"Darling," replied I, quietly, "if you love me, please let us postpone this interview to some time when you are in better humor."

"No," cried she, shaking her parasol. "This is really incredible, and it wounds me deeply to see how much you all want to get rid of me—my father, my aunt, and finally yourself. But I am not your slave. One can not marry off girls by main force, and I tell you very decidedly, my dear, as I would tell my father and my aunt, I don't wish to marry."

"As for that," said I, "nothing is easier, my dear child."

"I prefer a hundred times to go back to the convent."

"Excuse me, it is not to a convent you ought to go, but to an asylum. I am going to my room."

I was about to leave her, for my patience, great as it is usually, became exhausted, when she caught me by the arm. "Charlotte, do not abandon me, for I am so unhappy," said she in her tender way, and throwing herself upon my neck she began to cry. I was deeply concerned, and at the words, "I am unhappy," a sudden light flashed into my mind, which filled me with alarm.

"But, come," murmured I, between the caresses which I heaped upon her, "tell me what is the matter? What troubles you?"

Bending down her head, she answered in disjointed words: "Nothing, oh, nothing. I don't know. I really don't know."

When I saw that she was more composed, I again pressed her with questions; and she looked at me fixedly for a moment, as though on the point of confiding her secret to me, then she sighed and remained silent. Finally, she was able to give me a sort of explanation as to the cause of her distress and her emotion. As long as marriage appeared to her afar off, she contemplated it with the carelessness of a child, but as it came nearer and more real she could better understand its serious character, and drew back from a determination which would carry with it the happiness or the misery of her whole life. She concluded by begging me to allow her a few days more in which to reflect upon it.

I simply observed that she forced those gentlemen to a somewhat lengthy discipline, and should she remain some time longer without manifesting a preference for one or the other, we might fear to see them depart some fine morning completely discouraged.

"And a pleasant journey to them," added Cécile. We went in. I sought my room immediately, in haste to be alone and to try to put some order and quiet into my thoughts. I did not succeed. My head and my heart are utterly confused. It is impossible for me to mistake Cécile's sentiments. Her sudden indifference to the Messieurs de Valnesse, her words, her silence, her tears, are not to be interpreted in two ways. She loves, or thinks she loves, Monsieur d'Eblis.

That is her secret. Great God! is it possible? Of all the troubles which could be inflicted upon me, of all the afflictions which my imagination could conceive of, this would assuredly be the bitterest. A rivalry of the heart, a contest of jealousy between Cécile and me—a battle in which I must sacrifice either the dearest friendship or the dearest love. Oh, what an ordeal! And I have not even an opportunity to pray God to deliver me from it, for it is here—it is already upon me.

I may do my best, and try with all the strength of mind which is in me, to elevate my thoughts, but I can not bear to see that love which I would call mine given to another. I can not. All that I can do, and I will do it, is to enter this contest with a straight-forwardness and a loyalty which will be irreproachable; to say no word that may injure Cécile, nor even one that might help me too much; to wait with a bleeding heart, but peaceful conscience, until he chooses between us. If finally he should choose me, Cécile would suffer cruelly without doubt, poor girl! Nevertheless, knowing her as I do, I believe that, lively, tender, buoyant as her spirit is, she would be consoled in time. I, never! From the very beginning his inclination led him rather toward me than toward her. A woman can not be deceived in such things. My grandmother, too, has remarked it; and thus, though I am far from worthy of it, there is, it seems to me, between our two persons and our two characters more that is sympathetic and harmonious. Since that sweet evening when we seemed to understand each other so well, I have found him, it is true, somewhat cold and reserved. But he must have something on his mind; and he has seemed to be more occupied with, or, to speak more truly, more curious about Cécile. She amuses him, I think, more than she pleases him, but who knows? Ah, my darling, my darling, what pain you are giving me!

They are calling me for the afternoon walk. Monsieur d'Eblis accompanies us; and, now that my eyes are opened, the slightest circumstance, the least detail, may become a positive revelation.

Evening of the same day.—A singular adventure happened to Cécile in the course of our walk. We got into the carriage about two o'clock to-day to pay a visit to the Curé de Louvercy, who had made up a fishing party for us. His parsonage, which adjoins the church, is some kilometres from the château, and on a small river which is, I think, a branch of the Eure. One-half of our party took possession of the parsonage garden, which is on a peninsula running out into the river, and made preparations for fishing. Monsieur d'Eblis, Madame de Chagres, her husband, and I remained in the cemetery, which is one of the prettiest village cemeteries one ever saw. The church itself, hidden among the trees, is a graceful monument of the fifteenth century, whose porch and ogival windows are perfect jewels of carving. Monsieur d'Eblis proposed to draw it. Chairs were brought, and we formed a group about him, watching him as he worked, and admiring at the same time the play of light upon the water and through the leaves, for the day was superb. At the end of the wood which runs by the cemetery an ancient bridge is thrown across the river, and opposite, on the other side of the water, there is a rocky hill crowned with a patch of green. We were enjoying it all under the shade of an old yew tree, which, owing to the heat, gave out a resinous odor.

Cécile made her appearance after a little while, having become tired of fishing, and also perhaps of the absence of Monsieur d'Eblis. She came flying and running about him like a butterfly; then she ran around the little cemetery, reading the epitaphs in a low tone. But one thing above all the rest attracted her attention, and soon absorbed it completely: some one had died in the village, and a grave had been dug in the middle of the cemetery which would doubtless be filled the next morning. This open grave awakened an extraordinary interest in the mind of Cécile, and after approaching it several times with a mixture of fear and curiosity, she became emboldened and wanted to look at the bottom of it. This was difficult, because on all sides it was surrounded by piles of earth and stones, which had been taken out of it, and which gave way under one's feet. Yet she clung to her idea, and for the purpose of stooping over the grave without danger, she took hold of the top of a little cypress tree which grew on a hillock near by with one hand, and leaning on her parasol with the other, we saw her bend her delicate bust over and plunge an eager look into the grave. Monsieur d'Eblis raised his head, and with one glance took in the strange scene as it was lighted up by the bright summer's sun: a graceful form bending over a dark and gloomy hole, a fresh young face, half smiling, half terrified. He quickly turned over a leaf of his album as if intending to sketch the souvenir on another page. Then jumping up suddenly, he cried out: "Take care, Mademoiselle. My God! take care."

We were all on our feet at the same moment. The cypress to which Cécile clung with one hand had been half uprooted in the morning by the grave-digger; it now gave way and leaned toward her, and at the same time the heaps of dirt crumbled under her feet. She lost her balance, threw her arms forward, uttered a shrill cry, and disappeared in the yawning grave.

We ran forward overcome with feelings that it is difficult to describe. As for myself, I felt as though frozen lightning had passed through my body from head to foot. When we arrived, the poor girl had got up, and was standing on the bottom of the grave, with her hair down, motionless, dismayed, and looking at us with the smile of an idiot.

Messieurs de Valnesse ran forward with the rest of us when we heard her cry. Each one had advice to give as to the way of drawing her from the horrible tomb, and gave it confusedly. Arms were extended vainly. You know how deep these graves are. Some of the gentlemen said cords must be brought; some, chairs, and some, ladders. Cécile was under a nervous excitement which, if prolonged, might prove dangerous.

The calm, imperative tone of Monsieur d'Eblis made every one silent. He motioned us away with a wave of his hand.

"Come, Mademoiselle," said he, laughing, "don't lose your senses. This accident amounts to nothing—only keep cool, and in a moment you'll be out. I'm a pretty good gymnast, as you'll see. Now let me pass my hands under your two arms." He half knelt on the pile of dirt, and encouraging Cécile by his looks he raised her by the shoulders, and straightening himself little by little he brought her feet to the top of the bank. Pale as death, with half opened lips and eyes closed fast, she fainted away in his arms.

"She must not find herself here when she comes to," said Monsieur d'Eblis. "I will carry her to the orchard below there, where it is more cheerful."

As he walked out of the cemetery carrying Cécile in his arms, we opened the gate to the orchard for him, which was on the other side of the road. The moment he stopped to lay her gently on the ground she opened her eyes, gazed at him for a moment or two without being able to account for her position, then, remembering, she smiled, and whispering, "A father to me," closed her eyes and fainted away again.

Water was brought. I bathed her temples and loosened her clothes, and she was not long in coming to herself again. A quarter of an hour later we set out for the château. On the way we tried hard to turn the adventure into a joke, laughing heartily over it, but without altogether driving away the superstitious feeling it had left on the mind of Cécile, for while trying to join in our laugh she continued pale and thoughtful.

It may turn out, however, that she will owe her future happiness to this lugubrious incident. I walked beside Monsieur d'Eblis as he carried her along in his arms, and the expression of his face as it bent over the pretty sleeping head, denoted not only sympathy and pity, but admiration of the tenderest kind. In even the weakness of this delicate being, always requiring protection, there must be a powerful attraction to a soul of such strength.

Ah, my Cécile, Providence is indeed for you!

July 30th.—Nothing very new. That Cécile is now more under the influence, yoke, or charm of Monsieur d'Eblis is evident, and every one begins to notice it. I know not what to think of him; he is an enigma. In his manner toward her, one can perceive that his curiosity is excited, his taste gratified, that he is amused and interested, that he has even much affection for her, but nothing it seems to me of passion—nothing which is worth, if I dare say it, one of those looks which I found so often fixed upon me formerly, and which even now, I think, I receive at times. His voice even in speaking to me shows a tremulousness that I do not perceive when he is with Cécile. What is passing in that heart?

I was walking in the park this morning asking myself that question again and again. I own that I cried a little, and yet my tears do not come easily. But this continual agitation to which I am a prey, this secret rivalry with my best friend, this strife between my conscience and my duty, my unfortunate passion and my shattered friendship—all this martyrdom, for such it is—try my nerves frightfully. As I made a turn in the lonely path where I was walking, I came suddenly upon Madame de Louvercy. As I hastily dried my eyes, Madame de Louvercy, who had her handkerchief in her hand, appeared to do the same. She also had been weeping, but was not able to recover herself as soon as I did.

"You surprise me in one of my desponding moments," she said.

"Is Monsieur Roger suffering more than he did?" asked I.

"Physically, no; but his moral condition makes me despair. For several days, while he consented to amuse himself a little in our company, I thought there was improvement; but it was an illusion. I even imagine now that being in society has made him feel more sensibly the extent of his misfortune, and increased his regrets and his humiliation. You can not know it, but each day it is made apparent to me. His ravings are revolting; they have all the fury of a fallen angel, and terrify me as a mother—alas! and as a Christian. Ah, my dear child," added she, "for such misfortunes there is only God, and he does not believe in Him, or what is still worse, perhaps, he is angry with Him. He avoids the church as though he were a leper. If he could only pray for once, I feel that he would be quieted and consoled. But he will not, though he loves me well, and never since his accident have I been able to induce him to. I have even gone on my knees to him without avail."

And the poor woman gave free course to her tears. We gazed at each other with looks full of grief, finding I know not how great a consolation in bringing our heavy hearts thus closely together.

August 1st.—This is a day that will count in my life.

As there has been less activity in the château for some time past, no walk seemed to be arranged for to-day. All remained in their rooms or in the parlor. Having scratched off the foregoing lines I thought I would return to the sad-looking path where I met Madame de Louvercy, and there continue the reverie she had interrupted. I was just entering it when I heard the sound of rapid steps behind me. I turned my head and recognized Monsieur d'Eblis.

"Pardon me, Mademoiselle," said he, with the most serious air; "will you allow me to have a few moments' conversation with you?"

At these words my heart stopped beating, and when it began again the reaction was so violent that my life seemed passing away. I knew that the moment had come, and that the word which would decide my fate was about to be uttered.

"Sir," said I, hiding my emotion as well as I was able, but very imperfectly I fear, "I will listen to you."

He was very much disturbed and at first walked in silence by my side; then said he: "Mademoiselle, I fear that I shall appear to you guilty of a great indiscretion, but I hope to prove at least the profound, the respectful confidence with which you inspire me, since with you rests the happiness or the misery of my existence. You are in a position to know Mademoiselle Cécile de Stèle better than any one else in the world. You have been friends from childhood; you were companions at the convent. Is it not so?"

"Yes, sir."

"You have been able to study and judge of her character to its very depths. Before offering her my hand, before consecrating my life to her, may I ask what you think of her?"

"All the good possible."

"You understand, Mademoiselle, that this is no ordinary question. I conjure you, let there be nothing ordinary in your answer. Any one can see that Mademoiselle de Stèle is a very attractive young girl, full of grace, striking in appearance, brilliant, and witty. All that I know. But her disposition is so eccentric that it astonishes me; it even frightens me a little, I acknowledge. May I ask of you, of you who must have penetrated all its mysteries, what I may hope or fear from it?"

"Cécile, sir, never knew her mother. She has been brought up by her father, whose only child she is, and who has somewhat, perhaps considerably, spoiled her. This accounts for the unevenness of her moods, and those eccentricities and caprices which strike you so forcibly. But she has an excellent disposition, and is the most tender, the most reliable, and the most devoted of friends. She will make the most tender, the most reliable, and the most devoted of wives. On one condition, however, and that is this: if she is well guided she will love her guide."

"I ask a thousand pardons," resumed he, "but do you believe that she can love a man with a character as different from her own as mine is, for example; a man whose seriousness almost amounts to sternness and forms so striking a contrast with the levity, or apparent levity, of her disposition. You do not answer me."

"It is because I choose my words—not my thoughts; for my thoughts do not hesitate. I believe, sir, that if there is a man in the world who can attach Cécile to him, correct her little faults, develop her good qualities, and make her finally an honest, faithful, happy wife, you are he."

He bowed low, and then, after a short pause, asked:

"You love her very much, do you not?"

"Very much."

"That of itself is great praise. I thank you, Mademoiselle; for I do accept all you have told me with the greatest confidence."

We had now nearly reached the château. He took the road to it, after thanking me again in words, as well as in manner and in look. As for me, as soon as he was out of sight I sank down upon one of the seats along the path; for, after being sustained during the interview by a strong exercise of will and by my pride, now that it was over, I felt as though the earth was slipping from under me. There was nothing more to be said. From that moment my poor life seemed a failure, and my heart of twenty years carried a wound which time will never heal.

But how account for such a procedure on the part of a man of honor, or of one of any sense of delicacy. By what hidden prompting, through what refinement of cruelty, has it been brought about? Can he have had a consciousness of the horrible torture inflicted upon me? I do not know. But thus it happened, and that is all that I can say.

After his first words, after the first blow was received, I had but a single thought, which was to preserve my womanly dignity and suppress any movement of ignoble jealousy which might induce me to calumniate Cécile. Perhaps my over-anxiety on this point was excessive, and led me in my praise beyond what I thought, and perhaps even beyond the truth. Yet excess on that side was better than on the other.

Even then I was not at the end of my day's trials. As soon as I was able to stand, I began to walk and try to quiet the agitation I was in. I went on straight before me without knowing where I was going, and was crossing one of the principal avenues of the park, when the noise of wheels caused me to turn my head. It was Monsieur Roger de Louvercy in his dog-cart. He was alone; for notwithstanding the entreaties of his mother he almost always refuses to take a servant with him, following his custom in rejecting all assistance unless absolutely necessary. He was going very fast as he usually does, but seeing me he checked the speed of his horse with some difficulty, for he is very spirited, and stopped him two steps from me.

"Will you not ride, Mademoiselle?" asked he, with his somewhat ironical and bitter smile.

"No, I am much obliged to you."

"Is it my horse or myself which frightens you?"

"Neither the one nor the other."

"In that case, do let me have the pleasure of your company," said he.

"It seems to me," said I, "that it would not be altogether proper."

"Oh, not proper!" returned he, shaking his head. "Alas! in my company everything is proper. Besides, we will not leave our woods. Come, will you not—or am I decidedly horrible in your eyes?"

I saw that the pallor and the habitual sadness of his expression were increasing, and a feeling of pity overcame me. Besides, any diversion from my own thoughts was welcome. My head was half crazed, and it was indeed all one to me what I did at that moment. So I said:

"If it is only for a drive in the park, I will accept your invitation." After two attempts, I succeeded in getting into the dog-cart. The horse, a thorough-bred, danced about a great deal, and Monsieur de Louvercy had difficulty in holding him with his one hand. He dashed off immediately into a rapid gait. After he had gone a short distance, Monsieur de Louvercy said to me, laughing:

"You have missed your vocation, Mademoiselle."

"How is that?"

"You were born for a Sister of Charity. There was one at the Hospital of Orleans while I was there, who resembled you somewhat. It struck me the first time I saw you, although she was less beautiful. Are you of Creole origin?"

"No, I am a Parisian. Did the sister take good care of you?"

"Too good," answered he with a sigh.

"Why too good?"

"What was the use of preserving a life which could only become a burden to me and to others?"

"Will you allow me to tell you, sir, that you seem to be unjust to Providence? It has indeed cruelly afflicted you; but are you not too insensible to the advantages it has left you, and which so many other unfortunate people do not possess?"

"What advantages, I pray, Mademoiselle?"

"Well, you have a mother, first, with her incomparable tenderness; then all the attentions coming from so devoted and so rare an affection; and, finally, the opportunity of study, the leisure you are able to devote to it, the gratification it gives you, and the consideration that it promises."

"Yes," answered he, bitterly; "all that may keep a man from going crazy—but that is all; and even then there are moments when I imagine myself to be so, or actually am so."

He did not continue, but remained silent for some time, jerking the reins and hurting his horse's mouth, who needed nothing to excite him. At first he did not seem to notice that the animal was becoming impatient and getting the upper hand, but remarked:

"You saw d'Eblis this morning?"

"Yes; I had just parted from him when you met me."

"What a fine man he is! Don't you think so?"

I answered "Yes," with a simple inclination of the head. Then, looking at me, he remarked:

"You are pale, Mademoiselle. I noticed it before. Does anything trouble you?"

"No."

A wicked smile was playing about his lips, and, as though on purpose, he again jerked the reins. The horse sprang forward excitedly and ran away with us. Nearly throwing us on the avenue's fence in his furious and irregular course, he suddenly turned to the right, and, with all his speed, rushed on to the public road. I knew that this ended at a laundry on the bank of the river, which was very steep at that place.

Monsieur de Louvercy tried to calm him with his voice and with his hand, but he did not succeed. We flew along like the wind; the trees appeared and vanished as they do in dreams; I experienced a kind of vertigo as we neared the end of the road, and already perceived the mirrored sun sparkling in the water.

Monsieur de Louvercy turned toward me, and, with that cruel look which he has at times, said coldly:

"Mademoiselle Charlotte, do you cling much to life?"

No, in truth I did not cling much to it, and a simple movement of my head told him so.

"Nevertheless," cried he, "it would be a pity."

I do not know whether he has a secret for pacifying his horse, which he did not care to make use of up to that time, but almost immediately after, saying a word or two and moving his rein gently, the animal was quieted and fell into a reasonable gait, and we were able, just before reaching the river, to turn into a road which branched off.

Monsieur de Louvercy, whose coolness I could but admire, for we had certainly come very near being killed, then said quietly:

"That I should not cling to life is easily understood, but you—that is very mysterious!"

"Mysterious?" repeated I, smiling.

"Disappointed in love?" said he in a gravely ironical tone of voice, and, after a pause, "so beautiful, and neglected—that would be very strange."

"Sir," said I, excitedly, "your misfortune gives you great privileges. It does not, however, give you the right to insult a woman, I presume."

"Did I not tell you that I was crazy?"

"I see that it is so, sir, but you should have warned me of it before we started."

He was silent for a long time, biting his lips the while so violently that I saw the blood on them. At last he exclaimed in a voice full of contrition:

"Mademoiselle, I am indeed unworthy of the honor you have done me. I acknowledge it, and humbly ask you to forgive me."

"It is well, sir. Shall we return?"

We were then pretty far away in the country, for I could perceive through the trees the little church of Louvercy.

"We will return," said he, sorrowfully, "but, my God! must we go back angry with each other and enemies? Tell me, Mademoiselle, is there any thing on this earth that a poor miserable fellow like me can do to prove his profound respect for you, and to efface the remembrance of his hateful words?"

A sudden idea came into my head, remembering what Madame de Louvercy had told me that morning about the grief which the revolting impiety of her son had caused her, and seeing the little church near by.

"Yes," said I, all at once. "You can do something which will gain you my esteem, and, what is more, my friendship. You see the church down there? Go there and pray with me."

His brows suddenly contracted, but, in a somewhat gentle tone of voice, he said:

"My mother has told you?"

"Yes."

"And you wish it?"

"Yes."

"Let us go, then."

A few minutes after we were near the garden of the parsonage, which is contiguous to the church. The Curé's servant, who was working in it raised his head at the noise. Monsieur de Louvercy called him, and asked him to hold his horse. I got down, and even helped him to do so. We entered the cemetery and went into the ogival porch, to the great surprise of the servant, who was not accustomed to see Monsieur Roger in such places.

The interior of the church is very simple, the little nave quite white and bare. I preceded Monsieur de Louvercy, whose crutch resounded on the slabs and under the arched roof. Passing between two rows of chairs, we reached the seat reserved for Madame de Louvercy. I pointed out to him a low chair with a cushion in it, and in a low voice said:

"The prie-dieu of your mother."

Then I held him by the arm while he knelt on it. He allowed himself to be placed just as a child would, and bent his arms so that his head was resting on his hand, and I knelt beside him. While I was praying for both with all my soul his heart melted within him, and I heard him weep like a child. When we arose he showed me his face wet with tears, and said:

"See what you cause a soldier to do."

"But then you are forgiven," returned I, offering him my hand.

[CONTINUED IN NEXT NUMBER.]

An Iowa woman put starch in her husband's beer, thinking it was arsenic, and was surprised because it didn't stiffen him.

A SPELLING BEE AT ANGEL

Reported by Truthful James.

Waltz in, waltz in, ye little kids, and gather round my knee. And drop them books and first pot-books, and hear a yarn from me. I kin not sling a fairy tale of Jinny's fierce and wild. For I hold it is unchristian to deceive a simple child; But as from school yer driftin' by I thowt ye'd like to hear Of a "Spellin' Bee" at Angel's that we organized last year. It warn't made up of gentle kids—of pretty kids—like you. But gents ez had their reg'lar growth, and some enough for two. There woz Lanky Jim of Sutter's Fork, and Bilson of Lagrange. You start, you little kids, you think these are not pretty names, But each had a man behind it, and my name is Truthful James.

There waz Poker Dick from Whisky Flat, and Smith of Shooter's Bend. And Brown of Calaveras—which I want no better friend. Three-fingered Jack—yes, pretty dears—three fingers—you have five. Clapp cut off two—it's singlar, too, that Clapp ain't now alive. 'Twas very wrong, indeed, my dears, and Clapp waz much to blame; Likewise waz Jack, in after years, for shootin' of that same.

The nights waz kinder lengthenin' out, and the rains had just begun. And all the camp came up to Pete's to have their usual fun; But we all sot kinder sad-like around the bar-room stove. Till Smith got up, permississ-like, and this remark he hove: "Thar's a new game down in Frisco, thet ez far ez I kin see. Beats euchre, poker, and van-toon, they calls the 'Spellin' Bee.'"

Then Brown of Calaveras simply litched his chair and spake: "Poker is good enough for me," and Lanky Jim sez, "Shake!" And Bob allowed he warn't proud, but he "must say right thar That the man who tackled euchre had his education squar." This brought up Lenny Fairchild, the school-master, who said He knew the game, and he would give instructions on that head.

"For instance, take some simple word," sez he, "like 'separate.' Now, who can spell it?" Dog my skin, ef thar waz one in eight. This set the boys all wild at once. The chairs waz put in row, And at the head waz Lanky Jim, and at the foot waz Joe, And high upon the bar itself the school-master waz raised, And the bar-keep put his glasses down, and sat and silent gazed.

The first word out waz "parallel," and seven let it be, Till Joe waltzed in his double "l" betwixt the "a" and "e"; For, since he drilled them Mexicans in San Jacinto's fight, Thar warn't no prouder man got up than Pistol Joe that night—Till "rhythm" came! He tried to smile, then said, "they had him there."

And Lanky Jim, with one long stride, got up and took his chair.

O little kids, my pretty kids, 'twas touchin' to survey These bearded men, with weppings on, like school-boys at their play. They'd laugh with glee, and shout to see each other lead the van, And Bob sat up as monitor with a cue for a ratten, Till the chair gave out "incinerate," and Brown said he'd be burned If any such blamed word as that in school waz ever learned.

When "phthisis" came they all sprang up, and vowed the man who rung Another blamed Greek word on them be taken out and hung. As they sat down again I saw in Bilson's eye a flash, And Brown of Calaveras waz a-twistin' his mustache; And when at last Brown slipped on 'gneiss,' and Bilson took his chair, He dropped some casual words about some folks who dyed their hair.

And then the Chair grew very white, and the Chair said he'd adjourn; But Poker Dick remarked that he would wait and get his turn; Then, with a tremblin' voice and hand, and with a wanderin' eye, The Chair next offered "eider-duck," and Dick began with "I." And Bilson smiled—then Bilson shrieked! Just how the fight begun I never knowed; for Bilson dropped, and Dick he moved up one.

Then certain gents arose and said "they'd business down in camp;" And "ez the road waz rather dark, and ez the night waz damp, They'd"—here got up Three-fingered Jack and locked the door and yelled:

"No, not one mother's son goes out till that thar word is spelled!" But while the words waz on his lips, he groaned and sank in pain, And sank with Webster on his chest and Worcester on his brain.

Below the bar dodged Poker Dick, and tried to look ez he Waz huntin' up authorities that no one else could see; And Brown got down behind the stove, allowin' he "waz cold," Till it upst and down his legs the cinders freely rolled; And several gents called "Order!" till, in his simple way, Poor Smith began with "O, R, or"—and he waz dragged away.

O little kids, my pretty kids, down on your knees and pray! You've got your eddication in a peaceful sort of way; And bear in mind that may be sharps ez slings their spellin' square, But likewise slings their bowie-knives without a thought or care—You wants to know the rest, my dears? Thet's all! In me you see The only gent thet lived to tell about thet Spellin' Bee!

He ceased and passed, that truthful man; the children went their way, With downcast heads and downcast hearts—but not to sport or play. For when at eve the lamps waz lit, and supperless to bed Each child waz sent, with tasks undone and lessons all unsaid, No man might know the awful woe that thrilled their youthful frames, As they dreamed of Angel's Spelling Bee and thought of Truthful James.

Qy. Genil.

—Scribner's for November.

Bill of Fare for Six Persons.—Sunday, October 27, 1898.

Giblet.
Cantaleup.
Fried Clams.
Deviled Chicken, with Sauce.
Baked Tomatoes. Oyster Plant.
Roast Venison. Salt Lake Potatoes Baked.
Carrot Salad.
Raspberries, with Bavarian Cream.
Fruit-bowl of Peaches, Pears, Apples, Figs, Plums, and Grapes.

TO DEVIL CHICKEN.—Boil the chicken tender in a little salted water. When cold, it is cut into pieces. These pieces are basted with butter and broiled.

SAUCE.—One teaspoonful of made mustard, two tablespoonfuls of Worcester's shire sauce, three tablespoonfuls of vinegar. Boil all together and pour over the chicken. This dish is generally served on the Cunard steamers for supper.

The romance of Judge Orson Brook's marriage in Denver is of no ordinary sort. Forty-five years ago a Massachusetts maiden promised to marry him. They had a childish quarrel, and separated, he to go West, and ultimately to marry there; she to remain and be led to the altar in her native village. In a few years she had lost her husband and he had buried his wife. Both were then married a second time, and after a lapse of years again laid husband and wife in the grave. Chance then threw the Judge and his first love together, and they married. He is 70 and she 68.

Some eyes threaten like a loaded and leveled pistol, and others are as insulting as hissing or kicking; some have no more expression than blueberries, while others are as deep as a well which you can fall into.

Appear to be better than you are, and aim to be what you appear to be.

NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Rates of Subscription, $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance. Postage prepaid. City subscribers served for 35 cents per 4 weeks. Single copies, 10 cents.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."
 Branch Office, Cooper's Bookstore, 746 Market Street
 Agent at San Jose—F. A. Taylor.
 News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders should be addressed.
 A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PINLEY, }
 FRED. M. SOMERS, } Editors.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1878.

There is one great pregnant fact indicating that the gloomy period of our national depression is fast passing away. It indicates the lifting of the cloud from our business horizon, and gives promise of a bright and prosperous future. The exports of the United States during the last fiscal year exceeded the imports by millions of dollars. This indicates prosperity; it shows that we are becoming economical; it suggests the superior skill of our mechanics; it proclaims the enterprise of our merchants, and, better than anything and everything else, it takes the conceit out of our English, German, French, and Belgium cousins, and teaches them that brains are more than a match for money—that cheap labor is a snare and a delusion.

The New York Times, under caption of "The Curiosities of the American Exporting Trade," groups many interesting facts, and prophesies the good time coming when Kearney will become a bloated bondholder, Schwab will own a brewery and supply beer to the Bavarians, Chinese cheap labor will be welcomed by its whilom opponents turned manufacturers, greenbacks will advance to a premium, gold will be a nuisance, subsidies to steamship lines will be regarded with contempt, and many other equally incredible things from the present point of view will come to pass. Taking the figures of 1875-6-7 as a basis, we have advanced at the rate of $30,000,000 in two years. Our exports to-day are more than double those of 1860, in which year there was a very heavy export trade, the one article of cotton alone amounting to over $190,000,000, more than twice the cotton export of 1855. In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, the increase over 1877 was nearly $65,000,000, or about 11 per cent., and this notwithstanding the greatly lessened demand for war material consequent upon the cessation of hostilities abroad. The possibilities of the future are enormous. To say that our progress promises to equal that of the past three years is to claim too little. The least we can look for will be an expansion on the compound interest plan.

Our dry goods and cotton fabrics are superior to those of England, and are largely replacing European goods in the markets of China and India. Time was when England was regarded as the work-shop of the world, and defied competition, boastfully claiming that cheap labor, cheap money, and the proximity of iron and coal, made successful rivalry by America altogether impossible. We are now sending iron to Great Britain, and competing with Manchester and Birmingham in fine cutlery. English papers are filled with complaints of American competition and consequent loss of home trade. One paper—the British Mail—tells of a house in Birmingham which is manufacturing "Yankee pattern household sundries, such as egg-whisks, nutmeg-graters, etc.," and placing them on the market as American goods. In another we learn that several extensive padlock makers in the South Staffordshire district are "busy at work upon an order for padlocks upon a favorite United States pattern," and American manufacturers are warned to immediately register their trade-mark in Great Britain under the new treaty. Could any plainer acknowledgment of defeat be given than this?

In all American exports—including breadstuffs—since the foundation of the Republic, three commodities have stood forth prominent in amount and value—cotton, tobacco, and cheese, and of these cotton has been the king. In the fiscal year 1860, during which the largest crop was raised and the greatest quantity exported, 1,767,686,338 pounds were sent abroad, over 1,265,000,000 going to Great Britain. Last year, according to the official report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, a greater quantity of manufactured tobacco, and more cigars and cigarettes, were removed directly from the manufactories for exportation than during any previous year of which an account has been kept by the Internal Revenue Office. The excess in tobacco over the year preceding was nearly 3,000,000 pounds. Of the total amount England takes over 1,000,000; Australia comes next, Germany next, and the United States of Columbia next. There is scarcely any spot in the civilized world to which we do not export our manufactured tobacco direct. In Germany the clippings or refuse of the cigars made in this country have recently found a profitable market at from two to five cents per pound. Formerly these clippings were allowed to accumulate in American manufactories for months, until some speculator happened along and took the lot for a song. Now agents have been sent out through Canada to buy up all they can find, with a view to shipping it to Europe. Immense quantities of American made cigars have, within the past year, been sold in England, where they are eagerly purchased as cheaper and more suited to the popular taste than any cigars heretofore imported into that country. On one day in March last a single shipment was made aggregating 141,000, and it is estimated that the trade already returns at the rate of $4,000,000 per year, equal to an annual profit of $120,000.

The foreign demand for American cheese exhibits a growth unparalleled by any farm product, except perhaps cotton. As recently as forty years ago the exports amounted to but 411,338 pounds. Last year they reached the enormous aggregate of 107,364,666 pounds. If this were loaded on drays, each carrying one ton, and occupying eight yards, the line would extend 244 miles, or a greater distance than from Washington to New York. If the shipment were regular during every secular day, in the year the daily movement to the wharves for shipment would exceed 172 tons. The quantity of milk used in the production of 107,000,000 pounds of cheese may be computed by those having leisure and sufficient agricultural knowledge. Nine-tenths of this vast amount finds a market in Great Britain, which formerly stood preëminent in the reputation of her dairy products. Our dairymen have succeeded in imitating the size, general appearance, and even the flavor of the English production so closely, that, being able to sell at a much lower price, they have actually beaten the Englishman on his own ground. In Germany a demand for American cheese has also sprung up, but it has been too recent to permit of the presentation of the results accomplished.

On the subject of breadstuffs, every child knows that this country has been for some time the granary of the world. Nor will the ordinary newspaper reader require to be informed that American fresh meat and mutton, both slaughtered and on the hoof, have, within a comparatively short time, to quote an English newspaper, "deprived the English farmer of his last resource, his stalwart ox," and made the national roast beef a common thing in many a British household where it was a rarity before. Our refrigerator tonnage, which was but 8,000 tons in 1876, is now 28,000 tons. This covers oysters, butter, fruits, eggs, canned goods, and a thousand and one other perishable articles of food, the export trade of which is increasing enormously from year to year. If this thing keeps on, it will not be long before America is the butcher's shop and grocery store as well as the granary and manufactory of the world. What will be thought of the United States shipping plum pudding to England, potatoes to Ireland, oatmeal to Scotland, toys to Nuremberg, and lager beer to Germany? Yet such are the facts, and they are no more astonishing than the now thrice-told tale of the regular and profitable sale of American cotton goods in Manchester, and American cutlery and hardware in Birmingham. The business of making and canning plum pudding for export is regularly carried on at Dover, Delaware, and elsewhere. The trade is not a new one, and exports are regularly made to England. A Philadelphia firm sell large quantities of mincemeat in the same country. Steamer agents say that potatoes to Ireland are the commonest thing in the world, and the business of shipping them has been of long duration. On April 23d 1,100 bags of oatmeal were shipped to Glasgow, Scotland.

The export trade in toys, which amounted last year to over $1,000,000, began some five or six years ago through some presents sent abroad. Now nearly every steamer carries large quantities. The principal articles of export are the mechanical or "clock-work" and the steam toys, but there are also large shipments of tin and wooden toys, most of which class were formerly exported from England or Germany. Wood is much cheaper in America than in Europe, and machines work faster than hands. Very few mechanical toys are now imported, and only the finer French and Austrian work for show-pieces in windows. American ingenuity has also multiplied the varieties of mechanical toys, and the American manufacturers of the clock mechanism have met all overtures for the purchase of the detached works by European dealers by demanding prices which are practically prohibitory. In May last a firm of German brewers sent a cask of American lager beer to Count Bismarck, and in due time received a letter from him through the German Consul thanking them. Since the reception of the letter the firm have received several orders from German houses for samples of lager beer, and the head of the concern has sailed for Europe to make arrangements for its regular export. The Englishman has long had American turkeys regularly at Christmas, and he likes them. In January last a famous English house sent an agent to this country with orders to ship regularly every week fifty barrels of the finest quail, prairie hens, grouse, woodcock, wild turkeys, canvas-back ducks, and other American game that he could procure. The enterprise has proved a great success. Buffalo and antelope meat, venison, and salmon are also among the innumerable articles of food sent from this country, not only to England, but to nearly every other civilized nation. It would be unpardonable to close this paragraph without a mention of the fact that a Boston company are turning out 8,000 cans (equal to 24,000 pounds) of baked beans and cod-fish-balls daily, and that they find a large demand for both specialties in England, France, West Indies, and South America.

There are numerous other points in the American export trade that must be both novel and curious to the general reader. Take the item of coffins, for instance. Coffins and caskets in the latest styles have long been among the regular articles of shipment abroad, and they command a large sale among the subjects of effete monarchies. A warehouse containing two thousand of American make was recently opened in London. Think of exporting hoop-skirts at this late date. Twenty-two dollars worth went abroad last year. Berlin has sent a large order for corsets to Worcester, Mass., and another for American silk to Rockville, Conn. Will any one question the good taste of the German girls after that? Essex, Mass., exports steel pens to England. An American firm have made a complete outfit of locks for the new Imperial Post-office in Bremen, where the American system of lock-boxes has been introduced. Two cargoes of American coal were recently sent to Italy, and were sold readily at $7.72 per ton, which covers cost and freightage, and leaves a fair margin of profit. Heretofore over 200,000 tons of English coke per annum, at $11.58 per ton, has been used in the Mediterranean basin. A staple article of export to South America and the West Indies is patent water-closets. Another is American confectionery.

Peanut oil, from North Carolina, sells well in Italy, and cotton seed oil has almost taken the place of olive oil throughout Europe. The export of this latter commodity jumped from 281,000 gallons in 1876 to 1,705,000 gallons in 1877. American jewelry goes everywhere, and American watches have nearly if not quite driven Swiss and English made watches out of their own markets. The British Government purchased 200 stem-winders in December for the use of conductors and engineers on one of the State railroads in India, and in February an agent of the Rotherham Watch Company, of England, visited this country and ordered a number of sets of the tools and machinery used here. A Newark, New Jersey, sash and blind manufacturer filled a large order for shipment to Turkey in June. A Troy bell-founder has recently fitted out churches in Constantinople and Bangkok. American locomotive manufacturers are hard at work filling orders from Russia and South America. Our carriages, street-cars, and vehicles of all sorts are being sent in all directions. Our petroleum lights the world. Statuary and paintings are regularly exported from this country to Europe. We import short-horn Durhams, breed them for a time, and sell back to the fancy breeders at famous prices, viz: the Duchess of Oneida, a six-year-old cow, for $30,000. We are supplying England and France with the best trotting stock. The Emperor Napoleon drove four American trotters in hand in the Bois de Boulogne before he lost his throne. Among other important items of export are books, scientific instruments, wines, pianos, carpets, furniture, toilet soaps, fine and coarse boots and shoes, glassware, scales, stoves, leather, writing inks, slates, marbles, pins, and tools and machinery of all kinds. And the best of it is these things sell on their merits, and not on account of their cheapness. But the list is unending.

If our people would, for say ten years, deny themselves the indulgence of foreign luxuries, our gentlemen the privilege of drinking foreign wines and liquors, smoking Havana cigars, and dressing themselves in foreign cloths, and our ladies the luxuries of foreign dress, ornaments, and toilet articles, America would become the richest country in the world. Our bonds would be returned upon us. Both national and railroad securities would be owned in America, where they ought to be owned, and England would no longer hold to us the attitude of pawn-broker and financial uncle. This time is coming, and, at the present rate of progress, seems not far distant. With it will come our commercial supremacy upon the ocean, and leave us where, except for the war, we would long since have been, the leading commercial country of the world, as we are now first in agricultural, mineral, and mechanical wealth.

PRATTLE.

The Protestants are having a rather hard time of it in Bohemia. A religious weekly complains that in Prague each time they hold services a permit must be obtained from the Government, and, it seems, sometimes the Government is in an impious frame of mind and has to be exhorted a long time before it will give it. Then a police officer has to attend, and, which is worse, must be paid a fee. Neither is it reported that any police officer has ever been converted. Altogether, Prague appears to be a pretty stony soil, and the good American missionary intent upon its cultivation vainly beats his sword into a plowshare, for it beats the plowshare. This is to be regretted for the sake of the parsons, who (their own country being now so entirely pious as to no longer require their services) must go to Prague or go to work.

The theatrical reporter of the Bulletin speaks of "the experienced and critical audience" of the first night of Falmitza. Why, you preposterous creature, it is not the audience that advertises!

The Providence that feeds the young ravens when they cry is not unmindful of the local wits. If the marriage of Mr. Cashdollar to Miss Maylick, announced in last Tuesday's papers, had been postponed much longer some of them would assuredly have starved. The names can be tormented into at least six "well defined and several" puns; and at a cent a pun this means a tolerably good meal, as wits' meals go.

Time was and time is—each dog has his day.
Wit, that once reigned and dined like a Pharaoh,
Naked and blind by the side of the way,
Whines: "Date obolus Belisario!"

Here's an easier one, as the riddle-monger—himself a shining light of the modern school—would say:

Alack, the poor wit!
Like a bear in a pit,
He yearneth all day for his prog;
And he maketh a lap
For whatever may hap,
As he sitteth up-ended, agog,
And he'll gratefully take Deleterious cake,
Though the food of his fathers was hog.

Will some one have the goodness to tell me what under the sun a damstock is? I have heard the word repeatedly during the past week. Sometimes it is used in the plural, and then it frequently has no context—a mere "cry between the silences." In such instances I have fancied I noted an unusual accent on the initial syllable; when it is part of a connected and coherent discourse it is commonly accented on the final. Come, come, what is a damstock?

They are trying to beat the Black Hills road-agents with an iron-clad coach, but it is believed this will merely alter the character of these gentlemen's operations from placer-working—dropping the driver with a shotgun and taking the treasure-box off the top of the coach—to regular mining, with improved machinery and a diamond drill.

It was owing to my chum's talk
That I bought, not all, but some stock
In a pit upon the Comstock,
Dug for me.

Now the wild wish has arisen
To immure my chum in prison;
For the stock I bought was his'n,
Do you see?

Ah! if I but had that smarty
With my fingers round his heart, he—
But he's gone off with a party
To Paree.

The truly good who have found in the Decalogue a commandment which reads, "Remember the Sabbath day to make thy neighbor keep it holy," are dutifully determined to incorporate it in the State Constitution. It seems to me that under the laws we already have a man can obtain all the rest on Sunday that he requires, unless he is so nervously pious that it worries him to think of the sturdy preachers all about him, noisily pounding the pulpits that might just as well have been pounded on Saturday afternoon.

From childhood I have been passionately fond of the heliotrope. The divine plant has had from my heart the devotion that other men give to women, to gold, or to God; and my loyal fidelity to it has, I think, exercised a wholesome restraint on me in matters of love, business, and religion. As I slept, the other night, a spray of my adored flower on my pillow, I dreamed that I was on a large island in a tropic sea. Close beside me was the trunk of a giant tree—a heliotrope—whose branches covered the whole island and whose top touched heaven. All the fowls of the air built nests and sang in its foliage. Overcome by the ravishing perfume, I sank, swooning with happiness, at its root, yet, gazing dreamily seaward, could not help observing that of the many ships drawn convergent toward the island by the tree's matchless beauty all those beating up from leeward, on arriving within range of the odor which to me was heaven, put about and fled, holding their noses in the brine. Looking upward I then perceived that there was not a flower on the tree; the odor came from the swollen bodies and dropping oils of my literary enemies, one of whom was hanging by the neck from every branch. Filled with inexpressible rapture I awoke, the fragrant spray of heliotrope entangled in my moustache.

Rejoice, O mine enemies, and sing songs, that for once ye were my rivals—in a dream. A dream that was not your own! For in my dreaming I thought your attachment to my beloved mistress, the heliotrope, was stronger than mine, hoped it was more enduring, and felt it better for posterity. I regarded the union without jealousy, favored it without affectation, and remembered it with delight. It was a wild, impossible fancy, and it passed; yet waking I cherish the fond hope that Heaven will some day grant me the paternal satisfaction of seeing you all happily united to a sour-apple tree.

It has been decided by a St. Louis Judge that street-crossings are made for the pedestrians, and it is the duty of all drivers of vehicles, street-cars not excepted, to pull up when a fellow is making the transit afoot. It is to be hoped our citizens will remember this when crossing the bows of a street-car, and treat the conductor's frantic bell with dignified inattention. It is reassuring to have the law on one's side when the pole of a horse-car is being thrust into one's other side. The trouble is that at such times

"our thoughts take wildest flight,
Even at the moment when they should array Themselves in pensive order" to enjoy the consciousness of having placed the driver distinctly in the wrong; and when hastily endeavoring to disengage the complications of one's small intestine from the flying feet of the horses, one's

"manners have not that repose
Which stamps the caste of Vere de Vere."

It is all very well for starveling editors, dyspeptic scholars, and corn-fed politicians to disparage Lord Beaconsfield's diplomatic achievement in acquiring the Island of Cyprus, but no self-respecting gentleman can be insensible to the fact that Cyprus exports more potted ortolans than any country in the world. When there has been found a better bird than the ortolan it will be possible to outline a nobler foreign policy than that of Lord Beaconsfield.

Be good enough to contrast Lord Beaconsfield's acquisition of Cyprus with the late Mr. Seward's vaunted feat in securing Alaska. Bah! there is precisely the difference between them that there is between the flesh of an ortolan and the flesh of a penguin. Seward was a gentleman, and knew well enough the distinction between calipash and calipee, but, bless the soul of him, he had to take such territory as he could get an appropriation to pay for. Did a dunder-head Congress permit the annexation of San Domingo, actually belted with a circlet of green turtle, every one a gem worth a king's ransom? Did not every "meagre muse-rid mope, adust and thin," every blade-faced "thinker," with his belly sticking to his back, every husk-eating prodigal son of a gun, every flabby-fibred, sodden-witted, lard-lover in the land, get upon his hind legs and say there was a "job" in it? May be there was—what man of sense would deign to inquire? There was turtle in it—great gobs and dollops of turtle, as green as emerald—colossal collocations of foamy fat, redolent, luminous, musical!—masses for the repose of the undeparted soul!

Speaking of turtle, did I ever mention—it has always pleased me mightily—that ancient minute of the Royal Society Club, of London. This terse but touching record relates, of a turtle intended for the club table, that it "died on its way home from the West Indies." Languages are not immortal, but the noble tongue in which such a thing as that can be said may await dissolution with Christian tranquillity.

What broad fields of thought are sometimes opened up by a chance expression. (Peace, peace, thou restless reader; I mean to no more than set my toe in one.) That languages are perishable goods, to be used quickly ere they spoil, is trite enough, but I doubt if we duly consider all that it implies. How many of us can intelligently read Chaucer and Gower, or even Shakspeare or Spenser, without a glossary? I have in memory a recent article in an English magazine defining scores, and mentioning, I think, hundreds, of obsolete and obsolescent terms from the works of that ancient worthy, Charles Dickens! And is it not matter of common remark that nearly all the earlier poems of Mr. Cornelius Mahoney are unintelligible, even to the commentators?

One effect of the transitory nature of languages is to impede national civilizations. Each generation profits directly from the intellectual store of its predecessors only; from antiquity, indirectly, at second-hand. For every learning there is a forgetting; the prospect changes, but the horizon has ever the same radius. Of what use to the mariner is his regularly posted log if he has with equal regularity torn out all but the current page of his record, or used ink that has faded in a week? Clearly, the traveler has little profit of his long road who remembers but the last mile. Each generation is compelled to learn by experience whatever it can not read; and so it occurs that what was known and recorded by the earliest English idiot, Mr. William D. Pollock has had to find out for himself.

In its course through the centuries a language resembles a certain vine cultivated by the Thibetans, and called in their tongue "the traveling reptile," which, rooting wherever it touches the earth, grows at one end and decays at the other, thus accomplishing journeys of great length, and perhaps carrying the mails, I don't know. Their philosophers, by the way, have for some centuries disputed as to whether the vine arrived at one point is the same vine that set out from another; but up to the year 1847 the discussion had evolved more heat than light. It seems to me a scientific, rather than a philosophic, problem, and I should like to have our Academy of Sciences go to Thibet for its solution, or for almost any reason.

The Rev. Dr. Kalloch, who possibly mistakes the greed of notoriety for the call of duty, and the clapping of an audience for a sign of the divine favor, is to the fore with another lecture—on monopolies; "his attack," says a morning journal, "being mainly on the railroads."

From the summit of the town,
Yawning like a lazy Turk,
Stanford sleepily looks down
On the parson at his work:

"All my roads the man attacks,
Tearing up the rails I lay;
Neither leaves he any tracks
In 'the straight and narrow way.'"

Concerning man and wife, it is appointed of nature that the woman shall be most admired by the man when she is living, the man by the woman when he is dead. According to woman, the master-work of creation is a dead husband.

"That country has the freest institutions," says a contemporary, "where the press is least hampered by the government." Ah! yes, jesso—

"a factious band agree
To call it freedom when themselves are free."

The moral and elevating influence of the press has penetrated to Bodie: the local lights of the romantic school are so disconcerted in the presence of the Weekly Standard's shining liar that they occasionally blurt out the truth about their mines—whereby many investors are deceived and ruined.

The value of the opinions of "business men" as guides in legislation is shown in a lambent light by the action of our Chamber of Commerce the other day. Last May the Chamber recorded its approval of the proposed commercial treaty with France, whereby it was intended to materially reduce the duties on imported wines. But on Tuesday last, at the instance of the California Vinicultural Association, they unanimously recalled their approval and earnestly implored Congress to continue the present tariff. Now it so happens (that's the word for it) that a large number of the members of the Chamber of Commerce are opposed to protective duties—where local or personal interests are not concerned. They are sturdy free-traders—in Pennsylvania and Massachusetts. It would not surprise if now, by way of atonement for their latest action in this matter, they should demand the abolition of duties all over the continent of Europe. When your man of affairs, looking over the accounts of his political conscience, finds himself debited with a selfish opinion on a matter affecting his own interests, he immediately balances the books by crediting himself with a liberal one on a matter affecting the interests of others.

Your man of affairs, when affairing,
I honor (removing my hat)
But when he goes thinking, by—(swearing.)
Boys beat him at that!

He hasn't the (meaningly tapping
My forehead.) His thinker—by gum!
I wouldn't give that for it (snapping
My finger and thumb.)

Mr. Edward Jenningsen, an Arizona sheep-herder, has had the misfortune to kill his overseer under circumstances that seem to justify the severest censure. Details are lacking, but it is tersely explained in the dispatches that Mr. Jenningsen was dissatisfied with the breakfast served him, but whether his objection concerned its quality or its quantity is not stated. An imperfection in neither particular would, it seems to me, be sufficient cause for taking human life; for whereas the Decalogue is silent as to the service of bad breakfasts, it distinctly prohibits murder; though obviously the Decalogue is not the whole law. Whatever may be the moral aspect of the incident it will have a certain value when the evidence is all in, as marking the limit of patience in Arizona. In San Francisco the breakfasts commonly served at hotels are not in all respects what they should be, but in the manner of remonstrance it seems a clear enough duty to keep inside the law; though every one must determine for himself when a shot at the landlord has become an act of simple self-preservation.

COQUETTES.

The fickleness of woman has been the subject of animadversion by wounded swains and jilted lovers for many a long century. The fact that the number of coquettes is not lessened by their harangues proves that there is some necessity for their existence, some circumstance of birth or disposition that has made them such. Few women are wantonly and willfully cruel. That this is true I am convinced. No woman likes to give pain for cruelty's sake; no woman refuses an honest, earnest love without a strong sentiment of pity, albeit the confession of such love be a triumph to her vanity and a tribute to her superiority. It is not so much that women are fickle as that men are unworthy. A woman who holds herself to be the equal of a high-minded, devoted, chivalrous man, feels it necessary that she be sure he is such before she gives her heart to his keeping. There is an aphorism of Madame de Staël's, which translated reads:

"Love in a woman's life is a history; in man's, an episode."

This is true, yet not, for the happiness of women or the honor of mankind, including all men. It is this completeness of the love-history of woman's life that needs, if possible, the full assurance of continuity, which makes women hesitate. In too many cases does she come to perceive that love will be episodic in most men's lives, that she is rated highest who is hardest won, and that too often after winning one is regarded "as a tale that is told." It is not all women who reason deep enough to perceive this—it is not all women who are constructed to care if they do. The coquette has a heart, if you can but reach it, but in the search for it take care that your wings are not singed. There are not many men who stand the crucial test of deep feeling, large-hearted devotedness, and prescient affection which the isolated nature of a coquette demands. One precurrent cause of unhappiness is a lack of chivalrous consideration, of purity of principle, in the present generation. Coquettes are not shallow; no mere frivolous woman can be what the world terms a coquette. They are vivacious, witty, imaginative, tender at times, often handsome, and they possess a subtle, sympathetic attraction impossible to describe. When some new star rises in the horoscope of their lives, they imagine it possible to be the ideal knight for whose coming they have longed. Friendship strengthens this hope, but closer intimacy shatters the dream, resulting in conviction to the woman that hope lures falsely, to the man that consistency is a lost jewel, and to the world that the woman is a coquette. It is true that the fatal defect of our imagination wrecks too many women's lives. Nectar and ambrosia do not fall to the lot of ordinary mortals, yet the knowledge that women have been so loved, cherished, and protected, that the crown of wifehood was the greatest glory of life, serves to relumine the future after successive failures. This imagination is, in too many instances, the primary cause of fickleness. There is such a sinking of the heart, such a fading away of the couleur de rose, such a fainting and falling of sacrificial inspirations and aspirations, when one discovers that the lover one fondly believed immaculate and orthodox has been guilty of heresy, that he in whom truth seemed ingrained has stooped to deceit (that most unforgivable of sins against integrity), that he in whom all good seemed vivified is clay instead of Carrara. But this very imaginative quality constitutes one of the chief charms of its possessor, since under the influence of it a woman treats all men with deferential consideration, and a suave charm of manner which suggests that she believes them all to be heroes, knights sans peur et sans reproche. Of the lesser degrees of coquetry all women are liable to be accused. While few possess the full complement of charms and accomplishments accorded to coquettes in general, all women display more or less of coquetry which lacks the earnestness of a deep-seated longing, and brings upon woman the stigma of fickleness. Ninon de l'Enclos must have been moulded after this pattern—as also Diana of Poitiers. The Grecian princess Omphale must have been a wily coquette when she wore Hercules' lion-skin and wielded his club, well knowing that the playful assumption of manly dignity would enhance her feminine charms in his partial eyes. That graceful writer, Rose Terry Cooke, says of "La Coquette":

"You look at me with tender eyes,
That, had you worn a month ago,
Had slain me with divine surprise;
But now I do not see them glow."

And Mrs. Bradley charmingly writes:

"I passed before her garden gate:
She stood among her roses,
And stooped a little from her state,
In which her pride reposes,
To make her flowers a graceful plea
For luring and delaying me."

But nowhere in the poets' songs, in all the range of love-love, have I found any plea for the hidden mysteries of a coquette's nature—nothing but condemnation. Even Tennyson's conceited yeoman has a stone to cast at the proud, misunderstood Clara Vere de Vere. There have been those who could not distinguish between condescending kindness and treacherous wiles, and this stupid yeoman seems to have been one of them. I am not trying to prove the supremacy of those to whom the world applies a misnomer. It is only that they are a much reviled class of women, whom fate with circumstantial force has driven to violate the formal laws of society. If there are women who love coquetry for pain's sake, to whom bleeding hearts are a sacrificial offering and passion and incense, they are not of my knowledge, and by me unclassified. There is no pity wasted on a coquette's fate if her life is a blank; the inevitable, virtuous "serves you right" expression of more fortunate, though perhaps not more worthy women, stares her in the face like an immutable wall. And if the failure be in a measure her own, it is not on that account the less bitter to endure, but the mockery of love, the vengeance of narrow-mindedness, repeats for benefit and consolation.

"I had the pain when you had power;
Now mine the power, who reaps the pain?
You soothed the wind in that blue hour
Receive the whirlwind for your gain!"

SAN FRANCISCO, October 20.

"H."

He who thinks poorly of himself can not win the respect of his fellows.

THE LATEST MAGAZINE VERSES.

The Autumn Fire.

Cool falls the day whose balmy noon
Was spiced with snell of forest gums,
Red on the long lake burns the sun,
And star by star the evening cones.

No more that starry dark allures
By strange mysterious spells that thrill
The soul with longing for those things
Which no man's sense shall ever fill.

For all the world of dim desires
Which haunt the nights of summer days
Is lost behind the enchanted wall
Built by the autumn night's first blaze.

While, on the hearth within, the torch
In laughter and in song is laid,
And rich with increase, rich with sweets,
The summer's sacrifice is made.

—Harper's Bazar.

The Runie Stone.

I sit by the sea on the Runie stone,
Half dreaming and half waking;
The sea-mews cry, the wild winds moan,
And the wandering waves are breaking.

I have loved full many a maiden kind,
To many a friend have bound me;
Where are they now? Wild moans the wind,
And the wandering waves break round me.

HEINE, in Temple Bar.

Moultaineer's Prayer.

Gird me with the strength of Thy steadfast hills!
The speed of Thy streams give me!
In the spirit that calms, with the life that thrills,
I would stand or run for Thee.
Let me be Thy voice, or Thy silent power—
As the cataract or the peak—
An eternal thought in my earthly hour
Of the living God to speak.

Clothe me in the rose-tints of Thy skies
Upon morning summits laid;
Robe me in the purple and gold that flies
Through thy shuttles of light and shade.
Let me rise and rejoice in Thy smile bright,
As mountains and forests do;
Let me welcome Thy twilight and Thy night,
And wait for Thy dawn anew.

Give me of the brook's faith, joyously sung
Under clank of its icy chain;
Give me of the patience that hides among
Thy hill-tops in mist and rain.
Lift me up from the clod, let me breathe thy breath;
Thy beauty and strength give me;
Let me lose both the name and the meaning of death
In the life that I share with Thee.

LUCY LARCOM, in Sunday Afternoon.

Troubles in High Life.

Two miniature mothers at play on the floor
Their wearisome cares were debating,
How Dora and Arabelle, children no more,
Were twice as much trouble as ever before,
And the causes each had her own cares to deplore
Were really well worth my relating.

Said one little mother: "You really don't know
What a burden my life is with Bella!
Her extravagant habits I hope she'll outgrow,
She buys her kid gloves by the dozen, you know,
Sits for cartes de visite every fortnight or so,
And don't do a thing that I tell her."

These stivish young ladies (her dollies, you know),
Had complexion soft, pearly, and waxen,
With arms, neck, and forehead as white as the snow,
Golden hair sweeping down to the waist and below,
Eyes blue as the sky, cheeks with youth's ruddy glow,
Of a beauty pure Grecian and Saxon.

"Indeed," said the other, "that's sad to be sure;
But ah," with a sigh, "no one guesses
The cares and anxieties mothers endure;
For though Dora appears so sedate and demure,
She spends all the money that I can secure
On her cloaks and her bonnets and dresses."

Then followed such prattle of fashion and style,
I smiled as I listened and wondered;
And I thought, had I tried to repeat it erewhile,
How these fair little Israelites, without guile,
Would mock at my lack of their knowledge and smile
At the way I had stumbled and blundered.

And I thought, too, when each youthful mother had conned
Her startling and touching narration,
Of the dolls of which I to my childhood was fond,
How with Dora and Arabelle they'd correspond,
And how far dolls and children to-day are beyond
Those we had in the last generation.

MRS. J. G. BURNETT, in St. Nicholas.

Under the Limes.

How sweet in Winter-time we feign the Spring,
How fair by night we dream the day shall be!
Can any April-tide such freshness bring,
Our eyes on any morn such brightness see?
Half heedlessly we hear the first bird sing,
Behold the first shoots breaking on the tree;
And when we wake our reason fair would cling
Prisoner to fancies, fearing to be free.
For like the crossing leaves that day by day
Grow larger, till they weave the linden shade,
Our pleasures so are woven to a whole;
Not in the part we see how glad are they,
But after find ev'n fairer than we prayed
Their dreams and memories left within the soul.

FRANCIS W. BOURILLON.

Star, Rose, and Thorn.

I breathed a song to the silent night;
I died in ether beyond my sight.
I sighed a name in a garden fair;
'Twas lost mid clustering roses there.
In azure heavens serene and far
There glowed a radiant golden star;
A fresh bud bloomed on my red rose tree;
Both star and flower were my thought of thee.
All night the star through my window gleams;
I weave its light into golden dreams.
The red, red rose to my heart I pressed;
Its thorn, its fragrance are in my breast.
The star grows dim with the dawning day;
My dream is only a dream away.
The rose is faded, so fair to see;
A thorn is all that is left to me.

ELLIS GRAY, in Harper's Magazine.

PONY GLASSES OF FRENCH BRANDY.

La femme a un sourire pour toutes les joies, une larme pour toutes les douleurs, une consolation pour toutes les misères, une excuse pour toutes les fautes, une prière pour toutes les infortunes, un encouragement pour toutes les espérances.—Sainte-Foix.

O femmes! vous êtes des enfants bien extraordinaires.—Diderot.

En amour, comme en toutes choses, l'expérience est un médecin qui n'arrive qu'après la maladie.—Mme. de la Tour.

Les hommes seraient de grands saints s'ils aimaient autant Dieu que les femmes.—Saint Thomas.

Dans l'amour, si l'inconstance donne des plaisirs, la constance seule donne le bonheur.—L'Abbé Trublet.

"Je fais profession de ne savoir que l'amour."—Socrate.

Blâmer un jeune homme d'être amoureux, c'est reprocher à quelqu'un d'être malade.—Duclos.

Ne te fatte pas d'être aimé d'une femme qui s'aime beaucoup.—Pythagore.

S'il est un fruit qui se puisse manger crû, c'est la beauté.—Alphonse Karr.

Les êtres sensibles ne sont pas des êtres sensés.—Balzac.

BAISER.

Lorsqu'Agathis, par un baiser de flamme
Consent à me payer des maux que j'ai sentis,
Sur mes lèvres, soudain, je sens venir mon âme
Qui veut passer sur celles d'Agathis.—Platon.

Le cœur est comme ces sortes d'arbres qui ne donnent leur baume pour les blessures des hommes que lorsque le fer les a blessés eux-mêmes.—Chateaubriand.

Le cœur d'une femme galante est comme une rose dont chaque année emporte une feuille; il ne reste que l'épine au mari.—Sophie Arnould.

Une femme est une table bien servie qu'on voit d'un œil différent avant ou après le repas.—Helvetius.

Les femmes sont des poètes à dessus de marbre.—Charles Lemesle.

—Heureux qui te regarde, trois fois heureux qui t'écoute, ô ma belle Naïs! Te donner un doux baiser, c'est être demi-dieu; te serrer entre ses bras, c'est jouir de l'immortalité.—Sanazar.

SUR LES FEMMES.

Dans leur sein nous puisons la vie,
Et dans leurs bras la volupté;
Leur amitié douce et chérie
Survit à la prospérité.
On les rencontre à son aurore,
Dans le sentier qui conduit au bonheur,
Et, malheureux, on les retrouve encore
Sur le chemin de la douleur.

Vénus impérieuse est moins forte que Vénus caressante.

A l'âge de soixante-dix ans, Fontenelle avait de mauvais yeux que la lumière incommodait beaucoup. Une jeune dame, chez qui il se trouvait en visite, lui dit un soir: —Je vais faire enlever les flambeaux car je sais que vous aimez l'obscurité. —Non pas où vous êtes, Mademoiselle, lui répondit le galant vieillard.

L'amour est une erreur du cœur humain, mais aussi, c'est la plus douce qu'il puisse ressentir. Il est toujours triste et cruel d'en être désabusé.

Il n'est point d'amours sans désirs. Il n'en est point sans espérances.

On demandait à Madame de R. si elle aurait envie de connaître l'avenir. —Non, répondit-elle, il ressemble trop au passé.

Nous serions tous parfaits, disait quelqu'un, si nous n'étions ni hommes, ni femmes.

Un millionnaire se trouvant parmi des riches qui se plaignaient de la dureté des temps, dit: —Qui est-ce qui est heureux dans ces temps-ci? Quelque misérable!

En sortant de la Bastille, après plusieurs années de détention, M. de X. rencontra un de ses anciens amis, musqué, pommadé, et frisé, qui lui dit: —Comme vous êtes gros, gras, gris! —Et vous, lui répondit M. de X., comme vous êtes peint, teint, feint!

Le bonheur est une violette qui croît dans la mousse ou sous la ramée; il ne lui faut qu'un coin abrité, de l'ombre, une température moyenne, et la rosée du ciel. Il comprend la santé, des goûts simples, des mœurs pures, de croyances sincères et la réciprocité des affections.

L'envie est au fond du cœur humain comme une vipère dans son trou.—Balzac.

Le cœur humain sera toujours l'éternel abîme de la raison. L'espèce humaine doit probablement divaguer autour de la vérité ou de l'erreur jusqu'à la fin de toute dispute, c'est-à-dire, jusqu'à la fin des temps.

EPITAPHE D'UNE JEUNE FILLE.

Terre, sois-lui légère, elle a si peu pesé sur toi.

Les yeux sont les messagers du cœur.

October 19, 1878.

L. G. J. DE FINOD.

INTAGLIOS.

Slain Love.

See, here he lies—
Dead Love, than snow more cold;
His close shut, hidden eyes,
Wan lips, and locks of gold,
A sorrow and a terror to behold.
No light of sun or moon,
Nor roar of lion winds,
Nor tears that come too soon,
Nor sharp words that pain finds,
Shall bring to life this Sleeper whom Death binds.

When shall he live again?
No more for us, we know.
Rise up, pass on; in vain
We linger, let us go;
Throughout our lives we wander blindly to and fro.
ADA VROOMAN LESLIE, in Lady's Bazar for November.

Wise Items.

The clouds, which rise with thunder, slake
Our thirsty souls with rain;
The low most dreaded fates to break
From off our limbs a chain;
And wounds of man to man but make
The love of God more plain,
As through the shadowy lens of heaven,
The eye looks farthest into heaven,
On gleams of star and depths of blue
The glaring sunshine never knew.

WHITTIER

Tears.

Is it raining, little flower?
Be glad of rain!
Too much rain would wither thee—
"Twill shine again."
The clouds are very black, 'tis true,
But just behind them shines the blue.
Art thou weary, tender heart!
Be glad of pain;
In sorrow sweetest things will grow,
As flowers in rain.
God watches, and thou wilt have the sun
When clouds their perfect work have done.

Folded Hands.

Regret.

Think you the roses a-bloom o'er a tomb
Can shut in a sorrow or wrong?
At death's sepulchre a sad angel stands
To roll back the stone with pitiless hands,
And the dead comes forth to life's throng.
Thinner than cobweb stretched fair on the air,
Thinner than dew on the heart of the rose,
More subtle than breath drift in a sigh,
Is this ghost that haunts ever and ever and aye,
Clings close and will never repose.

Waiting.

Learn to wait—life's hardest lesson,
Conceded, perchance, through blinding tears;
While the heart throbs sadly echo
To the tread of passing years.

Learn to wait—hope's slow fruition;
Faint not, though the way seems long;
There is joy in each condition,
Hearts through suffering may grow strong;

Constant sunshine, however welcome,
Ne'er would ripen fruit or flower;
Giant oaks owe half their greatness
To the scathing tempest's power.

Thus a soul untouched by sorrow,
Aims not at a higher state;
Joy seeks not a brighter sorrow,
Only sad hearts learn to wait.

Human strength and human greatness
Spring not from life's sunny side;
Heroes must be more than driftwood,
Floating on a waveless tide.

Eden.

Deep in the summer time of long ago,
There dwelt on either side a broken stream
A knight, who, sighing, felt love's passion grow,
A maiden weeping for some distant dream.
His gallant life was lost on Holy Land;

Her love was buried in a life's regret,
Loving the river where he touched her hand;
They called it Eden where these lovers met.

The summer time still comes though knights are dead;
With tears of maidens rivers rush to sea;
Love ruleth still though chivalry has fled—
His kisses were the same to you and me.
All was the same from bridge to ruined mill;
Across the stream we loved, and met to part;
White winters change to flower time, and still
They call it Eden where you broke my heart.

—London World.

The Phantom.

I slept—my sleep was soft and sweet,
No pain nor trouble there—
Then did mine eyes a vision greet,
A maid supremely fair.

Pale, pale was she as marble stone,
And weird and strange to see;
With a light like pearls her eyes they shone,
Her locks hung loose and free.

And slowly, slowly did she glide,
So phantom-like and frail,
And down she lays her by my side,
That maiden marble-pale.

Then throbs my heart like a thing possessed
With passion, all aglow;
But no throbs stir that of my breast,
She is cold as the mountain snow.

"My breast, it neither throbs nor beats;
It is cold as the mountain snows;
But love, I know—its pang, its sweets,
And its all-mustering throes.

"My lips and cheeks bloom not with red,
The blood in my heart is still;
But shrink not away with shuddering dread—
I am time, to do thy will!"

And madder still she clasped me round.
Till my very breath I can feel;
The cock crew—gone, with never a sound,
Was the maiden marble-pale.—HEINE.

Circumstance.

Talk not to me of souls that conceive
Sublime ideals, but deterred by Fate,
And bound by circumstances, sit desolate,
And long for heights they never can achieve.

It is not so. That which we most desire,
With understanding, we at last obtain,
In whole or part. I hold there is no rain,
No deluge, that can quench a heavenly fire.

Show me thy labor, I straightway will name
The nature of thy thoughts. Who bends the bow,
And lets the arrow from the strained string go,
Strikes somewhere near the object of his aim.

We build our ships from timbers of the brain,
With products of the soul we load the hold;
Where lies the blame if they bring back no gold,
Or if they spring a leak upon the main?

There is no Fate, no Providence, no Chance,
The Will is all. So be it thou art pure
And strong of purpose, thy success is sure;
But fools and sluggards prate of Circumstance.

ELLA WHEELER.

THE AMBER RING.

It was a cold winter night. I sat by the fire at a German inn. Not far from me was Carl Von Arnheim. We were both members of the German University. The fire blazed fitfully, wreathing itself in glowing spirals around the huge logs that were slowly being consumed. I was about to go off in a doze, when, suddenly, Carl recalled me to my senses by asking:

"Do you know that the Baron Von — and his lovely daughter are in town?"

I replied in the affirmative. As I gazed on his face as it slowly settled to its dark, weird aspect, I was ready to give credence to those stories bruited around among the students of some strange, supernatural gifts with which Carl Von Arnheim was endowed. I had often met him; and from the first acquaintance he had somehow attached himself to me.

On being asked why, by some one, he replied that his and my own destinies were united; that I would be necessary to him some time in the future.

The persons he alluded to in his question to me were known to both of us. Baron Von — was a frank, free-hearted German nobleman. His daughter, Rena, as she was called, was the most beautiful creature I ever saw. Not only that the beauty attracted me—for we were secretly engaged; but it had evidently touched the heart of the sombre, pale-faced German student, Carl Von Arnheim. I do not know whether the thought of my being attached to Rena ever troubled him. He seemed confident, and feared no rival.

But, as I watched him that night, he had a strange look of fierce determination on his face. Presently he turned towards me, and fixed his eyes on mine. It was impossible to avoid his glance; a lurid light seemed playing in the very depths of his eyes. I could not move nor speak. Another moment and his hands were moving before me, and I knew that Carl was a mesmerist, and that I was under his control. Soon I lost all consciousness, and when I awoke to what appeared a new state of existence, I saw Carl still looking at what was myself; but from which, in some manner, I was separated.

I had often read of the duality of our existence; but never comprehended its meaning so clearly before. Here was I looking on a living and breathing body, from which the soul, the Ego of metaphysicians, was absent.

Carl still continued to gaze fixedly at my body; then, though he spoke not, I knew he was addressing me. There was no word uttered; but still the horrible purport of his meaning was conveyed to me, the more distinctly as we were conversing spirit with spirit. Knowing by his diabolical arts that I had won the love of the lady Rena, he was conjuring my soul from its body, which his own soul was to enter, while I was to dwell the inhabitant of his body. I could not struggle; I could only submit.

In this way he was to win the Lady Rena and I was to lose her forever. Again I lost consciousness; and when I came to myself I found the transformation complete, and Carl had departed. I was sitting alone by the fire of the German inn in the body of Carl Von Arnheim!

I arose to leave. The little inn-keeper stepped up briskly, and handed me his bill.

"The gentleman, your friend, said that you would settle this little account, Herr Von Arnheim," said he handing me a slip of paper.

Yes; henceforth I was to be Carl Von Arnheim, and he was to be myself. I paid the bill, and then I departed.

And now, as I came out in the cold, frosty air, the terrible truth dawned upon my mind for the first time in its awful reality. What was I to do? Where was I to go? Would it not be worse than madness to try and retain the love of Rena in my present guise? Should I attempt that, Carl Von Arnheim, in his new personality, would forestall me by declaring me a madman; and Rena would believe him. I staggered under the weight of my misery. All night I roamed the streets, caring not whither I went. In the morning some of the students passed by.

"There goes that queer, unfathomable genius, Carl Von Arnheim," I heard them say.

"What in the world has he been doing?"

"Reading the stars, perhaps, all night."

No one took any notice of my haggard aspect. It was like Carl to look pale and haggard. I turned a corner, and there a sight met my eyes before which I recoiled in horror. I saw Carl, as myself, glide swiftly past in the sleigh of Baron Von —. The latter was driving, and Carl was sitting beside the lovely Rena, talking earnestly. When he saw me he threw a malicious, triumphant glance. The sleigh and all rushed past; and I staggered and fell—and then knew no more.

When I recovered my senses I found myself in Carl's room. I recognized it, for I had been there once or twice before at his invitation. A physician and one or two students were standing beside the bed where I lay. I opened my eyes, and thanked them for their kindness.

Again the horrid reality of my condition burst upon me, and I nearly fainted again. Rallying my strength, I told them to leave me, as I wished to be alone. The physician gave them a sign, and all went out. I lay for some moment longer, trying to reflect upon my situation. At length I rose up and paced the room.

A desire for vengeance had seized upon me. A thousand schemes suggested themselves to me by which I could obtain satisfaction; but none of them seemed to content my morbid imagination. I looked about the room. In one corner I espied a large, iron-bound chest, which Carl was always particular never to open in my presence. A thought struck me. Why might not this chest contain secrets which it would be of importance for me to know? But how to get into it! I hesitated a moment. Carl must have carried the key which unlocked it in his pocket. I felt for key. Sure enough, there was a large one there. I took it out, and tried the lock. It yielded, and I opened the chest.

There was nothing in it—except some chemicals, several old, wrinkled, and yellow parchments, and, in a small box by itself, an amber ring. I had a presentiment that with these means I was to work my deliverance. I examined the parchments; large rolls they were, filled with diagrams, and words in the Latin language. Being familiar with the latter, I was at no loss to understand their meaning.

What! Had the days of magic returned? Here were directions for calling the powers of darkness to the aid of humanity; the hidden mysteries of nature revealed and examined; and dissertations of a metaphysical character on the mind of man, and its unknown affinities with the world of spirits. All was apparently written long ago—it might be centuries, I sat all day studying the mysterious writings. Night came, and, after obtaining a little nourishment for the body that was mine for the time being, I lit a lamp, and, locking the door, still continued to pore over those wonderful manuscripts that were revealing to me with every line I read strange secrets, which would make my power over mankind irresistible.

All that was demanded for the possessor of this secret was a peculiar organization. With the body of Carl Von Arnheim I, of course, had obtained his temperament, and facility to use these powers. I determined to make myself master of them, and then—let the villain look to himself. He had forfeited all his power by taking upon him my organization, so great had been his love for the beautiful Lady Rena.

Little did he think that I would act with my inheritance as I intended. My heart beat high with hope. Already I seemed to grasp revenge. With that Amber Ring, and the knowledge of its wonderful properties made known to me by these old manuscripts, I would bring him down—down to the very lowest pit of misery.

Over the way was the mansion of the baron, the father of Rena. It was lit up with a thousand brilliant lights. I heard the sound of music and dancing. As I looked from the window I saw passing by the opposite window, and inside the gorgeous drawing-room, Rena and Carl, arm in arm. I did not stagger that time. I smiled with secret exultation. Going to my table I unrolled a manuscript and read:

"The odic fluid is generated by wearing the Amber Ring on the third finger of the left hand; and by the odic fluid matter and mind are united. When the odic is withdrawn from the body the mind is free, and can be commanded."

The following farther directions ending with:

"Thus the Amber Ring, to him who knoweth its proper use, is, to a certain extent, all powerful."

Days passed. By the aid of the ring I kept myself informed of the movements of Carl. He was to be married in three days, which would be the day before Christmas. The ceremony was to take place in the evening.

My time was short, yet long enough for what I had to do. Day and night I studied and worked. My experiments were, with a few exceptions, successful. By the day before Christmas I was prepared. I had perfected myself in my art. I had no more need of the manuscripts—no more need of the Amber Ring. I therefore, for reasons of my own, burnt the whole, the manuscripts first, and then threw the Amber Ring into the blazing fire. A pale light started up; the whole room shook and gleamed as if of phosphorescent material. Then all was silent. I went to the window again and looked over the way. Could I have been mistaken? It seemed to me that I saw, in the uncertain light of the moon, Carl Von Arnheim raising his hands to heaven, with a look betokening the greatest fear. It was but for a moment, and then he was gone.

My vengeance should be a retribution. One hour before the time appointed for the marriage I was at the inn of which I spoke at the beginning of this story. I began the incantation which I knew would bring Carl, whether he wished or no, to my presence. Soon he came. There was a wild look in his eyes, and he seemed overcome with terror. I made him sit where he had sat three weeks before. Then, using the same mesmeric means he had used, reduced him to a state of insensibility. I then taking from my pocket a vial containing a virulent poison which I knew would take deadly effect in the space of half an hour, swallowed the contents—and commanding the spirit of Carl to resume its original body, I re-entered my own. Then springing up, I shouted triumphantly, for my vengeance was complete; the soul of Carl Von Arnheim had gone into its former body, whence it was soon to be driven forever by the deadly poison I had entranced into his system.

As I sprang from my seat the surroundings, somehow, seemed to be changed. I was still in the same room of the inn, and there before me sat Carl, fast asleep. The little keeper of the inn was hustling about as usual, and before me seemed lying the veritable box I had seen burning a month before. I shook Carl.

"What do you want?" said he, looking up.

"What do I want?" said I, half reflectively, "I believe I've been asleep, and had a queer sort of dream—all about magic and mesmerism. This isn't Christmas eve, is it?"

"Christmas eve!" he echoed. "Why, Christmas won't be here for a month."

"Let us go," said I.

An English writer has been sharply criticising the management of the London public schools, known as the "Board Schools," and produces the following as specimens of the written examinations of some of the scholars:

"Where is Turkey?"

"Turkey is the capital of Norfolk."

"Where is Turin?"

"Turin is the capital of Chiner, the peepul there lvs on burds nests and has long tails."

"Where is Gibraltar?"

"Gibberralter is the principal town of Rooshia."

"What do you know of the patriarch Abraham?"

"He was the ffather of Lot, and ad tew wifes—wun was called Hishmale and the t'other Haygr.

He kept un at home, and he turn'd the t'other into the desert, where she became a pillow of salt in the day time and a pillow of fire at nite."

"What do you know of Joseph?"

"He wore a coat of many garments. Hee were chief butler to Faro and told his dreams. Hee married Potiffers dorder, and he led the Gypsans out of bondage to Kana, in Galilee, and then fell on his sword and died in site of the promiss land."

"Give the names of the books of the Old Testament."

"Devonshire, Exeter, Littikus, Numbers, Stroony, Jupiter, Judgment, Ruth, etc."

"What is a miracle?"

"Don't know."

"If you saw the sun shining overhead at midnight what would you call it?"

"The moon."

"But if you were told it was the sun?"

"I should say it was a lie."

Another boy, giving his impressions in regard to Moses, wrote as follows:

"He was an Egyptsun. He lived in a hark maid of built-rushers, and he kep a golden carf, and worship brazen snakes, and he het authin but kwales and manner for forty year. He was kory by the air of his ed while riding under the bow of a tree, and he was killed by his son Abslon, as he was a hanging from the bow. His end was pease!"

It is a strange but melancholy fact that the less water there is on the bar the more schooners go over.

NEW

BOOKS

Studies in Literature, 1789-1877. By Edward Dowden, LL. D. 8vo. .... $6 00
Eden. By A. W. Kinglake. 12mo. .... 3 00
The New Paul and Virginia, or Positivism on an Island. By W. H. Mallock. 12mo. .... 1 00
Life and Adventure in Japan. By E. W. Clark. 12mo. 1 25
A Friend. By Henry Greville. Translated from the French by Miss Helen Stanley. .... 1 00
Shakespeare's Tragedy of Hamlet, Prince of Denmark. Edited, with notes, by Wm. J. Rolfe, A. M. .... 90
Poets' Homes; Pen and Pencil Sketches of American Poets and their Homes. By R. H. Stoddard and others. 4to, gilt. .... 2 50
Popular Astronomy. By Simon Newcomb, LL. D. 8vo. .... 4 00
Walks in London. By Augustus J. C. Hare. T. 10 volumes in one. 8vo. .... 3 50

BANCROFT'S
721 MARKET ST. S.F.

FALK'S

MILWAUKEE BEER

Beer drinkers will, on trial of this superior article, be convinced that it is excellent and unsurpassed by any other in the market. It has a beautiful amber color, full body and fine flavor, and is for sale at all the leading places of resort in the city and vicinity. We request a trial.

CUTTING & MURRAY,
Sole Agents, 206 Front Street, S. F.BUTTERICK'S
PATTERNS—OCT. STYLES.

Send stamp for catalogue. AGENCY, 124 POST ST., San Francisco.

EDUCATIONAL!

French, Spanish, and Italian taught by Prof. Barthélemy de Filippis, by his easy, new method, saving months of studies. Classes for beginners will be formed September 20th; also private lessons. PACIFIC BUSINESS COLLEGE, 320 Post Street.

HEALD'S BUSINESS COLLEGE,
No. 24 Post Street,
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

Opposite Mechanics' Institute.

IMPARTS A THOROUGH PRACTICAL

Education in all Commercial and English Branches, French, German, Spanish, Drawing, and Telegraphy. This school having greater facilities, and enjoying a more extensive patronage than any similar institution on the Pacific coast, continues to base its claims for recognition and patronage upon the good sense and enlightened judgment of the public.

LIST OF FACULTY.
E. P. Heald, F. C. Woodbury,
H. M. Stearns, A. B. Capp,
Mrs. C. Woodbury, T. R. Southern,
J. A. Chesnutwood, Mrs. W. J. Hamilton,
A. P. DuBief, F. Seregni,
R. Sorcini, Geo. Jebens,
Lloyd Baldwin, A. Vander Naillen.
For full particulars, call at the College, 24 Post Street, or address E. P. HEALD, President Business College, San Francisco.

RETURNED.

HAVING RETURNED FROM THE East, I respectfully announce to my friends and the public that I shall resume practice on WEDNESDAY, Sept. 5th, 1878,

S. W. DENNIS, M. D., DENTIST,
No. 33 KEARNY STREET.

R. C. MOWBRAY, M. D., DENTIST
224 STOCKTON ST., corner Post, S. F.

SAFES AND SCALES.

FOR SALE BY

JOHN MOLLOY, 54 CLAY STREET.

R. P. & H. N. CLEMENT,
ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW,

Nos. 2, 3, and 4 SHERMAN'S BUILDING,
Montgomery Street, N. E. corner of Clay, San Francisco
(P. O. Box 707.)

INTERCEPTED LETTERS.

SAN FRANCISCO, October 25, 1878.

MY DEAREST MADGE:—What a small margin Diogenes gave human nature when he went phantasmagoria around his world looking for an honest man, lighted only by a tallow dip. I make no doubt the old gentleman would have an equally hard time nowadays—what with stocks and politics—should he start out with a Drummond light. And perhaps he was not so old-fashioned after all, for I have observed that a California manager looks after novelties in about the same way, and it does not matter one jot which theatre he belongs to. It is a peculiarity which seems to be indigenous to the species. Naturally they travel in a circle, and by the time their candle has lighted up Joe Murphy in Help, Lawrence Barrett in Julius Caesar, Frank Mayo in Daisy Crockett, and so on to the end of the list, they are back to the starting place. I have been wondering therefore how they came to give us Fatinitzza, which we have never had before, but which we shall now probably have periodically to the end of our lives. I have come to the conclusion that it must have been that Mathilde de Cottrelly and Max Freeman were like the boy in the Flemish pictures, who always stands at the elbow of the woman with the lighted candle, and is such a very smoky looking little chap that it is only after some peering we discover him. I think I will let that candle go out, Madge. Figures of speech do very well sometimes, but when the column becomes too long it adds one's pate. I must tell you all about Fatinitzza. They call it a grand spectacular comic opera in the bill, and you would be amazed to see how much musical talent they have managed to bring to bear, none of it anything wonderful, but all of it acceptable. I am quite enchanted with Cottrelly, although she speaks English with that high, nasal tone which any one is apt to assume with a foreign tongue, and she reminds me occasionally of Lois when she struggles with our most rebellious consonants. I catch a fleeting resemblance to the tiny Aimée in her face now and then, especially in her contours are really not unlike. With all her hair she has almost succeeded in prejudicing me against her at the very beginning. She plays the part of Vladimir Dmitrowitch, a young lieutenant in the Russian army, and she saw fit to make a mustache a part of the make up. A mustache on a woman's lip, even in a play, is an odious thing, except on course as a momentary application according to established usage. Cottrelly's mustache, unfortunately, did not act nicely at all. One side of it partially detached itself, and when the lady expelled a breath in singing it waivered idly in the wind like a loose sail. Occasionally it fell sprawling across her face, and the prettiest face in the world could not look well under such circumstances. The gallery abstained from any remarks, but it almost spoiled the scene, for every one was manifestly uneasy, and I am quite sure that every mortal man and woman in the audience had an almost irresistible desire to get up and fasten it in its place. But she betrayed neither discomfort nor bad temper. She is very graceful, and has that pleasant foreign courtesy, which may be all artificial, and mean nothing, but is so pretty to see. She is a careful actress, for she never forgot, even in her picturesque Russian peasant girl costume, that she was supposed to be a man. The music was many degrees too difficult for her, as it was for every body else in the spectacle, but she has a fresh, pleasant voice and a fund of expression. She sang her first aria—I wonder if they call them arias in spectacular comic opera—with her heart in her mouth. Strange, is it not, that these people who spend their lives in the glare of the footlights should ever be so shaken by nervous fear. But, like "Rosalind," she carried a swashing and a martial outside whatever of woman's fear lay hidden. I am inclined to think much of this martial bearing was attributable to her boots, an extremely handsome pair, which fitted like a glove on a foot which might belong to a Spanish woman. You will think I am gushing terribly over the pretty German actress, Madge, but she is really charming, and we are going to see her again when Fatinitzza shall have ceased to be a rehearsal. The nervousness extended itself to M. Freeman, who, as an old Russian officer with a double-barreled name, disposed an excellent make-up, and some very queer musical talent. Truth to tell, the man has a voice like a buffalo, and while he roars in very good time, I have heard sounds more pleasing to the ear. It is easy to see that he is an accomplished actor, although in Fatinitzza over-zeal for its success made him overdo. I think that he suffered keenest pangs with every hitch, although they were very few. I quite trembled for

Gates when I saw his name on the bills. I never like to see any one make a guy of himself, and I remembered him in opera when, with a delicious voice and a more than ordinary share of good looks, he absolutely failed to make any impression. A man who fails with two such adjuncts for success had best forswear the stage. But this time something or other roused him from his supineness. Probably Freeman took him in hand, and transfused a little of his superabundant energy; perhaps he voluntarily submitted to the spur of necessity; perhaps on this occasion he wasn't sleepy anyhow. At all events he looked quite spick and span in a suit of shepherd's plaid and a blonde wig, and he really moved around considerably. Miss Marie Prescott has also developed as a musician. In fact so much latent talent was discovered in the theatre that I quite expected to see Voegtlin himself skip out and sing a few bars; but he abstained and only made his usual bow instead. Miss Prescott has some very clear tinkling notes in one part of her voice; the other part has a very serious defect, it is inaudible—that is in the California Theatre. I rather like Miss Prescott, more especially since I have heard her sing; but she is very rigid and angular beside Cottrelly. Her Russian furs looked strangely enough in the warm sensuous atmosphere of the harem, and the contrast might have been pretty if the costume had been picturesque, which it might easily have been although the story is a story of today. The stage gives such broad license in the matter of light and color, that a little taste and judgment can soon transform a rather homely woman—which Miss Prescott is not—into a picture, if she only have a little dash. But the sombre black uniform of the day, which bespeaks the limited purse as surely as alpen bespeaks downright poverty, is getting a strong hold on the stage, and womankind is merging herself into one vast lump of "genteel." I have an idea a harem is a wofully disordered and uncomfortable-looking place, as ugly and as odorous as Chinatown, and even Mr. Voegtlin's brush can not dissipate that idea; but he must think the Turks have a pretty good time, for he gives a harem interior which would almost make one willing to be a Turk, so far as the walls, the ceiling, and floor are concerned. But the hours, my dear girl, are really rather—well, spindly. Why in the world will not women wear Turkish trousers when they play Turks' parts, and not run around the stage like a flock of boarding-school girls on a cold morning, ten minutes after the dressing bell has rung. Miss Prescott did not find it necessary to present this half-clad appearance, for her Turkish dress was really as modest as a man's, and correct enough. Fancy how long a Turkish pasha would permit his felix to run about in gymnasium rig. I had not seen Felix Morris, the new comedian, before. He makes a very jolly Turk, and blends his orientalisms with the introduced occidentalisms with an evident enjoyment of the author's intention. In fact, Fatinitzza, with its pretty costumes, its handsome scenery, and its good music—for some of its airs are charming, though they will not be whistled on the streets—is enjoyable. The music of Le Petit Duc, at the Bush Street Theatre, is very pretty, but the libretto is what Jack calls "shady." In fact, it is pretty bad. Mrs. Oates has been obliged to make a point of her costumes since her voice is gone completely—I hope not irrevocably. I have heard prime donne sing before whose voices were said to be gone, but there remained in them some few tones to hint at the past. But Mrs. Oates' voice seems to be absolutely gone. There is not a note left. It is not hoarseness, but the chords simply refuse to obey her will. And yet she draws. What a magnificent fund of energy the little creature must have; too much, perhaps, and yet who else could tide over such a situation? A prima donna without a note! It is well that she lives in the wardrobe age. What a change a few years make in these women of the stage, and how much is the change attributable to dry goods. I remember her first night in San Francisco, when, as "Clairette," she came modestly down to the footlights, attired in simple white Swiss, with ill-fitting white slippers on her shapely feet, and a coiffure big enough for the Kentucky giants. "Some one behind me at the time observed, in a high and painfully audible voice, 'There's come-out-iveness in that little girl, you bet!'" I may remark of the same gentleman, that his hilarious delight, and the expression of it, in the quarrel scene when she did come out, were wonderful to contemplate. I compared the bridal costumes when, as the little Duke, she came down the stage point de vue from top to toe. How I did wish she could sing just a little, for her voice in speech is harsh and discordant as a peacock's, and she used sometimes to sing very well. She is a natural stage manager, and it is sometimes amusing to see the little midget guiding and directing. Miss Lulu Stevens is improving, but has not yet learned to pick out an acquaintance in the audience without letting every one in the audience know all about it. What a fresh, rich voice she has with its suggestion of reserved strength, but she requires to study something of stage elocution. We are introduced to a convent interior in Le Petit Duc, although there are no nuns about—by way of contrast to the harem at the other theatre perhaps. The maidens look very demure in their gray dresses and white caps. Taylor and Meade, as "Professor" and "Preceptress," have good parts, but they are heavy with an awful English heaviness. If Meade were supposed to be in an English school it would be different, but it strikes me that a nun's convent, with only an English preceptress of an uncertain age in charge, is something of an anomaly. "Poor Little Man" is the touching title of a favorite air in Le Petit Duc, and the four pages always get an encore for it. I like to see the chorus get an encore once in a while, and there is something really pitiful in the dazed gladness with which they acknowledge a double recall. The scenery in Le Petit Duc is really quite ambitious for the little theatre, and, in the last act, with a realistic knoll in the background, is reminiscent of Henry IV's gorgeous pageantry, although Mrs. Oates in armor is not reminiscent of George Rignold. It is a funny thing that at both theatres a woman plays she is a man masquerading in woman's attire. I wonder if the little Standard is going to play havoc with the other theatres when the long-promised opening at last takes place on Monday next! Mr. Kennedy has bided his time, and although the people are not absolutely new to us, Willie Edouin was always an immense favorite, and Alice Harrison is as blithe a little body as ever made the stage merry. At all events, they will have a big opening, and Hirawatha is new if the people are not. I am afraid the insidious attractions of new upholstery and fresh paint have a great deal to do with the promised crush on Monday, but after that it depends on the people themselves. I like to see California graduates do well, but it speaks badly for the next lot that we have commenced to live wholly in the past of our dramatic glory, and yet, take it for all in all, we never had a better company than they have now at Baldwin's Theatre, only we became used to having the best at the old California, and we are restive under change. I can not see that we have much to complain of at present with Fatinitzza, A Woman of the People, Le Petit Duc, and Rice's Surprise Party. One at least who is moderately satisfied is,

Yours devotedly,

BETSY B.

The Standard Theatre.

Next Monday evening this recently remodeled, newly furnished, and freshly-named and painted little theatre will throw open its doors with a strong bid for public patronage and a place in the Thespian list. Mr. Kennedy, its manager—who is so well known in connection with the Opera House—has taken more than ordinary pains to make an impression, and that it will be favorable is the sincerest wish of his many friends and, undoubtedly, his most cherished hope. There is no good argument why the Standard should not be a success. It is purely a question of management. Kennedy thinks he has it in him, and if he has, there is surely room on top for judgment, energy, and theatrical enterprise. "The Surprise Party" is well advertised, and known to be composed of lively people, who have with them the latest novelties, and who carry things with a rush. They will make it very interesting—if acceptable to the public—for Fatinitzza and The Little Duke. But Monday night will tell more of the story—more of the Standard's fate.

In Neil Burgess' new play of I'm one of the girls brings home a stranger and introduces him to her mother as the funny man of the theatre, whereupon the old woman remarks: "All right; say something funny and go home."

Yosemite Art Gallery.

In artistic photography California excels the world. Nowhere, even in the famed art centres of Europe, can there be found such exquisitely-finished photographs as may be seen at the Yosemite Art Gallery, No. 26 Montgomery Street. The elegant parlors of this establishment are unexcelled for comfort and convenience, and visitors are always delighted with the home-like air pervading the premises. The large operating rooms are supplied with every facility for producing perfect pictures, including the latest improved apparatus for instantaneously photographing young children. The firm of I. W. Taber & Co., by whom this Gallery has been so successfully conducted in the past, have dissolved partnership, Mr. Taber withdrawing, and leaving the business in sole charge of Mr. T. H. Boyd, his late associate, whose name alone is sufficient guarantee that the high character of work for which the firm have ever been celebrated will be maintained in the future. Mr. Boyd was for three years chief operator for G. D. Morse, and has a reputation second to that of no other photographer in the United States. The majority of the skilled employees of Taber & Co. are retained by Mr. Boyd, who has determined to inaugurate an era of low prices, such as will place the choicest pictures within the reach of all, and cheaper than can be elsewhere obtained in a gallery with first-class appointments. The lovely cameo glass photographs, cabinet size, never before made for less than $10 per dozen, have been reduced to $8 per dozen; the same style, card size, to $4 per dozen. Full-length cabinet pictures, with interior or rustic background, Mr. Boyd will supply for $5 a dozen. Elegant gray-tint vignettes are now only $6 a dozen, or $3 for card size. When the superior style of work is considered, these prices are without a parallel, and cannot fail to render the Yosemite Art Gallery more popular than ever before. Mr. Boyd also desires to specially call the attention of his old friends and patrons who have visited him at the Yosemite Gallery, that he has all the negatives of the Photographs taken in the Gallery, and can supply copies desired at very short notice, and at the reduced prices.

STANDARD THEATRE.

Bush Street, between Montgomery and Kearny.

LESSEE AND MANAGER.....M. A. KENNEDY.

This favorite theatre, after having been newly upholstered, remodeled, painted, decorated, and refurnished throughout,

WILL OPEN MONDAY EVEN'G, OCT. 28
WILL OPEN MONDAY EVEN'G, OCT. 28

With the reigning novelty of 1878.

RICE'S SURPRISE PARTY
RICE'S SURPRISE PARTY

In the new and fascinating extravaganza,

HIAWATHA
HIAWATHA

As played by this Great Star Company with the most brilliant success throughout the Eastern States.

You are invited to the Standard Theatre.
You are invited to the Standard Theatre.

Box Office now open, where plan of theatre can be seen and seats secured six days in advance.

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LOCKE.....PROPRIETOR.

SATURDAY EVENING.....OCT. 26

THE OATES

ENGLISH COMIC OPERA COMPANY,

In another decided success.

The new Military Comic Opera, in three acts, by Charles Lecocq, author of Girofle-Girofla and La Fille de Mme. Angot,

LE PETIT DUC,

With magnificent imported costumes, and exquisite scenery by Graham from Parisian models.

GRAND MATINEE SATURDAY.

Reserved seats at box office six days in advance.

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER.
F. LYSTER.....ACTING MANAGER.
G. R. CHIPMAN.....TREASURER

Last performances of the success of the year,

A WOMAN OF THE PEOPLE,

Attested by houses crammed from pit to dome, the unanimous verdict of the press, and repeated recalls of the principal artists.

Saturday and Sunday Evenings, Oct. 26 and 27,

A WOMAN OF THE PEOPLE,

With Miss Rose Wood, Mr. James O'Neill, Mr. Lewis Morrison, Mr. James A. Herne, and the legitimate Dramatic Company.

Saturday, at 2 P. M., last Matinee of

A WOMAN OF THE PEOPLE.

On Monday Evening, Oct. 28, first time in America of

PROOF POSITIVE.

CALIFORNIA THEATRE.

BARTON & LAWLOR.....MANAGERS.
BARTON HILL.....ACTING MANAGER.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 28,

Second Week and Great Success of the Grand Spectacular Comic Opera,

FATINITZAI

Nightly received by delighted, crowded, and enthusiastic audiences.

Brilliant reception of

MISS MATHILDE COTTRELLY

—AND—

MR. MAX FREEMAN,

And their brilliant supporting cast.

Gorgeous Scenery by Voegtlin. Superb Chorus. Full and complete Orchestra. Magnificent Costumes. Novel and startling properties and Mechanical Effects.

Fatinitzza matinee Saturday. Reserved seats at the box office six days in advance.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

Through the Dark Continent. By H. M. Stanley. 2 vols, cloth. $10 00
Anatomy for Artists. By John Marshall. Cloth. 9 00
Cyprus—Historical and Descriptive. By Franz von Loher. Cloth. 1 75
Etiquette of the Best Society. By Mrs. H. O. Ward. Cloth. 2 00
History of the Gypsies. By Walter Simson. Cloth. 2 00
Modern Frenchmen. By P. G. Hamerton. Cloth. 2 00
Stories from an Old Dutch Town. By Robert Lowell. Cloth. 1 50
Under the Lilacs. By Miss L. M. Alcott. Cloth. 1 50
Ferns in Their Homes and Ours. By John Robinson. Cloth. 1 50
The Life of Van Dyck. Artist Biography. Cloth. 50
Dick's Quadrille Call-Book. 75
Dictionary of Love. 75
The Hamilton Speaker. By Oliver E. Branch. Cloth. 1 00

JUST RECEIVED.

ARCHERY OUTFITS, COMPLETE

BILLINGS, HARBOURNE &amp; CO.,

BOOKSELLERS AND STATIONERS,

NO. 3 MONTGOMERY STREET.

LATEST FASHIONS.

In Jewelry.

The season opens with some of the richest designs in jewelry. The latest and neatest designs in diamond settings for breast-pins and hair-brooches now being manufactured are the Comet, with large brilliant surrounded by smaller diamonds representing the star, while in the train, neatly arranged, are dispersed numerous smaller brilliants; the whole, set upon delicate gold, making up in its elegant design one of the richest ornaments that can be worn by any lady. The peacock feather, cluster of wheat stalks in head, butterfly, fern-leaf, bird of Paradise, and other unique designs are coming into favor set with diamonds alone, and are also used as hair ornaments. Cameo surrounded with diamonds forms a rich design for ladies breast-pin. For gents as well as ladies some of the newest designs in gold for breast-pins are the whip and horse-shoe, set with turquoise and diamonds; also Cupid's arrow breast or veil-pin for ladies is set with pearls and turquoise. Among other designs for veil-pins will be seen the serpent with ruby eyes, leaf and cluster of grapes, set with pearls. Some of the neatest designs in medallion for ladies' neck chains are engraved with delicate shadings on gold, making beautiful representations of birds. The elegant tints of the bird's feathers are, marvelous in their richness and delicacy. The latest for gents' scarf pins are insects, snakes, lizards, etc., in different shades in gold. Neapolitan shell jewelry, with neat designs of doves, bunch of grapes, head of Neptune and trident, Bacchus, and other mythological characters, is being worn; also coral jewelry, with unique and rare designs. These designs can be seen at Anderson & Randolph's corner Sutter and Montgomery Streets, where the latest styles may be found in jewelry of every description.

Latest Styles in Hats and Bonnets.

The latest Parisian novelties in bonnets have assumed the unique as well as the picturesque. We were shown some of the very latest by Mrs. Caswell, at her millinery establishment on Post Street. Mrs. Caswell has returned from Paris, and is prepared to receive orders for the latest in Parisian bonnets, hats, etc. We noticed particularly a perfect gem of a bonnet, literally covered or made of solid pearl beads, trimmed with white feathers and humming bird. Among other elegant styles we observed a rich Bourdeaux velvet bonnet, trimmed with white lace, styled the Directeur bonnet, which has been recently revived in Paris. Also a very pretty and neat style of breakfast cap, made of white lace, trimmed with silk ribbon. The Princess of Wales hat, however, seems to have superseded all styles in Parisian circles. This style of hat is made of black soft felt, and is literally smothered in black ostrich feathers, the whole presenting a rich and elegant appearance. No other trimming appears, with the exception of two plain roses ostending among their sable surroundings. No display is ever made at this establishment, yet the proprietress is constantly in receipt of orders from the best families of San Francisco, which are filled at the shortest notice. The most fashionable ladies of San Francisco have here, for a number of years, found the latest fashions of Paris that could be obtained, and have, consequently, given Mrs. Caswell their liberal patronage, which she has well deserved through her careful attention to the wants of her many patrons. The very latest in the millinery line may here be found, at 28 Post Street, San Francisco.

Latest in Gents' Hats and Caps.

In connection with gentlemen's wearing apparel we must not forget to call attention to the leading styles in hats. Our memoranda are taken from the catalogue issued by our leading hatter, C. Herrmann, of 350 Kearney Street—branch establishment, 910 Market Street—a copy of which, by the way, is cheerfully mailed to any one applying. The fall season just having begun, an immense stock of fall style hats was lately received by the above enterprising firm, among which, in soft hats, the "Gypsy," "Club," and "Boss Rawedge" are the favorites. In stiff hats the under brim is either lined with silk or satin, giving the hat a very rich appearance. Of this style may be mentioned, for young gents, the "Beauty" and the "Challenge" as the choice of the "boon ton." For older gentlemen the "Forest" and the "Syndicate" are two very beautiful styles. A cut representing the style of the "Beauty" may be found on the last page of this issue of the ARGONAUT. The assortment being so large that it would be almost impossible for us to give any thing like a full description, we would advise our readers to call at the establishment of Mr. Herrmann, where they will invariably find something to their taste at a reasonable rate. The modifications of the style of the "Alpine" still seem to be in the ascendancy among young gentlemen, and it is whispered that young ladies are pleased more with this style of hat, when worn by their callers, than any other. Mr. Herrmann has fully established himself as one of the most fashionable hatters of the city.

Latest in Ready-made Clothing for Gents and Boys.

Some of the latest styles in ready-made clothing are to be found at the house of C. C. Hastings & Co., corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets, who have for the last twenty-five years been acknowledged as the largest retailers of fine goods on this coast. Mr. Hastings resides in New York, and gives his attention to manufacturing and the selection of the novelties for fine trade as soon as they appear in that market, giving this firm an advantage not held by other retail houses in this line. They are now in receipt of the latest novelties in gents' shirts, undergarments, and neckties, among which we noticed an immense variety of flat scarfs—now the thing with nobby trade of all the large Eastern cities. Also, a very choice selection of Scotch and English fancy mixed suitings and trouserings, many of the patterns being exclusively in their hands. Messrs. Hastings & Co. have never touched what may be termed cheap goods in their tailoring department, their positive rule being to allow no garment to leave that department until absolutely as near as possible perfect, in fit and workmanship; however, as they name only cash rates, their prices are from ten to twenty per cent. lower than can be afforded by credit houses. The boys' department, established five years since, is now full of the beautiful and durable; thoroughly finished, fine, and strong work here as in the men's department, is the leading feature. Especial attention is called to kilted suits for children from two to five years of age.

Messrs Burr & Fink, corner Post and Montgomery Streets, over Hibernia Bank, have the largest stock of gentlemen's furnishing goods in the city.

In Gents' Furnishing Goods.

In the neck-wear line the "de Joinville" scarf is the favorite. Dark tints prevail with light-colored or raised figure. This scarf in satin makes one of the richest ties that can add to a perfect toilet for gentlemen. It is the latest, and may well be said to be necessary in full dress. The newest styles in French Cretonne are of curious designs. Among others may be mentioned the broad and hair-line stripes, in color blue and red, on white ground; also the polka dots and many other novel designs have come into favor. These are all imported goods from Paris, and all of the very latest. In underwear may be mentioned those of Vicuna wool, in fineness closely resembling silk in texture. In hosiery of French and English make, we notice for gents new patterns in striped colors, both horizontal and vertical, also mottled colors. The colors prevailing are blue, and brown, and cardinal. The latest styles in the gents' furnishing department may be found at the establishment of Carmany & Crossett, 25 Kearny Street. This enterprising firm has received their Fall importations, and have on display silk handkerchiefs, wristlets, and other novelties, prominent among the latter is the "de Joinville" scarf above mentioned. The new short bosom shirts from this firm are very popular, and in great demand. When comfort and elegance are combined in this line of goods they are of necessity popular as well as fashionable. We noticed also some excellent French gloves recently imported from Paris at this establishment.

In Gents' Tailoring.

A perfectly dressed gentleman must of necessity keep posted in the latest designs in the Tailoring Department, while the ladies look to Paris for the latest in millinery and dress goods, etc. The fashionable gent notes the English style, and directs his tailor accordingly. The single-breasted, one-buttoned cutaway is the prevailing style in London for business wear, as well as in New York and Boston. The double-breasted sack is also worn this season for street wear, omitting the overcoat—making up in warmth by heavy underclothing. The check suits of plain black and white are the most in favor for the double-breasted sack suit. The four-buttoned cutaway is somewhat stylish, and is made from a serge-faced suiting of a dark mixture. The overcoat is now made single-breasted, half-shape fly-front. Also, for fancy style, we have the box coat cut straight and short, cut both double and single-breasted—mostly double. The swell coat is the single-breasted—turtleneck. These various styles are presented on the shortest notice by the firm of J. M. Litchfield & Co., 415 Montgomery Street, who also make a specialty of fine trimmings. Their work is of the most durable and satisfactory character, judging from the liberal patronage that this firm is constantly receiving. They have for some years made up many of the military suits for the army officers residing in the city, also of the staff officers connected with the militia. Some of the most fashionable of our young men here constantly bestow their patronage, and speak in terms of the highest praise of the quality of the workmanship done here, where the latest fashions in the Tailoring Department are always found.

When the modest young man is unexpectedly caught in a parlor full of women, one of whom has roguish eyes, and begins to try to think whether his hair is parted straight or not, the blushes start from the forehead, and creep over the top of his head and down his back, until he feels like a nutmeg grater with a tin ear.

The finest candies in the city are to be had at the Clarendon, 213 Kearny Street, of Love & Goldstein. Try them.

Currier, 103 Dupont Street, makes the finest PICTURE FRAMES.

At the Pacific Business College young men can prepare themselves thoroughly and efficiently for any branch of mercantile pursuits. A diploma from the College is the best possible recommendation for a person in search of a position in any of the great business houses, as it is recognized everywhere.

Did it ever occur to you that Romeo, in the garden scene, had just run himself out of breath, in a wild chase about five feet ahead of a vicious old goat belonging to the Capulet estate, when, in pleading tones addressed, not to the light breaking from Juliet's window, but to the pursuing goat, he exclaimed, "Butt soft!"

Messrs. Burr & Fink, corner Post and Montgomery Streets, over Hibernia Bank, have the largest stock of gentlemen's furnishing goods in the city.

BOSTON DRESS REFORM.

California "Worth" Princess Suits, Skirts, and detachable Flouncers; Cashmere and Merino Union Suits for ladies and children; ladies' and misses' shoulder-brace Corsets; Abdominal Corsets. No. 430 Sutter Street. A. W. BAKER, the only Dress Reform Agent in the city.

WANTED—By a widow lady of refinement, and therefore practical in all the various branches of industry, a position in a family of wealth and refinement as seamstress or housekeeper. Best of references. Apply at 126 Sixth Street, city, room 24.

Messrs. Burr & Fink, corner Post and Montgomery Streets, over Hibernia Bank, have the largest stock of gentlemen's furnishing goods in the city.

Misery.

What to him was love or hope? What to him was joy or care? He stepped on a bar of soap the girl had left on the top-most stair, And his feet flew out with wild, fierce flings; And he struck each stair with a sound like a drum; And the girl below, with the scrubbing things, Laughed like a fiend to see him come.

—Independent.

This paper is printed with ink furnished by Chas. Enou Johnson & Co., 509 South Tenth Street, Philadelphia, and 59 Gold Street, New York.

Mrs. Parker, of the Ladies' Depository, has opened a new store at 126 Post Street. Dolls dressed in all styles. New Lace Patterns.

DECKER BROS

Messrs. Burr & Fink, corner Post and Montgomery Streets, over Hibernia Bank, have the largest stock of gentlemen's furnishing goods in the city.

Currier, 103 Dupont Street, has a fine assortment of VELVET FRAMES.

MALICIOUS ARREST.

The public are hereby informed that W. L. Pierce, the inventor of the renowned "Pierce's Patent Magnetic Elastic Truss," and "Dr. Pierce's Pile Truss," has been arrested on complaint of a person who has been, and is at the present time, engaged in competition with our firm, and whose peculiar mode of competition is well known to the residents of this city and State. The complaint sworn to by the aforesaid truss dealer, charges defendant with practicing "medicine and surgery" without a certificate, as required by law. It remains to be seen whether manufacturing and selling the best Trusses the world has ever known can be construed into "practicing medicine and surgery." We think the hundreds of physicians, judges, editors, merchants, mechanics, farmers, etc., who wear our Trusses, and who know our method of doing business, will be somewhat surprised at this arrest. We thus call attention to the fact in order that our friends and the public generally may see the true "inwardness" of this additional persecution. We shall continue to manufacture and sell "Pierce's Magnetic Elastic Truss," and "Dr. Pierce's Pile Truss." Respectfully,

PIERCE & SON,

609 Sacramento Street, San Francisco.

JOE POHEIM

The Tailor,

203 Montgomery St. and 103 Third St., has just received a large assortment of the latest style goods.
Suits to order from ..... $50
Pants to order from ..... 15
Overcoats to order from ..... 15
The leading question is where the best goods can be found at the lowest prices. The answer is at

JOE POHEIM,

203 Montgomery St. and 103 Third St.

Samples and Rules for Self-Measurement sent free to any address. Fit guaranteed.

NEW BOOKS AT ROMAN'S.

Under the Lilacs. By Louisa M. Alcott. Cloth.....$1 50
Modern Frenchmen. By P. G. Hamerton. 12mo, cloth..... 1 00
Dictionary of Love. By Theocritus, Junior..... 50
Sir Thomas Browne's Writings. 16mo, cloth..... 1 50
All Around the House. By Mrs. Henry Ward Beecher. 12mo, cloth..... 1 50
Boy Trappers. By Horatio Alger. 12mo, cloth..... 1 25
Villages and Village Life. By Eggleston. 12mo, cloth..... 1 75
Stories from an Old Dutch Town. By Lowell..... 1 50
Electric Lighting. By Paget Higgs. 8vo, cloth..... 3 00
A Primer of American Literature. Cloth..... 50
Little Good-for-Nothing. By Alphonse Daudet..... 1 50
The Heir of Charlton. By Agnes Fleming. 12mo, cloth..... 1 50
History of Germany. By Miss Yonge. Cloth..... 1 50
New Poems. By Joseph Miller. Cloth..... 50
A Friend. By Henry Greville. Paper..... 50
Remorse. By Th. Bentzon. Paper..... 50
Cousin Polly's Gold Mine. By Mrs. A. E. Porter. Paper..... 40
The Primrose Path. By Mrs. Oliphant. Paper..... 50

Just received, a large assortment of Juveniles and Fine Stationery, Satchels, etc.

A. ROMAN &amp; CO.,

11 Montgomery Street,

Lick House Block,

San Francisco.

GENUINE SALE.

NICOLL, THE TAILOR

HAVING TO MAKE ROOM FOR

the daily arrival of new styles of French, English, and Domestic Goods from his New York and London houses, will display a very large quantity of uncalled-for garments at greatly reduced prices, as follows:

Pants.....from $3 00
Suits....." 12 00
Overcoats....." 15 00
Vests....." 2 00
Coats....." 7 00

Gentlemen, before ordering anywhere, will do well to call and inspect our daily arrival of French, English, Scotch, and Domestic Goods.

No. 303 MONTGOMERY STREET.

DECKER BROS

ARE YOU

INSURED?

THE TRAVELERS

LIFE AND ACCIDENT

INSURANCE CO.

OF HARTFORD, CONN.,

GRANTS

Life and Endowment Policies,

LOW RATES. ALL CASH.

ALSO,

GENERAL ACCIDENT POLICIES

Solid Cash Assets.....$4,460,000

Surplus to Policy Holders.....1,225,000

Parties contemplating Life Insurance are invited to call before insuring elsewhere.

ALEX. M. DEAN, Gen'l Ag't,

NO. 403 CALIFORNIA ST., S. F.

COMPLICATED

WATCHES

CHRONOGRAPH, REPEATING, SPLIT SECONDS, ETC.

AND A LARGE STOCK OF GOLD and Silver Watches, Chains, Diamonds, Jewelry, Silver Ware, and Fancy Goods at

ANDERSON &amp; RANDOLPH'S

CORNER OF

MONTGOMERY AND SUTTER STS.,

SAN FRANCISCO.

NEW IMPORTATION

OF THE LATEST STYLES OF

EMBROIDERIES

OF EVERY DESIGN.

ALSO, CANVAS OF NEW COLORS.

Ladies' Shopping Baskets of unique shapes. Bronzes, Clocks, Ivory Carvings, Toilet and Fancy Goods, Vienna Bronze Ornaments.

The finest assortment of FANS in the city.

H. SIERING &amp; CO.

(SUCCESSORS TO LOCAN & CO.)

19 MONTGOMERY STREET,

LICK HOUSE BLOCK.

OFFICE OF GENERAL THOMAS

Mill and Mining Company, San Francisco, October 22d, 1878.—The third annual meeting of the stockholders of the above named corporation, for the election of Directors and the transaction of such other business as may be presented, will be held on MONDAY, November 4th, 1878 (first Monday in November), at the hour of one o'clock P. M. on that day, at the office of the corporation, Room No. 29, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California. Transfer books will be closed on Wednesday, October 30th, 1878, at three o'clock P. M.

WM. WILLIS, Secretary.

RUPTURE.

BUY NO TRUSS

Until you see what has been accomplished by DR. PIERCE'S late invention.

Call, or send for New Illustrated Book. Prices reduced. MAGNETIC ELASTIC TRUSS

CO., 609 Sacramento Street, San Francisco.

GEORGE BARSTOW,

ATTORNEY AND COUNSELOR AT

Law, No. 309 California Street, San Francisco, Cal.

KOHLER & CHASE
SAN FRANCISCO
& OAKLAND

THE HUMAN SHIRT.

Its Origin and History from a Purely Scientific Standpoint

It is manifest that the human shirt has passed through a series of important modifications. The shirt of the Stone Age did not open—in the sense that the upper part of the contemporaneous shirt opens—either in front or behind. It had simply a large hole for the reception of the head and neck, and was devoid of either studs or buttons. At a later period the shirt developed an opening in front, and a little later studs were added to temporarily close this opening. This type of shirt was remarkably persistent, and, in fact, became extinct at or about the same time as the great ark of New Foundland; or, in other words, as late as the beginning of the present century. In the existing shirt, which is one of the most widely diffused of human garments, the front opening is closed, and an opening in the back has taken its place. Studs, which are now useless, exist merely in a rudimentary form, and what was once the horn button of the stud, is now merely a frail growth of spiral wire. What has produced these successive developments is one of the most interesting inquiries which the Darwinian investigation can undertake.

The first appearance of the shirt with an opening in front was contemporary, according to paleontologists, with the first efforts of man to navigate the water. In the Stone Age boats of any kind, from logs up to Cunard steamers, were unknown; but in course of time man began to paddle across rivers, say from Albany to New York, on the simple log now in use among Australians. Naturally, he frequently got very wet, and hence it became an object to him to remove his shirt with ease and rapidity. Hence the front opening was developed substantially as it appears in the shirts of the period immediately preceding the Stone Age.

It is agreed by all the anthropologists that the Iron Age, or the age when flat-irons came into use as domestic weapons, succeeded the Stone Age. The shirt-bosom naturally followed the introduction of flat-irons. It is obvious that no woman of the period could have possessed a shirt-bosom without wishing to iron something with it, and the shirt-bosoms were invented to supply this want. About the same time studs appeared. They were needed to keep the shirt-bosom closed, so that the owner could shut himself inside of it with a view to privacy, and were the device of a people among whom needles and thread, and, as a consequence, buttons, were unknown. Thus we can trace, by successive and well defined steps, the development of the rude, unformed shirt of the Stone Age, which was usually made of the coarse cloths manufactured of mail bags and cotton bales, until the shirt with an opening in front, an ironed bosom and three studs—in short, the species classified by western paleontologists under the name of "biled shirt"—became the ruling type.

One of our most profound washerwomen, who has devoted a lifetime to the study of shirts, is of the opinion that the opening at the back of the neck was first developed either in Scotland, at about the period when the Duke of Argyle erected his famous posts, or in America, soon after the early colonists made the acquaintance of the mosquito. This theory is ingenious and plausible, but it is open to the objection that it is not true. The modern species of shirt is older than the Duke of Argyle's posts or the early settlement of America. Doubtless it was found to be peculiarly adapted for Scottish and mosquito purposes, and its rapid increase may very possibly have been effected by counter-irritant considerations, but the latter were not the cause of the great change which we are now investigating. We can, however, confidently assert that this change took place in this country soon after its settlement, and in England soon after the passage of the first great reform bill. That is to say, it took place when demagogues began to bid for the popular vote. Now, the demagogue, with a nice ironed shirt bosom, could not with any plausibility represent himself as a plain workman. In order to do this it was necessary that he should wear a shirt-bosom devoid of starch and made of coarse materials. Hence it occurred to him that were he to wear his shirt wrong side before, and cut a slit in it to simulate an un-ironed and un-ornamented bosom, he would strengthen his popularity. This, then, is the origin of the shirt with an opening behind. With the growth of popular intelligence its original purpose has been forgotten, and no one now attempts to wear his shirt wrong side before. The slit made by the ingenious demagogue still remains, however; and two slits being unnecessary, nature has closed the front opening and decorated it with rudimentary studs.

These profound investigations, involving as they do prolonged processes of subtle reasoning, are inexhausting; but, in the cause of science, it is our duty to sacrifice everything in pursuit of truth.—New York Times.

Woman's Love for the Beautiful.

A woman went into a barber's shop on C Street some weeks ago, says the Virginia City Chronicle, and wanted to know how much it would cost to dye a man's hair and mustache. The price was named, and she then asked the barber to get his dye and follow her.

"Why can't the man come here?" asked the barber. "He's dead," replied the woman, "and the last thing he said when he was passing away was: 'Sally, fix me up pretty for the funeral.' His hair curled beautifully, but was a little gray. It won't look well to see a woman crying round a coffin with an old gray-bearded man in it, so I want him fixed up a little. He was always a beauty when he had his hair dyed. I know I'd want mine fixed up that way if I was gray and dead."

The barber dyed the dead man's hair in the highest style of the art, and the widow remarked, when all was over, that "he was the loveliest corpse ever buried on the Comstock."

It not infrequently happens, in this world of mistakes and thoughtlessness, that a man, even the best of men, may once or twice, during a long or otherwise faultless life, kiss his hired girl in mistake for his wife. But no man, of ages past or of to-day, was ever known to kiss his wife under the erroneous impression that she was the hired girl.

"Can stored urn and animated bust?" asks the poet. We don't know anything about the urn, but the "animated bust" usually holds high carnival throughout the country during the entire political campaign. Office hours, 10:30 P. M. to 2:15 A. M. —clock; push.

ARLINGTON HOTEL,
SANTA BARBARA, CAL.

NO HOTEL ON THE PACIFIC
Coast can surpass the ARLINGTON in the airy cheerfulness and convenience of its arrangements. None can equal it in the natural and artistic beauty of its surroundings. The readers of the ARGONAUT will be pleased to know that the problem of combining solid comfort within doors, inexhaustible pleasure without, and calm contentment all the time, at a very economical rate of expenditure, has been solved at the ARLINGTON, and is respectfully submitted by
GEO. T. BROMLEY, Manager.

BERKELEY GYMNASIUM.

The Berkeley Gymnasium (a preparatory school to the University)—a first-class boarding-school establishment in the interests of higher education, and in opposition to the cramming system of the small colleges and military academies of the State. The next term will commence July 23d. Examination of candidates for admission July 22d and 23d. By request, instructions have been provided during the summer months for students preparing for the August examination at the University. For catalogue or particulars, address—

JOHN F. BURRIS, PRINCIPAL,
BERKELEY, CALIFORNIA.

NOTE.—We desire to call special attention to the organization of our Grammar Department, separate from the Academic, and solicit the patronage of parents and guardians of small boys.

GOLDEN GATE ACADEMY

AND CADET SCHOOL.

Next quarter will commence October 7, 1878.
For circulars, address

D. P. SACKETT, A. M., Principal,
Oakland, Cal.

REDINGTON'S
FLAVORING EXTRACTS

ARE THE PERFECTLY PURE
and highly concentrated Extracts of

FRESH FRUITS

Prepared with great care. They are put up in superior style, in a bottle holding twice as much as ordinary brands of Extracts.

Comparing quality and contents, none other are nearly so cheap.

Wherever tested on THEIR MERITS, they have been adopted in preference to all others, and now are the

STANDARD FLAVORING EXTRACTS

Of the Pacific coast. Dealers will find them to give better satisfaction to the consumers than any other kind and are respectfully requested to give them a trial.

REDINGTON &amp; CO.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

O. F. WILLEY &amp; CO.,

IMPORTERS AND MANUFACTURERS OF

FINE CARRIAGES AND WAGONS

No. 427 MONTGOMERY ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

Agents for the sale of Wagons manufactured by BREWSTER & CO., New York;
W. D. ROGERS, Philadelphia;
C. S. CAFFEY, Camden, N. J.;
WOOD BROTHERS, New York;
H. KILLAM & CO., New Haven;
COOLING BROS., Wilmington

Also, AGENTS FOR

HARNESS MANUFACTURED BY WOOD GIBSON, TOMPKINS & MANDEVILLE, AND A. H. DUNCOMB.

Also, a fine assortment of Robes, Blankets, Nets, Whips, etc.

MILLER & RICHARD,
SOLE MAKERS OF
EXTRA-HARD METAL
SCOTCH TYPE.

SPECIAL AGENTS FOR

THE CAMPBELL, HOE, AND PEERLESS
PRESSES.

No. 523 COMMERCIAL STREET,
And 205 Leidesdorff Street, San Francisco.

GEO. W. PRESCOTT. IRVING M. SCOTT. H. T. SCOTT.

UNION IRON WORKS

(Founded 1849.) Post Office Box 2128.

COR. FIRST AND MISSION STREETS,
SAN FRANCISCO

MANUFACTURERS OF

Compressed Engines,
Air Compressors,
Rock Drills,
Portable Hoisting Engines,
Marine Stationary and Portable Boilers
Bally Hoist, complete.

CONSTANTLY ON HAND AND FOR SALE.

Direct-acting Pumping and Hoisting Engines,
Upright and Stationary Engines,
Quartz Crushing and Amalgamating Machinery,
Blake's Rock Breakers,
Smelting Furnaces,
Quicksilver Pumps,
Chlorodizing Furnaces,
Cornish Pumps,
Steam Pumps.

All manufactured by us of the best materials, design, and workmanship, and furnished at lower rates than by Eastern manufacturers.

PRESCOTT, SCOTT & CO.

J. H. JONES &amp; CO.,

Member S. F. Stock and Exchange Board,

STOCK AND EXCHANGE BROKERS

Office, 320 Pine Street, San Francisco.

CHAS. S. FOX.

M. B. KELLOGG.

FOX &amp; KELLOGG,

ATTORNEYS AND COUNSELORS
AT LAW, San Francisco, Cal.

Office, No. 540 California Street, Rooms 1, 2, and 3.

FRANK KENNEDY,

ATTORNEY AT LAW, 604 MERCHANT STREET, Room 16. Probate, divorce, bankruptcy, and all other cases attended to.

REMOVAL.

S. B. WAKEFIELD &amp; CO.

STOCK &amp; EXCHANGE BROKERS,

Have removed from 314 Pine Street to

322 Pine St., cor. Leidesdorff, San Francisco.

HOME IN THE COUNTRY.

NOOK FARM.

FAMILIES WISHING TO SPEND

the Summer in the country will find this a cheerful home, and beautiful scenery of such endless variety as tempt to healthful exercise and recreation. We furnish good accommodations, and an excellent table. Good fishing and hunting on the premises. Four trains from San Francisco pass the station daily. Address

E. B. SMITH,
Rutherford, Napa County, Cal.

MME. B. ZEITSKA'S
FRENCH, GERMAN, AND ENGLISH
INSTITUTE

FOR YOUNG LADIES,
922 POST ST., BETWEEN HYDE
and Larkin.

KINDERGARTEN connected with the Institute.
The next term will commence October 2d.
A limited number of Boarding Pupils received.

MME. B. ZEITSKA, Principal.

THOMAS BOYSON, M. D.

(University of Copenhagen, Denmark),

PHYSICIAN AND SURGEON. Office
and Residence, 112 Kearny Street. Office hours, 11 A. M. to 1 P. M., 6 to 7 P. M. Sunday 11 to 1 only. Telephone in the office.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF

the Eureka Consolidated Mining Company, Nevada Block, Room 37, San Francisco, Oct. 15th, 1878.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company, held this day, a dividend (No. 35) of three dollars per share was declared, payable on Monday, Oct. 21st, 1878. Transfer books closed until October 22d.

W. W. TRAYLOR, Secretary.

CALIFORNIA FARMERS'
MUTUAL

Fire Insurance Company

[ESTABLISHED IN 1874.]

Paid up Capital .....$200,000
Assets exceed..... 326,000

PRINCIPAL OFFICE, 209 SANSOME ST.
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.,

THOS. FLINT, President. J. W. FOARD, Manager.

FERD. K. RULE .....Secretary.

I. G. GARDNER.....General Agent.

COMMERCIAL
INSURANCE COMPANY OF CALA,
FIRE AND MARINE.

Principal office, 405 California Street, San Francisco.

JOHN H. WISE, President.
CHAS. A. LATON, Secretary.

THE STATE INVESTMENT

—AND—

INSURANCE COMPANY, FIRE AND MARINE

CASH ASSETS.....$450,000

Principal Office, 218 and 220 Sansome Street, San Francisco

OFFICERS:

A. J. BRYANT, President,
RICHARD IVERS, Vice-President,
CHAS. H. CUSHING, Secretary,
H. H. WATSON, Marine Surveyor

SILVER HILL MINING COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Gold Hill, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the thirtieth (30th) day of September, 1878, an assessment (No. 4) of fifty (50) cents per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the company, Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the first day of November, 1878, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction; and unless payment is made before will be sold on MONDAY, the twenty-fifth day of November, 1878, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

W. E. DEAN, Secretary.
Office—Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

OFFICE OF THE SIERRA NEVADA

Silver Mining Company, San Francisco, October 2d, 1878.—In accordance with a resolution adopted at a meeting of the Trustees of the Sierra Nevada Silver Mining Company, held this day, a special meeting of the stockholders of said Company is hereby called, the same to be held at the office of the Company, Room 47, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California, on MONDAY, the fourth (4th) day of November, 1878, at two (2) o'clock P. M., to take into consideration and decide upon the proposition to increase the capital stock of said Company from ten million ($10,000,000) dollars, divided into one hundred thousand (100,000) shares of the par value of one hundred ($100) dollars each, the present capital stock, to fifty million ($50,000,000) dollars, divided into five hundred thousand (500,000) shares of the par value of one hundred ($100) dollars each.

JOHN SKAE,
CHAS. H. FISH,
JOS. CLARK,
A. E. HEAD,
R. S. GRAVES, } Trustees

W. W. STEVENSON, Secretary.

BELCHER SILVER MINING CO.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Gold Hill, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Trustees, held on the eighth day of October, 1878, an assessment (No. 16) of one ($1) dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the company, Room 12, Cosmopolitan Hotel Building, 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 12th day of November, 1878, will be delinquent, and advertised at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on TUESDAY, the third day of December, 1878, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with cost of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors.
JNO. CROCKETT, Secretary.
Office—Room 12, Cosmopolitan Hotel Building, 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

MARY E. HENRY, plaintiff, vs. JAMES J. HENRY, defendant.—An action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JAMES J. HENRY, defendant: You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days—otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony existing between plaintiff and defendant (as will appear more fully by reference to the complaint on file herein, to which your attention is hereby directed), and for general relief and costs of suit. And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this Third day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.
By W. STEVENSON, Deputy Clerk.

T. J. CROWLEY, Attorney for Plaintiff,
No. 629 Kearny Street.

H. P. WAKELEE & CO.,

Wholesale and Retail

Druggists, Importers of Foreign and Domestic Drugs, Chemicals, and Perfumery,

No. 140 Montgomery Street, under the Occidental Hotel,
San Francisco.

PARTICULAR ATTENTION PAID
to compounding Physician's Prescriptions, the dispensing of which is entrusted only to the most competent hands, while every care is taken to ensure the purity of all preparations.

MUSIC BOXES

OF ALL DESCRIPTIONS AND OF
Standard Reputation, playing from one to over one hundred airs. The largest and best assortment in this city.
MUSICAL BOXES WITH CHANGEABLE CYLIN-DERS always on hand. New and interesting styles constantly received. Call and examine our stock.
REPAIRING OF MUSICAL BOXES thoroughly done in all their particularities.

M. J. PAILLARD & CO.,

MANUFACTURERS AND IMPORTERS,

120 Sutter Street, San Francisco.

Branch of House, 680 Broadway, New York.

ALASKA*COMMERCIAL CO.

No. 310 Sansome Street,

WHOLESALE DEALER IN FURS.

RE-OPENED.

HAYWARD WAREHOUSES

Are now receiving

GRAIN ON STORAGE.

THE PATRONAGE OF FARMERS

and others is respectfully solicited. Storage, one dollar per ton for the season. Advances and Insurance effected at the lowest rates.

Refer by permission to Chas. Webb Howard, President
Spring Water Valley Company, Bray Bros., M. Waterman
& Co., San Francisco; John Zeile, Hayward's; J. West
Martin, Western Union Savings Bank, Oakland.
R. H. BENNETT, Proprietor.

J. C. MERRILL & CO.

SHIPPING

—AND—

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Agents for the

SANDWICH ISLANDS AND OREGON PACKET
LINES.

204 AND 206 CALIFORNIA ST. San Francisco.

MOODY'S*Drug and Prescription

STORE,

Northwest corner Polk and Pine Streets.

Prescriptions prepared with care from the purest of Drugs and Chemicals.

NEWTON BOOTH, C. T. WHEELER, Sacramento,
J. T. GLOVER, W. W. DODGE, San Francisco

W. W. DODGE & CO.,

WHOLESALE GROCERS,

Northwest corner Clay and Front Streets, San Francisco.

T. J. PETTIT & CO.'S

LABEL, SHOW CARD,

ENGRAVING AND PRINTING ESTABLISHMENT,

528 CALIFORNIA STREET, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

THE VERTICAL FEED.

THE ONLY POSITIVE SUCCESS IN
all departments of sewing. Lightest running shuttle
machine in the market. The NEW DAVIS VERTICAL FEED
SEWING MACHINE, 130 Post Street.

MARK SHELTON.

P. S.—Howe, Florence, Wheeler & Wilson, Grover &
Baker, Domestic, Weed, Willcox & Gibbs, for sale at $70
each.

COMMENCING SUNDAY, JULY 14, 1878.
Passenger trains will leave San Francisco, from Passenger Depot on Townsend Street, between Third and Fourth, as follows:

8.30 A. M. DAILY for San Jose, Gilroy, Hollister,
Tres Pinos, Pajaro, Salinas, Soledad, and all Way
Stations. At Pajaro, the Santa Cruz R.R. connects with this train for Aplos and Santa Cruz. At Salinas the
M. & S. V. R. connects with this train for Monterey.
Stage connections made with this train.

10.40 A. M. DAILY for San Jose and Way Stations.

3.30 P. M. DAILY (Sundays excepted) for Gilroy, Pa-jaro, Hollister, Tres Pinos, and Way Stations.
Stage connection made with this train at SANTA
CLARA for Pacific Congress Springs.

4.40 P. M. DAILY for San Jose and Way Stations.

6.30 P. M. DAILY for Menlo Park and Way Stations.

SUNDAYS AN EXTRA TRAIN will leave for San Jose and Way Stations at 9.30 A. M. Returning, will leave San Jose at 6.00 P. M.

EXCURSION TICKETS to San Jose and other points and return sold on Saturdays and Sunday mornings.
Good for return until following MONDAY, inclusive.

Also, Excursion Tickets to Monterey—good from Saturday until following Monday, inclusive.

A. C. BASSETT, H. R. JUDAH,
Superintendent. Asst. Pass. & Tkt. Agt.

SOUTHERN DIVISIONS.

Passengers for points on the Southern Divisions of the road will take the cars of the Central Pacific Railroad
via OAKLAND, leaving SAN FRANCISCO via Ferry
Landing, Market Street, at 4.00 P. M. daily, and making close connection at GOSHEN for Summer, Mohave, LOS ANGELES, Wilmington, Anaheim, Colton, Colorado
River, and YUMA.

SAN FRANCISCO AND NORTH PACIFIC R. R.

Commencing Monday, October 7th, 1878, and until further notice, Boats and Trains will leave San Francisco:
(Ticket Office, Washington Street Wharf.)

3.30 P. M. DAILY, Sundays excepted,
Steamer "James M. Donahue" (Washington Street Wharf), connecting with Mail and Express Train at Donahue for Petaluma, Santa Rosa, Healdsburg, Clover-
dale, and way stations. Making stage connection at Lakeville for Sonoma; at Geyersville for Skaggs Springs, at Cloverdale for Ukiah, Lakeport, Mendocino City, and the GEYSERS.

Connections made at Fulton on the following morning with Fulton and Guerneville R. R. for Korbels, Guerneville, and the Redwoods.
(Arrive at San Francisco 10.35 A. M.)

8.00 A. M., Sundays only, Excursions, steamer "James M. Donahue," connecting at Donahue with trains for Cloverdale and way stations.

RETURNING—Trains will leave Donahue at 4.40 P. M., and arrive at San Francisco at 6.55 P. M.

Freight received from 7 A. M. to 2.30 P. M. daily (except Sunday).

TICKET OFFICE, WASHINGTON STREET WHARF.

ARTHUR HUGHES, Gen. Manager. A. A. BEAN, Sup't.
P. E. DOUGHERTY, Gen. Pass. and Tkt. Agent.

OCCIDENTAL AND ORIENTAL STEAMSHIP COMPANY

—FOR—

JAPAN AND CHINA,

Leave Wharf, Cor. First and Brannan Streets, at noon, for
YOKOHAMA AND HONGKONG.

Connecting at Yokohama with steamers for Shanghai,

GAELIC, OCEANIC, BELGIC.

November.....16 December.....17 October.....24
February.....18 March.....15 January.....24
May.....16 April.....16

Cabin plans on exhibition and Passenger Tickets for sale
at No. 2 Montgomery Street.

For freight apply at the Pacific Mail Steamship Company's Wharf.

T. H. GOODMAN, Gen'l Passenger Agent.

DAVID D. COLTON, President.

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP CO.

First-class steamers with unequalled accommodations for passengers will leave San Francisco:

FOR YOKOHAMA AND HONGKONG,
On the 1st of every month.

FOR SYDNEY AND AUCKLAND, via HONOLULU,
September 2d, and every fourth week thereafter.

FOR NEW YORK, via PANAMA, CENTRAL AMER-
ICAN, MEXICAN, and SOUTH AMERICAN
PORTS, HAVANA, and all WEST IN-DIA PORTS, on the 5th and 19th of each month.

FOR HONOLULU,
April 27th, and every four weeks thereafter.

FOR VICTORIA, B. C., PUGET SOUND PORTS,
and PORTLAND, Oregon, on the 10th,
20th, and 30th of each month.

WILLIAMS, BLANCHARD & CO., Agents,
Corner First and Brannan Streets.

PACIFIC COAST STEAMSHIP CO.

Steamers of this Company will sail from Broadway wharf
for PORTLAND (Oregon) every five days, direct, and for
LOS ANGELES, SANTA BARBARA, SANTA CRUZ,
SAN DIEGO, SAN LUIS OBISPO, and other Northern and Southern Coast Ports, leaving San Francisco about every third day.

For day and hour of sailing, see the Company's advertisement in the San Francisco daily papers.

TICKET OFFICE, No. 214 MONTGOMERY ST., NEAR PINE.
GOODALL, PERKINS & CO., Agents,
No. 10 Market Street, San Francisco.

W. LITTLE.....J. B. CUMMING.

LITTLE & CUMMING,

CARPENTERS AND BUILDERS, No.

34 O'Farrell Street, San Francisco.

Estimates given on all classes and styles of work. General jobbing promptly attended to. Offices and Stores neatly fitted up.

C. P. R. R.

COMMENCING MONDAY, OCTOBER

7, 1878, and until further notice.

TRAINS AND BOATS

WILL LEAVE SAN FRANCISCO:

OVERLAND TICKET OFFICE AT FERRY LANDING, MAR-KET STREET.

7.00 A. M. DAILY, VALLEJO
Steamer (from Market Street Landing), connecting with the trains for Napa (Stages for Sonoma), Calistoga (The Geysers), and Sacramento. Connecting at Davis (Sundays excepted) for Woodland and Knight's Landing,
and at Woodland for Williams and Willows.

[Arrive San Francisco 8.10 P. M.]

7.00 A. M. DAILY, LOCAL PASsenger Train (via Oakland Ferry), arriving at San Jose at 9.45 A. M. Connecting at Niles with train via Livermore, arriving at Tracy at 11.30 A. M., and connecting with Atlantic Express. [Arrive San Francisco 6.05 P. M.]

8.00 A. M. DAILY, ATLANTIC
Express Train (via Oakland Ferry, Northern
Ry. and S. P. & T. R. R.) for Sacramento, Marysville,
Redding (Portland, Or.) Colfax, Reno (Virginia City), Palisade (Eureka), Ogden, and Omaha. Connects at Galt with train arriving at Lone at 3.40 P. M.

[Arrive San Francisco 5.15 P. M.]
SUNDAY EXCURSION TICKETS TO SAN PABLO AND MAR-
TINEZ AT REDUCED RATES.

10.00 A. M. DAILY, (VIA OAKland Ferry), Local Passenger Train to Haywards and Niles. [Arrive San Francisco 6.05 P. M.]

3.00 P. M. DAILY, SAN JOSE
Passenger Train (via Oakland Ferry and Niles), stopping at all way stations. Arrive at San Jose at
5.20 P. M. [Arrive San Francisco at 9.35 A. M.]

3.00 P. M. DAILY, NORTHERN
Railway Passenger Train (via Oakland Ferry)
to San Pablo, Martinez, and Antioch.

[Arrive San Francisco 9.35 A. M.]

4.00 P. M. DAILY, SOUTHERN Express Train (via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R.), for Lathrop (and Stockton), Merced, Madera, Visalia, Summer, Mojave, Newhall
(San Buenaventura and Santa Barbara), Los Angeles,
"Santa Monica," Wilmington, Santa Ana (San Diego), Colton, and Yuma (Arizona Stages and Colorado River Steamers). Sleeping cars between Oakland, Los Angeles, and Yuma. [Arrive San Francisco at 12.35 P. M.]

4.00 P. M. SUNDAYS EXCEPTED,
Vallejo Steamer (from Market Street Landing),
connecting with trains for Calistoga (The Geysers), Woodland, Knight's Landing, and Sacramento, and at Sacramento with passenger train, leaving at 9.35 P. M., for Truckee, Reno, Carson, and Virginia. Sleeping cars between Vallejo and Carson. [Arrive San Francisco 11.10 A. M.]

4.00 P. M. SUNDAYS EXCEPTED,
Sacramento Steamer (from Washington Street
Wharf) for Benicia and Landings on the Sacramento River.
[Arrive San Francisco 8.00 P. M.]

4.30 P. M. DAILY, THROUGH
Third Class and Accommodation Train, via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. and T. R. R.)
connecting at Lathrop with train arriving at Los Angeles on second day at 11.55 A. M. [Arrive San Francisco 7.30 P. M.]

4.30 P. M. DAILY, LOCAL PASsenger (via Oakland Ferry) to Haywards,
Niles, and Livermore. [Arrive San Francisco 8.35 P. M.]

5.00 P. M. DAILY, OVERLAND
Emigrant Train (via Oakland Ferry and Northern Railway), to Ogden, Omaha, and East.

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

FERRIES AND LOCAL TRAINS.

FROM SAN FRANCISCO, DAILY.

To	To	To	To	To	To	To	To	To	To
Oakland.	Alameda.	Fernside.	East Oakland.	Niles.	Hayward.	Del Norte.	Street.	Del Norte.	Street.
A. M. P. M.	A. M. P. M.	A. M. P. M.	A. M. P. M.	A. M. P. M.	A. M. P. M.	A. M. P. M.	A. M. P. M.	A. M. P. M.	A. M. P. M.
6.10 12.30	7.00 7.00	6.10 7.00	7.30 10.00	8.30 10.00	9.30 10.00	10.30 11.00	11.00 11.30	11.30 12.00	12.00 12.30
7.00 1.00	8.00 8.00	7.30 10.00	8.30 10.00	9.30 10.00	10.30 11.00	11.00 11.30	11.30 12.00	12.00 12.30	12.30 1.00
7.30 1.30	9.00 8.00	8.30 10.00	9.30 10.00	10.30 11.00	11.00 11.30	11.30 12.00	12.00 12.30	12.30 1.00	1.00 1.30
8.00 2.00	10.00 P. M.	9.30 10.00	10.30 11.00	11.00 11.30	11.30 12.00	12.00 12.30	12.30 1.00	1.00 1.30	1.30 2.00
8.30 3.00	11.00 8.50	10.30 11.00	11.00 11.30	11.30 12.00	12.00 12.30	12.30 1.00	1.00 1.30	1.30 2.00	2.00 2.30
9.00 3.30	12.00 1.00	11.30 12.00	12.00 12.30	12.30 1.00	1.00 1.30	1.30 2.00	2.00 2.30	2.30 3.00	3.00 3.30
9.30 4.00	P. M.	P. M.	P. M.	P. M.	P. M.	P. M.	P. M.	P. M.	P. M.
10.00 4.30	1.30	12.30	1.00	1.30	2.00	2.30	3.00	3.30	4.00
10.30 5.00	2.00	1.00	1.30	2.00	2.30	3.00	3.30	4.00	4.30
11.00 5.30	3.00	4.30	3.30	4.00	4.30	5.00	5.30	6.00	6.30
11.30 6.00	4.00	4.30	4.30	5.00	5.30	6.00	6.30	7.00	7.30
12.00 6.30	5.00	5.30	5.30	6.00	6.30	7.00	7.30	8.00	8.30
..... 7.00	6.00	6.30	6.30	7.00	7.30	8.00	8.30	9.00	9.30
..... 8.10	7.00	7.00	7.00	7.30	7.30	8.00	8.30	9.00	9.30
..... 9.20	8.10	8.10	8.10	8.40	8.40	9.10	9.10	9.40	9.40
..... 10.30	9.20	9.20	9.20	9.50	9.50	10.20	10.20	10.50	10.50
..... 11.45	10.30	10.30	10.30	11.00	11.00	11.30	11.30	12.00	12.00
..... 12.15	11.45	11.45	11.45	12.15	12.15	12.45	12.45	1.15	1.15

B—Sundays excepted. C—Sundays only.

* Alameda passengers change cars at Oakland.

TO SAN FRANCISCO, DAILY.

To	To	To	To	To	To	To	To	To	To
Oakland.	Alameda.	Fernside.	East Oakland.	Niles.	Hayward.	Del Norte.	Street.	Del Norte.	Street.
A. M. P. M.	A. M. P. M.	A. M. P. M.	A. M. P. M.	A. M. P. M.	A. M. P. M.	A. M. P. M.	A. M. P. M.	A. M. P. M.	A. M. P. M.
6.30 7.40	7.05 8.10	6.10 7.00	7.30 10.00	8.30 10.00	9.30 10.00	10.30 11.00	11.00 11.30	11.30 12.00	12.00 12.30
8.00 7.50	8.00 8.50	7.30 10.00	8.30 10.00	9.30 10.00	10.30 11.00	11.00 11.30	11.30 12.00	12.00 12.30	12.30 1.00
10.00 8.30	P. M.	6.40	11.00 6.25	6.50	7.20	7.50	8.20	8.50	9.20
P. M. 9.30	2.05	7.40	P. M. 7.00	7.30	8.00	8.30	9.00	9.30	10.00
3.00 10.30	4.30	8.40	6.00	6.00	6.00	6.00	6.00	6.00	6.00
4.30 11.30	9.40	9.00	8.25	3.20	3.50	4.20	4.50	5.20	5.50
5.30 P. M.	10.40	11.00	9.50	4.20	4.50	5.20	5.50	6.20	6.50
..... 1.00	11.40	P. M.	12.00	5.20	5.50	6.20	6.50	7.20	7.50
..... 4.00	P. M.	12.00	9.50	6.20	6.50	7.20	7.50	8.20	8.50
..... 5.00	P. M.	12.00	10.20	7.20	7.50	8.20	8.50	9.20	9.50
..... 6.00	1.25	1.00	10.50	8.20	8.50	9.20	9.50	10.20	10.50
..... 7.00	2.40	3.00	11.20	9.20	9.50	10.20	10.50	11.20	11.50
..... 8.00	4.40	4.30	11.50	10.20	10.50	11.20	11.50	12.20	12.50
..... 9.00	5.40	5.00	12.20	11.20	11.50	12.20	12.50	1.00	1.30
..... 10.00	6.40	6.00	1.00	12.20	12.50	1.00	1.30	2.00	2.30
..... 11.00	7.50	7.00	1.30	1.00	1.30	2.00	2.30	3.00	3.30
..... 12.00	8.50	8.00	2.00	1.30	2.00	2.30	3.00	3.30	4.00
..... 1.15	9.50	9.00	2.30	2.00	2.30	3.00	3.30	4.00	4.30

B—Sundays excepted. C—Sundays only.

* Alameda passengers change cars at Oakland.

C

CHICKERING

PIANO WAREROOMS,

31 POST ST., Mechanics' Institute Building.

ELEGANT PIANOS.

L. K. HAMMER,

Sole Agent for Pacific Coast.

Owners of Chickering Pianos are specially requested to leave orders for tuning at warehouse, 31 Post Street.

MUSIC

KNABE PIANOS,
IRVING PIANOS, ROGERS' UPRIGHT PIANOS,
Prince Organs, Waters' Organs, Sheet Music.
BANCROFT, KNIGHT & Co.,
733 MARKET STREET.

PIANOS

SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED PIANOS.

Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.

WOODWORTH, SCHELL & Co.
12 Post Street San Francisco.

RECEIVER'S NOTICE.

The undersigned, having been appointed by the Judge of the Fifteenth District Court, Receiver, to take charge of the affairs of La Societe Francaise d'Epargnes et de Prevoyance Mutuelle (French Savings and Loan Society), with power to collect all moneys due the same, and to take possession of all books of accounts, papers, property, evidences of indebtedness, and assets thereof, hereby gives notice that he has entered upon the discharge of his duties as such Receiver, and has opened an office for the transaction of the business intrusted to him by said order of the Court, at No. 412 Montgomery Street.

All persons indebted to the Bank are hereby notified to make payment to the undersigned, and all depositors holding pass-books are requested to present them at the office of the Receiver, that they may be written up and balanced. F. F. LOW, Receiver.

KEANE BROS.

WOULD RESPECTFULLY ASK A visit of inspection to their new departments.

CLOAKS, SUITS, COSTUMES,

Etc., etc. Ladies will find only the latest novelties of this season's production in London, Paris, Berlin, and New York. Our cutters and fitters are thoroughly reliable, and combined with moderate charges we can confidently ask a share of public patronage.

All the newest materials and latest designs are to be found in our Silk and French Dress Goods Departments.

KEANE BROS.

107, 109, 111, AND 113

KEARNY STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.

ROSS'

MILLINERY EMPORIUM,
UNDER THE BALDWIN.PACIFIC BUSINESS
COLLEGE,
325 Post St., San Francisco.

THE CAL. FURNITURE M'FG CO.

HAVE FIVE TIMES AS MUCH

FURNITURE

As any other house on this Coast, which has been purchased so low that we CAN and WILL sell at such prices that the poor can gratify their WISHES and the rich their TASTE. At the old stand,

NOS. 224 AND 226 BUSH STREET, S. F.

REMOVAL.

I. W. TABER

The leading Photographer of this city, has just occupied his new and handsome parlors over the HIBERNIA BANK, CORNER MARKET AND MONTGOMERY STREETS. Entrance on Montgomery Street. Elevator connected with building.

Easy of access. The handsomest Photograph Rooms in the city. Give him a call.

NICOLL, THE TAILOR

BRANCH OF NEW YORK.

THE ONLY HOUSE IN THE CITY THAT RECEIVES FRESH PAT- terns and New York and Paris Fashions weekly. Samples with instructions for self-measurement SENT FREE. A small stock on hand of our own make to select from. Tailors and the public supplied with Cloth and Trimings at wholesale prices by the yard; any length cut. THE QUICKEST, BEST, AND CHEAPEST TAILOR IN THE WORLD. FANTS TO ORDER IN SIX HOURS. SUITS TO ORDER IN ONE DAY, if required.

Geo. W. Nicoll, Tailor

TO ORDER:

Pants ..... from $ 4 00
Suits ..... from 15 00
Overcoats .... from 15 00
Dress Coats . . from 20 00

TO ORDER:

Black Doeskin Pants
from ..... $7 00
White Vests .... from 3 00
Fancy Vests .... from 6 00

Costly thy habit as thy purse can buy,
But not expressed in fancy; rich, not gaudy;
For the apparel oft proclaims the man.
SHAKESPEARE.

"To be well dressed will oftentimes supersede the rest."
—LYRON.

FINEST STOCK OF WOOLENS IN THE WORLD.

505 MONTGOMERY STREET AND 18 KEARNY STREET.

PALMER BROS.

726 TO 734 MARKET ST.,

Have a full assortment of

LADIES' AND GENTS' FURNISHing Goods, Toilet Articles, Corsets, Embroideries,
French and Valenciennes Laces, a fine assortment of Velvetings, Trimmings, and the largest stock of

MILLINERY GOODS,

And the best stock of

BOYS' CLOTHING AND HATS & CAPS
in the city.

SIERRA NEVADA SILVER MINING

Company.—Location of principal place of business,
San Francisco, California. Location of works, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Directors, held on the twenty-second day of October, 1875, an assessment (No. 15) of three dollars ($3) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 47, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery
Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid
on the twenty-seventh day of November, 1875, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on WEDNESDAY, the eighteenth day of December, 1875, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses
of sale.

Office—Room 47, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street,
San Francisco, California.

MORRIS, SCHWAB &amp; CO.

FINE-ART DEALERS.

FREE ART GALLERY.

A complete assortment of ARTISTS' MATERIAL, GOLD
FRAMES, etc.

19 AND 21 POST STREET.

WAREHOUSES, N. W. CORNER
KEARNY AND SUTTER STREETS.

SHERMAN, HYDE &amp; CO.

SHEET MUSIC,
MUSIC BOOKS,
MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

SEWING MACHINES.

THE HIGH REPUTATION OF THE

Grover & Baker Machine is the result of true worth and long years of honorable service.

J. W. EVANS, 29 Post Street.

MARBLEIZED
IRON MANTELS.

IN ELEGANCE OF DESIGN, QUALity of finish, and durability of polish, they are every way superior to slate or marble. In point of economy, also, they cost very much less, are stronger, and certainly far more durable than either.

ALL SIZES AND STYLES

ENAMELED GRATES.

FRENCH COOKING

RANGES

All sizes, suitable for Hotels, Restaurants, Families, and Boarding-Houses.

W. W. MONTAGUE &amp; CO.

NOS. 110, 112, 114, 118, &amp; 120 BATTERY ST.

PALACE HOTEL RESTAURANT,

FIRST CLASS IN ALL RESPECTS.

QUIET AND DESIRABLE PLACE

for Ladies, Gentlemen, and Families. 23 Entrance
south side of Court. A. D. SHARON.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California
in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

FRANCES A. NELSON, plaintiff, vs. DAVID P.
NELSON, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to David P. Nelson, defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff, in the District
Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days;
otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony heretofore and now existing between the plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds
set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is hereby expressly made, and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 13th day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

[SEAL] THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.
By W. STEVENSON, Deputy Clerk.
GEORGE L. WOODS and JOHN J. COPPEE, Attorneys for Plaintiff.

BUY YOUR

SHIRTS AT

BEAMISH'S

The Argonaut.

VOL. III. NO. 17.

SAN FRANCISCO, NOVEMBER 2, 1878.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

MARGARET SINCLAIR'S SILENT MONEY.

A Scotch Story Founded on a Californian Fact.

"It was ma luck, Sinclair, an' I couldna win by it."
"Havers! If luck ruled, the bull might calve as well as the cow; it was David Vedder's whisky that turned ma boat tapsalteerie, Geordie Twatt."

"Thou had better blame Hacon; he turned the boat wid-dershins, an' what fool doesna ken that it is evil luck to go contrarie to the sun?"

"It is waur luck to have a drunken, superstitious pilot. Twatt, that Norse blood i' thy veins is o'er full o' freets. Fear God, an' mind thy wark, and thou needna speir o' the sun what gate to turn the boat."

"My Norse blood willow stand ony Scot stirring it up, Sinclair. I come o' a mighty kind—"

"Tush, man! Mules mak' an unco' fuss about their ancestors having been horses. It has come to this, Geordie; thou must be laird o' theesel' before I'll trust thee again wi' ony craft o' mine." Then Peter Sinclair lifted his papers, and, looking the discharged sailor steadily in the face, bid him "go on his peententials an' think things o'er a bit."

Geordie Twatt went sullenly out, but Peter was rather pleased with himself; he believed that he had done his duty in a satisfactory manner. And if a man was in a good temper with himself, it was just the kind of evening to increase his satisfaction. The gray old town of Kirkwall lay in supernatural glory, the wondrous beauty of the mellow gloaming blending with soft green and rosy-red spears of light, that shot from east to west, or charged upward to the zenith. The great herring-fleet outside the harbor was as motionless as "a painted fleet upon a painted ocean"—the men were sleeping or smoking upon the piers; not a foot fell upon the flagged streets, and the only murmur of sound was round the public fountain, where a few women were perched on the bowl's edge, knitting and gossiping.

Peter Sinclair was perhaps not a man inclined to analyze such things, but they had their influence over him; for, as he drifted slowly home in his skiff, he began to pity Geordie's four motherless babies, and to wonder if he had been as patient with him as he might have been. "An' yet," he murmured, "there's the loss on the goods, an' the loss o' time, an' the boat to steek afresh forbye the danger to life! Na, na, I'm no called upon to put life i' peril for a glass o'ermuch whisky."

Then he lifted his head, and there, on the white sands, stood his daughter Margaret. He was conscious of a great thrill of pride as he looked at her, for Margaret Sinclair, even among the beautiful women of the Orcaades, was most beautiful of all. In a few minutes he had fastened his skiff at a little jetty, and was walking with her over the springy heath toward a very pretty house of white stone. It was his own house, and he was proud of it also, but not half so proud of the house as of its tiny garden; for there, with great care and at great cost, he had managed to rear a few pansies, snowdrops, lilies of the valley, and other hardy English flowers. Margaret and he stooped lovingly over them, and it was wonderful to see how Peter's face softened, and how gently the great rough hands, that had been all the day handling smoked geese and fish, touched these frail, trembling blossoms.

"Eh, lassie! I could most greet wi' joy to see the bonnie bit things; when I can get time I'll see 'em go wi' thee to Edinburgh; I'd like weel to see such fields, an' gardens, an' trees, as I hear thee tell on."

Then Margaret began again to describe the greenhouses, the meadows, and wheat-fields, the forests of oaks and beeches, she had seen during her school-days in Edinburgh. Peter listened to her as if she were telling a wonderful fairy-story, but he liked it, and, as he cut slice after slice from his smoked goose, he enjoyed her talk of roses and apple-blossoms, and smacked his lips for the thousandth time when she described a peach, and said: "It tasted, father, as if it had been grown in the Garden of Eden."

After such conversations Peter was always stern and strict. He felt an actual anger at Adam and Eve; their transgression became a keenly personal affair, for he had a very vivid sense of the loss they had entailed upon him. This vague sense of wrong made him try to fix it, and, after a short reflection, he said, in an injured tone:

"I wonder when Ranald's coming hame again?"

"Ranald is all right, father."

"A' wrong, thou means, lassie. There's three vessels waiting to be loaded, an' the books sae far ahint that I ken na whether I'm losing or saving. Where is he?"

"Not far away. He will be at the Stones of Stennis this week some time with an Englishman he fell in with at Perth."

"I wonder now, was it for my sins or his ain that the lad has sic auld-warld notions? There isn't a pagan altar-stane 'tween John O'Groat's an' Lamba Ness he doesna run after. I wish he were as anxious to serve in the Lord's temple—I would build him a kirk an' a manse for it."

"We'll be proud of Ranald yet, father. The Sinclairs have been fighting and making money for centuries; it is a sign of grace to have a scholar and a poet at last among them."

Peter grumbled. His ideas of poetry were limited by the Scotch psalms, and as for scholarship, he asserted that the books were better kept when he used his method of tallies and crosses. Then he remembered Geordie Twatt's misfortune and had his little grumble out on this subject:

"Boat an' goods might hae been a total loss, no to speak o' the lives o' Geordie an' the four lads wi' him; an' a' for the sake o' a drap mair than eneuch!"

Margaret looked at the brandy-bottle standing at her father's elbow, and, though she did not speak, the look annoyed Peter.

"You arna to even my glass wi' his, lassie. I ken tell when to stop—Geordie never does."

"It is a common fault in more things than drinking, father. When Magnus Hay has struck the first blow, he is quite ready to draw his dirk and strike the last one; and Paul Snackoll, though he has made gold and to spare, will just go on making gold until death takes the balance out of his hands. There are few folks that in all things offend not."

She looked so noble standing before him, so fair and tall, her hair yellow as dawn, her eyes cool, and calm, and blue as night, her whole attitude so serene, assured, and majestic, that Peter rose uneasily, left his glass unfinished, and went away with a very confused "good-night."

In the morning, the first thing he did when he reached his office was to send for the offending sailor.

"Geordie, my Margaret says there are plenty folk as bad as thou art; so thou'll just see to the steering o' the boat, an' be ready to sail her—or upset her—i' ten days again."

"I'll keep her right side up for Margaret Sinclair's sake—tell her I said that, master."

"I see do no promising for thee, Geordie. Between working an' working is a lang road, but Kirkwall and Stromness kens thee for an honest lad, and thou wilt mind this—things promised are things due."

Insensibly this act of forbearance lightened Peter's whole day; he was good-tempered with the world, and the world returned the compliment. When night came, and he watched for Margaret on the sands, he was delighted to see that Ranald was with her. The lad had come home, and nothing was now remembered against him. That night it was Ranald told him fairy stories of great cities and universities, of miles of books and pictures, of wonderful machinery and steam engines, of delicious things to eat and drink. Peter felt as if he must start southward by the next mail-packet, but in the morning he thought more unselfishly.

"There are forty families depending on my sticking to the shop an' the boats, Ranald, an' I canna go pleasuring till there is ane to step into my shoes."

Ranald Sinclair had all the fair, stately beauty, and noble presence of his sister, but yet there was some lack about him easier to feel than to define. Perhaps no one was unconscious of this lack except Margaret; but women have a grand invention where their idols are concerned, and create readily for them every excellency that they lack. Her own two years' study in an Edinburgh boarding-school had been very superficial, and she knew it; but this wonderful Ranald could read Homer and Horace, could play, and sketch, and recite Shakspeare, and write poetry. If he could have done none of these things, if he had been dull and ugly, and content to trade in fish and wood, she would still have loved him tenderly; how much more, then, this handsome Antinous, whom she credited with all the accomplishments of Apollo!

Ranald needed all her enthusiastic support. He had left heavy college bills, and he had quite made up his mind that he would not be a minister, and that he would be a lawyer. He could scarcely have decided on two things more offensive to his father. Only for the hope of having a minister in the family had Peter submitted to his son's continual demands for money. For this end he had bought books, and paid for all kinds of teachers and tours, and sighed over the cost of Ranald's different hobbies. And now he was not only to have a grievous disappointment, but also a great offense; for Peter Sinclair shared fully in the Orcaean dislike and distrust of lawyers, and would have been deeply offended at any one requiring their aid in any business transaction with him.

His son's proposal to be a "writer" he took almost as a personal insult. He had formed his own opinion of the profession, and the opinion of any other person who would say a word in favor of a lawyer he considered of no value. Margaret had a hard task before her; that she succeeded at all was due to her womanly tact. Ranald and his father simply clashed against each other, and exchanged pointed truths which hurt worse than wounds.

At length, when the short Orcaean summer was almost over, Margaret won a hard and reluctant consent. "The lad is fit for naething better, I suppose"—and the old man turned away to shed the bitterest tears of his whole life. They shocked Margaret; she was terrified at her success, and, falling humbly at his feet, she besought him to forget and forgive her importunities, and to take back a gift baptized with such ominous tears.

But Peter Sinclair, having been compelled to take a step, was not the man to retrace it; he shook his head in a dour, hopeless way: "He couldna say 'Yes' and 'No' in a breath, an' Ranald must e'en drink as he brewed."

These struggles, so real and sorrowful to his father and sister, Ranald had no sympathy with—not that he was heartless, but that he had taught himself to believe they were the result of ignorance of the world and old-fashioned prejudices. He certainly intended to become a great man—perhaps a judge—and, when he was one of "The Lords," he had no doubt his father would respect his disobedience. He knew his father as little as he knew himself. Peter Sinclair was only Peter Sinclair's opinions incorporate; he could no more have changed them than he could have changed the color of his eyes or the shape of his nose; and the difference between a common lawyer and "a lord," in his eyes, would only have been the difference between a little oppressor and a great one.

For the first time in all her life Margaret suspected a flaw in this perfect crystal of a brother. His gay, debonair manner hurt her. Even if her father's objections were ignorant prejudices, they were positive convictions to him, and she did not like to see them smiled at, entertained by the cast of the eye, and the put-by of the turning hand. But loving women are the greatest of Philistines; knock their idol down daily, rob it of every beauty, cut off its hands and head, and they will still "set it in its place," and fall down and worship it.

Undoubtedly Margaret was one of the blindest of these characters, but the world may pause before it scorns them too bitterly. It is faith of this sublime integrity which, brought down to personal experience, believes, endures, hopes, sacrifices, and loves to the end, winning finally what never would have been given to a more prudent and reasonable devotion.

So, if Margaret had doubts, she put them arbitrarily down, and sent her brother away with manifold tokens of her love—among them, with a check on the Kirkwall Bank for sixty pounds, the whole of her personal savings. To this frugal Orcaean maid it seemed a large sum, but she hoped by the sacrifice to clear off Ranald's college debts, and thus enable him to start his new race unweighted. It was but a mouthful to each creditor, but it put them off for a time, and Ranald was not a youth inclined to take "thought" for their "to-morrow."

He had been entered for four years' study with the firm of Wilkes & Brechen, writers and conveyancers of the city of Glasgow. His father had paid the whole fee down, and placed in the Western Bank to his credit four hundred pounds for his four years' support. Whatever Ranald thought of the provision, Peter considered it a magnificent income, and it had cost him a great struggle to give up at once, and for no evident return, so much of his hard-earned gold. To Ranald he said nothing of his reluctance; he simply put the vouchers for both transactions in his hand, and asked him to "try an' spend the siller as weel as it had been earned."

But to Margaret he fretted not a little. "Fourteen hundred pounds a' thegither, dawtie," he said, in a tearful voice, "I warked early an' late through mony a year for it; an' it is gane a' at once, though I hae naught but words an' promises for it. I ken, Margaret, that I am an auld-farrant trader, but I see aye say that it is a bad well into which ane must put water."

When Ranald went the summer week, too. It became necessary to remove at once to their rock-built house in one of the narrow streets of Kirkwall. Margaret was glad of the change; her father could come into the little parlor behind the shop any time in the day and smoke his pipe beside her. He needed this consolation sorely; his son's conduct had grieved him far more deeply than he would allow, and Margaret often saw him gazing southward over the stormy Pentland Frith with a very mournful face.

But a good heart soon breaks bad fortune, and Peter had a good heart, sound, and sweet, and true, to his fellow-creatures, and full of faith in God. It is true that his creed was of the very strictest and sternest; but men are always better than their theology, and Margaret knew from the Scriptures chosen for their household worship that in the depth and stillness of his soul his human fatherhood had anchored fast to the fatherhood of God.

Orcaean winters are long and dreary, but no one need much pity the Orcaeans; they have learned how to make them the very festival of social life. And, in spite of her anxiety about Ranald, Margaret thoroughly enjoyed this one—perhaps the more because Captain Olave Thorkald spent two months of it with them in Kirkwall. There had been a long attachment between the young soldier and Margaret, and, having obtained his commission, he had come to ask also for a public recognition of their engagement.

Margaret was rarely beautiful and rarely happy, and she carried with a charming and kindly grace the full cup of her felicity. The Orcaeans love to date from a good year, and all her life afterward Margaret reckoned events from this pleasant winter.

Peter Sinclair's house, being one of the largest in Kirkwall, was a favorite gathering-place; and Peter took his full share in all the homelike, innocent amusements which beguiled the long, dreary nights. No one in Orkney or Zetland could recite Ossian with more passion and tenderness, and he enjoyed his little triumph over the youngsters who emulated him. No one could sing a Scotch song with more humor, and few of the lads and lassies could match Peter in a blithe, foursome reel, or a rattling strathspey. Some, indeed, thought that good Dr. Ogilvie had a more graceful spring and a longer breath, but Peter always insisted that his inferiority to the minister was a voluntary concession to the dominie's superior dignity. It was, however, a rivalry that always ended in a firmer grip at parting. These little festivals, in which old and young freely mingled, cultivated to perfection the best and kindest feelings of both. Age mellowed to perfect sweetness in the sunshine.

ful gayety; and youth learned from age how at once to be merry and wise.

At length June arrived again; and, though winter lingered in spates, the song of the skylark and the thrush heralded the spring. When the dream-like voice of the cuckoo should be heard once, Peter and Margaret had determined to take a long summer trip. They were to go first to Perth, where Captain Thorkald was stationed, and then to Glasgow, and see Ranald. But God had planned another journey for Peter, even one to "a land very far off." A disease, to which he had been subject at intervals for many years, suddenly assumed a fatal character, and Peter needed no one to tell him that his days were numbered.

He set his house in order, and then, going with Margaret to his summer dwelling, waited quietly. He said little on the subject, and, as long as he was able, gave himself up, with the delight of a child, to watching the few flowers in his garden; but still one solemn, waylaying thought made these few last weeks of life peculiarly hushed and sacred. Ranald had been sent for, and the old man, with the clear prescience that sometimes comes before death, divined much and foresaw much he did not care to speak about—only that in some subtle way he made Margaret perceive that Ranald was to be cared for and watched over, and that to her this charge was committed.

Before the summer was quite over, Peter Sinclair went away. In his tarrying by the eternal shore he became, as it were, purified of the body; and, one lovely night, when gloaming and dawning mingled, and the lark was thrilling the midnight skies, he heard the Master call him, and promptly answered, "Here am I." Then "Death, with sweet enlargement, did dismiss him hence."

He had been thought a rich man in Orkney, and, therefore, Ranald—who had become accustomed to a Glasgow standard of wealth—was much disappointed. His whole estate was not worth over six thousand pounds; about two thousand pounds of this was in gold, the rest was invested in his houses in Kirkwall, and in a little cottage in Stromness, where Peter's wife had been born. He gave to Ranald eighteen hundred pounds, and to Margaret two hundred pounds and the life-rent of the real property. Ranald had already received fourteen hundred pounds, and, therefore, had no cause of complaint, but somehow he felt as if he had been wronged. He was older than his sister, and son of the house, and use and custom were not in favor of recognizing daughters as having equal rights. But he kept such thoughts to himself, and when he went back to Glasgow took with him solid proofs of his sister's devotion.

It was necessary now for Margaret to make a great change in her life. She determined to remove to Stromness and occupy the little, four-roomed cottage that had been her mother's. It stood close to that of Geordie Twatt, and she felt that in any emergency she was sure of one faithful friend. "A lone woman" in Margaret's position has in these days numberless objects of interest of which Margaret never dreamed. She would have thought it a kind of impiety to advise her minister, or meddle in church affairs. These simple parents attended themselves to the spiritual training of their children—there was no necessity for Sunday-schools, and they did not exist. She was not one of those women whom their friends call "beings," and who have deep and mysterious feelings that interpret themselves in poems and thrilling stories. She had no taste for philosophy, or history, or social science, and had been taught to regard novels as dangerously sinful books.

But no one need imagine that she was either wretched or idle. In the first place, she took life much more calmly and slowly than we do; a very little pleasure or employment went a long way. She read her Bible, and helped her old servant, Helga, to keep the house in order. She had her flowers to care for, and her brother and lover to write to. She looked after Geordie Twatt's little motherless lads, went to church, and to see her friends, and very often had her friends to see her.

It happened to be a very stormy winter, and the mails were often delayed for weeks together. This was her only trouble. Ranald's letters were more and more unsatisfactory; he was evidently unhappy and dissatisfied, and heartily tired of his new study. Poets were so irregular that often their letters seemed to be playing at cross-purposes. She determined as soon as spring opened to go and have a straightforward talk with him.

So the following June Geordie Twatt took her in his boat to Thurso, where Captain Thorkald was waiting for her. They had not met since Peter Sinclair's death, and that event had materially affected their prospects. Before it their marriage had been a possible joy in some far future, now there was no greater claim on her care and love than the Captain's, and he urged their early marriage.

Margaret had her two hundred pounds with her, and she promised to buy her "plenishing" during her visit to Glasgow. In those days the girls made their own trousseaux, sewing into every garment solemn and tender hopes and joys. Margaret thought that proper attention to this dear stitching, as well as proper respect for her father's memory, asked of her yet at least another year's delay, and for the present Captain Thorkald thought it best not to urge her further.

Ranald received his sister very joyfully. He had provided lodgings for her with her father's old correspondent, Robert Gorie, a tea merchant in the Cowcaddens. The Cowcaddens was then a very respectable street, and Margaret was quite pleased with her quarters. She was not pleased with Ranald, however. He avowed himself thoroughly disgusted with the law, and declared his intention of forfeiting his fee, and joining his friend, Walter Cashell, in a manufacturing scheme.

Margaret could feel that he was all wrong, but she could not reason about a business of which she knew nothing, and Ranald took his own way. But changing and bettering are two different things, and, though he was always talking of his "good luck" and his "good bargains," Margaret was very uneasy. Perhaps Robert Gorie was partly to blame for this; his pawky face and shrewd little eyes made visible discontents to all such boasts, nor did he scruple to say: "Gaid luck needs guid elbowing, Ranald, an' it is at the guid bargains I aye pause an' ponder."

The following winter was a restless, unhappy one; Ranald was either painfully elated or very dull, and soon after the year Walter Cashell fell into bad health, went to the West Indies, and left Ranald with the whole business to manage. He soon now began to come to his sister not only on advice but for money. Margaret believed at first that she was only supplying Walter's sudden loss, but when her cash was all gone, and Ranald urged her to mortgage her rents, she resolutely shut her ears to all his plausible promises, and refused to "throw more good money after bad."

It was the first ill-blood between them, and it hurt Margaret sorely. She was glad when the fine weather came, and she could escape to her island-home, for Ranald was cool to her, and said cruel things of Captain Thorkald, for whose sake, he declared, his sister had refused to help him.

One day, at the end of the following August, when most of the towns-people—men and women—had gone to the moss to cut the winter's peat, she saw Geordie Twatt coming toward the house. Something about his appearance troubled her, and she went to the open door and stood waiting for him.

"What is it, Geordie?"

"I am bidden to tell thee, Margaret Sinclair, to be at the Stanes o' Stennis to-night at eleven o'clock."

"Who trysts me there, Geordie, at such an hour?"

"Thy brother; but thou'lt come—yes, thou wilt."

Margaret's very lips turned white as she answered:

"I'll be there—see thou art, too."

"Sure as death! If nobody speirs after me, thou needna say I was here at a', thou needna."

Margaret understood the caution, and nodded her head. She could not speak, and all day long she wandered about like a soul in a restless dream. Fortunately, every one was weary at night, and went early to rest, and she found little difficulty in getting outside the town without notice; and one of the ponies on the common took her speedily across the moor.

Late as it was, twilight still lingered over the silent moor, with its old Pictish mounds and burial-places, giving them an indescribable aspect of something weird and eerie. No one could have been insensible to the mournful, brooding light and the unearthly stillness, and Margaret was trembling with a supernatural terror as she stood amid the solemn circle of gray stones, and looked over the lake of Stennis and the low, brown hills of Harray.

From behind one of these gigantic pillars Ranald came toward her—Ranald, and yet not Ranald. He was dressed as a common sailor, and otherwise shamefully disguised. There was no time to soften things—he told his miserable story in a few plain words: "His business had become so entangled that he knew not which way to turn, and, sick of the whole affair, he had taken a passage for Australia, and then forged a note on the Western Bank for nine hundred pounds. He had hoped to be far at sea with his ill-gotten money before the fraud was discovered, but suspicion had gathered around him so quickly, that he had not even dared to claim his passage. Then he fled north, and, fortunately, discovering Geordie's boat at Wick, had easily prevailed on him to put off at once with him."

What cowards sin makes of us! Margaret had seen this very bad face death often, among the sunken rocks and cruel surfs, that he might save the life of a shipwrecked sailor; and now, rather than meet the creditors whom he had wronged, he had committed a robbery and was flying from the gallows.

She was shocked and stunned, and stood speechless, wringing her hands and moaning pitifully. Her brother grew impatient. Often the first result of a bitter sense of sin is to make the sinner peevish and irritable.

"Margaret," he said, almost angrily, "I came to bid you farewell, and to promise you, 'by my father's name,' to retrieve all this wrong. If you can speak a kind word, speak it, for God's sake—if not, I must go without it!"

Then she fell upon his neck, and, amid sobs and kisses, said all that love so sorely and suddenly tried could say. He could not even soothe her anguish by any promise to write, but he did promise to come back to her sooner or later with restitution in his hand.

All she could do now for this dear brother was to call Geordie to her side, and put him in his care; taking what consolation she could from his assurance that "he would keep him out at sea until the search was cold, and if followed carry him into some of the dangerous 'races' between the islands." If any sailor could keep his boat above water in them, she knew Geordie could; and if not—she durst follow that thought no further, but, putting her hands before her face, stood praying, while the two men pulled silently away in the little skiff that had brought them up the outlet connecting the lake of Stennis with the sea.

Margaret would have turned away from Ranald's open grave less heart-broken. It was midnight now, but her real terror absorbed all imaginary ones; she did not even call a pony, but with swift, even steps walked back to Stromness. Ere she had reached it, she had decided what was to be done, and next day she left Kirkwall in the mail-packet for the mainland. Thence by night and day she traveled to Glasgow, and a week after her interview with Ranald she was standing before the directors of the defrauded bank and offering them the entire proceeds of her Kirkwall property, until the debt was paid.

The bank had thoroughly respected Peter Sinclair, and his daughter's earnest, decided offer won their ready sympathy. It was accepted without any question of interest, though she could not hope to clear off the obligation in less than nine years. She did not go near any of her old acquaintance, she had no heart to bear their questions and condolences, and she had no money to stay in Glasgow at charges. Winter was coming on rapidly; but, before it broke over the lonely islands, she had reached her cottage in Stromness again.

There had been, of course, much talk concerning her hasty journey, but no one had suspected its cause. Indeed, the pursuit after Ranald had been entirely the bank's affair, had been committed to private detectives, and had not been nearly so hot as the frightened criminal believed. His failure and flight had been noticed in the Glasgow newspapers, but this information did not reach Kirkwall until the following spring, and then in a very indefinite form.

About a week after her return, Geordie Twatt came into port. Margaret frequently went to his cottage with food or clothing for the children, and she contrived to meet him there.

"You lad is a' right, indeed is he," he said, with an assumption of indifference.

"O Geordie! where?"

"A ship going westward took him off the boat."

"Thank God! You'll say naught at all, Geordie?"

"I ken naught at a', save that his father's son was i' trouble, an' trying to gie thae weary, unchancy lawyers the go-by. I was fain eneuch mesel' to baulk them."

But Margaret's real trials were all yet to come. The mere fact of doing a noble deed does not absolve one often from very mean and petty consequences. Before the winter was half over she had found out how rapid is the descent from good report.

The neighbors were deeply offended at her for giving up the social tea-parties and evening-gatherings that had made the house of Sinclair popular for more than one generation. She gave still greater offense by becoming a working-woman, and spending her days in braiding straw into the (once) famous Orkney Tuscans, and her long evenings in the manufacture of those delicate knitted goods peculiar to the country.

It was not alone that they grudged her the money for these labors, as so much out of their own pockets—they grudged her also the time; for they had been long accustomed to rely on Margaret Sinclair for their children's garments, for nursing their sick, and for help in weddings, funerals, and all the other extraordinary occasions of sympathy among a primitively social people.

Little by little all winter the sentiment of disapproval and dislike gathered. Some one soon found out that Margaret's tenants "just sent every babbee o' the rent-siller to the Glasgow Bank;" and this was a double offense, as it implied a distrust of her own townsmen and institutions. If from her humble earnings she made a little gift to any common object, its small amount was a fresh source of anger and contempt; for none knew how much she had to deny herself even for such curtailed gratuities.

In fact, Margaret Sinclair's sudden stinginess and indifference to her townsmen was the common wonder and talk of every little gathering. Old friends began to either pointedly reprove her, or pointedly ignore her; and at last even old Helga took the popular tone, and said "Margaret Sinclair had got too scrimping for an auld wife like her to bide wi' langer."

Through all this Margaret suffered keenly. At first she tried earnestly to make her old friends understand that she had good reasons for her conduct; but, as she would not explain these good reasons, she failed in her endeavor. She had imagined that her good conscience would support her, and that she could live very well without love and sympathy; she soon found out that it is a kind of negative punishment worse than many stripes.

At the end of the winter Captain Thorkald again earnestly pressed their marriage, saying that "his regiment was ordered to Chelsea, and any longer delay might be a final one." He proposed, also, that his father, the Udaller Thorkald of Serwick, should have charge of her Orkney property, as he understood its value and changes. Margaret wrote and frankly told him that her property was not hers for at least seven years, but that it was under good care, and he must accept her word without explanation. Out of this only grew a very unsatisfactory correspondence. Captain Thorkald went south without Margaret, and a very decided coolness separated them farther than any number of miles.

Udaller Thorkald was exceedingly angry, and his remarks about Margaret Sinclair's refusal "to trust her bit property in as guid hands as her own" increased very much the bitter feeling against the poor girl. At the end of three years the trial became too great for her; she began to think of running away from it.

Throughout these dark days she had purposely and pointedly kept apart from her old friend Dr. Ogilvie, for she feared his influence over her might tempt her to confidence. Latterly the doctor had humored her evident desire, but he had never ceased to watch over and, in a great measure, to believe in her; and, when he heard of this determination to quit Orkney forever, he came to Stromness with a resolution to spare no efforts to win her confidence.

He spoke very solemnly and tenderly to her, reminded her of her father's generosity and good gifts to the church and the poor, and said: "O Margaret, dear lass! what good at a' will thy silent money do thee in that Day? It ought to speak for thee out o' the mouths o' the sorrowful an' the needy, the widows an' the fatherless—indeed, it ought. And thou hast gien naught for thy Master's sake these three years! I'm fair shamed to think thou bears sae kind a name as thy father's."

What could Margaret do? She broke into passionate sobbing, and, when the good old man left the cottage an hour afterward, there was a strange light on his face, and he walked and looked as if he had come from some interview that had set him for a little space still nearer to the angels. Margaret had now one true friend; and, in a few days after this, she rented her cottage and went to live with the dominie. Nothing could have so effectually reinstated her in public opinion; wherever the dominie went on a message of help or kindness Margaret went with him. She fell gradually into a quieter but still more affectionate regard—the aged, the sick, and the little children clung to her hands, and she was comforted.

Her life seemed indeed to have wonderfully narrowed; but, when the tide is fairly out, it begins to turn again. In the fifth year of her poverty there was, from various causes, such an increase in the value of real estate, that her rents were nearly doubled; and by the end of the seventh year she had paid the last shilling of her assumed debt, and was again an independent woman.

It might be two years after this that she one day received a letter that filled her with joy and amazement. It contained a check for her whole nine hundred pounds back again. "The bank had just received from Ranald Sinclair, of San Francisco, the whole amount due it, with the most satisfactory acknowledgment and interest. It was a few minutes before Margaret could take in all the joy this news promised her; but when she did, the calm, well-regulated girl had never been so near committing extravagances.

She ran wildly up-stairs to the dominie, and, throwing herself at his knees, cried out, amid tears and smiles: "Father, father! Here is your money! Here is the poor's money and the church's money! God has sent it back to me!—sent it back with such glad tidings!"—and surely, if angels rejoice with repenting sinners, they must have felt that day a far deeper joy with the happy, justified girl.

She knew now that she also would soon hear from Ranald, and she was not disappointed. The very next day the dominie brought home the letter. Margaret took it up stairs to read it upon her knees, while the good old man walked softly up and down his study praying for her. Presently she came to him with a radiant face.

"Is it weel wi' the lad, ma dawtie?"

"Yes, father; it is very well." Then she read him the letter.

Ranald had been in New Orleans and had the fever; he had been in Texas, and spent four years in fighting Indians and Mexicans and in herding cattle. He had suffered many things, but had worked night and day, and always managed to grow a little richer every year. Then, suddenly, the word "California!" rung through the world, and he caught the echo even on the lonely Southwestern prairies. Through incredible hardships he had made his way thither, and a sudden and wonderful fortune had crowned his labors, first in mining, and afterward in speculation and merchandising. He said that he was indeed afraid to tell her how rich he was lest to her Orcadean views the sum might appear incredible.

Margaret let the letter fall on her lap and clasped her hands above it. Her face was beautiful. If the prodigal son had a sister she must have looked just as Margaret looked when they brought in her lost brother, in the best robe and the gold ring.

The dominie was not so satisfied. A good many things in the letter displeased him, but he kissed Margaret tenderly and went away from her. "It is a' I did this, an' I did that, an' I suffered you; there is nae word o' God's help, or o' what ither folk had to thole. I'll no be doing ma duty if I dinna set his sin afore his e'en."

The old man was little used to writing, and the effort was a great one, but he bravely made it, and without delay. In a few curt, idiomatic sentences, he told Ranald Margaret's story of suffering and wrong and poverty; her hard work for daily bread; her loss of friends, of her good name, and her lover, adding: "It is a poor success, ma lad, that ye dinna acknowledge God in; an', let me tell thee, thy restitution is o'er late for thy credit. I wad hae thought better o' it had thou made it when it took the last plack i' thy pouch. Out o' thy great wealth, a few hun'ed pounds is nae matter to speak about."

But people did speak of it. In spite of our chronic abuse of human nature, it is, after all, a kindly nature, and rejoices in good more than in evil. The story of Ranald's restitution it considered honorable to it, and it was much made of in the daily papers. Margaret's friends flocked round her again, saying, "I'm sorry, Margaret!" as simply and honestly as little children, and the dominie did not fail to give them the lecture on charity that Margaret neglected.

Whether the Udaller Thorkald wrote to his son anent these transactions, or whether the captain read in the papers enough to satisfy him, he never explained; but one day he suddenly appeared at Dr. Ogilvie's, and asked for Margaret. He had probably good excuses for his conduct to offer; if not, Margaret was quite ready to invent for him—as she had done for Ranald—all the noble qualities he lacked. The captain was tired of military life, and anxious to return to Orkney; and, as his own and Margaret's property was yearly increasing in value, he foresaw profitable employment for his talents. He had plans for introducing many southern improvements—for building a fine modern house, growing some of the harder fruits, and for the construction of a grand conservatory for Margaret's flowers.

It must be allowed that Captain Thorkald was a very ordinary lord for a woman like Margaret Sinclair to "love, honor, and obey;" but few men would have been worthy of her, and the usual rule, which shows us the noblest women marrying men manifestly their inferiors, is doubtless a wise one.

While these things were occurring Ranald got Margaret's letter. It was full of love and praise, and had no word of blame or complaint in it. He noticed, indeed, that she still signed her name "Sinclair," and that she never alluded to Captain Thorkald, and the supposition that the stain on his character had caused a rupture did for a moment force itself upon his notice; but he put it instantly away with the reflection that "Thorkald was but a poor fellow, after all, and quite unworthy of his sister."

The very next mail-day he received the dominie's letter. He read it once, and could hardly take it in; read it again and again, until his lips blanched, and his whole countenance changed. In that moment he saw Ranald Sinclair for the first time in his life. Without a word he left his business, went to his house, and locked himself in his own room.

Then Margaret's silent money began to speak. In low up-braidings it showed him the lonely girl in that desolate land trying to make her own bread, deserted of lover and friends, robbed of her property and good name, silently suffering every extremity, never reproaching him once, not even thinking it necessary to tell him of her sufferings, or to count their cost unto him.

What is this bitterness which we call remorse? This agony of the soul in all its senses? This sudden flood of intolerable light in the dark places of our hearts? This truth-telling voice which leaves us without a particle of our self-complacency? For many days Ranald could find no words to speak but these: "O wretched man that I am!"

But at length the Comforter came as swiftly, and surely, and mysteriously, as the accuser had come, and once more the miracle of grace was renewed—"that day Jesus was guest in the house of one who was a sinner."

Margaret's "silent money" now found a thousand tongues. It spoke in many a little feeble church that Ranald Sinclair held in his arms until it was strong to stand alone. It spoke in schools, and colleges, and hospitals, in many a sorrowful home, and to many a lonely, struggling heart—and at this very day it has echoes that reach from the far West to the lonely islands lying beyond the stormy Pentland Firth, and the sea-shattering precipices of Duncansby Head.

It is not improbable some of my readers may take a summer's trip to the Orkney Islands: let me ask them to wait at Thurso—the old town of Thor—for a handsome little steamer that leaves there three times a week for Kirkwall. It is the sole property of Captain Geordie Twatt, was a gift from an old friend in California, and is called the Margaret Sinclair.—Amelia E. Barr, in Appleton.

LA ALISAL.

Sweetly now the river calls,
Sweet and low,
In its happy flow
Round the feet of mossy walls,
Under bending larches,
And by willow arches,
Sweet and low;
Leaving ripples, as it passes,
Murmurs in its tangled grasses
That grow tall and quiver
By the pulsing river,
Sweet and low, sweet and low.

Slowly, slowly slipping down,
Past the mountains broad and brown,
Past the island shallows,
Past the meadows and the fallows,
Singing slowly,
Keeping lowly
Fulse, and sway, and accord wholly
With the grasses and the trees,
And the maple's drooping keys
That just touch the edges
Of entangled sedges,
Sweet and low, sweet and low.

Ah! if we could follow
Back o'er ridge and hollow,
And our river trace
To the rocky place
Where from out the mountain's heart it slid,
We should find, I venture surely,
Should discover, if we did,
That at first it, flowing purely,
Came from haunts of fay and fairy,
To bright valleys keen and airy,
And crept on, by gorge and glen,
To the homes and hearts of men,
Sweet and low, sweet and low.

NILES, October 23, 1878.

CHARLES H. SHINN.

Reverie.

I bear your wedding-bells ring golden clear
This mellow morn,
Across the red October woods, and sere
Crisp fields of corn;
The bells to which your strange new life is set
Apart from mine I bear with vain regret,
And desultory thoughts of other days,
Dreamlike and dim with warm October haze,
Forever gone.

I listen as the notes come floating through
The hollow air;
My fancy paints you—o'er as erst I knew—
Yet wondrous fair—
A radiant vision, snowy-robed, serene,
With downcast lids and proud unconscious mien,
With eyes wherein all heaven lies confided,
And golden glory round your head entwined
In rippled hair.

I bridge the time from this to other days
With swift-winged thought,
And find you not less fair because the praise
Of first love wrought
Within our hearts to find each other fair;
Now I am here and you are there—
So far apart unfathomed seas might beat
From shore to shore, unheeded at our feet,
As we were naught.

"First love is sweetest," I have heard you say
In other days;
I wonder if you would the proof betray
Were I to gaze
Upon your face to-day. It is not wise
To wake dead pains. If other loves arise,
Lock up the secret chambers of your heart
And hide some tender memories apart
From common ways.

Aid not the less I wish you happy hours
Because we two
Have gathered melrose from late-opened flowers
When love was new;
I would not lift my hand to beckon back
One gold-bound autumn day, nor stall I lack
The inner heart of life through loving you,
Whom fate made charming, but inconstant, too:
And so—adieu.

NORTH COLUMBIA, Oct. 28, 1878.

MAY N. HAWLEY.

"Saint or Sinner?"

[Translated from the Provençal of Frederic Mistral by Harriet W. Preston.]

Once, in the wild woods of the Luberon,
A shepherd kept his flock. His days were long;
But when at last the same were well nigh spent,
And toward the grave his iron frame was bent,
He sought the hermit of Saint Onqueri
To make his last confession piously.

Alone, in the Vaumasco valley lost,
His foot had never sacred threshold crossed
Since he partook his first communion.
Eve's prayers were from his memory gone.
But now he rose and left his cottage lowly,
And came and bowed before the hermit holy.

"With what sin chargest thou myself, my brother?"
The solitary said. Replied the other,
The aged man: "Once, long ago, I slew
A little bird about my flock that flew;
A cruel stone I flung its life to end—
It was a wag-tail, and the shepherds' friend."

"Is this a simple soul," the hermit thought,
"Or is it an impostor?" And he sought
Curiously to read the old man's face.
Until, to solve the riddle, "Go," he says,
"And hang thy shepherd's cloak yon beam upon.
And afterward I will absolve my son."

A single sunbeam through the chapel strayed;
And there it was the priest the suppliant bade
To hang his cloak! But the good soul arose,
And drew it off with mien of all repose,
And threw it upward. And it hung in sight,
Suspended on the slender shaft of light.

Then fell the hermit prostrate on the floor.
"O man of God," he cried, and he wept sore,
"Let but the blessed haud these tears bedew
Fulfill the sacred office for us two!
No sins of thine can I absolve; 'tis clear
Thou art the saint and I the sinner here."

FABLES AND ANECDOTES.

By Little Johnny.

Fable of the Hen whose Callow Brood were Fond of Chicken.
—The Provident Hawk that Took Thought of the Morrow.—More of the Famous Wooden Leg of Mr. Jonnice.—Madame Doppy's Head also again Illuminates these Columns.—Stories of the Anthropophagi, very Delightful in Flavor, with much other Matter of Shining Merit and Incalculable Value.

There was a ole hen wich was a settin, and there was a boy, but the boy wassent a settin, as boys dont set, but Billy, thats my brother, he can cro like roosters. The boy he took a way the ole hens eggs for to suckem. But wen they was all sucked, every last one up, he kanew, the boy did, his mother wude say: "Wots come of them eggs, you notty little feller?" So the boy he put sum owls eggs under the ole hen, wich he had found, and wich aint good for suckin. And the ole hen hatched them out, and was reel proud of her chicks, jest like my mother with Franky, thats the baby, but Mary, thats the hired girl, she likes the butchers boy wich fetches the meat. You never see sech lukin chickens as them little owls was, eys like cats eys.

One day the ole rooster he sed to the ole hen: "Did you ever take notis wot peulier lukin chicks them is of yourn?" The ole hen she side, and then she sed: "Yes, they look so sollum out of their eys, Ime fraid thay aint long for this werld, pore darlins!"

The ole rooster he shuke his hed and went a way, but one day he cum back to the ole hen a other time, and he sed: "Them dam chickens of yourn, wich aint long for this werld, is playn the ole Nick wile thay sta. Thay jest now piled onto the yellor leg pullit and give her fits, yes, in deed, the pore darlins et her up in a minnit!"

The ole hen she thot a wile and then she sed: "I reck-leck now that one nite, jest fore the eggs was laid for them chicks, I got offly fritend by a dredfle ole he owl. I gess it affected their dispostions."

But Uncle Ned he says a other ole hen she spoke up and said: "Its my pinion that you wasent so much a fraid of that ole he owl as you wude like for to have fokes think you was."

One day there was a feller wich was a plantin tatoes, and he seen a hok a settin onto a nest, and there was lots of hen fethers round there, like a piller had busted. The hock it flew a way and set onto a fence, and the feller he see that the nest was a hens nest, with lots of eggs, and the feller he was a stonish! He loked at the eggs, and then he loked at the hok, and then he sed: "Ile be blode if this isent the biggest hatchin bee which was ever held! Yude make a nice mother to a brude of yung chickens, wudent you?"

But the hok it tost its hed up and sed: "Wel, wot kind of a mother be you for a feed of tatoes?"

The feller he was sprisder than ever, and he said: "Wy, you iddiot, Ime a plantin these tatoes for to eat em!"

And the halk it sed: "Wel, do you spose Ime a hatchn thees chickens for to let em eat me?"

One time me an Billy we seen one lite on the pump, and I run and got my wuden saword, and soon as it had flied you jest ot to seem me be a briggy dear gennel of mlishy! But Mister Jonnice he has got a wuden leg.

Mister Jonnice stade to our house ol nigt, and wen he went to bed he hung his wuden leg on the kanob of the dore out side, purpos to have some fun with Mary, thats the hired girl, an his wuden leg looks jess like a meat leg, ony witer. In the mornin Mary she see it, but she wasent a bit a fraid, she jest went and waked my mother up an said: "O, if you pleas, mam, I gess the gent wich slep in the spare room cant git his dore opn, cos he is a comin out thru the ke hole."

One day wen Mister Jonnice was to my sisters new house, and I was there too, and Missis Doppy was there, wich has got the red hed, you never seen sech a red wun, wen Missis Doppy had went home Mister Jonnice he said: "If I was that woomins husban Ide use her bed for a parler fire."

Then Missy, thats my sister, she spoke up an sed: "I spose, Mister Jonnice, you wude use yure leg for a back log."

A other time, wen Missis Doppy, wich has got the red hed, was to our hous, she had went an laid her bunnet onto the flore, and I stept in it. Wile I was a bein scolded, and was a cryin, Uncle Ned he come in, and wen he lernt how it was he loked mity cros, and he sed, Uncle Ned sed: "Johnny, is it posble that you hav lived of this time under the in struction of a man wich has ben in Injy and evry where, and you dont know eny better than to wock rite in to the fire place?"

Then my father he busted out a lafn, but my mother she sed: "Wy, Edard!"

After a wile Missis Doppy was in my mothers bed room cobming her hair, and Uncle Ned he past the dore, and wen he come down he sed to my father: "I gess she is firin up to be off. I seen her rakin out the cinders."

Mister Pichel, thats the preacher, he sez its whicked for to poke fun, cos fokes miss fortins is for sum wise purpos, and Uncle Ned he sez Missis Dopys hed is a shinin xample.

But wot for was Mister Brily the butcher give sech a big belly is wot flores me! Jack Brily, the sailer, wich is his boy, he says it use to be bigger than tis now, but one day Mr. Briley was cuttin off some meat for Mister Gipple, and was tockn polittix same time, and he was xcited, and he didnt look where he was a takin it from, cos his belly was a lyn on the block, did you ever hear sech a wopper?

Jack he says one time wen on the sand wich is islands he see 2 cannibes meet, and one cannible sed to the other, how did he do, and the other cannible he said: "O Ime jest bully—fit for to set before a king!"

A other time Jack he was a ship reck, and him and the capten was the only ones wich was safed, and thay was on a rock were thay cudent git nothing for to eat. So thay drot fots to se wich shude be et, and the capten he lost, and jest as Jack was goin to butcher him reel nice the capten sed: "Wel, my man, you didnt think you an me wude ever be mess mates did you?"

And Jack he sed: "No, sir, and I wude slikt mysef up more ship shape if I had knew me and yure honor was to come to gether at the same table."

But suckn pigs is the dandys for me!

SAN RAFAEL, October 29th.

The navigation of schooners of beer to the placid haven of my sky-parlor while writing as special correspondent from Paris for the Chronicle has been forbidden by my landlady. My Ganymede of the dattened nose received the direful warning at the very portals: "Who enters here leaves beer behind." As this frothy element was a necessary element of such imaginative composition, I fear, owing to its privation, that foreign correspondence will suffer in the hereafter.

"Now folds the lily all her sweetness up,
And drops into the bosom of the lake."

The woman who would raise her hand to grasp a schooner of beer save in the way of conveying it to a soul athirst is a wretch, to whom it were base flattery to pay the month's rent in advance. My standing in Grub Street was imperiled. The élite of our block were beginning to give me the cold shoulder. Distant bows and faint recognitions portended a future heritage of cuts and oblivion. Ganymede eyed me questioningly at the corner. His look reminded me of Captain Cuttles when he hails Jack Bunsby as the latter is led by the inexorable MacStinger to the altar: "Shipmet, what cheer?" and mine was the responsive look of Bunsby when he signals back: "Damn bad." At last, in my extremity, I gave my Ganymede a douceur, and asked him artlessly: "Could any one suppose for one instant these schooners of beer were for my landlady?" The young scapegrace, I have learned since, has actually had the audacity to circulate everywhere that all the schooners that came into this port were consigned to her special consumption. Desirous, above all things, of moving among the native aristocracy, I have sacrificed the fond yearnings of nature to the exigencies of society. The dispersal of these strange craft has appeased the Junonian wrath of my landlady, and the fair matrons of our block open their doors to me once more. When I first came into this hallowed precinct I feared that my attempts to obtain an entrée to its choicest reunions would meet with a chilling discomfiture. I had heard that in Boston society a certain amount of literary taste and culture is a prerequisite for an entrance thereto; that the Otises, the Barclays, the Shaws, the Winthropes, the Lawrences, the Appletons, and the Danas are among its leading guides. In New York the Livingstones, the Hamiltons, the Leroyes, and the descendants of that valiant army of old Peter Stuyvesant (recorded in Washington Irving's chronicle, whose muster roll commences with the Van Pelts, the Van Rippers, and the Van Dams) are principally those who form the apex of its society. In Philadelphia the Cadwalladers, the Pattersons, the Binneys, the Wisters, the Newhalls, and others, form a society, whose marked characteristic is its exclusiveness. But the problem was, what was the great characteristic distinction of Grub Street society? I found, happily, in Grub Street that literary and æsthetic tastes are not regarded as a passport of admission to its first circles. That was lucky for me. I could "glide in the mazy and pledge myself in the rosy," as Mr. Richard Swiveller says, without showing my ignorance of evolution or transcendentalism. The Knickerbockers don't lord it here in God's own country. There is no rigid exclusiveness, and no silly notions about ancestry, good blood, or the bar-sinister in our street, thank gracious! At one of these charming soirées in our block, I had the honor of being introduced to one of the pillars of its society. I allude to that genial old soul, Ramsbottom, who, after living happily for nineteen years with the stout, portly lady I saw at his side, magnanimously married her three years ago, thus coming bravely to the rescue of those half dozen waifs, his offspring. In his own construction of their sense he may congratulate himself in the words of Bacon, "that neither the births nor the miscarriages of time are entered in our records." It would be only a morbid feeling now that would cause Cytherea, his eldest daughter, aged eighteen, to blush for her parentage, and, I am happy to say, she does nothing of the sort. Mrs. Ramsbottom is very austere and reserved in her manner; she is rigidly devotional, and unfailingly attends morning and evening service at Saint Pancras, whose gifted pastor has been irreverently compared to an Eastern juggler who keeps three balls in the air at once, such, they allege, is the dexterity with which he flings his arms in different directions. They have also the presumption to add that his gestures have no more relevancy to his figures of speech than the arms of the windmills to the invisible foes of Don Quixote. Mrs. Ramsbottom has unbent herself a little to the occupant of the sky-parlor, not for any merit of his own, but because Mrs. Q. Z. whose ancestry in one connected link with no bar sinister is found in Burke honors him with her acquaintance, and whom, as Sir Richard Steele said of another charming lady,

"To know is a liberal education."

Let me here make a valuable suggestion to some young gents whom I have met among our cité. In order that their hands may become accustomed to the feeling of kid gloves, let them put on an old pair every night on retiring, and sleep in them for a month. I know hands and feet are a great nuisance to young gents at parties; but, unfortunately, they can not leave them at home in their dressing-rooms. While making this delicate insinuation about kid gloves, I can not, on the other hand, sufficiently express my admiration for the bonifier and perfect self-possession (which stamps a gentleman) which induces him to take his coat-tails in each hand and spread them like a pretty fan while executing the pas seul. The lavish and generous application of powder by many fair young damsels of our block to one feature alone, and that the most prominent one of their dear faces, produces a deliciously startling and bewildering effect which I have not noticed in other cities. I admire their fine gushing manner, also; it is so exquisitely négligé and unconventional, and so perfectly natural. I have learned a few items regarding the latest movements of the MacDooligans in Paris. Bernard is wearing a single eye-glass in his left eye, and is assiduously cultivating long side whiskers. He says the frequent cry of oh, divvy! eau de vie at Mabilie reminds him of his early childhood, when he emerged from the candy store with a stick, and was surrounded by hungry youngsters of his own age. He has bought a quantity of handsomely mounted whips of all kinds and sizes, on the platings of which are being engraved legends of the following character: "Presented to Major Bernard Mac Dooligan by H. R. H. the Prince of Wales," another by the Comte de Joinville, Duc de Chartres, H. R. H. the Duke of Edinburgh, etc. Bernard's title of major is what the lively Gaul would call a bric-à-brac d'invention. An English lord, who resides on the Continent since a late transaction at Newmarket, with the live-discount now divides the attention of the fair Margaret. She is taking singing lessons, to prepare herself for future concerts. Her progress is not rapid. Her voice can not reach a sharp yet, but only thus far strikes U flat. The occupant of the sky-parlor begs to assure her that her maidenly dignity, and the innate modesty of her sex, run no risk in singing in public here. To use a society phrase, nous avons changé tout cela, and it is quite comme il faut. A mysterious whisper has reached Mamma Mac Dooligan that her bosom's lord has installed a very pretty young housekeeper at the palatial mansion on Nob Hill, and who rides with Mac to the Cliff. The spectre injuria forme (Anglice: this insult to the charms of a Mac Shinnegan) is too much for the fair descendant of Irish kings. She has written a letter to Mac breathing of revenge, and in which she vows never to return until the huzzy is sent away. In the meantime, being a good Episcopalian, though of ritualistic tendencies, she desires, by way of doing penance for Mac's present fall from grace, to make a pilgrimage to Rome and kiss the Pope's toe. A delightful abbé to whom she has made confession says it is the only thing left now to regain the faithless Mac. I have been asked if I have seen Penny-lope. Can she be any relation to Mee-rope? I don't want to betray my ignorance of the classics. I have heard all sorts of criticisms about Penny-lope. Can she be the spouse of Ulysses who is scanned in such an irreverent manner? M.

The following incident of social life in San Francisco has never before, we believe, been told in print: The party were English—very swell; they were dukes and lords, and members of Parliament, men of unbounded wealth, the very nobles of Albion. The gentlemen wore round hats with white linen bands, as though in India. Their clothes were checkered tweeds, their coats were short below the waist, their pantaloons small in the legs; they wore eye-glasses and hob-nailed shoes, and the women wore dresses like dairy maids out on a walking expedition, and they all had umbrellas; but they were all duchesses, ladies, and right honorables, and all were a little freckled, a little red in the face, a little coarse in manner; wore number nine brogans and number ten buckskin gannetts, in fact the very crème de la crème of England's best society. They were entertained at Belmont, sent down by special train, driven through San Mateo four in hand; dined, wine, fléed, flattered by the gentlemen of the country. After the return of the party from the Geysers, Tahoe, Yosemite, and the Big Trees, a ceremonial dinner was given them by one of our Nob-hillity—cards issued. At the given hour the guests began to come. Our American gentlemen in dinner costume, claw hammer, kid gloves, and white neck-tie; the ladies in richest of dinner toilets, blazing in diamonds. The English party came in, having walked up the hill, because they preferred "to walk you know," dressed in checkered tweeds, short coats, pantaloons small in the legs, colored shirts, blue neck-ties, hob-nailed shoes, walking dresses and umbrellas. As the introductions were being made the American guests exchanged glances, and then one lady, then another, then gentlemen one after another, quietly withdrew. The gentleman of the house at the conventional hour led his guests to the dining room, seated them, and then begged to be excused by reason of a very pressing and sudden engagement, and enjoining his servants to entertain his guests right royally, himself withdrew. The English party found itself seated at a sumptuous board, adorned with every thing that wealth and taste could provide. Servants in white waistcoats, ties, and gloves, assiduously serving the soup. English audacity and insolence found itself checkmated. The incivility of business suits and dirty traveling dresses had been appreciated and resented by the American barbarians, and the John Bull party had been left to feed. One of the younger gentlemen of the party having placed his eye-glass beneath his corrugated brow, in that stammering utterance so peculiarly indicative of the polished manners of the higher English class, inquired if they did not think "this was a beastly Yankee trick?" Is this a restaurant where they give a fellow free soup? All parties agreed that they were never served in such a "nasty" way in all their lives. The position was embarrassing, and the party struggled between the indignity of their treatment and the appetizing allurements of dinner and wine; when one of the ladies of the party, the youngest and fairest, said: "I enjoy this. We have been justly served. Our American friends, who have been so generous and so hospitable, who have entertained us everywhere, broke down under this final insult, of our responding to a dinner invitation in the costume of shop-keepers and green-grocers. Had the conditions been reversed, and an American presented himself at an English dinner party thus dressed, the servants would have refused them admittance at the door. I feel that we are properly treated, and propose that we take our umbrellas and walk away as we came." They did so. The joke got around. No more entertainments followed, and the checkered short coats, hob-nailed shoes, and umbrellas were left to do their California explorations their own way.

NOBLESSE OBLIGE.

*She writes that in Paris stores are appropriately called magazines, on account of the frequent explosions they give rise to in family circles.

BONBONS,—FRENCH AND OTHERWISE.

Justice—You say your wife threw you down stairs, dumped a bucket of ashes on you, and—by the way, you swear all this is true?

Applicant for Justice—Good Lord, Squire, don't my looks confirm my story?

Little Girl (to visitor)—I know why Bridget won't come to our house any more; she's just mad about our swill—she wanted her husband to have it.

Caller—I want to see the head of the hruse.

Mr. Henpeck—Ah, you wish to see my wife, probably.

Young Lady (to a junior)—"Man should not be alone?"

Junior—"Correct!"

Young Lady—"Therefore he should buy a dog!"

The same sweet and fragrant story. They owned rabbits, and it was in the evening, and she, hearing a disturbance in the back yard, went out there and saw one of the rabbits loose, and made a dive for it.

Was it a rabbit?

No, it was not a rabbit, but it looked very much like one till the perfume gave it away.

A pompous husband, whose wife has stolen up behind and given him a kiss, breaks out:

"Madam, I consider such an act indecorous."

"Excuse me," meekly replies the wife, "I didn't know it was you."

Stranger—"Can you tell me where Second Street is?"

Smart young man—"Yes, sir, I can!"

S.—"Oh, thank you!"

S. Y. M.—"Do you want to know where it is?"

S.—"Oh, no. I simply wanted to know if you knew."

Two members of the high Bohemianism encounter themselves upon the Boulevard.

"And our friend Panel, the ancient inseparable, how is he?"

"Panel? Never speak to me of the miserable. After the way he treated me!"

"Which?"

"Well, the banker X., whom you know, invited me to pass a day with him. Says I, to myself, 'Good enough; I'll strike him for a thousand.' I set out; I arrive at X.'s. Whom do I meet? Panel, d—him, Panel; and he says to me, 'Quite too awfully jolly a fellow X. is; he's just lent me a thousand francs.' See how I was left? Impossible to do anything after Panel had covered the ground, so I gave him a piece of my mind and left."

"You were right. Such an act of treachery is not to be forgiven."

It takes two properly to enjoy a canvas-back duck.

1. You.

2. The duck.

The vessel casts anchor off an island which is laid down upon none of the charts, and the bosunlight, and the midshipmite, and the crew of the captain's gig are sent ashore to investigate. The young officer returns presently, much excited.

"Fetch on your Captain Cooks and your La Peyrouses," he exclaims; "we've laid 'em all out. Captain, it is your glorious destiny to plant the tri-color of la belle France upon a shore never yet trodden by the foot of man."

"Never yet trodden by the foot of man?" says the Captain. "Who told you that?"

"The inhabitants," proudly replied the gallant youth.

"Like the piano?" said, with rapture, the fair Mme. X.; "I should just think I did. Why the tuner has to come three times every two weeks—that's how I like it."

His wife has a weakness for scouring over the face of the city in hacks. Says a friend unto him: "She always seems to be out. Is there no way of catching her?"

"Tell you what," says the sapient husband, "if you want to find her just go out and hail a hack. She may be in it. It's your only chance."

"I am standing," yelled the orator, "on the sacred soil of libertee."

"You are standing," yelled his creditor, "on the soles of a pair of boots you haven't paid me for."

Said General Philippovitch, Commander-in-Chief of the Austrian army of occupation in Boscio, to a smart sergeant of hussars, "What is the best horse in the squadron, eh?"

"No. 2, General; bay, with four white feet and a blaze."

"Why do you consider him the best?"

"Because he trots and gallops well, carries his head well up, is still young and has the best of tempers."

"Well, and who is the best soldier in the squadron?"

"Nazy d'Anos, General."

"Why is he?"

"Because he takes care of his horse, is honest and serviceable, keeps his equipments in perfect shape, and does his duty up to the handle."

"Where is the horse you have cracked up so?"

"It's my horse, General."

"And who is the paragon of soldiers you have lauded thus?"

"I'm the man, General."

"You rascal!" said pleasantly the commander, as he passed his purse over to the trooper.

The named B., who is not at all poor, though by no means a millionaire, returns to the house of the friend whom he is visiting in the country, and his friend says unto him:

"See here! They took up a special collection for the poor this morning, and I subscribed 500 francs for you. Is that O. K.?"

"Well, I suppose I can't go back on it. Only, young man, I think you are pushing my generosity to extremes."

PRELUDES--IN DIVERS KEYS.

"Will thou have music? Hark! Apollo plays."

The first Schmidt Quintet Soirées for this season, at Mercantile Library Hall on the 25th, was a very good concert, with a very mixed programme, carefully selected to suit all tastes (excepting mine, which is never suited with an illogical mess of this sort), and, judging from the applause and frequent encores, seemed to please the audience greatly. Somehow I did not find the earlier portion of it very enjoyable. The Beethoven quartet—the opening number—had a chill over it, and left one in a frame of mind in which the somewhat prolix and dry trio of Mendelssohn (the one in C minor) was really a bore. The Schubert quartet, too, left me cold, and failed to make any decided impression. In this number, however, the Messrs. Schmidt proved that the summer's study has improved their ensemble; the quartet was very nicely played. When I have added a growl at Mr. Louis, Jr., for wasting his time—and ours—over such stuff as the piece by Sarasate (although he played it with great bravura and beautiful finish), I have about got through with my fault-finding. For Mrs. Tippet, with her pretty, sympathetic voice, and truly musician-like style, I have nothing but praise. Mr. Ernest Schmidt shall also have an approving pat on his metaphorical shoulder, since he has evidently been studious, and is decidedly improved both in tone and style. And now stand up, all five of you Schmidts, with Miss Alice—little trump of pianistes—at the head, and be publicly praised for your really admirable playing of the very difficult quintet by Saint-Saens. This is the key note that fixes my recollection of the entire evening, and I believe it will last a long time with everyone who heard it. The composition, a truly beautiful one in every sense of the word, with great freshness and spontaneity of thematic material and masterly handling of form, was finely interpreted; and I believe that every one of the audience would be glad to hear it again. The next concert brings the succeeding numbers—andante and scherzo—and for once I am satisfied with the miserable fashion of giving only detached movements of works, since the impression of this first was quite enough to take in at one time, and I have the others still to look forward to.

The next Quintet Concert will introduce two new faces: Miss Gertie Dietz, of this city, a soprano (pupil of Herr Carl Formes), who is said to have a lovely voice, and who will sing at once "hail and farewell," since she goes shortly to England to fill a concert engagement; and Mr. Henry Koppitz, of Boston, solo flutist. Mr. Koppitz is of a family that has given to the world several fine musicians, and brings an excellent reputation with him.

Schumann said once in the Neue Zeitschrift (I believe he was speaking of the ninth symphony) that there were certain things in art about which every word written or spoken was wasted; and I am confident that he was right. Foremost among them—in the front rank, and towering aloft above all other overtures as a giant in an army of pigmies—stands the Leonore overture No. 3, of Beethoven. It was performed in the last Herold Matinée (the concluding one of the series), and it was a thousand pities the concert did not close with its final chord. What followed seemed like desecration, and the manner in which it was done—the Chopin march especially—like blasphemy. Such performances as last Wednesday's are really very hard to understand. There was this enormously difficult overture, the undertaking of which seemed in advance to be rash in the extreme, really very respectably played (nobody expected the great violin passage to go, but it did with somewhat of a scramble and savez qui peut), and immediately after it the funeral march, a mere bagatelle for an orchestra that is accustomed to mind its p's and f's, one of the most shabby performances that it is possible to imagine. Oh, Trenkle (and Chopin), what had you ever done in the flesh that you should have deserved this after death? The symphony—the D minor of Schumann, second time this season—was almost as bad. In this the slow tempi—introduction, romanza, and bits leading over to the finale—were taken unaccountably fast and rendered absolutely unmeaning; the two allegri were slurred over until it was well-nigh impossible to recognize the themes; the violin solo of the romanza played by all the first desk of fiddles (and barbarously at that) and the trio to the scherzo—oh! As I said before, all this is not easy to account for. Certainly Mr. Herold knows perfectly well how this symphony should be played; he knows as well as I do that the introduction to the Leonore overture is a slow adagio, the character of which is designated beyond any possibility of doubt by its suggestion of Florestan's aria (marked in the score adagio cantabile), and that in taking the movement almost as an andante he is quite certain to render trivial and unmeaning the wonderful passage where the flutes and violins alternate with short detached phrases, and which, to me, has always the effect of a lovely summer day, one's consciousness of the beauty of which seems to be intensified by the knowledge of the awful tragedy that is passing within the prison walls. All of this, I say, Mr. Herold knows as well as the best of us—yes, far better than most of us. And yet in concert after concert we hear, from an orchestra that is now for the third season under his control, performances the most unequal that can be imagined, almost invariably with wrong tempi somewhere. I mean so entirely wrong as to be beyond a mere question of taste, and in which the simplest and most superficial details of light and shade—piano and forte—are completely lost sight of. I am aware that an inefficient leader of the violins so adds to the responsibility of the conductor that the proper rehearsal of a symphony becomes a very arduous piece of work. I know the almost impossibility of tuning down the brass, making the strings bow together (especially when the half of them have no idea of proper bowing at all), or getting the reeds to play nicely in tune. But in three years one might, after all, accomplish something, if it were no more than the reasonably clean playing of a Haydn symphony. To be sure, the opening marches generally go pretty well; and so, I have been told (I never stop for them) do the closing ones. But it is in the symphonies that I am more interested, and I regret to be obliged to say that they are in the main very unsatisfactory performances.

S. E.

OLLA-PODRIDA.

When a male individual of the human species has passed the age of fifty years he is no longer young. There is no use of attempting to disguise the fact—that person is old. He is over the divide; he is on the downward track; he is on the home stretch, going down the grade. It is time to put away delusions, to fling away ambition, to forgive your enemies, to put your household in order. There sits the grim old croupier Death just on the other side of the green cloth, with his rake in his hand. Every year he makes his game; every year the rake comes nearer and nearer, every move gathering in your neighbors, friends, and associates. You may look the fleshless old skeleton square in the face; you may affect to be brave, to be careless, to be indifferent; but every time his long, gaunt fingers takes away a friend. There comes over you a nervous twitch, and the smile that smiles when he is gone is a ghastly, nervous one. These are the reflections of a sick sinner who has heard the gates creak on their rusty hinges, who has seen the shadow of the wing of the passing Azrael, who has caught a glimpse of the dry bones in the valley of the shadow of death, who has lost twenty pounds in a week, who has been propped up on pillows in a lace night-shirt, indulged with dry toast, weak tea, and with frequent powders, drops, pills, and all sorts of medicaments, prescribed with a frequency that converts one's wife into an uncompromising fiend of inexorable regularity, and your sick stomach into a pharmaceutical common sewer for druggists to pour their nauseous drugs into at about a dollar an ounce vial, fifty cents a powder, and two bits a pill. One of the most common conceits of old gentlemen past fifty is to claim that they are "just as young as they ever were," "never felt so well in all my life," "just as vigorous as ever," "prime of life, sir," "full intellectual vigor." Some of these old duffers will wink and look wise, and hint hints, and boast of their unimpaired manly vigor. But they do not ride horseback any more; "have lost their taste for such vigorous exercise." They do not go over the mountains for quail any more, they shoot ducks from a punt bid in a tule blind. They do not dance or enjoy social life, nor ride horseback, nor go up stairs two steps at a time, nor jump upon a car in motion. Just see one of these well-preserved old gentlemen get out of a buggy or walk up hill; hear him pant and wheeze; see him avoid a draft from a crack in a door or window; see him throw his handkerchief over his bald head when he goes to sleep in church; note the fact that he walks, if fat, solid on his heels; if spindle and lean, be tiptoes along like a young beau, striking the thin calf of his shrunken shank with a delicate rattan. After fifty the digestion is impaired, the kidneys do not act, the liver is torpid, the spleen enlarges, the heart is irregular in its action, the blood circulates slowly, motes dance before the eyes, glasses are in demand, the memory plays tricks, one can not sleep of nights, the hands are cold and perspire as does the clam. He lays awake and thinks. The brain beats like a hammer, and worries itself all night in hunting up something to worry about. The appetite gives way and breakfast resolves itself into a cocktail or a cup of strong coffee. This old man past fifty carries a substantial cane, wears thick underclothes, a buckskin over his chest, corsets, if too fat, and a liver pad. His hair gets thin, his legs get weak, he gets irritable, thinks this generation not as good as the last, thinks the world is growing dishonest, and the country is going to the devil. If he is a lawyer, he has become an old fogey, and the boys worry him with sharp practice. If he is a doctor, he regards all young men as quacks, and all progress in medicine as empiricism. If he is a preacher, well, he begins by being fifty years old and never gets any younger. If he is banker, he looks wise, and continues to look wiser and wiser, till at the age of fifty the countenance is rigid with frozen sagacity. Women never get to be fifty; that is, not by the regular process of gradually growing old. The dentist, the hair-dresser, the corset-maker, the milliner, the importer of French bonnets, form a body guard around the advancing female, and when finally she can not dodge old age any longer she just skips with a bound from thirty-five to seventy, throws up the sponge and turns pious, finds that consolation in religion that she formerly found in society, dress, and false teeth, becomes charitable, and contributes free soup to the indigent. We are not discussing poor old men past fifty. They never die, and if they do it is of no consequence. The old croupier sends his rake only after those who have something on the cloth. All the way up from $500,000 to $15,000,000 the old man past fifty is worth raking in. At fifty the rich old man begins to take care of himself. He stays at home nights—he does not so often have an appointment to see a man down town. He begins to pinch off on his wine and cigars. He finds that champagne inflames his toes, and makes chalk in his joints. He begins to diet—eats cracked wheat for breakfast, has a light dinner, and goes to bed several drinks of brandy and water earlier than usual. The rich old man past fifty purchases a trotting horse, or takes sea baths and long walks in the morning. At this age he begins to moralize on the vanity of wealth, and philosophize upon the accumulation of unnecessary millions. He admits, with an undertone of regret, that he can not take his money with him, and if he does that it will melt. The rich old man past fifty now finds his hands full. First is the nervous anxiety concerning death. He is a watchful observer of the little indications with which death is good enough as a rule to herald his coming. He takes better care of himself, and just now he begins to realize that he has a family. He has a dim consciousness that all these years past he has had butcher and other bills to pay; but now, as the bills increase, he realizes that he has sons and daughters. Boys are beginning to assert themselves, and the girls are making raids upon the treasury. Europe must be done, society makes its demands, and the rich old man past fifty begins to realize that just as his faculties are beginning to decay, just as he is weakening from old age, just as he feels the gout twingeing at his toes, just as he is threatened with paralysis, softening of the brain, and apoplexy, all his faculties are strained to hold on to what he has. He finds it harder to keep than to get. Young fellows whom he does not like steal his daughters. His boys marry girls whose family he does not know. He hates to dower and divide, and if he does not the world says he is an old hunk. Society is very busy gossiping over the rich old man past fifty. Having exhausted itself over the important inquiry as to how he got his money and all the cognate facts of his family, his early education, his former employments, whom he married, etc., are explored. Having plowed and harrowed this field, the next inquiry is as to what he will do with his money. If he builds a mansion in town and country, drives four in hand, sends his family to Europe, educates his boys in Germany and his daughters in Paris, he is extravagant, and society deplores the fact that he spends his money generously. If he is economical, lives quietly, boards at a cheap restaurant, and sleeps alone in a garret, society denounces him as a money-grub, a usurer, and a mean old cuss. Everybody speculates as to what the rich old man past fifty ought to do with his money. Everybody agrees that he ought to build a monument for himself, laying the foundations broad and deep in some princely charity, some great, noble, generous scheme of philanthropy; and it is singular with what unanimity everybody asserts that, if they were rich and past fifty, they would astonish the world by some great act of large-hearted benevolence. The life of the rich old man past fifty is beset with difficulties when he lives, and if he can look down from the bright mansions in the skies—where, by the way, all rich old men go—he will see his heirs quarreling over his estate, contesting his will, and raising the question of his sanity. If he endows a charity, the heirs fight it; if he does not, society denounces him. If he leaves no heirs, no wife, no children, the lawyers hunt them up, and from out of some vile boarding-house or alley, some draggled-tailed widow, or servant, or demipre, is dragged to smirch the good name and steal the estate of the rich old bachelor or widower past fifty. We have been casting about us, and in San Francisco we have penciled the names of nearly one hundred rich old men past fifty, all of whom in due course of nature will soon be compelled to pass in their chips to the old croupier and give up their seats around the green table. What a crop of law suits, scandals, secret tales, involved mysteries, will grow up around their graves. It makes us almost envious of younger men that they will enjoy this rich harvest of defamations, and may revel in the scandals that are reported of the living and the slanders that are told of the wealthy dead. Who is the next gentleman worth a million who is to die? Would it not be well to form a pool and sell chances. We gamble at everything else, then why not give the public an opportunity to bet on the next millionaire that dies.

The readers of the ARGONAUT will remember to have read from time to time in these columns some very strong and original poems signed Richard Realf. Realf was an Englishman of good birth, was the associate of literary men and women of highest rank in his native country; came to America, and in the border difficulties of Kansas was an admirer and adherent of John Brown of Ossawatimie. He served, and with honorable distinction, through our war, was upon the staff of General John F. Miller, and was highly esteemed by him. He was a poet, a gentleman, a genius. Domestic difficulties shadowed his life. He freed himself from them and life's troubles by seeking and finding in Oakland a suicide's grave. On the day before he accomplished his fate he wrote the following poem:

"De mortuis nil nisi bonum." When
For me this end has come and I am dead,
And the little voluble, chattering daws of "meo"
Peck at me curiously, let it then be said
By some one brave enough to speak the truth:
Here lies a great soul killed by cruel wrong.
Down all the balmy days of his fresh youth
To his bleak, desolate noon, with sword and song,
And speech that rushed up hotly from the heart,
He wrought for liberty, till his own wound,
(He had been stabbed) concealed him and he swooned,
Through wasting years, mastered him and he swooned,
And sank there where you see him lying now
With that word "Failure" written on his brow.

But say that he succeeded. If he missed
World's honors, and world's plaudits, and the wage
Of the world's deft lacqueys, still his lips were kissed
Daily by those high angels who assuage
The thirstings of the poets—for he was
Born unto singing—and a burthen lay
Mightily on him, and he moaned because
He could not rightly utter to the day
What God taught in the night. Sometimes, nathless,
Power fell upon him, and bright tongues of flame,
And blessings reached him from poor souls in stress;
And benedictions from the black pits of shame,
And little children's love, and old men's prayers,
And a Great Hand that led him unawares.

So he died rich. And if his eyes were blurred
With thick films—silence! he is in his grave.
Greatly he suffered; greatly, too, he erred;
Yet broke his heart in trying to be brave.
Nor did he wait till Freedom had become
The popular shibboleth of courtier's lips;
But smote for her when God Himself seemed dumb
And all His arching skies were in eclipse.
He was a-weary, but he fought his fight,
And stood for simple manhood; and was joyed
To see the august broadening of the light
And new earths heaving heavenward from the void.
He loved his fellows, and their love was sweet—
Plant daisies at his head and at his feet.

Clubs for women are the fashion at present in London. The Russell Club has five hundred members. The arrangements of this club include both ladies and gentlemen, special rooms being set apart for the exclusive comfort of each. Certain rooms, as reading, writing, dining, and music rooms, are common to ladies and gentlemen. While gentlemen are not forgotten in the Russell Club, the special object in establishing it was the accommodation of ladies while engaged in the duties of shopping.

"Is there a letter for me?" asks an ancient female of a post-office employé.

Inquiring her name, the obliging clerk answers: "Yes, ma'am; nine cents postage due on it, too."

"Yes, sir. Would you be so good as to read it for me?" Obliging clerk opens the billet, which proves to be eleven pages of foolscap, and after patiently wading through it, the old lady draws a long breath and remarks:

"All right, young man, I don't believe I will take it."

Truth is stranger than fiction. A man may know that he is a liar, and yet he'll feel decidedly strange when he is called one.

THE DIARY OF A WOMAN.

Translated for the Argonaut from the French of Octave Feuillet.

(CONTINUED FROM LAST NUMBER.)

We started off immediately and with speed, but not racing. His emotion quieted, he became almost gay, and began to call to, and talk with, the country people whom we met here and there on the road, informing himself about their affairs, and relating to me their histories with much interest. I already knew well that his misanthropy did not hinder his doing a great deal of good in the country, where he was much beloved. We had just entered the park, when at the turn of a path we saw three persons walking slowly toward us. They were Madame de Louvercy, Monsieur d'Eblis, and Cécile, and seemed much surprised to see me in company with Monsieur Roger.

"Mother," cried he, laughing, "I was running away with Mademoiselle d'Erra, but 'tis she who is running away with me. Do you know where she carried me? No. You can't imagine. There, I will let her have the pleasure of informing you."

I got down, took Madame de Louvercy apart, who seemed more and more puzzled, and whispered in her ear:

"I have been taking him to church, and he prayed."

She cried out while pressing me almost violently to her heart:

"Ah, my dear child!" and then after a pause and a deep sigh: "Have I then all this happiness at once—for you know—Cécile!" and she showed me Monsieur d'Eblis near by.

"Yes," said I, "I know."

"Who could ever have thought that she would have made so wise a choice?—and that he, on the other hand. . . . Well, God has his days!"

Cécile had taken my arm, and said to her aunt in a suppliant tone: "Leave me alone with her."

And Madame de Louvercy and Monsieur d'Eblis walked away slowly, chatting with Monsieur Roger, who put his horse to a walk. Cécile drew me away, and following a short and winding path made me enter a very retired part of the park, which is called the "Hermitage." According to the tradition of the country, on this spot there formerly lived a hermit, the remains of whose dwelling are supposed to have been found in some ruins half-covered at the present time by a well-turfed hillock, the only part of which, still almost intact, is a small old piece of mason-work in the shape of an arch, under whose shadow is the source of that brook which, bubbling up from a little spring, flows gayly through the wood. A rather broad piece of ground, which seems to have been the garden of the house, at the present day forms a glade with a walk, along which groups of lofty trees have been here and there preserved. This site presents a singularly quiet and natural appearance; with its graceful repose it seems a hallowed spot where one might dream of those foregrounds in which scenes of nymphs, and shepherds, and antique fountains are drawn.

Cécile said not a word as she led me to this place, but when we reached it, looking into my eyes with an expression of tenderness mingled with anxiety, and with her tears trickling down, she threw herself upon my neck and exclaimed:

"Ah, I am robbing you—I am robbing you!"

My tears mingled with hers, and returning her caresses, I murmured:

"What folly! What are you thinking about? Why will you, without any reason, thus try to spoil your own happiness?"

"You have been so kind to me," pursued she, still crying, "so generous—he told me all. Ah, it is you alone who are worthy of him—you alone! Tell me only that you did not love him so very much."

"Why, no, my darling—rest quite easy. 'Twas only sympathy."

"I adore him! Listen: 'twas here in this charming spot that he told me that he loved me—that he asked if I would be his wife. Ah, 'tis here that I would be buried when I die! Do you think that would be possible?"

"I do not know, my darling. But do you know that you are talking nonsense?"

"I am a little crazy, really. But—do you think he will be happy with me? I do wish so much that he may be happy."

"He will be happy, dearest."

"Ah, nothing was spared me! I can not dwell on the recital, for my heart fails me. And what shall I do now? Tomorrow I will see. I will consult grandma, having decided to tell her all."

August 2d.—My grandmother and all the rest of the château learned last evening of that great event—the engagement of Cécile. Though much disappointed and indignant at a supreme degree, she received the news with a calmness and serenity and a smile which should be an example to me. She simply said, on quitting me at the stairs:

"That gentleman has a singular taste."

This morning she came to my room as she said she would, and, as I awakened from a very short sleep, after kissing me and pressing my hand tightly, she said:

"Well, my sweet pet. Mesdames de Sauve and de Chagres have just informed me that they leave to-day with their brothers. I declare I think their conduct ridiculous. It is acknowledging their disappointment—their spite. It is mean—it is contemptible! We have more pride than that, haven't we, little one?"

"Yes, grandma."

"If I know how to suffer without showing it, don't we? And, though it be very trying, we will remain here for a fortnight or three weeks to save appearances. At least that is my advice. Have you the courage to do so?"

"I will try."

"Besides, my dear child, flight in such a case is no more reasonable than it is honorable. It is far better to accustom oneself to things as they are—to face them, and thus get rid of their first impressions. Don't you think so?"

"I do not know what to think yet."

"Well, you will see. If it is more than you can bear, we will go. Pardon me, my dear child, if I have added to your pain, instead of weeping, grieving, and condoling with you. It is wiser and better to do as I am doing, you may depend."

"I should never hug one's grief. Kiss me, darling. I do love you so very much." And she went off to her own room—leaving me, as she said, by herself, I am sure.

Here is the result of my night's meditations: I have so often in society heard eternal love made light of, and constancy treated as a fable, and more particularly by my own sex, that I feel reluctant to believe that I am an exception to the rule. It is, however, impossible for me to imagine that my own heart will ever receive, even in the most remote future, a sentiment which drives from it the one which I have already admitted there. Right or wrong, I am convinced that I shall always love the man whom I have once loved, with all my heart, with all my reason, with all the strength of my being, and of my life. It is not even possible for me to imagine that, with such a sentiment in my heart, I can ever unite myself to another; and, unless a very great change takes place in me, which I do not expect nor wish, I shall never marry. While grandma remains I will live near her and for her. If I survive her I will return to the convent where I passed my youth, and I will never leave it again. I feel that I shall not be very unhappy there. Although many bitter regrets must accompany me, I shall receive some consolation also. Apart from the poetry of the cloister, and its sweet familiarity with things divine, I shall enjoy in my humble duties, as instructress, that sweet dream of maternal devotion which I am destined to know only as a dream. All that I once did for Cécile I will do for others, and they shall become my family.

This settled as to the future, I will conform now to the desires and wishes of my grandmother. Her pride accords with my own. I should be ashamed to show by a sudden departure any bitterness of feeling, which would degrade me in my own eyes. Doubtless I shall still suffer, but I think the past day has exhausted all that I can suffer in that way.

August 8th.—My grandmother had a long talk with Madame de Louvercy to-day, the subject of which I cannot exactly make out, but it seems to have resulted in a modification of our plans. Instead of leaving in a fortnight, we are to leave to-morrow. She has just notified me of it, alleging that we have done quite enough for our dignity. Her expression was very thoughtful, and when I saw Madame de Louvercy as she left grandma's room she looked much troubled. Nothing disagreeable, however, has taken place between them, as their manner toward each other proves. She is affectionate, and even tender, but there is a peculiar sadness in her look. I give up trying to penetrate this new mystery, which preoccupies me very little. The most important thing for me is that we are soon going away. I acknowledge now that I presumed too much upon my courage, which has come to an end. The departure of the De Valnesses and their sisters left me too often in the immediate presence of the pandées. I had to be the smiling witness of their tête-à-têtes, of their love, and of their happiness—the smiling, yet despairing witness of it all. The pains of jealousy are made up of frightful complications. It not only makes the heart bleed, it degrades it also. One not only feels its tortures, but is made vile by its influence. The wound it makes is not a clean one—it is unhealthy; ulcerated pride, envy, and hatred are mingled in it, soil it, poison it. I suppose that there is no passionate soul which is not in some accursed hour capable of these unworthy sentiments, and the merit consists not in being incapable of them, but in detesting them and in conquering them. That is what with God's aid I have tried to do. But oh, I am so glad to go!

I promised Cécile to return for her marriage, if she were married here; but I think the ceremony will take place in Paris, and I much prefer that it should.

Monsieur de Louvercy did not appear at our breakfast this morning, and will not come to dinner this evening. It seems that he is suffering very seriously. In fact, I have remarked for some time that he seemed weak and languid, and more unwell than usual. I regret to be obliged to leave without seeing him again. And probably I shall never see him again, as he never leaves Louvercy, and I hope never to return to it. Poor young man! I shall always feel so grateful to him for what he did for my sake.

August 9th.—What a night!

I was on my feet until one o'clock in the morning over-seeing our packing, and had only a moment before sent my maid away and began to undress, when I thought I heard a door open gently on the landing in front of my room, then a slight noise of steps, creaking of boards, and dragging of clothes over the steps. Some one was descending the stairs in a mysterious way. Surprised and agitated by I do not know what vague fear, I opened my door softly, and saw a faint light at the bottom of the stairs. At the same time the noise of half-uttered words, and what seemed to me to be suppressed sobs, reached me. I leaned over the balustrade, and was able to discern Madame de Louvercy at the railing of the basement, candlestick in hand, resting her head against the door of her son's apartment, and listening attentively. All at once she opened the door with extreme caution, and glided into the apartment.

For one or two minutes there I stood, holding my breath, anxious and alarmed, when a woman's scream, a sharp, painful scream, pierced the dead silence of the night. I started off running down stairs rapidly, and found myself before the door that Madame de Louvercy had left ajar. It opens into a cabinet or workroom which is in front of Monsieur Roger's chamber. This cabinet was quite dark, but a few rays of light penetrated the obscurity, coming in through the door which separated it from the neighboring room. I was now in my turn listening with anguish, my heart beating rapidly. Madame de Louvercy had entered the chamber. She was weeping, her voice rising at intervals in accents of supplication and despair. No voice answered hers. A mortal terror seized me, for I feared some accident had happened, and without thinking I stepped into the cabinet and raised a corner of the curtain which hung over the door. In front of me was Monsieur Roger de Louvercy, seated in an arm-chair, pale and immovable as a ghost, looking with fixed eye at his unhappy mother, who knelt before him with clasped hands, and from time to time struck his knees with her forehead. I also observed on the table a large letter sealed with wax, and near it one of those long narrow violet-boxes in which fine pistols are encased. At last Monsieur Roger said, in a low and irritated tone of voice:

"John had much better have held his tongue."

John is an old soldier, and his confidential servant at present.

"O mon Dieu! Tell me," sobbed Madame de Louvercy, "tell me, I beseech you, if I am nothing—nothing to you?"

He hesitated for a moment, and then I saw him bend down and clasp his mother's forehead in his hands and kiss it.

"Forgive me," said he, "the hour of folly is passed—completely passed—I promise you."

"Do you promise me—truly promise me—my beloved child?"

"I do indeed promise. Only I supplicate you to let her go, so that I may never see her again. Shall that be so?"

"Yes, yes. That is all arranged, you know. She leaves to-morrow—indeed, this very morning."

"Never let her know what has happened."

"No, never."

"Now, my dear mother, you may leave me, and go and rest in peace. Again forgive me. Go in all confidence. You may take those arms with you if you choose."

While they embraced each other, I left in haste, ran up stairs, and shut myself in my room, passing the rest of the night in thinking over all that had happened. When daylight appeared, I went to my grandmother and had a long talk with her. She was now able to tell me why Madame de Louvercy wished to hasten our departure, but it was useless, for I already knew.

Now I must try to sleep a little, and then I will continue.

Same day.—The resolution which I came to during the night has been long and violently opposed by my grandmother.

"My darling," said she, "you are aware that I do not from principle hate whatever is romantic, but really this is too much. At your time of life, with your face and figure, your accomplishments, and your fortune, to marry an invalid, is all very fine, very noble, and very poetic; but it is a little too much. And besides, allow me to say, my dear child, if you were to make such a resolution at any ordinary time when your mind was clear and your heart free, when you were calm and cool and perfectly self-possessed, that would be another thing; but this is not the case. You are suffering from a most disagreeable surprise. By the way, mon Dieu! I shall never be able to understand what could have come into the head of that gentleman. Be that as it may, however, you are at present in that condition of mind, my love, in which false steps are so often taken. You should mistrust this impulse of a seeming enthusiasm, which, after all, may be only the prompting of despair. At any rate, let us wait—let us wait a few months. Let time do its work. If your judgment be confirmed, and the desire becomes stronger—well, well—then we'll see. But in truth I should not do my duty if I allowed you to engage in such an adventure while under the influence of the disappointment and the shock which your heart has received, and also under the undue emotion caused by the tragic scene of the past night."

Such, in short, were the objections of my grandmother, which were combated with all the force of my conviction and all my eloquence. I was romantic, doubtless; but had she not always encouraged such a tendency? Had she not, indeed, recommended it as a guarantee of one's dignity and happiness? I was indeed heartless, but might not the cure depend mainly upon such a diversion as a great duty faithfully performed, a generous devotion to a worthy cause, would afford? Should not my heart try at present to forget the happiness which it had lost, and seek for another kind of happiness in its efforts to console others? I did not hide from her my positive determination of entering a convent if ever I had the misfortune of losing her. Devotion for devotion, was not the opportunity now offered of a higher order, more attractive, of a more pious kind—less egotistical, in fact, than would be a simple renunciation of the world and the somewhat common self-denial of the instructress? As for waiting, it would perhaps be risking all the benefit of my act. Who knows but that, during the interval, that unhappy young man might not fall again into one of those attacks of utter despair which I had witnessed, and whether his mother would be warned of it in time, and whether he might not fall under it? It was also certain that to wait would cause me to lose the best part of my reward, which was the joy that I had promised myself of seeing these two poor people pass from an excess of grief to an unexpected happiness. To be the cause of this, descending like an angel of light into their gloomy existence, to have one such moment in my life, would spread joy and peace over the past and over the future, and be a constant source of consolation to me for evermore.

My dear grandma, with tears streaming from her eyes, was at last willing to acknowledge the force of my argument.

"But ah, my dear little daughter!" returned she, in conclusion, "the world will say that we are two fools."

"God bless such folly!"

"I think so, too," added she; "but there is now another difficulty which arises."

"Ah, mon Dieu! what is that?"

"How are we to arrange with the de Louvercys? I must do the poor mother the justice to say, that while she confided to me the unfortunate passion of her son, she did not for an instant appear to admit the supposition—and it is really unimaginable—of a marriage between you two. The young man evidently does not admit its possibility either, which does honor to his good sense. But then, what? Must you offer yourself to him? Must you throw yourself into his arms without saying, 'Look out?' It is impossible, my daughter. It is altogether wrong."

"But, grandma, since we are sure that they will not refuse me."

"Ah, that alone would be wanting! It is a very delicate business—very delicate."

"Are you willing to leave it all to me, grandma?"

"Ah, mon Dieu! why not? 'In for a penny for a pound.' As we are already up to our necks in improprieties, one more or less will not matter. But I suppose, however, that you will first speak to the mother."

"Of course I shall," said I. "And that's the reason why I have just asked for a few moments' conversation with Madame de Louvercy. I am going to her room now."

Same day.—Madame de Louvercy was in her son's room when my message reached her. She came immediately to mine. Her face, one of the noblest I have ever seen, was very pale and worn, showing the effects of her terrible suffering during the past night. She smiled upon me, however, but with that absent look of a woman whose thoughts were a thousand leagues away from the surprise I was preparing for her.

"My dear child," said she, "you wish to bid me good-bye. You are kind. I am myself glad to be able to do so without witnesses, the better to tell you how much I shall miss you—how much I thank you for being so obliging, so sympathizing, toward us all."

She took my hands while speaking, saw that I was disturbed, and felt that I trembled. Her troubled look became composed in a moment, and her eyes sought mine while giving forth an expression of astonishment and vague suspicion combined.

"Madame," said I, stammering a little, "I have to beg your pardon. I—I was very indiscreet last night."

She gazed at me with a deeper and more intense look.

"I heard you pass by, then I heard your sons, I feared you needed my assistance, and went down."

"You know all, then?" cried she, trembling in her turn.

"Yes. I know all. I am deeply touched by the sentiments with which I have impressed your son—touched also by his misfortunes; and, Madame," approaching her very gently, "do you wish that I should become your daughter?"

She trembled all over. Her eyes dilated, and with an astounded—almost wild—look they remained fixed on mine. Her half-opened lips moved convulsively, and murmured, quite low: "No, it is not possible."

"Will you take me for your daughter?" repeated I, smiling. Oh, what a cry came forth! What a mother's cry!—the cry of a happy mother.

I do not know exactly what took place during the moments that followed. I half lost my senses—she also. She embraced me, she kissed me, she almost smothered me. She called me the most tender names, while praying and weeping, and she joined me with her God in her offerings of gratitude. Oh, what precious moments those were!

As soon as she could recover herself a little, she exclaimed with anxiety:

"Mon Dieu! But your grandmother! Does she consent?"

"Ah, come to her and see."

She drew me to her. After the first transports were over, and they were very great on both sides, my grandmother observed that, before giving ourselves up to it any longer, it would be well to inquire as to the intentions of Monsieur Roger.

"Ah, Dieu!" cried Madame de Louvercy. "My poor boy! All that I ask is that he may not die of joy. But I must not longer keep this happiness from him." And suddenly seeing herself in the mirror with her beautiful white hair falling about in disorder: "How I do look. He'll think me crazy." She smoothed her hair a little and turned toward the door with the firm and elastic step of a young girl. Really, the brightness of her eyes, the beaming expression of her face, would have led one to think that ten years had been taken away from her age. As she went out she stopped, and turning round she said—looking timidly at me: "He will not believe me." I acknowledge that I was dying to accompany her.

My grandmother, carried away by the enthusiasm of the moment, pushed me by the shoulders.

"Go," said she. "Oh, mon Dieu! go, my daughter. Are we not almost drowned in improprieties already?"

Madame de Louvercy passed my arm under hers, and led me away as fast as she could go. As we went down stairs she kissed me again, saying: "What a contrast to that awful night!" Opening the door to the basement rooms, she begged me to wait for a moment in the cabinet; then raising the curtain which hung over the door, she entered Monsieur Roger's chamber.

I was hardly a moment alone in the cabinet when the strangeness, the apparent impropriety, of my situation overcame me. Do what I would in recalling to mind all that might justify the step I had taken, all that was exceptional in the circumstances that had led me to it, in the unfortunate condition of Monsieur Roger and the reserve it imposed upon him, and say to myself if I would, that from the nature of things ordinary rules were in some measure overturned between us, I was not the less at his door and waiting his good pleasure like an eastern slave; and, not being of a very humble disposition, it seemed very disagreeable at the least. This feeling of uneasiness increased painfully as the measure of my solitude was prolonged. Time for reflection on which I had not counted was afforded me. My imagination had painted an exact repetition of the animated, rapidly-passing scene which had so much moved me a few moments before: a surprise, a cry, an outburst, a transport of joy! But instead of that, minutes succeeded minutes, and through the thickness of the curtains I could hear whisperings, exchanges of confidence, a sort of discussion. The blood left my heart, and the floor was sinking under me when the curtain was at last raised, showing me the serious and disturbed, though not precisely sad, face of Madame de Louvercy.

"Will you come in, my child?" said she to me gently.

I entered the chamber. Monsieur de Louvercy was standing resting his wounded knee upon a chair. His features, which generally wear a worried, bitter, and sarcastic expression, had absolutely lost that character. A grave and almost solemn melancholy set off most proudly their pure and well cut lines. His eyes encircled with dark rings seemed moist with tears. He fixed his look upon me, and said, speaking slowly, as though trying to suppress an emotion about to overflow:

"My mother, Mademoiselle Charlotte, has made me acquainted with that sentiment of angelic goodness which has brought you here, and were I not as infirm as I am I should now be at your feet. I must not, however, accept your sacrifice; but that the thought should have come to you suffices to render my life more agreeable and satisfactory to me, and will cause my profound and most tender gratitude to follow you wherever you go. God bless you always! And now I beg you, Mademoiselle, do not prolong an ordeal which would really be beyond the strength of any man. Leave me firm in the resolution which honor commands, and you will esteem me more highly for it. Again thanking you, I bid you farewell!"

He bowed very low to me, and his mother wept in silence. I went toward him and frankly offered him my hand. He took it, and pressed it warmly.

"Oh, mon Dieu!" said he, in a low voice, and after looking at me for some time. "Excuse me, Mademoiselle, if I find no words. My heart is so full, my mind so much disturbed, I have passed so suddenly from a dark abyss to a Heaven; but at least let me prove to you how sincere I was in what I said just now, and how much I fear to take advantage of your most generous impulse, your outburst of enthusiasm. I beseech you to take time to reflect—a few months, a year even—and then, if you continue to be of the same mind, and do not fear to make the great sacrifice any more than you do to-day, I will accept it. But until that time arrives, suffer me to free you from every obligation and render you your entire liberty."

As he had retained my hand in his, it was unnecessary for me to offer it to show that I agreed to what he said. Madame de Louvercy seemed well satisfied, hoping perhaps, and perhaps with reason, that it would result as do so many other modern treaties. I simply replied: "As you choose, sir. But I will not change. I shall see you again, for you will not insist upon our leaving immediately, I suppose. You will allow us a few days' reprieve?"

He shook his head, smiled, and kissed my hand, and his mother and I left him.

On learning the result of this conference, my grandmother declared that the conduct of Monsieur de Louvercy appeared to her perfectly honorable and proper. I thought so too, and after having been mortified and shocked at the little eagerness shown in the way in which he received me, and in his answer, I should after all have regretted to have had him act differently. I was thankful for his hesitation and his scruples, finding in them more than his words conveyed. Yes, without doubt he feared to take advantage of any impulse of romantic enthusiasm which might bring repentance in its train, and feared also to accept the gift of a bleeding heart which is not yet, and perhaps never will be, cured of its wound; for it is certain that he at least suspected my attachment for Monsieur d'Eblis, though he did not allow himself to ask any explanation on this point. Delicate as it is, I will give it to him some day, and as an honest man he shall be satisfied with me. If it is a bleeding heart which I offer him, it is also a faithful and devoted one.

August 25th.—I have indeed been inspired, but I must not deceive myself. I am not happy; nor can I ever be so. I looked forward to too great, too perfect a happiness to admit of my ever consoling myself for its loss. But this thought has at last ceased to trouble me. I have an end in view and a future. I have made for myself a duty which shall fill the void occupied by my thoughts. It is a pleasant task to raise a soul little by little from desolation, to relieve it from its despair, to give it peace and pleasure, to lead it to submission, to happiness, to God. These are the cares to which I consecrate myself with a tender interest, which will doubtless increase every day like the affection of a mother for her sick child, and which I hope will leave nothing to regret for him who is its object.

So far he sees, he understands all that I am giving him with all the sincerity of my heart. I tell him part—he divines the rest, and he appears to be happy. As I expected, the contract does not hold. It is true, he insists upon my observing the delays. I do not resist, but I remain here and he does not complain of that. I think we shall be married in a few weeks.

It became necessary to confide this great secret to Cécile and her fiancé. I think I told nothing new to Monsieur d'Eblis. He simply said: "It is worthy of you." As for Cécile, after some seconds of utter amazement, she went into a sort of joyful tender convulsion, which lasts still. We shall be cousins—almost sisters; that has always been her dream, and she figures to herself that this marriage is going to strengthen our intimacy still more, and that our two existences are, as it were, about to unite. In this she deceives herself. She will remain the dearest among my friends, but it is probable, for some time, at least, that we shall live more separate than during the past. Despondency had prevented Monsieur de Louvercy from yielding to the advice of doctors who recommended a sojourn at the South and on the borders of the sea. Now that he wishes to live, I have spoken already of a residence at Nice for the winter, much to his gratification for more reasons than one perhaps.

I have closed my locked book, never to reopen it, I hope, for I think that, once married, a woman should have no other confidant than her husband. So, then, adieu! passionate, romantic Charlotte!

[END OF FIRST PART.]

Bill of Fare for Six Persons.—Sunday, November 3, 1878.

Celery Soup.
Boiled Sea Bass, Anchovy Sauce.
Broiled Quails on Toast. Fried Potatoes.
Succotash. Brussels Sprouts.
Roast Lamb, Mint Sauce.
French Artichokes.
Blanc Mange, with Quince Jelly and Whipped Cream.
Fruit-bowl of Pears, Plums, Apples, and Grapes.

TO MAKE ANCHOVY SAUCE.—Three ounces of butter, one ounce of flour, half a pint of white stock (water will do), and some pepper (no salt). Put two ounces of the butter into a stewpan, and when it bubbles sprinkle in the flour. Stir well with a wire egg-whisk until the flour is thoroughly cooked without being colored, and then mix in well the stock or water. Take off the fire and pass through a gravy strainer; stir in the other ounce of butter cut in pieces; add and mix thoroughly four teaspoonfuls anchovy extract or anchovy paste. This makes nearly one pint of sauce.

An auction art sale is in progress.

A marine view is about to be knocked down at a handsome figure, when a bluff sailor who has just wandered in exclaims, earnestly: "My stars, if there isn't a vessel drifting on to the rocks, with a strong breeze blowing off shore." The artist takes his work home to rearrange the wind.

"When was Rome built?" asks a teacher.

"In the night," replies a little miss of twelve.

"In the night?" exclaims the astonished teacher. "How do you make that out?"

"Because it was not built in a day," is the prompt reply.

There are some scenes almost too pure and sacred to be viewed by the thoughtless world. One of them is a two hundred pound woman with a mole on her chin "talking baby" to an ounce-and-a-half canary bird in a brass cage.

A man's own good breeding is the best security against other people's ill manners.

THE LATEST MAGAZINE VERSES.

Song.

O Love, Love, Love!
Whether it rain or shine,
Whether the clouds frown or the sky is clear,
Whether the thunder fill the air with fear,
Whether the winter rage or peace is here,
If only thou art near,
Then are all days divine.

O Love, Love, Love!
Where thou art not, the place
Is sad to me as death. It would be cold
In heaven without thee, if I might not hold
Thy hand in mine, if I might not behold
The beauty manifold,
The wonder of thy face.

C. T., in Lady's Bazar.

Flown Away.

On the bare, brown boughs before me,
In the softly flowing rain,
Kests a blue-bird. Now, upstarting,
See how suddenly she's darting
Far away across the plain.

It was but a dash of color
Shown against a stormy sky;
Only two blue wings uplifted
Where the gray clouds slowly drifted—
But they bore a song on high.

She is lost in misty darkness—
Will she pierce beyond the gray?
Will she reach the blue behind it?
Will she pause when she shall find it?
Will she know it? Who shall say?
DORA READ GOODALE, in Scribner for November.

Beethoven.

If God speaks anywhere, in any voice,
To us his creatures, surely here and now
We hear him, while the great chords seem to bow
Our heads, and all the symphony's breathless noise
Breaks over us, with challenge to our souls!
Beethoven's music! From the mountain peaks
The strong, divine, compelling thunder rolls;
And "Come up higher, come!" the words it speaks,
"Out of your darkened valleys of despair;
Behold I lift you upon mighty wings
Into Hope's living, reconciling air!
Breathe, and forget your life's perpetual stings—
Dream, folded on the breast of patience sweet,
Some pulse of pitying love for you may beat!"
CELIA THAXTER, in Scribner for November.

Cardinal Flower.

No purer joy the glad midsummer holds
For those who love to seek in secret nooks
Of wood or mead, or by the marge of brooks,
The hidden treasures she for love unfolds,
Than on a morn when skies are perfect blue,
And clouds are far and fleecy, loitering slow,
To follow some wild streamlet's wayward flow,
And spy afar, O flower of matchless hue!
Thy wondrous brightness flashing through the green,
As if a flock of red-birds stooped to drink
In airy flutter at the brooklet's brink,
Or, as a troop of Indian girls, half seen,
Half hid, were wading in the crystal stream,
While through the leaves their scarlet "broaderies gleam."
E. F. S., in Appleton for November.

When Hearts are True.

O new-found earth! O wondrous birth!
The very grass and clover
Have caught the sense of sweet surprise—
The mystery breeding over
All life that lies beneath the skies,
When eyelids first uncover;
For old things pass—the world is new
When love is young, and hearts are true.

But hark, but hush! a awakening thrush
Sets all the air a-quiver;
And look! the brook has left its nook
And grown a rushing river;
And buds unclose the perfect rose
To lose in gift the giver!
O green, glad earth! O heavens blue!
When love is grown, and hearts are true.

And now—what now but weighted bough,
Gold, rubies, without measure,
And scarlet leaf and yellow sheaf
Heap up the royal treasure;
While purpling vine, full veined with wine,
Thrills with intenser pleasure,
And earth robs heaven of every hue
When love is ripe and hearts beat true.

Yet stay! although the falling snow
The warm, bright earth is hiding,
Though dull and gray the shortening day
Comes like a sudden chiding;
Full well we know the hearth fire's glow
In dearest eyes abiding;
For last is best the whole world through,
When love is tried, and hearts keep true.

E. E. BROWN, in Atlantic for Nov.

An Old Song.

An old song! An old song! But the new are not so sweet—
Sweet though they be with honeyed words, and sweet with fancies fair,
With thrills of tune in silver troop of answering echoes fleet,
With tender longings slumberous upon the enchanted air.

An old song! But across its verse what voiceless voices sing!
Through all its simple burden what human pulses stir!
More intimate with grief and joy than any precious thing
That the years have wrapped away in frankincense and myrrh!

Lovers have sung it, summer nights, when earth itself seemed heaven;
Sailors far off on lonely seas have given it to the gale;
Mothers have hushed its measure on the quiet edge of even,
While soft as falling rose-leaves dear eyelids dropped their veil.

Long since the sailor made his grave between two rolling waves,
The lovers and their love are naught, mother and child are dust:
But to-night some maiden lifts it, to-night its sounding staves
Are blowing from the stroller's lips, on this balmy blossom-gust.

A part of life, its music flows as the blood flows in the vein;
Laughter ripples through it, tears makes its charm complete;
For the heart of all the ages beats still through this old strain—
An old song, an old song, but the new are not so sweet—
HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD, in Atlantic.

NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Rates of Subscription, $2 per year, six months, $1.25; three months, $1.00—payable in advance. Postage prepaid. City subscribers served for 25 cents per annum. Single copies, 10 cents.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."
 Branch Office, Chicago, Rockford, 710 Market Street.
 Agents at San Francisco, J. A. Taylor.
 News Dealers and Agents in the Interior, supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 412 Washington Street, to whom all orders should be addressed.
 A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PINLEY, }
 FRED. M. SOMERS, } Editors.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 2, 1878.

Ever since and before the beginning of the war, Wendell Phillips has been authority upon many important questions under consideration by the American people. There is a strength, vigor, and apparent honesty in all he writes. He is seemingly bold, resolute, and unselfish. He has never sought office, he has always been loyal, and, in our judgment, there is no man in America whose utterances carry with them more weight, or that leave a more profound impression upon the public mind. In the gubernatorial contest which General Butler is now waging in Massachusetts Wendell Phillips declares for the squint-eyed man of destiny. This fact does not convince us that the election of Butler is probable; taken by itself it argues, we think, the probability of Butler's defeat, as Phillips, as a rule, is always for the bottom dog. It does, however, compel us to think that the election of General Butler to be Governor of the commonwealth of Massachusetts would not be an unmix'd evil.

Wendell Phillips also declares himself opposed to the National Banks. As we understand his position, it is in favor of a national currency, to be issued and controlled by the National Government, and independent of any interference by bank corporations or individuals. It is our judgment that the Federal Government ought to have the sole and exclusive control of issuing money, and should exercise that function of government as independently as it does the post-office or revenue department. To turn the mail over to carriers or express companies, to farm the collection of customs out among merchants, would seem to us as improper as to allow banks or bankers to have any right of interference with the national currency. We are aware that "honest money" is the popular thing to advocate; that "honest money" means gold and silver; and we know that gold and silver may be locked up in vaults, may be "cornered," may be monopolized; and we are mistaken if National Banks are not instruments to "lock up," "corner," and "monopolize" money to the great hurt of the people.

Mr. Wendell Phillips gives utterance to another sentiment that will find a response in the intelligence of that great middle class now being ground and crushed between the upper and nether millstone—wealth at the top, vice, ignorance, and idleness at the bottom. Mr. Phillips says: "If corruption seems rolling over us like a flood, mark it! It is not the corruption of the humbler classes. It is the millionaires who steal banks, mills, and railways. It is the defaulters who live in palaces and make way with the millions. It is the money-kings who buy up Congress. It is the demagogues and editors in purple and fine linen who bid $50,000 for the Presidency itself. It is greedy wealth which invests its thousand millions in rum to coin money out of the weakness of its neighbors. These are the spots where corruption nestles and gangrenes the State. If humble men are corrupted, these furnish overwhelming temptations. It is not the common people in the streets, but the money-changers who have intruded into the temple that we most sorely need some one to scourge. If the hills will cease to send down rottenness the streams will run clean and clear on the plains."

All this is true and pitiable. It does seem as though the very foundations of society were rotten—rotten to the very core: as though there was no such thing as financial honor; as though there was no man left living honest enough to honestly execute a fiduciary trust. Avarice has corrupted society; grasping, swindling, audacious crime runs rampant in the land. The list of bankrupts and commercial failures is something astounding. There was a time when the merchant having failed the first thought that struggled above his humiliation and mortified pride was suicide. The bankrupt merchant of to-day is a cheerful specimen of business audacity. The banker who fails and robs loses no social standing. Fifty cents on the dollar rehabilitates the dishonest and dishonorable business man, and the competition of trade solicits again his patronage.

It is not the idler and vagrant, it is not the mendicant and tramp, it is not the social dreamer and the Communist, that threatens to overthrow and destroy the fabric of civilization. It is not this class that is striking the most severe blows at the things we call property, government, and social order; but it is the sordid, grasping, unprincipled, selfish, rich man, who, in trampling upon the rights of the poor, is mining the foundations upon which all that he treasures is built. It is this that makes the sand-lot possible; it is this that invites to social disorders; it is this condition of things—this evil condition of things—these crimes in high places, infamy in politics, dishonesty in business, swindling in trusts, robbing of savings banks, repudiation of honorable obligations, indifference to the rights of the common people—that is threatening a social revolution and a political upheaval. It is Tweed, Louisiana frauds, telegraphic ciphers, Bank of Glasgow failure, stock gambling, fraud in trusts, savings bank and life insurance robberies, that are undermining man's confidence in man, and resolving society back to its normal condition of barbarism, when property will belong to the sharp-witted and the strong of hand.

The failure of the Bank of Glasgow—the bankruptcy of so many leading merchants and corporations in England—will have one good effect, and that is to disarm the Englishman of that arrogant, and sometimes offensive, assurance that has continually asserted the superior integrity of English over American business men. They are exceedingly fond of assuming to themselves superior virtues. We experienced this largely when slavery existed in our country. "England was free; when the slave touched her soil his shackles fell." And yet when our unfortunate civil war occurred British sentiment arrayed itself in favor of the institution, gave money, medicines, ships, and contraband service in aid of the rebellion. England is full of private banks, and its laws provide no machinery for examination as to their solvency. It is now being whispered abroad through the financial circles of Great Britain that it is desirable to have bank commissioners, armed with authority to investigate, and the fear exists lest many of them shall be found to be as rotten as the Bank of Glasgow, and the management no better. Specimens of French banking in San Francisco have been unfortunate. The history of Pioche, Bayerque & Co., of the French Savings Bank, have taken from this nationality the privilege of throwing stones at our glass houses.

In contemplating these things, and considering the nationality of those who compose our criminal classes, who meet on the sand-lot to blaspheme God, to assault the principles of republican government; considering the birthplace of that great body of tramps, thieves, and idle adventurers who are now scouring the country in criminal vagabondage, we accept with resignation the fact that we are native-born and of American parentage. And while we thus write we again, as always, desire to make exception of those foreign-born who come to our land inbred with republican principles, and prepared to accept their positions as American citizens. But we resent with indignation the insolence of this foreign interference in our political affairs; we are restive under the arrogant and impudent meddlesomeness of ignorant foreign demagogues who thrust themselves so presumptuously into our political matters. We look upon this sand-lot business as the crystallization of foreign vagabondage with American demagoguery, and can not hide our shame and mortification that in a convention to remodel the organic laws of our State the delegates from this great city are ignorant and adventurous Germans and Irish, who represent neither the intelligence, the virtue, the wealth, nor the respectability of their constituency.

A great spasm of indignation has just recently gone over the whole of the California press because of a picture in one of Harper's publications, representing Chinamen treading out the wine. It is regarded by our patriotic journals as a direct blow at the wine interest by this representation of "a mercenary and hireling press" to make it appear that the nasty Heathen Chinese tramples in our wine vats. We prefer to have it understood that our vintage is managed as is represented to have been done in the Roman mountains by Macaulay in one of his lays of Ancient Rome:

And in the vats of Luna
 This year, the musts shall foam
 Round the white feet of laughing girls,
 Whose sires have marched to Rome."

Now, the real fact is, that most of our grapes are crushed in the wine press, and whatever there may be of impurities are carried away by the process of fermentation. But the additional fact also remains that some of the grapes are trodden under the feet of the Heathen Chinese, and the still cheaper labor of Digger Indians. We visited some years ago the famous vineyard of Cocomungo, on the road between Los Angeles and San Bernardino. We believe it is the oldest large vineyard in California, as it is one of the most celebrated for the excellence of its wines. It was then under the management of Mr. Sansevaime, and there we saw the great luscious purple clusters being picked by Indians, brought to the vats in great-wheeled Spanish wains, and after being dumped into the vats we saw them filled with great, stalwart, sweating Indian bucks, up from between whose gaunt toes spurted the purple blood that went to make the famous wine of Cocomungo.

And while we are upon the wine question it is in order to remark that our wine enterprise is suffering under the indifference and criminal conduct of our own people. The fact is, we affect to despise our own wines; we affect to believe that the imported wines of Germany, France, Spain, and Portugal, are better than those of California, and that the imported brandies of southern France—which are supposed to come to us by way of the London docks—are superior to those manufactured in California. Now, all this affectation is started in the interest of a foreign wine trade, and kept up by a class of ignorant wine-gulpers, who pretend to a knowledge they do not possess. Every club, and, we presume, every bar-room and corner grocery, has a sort of wine dilettanti, who affect to have a nice, discriminating taste concerning wine, and, with an unanimity that is absolutely astonishing, they agree that California wines are not equal to foreign. There is too much alcohol in them, they are earthy, they are this, and they are not that. The fact is, and is indisputable, and is growing into recognition, that the majority of the wines of California are superior to a majority of the wines of the countries we have named. There is no such brandy imported from France, and has not been for ten years, and is not now being made there, as that produced by General Henry M. Naglee at his vineyards at San José. They do not use such rare and valuable grapes in any part of France for brandy as does General Naglee. They can not afford it. And when General Naglee's brandy is subjected to the treatment, and has the age given to the production of the French still, he can and does produce a superior article.

This truth is forcing its recognition in our clubs and among our brandy drinkers, in the face of narrow prejudice, and the interests of the foreign grower, importer, and trader. Any gentleman who having traveled in the wine countries of Europe, and tasted the local wines with a view to comparison with the production of California vineyards, is not honest who does not admit the superiority of our wines. It is undoubtedly true that we have not produced such sparkling champagnes as some of those imported. Champagne is a manufactured article, and it may be that our wine makers can not produce a wine that pleases the purely artificial taste that the drinker of imported champagnes demand. It is undoubtedly true that in sherries and madeiras there is a quality from abroad that we have not equaled. But that we will produce wines of equal purity, flavor, and excellence in course of time, we do not doubt. Our port wine, in point of all its qualities, is now the equal of the best imported port wines. We are producing over $5,000,000 in value of wines annually. It is nearly all sent abroad, and after being pasted with false labels, and stamped with the lying device of some foreign house or vineyard, is sent back to us, or distributed over the world as French or German wine.

Wine is destined to be not one of the greatest, but in time the greatest of the industries of California. It will not be many years before it will swell in value beyond grain, or wool, or gold. It deserves to be protected, and above all things it deserves a good word from Californians. The sneers of those brainless asses of the clubs and bar-rooms, who find no good in the product of our vineyards, ought to be washed back down their throats with a flood of the vile, sour decoctions of the German Rhine, and the thin, watery compounds that the traveler experiences all the way from Lisbon to Naples when he calls for the "wine of the country." It stands to reason that the best grapes will make the best wine. There is no land in the world where the grape is so luscious, so large, so perfect as in California. In variety we are not excelled. Therefore we declare, without fear of contradiction, that the majority of our wines and brandies, given the proper treatment and the proper age, are superior to the foreign productions, and the sooner our newspapers, club sharps, and wine dilettanti get rid of the affectation of undervaluing the products of our vineyards, the better it will be for the country.

We are frequently asked why we do not give more space to the consideration of questions now being discussed by the Constitutional Convention. We deem it better to await the conclusion of its deliberations. The personnel of the body is representative of the best intelligence of the State. The Convention works industriously, and so far harmoniously. We expect from it a good outcome. In such event we shall give the work our approval, and earnestly labor for its acceptance by the people.

PRATTLE.

Secretary Evarts has taken the rather unnecessary trouble to correct the press report of a speech of his, by giving the first nine lines of a sentence which the reporter had rounded off in three. In private life Secretary Evarts is an interesting child. It is said to be charming to hear him say—

Now I lay me down to sleep,
I pray the Lord my soul to keep.

He kneels at his bedside in his little nightg, clasps his tiny hands, and looking trustfully upward begins:

"At the present juncture of affairs, deeming it expedient to substitute for a vertical attitude one of recumbency, in order to avail myself of the nocturnal cessation of consciousness that restores the vital energies and exhausted powers, I have the distinguished honor to solicit the attention of His Excellency, the Ruler of Nations, to the unprotected condition of my incorporeal part, and venture to suggest, with great respect, that such measures may be taken, looking to its preservation, as in His wisdom He may consider most likely to be effective."

It is announced that an owner is wanted at the Police Office for two hundred pounds of lead, taken from a Chinaman. No doubt many of the owners are dead, and others scattered in foreign lands. Few, probably, could make proof of ownership; some from delicacy would not attempt it. Let the lead go as a perquisite to the surgeon who took it out.

The daily newspapers are bewailing a vanished opportunity: Mr. James Brooks, the chief of the United States Secret Service Bureau, was in San Francisco for two weeks, and they did not know who the great man was until he had gone; so the butter wherewith they would have anointed the hide of him was tardily expended upon his trail, serving but to grease the metals of the overland railroad. The literature of regret contains nothing more moving than the language in which one journalist complains, again and again, that the gentleman did not reveal himself.

"Come back, come back!" he cries with grief—
The while his mouth runs water—
"That I may kiss thee—kiss thee, chief,
I oughter, oh, I oughter!"

Lo vain—he turned his back the more,
But called out: "What's preventing?"
Then grimly smiled and cried: "My child,
Just kiss me while I'm venting."

"Had I but known his lordship's rank and officious character, I had performed for his lordship and his lordship's horse such dutiful servility as must needs have touched their hearts, and procured for my tavern their lasting disfavor."

"You feel, with Tennyson," writes the music reporter of the Post, "that men must work and women must weep." Well, if men would work harder to qualify themselves for their arts, women (and the angels) would not need to weep over the duplex ignorance of a singing scribbler who thinks Tennyson wrote "the words" of the "Three Fishers."

The foregoing criticism, Herr "Doppelkreuz," is perhaps needlessly pointed; it is made so merely for your instruction, by example, in the useful art of assaulting a friend without lying about him in the interest of another liar. I can recommend the truthful method, for I have never practiced any other. It is harder on the self-respect of a friend, and easier on mine; and in any kind of contest he who loses his self-respect loses the battle. Falsehood (you will agree) is the method of a bungler—an impostor who knows not his business. A man of sense and wit will not write a lie, for that is to confess himself wanting in imagination. Any body can make a lie, but only a wit can evolve ridicule with equal facility from a discreditable and a creditable truth. The man of imagination and judgment, therefore, ignores falsehood, not because it is wicked, but because it is weak. It is, I suppose, a fault in morals; I know it to be a crime in taste. Would you willfully sing a false note? Then why should you write a false statement? Are not letters as good as music? Think on this.

You are a child, Herr "Doppelkreuz"—a child. It pleases me to take an interest in you. I am told you sing well—God knows I've no ear—but in letters you make mistakes; you go wrong, and must be set right. I have known you to mistake whimsical badinage for unfriendly rancor. You fly into a passion and try to injure those who love you; and anon, presto! you are caressing those whom you should despise. This, I must remind you, is not the disposition of a critic; it is more like a woman. Like a woman, too, you have a pretty knack at virtue, but you sin without much understanding. You must learn, Herr "Doppelkreuz," you must learn. Shall it be from the enemy?

The San Rafael Herald publishes some verses by a convict in the State Prison. They are not very good verses—hardly better than the average; but as evidence that at least one local poet has had justice done upon him they are pleasing and instructive. But what shall we say of the reformatory character of the State Prison?

"Rutherford," said Mrs. Hayes, looking up from the documents she was signing, "this is positively the last agricultural fair that I shall permit you to attend. You will drink lemonade, Rutherford—it seems a mania with you—and as President of the United States I must be careful of my example." "But it isn't your example," mildly protested Mr. Hayes, his crochet needle temporarily suspending its function; "it's mine." "Rutherford Hayes—Rutherford B. Hayes," replied the lady, with rasping particularity, "I will not be insulted in my own capital. Whatever is yours is mine, and whatever is mine—" "Is your own, I s'pose," interrupted the insurgent; "I've heard it before." The lady removed her pen, assumed a stiffly vertical attitude, and took a reef in her right sleeve. But there ensued the titful snapping of coat-tails, and the sound of a great going-out, and the Executive Head of this nation was represented in the White House by a warm spot on a cushion.

A hulk imprisoned in a stall
Broke boldly the confining wall,
And found himself, when out of bounds,
Within a washerwoman's grounds,
Where, hanging on a hook to dry,
A crimson skirt inflamed his eye.
With bellows that woke the dead,
He low'ed his formidable head—
Its level horns and gnarly forehead—
Then, planting firm his shoulders horrid,
Began, with rage made half insane,
To paw the arid earth amain,
Flinging the dust upon his flanks
In desolating clouds and banks!
The while his eyes' uneasy white
Betrayed his doubt what for the bright
Red tent concealed, perchance, from sight
That garment, which, all unadorned,
Had never paled a single shade,
Now found a tongue—a dangling sock,
Left carelessly inside the smock:
"I must insist, my gracious liege,
That you'll be pleased to raise the siege:
My colors I will never strike.
I know your sex—you're all alike—
Some small experience I've had—
You're not the first I've driven mad."

A writer in the Fortnightly Review thinks he has made a point against apparitions and the supernatural by reminding us that no ghosts or visions ever appear except such as are popularly believed in at the time. Witches, for example, who two or three centuries ago were as thick as tombstones in a village blackberry patch are now never seen; and the Satan of the middle ages—I came near saying the middle-aged Satan—did not visibly penetrate into ancient Greece and Rome. I fancy, however, this can be otherwise explained. There are fashions in apparitions, and spirits who, for reasons of business and pleasure, wish to be recognized as such conform to the current descriptions in literature and folk-lore, assuming such form and manner as these have made us familiar with. This is simpler than handing us a card, which in most cases would entail the necessity of striking a match to read it.

When, on the contrary, our fellow-citizens who have unloaded their clay (our poor relations, so to speak), or the rarified aborigines of the elements, wish to visit us unknown, they safely may, and doubtless do, adopt such tricks of shape, apparel, and manner as have been long discarded or are not yet generally introduced. In the fourteenth century the inferior demons commonly presented themselves as goats. A Spanish monk was so annoyed by an old he goat that kept coming into his cell by night in spite of locks and bars that on one occasion he seized the creature by the beard, and cut it off. The goat instantly vanished, but the beard being thrown into the fire would not burn; a circumstance which is rightly interpreted as proof that the animal was a demon. Seeing a group of fragrant Billies and straddling Nannies, who now recognizes them as what they probably are—visiting statesmen from the lower world?

You are walking down the street; you meet a bent and bearded old bag, "beated and chopped with tanned antiquity," riding a broomstick. Her eyes shine with a cold, malevolent lustre, like the reflection of a candle in the nail-heads of a coffin. Her gray hair, foul with dirt, trickles bitterly down her skinny shoulders to loosely spend itself amongst the eminences of her bony back. Her shred of raiment is bedraggled; her great shoes clap and scuffle on the stones; she croons to herself an evil ditty, with rhymes not of this earth and in the devil's own metre. Now how—precisely how do you know this apparition is one of the Post's talented contributors, and no witch?

In the very form in which he afterward strove with Dr. Luther, Satan, no doubt, once strutted about in the streets of Imperial Rome, just as he now does in those of San Francisco. But he was then mistaken for the Court Fool of the latest African potentate brought into the city at the chariot wheel of the newest conqueror, just as in San Francisco he is now mistaken for Brigadier-General McComb.

I remember Heine somewhere mentions a belief that when, in their dismal wanderings, ghosts meet human beings the dead are as much alarmed as the living. Lord knows why the poor devils should fear and avoid us; they carry no purses. Their reasonless timidity is to me a revelation and a disappointment, for I had hoped to soon have the happiness of a visit from the disembodied spirit of the brave Mr. Widmer, destroyer of editors. Nothing, it appears, will procure me the pleasure of a second call from his meat and bones.

The rags of humility are not commonly found on the back of the fool—to whom they belong—because they have been borrowed by the knave to deceive their owner.

Mr. Bierstadt proposes to establish in London or Paris a gallery of American art. Any scheme is a good one that will assist in putting the Atlantic ocean between American art and American art students.

They are building steamboats above the Falls of the Missouri. This is the best thing that could happen to that river; the steamboats having been built and equipped it will be necessary to demolish the falls to get them out.

Prowling by night in the disreputable places of New York, taking notes to refresh the memories of the pious, that man o' God, the Rev. Mr. DeWitt Talmage, records the names of the respectables he meets in these evil corners, and threatens them with public exposure. Pending the revelations, the frightened gentlemen in question (or as the loose-thinking member of Congress had it, "the questionable gentlemen") are forestalling the child of light by publishing their own names, and averring that they visited the temples of sin to have an eye upon the Rev. Mr. Talmage—whose name, in connection with this matter, they swear they will pitilessly suppress.

In this bitterest of quarrels
Lo! the right is hardest hit,
For DeWitt has all the morals
But the sinners have DeWitt.

When one of my paragraphs, writing itself, expires in a pun, I have always the disagreeable feeling of having met a fool and shaken hands with him. I don't like to be thought "stuck up," and I am not unsocial, but really I have an aversion to fools, and am choked by the atmosphere of the plane in which they move. As most of them are in the newspaper business, and many in my department of it, there would seem to be a certain fitness in our occasionally coming together on some common ground of fellowship. The field in which they cull their finest flowers of fancy—that of lying—I am dissuaded by shame from entering, and they never come near enough to the dividing line between it and the truth for me to even shake hands with them through the fence. I have not the skill and experience to collaborate with them in their immortal pictures of low life—can not relate a bout at carpet-beating, a hunt for a lost suspender button, a struggle with a stubborn bureau drawer, an attempt at compiling a stove-pipe, the decapitation of a hen-pecked husband, nor the overthrow of a dry goods salesman in a slangy hanging match with a vulgar beast of a she granger. Amongst the tubs and towels, soiled linen and soapy odors, of the literary scullery from which the "funny men" delight to draw their inspirations, "when fond recollection presents them to view," I should feel de trop. I am not proud; but pray, my good men, where are we to meet? There remains the pun.

Hail, peerless Pun! thou last, and best,
Most rare and excellent bequest
Of Dying Idiot to the wit
He died of, rat-like, in a pit!

Thyself disguised, in many a way
Thou let'st thy sudden splendor play.
Adorning all where'er it turns,
As the revealing bull's eye burns,
Of the dim thief, and plays its trick
Upon the lock he means to pick.

Yet sometimes, too, thou dost appear
As boldly as a brigadier,
Tricked out with marks and signs, all o'er,
Of rank, brigade, division, corps,
To show by every means he can
An officer is not a man;
Or naked, with a lordly swagger,
As proud as cur without a waggon,
Who says: "See simple worth prevail—
All dog, sir—not a bit of tail!"
'Tis then meo give thee loudest welcome,
As if thou wert a soul from hell come.

O obvious Pun! thou hast the grace
Of skeleton clock without a case—
With all its vitals and arrayed
Intestines modestly displayed.

Dear Pun, you're common ground of bliss,
Where fools and I can meet and kiss;
Than thee my wit shall stoop no low'—
No higher theirs did ever soar.

Gratitude is a dog licking the hand of the bread-giver. There may be a few crumbs adhering to the fingers.

Beerstretcher wants the Constitution to "provide" that a man shall support and educate his illegitimate child. His part of it, I suppose, is meant.

A proposed article, section, chapter, stanza, sonnet, or whatever it is, of the Constitution denies the right of suffrage to all who employ Chinese. This is the shortest and sharpest way of dealing with "the Irish vote" that has been suggested.

A LETTER FROM A SUMMER RAMBLER.

There is wailing in the house by the sea, and moaning in the halls thereof; S. crying for her morning dip, and M. weeping for her noon-day bath, and neither will be comforted because they are not! The long, lazy days of July and August and September have drifted away—our summer idyl is ended. No more running down into the sea, between hedges of wild rose and azaleas, crushing with bare feet clover blossoms and sweet fern, and carrying away on our bathing-dresses their perfume to soften the intenser salt-sea scent of the ocean; no more garnering up of lily-pod shields with alternate faces of ruby and emerald, each one uplifting a crest of ivory, rose-tinctured at the heart; no more fingers stained with purple, blue, or red, as we rush along lanes blockaded by tangled vines beaded with myriad-dyed fruitage; no more crabblings in a leaky boat, returning at dusky twilight, crowned with sea-weed, wet and ocean-scented, but, alas! minus the crabs; no more sailing in a yacht, all white from stem to stern, a veritable bride of the waves, shining like a silver galley in a sea of sapphire; no more trips to town in a toy steamer, so low that our hands may feel the cool laps of the water as we hurry along; no more picnicking at the Grove, or junketings on Pirate's Rock, or idolent ramblings on the banks of the Thames, or swinging in a hammock reading a deliciously silly novel, or glancing upward through the green gleam of some dewy-tasseled tree to fix in memory the flamboyant description of an impossible hero or heroine. Ah, me! our gala-days are over, and a red stone marks the final flitting-place of all their vanished joys! Happily for us, we have been spending the summer with friends, and can say nothing of sea-side life from the fashionable view-point. The house in which we lived is of cool gray stone, and looks as if it might have been evolved out of the inner consciousness of the granite foundation from which it seems literally to grow, so lovingly has nature accepted it as her own. Ivy folds green arms about it on one side, while woodbine creeps to the roof on the other; delicately tinted lichens, brilliant fungi, and pretty mosses embroider the surface, the soft gray tint of which throws them up in the daintiest of basso-reliefs. The great ocean, changeless, yet ever changing, chanted its grand psalm unceasingly through the busy day and the still hours of the night. In early morning, we watched the stately ships, and the lovely yachts, and the tiny sail-boats, all flitting along the iridescent splendor of the water like a flash of ivory butterflies; at evening we sat on the rocks that creep out into the sea, and sang or dreamed—while our host touched softly the guitar—through the sunsets, the twilights, and the gloamings, that succeeded each other in the unmatched loveliness of their daily procession. The other night we had an atmospheric miracle. The waves have sculptured that part of the coast over which the gray roof of our friend seems to brood into the perfectest possible semi-circle about a mile and a half in extent. Above the whole expanse of the ocean, as far as the eye could reach, lay a cloud of the richest, deepest carmine. Its peculiarity, after the rare coloring, was the uniform tint and texture throughout. No fainter hues broke the opaque magnificence which hung like a rosy canopy over the water. The pink reflection from above meeting the wine-colored waves made them look as if sheathed in glittering coral, the effect of which was heightened by a tiny strip of azure which the cloud curtain did not cover. The contrast between the rich red and the shining blue was wonderful. It was, doubtless, the most remarkable phenomenon ever seen by those who gazed upon it, awe-struck and entranced by its marvelous loveliness. We have had many delightful visitors from town to enjoy with us our dreamy seaside dolce far niente. Among others William Winter, one of the editors of the Tribune, and author of a volume of dainty poems, which he has baptized "Thistle-down." It is an "airy fairy Lillian" sort of book, rich with the perfumed effervescence peculiar to young poets, and giving rare promise of purple vintages and yellow harvests hereafter. The English critics place him very high, detecting in his writings a racy originality strikingly American. The poems remind me of the mingled music of old George Herbert and wicked, witty Herrick (the wickedness left out, however,) and I can fancy a pretty quarrel between the two (granting Spiritualism and its materialistic control) as to which shall enthrall him. Farjeon spent a day or two with us. He is a frank, whole-souled, cheery Englishman, with slightly-suggested Hebraic features, and a fearless, outspoken expression of countenance, eminently Anglo-Saxon. We used to sit on the rocks during the moonlight nights of June listening to his bright flow of words, with whose indolent monotone the sand-kissing waves kept time. Many a racy anecdote did he relate to us during these moonlight serenades of the noted men and women that he had met. Among these were several of Dickens—whom he knew intimately—that have never been in print, and which I may tell you also some day. He was intending, when we last saw him, to go to San Francisco, in order to meet his celebrated father-in-law, the immortal Rip Van Winkle. I have just arrived at a quaint old New England village, where I used to visit when a girl. It is the Sleepy Hollow of the East. One of the villagers said to me the other day that "fifty years from now the wolves would be howling through its vast forests and tangled shrubbery." There seems to be some strange spell over the place which forces its young people to rush away from it as soon as they can possibly raise the money to do so. And yet its glens, and waterfalls, and mountain peaks, are of rare loveliness. "But the people, ah! the people!" Where I left ebony, gold, and amber, I find grey and silver; for rose-bloom, sallowness; for dimples and peach contours, hollows and wrinkles; for the lithe gracefulness and round forms of youth, bowed backs and trembling limbs. "Oh! oh! oh! oh! oh!" as Charles Read says. But the kindly hearts were fresh and loving as ever, and they had graciously kept green the memory of the absent.

E. O. N. E.

LEVERETT, Mass., October 10.

There are three things that no man can keep—a point on a pencil, a pointed joke, and an appointment with the dentist. There are three things which all men borrow—postage stamps, cigarettes, and car tickets. There are three things no woman can do—cross before a horse, hurry for a horse, and understand the difference between ten minutes and half an hour.

PONY GLASSES OF FRENCH BRANDY.

L'amour est une goutte céleste que les cieux ont versé dans le calice de la vie pour en corriger l'amertume.

— Craignez l'amour, disait Laure à sa fille, c'est un serpent, un monstre, un monstre affreux! L'enfant à quinze ans, et l'enfant gentille, doit redouter ses venies dangereux. Or, si jamais l'enfant furieux, prêt à piquer, se présente à vos yeux, que ferez-vous pour parer son atteinte? Je le fuirai. — Mais il vous poursuivra? — Oh bien! maman, n'ayez aucune crainte, si l'enfant poursuit, Colin me défendra.

Il y a dans nous un obstacle au parfait bonheur. C'est l'ennui des choses que nous possédons, et le désir de celles que nous n'avons pas. — Mme. de Rieux.

L'amour, l'inquiétude et le chagrin cheminent toujours ensemble.

En amour, le hasard est un grand maître. Ayez toujours l'hameçon prêt, et dans l'endroit que vous soupçonnez le moins, vous trouverez du poisson. — Ovide.

Les femmes sont plus heureuses de l'amour qu'elles insistent que de l'amour qu'elles éprouvent. Les hommes sont tout le contraire. — Rocheperdre.

Ce qu'un homme a mérité un an, une femme le reverse en un jour. — Démétrius.

Tant que le cœur garde des desirs, l'esprit garde des illusions. — Chateaubriand.

Quand on songe à tout ce que les femmes apportent de tendresse, de sollicitude, de protection, de grâce, de charme, de bonheur, ou, du moins, de consolation dans la vie de l'homme, on est tenté de ne plus parler aux femmes que tête nue, à deux genoux, le front plongé dans les poussière. — Louis Desnoyers.

— Si vous négligez votre toilette, disait-on à une jeune fille, vous ne vous marierez jamais. — Eh bien! répondit-elle étourdie, je ferai comme ma mère, je resterai fille.

Vous aimerez mon Aspasie,
Si, comme moi, vous pouviez voir
Combien la friponne est jolie,
Sur son sofa, dans son boudoir.
Elle est coquette, elle est volage,
Mais je ne veux pas le savoir;
Quelle est la femme qui soit sage
Sur son sofa, dans son boudoir?

Tous les trésors de la terre ne valent pas le bonheur d'être aimé. — Calderon.

Les amants qui se disputent s'adorent.

On demandait un jour dans une compagnie quelle était la vertu la plus nécessaire aux femmes. Presque, toutes furent d'avis que c'était la chasteté; il n'y en eut qu'une qui répondit: Vous vous trompez, Mesdames, c'est la discrétion. J'ai soixante ans, et j'ai la réputation d'avoir été sage; il n'y a que moi qui sache si cela est.

— Eh quoi! Madame, disait un vieux Céladon à jeune femme, vous serez donc toujours cruelle; pas le plus petit serrement de main! pas la moindre petite faveur! Vous ne me donnerez donc jamais rien? — Moi! Monsieur, mais, pardon, je vous donne soixante ans, et les mois de nourrice.

Un jeune homme se promenant à la campagne avec une jeune dame de sa connaissance lui dit en lui présentant une pomme qu'il venait de cueillir dans un jardin:

Comme Paris, je suis berger;
Comme Vénus, vous êtes belle;
Comme lui, je viens de jurer;
Voulez-vous me payer comme elle?

A un bal masqué, une dame très-décolletée portait un costume aquatique. — Que représentez-vous? lui demanda un invité. — La mer. — Ah! ah! à marée basse, alors?

Pourquoi diable vous mariez-vous? disait un jour le Cardinal de Coislin au vieux Duc de Lesdiguières. — Eh parbleu! comme tout le monde, pour avoir des enfants. — Des enfants! répliqua le cardinal. Ah! Monsieur le duc, votre femme est bien vertueuse!

Ce vêtement noir que portent aujourd'hui les hommes est un symbole terrible. Pour en venir là, il a fallu que les armures tombassent pièce à pièce, et les broderies fleurs à fleurs. C'est la raison humaine qui a renversé toutes les illusions, mais elle porte le deuil afin qu'on la console. — Alfred de Musset.

L'amour est le fils de la pauvreté et du dieu des richesses. De la pauvreté, parce qu'il demande toujours; du dieu des richesses, parce qu'il est libéral. — Platon.

L'amour est l'architecte de l'univers. — Hésiode.

Jadis, on languissait, on brûlait, on mourait d'amour; aujourd'hui, on en parle, on en jase, on le fait, et, le plus souvent, on l'achète. — Jouy.

Quand l'idéal a fui, quand la foi manque à tout,
L'œil au divin parfum, l'amour seul est debout.

L'amour est un malicieux aveugle qui ne cherche qu'à crever les yeux de son guide pour s'égarer tous deux ensemble.

Il est si beau d'aimer et d'être aimé que cet hymne de la vie peut se modular à l'infini sans que le cœur en éprouve de lassitude. — Mme. de Staël.

October 26, 1878.

L. G. J. DE FINOD.

ALL ABOUT WOMEN.

A lone association—An old maid's club.

How to manage a wife—Remain single.

The latest London belle is an Irish lass, and her name is Gibbins.

The famous mare, "Folly," daughter of "Fashion," has had twins.

The world without woman would be a perfect blank—like a sheet of paper, not even ruled.

A child thus defines gossip: "It's when nobody don't do nothing, and somebody goes and tells it."

If a lady runs against you in the street, apologize. She expects it. It is the custom of the country.

There are actresses who are always recognized of that profession when off the stage, but never on.

The divorced wife of a Boston bowling-saloon-keeper is suing to get some alley-money from her former husband.

A young lady in tears said she had just left a bed side. When asked if a friend was ill, replied sweetly: "Oh, no, it was an onion bed."

A tiny thread of gold supporting a solitaire diamond is the latest style of engagement ring. It is so everlastingly sweet, and so easily broken.

Lady—"And how long have you been out of place?" Lady help (indignant at "out of place")—"I have been malapropos only a few weeks, madam."

A woman's back hair has just been turned to a profitable account. A Mrs. Meade, of Muskegon, Michigan, was shot at recently, and the ball lodged in her French twist.

"Why do you use paint?" asked a violinist of his daughter. "For the same reason that you use rosin, papa." "What is that?" "Why, to help me draw my beau."

Vassar College has two Japanese girls, and the Philadelphia Chronicle says it is an affecting sight to see the American girls teaching them how to slide down the "bannisters."

Some girls up in Worcester dosed with sweetened flour a fellow who bored them, and made him think he had taken arsenic. He took an emetic, and they arsenickering about it yet.

A Frenchman has opened a Hymeneal Academy in which young ladies are taught the marriage service, with all the sighs and sobs and hysterics, in three easy lessons. A good scheme.

An exchange says a pretty female lobbyist, when she commences to weep, generally wins a Congressman over to her side. From this it would appear that Congress is partially run by water-power.

It has been discovered that the New England lady who spelled six hundred and fifty words out of the word "congregationalist," has never learned to make a loaf of bread out of yeast and flour.

"Do you mean to say, positively, madam," said a lawyer to a witness, "that the person referred to never left his native village after the day of his marriage?" "I do." "How do you know he never did?" "Because I saw him buried in the village graveyard the same afternoon."

A young lady called at one of our music stores the other day and asked for something new in piano music. The clerk asked her if it made any difference how many sharps there were in the piece. "Oh, no," she replied, "not in the least, for if there is more than two, I always scratch them out with my penknife."

A Peoria man trained his loving wife to get up and build the fire. His wife went away to visit some friends, and the next morning he tried his system of household management on his mother-in-law, and the coroner hung around his bedside for hours, though the doctor assured him there would be no occasion for an inquest.

A barber's apprentice in Hungary cut his throat because a girl would not marry him. He was taken to the hospital at Ratisbon and cured. It subsequently proved that the operation his larynx had undergone had given him a fine tenor voice, which he improved by practice, and he is now singing at the Opera House in Vienna.

A St. Louis young man's chance of marrying an heiress to whom he was engaged was spoiled by the use of his diary as evidence in a lawsuit. The record showed that he frequently called on other girls, that he had been rejected by two of them since his betrothal to her, and that he had borrowed money, to be repaid when he got hold of her purse.

About a century ago, an insurance company at Madrid took the Virgin Mary into formal partnership, covenanting to set aside her portion of the profits for the enrichment of her shrine in the city. Not doubting that she would protect every vessel in which she had so manifest an interest, they underwrote ships of all sorts at such reduced rates that in a few months the parties were all declared bankrupts!

A Palmer, Massachusetts, youth took a minister to the house of his expected bride the other day to have the ceremony performed, but the fickle girl preferred one of the guests to the bridegroom. The guest procured a team to take the girl to ride and think it over. He concluded he was not ready for matrimony and proceeded to get drunk. The girl did not get a husband, the bridegroom did not get a wife, the guest lost his reason in a drunken stupor, and the minister lost his fee.

Mrs. M. is beautiful, rich, and fashionable, but is unable to read. One day, while calling upon her friend, Mrs. B., she perceived a richly bound copy of the Bible, and smilingly inquired if she might take it home and read it. Wondering much, Mrs. B. assented, and one week later the book was returned. "Were you pleased with it?" asked Mrs. B., dryly. The sweet blue eyes of Mrs. M. fairly sparkled with pleasure. "Oh, my dear friend, it is a charming novel. They got married at last!"

INTAGLIOS.

The Death of the White Heron.

I pulled my boat with even sweep
Across light shoals and eddies deep,
Tracking the currents of the lake
From lettuce raft to weedy brake.
Across a pool, death-still and dim,
I saw a monster reptile swim.
And caught, far off and quickly gone,
The delicate outlines of a fawn.
Above the marshy islands flew
The green teal and the swift curlew.
The rail and dunlin drew the herd
Of fly-bonnets over their heads.
I saw the tufted wood-duck pass
Between the clumps of water-grass.
All round the gunwales and across
I draped my boat with Spanish moss,
And, lightly drawn from head to knee,
I hung gay air-plants over me.
Then, lurking like a savage thing,
That meditates a treacherous spring,
I stood in motionless suspense
Among the rushes green and dense.
I kept my bow half drawn, a shaft
Set straight across the velvet bait.
Alert and vigilant I stood,
Scanning the lake, the silver mud.
I heard a murmur soft and sad
From water-weed to lily-pad,
And from the frondous pines did ring
The hammer of the golden-wing.
On old drift-logs the bitterns stood,
Dreaming above the silver flood,
The water-turkey eyed my boat,
The hideous snake-bird coiled its throat,
And birds whose plumage shone like flame—
Wild things grown suddenly, strangely tame—
Lit near me; but I heeded not,
They could not tempt me to a shot.
Grown tired at length, I bent my oars
By grassy brinks and shady shores,
Through labyrinths and mysteries,
Mid dusky cypress stems and knees,
Until I reached a spot I knew
Over which each day the herons flew.
I heard a whisper sweet and keen
Flow through the fringe of rushes green
(The water saying some light thing,
The rushes gayly answering).
The wind drew faintly to the south,
Like breath blown from a sleeper's mouth,
And down its currents sailing low
Came a lone heron white as snow.
He dived with grandly spreading wing
The hazy sunshine of the spring;
Through graceful curves he swept above
The gloomy moss-hung cypress-grove;
Then gliding down a long incline,
He flashed his golden eyes on mine,
Half-turned, he poised himself in air.
The prize was great, the moment fair;
I raised my bow and steadily drew
The silken string, until I knew
My trusty arrow's barbed point
Lay on my left fore-finger-point—
Until I felt the feather seek
My ear, swift drawn across my cheek;
Then from my fingers leapt the string
With sharp recoil and deadly ring,
Closed by a sibillant sound so shrill
It made the very water thrill;
Like twenty serpents bound together
Hissed the flying arrow's feather!
A thud, a puff, a feather, ring,
A quick collapse, a quivering—
A whirl, a headlong, downward dash,
A heavy fall, a sullen plash,
And like white foam, or giant flake
Of snow, he lay upon the lake!
And of his death the rail was glad,
Strutting upon the lily-pad.
The jaunty wood-duck smiled and bowed,
The belted kingfisher laughed aloud,
Making the solemn bittern stir
Like a half-wakened slumberer;
And rapping notes of joy I heard
From gallinule and crying bird,
The while with treble note did ring
The hammer of the golden-wing.

MAURICE THOMPSON, in his Witchery of Archery.

Good-Bye.

The deepest snows can melt away;
Dark clouds can dim the sunniest day;
Both stranger things than this, that I
Can say good-bye.

The broadest streams can dry in drought,
The clearest faith give room to doubt;
The rule holds everywhere—don't cry;
What's in "Good-bye!"

Our bond was not so firm or strong—
A silken feather snap and
A passing fancy fledged to fly
With brief good-bye.

To call such love puts Love to shame;
Let who will lightly speak his name,
We cannot, even when death draws nigh,
Bid Love good-bye.

Though casual clouds obscure the sky,
Fortuitous streams at length run dry,
Heedless we mark nor question why—
Kiss and good-bye.

Ah, dear, if all our loves like this
Could end in one half-careless kiss,
One touch of bands, no after-sigh,
One brief "Good-bye!"

Then would the marks of what hath been
Be wholly done away, I ween;
When years and distance should let die
That knell "Good-bye."

Well, well—the worst I wish you now
Is this, that those you make to bow
May not all come to say, as I,
"My dear, good-bye." JOHN MORAN.

Thy Duty.

If thou canst speak one little word
To cheer thy brother on his way,
Then fearless let thy voice be heard,
Perchance 'twill change his night to day.

If thou canst lend a helping hand
To aid his footsteps up the steep,
Then fail thou not, thy angel-band
Will give thee strength, and nearer keep.

If thou canst give one ray of hope
To him, when sinking in despair,
Perchance 'twill prove a saving rope;
Fail not to do thy duty there.

If thou canst do a kindly deed,
Fail not to act the helper's part;
No matter what thy brother's creed,
He'll feel thy kindness in his heart.

If thou canst lift a fallen one,
Who journeys on in paths of sin,
Be sure in this thy duty's done,
Though thou do earthly crown may win.

If thou thyself grow faint and weak,
And long for rest and earthly love,
List thou to words the angels speak:
"Thy rest shall be with us above."

HORACE M. RICHARDS.

HOW TO FURNISH A HOME.

Every toiling, energetic business man some time in the future expects a home with all the modern comforts and conveniences that money can procure. The nearer the time approaches adds to his pleasure in anticipation. Success he wants in business—for what? That he may some time be surrounded not only with the comforts, but the luxury of a home in the true sense of the word. The house he shall buy may be a brown stone, or marble palace, constructed with all the beauty and grandeur of modern architecture; fitted it may be in royal splendor. Every room must have gas and water, with all the conveniences that modern civilization presents. He goes naturally to a first-class establishment to procure gas fixtures combining utility with elegance. He must have chandeliers, drop-lights, etc., for hall, parlors, salon, bedrooms, etc., not forgetting the hot and cold water bath, which must be located in the most convenient spot for comfort and true luxury, possibly near the family bed-room. He wants the latest improvements in these important home comforts. For hall and stairway niches the neatest modern designs are bronze statuary of Perseus and other mythological characters; also statuary representing styles in dress of the middle ages, making, in their picturesque attire, beautiful and rich ornaments, at the same time performing their offices as necessary articles of household furniture. In chandeliers, instead of the bronze, which still seems to be in favor, we have gold and silver-plated designs, ornamented with cut-glass. For wall fixtures, silver again prevails in all the newest designs, also polished brass and bronze. Elegance seems to be sought after in this department as well as utility. Drop-lights, in rich and rare designs of animals, miniature statuary, in silver, gold, and bronze, add much to the comfort and beauty of each room. At the establishment of Bush & Scudder, 22 Post Street, we found all the latest designs, novelties, etc., in this department.

With Carpets and Furniture.

Every man has his ideal of a home, and in fitting up his new domicile his taste will be displayed in the selection of carpets and furniture. A well-furnished home means comfort, combined with beauty and utility. In making his choice in carpeting, he will find that the French Moquettes have assumed complete sway in this department. The latest designs in this beautiful production of the French looms are all in soft colors, combining by their delicate figures upon a light background that poetry in sentiment for which the French novelties are so celebrated. In selecting rugs, Turkish, Persian and Indian patterns, with their rich modern and antique designs and contrast in color, will add to the air of elegance and comfort presented by the light and almost ethereal tints of the moquette. In satin draperies the favorites now being used are blue and rose colors. Brocades for the library are mostly in solid colors, green and gold, and crimson and gold. Lace and Nottingham curtains are used sparingly in parlors, but mostly in bed-room trimmings. In furniture will be found true luxury, the frames being hid beneath their elegant cushions, which are covered with raw silks, satins and tapestries of Persian and Turkish patterns, with puffings and trimmings contrasting in color. The fashionable tints are light blue, gray, cardinal and green, corresponding with the carpets. The patterns in coverings for furniture are marvelous in their execution and beauty. Luxury in easy chairs are to be found in the French patent rockers, conversational, Hindoo, and scroll back chairs—durability being an element not forgotten, thereby doing away with furniture of that fragile nature so profitable to furniture dealers. The soft, yielding cushion upon solid frames, involuntarily bring upon one a delightful feeling of perfect ease and comfort. In lounges, the same perfect harmony in utility, comfort, and luxury are found. Truly may we say the American people have attained to true luxury, combining American and English durability with the comforts of luxurious Turkey and contented Persia, and the abandon of French luxuriousness. In bedding, the spiral and later improvements in spring mattresses have entirely superseded every other form of bed—downy couches being one of the things of the past. We are indebted to the firm of J. W. Burnham & Co., carpet and furniture dealers, 15 to 17 Post and 618 Market Streets, for the above information, and where we found all the latest luxuries in this department.

With Paintings, Engravings, Etc.

No home is worthy of the name without the necessary wall ornaments in paintings and steel engravings. Where one can afford it the works of the great masters are the most desirable, and in their absence steel engravings in elegant frames should not be overlooked. Chromos are indeed excellent copies, but the true works of art are from the painters' brush or engravers' handwork on steel. We observed a rich oil painting from the hands of William N. Harriet, representing a worn copy of the works of Shakespeare, bound in calf—the rough, furry appearance of the binding being startling in imitation. On the volume rests a written letter, inkstand, and pen, while on the left lies a pile of gold notes and gold and silver coin—the representation being as near perfection as the hand of art can produce. This gem of art can be seen at the establishment of A. Currier, 103 Dupont Street, recently removed from 225 Kearny Street. We observed here also some fine steel engravings and other oil paintings. For mantel ornaments we noticed also a fine assortment in gold-gilt portrait and picture frames; also, richly carved Swiss frames in orange wood, fine fire-gilt embossed frames with opening doors, paintings on porcelain, photographs of all the statesmen, orators, writers, and poets of Europe found in the Dresden gallery, of which these are copies.

The Sewing Machine.

Next comes the sewing machine without which no household is complete. For information relative to this really indispensable article of household furniture we called at the general agency for the Pacific Coast of the Singer Manufacturing Company (the leading sewing machine manufacturers of the world) at No. 118 Sutter Street, where we were shown a full line of these new family sewing machines in various styles of cabinet work and ornamentation, and at prices ranging from forty to one hundred and sixty dollars. The only difference between the cheapest and the most costly machine is in the cabinet work and ornamentation, the mechanical parts being made exactly alike, and the cheapest machine will do the finest work as well as the most elaborately ornamented sewing machine.

The Cutlery Department.

In the cutlery line some of the newest designs are silver-plated knives and forks with pearl and ivory handles. Carving knives and forks in steel, of the most perfect make, plated with silver, have assumed new designs in the shape of the handle made of solid ivory, plain and carved; also, carving knife, fork, and steel, with handles made of deer's horn, carved in new and elegant designs combining beauty and perfection—some of the latest with deer's horn handles being tipped with silver, and carved into the most fantastic and elegant patterns. We noticed also in this department a novel invention termed the skewer-puller, silver-plated, with elegant ivory handle; also, some neat designs in silver-plated cheese scoopers, lemon-squeezers in ebony and rosewood with rich ornaments in silver, and cork screws with pure ivory handles. In plated ware we note the shell design for cake basket, and castors plain as well as neatly carved in solid and plated silver. The novelties in napkin rings are almost endless. The half-egg-shaped ring with carvings seem to be the latest. Ladies work cases, containing dainty scissors, thimble, etc., have apparently reached perfection. The firm of Will & Finck, 768 Market Street, representing this department, received the highest premium at the Mechanics' Fair, and also at the Centennial Exposition at Philadelphia, against numerous competitors in their specialties in cutlery. Their workmanship, therefore, stands unrivaled; and, in furnishing a house, it is but justice to state that purchasers should call at this establishment where they may see and purchase all the novelties in this department that will stand the wear and tear of housekeeping. For holidays some new specialties will be seen at this establishment.

The Piano.

In this age of culture and refinement one of the necessary pieces of furniture is the piano. While there are numerous cheap pianos in the market it behooves one in selecting to obtain at least one of the best, possessing, above all other qualities, that of durability. Depth and richness in tone being valuable qualities, still another more important quality must be taken into consideration. The climate of California puts to the severest test the materials used in the construction of furniture, and more especially that of pianos. The delicate mechanism of pianos requires the most diligent care in their construction. The wood must be perfectly seasoned, or the changes of temperature will soon render this one of the most desirable of home comforts valueless. The first quality of English steel wire, ivory, felting, veneers, and perfectly-seasoned woods must be used. The great reputation of the Chickering Pianos is a guarantee of its possession of the qualities above mentioned. The purchase of a piano is usually a lifetime investment, therefore great care should be exercised in the selection. Of all nuisances that deprive sensitive people of home happiness, a rickety, untuned piano is the most exasperating. Let beauty, elegance, grandeur of tone preside over the music of the piano, and true enjoyment follows its introduction into the household. Economy is a very valuable goddess to preside over a home, and economy certainly dictates to the common sense of every piano purchaser to obtain the best at the lowest rates attainable. Music renders life happy when sentiment, delicacy, and refinement swell upon the sacred atmosphere of the home. We are indebted to L. K. Hammer, agent for the Chickering Piano, 81 Post Street, for the above valuable information, and freely give it to the readers of the ARGONAUT. At this establishment the best grade of the Chickering Piano may be obtained, possessing the above qualities, at great reduction in prices.

According to M. Emile de Laveleye, a distinguished Belgian economist, the precious metals are getting scarce, or are no longer in the same ratio to the commerce of the world. The consequence, he thinks, will be a general fall in prices, and a consequent advance in the purchasing power of money. The two metals now increase annually but 850,000,000 of francs, while some years ago they increased over a milliard. M. Laveleye places the industrial consumption of the metals at 230,000,000 of francs, the annual wear of coin at 250,000,000, and the sum annually required to settle the balance of trade with the East at 250,000,000; making in all a total annual loss of 780,000,000 of francs, leaving only 70,000,000 of francs for the increase of trade and population. These figures have, however, been vigorously disputed, but even if correct, the writer has left out of account the numerous substitutes for coin, and the probability that Brazil, Peru, Central Asia, Siberia, and Central Africa contain grand reserves of precious metals.

What was it that Thaddeus of Warsaw?—Cincinnati Saturday Night. What kind of grub was it that Henry VIII.?—Wheeling Leader. What did Darwin?—Kennebunk Star. Whom did Gladstone?—Bellair Phonograph. What did Count Schowloff?—Burlington Hawkseye. Which is Beaconsfield?—New York Star. How did Admiral Popoff?—New York Era. What did Oliver Twist? What did Harriet B. Stowe? How did Henry Ward Beecher? Where did Marion Harland? In whose back yard does Professor David Swing? What does Joseph Cook? What made Mark Twain? What has become of England's great Cole-ridge? Does any one really believe that Robert Burns? What does Whitlaw Reid? Who drinks Fitz-John Porter? Would Smith E-Jy? What will U. S. Grant? Who knows how much Rutherford B. Hayes? Does William M. Evans? Two or three hundred more crowded out for lack of room.

A romantic story is being told of one of the members of Gilmore's Band, which has just returned from Europe. While they were in Berlin, and at one of their most crowded concerts, a lady screamed, "It is he," and fainted. A German Countess, of great wealth and social distinction, had recognized her long absent son as a member of the American orchestra, whom she supposed to be dead. He had spent a fortune in dissipation, and as a last resort made his musical culture available, no one among his conferees suspecting his rank and former position. Too proud to write of his position to his family, they had given up the hope of hearing from him again. The band were playing "The Invitation to Dance" when this little scene occurred, and very soon papa—the Count (the name is not given)—led the wanderer to his mother and sister, who embraced him with emotional fondness and exclamations of joy. It is said that Gilmore has lost one of his cleverest musicians by this recognition.

In the town where homes are darkest and coldest at eventide, saloons are warmest and brightest.

NEW

BOOKS

A Manual of the Mechanics of Engineering and of the Construction of Machines. By Weisbach and Du Bois. Vol. 11 (Heat, Steam, and Steam Engines) now ready. 8vo. $6 00
Art and Art Industries in Japan. By Sir Rutherford Alcock, K.C.B., D.L.C. 8vo. 6 00
The History of Indian Literature. By Albrecht Weber. Translated from the second German edition John Mann, M.A., and Theodor Zacharias, Ph.D. 8vo. $5 00
Johnson's Chief Lives of the Poets, and Macaulay's Life of Johnson. With a Preface by Mathew Arnold. 8vo. 2 00
The Bible of To-day. A Course of Lectures by John W. Chadwick. 8vo. 1 50
The House of the Future. By Geo. C. Mason. 8vo. 1 50
Old-Plans for Everybody. By S. B. Reed. 12mo. 1 50
Talks on Manures. By Joseph Harris. 12mo. 1 50
Young Folk's History of Germany. By Charlotte M. Yonge. 12mo. 1 50
The Europeans. By Henry James, Jr. 12mo. 1 50
Prince Bismarck's Letters to his Wife, his Sister, and Others, from 1844 to 1870. Translated from the German by Fitzh. Maxse. 12mo. 1 25
Cupid and the Sphinx. By Harford Fleming. 12mo. 1 25
American Colleges: Their Students and Work. By Chas. F. Thwing. 12mo. 1 00
Grammar-Land, or Grammar in Fun for the Children of Schoolroom. By M. L. Nesbitt. 12mo. 1 25
Tecumseh and the Shawnee Prophet. By Edward Eggleston and Lillie Eggleston Seeley. 12mo. 1 25
The Family Library of British Poetry, from Chaucer to the Present Time (1350-1873). Edited by James F. Field and Edwin P. Whipple. Large 8vo. 6 50
Tritons. Anovel. By Edwin Lassetter Byrner. 12mo. 1 25
A Woman's Mistake; or Jacques De Trevannes. Translated by Mary Neal Sherwood from the French of Madame Angèle Dussaud. 12mo. 1 00
The Little Good-for-Nothing, from the French of Alphonse Daudet. 12mo. 1 50

BANCROFT'S
721 MARKET ST. S.F.

FALK'S
MILWAUKEE BEER

If you are going overland, or on a picnic, or making a trip by steamboat or steamer, or visiting in the country, let us suggest that you take with you some of this celebrated Beer. It is the very best for these trips.

For sale by all dealers.

CUTTING & MURRAY,
Sole Agents, 206 Front Street, S. F.

KURRACHEE RUGS!

ASK FOR THEM IN THE LEADING Carpet Stores. Manufactured by WAKEFIELD RATTAN CO.,
38 Geary Street.

BUTTERICK'S
PATTERNS-NOV. STYLES.

Send stamp for catalogue. AGENCY, 124 POST ST.,
SAN FRANCISCO.

HEALD'S BUSINESS
COLLEGE,
No. 24 Post Street,
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

Opposite Mechanics' Institute.
IMPARTS A THOROUGH PRACTICAL Education in all Commercial and English Branches, French, German, Spanish, Drawing, and Telegraphy. This school having greater facilities, and enjoying a more extensive patronage than any similar institution on the Pacific coast, continues to base its claims for recognition and patronage upon the good sense and enlightened judgment of the public.

LIST OF FACULTY.
E. P. Heald, F. C. Woodbury,
H. M. Stearns, A. F. Capp,
Mrs. C. Woodbury, R. Southern,
J. A. Chesnutwood, Mrs. W. J. Hamilton,
A. P. Duffiel, F. Sereni,
R. Sorcini, Geo. Jebens,
Lloyd Baldwin, A. Vander Nallden.
For full particulars, call at the College, 24 Post Street,
or address E. P. HEALD,
President Business College, San Francisco.

RETURNED.

HAVING RETURNED FROM THE East, I respectfully announce to my friends and the public that I shall resume practice on WEDNESDAY, Sept. 5th, 1878.

S. W. DENNIS, M. D., DENTIST,
No. 33 KEARNY STREET.

R. C. MOWBRAY, M. D., DENTIST
224 STOCKTON ST., corner Post, S. F.

INTERCEPTED LETTERS.

SAN FRANCISCO, October 30, 1878.

MY DEAR MADON—Have you not sometimes wondered whether there is not a species of Yankee vendetta between the Longfellow and Rice families, which will account for this second attack on the great poet. Some malignant being once observed, "Oh, that mine enemy would write a book," but to burlesque the book after it has been written is a greater refinement of malice. Fortunately, the wit of the Rice libretto is of so peculiarly mild a type that it has not succeeded in making either Faustine or Hawatha less beautiful, and the reader of the poems will be quite unaffected by the literary sacrilege of the Boston composer. However, I make no doubt his intentions were honorable, and tended rather to the amusement of the public and to repelling the Rice exchequer, than to any design whatever upon the poet of America. I must confess Mr. Rice has a pretty musical taste. Some of the numbers of Faustine were charming, though lost in that vast blue and white opera expansion; and Hawatha, though less ambitious, is a continuation in the same groove. Indeed, every man nowadays travels in but one groove. The rice has so multiplied that ideas are like boarding-house pie—they go around only once. It is easy to tell which chords are most melodious to the Rice ear, for they occur too frequently to be mistaken. The choicest notes of "Sweet the song of birds in spring time" echo in the chorus of a very extraordinary duet between Mr. and Mrs. "Lo," and twenty familiar strains, bring the luckless Faustine troupe back to memory. I admire Mr. Rice as a plagiarist. His boldness challenges admiration; for who else would have dared to place the first strains of the old time melody of "Jennie who lives in the Dell" under so transparent a disguise as "Into the Water we Go" while a dozen other Boucicaltan eccentricities cast one into a haze of perplexity with trying to recall the original air out of which the new was manufactured. Hawatha is not so bad as Faustine in this matter, but then Hawatha is not so good as Faustine in any other. I like the troupe much better. Miss Webster was a shapely little woman, but couldn't sing, and the remainder of the ladies were not worth mentioning. Alice Harrison is an infinitely better actress, and can sing some; although, as a prima donna, her style is unique. Poor little Alice! People wondered the first night what was the matter, and feared that it was a bad case of Boston refinement, but it turned out to be a bad cold instead; and she was obliged temporarily to withdraw from the east, so that we shall not yet be able to know what transformation Boston has wrought. It has left Mr. Metayer quite unchanged. I do not remember ever before to have seen this individual in a part which measured him so accurately. He is really rather a clever burlesque actor since, in his new province, he finds full play for the peculiar qualities of his acting, with which you are too painfully familiar to make it necessary for me to recapitulate them. I assure you, Madge, that I sit better upon "Lo," the poor Indian, than upon the legitimate characters over which you used to groan. I may remark of him, that Boston or any other degree of refinement and he do not seem to have encountered each other upon the trip. There is one really delightful singer in the troupe in the person of a Miss Louise Searle, whose name, I am quite sure, I have seen among some of the English opera companies in the East. She is quite pretty, in a characterless way, and in pink silk and spangles reminds me of a French doll sitting open-eyed in a toy window at Christmas time. She has no natural vivacity, no chic. In fact, she reminds me, as many women on the stage do, of a neat home-made garment. There is nothing of the striking, of the bizarre, which footlight people cultivate so actively. But there is a fresh ring to her voice which makes one love to hear her, and her musical abilities are far beyond the ordinary standard of a burlesque troupe. Also, she has a gentle and most transparent desire to please, which recommended her at once, and she was already a favorite when the curtain fell upon the first act of the incomparable dullness of Hawatha, for Hawatha there is no disputing, is dull. I do not think it would be possible to brighten it up much, even if the troupe had not been fresh from the rigors of a disagreeable trip, delayed arrival, and an insupportable climate. Its puns are feeble and stale, and its situations are not amusing, although the author has introduced the play within the play, which latterly has grown to be a specialty in dramatic writing. I think Mr. Rice must agree with Owen Meredith, that "old things are best," for he utilizes yet once again the pastels of dumb-bells and weights, and the wooden horse which have become standing properties in a man-of-war troupe. I do not think a patient public would have endured the revival of them, but that Willie Edouin was master of ceremonies. He was cast for "William Penn" in that vague classic way peculiar to burlesques, and perpetrated a series of lightning changes from Quaker to athlete. It is not a part adapted to show Willie Edouin at his best, but he shows himself to be a thorough artist. We are to have him as "Min Friday" next week, in which he made a hit in London, and then I will tell you more about him. I am quite taken with his wife, Alice Atherton, who, as "Mrs. Lo," has a most ungraceful part for a pretty woman. I know she is pretty, for she did her best to make herself ugly, and did not quite succeed. I fancy that originally she must have been a very time-burlesque actress, for she has borrowed a leaf from the book of her lord and master. She manages to hit off the stolidity of the Indian squaw in a very amusing and thoroughly life-like way, and accomplished a very amusing duet with "Mr. Lo," although she has the merest skeleton of a voice. Prof's skeletons, or rather skeleton voices, I must tell you of a tiny midget called as Ella Chapman, who has all the prettiness of Belle, with a life to make her interesting. She sings a little song, and dances a little dance, and plays a little baby banjo, and has a wee little voice, and is altogether such a little creature that one feels rather as if they are looking on an infant prodigy than the burlesque actress of the period. I admired her sublime effrontery in singing with such a voice, and there is really a fascination in watching her spidery motions in the dance. These people are generally so awfully solid. The Standard presented a very creditable appearance at its opening. The place had been brightened up wonderfully, and the little stage showed some excellent scenery and decorations from the brush of artist Strauss. The wood scene was particularly good, and the curtain an unquestionably needed novelty. What a merry time of it they are having at the downtown theatres. I believe they have unwisely concluded to withdraw Faustine after this week, and Hawatha is to be replaced by Robinson Crusoe, which, I imagine, will be a change for the better. At the Bush Street Theatre the delightful music of The Little Duke is becoming more popular every day. "Poor little man" is all the rage, and so is the midget which gives dignity to the whole opera, and which Mrs. Oates dances in a manner not one bit like a grand seigneur, but in a style of her own, which is very pretty nevertheless. Prof Positive up at Baldwin's appears all the gloomier, perhaps, by contrast with all this merry-making down town. They are very luxurious up there lately, and poor Rose Wood threatens to become a victim of melancholia if they keep her in this line of business much longer. I sometimes wonder why Rose Wood is not a great actress. I have seen her at odd moments when she was worthy a niche in highest places. She is very touching in some lines in Prof Positive, but a certain softness and magnetism are lacking which we sometimes find in successful actresses of lesser talent. Prof Positive is one of those harrowing plays in which every one is a grand scoundrel except the suffering heroine. She goes through all stages of suffering on account of the machinations of one "Mark Langley," melodiously termed a "tooter" by Mr. Galloway in one of the eccentricities of a very laborious style of speaker. Mr. Herne plays "Mark Langley," and looks more like a butcher boy in his Sunday clothes than a tutor, but acts nobly. He is the discarded lover of the heroine, and you know how long it takes lovers in plays to get over anything of that sort. The misery which the hapless lady is made to undergo is something dreadful. A letter which she writes for a friend is misconstrued, she is suspected of infidelity to her husband, who fires her out—this literally, not slangily. Shooting at his false friend he manages in some way to shoot her eyesight. She wanders forth, her child is stolen from her, she is generally very hard up, and the villain still pursues her. The gates of a lock are left open, she tumbles into the water—a realistic splash is here introduced—and is rescued by her husband, who opportunely returns from Australia for this situation. She has an operation performed on her eyes, and while they are still bandaged she wanders into a drawing-room, stumbles over a dead body, picks up the pistol—just like a woman—and, being found with it, is accused by the "tooter" of murder. By this time the agony was piled so heavily that I could endure no more. I left bathed in tears. The tutor was one of a gang of counterfeiters of which one "Abrams" was the leader. Mr. O'Neill plays "Abrams"—an entirely new departure for him. Some people are unkind enough to say he does not play it well, but I entirely disagree with the grumblers on this occasion, and consider it a remarkably good piece of acting. He sinks his identity completely, has a new voice, a new gait, a new appearance, and all of them minutely well adapted to the character which he assumes. If it were word study—which it certainly is not—I fancy he could make a genuine hit as a character actor. Strange that this budding tragedian, by what seemed at first sight a big stroke of luck, his engagement at the Union Square, has gradually descended from "Iago," "Romeo," and company, through the intermediate swallow-tail coat stage to the personation of an "Abrams." I have a fancy that he and Lewis Morrison changed parts for an experiment. If so, the result has been better for O'Neill than for Morrison, for while there is really no fault to find with the latter his part does not fit him like a glove. "I got a heye like a heagle" has become one of the favorite embellishments in conversation on the street. Gags are odious things, but I must do Mr. O'Neill the justice to say that he managed his gag with good taste, if such a thing be possible, and did not thrust his heagle heye upon the patient listeners to Positive Proof with that nauseating pertinacity which is usually peculiar to a gag part. We are to have Clara Morris next week in Miss Multon. I trust she has forgotten her morphine pill box. I had the Morris mania very badly at one stage, and would to-day prefer Clara Morris in Camille to any actress on the stage, not accepting Modjeska. But there is nothing exhilarating in looking at an actress whose health is so precarious that it is problematical in each scene whether or not she appears in the next. The sensational bulletins of her health which the Eastern papers continued to issue from time to time have injured her to some extent. One can not help looking at her as a house of cards which, under a rude breath, would tatter to destruction. However, it is a magnificent genius which is enshrined in so frail a casket, and I am quite longing to see again that broad characteristic brow and those earnest eyes. Jack has laid aside one of his biggest handkerchiefs for me to carry the first night, as he insists that it is perfectly absurd for me to take home a pocketful of the little damp mops, which lasted two minutes by the watch when the fair Clara began to make me miserable. I can not say how she affects him, but I have observed that a great many gentlemen prudently retreat to the doors and blink at her through their opera glasses when the charm begins to work. After all, a theatre cry over a sham woe is very refreshing. I shall let you know what havoc Miss Multon's troubles create. Till then adieu.

Yours lovingly,

BETSY B.

Another of those fine sacred concerts, which have afforded so much pleasure and satisfaction to lovers of church music, will take place at the Unitarian Church (Dr. Stebbins') to-morrow (Sunday evening). The proceeds are for the charitable purposes of the "Society for Christian Work"—a society which for the past five years has quietly accomplished much good, its various committees dividing their work most judiciously in caring for the poor and needy, teaching poor children to sew, and in distributing among hospitals, almshouses, and jails reading matter, and other sources of comfort and pleasant occupation. It will undoubtedly receive as liberal a patronage as the concert a year ago, when Miss Cary so generously volunteered her services.

Where can one thoroughly enjoy a swim? At the Terrace Baths, Alameda.

HOW TO FURNISH A HOME.

[CONTINUED FROM ELEVENTH PAGE.]

With Crockery, Glass Ware, Etc.

Although the average American rarely takes time enough to note what he is eating, or from where it comes, yet, overlooking this weakness, we would call the attention of those who desire the comforts of a home to the culinary department. Depression in stocks often affects the stomach, especially if carelessness in not supplying the kitchen with all the latest improvements for culinary purposes has brought on a dyspeptic tendency. We called upon a first-class firm for information on the above subject, and submit to our readers the following: Supposing that one of the latest improvements in ranges had been provided, we found all the necessary additional outfit for this department, in tin and wood ware, trays, etc., at the establishment hereinafter named; also the celebrated horizontal ice cream freezer and Jewett's refrigerator, without which no home can be said to be completely furnished. For the dining-room we observed the following among the substantial and latest: Among the decorated ware of English manufacture the old willow tree pattern still finds its place in this department, at prices ranging from $35 and upward. When one desires to obtain something more expensive, a very tasty and entirely new ware, called the ivory-ware from its peculiar color, will be found to add to the elegance that should preside over the appointments of dining-room. Another and later design from the establishment of Wedgewood, called the "Banquet" set, neatly decorated with representations of the preparations of the various dishes. Each piece has its appropriate decoration, and is attracting much attention. In glass ware we observed a number of engraved patterns at the establishment of B. Nathan & Co., importers of French china, crockery, glassware, etc., 130 Sutter Street, of this city, where we also found all the above mentioned wares. At this establishment we were informed, by Mr. Dohrmann, that this firm also make a specialty in matching broken sets in glassware, for which purpose they have in their employ one of the best Bohemian artists. Initials, monograms, and various designs are here engraved to order, all of the designs of this establishment. The novelty in glassware has appeared in the rediscovery of one of the lost arts—that of tinting glassware with the colors of the rainbow. The ware subjected to this peculiar process is called the "iridescent." Specimens of this ware collected as antique may be found in the British and Continental museums, where it is highly prized, being a relic of the lost arts. It is only about a year since the rediscovery of the process of its manufacture. As usual the above enterprising firm of this city obtained and introduced this beautiful ware upon this coast. Their first consignment was on hand but a few days when the whole was immediately sold. They at once ordered a new supply, which will be found at their establishment in a short time. For the parlor we found a large assortment of clocks of the latest and neatest designs, with all the improvements in Swiss, English, and American make, at prices within the reach of every one. We also noticed some beautiful bronzes in imitation of the noblest works of art in sculpture. Grouping and single in statuary, for mantle, bracket, and table, we found here in elegant castings. For the bed-room we noted some very neat and elegant cologne sets, jewel boxes, and folding mirrors. For the bath-room we observed quite a novelty in hanging soap dishes. For the garden, the majolica, iron garden vases, and garden seats, with which every garden is supposed to be furnished; and for luxury, in the midst of the flower beds, shrubbery, and trees, should be interspersed statuary and fountains. Of these specimens of American garden luxuries we found some neat and appropriate designs at this establishment.

Genuine Enterprise.

We have watched for some years now, and with great interest, the various business enterprises of San Francisco, seeing many of those which are to-day the leading firms come up, through changes of location and gradual extension of their stock, from modest beginnings to their present positions, and it is with no little pride that we sum up so large a number as the outgrowth of our brief civic existence. But a still more signal evidence of our business enterprise, as a city, is to be found in the launching of new firms on a scale fully equal to that which many others have only just reached through years of effort. A case in point is the firm of O'Connor, Moffatt & Co., which will throw open a large and varied stock of dry and fancy goods during the coming week, at their new premises, Nos. 111, 113 and 115 Post Street. This is the first instance in this city, we believe, of a new firm of the magnitude of this one beginning business in an entirely new building, and with a completely new stock. The building itself is a very handsome one outside, commodious and cheerful, having a frontage of fifty feet on Post Street, and running through to Morton street, a depth of 122½ feet more. It stands on the site lately occupied by the Morton House, and is one of the most convenient locations in the city, while its entire appearance architecturally is all that can be desired in the way of solidity as well as elegance of design. The interior is handsomely fitted up with counters of highly polished walnut, extending the full depth of the store on either side, and a double row down the centre. A fine large skylight occupies the middle of the ceiling, and reflects abundance of sunlight, while for illuminating purposes after dark there are a dozen or more elegant chandeliers down each aisle, whose brilliant mountings form a pleasing contrast to the darker surroundings. Of the business qualifications of the members of the firm it is hardly necessary for us to speak, long acquaintance with the public having made their names household words in San Francisco. Few, if any, mercantile ventures have ever been embarked in on this coast with the prestige that attaches itself to this one, or that can be said to have so surely secured certain and immediate success from the very outset. Of the stock, which has been selected by Mr. O'Connor in person at the East, and through their importing agents in Europe, it is our intention to speak later and in detail; meanwhile, our sincerest good wishes are tendered to Messrs. O'Connor, Moffatt & Co., for their increased and continued success. Monday next is named as the opening day at this establishment, and we hope to see the ladies out in full force to welcome the new firm.

Ladies, why don't you get your riding habits made at Burr & Fink's, corner Post and Montgomery Streets, over Hibernia Bank?

Currier, 703 Dupont Street, makes the finest PICTURE FRAMES.

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER.
F. LYSTER.....ACTING MANAGER.
G. R. CHIPMAN.....TREASURER.

This (Saturday) afternoon and evening, and Sunday evening, last performances of the most powerful and realistic drama of the day,

PROOF POSITIVE.

Monday evening, Nov. 4, first appearance of the greatest actress of the day,

CLARA MORRIS,

In her great original impersonation of

MISS MULTON.

Saturday evening, Nov. 4—

A DAY AFTER THE WEDDING.

Miss Clara Morris as Lady Rivers.

STANDARD THEATRE.

Bush Street, between Montgomery and Kearny.

LESSEE AND MANAGER.....M. A. KENNEDY.
BUSINESS MANAGER.....P. H. KIRBY.

Still the reigning novelty,

RICE'S SURPRISE PARTY.

This (Saturday) afternoon and evening and Sunday evening,

HIAWATHA.

Monday, November 4, first time in this city, our own version of the delightful English burlesque,

ROBINSON CRUSOE, ESQUIRE.

With three members of the original cast as produced two years ago in London. Alice Atherton as Robinson Crusoe, Willie Edouin in his original character, Man Friday; Miss Louise Searles as Polly; Miss Ella Chapman as Jelly; W. A. Metayer as Jim Cox; Mr. Louis Harrison as Atkins; Mr. H. E. Dixey as Whaddysey.

In preparation, and will be produced at an early date, the charming burlesque,

BABES IN THE WOOD.

Box Office now open, where plan of theatre can be seen and seats secured six days in advance.

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LOCKE.....PROPRIETOR.

MONDAY EVENING.....NOV. 4

And most positively last week but one of the

OATES COMIC OPERA COMPANY.

First time in America, in English, of the sparkling Opera,

LA MARJOLAINE.

By Charles Lecocq, author of Le Petit Duc, Girofle-Girofla, Madame Angot, etc.

REPLET WITH BEAUTIFUL SONGS, DUETS, AND TRIOS.

Imported Characteristic Costumes.

New Scenery and Properties have been expressly prepared for the elaborate production of La Marjolaine.

Reserved seats at box office six days in advance.

CALIFORNIA THEATRE.

BARTON & LAWLOR.....MANAGERS.
BARTON HILL.....ACTING MANAGER.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

By general request, the last performance of the comic opera,

FATINITZAI

On Monday evening, Nov. 4, WILL BE IN GERMAN, with a cast including the full strength of the German Dramatic Company.

Thesday, Nov. 5, will be presented the thrilling drama of

AURORA FLOYD,

WITH

MR. FRANK LAWLOR

In his great character, JOHN MELLISH.

28 Seats at the box office.

SACRED CONCERT FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE SOCIETY FOR CHRISTIAN WORK

Will be given at the

FIRST UNITARIAN CHURCH

(Geary Street—Rev. Dr. Stebbins) on

SUNDAY EVENING.....NOV. 3, 1878.

A choice programme will be given by

MRS. MARRINER-CAMPBELL,
MRS. PIERCE,
MRS. CHISHOLM,

MR. BEN. CLARK,

WALTER CAMPBELL,

And a full choir of the finest talent in the city, who have kindly volunteered. Instrumental solos by

Messrs. HENRY HEYMANN and E. SCHLOTTE.

Tickets, 50 cents. Concert begins at 8 o'clock.

FASHION GOSSIP.

Latest in Jewelry.

In this department the novelties are approaching the poetic in sentiment, some of the latest in ladies' breast pins and ear pendants being elegant representations of the tulip, aemone, forget-me-not, corn and sickle, etc., all beautifully engraved with rich shadows in gold. We also noticed a very unique design for a ladies' breast pin in the fishing rod and basket containing fish; also a very rich pattern representing a ribbon bow, in dead gold, set with turquoise in centre. Another very neat design is that of the horseshoe, in black onyx, with representation of stirrup and whip in gold resting upon the black surface, while the nails are set with diamonds. The latest in ladies' shawl pins, are the parasol in gold set with pearls and turquoise, sickle, key, and various other designs. The latest for ladies' and gents' charms for chain we find to be a new style of pencil—folded it assumes the shape of a champagne bottle; also representations of a screw, key, and various other patterns. In coral jewelry exquisite pieces of workmanship, representing flowers, etc., are still in the ascendency. In quartz jewelry, representing the productions of the various mines of the coast, we find a large assortment. Among the novelties we noticed a solid gold bouquet holder, inlaid with rich specimens of quartz; also a match box representing a horseshoe, set with quartz and Rocky Mountain agate. Quartz bracelets and scent bottles in all the newest patterns are much esteemed by ladies from the East who visit the coast. A very rare design for porte-monnaie in gold we found with a miniature watch set in the side with all its delicate mechanism, the face not being larger than a silver half-dime. In ladies' neck-chain we observed a novelty in gold plaits, also in gold braid. All of these designs are of the very latest, and all designed by Col. Andrews of this city, proprietor of the Diamond Palace, where we found all the above new styles in jewelry. Among other novelties we noticed at this establishment a medallion for ladies' neck-chains, in dead gold, representing a padlock with key and combination lock. In watches we found here almost an endless variety in gold and silver for ladies and gents, among others the chronograph repeater, which strikes the hours, quarters, and minutes, and the alarm watch. In the braided gold chain the slide is set with diamonds. In the variety and number of diamonds of the purest water we found this establishment unrivaled. In ear-pendants we observed a rare and costly pattern, plainly set, interfering with the brilliance of the gems as little as possible, adding much to their elegance. In settings for ladies' breast pin, the diamond cross inlaid with black onyx, makes a rare design. A very neat medallion of solid black onyx set with three rows of diamonds presents a rich appearance when attached to any style of ladies' neck-chain. One of the rarest ladies' breast pins we observed at this establishment was that of a large cluster of diamonds completely biding the setting, while coarsely nesting in the centre a beautiful sapphire of the purest water adds to the richness of the ornament. Diamond bracelets are in vogue here in all the newest patterns. For hair ornaments the star design in diamonds adds much to the fascination of California's rarest beauties. Diamonds are becoming almost the fashion in jewelry, as we find thumb-rings, pencils, as well as rings, breast-pins, and shawl pins, and almost every article of jewelry, with its elegant diamond ornamentation. We are surprised at the very low prices of diamonds and every description of jewelry to be obtained at this establishment, and we advise the readers of the ARGONAUT by all means to examine, before purchasing elsewhere, the elegant and extensive assortment at the Diamond Palace. We have no hesitancy in saying that the public may rely upon the representations of Colonel Andrews as to the quality of the goods exhibited at this establishment.

Latest in Boots and Shoes.

One of the neatest as well as latest styles in French make for ladies' slippers is the "Aimée," with Louis XV. heel. This style in bronze takes the lead in fashionable circles. The "Alice Oates" slipper, for balls and parties, after the French pattern, with Louis XV. heel same as the "Aimée" style, appears in white satin, or in colors to match the dress, with cut steel ornaments. This style of slipper is certainly one of the daintiest that can complete the ball toilet. The heel is made of cork, making the slipper very light and airy. In ladies' winter boots cork soles are now the specialty. The fall boot for ladies is made of Matelassé cloth, in color black and gray. A new style of dress button boot, with pump foxing and fine kid or cloth top, now also a specialty, has the appearance of a slipper on the foot. A new style of traveling or riding boot, called the "Ladies' Comforter," has also appeared. The name is certainly very appropriate, as the boot is made of heavy beaver cloth, buttoned very high, and fitting snugly to the limb. This style is also made with patent leather foxings for the winter. The Gipsy boot, in French kid or Matelassé cloth, with seam running down to the toe in front, is another very pretty style. In children's goods the Matelassé cloth, with kid or patent leather foxings, is one of the novelties. For gents the cork-soled sewed boot in French calf, also the French and London toe gaiters, are some of the latest specialties. Also, of the very latest, another style appears, called the "Risley Balmorals." For opera the above, with London toe, is made in French kid or patent leather to fit the foot neatly, and is cut either high or low. For party the pump is made of patent leather or French kid. All the above latest styles are to be seen at Kast's fashionable shoe store, corner Dupont and Market Streets, where all the latest styles are made to order on the shortest notice.

At the reception of Clara Morris, at the Baldwin, on Monday evening next, the theatre will be performed with one of the rarest productions of Parisian performers. The elegant perfume is called the "Menlo Park Bouquet," prepared expressly for Fred. C. Keil, of this city, by Berranger, Paris. This new toilet article has been received with favor by the fashionables of this coast. The idea of perfuming the theatre on such an occasion is certainly very appropriate, and Mr. Keil will deserve the thanks of the audience for his enterprise in this direction. San Francisco has many pharmacists, but in enterprise in the perfumery department few have equaled Mr. Keil in his specialties for the toilet. The peculiar fragrance of the "Menlo Park Bouquet" perfume belongs exclusively to this production, and we have no hesitancy in saying it will be found acceptable to the ladies who desire novelties in perfumery. The card of Mr. Keil for this occasion will be perfumed with this exquisite toilet article.

For the Toilet.

The ladies are always desirous of choosing for the toilet those little delicacies that are the most fascinating to the gents, for what lady can resist that crowning glory of women—to be the most fascinating of her sex at the ball, party, or social entertainment. One of the necessary articles for the toilet, which every lady has found indispensable among her toilet paraphernalia, is the exquisite and elegant cologne. That which is the most lasting in odor is the most eagerly sought after. The fragrant perfume, in richness most closely imitating the breath of nature's rarest flowers, the chemist has long sought to produce; numerous have been the attempts, only to be followed by failure, until the art of extracting from the sweet-scented flowers and other natural productions has become one of the most difficult of all problems to the chemist when he desires to produce delicacy, purity in aroma, that will be new, and consequently popular. Desirous of giving to our fashionable readers an item in perfumery, we called at the magnificent establishment of H. B. Slaven, pharmacist, under the Baldwin, and found that Mr. Slaven has been making immense sales in his specialty in perfumery called "Slaven's Yosemite Cologne." This elegant cologne has assumed a popularity that any lady can easily see is well deserved, in testing the quality of this rare production for the toilet. This article is manufactured only at this establishment, and has gradually found its way among the favorite aromas of the toilet.

To the Katydid.

Shrill oracle, proclaiming night by night
The antique riddle man may never guess,
But which by thy fond unforgetfulness
Thrills all the dark with music—thy delight,
Whatever Katy did, is to recite
The act's occurrence with such ceaseless stress
Of triple chirp as thy small powers possess,
The traveler's listening fancy to excite.
Oh, what immortal secret, strange and dear,
Should hold thy faithful memory so long?
What deathless deed which thou must still withhold—
Which autumn after autumn, year by year,
Yea, century after century thy song
Reiterates, yet never leaves untold?
HENRY S. CORNWELL, in Scribner.

Terrace Swimming Baths, Alameda, now open.

BOSTON DRESS REFORM.

California "Worth" Princess Suits, Skirts, and attachable Flouncings: Cashmere and Merino Union Suits for ladies and children; ladies' and misses' shoulder-brace Corsets; Abdominal Corsets. No. 430 Sutter Street. A. W. BAKER, the only Dress Reform Agent in the city.

Currier, 103 Dupont Street, has a fine assortment of VELVET FRAMES.

A man who made a business of writing obituaries, epitaphs, etc., used to solicit patronage far and near. Hearing of the death of a man in a distant part of the county and business being a little dull he made a journey there. Finding the widow of the deceased person he stated his occupation and asked if she wouldn't like a few lines about her husband. "Lines about him?" she said, wearily; "he had all the lines he wanted. If he had had one line less he would have been alive to-day." "What ailed him, madam?" "He was hung."

This paper is printed with ink furnished by Chas. Eneu Johnson & Co., 509 South Tenth Street, Philadelphia, and 59 Gold Street, New York.

Mrs. Parker, of the Ladies' Depository, has opened a new store at 125 Post Street. Dolls dressed in all styles. New Lace Patterns.

A lady in Bridgeport, Connecticut, struck her lawyer three times on the head with a water pitcher. "Why did you do that?" said the man, indignantly. "As your lawyer I shall have everything of value you have anyhow, so that I can really get nothing because of assault and battery."

The finest baths are at the Terrace, Alameda.

The plash of fountains in the moonlit courts of the Alhambra; the tinkle of a lover's lute beneath the window of Beauty; the swooning of "the languid air" tangled in the strings of an Eolian harp; "the horns of Elfrand faintly blowing"; the "sweet jargonning" of "all little birds that are"—all these, and more, are mixed and mingled, and anon clearly individualized, in the strains of the modern musical box. At M. J. Paillard & Co.'s 120 Sutter Street, every variety of this magical instrument can be heard, and from hearing to buying the transition is almost inevitable. Some of these angels in the household will perform you more than one hundred airs, and the prices of all kinds are ridiculously low.

For the finest Photographs, go to Dames & Hayes, 715 Market Street.

Go to the Terrace Swimming Baths, Alameda.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

The Old House Altered. By Geo. C. Mason, Architect. 8vo, ill. $2 50
Cupid and the Sphinx. A novel. By Hartford Fleming. 12mo, cloth. 1 25
American Colleges—Their Students and Work. By C. F. Thwing. 16mo, cloth. 1 00
Thanatopsis. By William Cullen Bryant. 8vo, ill. cloth. 2 50
Johnson's Chief Lives of the Poets. Ed. by Mathew Arnold. 8vo. Grammar Land. By M. L. Nesbitt. Square 16mo. England from a Back Window. By James M. Bailey, the Danbury News man. 12mo, cloth. 1 50
Lake Breeze. By Oliver Optic. 16mo, cloth. 1 50
Live Boys. Ed. by Arthur Morscamp. 16mo, cloth. 1 00
Renorse. Th. Bentzon. Paper, 50 cents; cloth. 75
Vision of Echar. By J. G. Whittier. 16mo, cloth. 1 25
Little Good-for-Nothing. By Alphonse Daudet. 1 50
Through the Dark Continent. By Henry M. Stanley. 2 vols, 8vo, ill. cloth. 10 00

BILLINGS, HARBOURNE & CO.,
BOOKSELLERS AND STATIONERS,
NO. 3 MONTGOMERY STREET.

DECKER BROS

REMOVAL.
I. W. TABER

The leading Photographer of this city, has just occupied his new and handsome parlors over the HIBERNIA BANK, CORNER MARKET AND MONTGOMERY STREETS. Entrance on Montgomery Street. Elevator connected with building.

Easy of access. The handsomest Photograph Rooms in the city. Give him a call.

MADAME SKIDMORE
FINE MILLINERY.

THE LATEST PARISIAN STYLES CONSTANTLY RECEIVED.

1114 Market St., between Mason and Taylor, under Graham House.

COMPLICATED
WATCHES

CHRONOGRAPH, REPEATING,
SPLIT SECONDS, ETC.

AND A LARGE STOCK OF GOLD and Silver Watches, Chains, Diamonds, Jewelry, Silver Ware, and Fancy Goods at

ANDERSON & RANDOLPH'S

CORNER OF

MONTGOMERY AND SUTTER STS.,
SAN FRANCISCO.

NEW BOOKS AT ROMAN'S.

Cyprus. By Franz von Loher. 12mo, cloth. $2 00
Thanatopsis. By William Cullen Bryant. Ill., 4to, cloth. 2 50
The Old House Altered. By Geo. C. Mason. 4to, cloth. 2 50
Grammar Land. By M. L. Nesbitt. 16mo, cloth. 1 25
Bismarck's Letters. Edited by Ritz Maxse. 1 00
Broken Walls. By author of Wide World. 12mo, cloth. 1 25
Cupid and Sphinx. A novel. 12mo, cloth. 1 25
Froude's Third Studies on Great Subjects. 12mo, cloth. 1 50
Lake Breeze. By Oliver Optic. Great Western Series. 12mo, cloth. 1 50
Live Boys in Texas. By Morscamp. 12mo, cloth. 1 25
England from a Back Window. By J. M. Bailey, the Danbury News man. 12mo, cloth. 1 50
Under the Lilacs. By Louisa M. Alcott. 12mo, cloth. 1 50
Stories from an Old Dutch Town. By Robert Lowell. 12mo, cloth. 1 50
American Colleges and the American Public. By Porter. 12mo, cloth. 1 50
All Around the House. By Mrs. Henry Ward Beecher. 12mo, cloth. 1 50
Modern Frenchmen. By Hamerton. 12mo, cloth. 2 00
Johnson's Lives of the Poets. Edited by Mathew Arnold. 8vo, cloth. 2 00
The Heir of Charlton. By May Agnes Fleming. 12mo, cloth. 1 75
Just received, a large assortment of Bronze Inkstands. Fifty different styles of Shakespeare. Immense assortment of Juveniles for the holidays.

A. ROMAN & CO.,

11 Montgomery Street,

Lick House Block.

San Francisco.

OCCIDENTAL AND ORIENTAL

STEAMSHIP COMPANY

—FOR—
JAPAN AND CHINA,

Leave Wharf, Cor. First and Brannan Streets, at noon, for
YOKOHAMA AND HONGKONG.

Connecting at Yokohama with steamers for Shanghai,

GAELIC, OCEANIC, BELGIC.

November.....16 December.....17 January.....16
February.....18 March.....15 April.....16
May.....19

Cabin plans on exhibition and Passenger Tickets for sale at No. 2 Montgomery Street.

For freight apply at the Pacific Mail Steamship Company's Wharf.

T. H. GOODMAN, Gen'l Passenger Agent.

LELAND STANFORD, President.

B. F. STERETT
PRINTER
532 CLAY ST. SAN FRANCISCO.

R. P. & H. N. CLEMENT,
ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW,

Nos. 2, 3, and 4 SHERMAN'S BUILDING,
Montgomery Street, N. E. corner of Clay, San Francisco
(P. O. Box 707.)

PIANOS ARE THE BEST

NEW IMPORTATION
EMBROIDERIES

Of the LATEST STYLES of

OF EVERY DESIGN.

ALSO, CANVAS OF NEW COLORS.

Ladies' Shopping Baskets of unique shapes.
Bronzes, Clocks, Ivory Carvings, Toilet and Fancy Goods, Vienna Bronze Ornaments.

The finest assortment of FANS in the city.

H. SIERING & CO.

(SUCCESSORS TO LOGAN & Co.)

19 MONTGOMERY STREET,
LICK HOUSE BLOCK.

MAURICE DORE & CO.

AUCTIONEERS.

EXTRAORDINARY SALE

AT AUCTION, AT PLATT'S HALL

.....OF OVER.....

300

Central, healthful, and beautiful large

CITY LOTS

.....ON.....

TUESDAY, Nov. 5, 1858, at 12 o'clock noon.

TERMS OF SALE:

One-quarter cash, one-quarter in 3 years, one-quarter in 5 years, one-quarter in 7 years.

Deferred payments to bear ONLY 5½ per cent. per annum interest, payable semi-annually, and be secured by mortgage on the property, with privilege to pay any sum not less than $50 at any time before maturity.

To those paying all cash, a discount will be allowed of 7 per cent on the deferred payments.

THE TITLE IS PERFECT.

MAURICE DORE & CO., Auctioneers,
410 Pine Street, San Francisco.

JOE POHEIM

The Tailor,

223 Montgomery St. and 103 Third St., has just received a large assortment of the latest style goods.
Suits to order from.....$20
Pants to order from.....5
Overcoats to order from.....15

2d The leading question is where the best goods can be found at the lowest prices. The answer is at

JOE POHEIM,

223 Montgomery St. and 103 Third St.

Samples and Rules for Self-Measurement sent free to any address. Fit guaranteed.

KOHLER & CHASE
SAN FRANCISCO
& OAKLAND.

TOLD IN LETTERS.

What shall I tell you of first this week, dear Em? Shall it be of a little tour I took this morning through Ackerman's inexhaustible store? Well, there was really so much that is new and beautiful, I scarcely know where to begin. There are the bronzes, many entirely novel, and among them some of the most elegant vases I have yet seen, in the form of tall, slender pitchers, covered with exquisite designs, clocks of the same style, and receivers for cards or letters, constituting complete sets of library or drawing-room ornaments. Things come under the head of bronzes nowadays that are not bronzes at all, but are, if anything, even more showy. The combination of gilt and silver in mantel ornaments is only comparatively new, but it seems so constantly changing as to bring a feeling of freshness with each new change. Nothing can be much more effective than the designs of grouse or quail in silver nestling among tall grasses of gold, or a pair of hunting dogs coupled together in characteristic attitudes. Again, there are the golden bronzes, touched here and there with green. Some new and very quaint figures in terracotta show the faces and visible portions of the body of clay color, with dress trimmings of blue and yellow. The newest thing in jewel cases, just come from Paris, are made up in the Japanese styles, in round, square and oblong boxes, with satin linings. The covers come off entirely, after the fashion of powder boxes, and they are in bright orange, pink, or gray groundwork, with floral flowers spreading over them in true Oriental abandon. One of the handsets is a lead-colored polished surface with chrysanthemums, the Japanese national flower, in black lines all over it. Exquisite toilet mirrors, framed in gilt, silver, and oxidized silver, with little companion Cupids hovering over the top or at one side, are also new. One window is quite filled with these daintinesses, and some of the handsets fans of the season. Among the last are white satin ones mounted on pearl sticks, covered, with the exception of one corner, which is filled in with a fine painting, with the finest of Point lace. I think them exceedingly moderate in price at $30 and upward. You would like a new design in music stands Mr. Ackerman showed me, or rather a music stand, portfolio, and easel combined, made of ebony, the top so contrived that the easel part can be made to slip down out of sight when not in use. Of a large invoice of English table ware, dinner sets numbering two hundred and fifty pieces, but one remains, although they were received but a few days since. But the sensation of the day is the prospective doll's machine, for tickets of admission to which applications are being every day filed. It will be an immensely fine and select affair, and there is no time to be lost in securing cards. There will be at least two thousand dolls when Mr. Ackerman gets his interesting and numerous family together. There is a bustle of preparation already going on at Lanier's that presages good things in the not far distant future: as an earnest of them, there are new shapes in the very fashionable colors in letter paper, the delicate pink and the moss-green. The texture is perfect and the tints must, as the saying is, "be seen to be appreciated." The new "Windsor" envelope, with the diagonal flap, is so popular that every other style is giving place to it. "Sea-foam" green is another shade that comes in both satin and rough surface, with these same envelopes, and, if you would be extra stylish, there is sealing wax of all colors to match. As to visiting cards, one must go into the technicalities in order to describe them adequately. For instance, there are the round cornered, turned, gilt, beveled edge; and the clipped corner, gilt, beveled edge, both and all styles to be uncompromisingly square, so that there must needs be card cases to match, of which Mr. Bancroft has already a most bewildering display. By the way, did you know that this firm publishes a bi-monthly paper, called the Manager, which, besides being an index to all their own publications and other books, contains quite a complete list of pseudonyms, a handy thing to have for reference in those days when so many literary folks hide their lights under figurative bushels. Mrs. DeLorme, of Thurlow Block, has some elegant toilets this week, among them a pale green maire, trimmed with black velvet and deep black lace; the train is cut square—the most modern fancy—edged with deep white ruffling, over which fall the points of the silk, each terminated by a black tassel; the velvet draping goes diagonally over one hip, across the front, and lies down low on the train; Duchesse sleeves are finished by double ruches of lace. A Mandarin yellow gown, garnished with black velvet in bands and large leaves; numbers of bows with fringed ends, and others oddly combined of dahlia-shaped leaves of the silk and velvet-rottes; the silk and velvet, simulating an overdress, are headed with frayed ruchings of the silk. It is a very striking costume, and goes to one of the prettiest brunettes now at the Palace. The decided tendency seems to be to a revival of the Pompadour and Marie Antoinette overdress, with long-waisted corsets, cut round over the hips, low or square in the neck, and with very short sleeves. The overdress, which is draped and puffed behind and on the hips, is continuous with the bodice. Mrs. Koerner is having a general reconstruction at her embroidery parlors, under the Baldwin, enlarging and preparing for new stock coming in to the course of the next week, and which will comprise all the latest fancies in vases, statuettes, and bric-a-brac generally, from Paris and Vienna markets. Mrs. Koerner's free afternoon instruction in embroidery is, I am told, immensely popular. You have heard so much of Walden's Carding, you say, that you mean to try it. Now, let me add one or two points that perhaps you have not yet heard. You know I never use anything of the kind, knowing that in the best preparation in the market there are so many dangerous ingredients, like arsenic, mercury, and lead, but since I have been admitted into the secret of the making of this cosmetic, though I dare not breathe to you on a syllable of it—I am convinced there may be one such make that is not only not injurious, but that is positively beneficial. Furthermore, I have seen it flatter from our leading chemists, attesting its perfect purity for the firm has not neglected one precaution necessary to assure those most interested of the real character of the article they offer them. Not only, too, does it give a temporary softness and whiteness to the skin, but in a short time effects a radical change for the better in the very worst complexions. What more can I add, after saying that it may be used for infants, as a wash, as a depilatory, and as a preventive and cure for poisoning from poison oak, and will have no bad effects, even if through chance any of it should be swallowed. Yours, etc., LILLIAN DUBOIS.

Hypnotism is beings of darkness disguised in the garments of light.

ARLINGTON HOTEL,

SANTA BARBARA, CAL.

NO HOTEL ON THE PACIFIC
 Coast can surpass the ARLINGTON in the airy cheerfulness and convenience of its arrangements. None can equal it in the natural and artistic beauty of its surroundings. The readers of the ARGONAUT will be pleased to know that the problem of combining solid comfort within doors, inexhaustible pleasure without, and calm contentment all the time, at a very economical rate of expenditure, has been solved at the ARLINGTON, and is respectfully submitted by
 GEO. T. BROMLEY, Manager.

BERKELEY GYMNASIUM.

The Berkeley Gymnasium (a preparatory school to the University)—a first-class boarding-school establishment in the interests of higher education, and in opposition to the cramming system of the small colleges and military academies of the State. The next term will commence July 24th. Examination of candidates for admission July 22d and 23d. By request, instructions have been provided during the summer months for students preparing for the August examinations at the University. For catalogue or particulars, address

JOHN F. BURRIS, PRINCIPAL,
 BERKELEY, CALIFORNIA.

NOTE.—We desire to call special attention to the organization of our Grammar Department, separate from the Academic, and solicit the patronage of parents and guardians of small boys.

GOLDEN GATE ACADEMY

AND CADET SCHOOL.

Next quarter will commence October 7, 1878.
 For circulars, address

D. P. SACKETT, A. M., Principal,
 Oakland, Cal.

REDINGTON'S
FLAVORING EXTRACTS
ARE THE PERFECTLY PURE
 and highly concentrated Extracts of
FRESH FRUITS

Prepared with great care. They are put up in superior style, in a bottle holding twice as much as ordinary brands of Extracts.

Comparing quality and contents, none other are nearly so cheap.

Wherever tested on THEIR MERITS, they have been adopted in preference to all others, and now are the

STANDARD FLAVORING EXTRACTS

Of the Pacific coast. Dealers will find them to give better satisfaction to the consumers than any other kind and are respectfully requested to give them a trial.

REDINGTON &amp; CO.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

O. F. WILLEY &amp; CO.,

IMPORTERS AND MANUFACTURERS OF

FINE CARRIAGES AND WAGONS

No. 427 MONTGOMERY ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

Agents for the sale of Wagons manufactured by BREWSTER & CO., New York.
 W. D. ROGERS, Philadelphia.
 C. S. CAFFEY, Camden, N. J.
 WOOD BROTHERS, New York.
 H. KILLAM & CO., New Haven.
 COOLING BROS., Wilmington

ALSO, AGENTS FOR

HARNESS MANUFACTURED BY WOOD GIBSON, TOMPKINS & MANDEVILLE, AND A. H. DUNSCOMB.

Also, a fine assortment of Robes, Blankets, Nets, Whips, etc.

MILLER & RICHARD,
 SOLE MAKERS OF
EXTRA-HARD METAL
SCOTCH TYPE.

SPECIAL AGENTS FOR

THE CAMPBELL, HOE, AND PEERLESS PRESSES.

No. 222 COMMERCIAL STREET.

And 205 Leidesdorff Street, San Francisco.

GEO. W. PRESCOTT. IRVING M. SCOTT. H. T. SCOTT.

UNION IRON WORKS

(Founded 1849.) Post Office Box 2128.

COR. FIRST AND MISSION STREETS,
 SAN FRANCISCO

MANUFACTURERS OF
 Compressed Engines,
 Air Compressors,
 Rock Drills,
 Portable Hoisting Engines,
 Marine Stationary and Portable Boilers
 Baby Hoist, complete.

CONSTANTLY ON HAND AND FOR SALE.

Direct-acting Pumping and Hoisting Engines,
 Upright and Stationary Engines,
 Quartz Crushing and Amalgamating Machinery,
 Blake's Rock Breakers,
 Smelting Furnaces,
 Quicksilver Pumps,
 Chlorodizing Furnaces,
 Cornish Pumps,
 Steam Pumps.

All manufactured by us of the best materials, design, and workmanship, and furnished at lower rates than by Eastern manufacturers.

PRESCOTT, SCOTT &amp; CO.

CHAS. N. FOX.

M. B. KELLOGG.

FOX &amp; KELLOGG,

ATTORNEYS AND COUNSELORS
 AT LAW, San Francisco, Cal.

Office, No. 530 California Street, Rooms 1, 2, and 3.

FRANK KENNEDY,

ATTORNEY AT LAW, 604 MERCHANT STREET, Room 15. Probate divorce, bankruptcy, and all other cases attended to.

REMOVAL.

S. B. WAKEFIELD &amp; CO.

STOCK &amp; EXCHANGE BROKERS,

Have removed from 314 Pine Street to 322 Pine St., cor. Leidesdorff, San Francisco.

MME. B. ZEITSKA'S

FRENCH, GERMAN, AND ENGLISH
 INSTITUTE

FOR YOUNG LADIES,

922 POST ST., BETWEEN HYDE

and Larkin.
 KINDLY REMEMBER connected with the Institute.
 The next term will commence October 2d.
 A limited number of Boarding Pupils received.
 MME. B. ZEITSKA, Principal.

THOMAS BOYSON, M. D.

(University of Copenhagen, Denmark).

PHYSICIAN AND SURGEON. Office
 and Residence, 112 Kearny Street. Office hours, 11
 A. M. to 5 P. M., 6 to 8 P. M. Sunday 11 to 1 only. Telephone in the office.

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATOR,

WILLIAM DOOLAN,

Office No. 12 Nevada Block.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

FRANCES A. NELSON, plaintiff, vs. DAVID P. NELSON, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to David P. Nelson, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony heretofore and now existing between the plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is hereby expressly made, and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 13th day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.
 By W. STEVENS, Deputy Clerk.

Geo. L. Woods and John J. Coffey, Attorneys for Plaintiff.

[SEAL]

OFFICE OF GENERAL THOMAS

Mill and Mining Company, San Francisco, October 22, 1878.—The third annual meeting of the stockholders of the above named corporation, for the election of Directors and the transaction of such other business as may be presented, will be held on MONDAY, November 4th, 1878 (first Monday in November), at the hour of one o'clock P. M., on that day, at the office of the corporation, Room No. 29, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California. Transfer books will be closed on Wednesday, October 30th, 1878, at three o'clock P. M.

WM. WILLIS, Secretary.

CALIFORNIA FARMERS' MUTUAL

Fire Insurance Company

[ESTABLISHED IN 1874.]

Paid up Capital ..... $200,000
 Assets exceed ..... 325,000

PRINCIPAL OFFICE 209 SANSOME ST.
 SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.,

THOS. FLINT, President. J. W. FOARD, Manager.
 FRED. K. RYLE ..... Secretary.
 I. G. GARDNER ..... General Agent.

COMMERCIAL

INSURANCE COMPANY OF CALA,

FIRE AND MARINE.

Principal office, 405 California Street, San Francisco.

JOHN H. WISE, President.
 CHAS. A. LATON, Secretary.

THE STATE INVESTMENT

—AND—

INSURANCE COMPANY, FIRE AND MARINE

CASH ASSETS ..... $450,000

Principal Office, 218 and 220 Sansome Street, San Francisco

OFFICERS:
 A. J. BRYANT, President.
 RICHARD IVERS, Vice-President.
 CHAS. H. CUSHING, Secretary.
 H. H. WATSON, Marine Surveyor

SIERRA NEVADA SILVER MINING

Company.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Directors, held on the twenty-second day of October, 1878, an assessment (No. 56) of three dollars ($3) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 47, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the twenty-seventh day of November, 1878, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on WEDNESDAY, the eighteenth day of December, 1878, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.
 Office—Room 47, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

OFFICE OF THE SIERRA NEVADA

Silver Mining Company. San Francisco, October 2d, 1878.—In accordance with a resolution adopted at a meeting of the Trustees of the Sierra Nevada Silver Mining Company, held this day, a special meeting of the stockholders of said Company is hereby called, the same to be held at the office of the Company, Room 47, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California, on Monday, the fourth (4th) day of November, 1878, at two (2) o'clock P. M., to take into consideration and decide upon the proposition to increase the capital stock of said Company from ten million ($10,000,000) dollars, divided into one hundred thousand (100,000) shares of the par value of one hundred ($100) dollars each, the present capital stock, to fifty million ($50,000,000) dollars, divided into five hundred thousand (500,000) shares of the par value of one hundred ($100) dollars each.

JOHN SKALE,
 CHAS. H. FISH,
 JOS. CLARK,
 A. E. HEAD,
 R. N. GRAVES, } Trustees

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

BELCHER SILVER MINING CO.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Gold Hill, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Trustees, held on the eighth day of October, 1878, an assessment (No. 16) of one ($1) dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 12, Cosmopolitan Hotel Building, 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 12th day of November, 1878, will be delinquent, and advertised at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Tuesday, the third day of December, 1878, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with cost of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors.

JNO. CROCKETT, Secretary.
 Office—Room 12, Cosmopolitan Hotel Building, 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

MARY E. HENRY, plaintiff, vs. JAMES J. HENRY, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JAMES J. HENRY, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony existing between plaintiff and defendant (as will appear more fully by reference to the complaint on file herein, to which your attention is hereby directed), and for general relief and costs of suit.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this Third day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.
 By W. STEVENS, Deputy Clerk.

Geo. L. Woods and John J. Coffey, Attorneys for Plaintiff.

[SEAL OF COURT]

OFFICE OF GENERAL THOMAS

Mill and Mining Company, San Francisco, October 22, 1878.—The third annual meeting of the stockholders of the above named corporation, for the election of Directors and the transaction of such other business as may be presented, will be held on MONDAY, November 4th, 1878 (first Monday in November), at the hour of one o'clock P. M., on that day, at the office of the corporation, Room No. 29, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California. Transfer books will be closed on Wednesday, October 30th, 1878, at three o'clock P. M.

WM. WILLIS, Secretary.

H. P. WAKELEE &amp; CO.,

Wholesale and Retail

Druggists, Importers of Foreign and Domestic Drugs, Chemicals, and Perfumery,

No. 140 Montgomery Street, under the Occidental Hotel, San Francisco.

PARTICULAR ATTENTION PAID

to compounding Physician's Prescriptions, the dispensing of which is entrusted only to the most competent hands, while every care is taken to ensure the purity of all preparations.

MUSIC BOXES

OF ALL DESCRIPTIONS AND OF Standard Reputation, playing from one to over one hundred airs. The largest and best assortment in this city. MUSICAL BOXES WITH CHANGEABLE CYLINDERS always on hand. New and interesting styles constantly received. Call and examine our stock. REPAIRING OF MUSICAL BOXES thoroughly done in all their particularities.

M. J. PAILLARD &amp; CO.,

MANUFACTURERS AND IMPORTERS,

120 Sutter Street, San Francisco.

Branch of House, 680 Broadway, New York.

ALASKA

COMMERCIAL CO.

No. 310 Sansome Street,

WHOLESALE DEALER IN FURS.

RE-OPENED.

HAYWARD WAREHOUSES

Are now receiving

GRAIN ON STORAGE.

THE PATRONAGE OF FARMERS

and others is respectfully solicited. Storage, one dollar per ton for the season. Advances and Insurance effected at the lowest rates.

Refer by permission to Chas. Webb Howard, President Spring Water Valley Company, Bray Bros., M. Waterman & Co., San Francisco; John Zelle, Hayward's; J. West Martin, President Union Savings Bank, Oakland.

R. H. BENNETT, Proprietor.

J. C. MERRILL &amp; CO.

SHIPPING

—AND—

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Agents for the

SANDWICH ISLANDS AND OREGON PACKET LINES.

204 AND 206 CALIFORNIA ST. - - San Francisco.

NEWTON BOOTH, C. T. WHEELER, Sacramento,
J. T. GLOVER, W. W. DODGE, San Francisco

W. W. DODGE &amp; CO.,

WHOLESALE GROCERS,

Northwest corner Clay and Front Streets, San Francisco.

THE VERTICAL FEED.

THE ONLY POSITIVE SUCCESS IN all departments of sewing. Lightest running shuttle machine in the market. The NEW DAVIS VERTICAL FEED SEWING MACHINE, 130 Post Street.

MARK SHELDON.
P. S.—Howe, Florence, Wheeler & Wilson, Grover & Baker, Domestic, Weed, Willcox & Gibbs, for sale at $70 each.

COMMENCING SUNDAY, JULY 14, 1878.
Passenger trains will leave San Francisco, from Passenger Depot on Townsend Street, between Third and Fourth, as follows:

8:30 A. M. DAILY for San Jose, Gilroy, Hollister, Tres Pinos, Pajaro, Salinas, Soledad, and all Way Stations. At Pajaro, the Santa Cruz R. R. connects with this train for Aptos and Santa Cruz. At Salinas the M. & S. V. R. R. connects with this train for Monterey. STAGE connections made with this train.

10:40 A. M. DAILY for San Jose and Way Stations.

3:30 P. M. DAILY (Sundays excepted) for Gilroy, Pajaro, Hollister, Tres Pinos, and Way Stations. STAGE connection made with this train at SANTA CLARA for Pacific Congress Springs.

4:40 P. M. DAILY for San Jose and Way Stations.

6:30 P. M. DAILY for Menlo Park and Way Stations.

ST SUNDAYS AN EXTRA TRAIN will leave for San Jose and Way Stations at 9:30 A. M. Returning, will leave San Jose at 6:00 P. M.

EXCURSION TICKETS to San Jose and other points, and return sold on Saturdays and Sunday mornings. Good for return until following MONDAY, inclusive. Also, Excursion Tickets to Monterey—good from Saturday until following Monday, inclusive.

A. C. BASSETT, Superintendent. H. R. JUDAH, Asst. Pass. & Tkt. Agt.

SOUTHERN DIVISIONS.

Passengers for points on the Southern Divisions of the road will take the cars of the Central Pacific Railroad via OAKLAND, leaving San Francisco via Ferry Landing, Market Street, at 4:00 P. M. daily, and making close connection at GOSHEN for Sumner, Mohave, LOS ANGELES, Wilmington, Anaheim, Colton, Colorado River, and YUMA.

SAN FRANCISCO AND NORTH PACIFIC R. R.

Commencing Monday, October 7th, 1878, and until further notice, Boats and Trains will leave San Francisco: (Ticket Office, Washington Street Wharf.)

3:30 P. M., DAILY, Sundays excepted, Steamer "James M. Donahue" (Washington Street Wharf), connecting with Mail and Express Train at Donahue for Petaluma, Santa Rosa, Healdsburg, Cloverdale, and way stations. Making stage connection at Lakeville for Sonoma; at Geyserville for Skaggs Springs, at Cloverdale for Ukiah, Lakeport, Mendocino City, and the GEYSERS.

Connections made at Fulton on the following morning with Fulton and Sonoma R. R. for Korb's, Guerneville, and the Redwoods. (Arrive at San Francisco 10:35 A. M.)

8:00 A. M., Sundays only, Excursions, Steamer "James M. Donahue," connecting at Donahue with trains for Cloverdale and way stations.

Returning—Train will leave Donahue at 4:40 P. M., and arrive at San Francisco at 5:55 P. M.

Freight received from 7 A. M. to 2:30 P. M. daily (except Sunday).

Ticket Office, Washington Street Wharf. ARTHUR HUGHES, Gen. Manager. A. A. BEAN, Sup't. P. E. DOUGHERTY, Gen. Pass. and Tkt. Agent.

OCCIDENTAL AND ORIENTAL

STEAMSHIP COMPANY

—FOR—

JAPAN AND CHINA,

Leave Wharf, Cor. First and Brannan Streets, at noon, for YOKOHAMA AND HONGKONG.

Connecting at Yokohama with steamers for Shanghai,

GAELIC, OCEANIC, BELGIC.

November.....16 December.....17 October.....24

February.....18 March.....15 January.....16

May.....18 April.....16

Cabin plans on exhibition and Passenger Tickets for sale at No. 2 Montgomery Street.

For freight apply at the Pacific Mail Steamship Company's Wharf.

T. H. GOODMAN, Gen'l Passenger Agent.

DAVID D. COLTON, President.

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP CO.

First-class steamers with unequalled accommodations for passengers will leave San Francisco:

FOR YOKOHAMA AND HONGKONG, On the 1st of every month.

FOR SYDNEY AND AUCKLAND, via HONOLULU, September 2d, and every fourth week thereafter.

FOR NEW YORK, via PANAMA, CENTRAL AMERICAN, MEXICAN, and SOUTH AMERICAN PORTS, HAVANA, and all WEST INDIA PORTS, on the 5th and 15th of each month.

FOR HONOLULU, April 27th, and every four weeks thereafter.

FOR VICTORIA, B. C., PUGET SOUND PORTS, and PORTLAND, Oregon, on the 10th, 20th, and 30th of each month.

WILLIAMS, BLANCHARD & CO., Agents, Corner First and Brannan Streets.

PACIFIC COAST STEAMSHIP CO.

Steamers of this Company will sail from Broadway wharf for PORTLAND (Oregon), every five days, direct, and for LOS ANGELES, SANTA BARBARA, SANTA CRUZ, SAN DIEGO, SAN LUIS OBISPO, and other Northern and Southern Coast Ports, leaving San Francisco about every third day.

For day and hour of sailing, see the Company's advertisement in the San Francisco daily papers.

Ticket Office, No. 214 MONTGOMERY ST., NEAR PINE.

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO., Agents, No. 15 Market Street, San Francisco.

W. LITTLE, J. B. CROMBIE.

LITTLE &amp; GUMMING,

CARPENTERS AND BUILDERS, No.

34 O'Farrell Street, San Francisco.

Estimates given on all classes and styles of work. General jobbing promptly attended to. Office and Stores neatly fitted up.

C. P. R. R.

COMMENCING MONDAY, OCTOBER

7, 1878, and until further notice.

TRAINS AND BOATS

WILL LEAVE SAN FRANCISCO:

OVERLAND TICKET OFFICE AT FERRY LANDING, MARKET STREET.

7:00 A. M., DAILY, VALLEJO

Steamer (from Market Street Landing), connecting with the trains for Napa (Stages for Sonoma), Calistoga (The Geysers), and Sacramento. Connecting at Davis (Sundays excepted) for Woodland and Knight's Landing, and at Woodland for Williams and Willows. (Arrive San Francisco 8:10 P. M.)

7:00 A. M., DAILY, LOCAL PASsenger Train (via Oakland Ferry), arriving at San Jose at 9:45 A. M. Connecting at Niles with train via Livermore, arriving at Tracy at 11:30 A. M., and connecting with Atlantic Express. (Arrive San Francisco 6:05 P. M.)

8:00 A. M., DAILY, ATLANTIC

Express Train (via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R.) for Sacramento, Marysville, Redding (Portland, Ore.), Colfax, Reno (Virginia City), Palisade (Eureka, Oregon), and Orono. Connects at Galt with train arriving at Lone at 3:40 P. M. (Arrive San Francisco 5:15 P. M.)

SUNDAY EXCURSION TICKETS TO SAN PABLO AND MARTINEZ AT REDUCED RATES.

10:00 A. M., DAILY, (VIA OAKland Ferry), Local Passenger Train to Haywards and Niles. (Arrive San Francisco 6:05 P. M.)

3:00 P. M., DAILY, SAN JOSE

Passenger Train (via Oakland Ferry and Niles), stopping at all way stations. Arrive at San Jose at 5:20 P. M. (Arrive San Francisco at 9:35 A. M.)

3:00 P. M., DAILY, NORTHERN

Railway Passenger Train (via Oakland Ferry) to San Pablo, Martinez, and Antioch. (Arrive San Francisco 9:35 A. M.)

4:00 P. M., DAILY, SOUTHERN

Express Train (via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R.) for Lathrop (and Stockton), Merced, Madera, Visalia, Sumner, Mojave, Newhall (San Buenaventura and Santa Barbara), Los Angeles, "Santa Monica," Wilmington, Santa Ana (San Diego), Colton, and Yuma (Arizona Stages and Colorado River Steamers). Sleeping cars between Oakland, Los Angeles, and Yuma. (Arrive San Francisco at 12:35 P. M.)

4:00 P. M., SUNDAYS EXCEPTED,

Vallejo Steamer (from Market Street Landing), connecting with trains for Calistoga (The Geysers), Woodland, Knight's Landing, and Sacramento, and at Sacramento with passenger train, leaving at 9:35 P. M., for Truckee, Reno, Carson, and Virginia. Sleeping cars between Vallejo and Carson. (Arrive San Francisco 11:10 A. M.)

4:00 P. M., SUNDAYS EXCEPTED,

Sacramento Steamer (from Washington Street Wharf) for Benicia and Landings on the Sacramento River. (Arrive San Francisco 8:00 P. M.)

4:30 P. M., DAILY, THROUGH

Third Stage and Accommodation Train, via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R.) connecting at Lathrop with train arriving at Los Angeles on second day at 11:55 A. M. (Arrive San Francisco 7:30 A. M.)

4:30 P. M., DAILY, LOCAL PASsenger (via Oakland Ferry) to Haywards, Niles, and Livermore. (Arrive San Francisco 8:35 P. M.)

5:00 P. M., DAILY, OVERLAND

Empire Train (via Oakland Ferry and Northern Railway) to Ogden, Omaha, and East. Public conveyance for Milk Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

FERRIES AND LOCAL TRAINS.

FROM SAN FRANCISCO, DAILY.

To	To	To	To	To	To	To	To
Oakland.	Alameda.	Ferris.	Oakland.	Niles.	Berkeley.	Daly.	Daly.
A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.
6:10	12:30	7:00	8:10	8:10	7:00	7:30	8:10
7:00	1:00	8:00	9:10	9:10	8:00	8:30	9:10
7:30	1:30	8:30	9:40	9:40	8:30	9:00	9:40
8:00	2:00	9:00	10:10	10:10	9:00	9:30	10:10
8:30	2:30	9:30	10:40	10:40	9:30	10:00	10:40
9:00	3:00	10:00	11:10	11:10	10:00	10:30	11:10
9:30	3:30	10:30	11:40	11:40	10:30	11:00	11:40
10:00	4:00	11:00	12:10	12:10	11:00	11:30	12:10
10:30	4:30	11:30	12:40	12:40	11:30	12:00	12:40
11:00	5:00	12:00	1:10	1:10	12:00	12:30	1:10
11:30	5:30	12:30	1:40	1:40	12:30	1:00	1:40
12:00	6:00	1:00	2:10	2:10	1:00	1:30	2:10
.....	7:00	2:00	3:00	3:00	1:30	2:00	3:00
.....	8:10	3:10	4:00	4:00	2:00	2:30	4:00
.....	9:20	4:20	5:00	5:00	2:30	3:00	5:00
.....	10:30	5:30	6:00	6:00	3:00	3:30	6:00
.....	11:45	6:45	7:00	7:00	3:30	4:00	7:00
.....	.....	.....	8:15	8:15	4:00	4:30	8:15

8—Sundays excepted.

Alameda passengers change cars at Oakland.

TO SAN FRANCISCO, DAILY.

From	From	From	From	From	From	From	From
Oakland.	Alameda.	Ferris.	Oakland.	Niles.	Berkeley.	Daly.	Daly.
A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.
6:10	12:30	7:00	8:10	8:10	7:00	7:30	8:10
7:00	1:00	8:00	9:10	9:10	8:00	8:30	9:10
7:30	1:30	8:30	9:40	9:40	8:30	9:00	9:40
8:00	2:00	9:00	10:10	10:10	9:00	9:30	10:10
8:30	2:30	9:30	10:40	10:40	9:30	10:00	10:40
9:00	3:00	10:00	11:10	11:10	10:00	10:30	11:10
9:30	3:30	10:30	11:40	11:40	10:30	11:00	11:40
10:00	4:00	11:00	12:10	12:10	11:00	11:30	12:10
10:30	4:30	11:30	12:40	12:40	11:30	12:00	12:40
11:00	5:00	12:00	1:10	1:10	12:00	12:30	1:10
11:30	5:30	12:30	1:40	1:40	12:30	1:00	1:40
12:00	6:00	1:00	2:10	2:10	1:00	1:30	2:10
.....	7:00	2:00	3:00	3:00	1:30	2:00	3:00
.....	8:10	3:10	4:00	4:00	2:00	2:30	4:00
.....	9:20	4:20	5:00	5:00	2:30	3:00	5:00
.....	10:30	5:30	6:00	6:00	3:00	3:30	6:00
.....	11:45	6:45	7:00	7:00	3:30	4:00	7:00
.....	.....	.....	8:15	8:15	4:00	4:30	8:15

8—Sundays excepted.

Alameda passengers change cars at Oakland.

CREEK ROUTE

From San Francisco—Daily—7:20—8:15—9:15—10:15—11:15 A. M.—12:15—1:15—2:15—3:15—4:15—5:15 P. M. From Oakland—Daily—7:15—8:10—9:10—10:10—11:10 A. M.—12:05—1:05—2:05—3:05—4:05—5:05 P. M.

8—Daily, Sundays excepted.

"Official Schedule Time" furnished by Anderson & Randolph, Jewelers, 101 and 103 Montgomery Street.

A. N. TOWNE, T. H. GOODMAN, General Sup't. Gen. Pass. and Ticket Ag't.

THE NEVADA BANK OF SAN FRANCISCO

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA.

Paid up Capital.....$10,000,000 Gold Reserve (U. S. Bonds).....3,500,000 "

DIRECTORS:

LOUIS McLANE, President. J. C. FLOOD, Vice-President. JOHN W. MACKAY, J. L. FLOOD, JAMES G. FAIR.

Cashier.....H. W. GLENNY. Agent at Virginia, Nev.....GEO. A. KING. Agents at New York.....C. T. CHRISTENSEN. (62 Wall Street.) GEO. L. BRANDER.

Issues Commercial and Travelers' Credits, available in any part of the world. Makes Transfers by Telegraph and Cable, and draws Exchange at customary rates. This Bank has special facilities for dealing in bullion.

EXCHANGE

On the principal Cities throughout the United States, Europe, Japan, China, and the East Indies, the Australian Colonies, and New Zealand, and on Honolulu, Hawaii.

NEW YORK BANKERS.....The Bank of New York, N. B. A. Amer. Exchange Nat. Bank. LONDON BANKERS.....Messrs. Smith, Payne & Smiths. The Union Bank of London.

THE ANGLO-CALIFORNIAN BANK (Limited.)

No. 422 CALIFORNIA STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.

London Office.....3 Angel Court. New York Agents.....J. & W. Seligman & Co.

Authorized Capital Stock.....$6,000,000 Surplus Earnings.....150,000

Will receive Deposits, open Accounts, make Collections, buy and sell Exchange and Bullion, loan Money, and issue Letters of Credit available throughout the world.

FRED'X F. LOW, } Managers. IGN. STEINHART, }

P. N. LILIENTHAL, Cashier.

THE BANK OF CALIFORNIA,

SAN FRANCISCO

Capital.....$5,000,000

D. O. MILLS.....President. WILLIAM ALVORD.....Vice-President. THOMAS BROWN.....Cashier.

AGENTS—New York, Agency of the Bank of California; Boston, Tremont National Bank; Chicago, Union National Bank; St. Louis, Boatmen's Savings Bank; New Zealand, the Bank of New Zealand; London, China, Japan India, and Australia, the Oriental Bank Corporation.

The Bank has Agencies at Virginia City and Gold Hill, and Correspondents in all the principal mining districts and interior towns of the Pacific Coast.

Letters of Credit issued available in all parts of the world. Draw direct on London, Dublin, Paris, Bremen, Hamburg, Frankfurt-on-Main, Antwerp, Amsterdam, St. Petersburg, Copenhagen, Stockholm, Christiania, Locarno, Melbourne, Sydney, Auckland, Hongkong, Shanghai, Yokohama.

CHICKERING

PIANO WAREROOMS,

31 POST ST., Mechanics' Institute Building.

ELEGANT PIANOS.

L. K. HAMMER,

Sole Agent for Pacific Coast.

Owners of Chickering Pianos are specially requested to leave orders for tuning at warehouses, 31 Post Street.

MUSIC

KNARE PIANOS,

IRVING PIANOS, ROGERS' UPRIGHT PIANOS,

Prince Organs, Waters' Organs, Sheet Music.

BANCROFT, KNIGHT &amp; Co.,

733 MARKET STREET.

PIANOS

SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED PIANOS.

Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.

WOODWORTH, SCHELL &amp; Co.

12 Post Street San Francisco.

PIANOS

NO. 12 TYLER STREET, S. F.

WAKELEE'S

AUREOLINE

PRODUCES THE BEAUTIFUL

Golden Hair so much admired. Superior to the imported article by reason of its freshness and the care used in its production.

PRICE, LARGE BOTTLES, $2.

Manufactured by

H. P. WAKELEE &amp; CO., DRUGGISTS,

Corner Montgomery and Bush Streets, San Francisco.

GENUINE SALE.

NICOLL, THE TAILOR

HAVING TO MAKE ROOM FOR

the daily arrival of new styles of French, English, and Domestic Goods from his New York and London houses, will display a very large quantity of uncalled-for garments at greatly reduced prices, as follows:

Pants	from $4.00
Suits	12.00
Overcoats	15.00
Vests	2.00
Coats	7.00

Gentlemen, before ordering anywhere, will do well to call and inspect our daily arrival of French, English, Scotch, and Domestic Goods.

No. 305 MONTGOMERY STREET.

J. J. BIRGE, DENTIST, 313 Kearny Street.

ROSS'

MILLINERY EMPORIUM, UNDER THE BALDWIN.

PACIFIC BUSINESS COLLEGE, 320 POST STREET, San Francisco.

THE SPIRIT OF '78.

An Opportunity such as was never before offered to the San Francisco Public.

T. H. BOYD,

An Artist of rare ability, long known to the public as being connected with some of our most prominent Photographic Galleries, and latterly of the firm of Messrs. I. W. TABER & T. H. BOYD, noticing the wants of the people for first-class pictures at a reasonable price, has retained the elegant and commodious apartments, where he has every facility for doing work of a superior kind, and proposes to make his prices so moderate than none need have an excuse for having an inferior picture taken, either of themselves or their children. Never before were such full-length Cabinets—interior or rustic—taken for the low figure of five dollars per dozen; the popular Gray Tint Vignette Cabinets at six dollars per dozen; and the truly elegant Cameo Glacé—the favorite of all—usually costing ten and twelve dollars per dozen, at Boyd's will only cost you eight dollars. His card-size Photos, for the Cameo Glacé finish, will be four dollars per dozen, and the Gray Vignettes only three dollars.

NO. 26 MONTGOMERY STREET,

His apartments are all that could be asked for—large, commodious, and first-class in every particular; every convenience, in fact, that tends to enhance the comforts of his patrons. His skylight is the largest in the city, thus giving him a volume of light to be controlled at his will, and so secure an effect in light and shade that can not be obtained with a smaller light. Every improvement of modern times that makes exposures shorter has been secured, so that pictures of children will now be taken so quickly that it is the exception if a superior picture is not obtained.

He also desires to specially call the attention of his old friends and patrons who have visited him at the Yosemite Gallery, that he has all the negatives of the Photographs taken in the Gallery, and can supply copies desired at very short notice and at the reduced prices.

Pay him a visit and judge for yourselves.

YOSEMITE ART GALLERY

No. 26 Montgomery St., near Sutter.

THE CAL. FURNITURE M'FG CO.

HAVE FIVE TIMES AS MUCH

FURNITURE

As any other house on this Coast, which has been purchased so low that we CAN and WILL sell at such prices that the poor can gratify their WISHES and the rich their TASTE. At the old stand,

NOS. 224 AND 226 BUSH STREET, S. F.

HERRMANN'S

FALL

STYLES

ARE NOW OUT AT

336 KEARNY STREET, BETWEEN BUSH AND PINE, &amp; 910 MARKET STREET, ABOVE STOCKTON.

SEND FOR ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE.

EDUCATIONAL!

French, Spanish, and Italian taught by Prof. Berthelemy de Filipe, by his easy, new method, saving months of studies. Classes for beginners will be formed September 1st; also private lessons. PACIFIC BUSINESS COLLEGE, 320 Post Street.

SAFES AND SCALES.

FOR SALE BY

JOHN MOLLOY, 54 CLAY STREET.

BUY YOUR

RUPTURE.

BUY NO TRUSS

Until you see what has been accomplished by DR. PIERCE'S late invention.

Call or send for New Illustrated Book. Prices reduced.

MAGNETIC ELASTIC TRUSS

CO., 609 Sacramento Street, San Francisco.

GEORGE BARSTOW,

ATTORNEY AND COUNSELOR AT

Law, No. 309 California Street, San Francisco, Cal.

SHIRTS AT

MORRIS, SCHWAB &amp; CO.

FINE-ART DEALERS.

FREE ART GALLERY.

A complete assortment of ARTISTS' MATERIAL, GOLD FRAMES, etc.

19 AND 21 POST STREET.

WAREHOUSES, N. W. CORNER KEARNY AND SUTTER STREETS.

SHERMAN, HYDE &amp; CO.

SHEET MUSIC, MUSIC BOOKS, MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

SEWING MACHINE,

The only really light-running lock-stitch Sewing Machine in the market.

"DOMESTIC" PAPER FASHIONS

Elegant, stylish, and reliable.

J. W. EVANS, 20 Post Street, San Francisco.

STOVES

FOR PARLORS, OFFICES, HALLS
BED-ROOMS, CHURCHES,
STORES, ETC., ETC.

THE LARGEST STOCK AND
the greatest variety on the Pacific Coast.

500

DIFFERENT SIZES, STYLES, AND PATTERNS to select from.

W. W. MONTAGUE &amp; CO.

NOS. 110, 112, 114, 118, &amp; 120 BATTERY ST.

PALMER BROS.

726 TO 734 MARKET ST.,

Have a full assortment of

LADIES' AND GENTS' FURNISH-
ing Goods, Toilet Articles, Corsets, Embroideries,
French and Valenciennes Laces, a fine assortment of Veil-
ings and Ruchings, and the largest stock of

MILLINERY GOODS,

And the best stock of
BOYS' CLOTHING AND HATS & CAPS
In the city.

PALACE HOTEL RESTAURANT,

FIRST CLASS IN ALL RESPECTS.

QUIET AND DESIRABLE PLACE
for Ladies, Gentlemen, and Families. Entrance south side of Court.

A. D. SHARON.

RARE ENGRAVINGS
AND ETCHINGS,

CHRISTMAS, 1878.

JUST RECEIVED, A LARGE COLlection of fine Engravings specially purchased in Italy for the Christmas trade. Nothing can be more appropriate for a holiday or wedding present than a fine Engraving, which is suitable for home decoration and at the same time rare. W. K. VICKERY would respectfully invite an inspection of his Engravings and their prices.

Please note address—22 Montgomery Street, opposite the Lick House.

BEAMISH'S

The Argonaut.

VOL. III. NO. 18.

SAN FRANCISCO, NOVEMBER 9, 1878.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

THE DIARY OF A WOMAN.

Translated for the Argonaut from the French of Octave Feuillet.

LAST PART.

1878.—The extraordinary circumstances in which I find myself placed induce me, after a period of five years, to recommence my diary. I am passing through a terrible ordeal, and it never was more necessary for me to put my thoughts in order. First, I wish to recall to my remembrance the principal events which have brought about my present situation, and try to draw from it that light and those counsels of which I stand so much in need. Besides I begin to have a presentiment that these pages may one day be read by some one besides myself, and on that account I wish to leave nothing about them in obscurity.

My marriage, as I foresaw it would, took place at the same time as that of Cécile, in the little church in Louvercy. Monsieur and Madame d'Eblis left the next day for Italy, where they intended to travel for several months. Five or six weeks afterward I left for Nice, with my husband and my mother-in-law. The health of my husband has given me the only serious concern I have known during nearly four years passed in that fine climate. I can not say that my heart has always been free from regrets and sad remembrances; but I can say, however, that God has blessed the folly of my marriage, and that it brought me all that I anticipated. It is not true that pleasures derived from the passions take but a single shape, as we are too apt to think. There is a happiness which comes from the passions under the shape of duty, devotion, sacrifice; it exists even in martyrdom. As for martyrdom, let it be well understood that there was no question of it in my case; nevertheless, a task such as I had undertaken is not accomplished without difficulty nor without some opposition. It is not in one day that the most delicate or beloved hand can tame or cure a naturally violent spirit embittered by misfortune; but at the same time what an almost divine rapture there is in combating for a doubting and rebellious soul, and in drawing it little by little, but whole and pure, from under the ruins of the body, where it was as it were buried, and making it live again in the pure light of heaven and in a revival of its hopes! For the few desponding tears that I may have shed in secret, what sweet, happy, grateful tears have I let fall whenever I felt that my efforts were being rewarded!

At last the time arrived wherein it was sufficient for me to raise my finger smilingly to instantly subdue those terrible fits of passion to which my poor Roger often abandoned himself. Not to take too much credit to myself, I ought also to say that the honor of this miracle was not mine alone, for it was after the birth of my daughter that her father became reconciled to God.

It was a little while before her birth that Cécile and her husband, on returning from Rome, came and passed several days with us at the Villa des Palmes, where we resided. I had secretly dreaded the moment when I should have to meet Monsieur d'Eblis again, but the event which was then maturing rendered me almost indifferent about it, or at least I thought I was. Besides, I found him so cold in his manner toward me that I was troubled with the idea that he had some grievance against me. Was he dissatisfied with Cécile, and did he reproach me with giving too flattering an account of her when he asked my opinion? Certain little things in his manner toward his wife astonished me; he did not seem to be in the same degree under the influence of her charms; always extremely courteous, his tone toward her was dry and ironical; he seemed sometimes to be bored with the ridiculous account she gave of her travels, her intentional confusion of names, things, epochs, her smart sayings, and her prattle. But Monsieur de Louvercy, to whom I said a few words as to my fears, assured me that Captain d'Eblis was more in love with his wife than ever; that perhaps he was uneasy at seeing her so brilliant and sparkling, and so much admired, but that was all. I therefore thought no more about it, and I was too happy and too much occupied with the idea of my approaching maternity to trouble myself much about other matters.

It was our intention to leave Nice at the end of the spring, and return and pass the summer at Louvercy, my husband absolutely discarding all idea of a residence in Paris. But the doctors feared a sojourn for him in the damp climate of Normandy. By their advice we concluded to remain at the South until his health was more fully assured. The two succeeding years were of an almost perfect serenity for me. My dear grandmother came to see us two or three times, my mother-in-law overwhelmed me with her affection, and then I had my daughter, whose birth, as I have said, had completely reconciled my husband to life, and increased his attachment to me. He had commenced with much arduous work, in which I humbly assisted him as secretary, classifying, as well as I was able, the documents with which Monsieur d'Eblis kept us supplied, making extracts and copying in my very best handwriting his illegible fly-tracks. The profound and sincere friendship with which he had inspired Monsieur d'Eblis was no longer a mystery to me, as I acknowledge it had been formerly, when only his faults were to be seen; but since he had ceased to consider himself condemned to an isolated existence, without affection and without a future, the great qualities of heart and mind which he possessed had reappeared in all their force, and with a charm that was indisputable. He had even shown a gayety of manner of which I was far from believing him capable in the early days of our acquaintance, and it was so pleasant for me to think that I had something to do with these changes. But what touched me more than all the rest was the entire confidence he had in me. I said to myself on marrying him that a life in the world of society was over for me, and I freely resolved to give up all idea of it. It did not suit me to seek pleasures in which my husband could not participate. But he wanted to insist upon my accompanying his mother to some of the assemblies of the French and foreign colony which seethed around us.

I did not abuse this liberty, but was happy to make use of it, as it enabled me to receive in my own house at times. I was naturally exposed, on the part of our guests and neighbors, to those gallant attentions offered to every woman blessed with a passable exterior or an expert dressmaker. A sick, infirm husband might tend to encourage the expression of them; but I met them with that quiet reserve by which it is always easy to show that one is not in the game. My husband, shrewd and clear-sighted, spoke jokingly of these absurdities. I think he took pride in showing by his sovereign indifference how far above the shadow of suspicion I was placed in his esteem. I was grateful for this; but the time came when his confidence seemed excessive, because it put me to serious inconvenience, which unfortunately became connected with the greatest affliction of my life.

There was at that time, as there always is indeed at Nice, a mixed company from which it was necessary to choose one's society. I am naturally exclusive enough, and do not lend myself easily to certain arrangements which are too much the fashion at the present day. Monsieur de Louvercy, like all of his sex, I think, was more tolerant and liberal than myself in these matters. He pretended that my salon was a sheepfold, in which I admitted only lambs without spot and sheep incapable of being led astray; that this was a bore, and that all the life was taken out of it; and, moreover, it was uncharitable—it discouraged sinners, male as well as female, to close against them the doors of an honest house, where from a purer atmosphere and good example they might be led to mend their ways, and reduced them to a condition of lasting impotence. His arguments in no way affected me. I answered gayly, that my mission was not to regenerate society; that, after having brought about his reformation, I had done enough for the edification of my life, and asked for nothing more.

During the spring of our third year at Nice, young Prince de Viviane came to live in a villa near ours. A great train of horses accompanied him, and a lady, said to be English, which one might believe from the prismatic splendor of her toilets. Although my grandmother was intimate with the Princess Dowager, I did not remember to have seen her son, who led a not very reputable life, partly in Paris, but ordinarily at the different watering places. Scarcely had he arrived when he scandalized our little colony by his dissipation, his frightful gambling, and his more than equivocal household arrangements. My husband, who had been at school with him, and retained a sort of childish affection for him, was much put out by his arrival, and particularly on account of his living so near us. Through good luck, however, we had not met him during the early portion of his stay at Nice.

One morning, I was walking with my child and her nurse in the garden attached to our villa, which had several ranges of terraces communicating with each other by long flights of marble steps; the lowest of these terraces faced the public road, and reached it by means of a last flight of a dozen steps, whose iron gate was left open during the day. We were leaning over the balustrade and looking at the white sails passing over the blue sea, which seemed to fascinate my little daughter. All at once the noise of horses' feet drew our attention to the road, and we saw approaching us at a walk a gentleman and lady on horseback. The amazon dress worn by the latter was very costly and very ugly. With other ungraceful ornaments, she wore a magnificent white feather twisted round a jockey hat. But she appeared to me to be very beautiful. As the couple passed under our garden, my child became very restless, and at last quite furious. She stretched out her hands and cried with all her might, while the nurse, who was an Italian, began to sing her most quieting songs to her. The sound of the music caused the gentleman to look up. On perceiving me, he stared and raised his hat; then stopping short, he said, smiling:

"What's the matter with the baby, nurse?"

Much surprised at this familiarity, I drew back a short distance, and told the nurse not to answer. The woman did not understand me, but quickly began talking with the gentleman. She ended by saying:

"I guess the little one wants Madame's white feather."

"Give her the feather, Sarah," said the young man, turning to his companion.

The latter undid the feather from her hat, and threw it toward the terrace; but it was so light that it did not reach it. The young man catching it as it fell threw it again with greater force, but quite as unsuccessfully.

"Well, then," said he, very loud, "I will carry it myself to the child."

Immediately his horse began to step upon the marble, but balked, slipped, backed, and snorted. I heard all this from the clump of orange trees behind which I had taken refuge, and was asking myself, not without considerable fear, who this fool might be, when suddenly I saw him make his appearance like an equestrian statue on the ground of the terrace and advance triumphantly toward us. He bowed to me again, but very low this time, stooped to put the feather into the child's hand, whom this apparition had already quieted, then bowed once more, and made his horse go down the steps, but I don't know how. When a few minutes after I related the adventure to my husband:

"That must be Viviane," said he; "that's just his way."

It was he, in fact. That very evening he called upon us, giving as a reason therefor his former intimacy with Monsieur de Louvercy. I beheld a tall, thin, fair complexioned young man, with a bold eye, fine cut features, and worn expression—such a figure as might belong to the Court of the Valois. He was genial and very witty. My husband received him very cordially. My manner was colder, but I thanked him for the feather, not exactly knowing whether his politeness had been offered to my child, my nurse, or myself.

This visit was followed by several others at short intervals. I felt that his sallies, and his lively, though somewhat wild, humor amused my husband, and yet I could not take upon myself to invite him to remain at the house. The Prince had had too much sense and usage of the world not to perceive the icy reserve which I showed him, and, notwithstanding his perfect self-possession, he at times looked somewhat discomposed. My husband noticed this, and it even troubled him.

"My dear child," said he to me one day as the Prince was leaving us, "Viviane goes away feeling quite uncomfortable. You have really, when it suits you, a manner which is utterly petrifying. Come, now, let us see what the poor fellow has done."

"Nothing, my dear."

"No. But does he annoy you? Is he too amiable? I should only smile at it, you know, and receive him less cordially, so as to spare you such annoyances in future."

"I assure you," I answered, "that there is nothing of the kind. I never met the Prince outside of my salon, and you perceive that he behaves with great propriety there."

"Well, then, my dear, allow me to say that you do not. You treat him with a reserve which is really painful."

"But, dear, if I encouraged him the least bit in the world, he would bring us the young person who is living with him."

"Really, you are not in earnest?"

"May be not. But at any rate, I hate disorder in any shape. You know that I can not bear to see a piece of furniture out of its place, nor can I suffer the presence of a man who is not correct and honorable. I am not at all sensible—beware it, if you will—of that weakness attributed to our sex for men of pleasure, and this one, besides, has particular claim to the antipathy which I can not help showing him. You are aware of the intimacy which exists between his mother and my grandmother. I have more than once witnessed the despair of, and the tears shed by, the poor Princess on account of her son—so that it is long since he has occupied a place in my esteem and in my imagination which you must allow his present conduct is not of a kind to make him lose."

"All well and good, my dear. But as for the poor Princess, I can dispense with mourning on her account. It is she who has ruined her son by idolizing him, and making him believe that heaven and earth were created for his particular amusement. I remember the day when she bought him the goat carriage of the Champs Elysées. The result is, so they say, that he is going to marry that figurante from Drury Lane. Very logical, truly!"

"Very logical, my dear, but very unpleasant."

We were one week without seeing the Prince at our house. At last he came again one morning, and was closeted with Monsieur de Louvercy. They had a pretty long interview, of which my husband gave me an account immediately after it took place. Monsieur de Viviane, it seems, gave as a reason for the cessation of his visits, and he said it with sadness, that he felt that they were not agreeable to me. My husband, touched by his sadness and his feeling of mortification, answered him as an old friend would, to the effect that he ought not to be surprised if his strange course of life shocked a young wife who had been brought up with the strictest of principles; and that it depended entirely upon himself to do away with those obstacles with which he had chosen to surround himself; and that his friends of both sexes would be grateful to him for all that he did to render their intercourse with him easier and closer. "I am very indifferent as a general thing to the opinion of the world," said the Prince, "but I must acknowledge that the contempt of Madame de Louvercy is very hard for me to bear." "It is not a question of contempt, my dear friend; it is only the inconvenience of the thing;" and then they separated, the Prince looking very thoughtful.

Two days afterward, as I came home from my walk, my husband told me that Monsieur de Viviane had just left him. "I invited him to dine with us to-morrow," added he.

I opened my eyes very wide. He began to laugh, saying: "He has sent away the English woman, and written for his mother to come, which certainly deserves reward."

I agreed with him, and when the Prince made his appearance the next day I offered him my hand with more cordiality than usual. We became better friends, and from that day he was received as one of my intimate acquaintance.

However, to console himself apparently, he commenced gambling furiously. To his credit he generally lost, but one evening he told me that he had won some thirty thousand francs at baccarat.

"You are really a terrible man," said I to him, shrugging my shoulders. "When you are helped up on one side you fall on the other."

He instantly drew from his pocket a large roll of bank-bills, and presented them to me.

"For your poor people," said he.

"I accept them," said I, "but on one condition only, which is that you give me your word that you will never touch a card again."

"I do promise it."

And thus it was that I was enabled to send my grandmother thirty thousand francs for her society for young apprentices.

Finally, as he had a complete assortment of vices, he presented himself occasionally at our house when he was a little high, not to say tipsy. Nothing in the world is more horrible to me than a man in that condition, and I wonder at those women—and they are too numerous, alas!—who look upon the thing as a good joke, or else take no notice of it at all. The Prince could not misunderstand the feelings with which he inspired me on such occasions. He remembered them, and became comparatively a sober man, and thus he put the finish to this series of reforms accomplished at my instigation, and which seemed as though dedicated to me. These little triumphs, which amused my husband (who laughed a great deal when he caught the Prince modestly winking worsted at my feet, did not fail to interest and even to flatter me, but at the same time they alarmed me a little. I mistrusted all these sacrifices, asking myself whether he was not promising himself some compensation for them. These vague apprehensions, kept me on my guard with him, which he did not fail to notice. We were walking one evening on one of the terraces. The beauty of the night, the almost intoxicating odor of the orange and violet blossoms with which the air was filled, had the effect of raising his discourse to more than ordinary sentimental and poetic heights. As I rather sharply brought him to the earth again,

"Mon Dieu! madame," said he, "I do not know what more to do to disarm you of the prejudices you have against me. To please you I have put my vices far from me. I gave up all. I no longer gamble, drink, etc. What can you ask more? Shall I make a priest of myself? Tell me."

"I want only one thing more," I simply said, "which is, that you never let me question your friendship for my husband."

He bowed very respectfully, and from that moment everything in the least equivocal disappeared from his conversation.

It was at about this period that Cécile and her husband came to visit us at Nice for the second time. My correspondence with Cécile had been very frequent. To judge by her letters she was very happy, though she appeared to seek her principal amusements in the rounds of society. I found her improved and perfectly charming, but not at all toned down by marriage, and always flighty. There appeared in her manner towards her husband a sort of timidity, which struck me. He was very gentle with her, but under a certain restraint. I was surprised, and almost frightened, on this second visit to find, notwithstanding the time which had passed, how great was his influence over me. I could not hear the sound of his voice without extreme uneasiness. He was scarcely twenty-four hours with us before I was seeking some cause for shortening his visit. He furnished it himself by a singular indiscretion, which, though I understood it afterward, at the time seemed perfectly incomprehensible.

Had my husband discovered in his heart some secret warning of what was passing in mine? Or was he then feeling the first attacks of the cruel disease which already threatened him? I do not know; but from the day which followed the arrival of Monsieur d'Eblis he became more gloomy. Monsieur d'Eblis asked me in an embarrassed and confidential way one morning if I had remarked this change in Roger's disposition. On my answering affirmatively, he permitted himself, half in joke and half in earnest, to allude to the Prince de Viviane's attentions to me, leaving me to understand that they might have caused the irritability of my husband. I knew that Monsieur de Louvercy was perfectly at ease on that point, and even too much so as far as the Prince was concerned, and I felt certain that Monsieur d'Eblis in this instance was not his interpreter, but that he was speaking rather on his own account. This shocked me to the utmost degree. I am not a saint; I had forgiven him as well as I could his preferring Cécile to me, and his marrying her after making love to me; but that he should presume to arrogate to himself any right of conjugal surveillance over me was a little too much. So I said:

"Since you have the kindness to interest yourself about the secrets of my family and the peace of my household, I will tell you that you are both right and wrong in your suppositions. I believe you are right in attributing the sadness of my husband to a slight feeling of jealousy, but you are entirely mistaken as to the person who is the cause of it."

At these words he became very pale, bowed, and left me. Two days afterward he announced to us that he was recalled to Paris, and he went away on the same evening, leaving his wife with us.

I remember that the day after his departure Cécile very bluntly asked me this singular question:

"Do you think," said she, "that my husband is happy?"

"Well, ma chérie, you ought to know that better than I."

"I fear," replied she, shaking her pretty head, "I fear that he is not. I am too frivolous, too worldly, too much carried away by pleasure. I drag him after me like a martyr—poor man! I reproach myself for it, and yet I continue to do it. Always that devil which possesses me, you see. He does not complain to you? Has he never told you that he was unhappy? Come, now, truly?"

I answered that I had really never been the recipient of any of Monsieur d'Eblis' confidences. Thereupon she recovered all her cheerfulness. She remains with us a fortnight, and although my friendship for her continued as strong and tender as ever, I saw her go away with a sense of relief. Perfectly pure and upright as she was, she was too striking a person to be easily guarded. The five portions of the globe represented at Nice buzzed around her like a swarm of bees, and my husband insisted that she should be kept right and day under a mosquito net. Completely surprised with such kind of attentions, she continued to like them nevertheless, and was put out with those who did not offer them. So it was that she became annoyed at the marked indifference which the Prince de Viviane showed on her account. She said I had made a simpleton of him, and ought to lead him about with a red ribbon.

Alas! all our gaiety disappeared with her. A few weeks after her departure, the health of my husband, which seemed to be restored, grew rapidly worse. Frightful symptoms succeeded each other, becoming more and more aggravated. The rest of his sad life was only agony for both of us, and toward the end of the following winter I had the great misfortune to lose him. After much acute suffering, he died calmly, while thanking me for having afforded him a few happy years. Monsieur d'Eblis, who came to be near him at his last hour, wept over him with all the transports of despair. I pass quickly over these bitter recollections. God knows that any expression of my grief, strong as it might be, would not lack in sincerity; but at the hour in which I am writing this it would scarcely seem becoming.

I passed the first months of my mourning at Louvercy with my mother-in-law, and afterward I took up my residence with my grandmother, at Paris, counting upon dividing my life between these two very dear relations.

Great mental shocks like those which I had experienced seem at first to cause a suspension of the life that is in us, and to arrest its movement forever. Our tastes, our feelings, our passions, come to a standstill as though stupefied by the blow, and we almost believe that they have come to an end. Little by little, however, the heart begins to beat again, and the mind to think. At first this unfortunate persistence of life is almost painful, but we get used to it, for it is God's will.

Very naturally my daughter occupied the first place in my new existence; but this interest, great as it was, did not absorb all my heart. I had found again dear friends in Paris, and among the dearest and most faithful were Cécile and her husband. I saw Cécile almost every day. She related in her sprightliest vein the gossip of the city and of society; she brightened my solitude, and loaded me with the most delicate attentions, and my affection for her was revived in all its strength. Her husband I saw less often; but he never let an opportunity pass in which he could be useful or agreeable to me. Throughout all the painful circumstances and sad details which crowd such events, and the business questions which are mixed up with them, he had shown me the devotion and care of a brother. By Monsieur de Louvercy's will he had been appointed guardian of my daughter, and seemed to have bestowed upon her the only impassioned sentiment of his life, the heroic friendship he had felt for her father.

It is needless to say that I had entirely forgiven him for his singular indiscretion with regard to Prince de Viviane and myself. He showed that he remembered it, and wished to make up for it by treating the Prince with greater politeness whenever they met at my house—for Monsieur de Viviane was then living in Paris, and I received him often and on familiar terms, his conduct having been worthy of all praise during the last months of our stay at Nice.

The only uneasiness which Monsieur d'Eblis caused me was wholly involuntary on his part, and without knowing that he did it. I had only myself to reproach for the unsatisfactory kind of pleasure with which I anticipated his visits, and for the suppressed emotion which always took possession of me in his presence; but I sincerely hoped that these unfortunate remains of my old attachment would become effaced little by little and finally disappear. I hoped it the more because his grave and respectful politeness to me was calculated to quiet, rather than to trouble, my heart. I was feeling, however, extreme solicitude, which at the time I thought was purely affectionate, in consequence of his bearing toward Cécile, the condition of their relations to each other and the strange turn their married life had taken. As I had discovered at Nice, owing to certain explanations, it was Cécile, contrary to all logic, who seemed to have got the upper hand in their household. She had entirely thrown off all the control that the intellectual and moral superiority of her husband ought naturally to exercise over her, and Monsieur d'Eblis did not apparently trouble himself about it. He submitted to all the worldly and dissipated habits of his young wife with an indifference, or a resignation, which was inconceivable. After having for a long time gone with her into society, which was not an agreeable thing for him to do, he began to allow her to go alone. All this surprised me very much, and I asked myself what effect it had upon their intimate relations, and whether they loved each other and were happy. Not being able to question them on such delicate points, I began to study with great curiosity, not to say avidity, their language, their expression, their bearing toward each other, so as if possible to draw some conclusion from them. But Monsieur d'Eblis, with his serious grace of manner, had all the impassability of a sphinx, and Cécile, with her levity, was equally difficult to get at.

The world was as surprised as I at the singularities presented by this household, and even began to talk about them. One day Captain d'Eblis was at my house when the Prince de Viviane came in. Monsieur d'Eblis, according to his almost too polite custom, left very soon, after having exchanged with him a few friendly words. As soon as he had gone, the Prince said:

"You have a cousin there whom I like very much, but who is at the same time a veritable enigma to me."

"Why an enigma?"

"Because, with all his merit and all his high sense of honor, he seems to have determined to ruin his charming wife."

"I do not understand you—absolutely."

"How! Don't you see that he neglects her more and more? He does even worse than neglect her, when he permits her to take Madame Godfrey as a chaperon."

"Who is this Madame Godfrey, then?"

"Madame Godfrey, Madame, was formerly a very beautiful and much courted lady, not to say more. She is to-day one of those stars which are in their decline, who, having no longer pretensions to any direct homage, arrange so as to receive it in oblique ways by surrounding themselves with young satellites and profiting by their reflected light."

[CONTINUED IN NEXT NUMBER.]

THE LAST POOL.

Through the murmuring sycamore branches
Swept the breeze from the south, fresh and cool,
And the hues of the leaves, autumn tinted,
Lay in trembling sheen on the pool.

The song of the stream had been silenced
In the heat of the summer past,
And in all the bed of the river
This leaf-shadowed pool was the last.

This last, lone pool of the river,
In the shade of the sycamore tree,
To the heart of the man, world weary,
Had a type and a likeness for me.

When the heats of passion are over
And hopes given way to distrust,
When the brightness and joy of existence
Are dimmed with the canker and rust,

Though all may seem arid and worthless,
And the founts of feeling be dry,
There is still in the soul, closely guarded
And remote from the passers-by,

One spring, which wears all the freshness
Of those days when the heart was green,
One spot, like the pool in the river,
Fair and pure in its shadow and sheen.

When the traveler, footsore and weary,
Comes suddenly, unprepared,
On a river pool, lonely and lovely,
Which the heats of summer have spared,

His heart is filled with thanksgiving,
And he blesses the path which led
His steps to this secret beauty
In the arid river bed.

So, when the human hearted
Find in the darkest breast
This spring, which has never yielded
To the heats that consumed the rest,

They bless the hope it brings them
That the showers will some time come,
When the silent current of feeling
Shall no longer be dry and dumb.

SAN FRANCISCO, October 28, 1878. DANIEL O'CONNELL.

Weavers We.

Weavers we at the loom of Time,
Swift are our shuttles flying;
Warp and woof we're weaving fast,
Ever our life-task plying;

In sunshine and shade, in pleasure and gloom,
Weave we Life's tissue on Time's busy loom.

Threads of gold through the bright new woof
Gleam when the work is begun;
The gold pales off in dull gray hues
And fades ere the work is done;

While some strands are snarled, and the tangled skein
Is soiled in the weaving with salt tears' stain.

Weave we the warp as weave we may,
Vain our toil, vain all our skill;
Drovered by Fate, the web shall be
Not the fashion of our will—

For a double thread e'er runs through the web,
In the fairest stitch some false loop is left.

Alas! who gayest wove at dawn,
As slow the dull lengths unrel,
Most weary at the evening's close
Toils on at the restless wheel.

Till he snaps his thread, and his shuttle drops,
When the loom with its unshaped fabric stops.

Then One picks up the broken ends,
Tangled by Error and Doubt,
Forms of the web the weaver wove,
As He smooths the roughness out,

Whatever the worker fashioned below—
His robe of light or his garment of woe.

SAN FRANCISCO, November, 1878. JULIA CLINTON JONES.

Ode to the Owl.

Most bilious bird, slow blinking there
In gravest quiet, glare, oh, glare!
Some wondrous purpose lurks inside
Those orbs which shine so round and wide;

But what, thou Owl? Why hold that breath
In seerey next door to death,
Then clear the cobwebs from thy throat
With direst strains e'er sent afloat?

Enigma of the open eye,
When winds of night all peaceful lie
And noiseless clouds go cross the moon,
Why start that cemetery tune?

Unearthed cock of Erebus,
Astounding, solemn, ominous,
Thou forest fixture, once declare
Why thou art nailed so stiffly there;

Proclaim, O bust of silence,
Thy true Promethean distress!
SACRAMENTO, November 5, 1878. JOHN VANCE CHENLEY.

Lavender.

The Summer days are laid away
With crumpled leaves of lavender:
So they keep sweet for evermore,
So that their perfumes ever may

Float from the still white things, and stir
Our hearts as we pass the open door.
They are only clothes our dead have worn.
What need to fret and make ado

Over a crease or stain of mould,
Or feel a heart-pang when they're torn
By curious hands? What need to rue
The dust that gathers in their folds?

The subtle scent of lavender
Stirs us still with a far-off pain;
Then we forget, and, by and by,
Not even the breath of musk or myrrh

Could make us look on our dead again
With the same eyes that watched them die.
But, after the gates of Summer close,
We sometimes find in a rose's heart

A sensuous perfume, rich and rare,
As if the soul of every rose
Which made of the Summer-time a part
Had been lured back and prisoned there.

So, while we fold our memories
With fast-dropped tears and lavender,
Something that has no name or place—
Something hidden from earthly eyes—

Is filling our lives with the days that were,
And rounding them into fairer grace.

BELMONT, October 20th. Q. T.

OLLA-PODRIDA.

The ordinary man who has worried through life as the husband of one woman, who has been subjected to the vicissitudes of matrimony—now crowing in triumph like a chanticleer from the top bar after a domestic misunderstanding, and anon lying helpless, wrecked, and wave-lashed upon the matrimonial shore with the breakers beating over him—will read with great interest and profound sympathy the case of Elder Miles, the English Mormon, who, in one rash, adventurous day, took to himself three wives. Elder Miles had been a sailor. He had braved the storms and breasted the tempest when in their mad fury they assailed the bark that bore him. He had looked upon the ocean in the wild fury of its madness; he had stood with unblanched cheek when the lightnings played around him, and undismayed when the roar of thunders mingled with the roar of angry seas. Elder Miles is a brave man; and, to illustrate a valor that has no parallel in story, no equal in classic legend, no comparison in modern life, he determined to take to himself three wives all in one day—and he did it. Miss Owens was an early love—a buxom, red cheeked, strong armed English girl. To her he had pledged himself before he went roving on the seas, and at a time when the writings of the prophets, Mormon and Moroni, and the interpretation of the Latter-Day Saints, Jo Smith and Brigham Young, had not revealed to him the possible happiness involved in the possession of a harem of many married wives. He settled at Salt Lake, sent to England for the lovely Owens, and in the meantime engaged himself to two American girls—whom the Owens, in her anger, designates as “nasty squaws”—and made preparations at the Endowment House for the triple ceremony—tria juncta in uno. Owens claimed, by virtue of an earlier engagement, to be entitled to become the first wife. The inexorable rule of the Mormon Church declared that Miss Emily Spencer was entitled to that distinction by virtue of her years. We commend the Mormon religion to our older girls; it does not encourage fibs in reference to age. The ceremony took place. Elder Miles was sealed to his three wives; he endowed them with all his worldly goods, and they pledged themselves to leave father and mother and cling, all of them, to Miles—to love, honor, and obey him, to stick to him in sickness, in health, in prosperity and adversity, when stocks were booming and when the market was off. After the wedding ceremony came the wedding dinner, and Owens—wife No. 2—determined to be the first of the family to throw the cat out of the window. Such a wedding demanded a litter of cats to determine the domestic supremacy. Owens was equal to the emergency. She swung the feline and made it lively times at the banquet. She clawed poor Emily, slapped her in the face, scratched the valiant Miles, broke up the dance, made a general row, left the house, claimed the protection of the United States Marshal, instigated a law suit, and set all Mormonism by the ears.

Now, we did not intend to tell the story of this English Mormon scandal, but only to state the fact that Elder Miles married three women in one day, and draw some moral reflections from the fact. Three wives! Only think of it, my poor, dear hen-pecked reader; only think of three wives all in one house, and all contending for the dignity and supremacy of “first wife!” Let bachelors skip the balance of this article, for we are writing of mysteries beyond their comprehension. Brigham Young had seventeen wives; Brother Miles starts out in married life with three. We look upon him as a brave man who dares to shoulder the responsibility of one wife in this age of luxurious living and extravagant domestic expenditure, but three or seventeen! Great God, what a fearful experiment! Just imagine for a moment that the wave of civilization should sweep over Mormonism, bearing to it all the results of fashionable society. For the sake of striking the average of wives between three or seventeen, let us suppose ourselves encumbered with seven—one for each day of the week; all young, good looking, fashionable, well educated, ambitious, prolific. The months roll round, and baby-hands clutch the horns of the domestic altar. Let us, for the sake of illustration, say twenty-one babies in three years. Twenty-one times the doctor comes; twenty-one monthly nurses; twenty-one diapers drying around the kitchen fire; twenty-one ceremonies of putting the babies into short clothes; twenty-one pairs of shoes at a time; twenty-one multiples of each article of dress; seven babies teething all at once; seven whooping with a cough; seven with chicken-pox, and measles, and scarlatina, and scarlet fever. And then the wives! Seven French bonnets; seven red satin corsets; seven pairs of four-button kid gloves; seven pairs of French boots; seven dresses for a party; seven sets of diamonds; seven sets of laces, Brussels, Valenciennes, and Duchesse; seven India cashmere shawls; seven one-horse phaetons; seven mothers-in-law; seven sets of poor relations. Time rolls on, children multiply, and boys and girls become young gentlemen and ladies. We are bewildered in contemplating the complications that will weave themselves around the many-wed Elder Miles as years advance—the responsibility of governing so many wives, of guiding so many boys through all the incidents of life's journey, from the first boots to the first ballot, and directing so many girls from infancy to their final destination at the Endowment House.

We have been favored with the advance printed sheets of School Superintendent Mann's first annual report. It is a fair average specimen of the reasoning of a schoolmaster who hopes for renomination and reelection, and in failure of such an event expects to drop back into a soft berth at a good salary. All the important questions now being considered by indignant taxpayers he has either dodged or straddled. To the broad indictment that the free public school system of San Francisco is a departure from the original idea—that it is extravagant, unjust, and a virtual robbery of tax-payers—he makes no answer. To the charge that it is a crime to tax property to educate the children of poor or rich in anything beyond a liberal and generous English education, he makes no answer. He does not explain upon what principle of justice the tax-payer is compelled to educate children in calisthenics, military drill, physics, botany, geology, mineralogy, telegraphy, chemistry, music, drawing, German, French, the higher mathematics, or any of the ornamental branches of education. We would be pleased if

Mr. A. L. Mann, or Mr. John Swett, or Mr. Herbst, or any body else, would explain to the writer of this article why he should contribute to educate their children in any of these branches. Why not pay to make carpenters, masons, or farmers of them as well as telegraphic operators? Why not ask us to educate your girls in dressmaking, cooking, or the graceful accomplishment of dancing, as well as music, painting in oil, as well as drawing? If Messrs. Mann, Swett, and Herbst are poor we recognize the obligation to give their children an English education, upon the same principle that we would give them food or clothes if destitute, and provide them homes if abandoned. Please inform us upon what principle of right do you exact from the tax-payer money to educate the children of French, or German, or American citizens in the French and German language. If the German, or the French, or the American parent, desires this accomplishment, why should he not pay for it? What better argument is there for teaching German children German, or French children French, than for teaching Italian, Portuguese, Spanish, or any other of the foreign languages? Why not teach the Celtic, and old Irish, Scotch, and Slavonic tongues? Why not Hebrew? The Irish, the Scotch, the Slavonians, the Italians, the Portuguese, the Spanish, and the Hebrew can all vote. “1779 pupils are engaged upon studies outside of ordinary English branches,” says the report. There are 1219 pupils in the high schools; there are 2811 studying French and German in cosmopolitan schools; there are seven music teachers earning $11,400 a year; how many special teachers for the other flummery departments of the schools we do not know. The report is exceedingly barren of statistics, suggesting a studied attempt to keep all the damaging figures out of sight. We suggest to Mr. Superintendent A. L. Mann that his report shall contain a tabulated statement of the expenditures of the department, so arranged that we—the tax-payers—may figure for ourselves the expenditures that go to teach simple English branches, and those that are disbursed for what we please to style the flummies of a vicious, extravagant school system, based upon sentimentality, and upheld by demagoguery. If we desired to make a facetious article we would call attention to that part of the report where our very gallant Superintendent of Schools squirms and wriggles between his “noble scorn of saving money for the tax-payers,” and his desire to economize $90,000 per annum out of the earnings of six hundred and fifty school marms. He would not reduce the pay of the fifty male teachers who get $200 per month, but would that of the women teachers, who for the same—and we believe oftentimes better—work get $65 per month. If the word “male” were stricken from the law that qualifies voters, and women could attend primaries and party conventions, Mr. A. L. Mann would have a bee in his bonnet. Perhaps he will as it is. If we had the control of the school moneys and the school department, we would first take away the salaries from the Board of Education, and expect it to be filled with educated gentlemen of independent means, who could afford to devote one afternoon and evening in a month to school legislation, and whose position in society would place them above the suspicion of dishonest practices. We would eliminate from our schools the teaching of anything except what is embraced in a liberal interpretation of the expression, “rudimentary elements of an English education.” This would justify us in discharging nearly all the male teachers, all the cosmopolitan teachers; in abolishing all the cosmopolitan schools, and all the special teachers. We would discharge the mob of janitors, stove-pipe inspectors, and politicians that has fastened itself upon the department, and in the place of ward hummers would have our school rooms swept and fires made by honest working women. In this way we would not so over-educate the poor man's boy that he should be ashamed of his father's hod or shovel; nor the poor girl to look down with ungrateful scorn upon the wash-board and tub by means of which an honest mother has gained an honest support. We would thus by a sensible economy save to San Francisco at least six hundred thousand dollars per annum, and secure a system of education out of which would come laborers, mechanics, manufacturers, sailors, and adventurous workers, as well as lawyers' clerks, office boys to curb-stone brokers, and idle hangers on and expectants of paternal support. When Messrs. Mann, Swett, and Herbst come to answer the conundrums we have proposed, let them please to give us the per centage of high-school boys who have engaged in any occupation demanding physical labor; let them tell us how many have gone to mechanical employments, to the farm, to the grocery, to the mine, to the forest, to the merchant ship, to carve out for themselves a career by honest toil.

A banker of the best-knowns and most honorables sends out from his office for a cab. The hackman, who has often seen him before, salutes him amicably.

“Hurry up,” says the banker. “Drive me to the station of the railroad of the north.”

The reader should understand that this short line to Belgium is much affected by assistant district-attorneys and other gentlemen who have previously borne an unblemished reputation.)

“Tsh! Not so loud; don't give yourself away,” says the driver, pleasantly, to the banker, whose only aim and object is to get out to a friend's place for a day's shooting. Then, as the horse flies up the street, he adds, contemplatively, “They all do it.”

The Baltimore Gazette says, editorially, of Mrs. Hayes: “As an elegant, refined, matronly woman she is far superior to Mr. Hayes.” Of course she is. As a woman, Mr. Hayes is not to be compared with his wife.

Mrs. Peters asked rather sharply: “Do you think that a little temper is a bad thing in a woman?” And the gallant philosopher replied: “Certainly not; it is a good thing, and she shouldn't lose it.”

The following is an extract from a letter introduced in a recent breach of promise case: “Dearest Love—I swallowed the postage-stamp on your letter because I knew your lips had touched it.”

Happy is the man who has neighbors willing to forgive his mistakes.

PONY GLASSES OF FRENCH BRANDY.

ANAGRAMMES DE QUELQUES PERSONNAGES CELEBRES.

Pierre de Ronsard.—Rose de l'indare.

Marie Touchet (maitresse de Charles IX.)—Je charme tout.

Frère Jacques Clément (assassin de Henri III.)—C'est l'enfer qui m'a créé.

Pierre Coton.—Perce ton roi.

Louis treizième, roi de France et de Navarre.—Roi très-rare, estimé dieu de la fauconnerie.

Louis quatorzième, roi de France et de Navarre.—Va, Dieu confondra l'armée qui osera te résister.

Marie Thérèse d'Autriche (femme de Louis XIV.)—Mariée au roi très-chrétien.

Voltaire.—O alte vir.

Napoléon, empereur des Français.—Un pape serf a sacré le noir démon.

Il y a une infinité d'erreurs utiles au bonheur ou aux plaisirs de notre vie.

Il y a autant de plaisir à aimer qu'à être aimé.

Un amant a toutes les qualités et tous les défauts qu'un mari n'a pas.—Balzac.

On aime parce qu'on aime. Cette explication est encore la plus sérieuse et la plus décisive qu'on ait trouvée pour la solution de ce problème.

Faire naître un désir, le nourrir, le développer, le grandir, l'irriter, le satisfaire: c'est un poème tout entier.

Les coquettes sont comme certains chasseurs qui aiment la chasse et non le gibier.

Le métier de femme est bien dur.—Mme. d'Épinay.

Se voir, paraître s'aimer, se le jurer, se le prouver, se brouiller, se haïr, se quitter pour courir après un autre amour, voilà l'histoire d'un moment et de tous les jours dans la comédie du monde.—Ph. de Varanne.

Un enfant disait à son père:

—Les femmes ne vont donc jamais en paradis?

—D'où vient, dit le père surpris, cette demande singulière?

—C'est répliqua l'enfant, que je ne vois jamais,

Malgré leurs figures gentilles,

De petits anges qui soient faits

Comme sont les petites filles.

C'est en ne faisant rien que les femmes apprennent à mal faire.—Publius Syrus.

La destinée des femmes est de plaire, d'être aimables et d'être aimés; ceux qui ne les aiment point ont encore plus de tort que ceux qui les aiment trop.—Rochebrune.

—“Je canoniserais gratis une femme dont le mari ne se serait jamais plaint.”—Sixte V.

Les deux mots les plus courts à prononcer, oui et non, sont assurément ceux qui demandent le plus sérieux examen.—Pythagore.

Un jeune homme, fort amoureux de sa jolie cousine, la suppliait un jour de lui faire la charité d'un seul baiser. —Je ne puis rien pour vous, Monsieur, lui répondit-elle, absolument rien... j'ai mes pauvres.

—Quelle différence y a-t-il de moi à une montre, demandait une dame à un jeune homme. —Madame, répondit-il, une montre marque les heures, et, près de vous, on les oublie.

Un jeune homme timide rôdait depuis quelque temps auprès d'une jeune fille, assise dans un jardin public, sans oser lui adresser la parole. Tout à coup, il aperçut une araignée qui montait sur son banc, et saisissant aussitôt l'occasion il dit: Mademoiselle, vous avez une grosse bête derrière vous. —Ah, Monsieur, répondit la jeune fille, je ne savais pas que vous étiez là.

Les premiers soupirs de l'amour sont les derniers de la sagesse.

Heureuse, après une longue absence d'avoir retrouvé l'amour et ses plaisirs, une dame écrivait une jour à une de ses amies:

Un sourire de mon amant

A rappelé l'enfant volage;

Un baiser l'a rendu charmant,

Mais rien n'a pu le rendre sage.

L'amour est comme un flambeau: plus il est agité, plus il brûle.—Syrus.

La femme, chez les sauvages, est une bête de somme; en Orient, un meuble; en Europe, un enfant gâté.—Sénac de Meilhan.

Une femme inconstante est celle qui n'aime plus; une légère, celle qui en aime déjà un autre; une volage, celle qui ne sait si elle aime et ce qu'elle aime; une indifférente, celle qui n'aime rien.—La Bruyère.

N'avaient-ils pas raison ces deux sages, l'un riant dès qu'il mettait le pied dehors, l'autre pleurant sans cesse? Toutefois, le sarcasme sied mieux à la satire, et je m'étonne que l'eau de ses yeux ait pu suffire aux larmes d'Héraclite. Démocrite riait donc à pleins poulmons.—Juvénal.

Quand les femmes ne peuvent se venger, elles font comme les enfants, elles pleurent.—Cardan.

Beaucoup de femmes n'ont de chaste que les oreilles.

Tel cherchait rose qui a trouvé épine.

L'examen de la nature humaine est humiliant.

November 4, 1878. L. G. J. m

PRELUDES--IN DIVERS KEYS.

"Wilt thou have music? Hark! Apollo plays."

I did but scant justice, last week, to the great feature of the Orchestral Matinee, Beethoven's Leonore Overture, No. 3, and feel moved to come back to it for a brief space. [It will be observed that I persist in designating it as No. 3, the profoundly learned Herr "Doppelkreuz," of the Post, and his not always infallible authority, Dr. Grove, to the contrary notwithstanding. Somehow I prefer to trust, firstly, Beethoven himself, who composed it; secondly, Breitkopf and Härtel, who published it from the composer's MSS. in 1810; thirdly, Moschelles, Schindler, and von Breuning, who were contemporaneous with the composition and production of it; and, lastly, the internal evidences of the work itself.] It is a difficult matter to either analyze or describe a musical composition in mere words with any hope of making one's self understood; the only intelligent way would be to send to each reader a copy of the score, which in most cases would also have to be accompanied by some one who could read it to them. But as I desire to touch only one or two points with regard to the Overture, leaving the rest to such study as my readers may choose to devote to it (it is to be had in arrangements for two or four hands, and is not over difficult), perhaps I shall not drift so far into the nebula but that those who are interested may follow me. The points to which I would direct attention are, firstly, the wonderful conciseness and precision of form—the mould, as it were, in which the composition is cast—in which the development of the themes, without the sacrifice of aught of the flow or grace of beautiful music, may be said to proceed like a succession of powerful blows, each delivered more forcefully than the last. The short opening theme of the Allegro (note that this had already been used, and seemingly exhausted, in the Overture No. 2) will be found to recur again and again, always with the same epigrammatic terseness. The instrumental color changes, but the intense suggestiveness of the theme is never weakened. The second subject, no less beautiful than the first, is equally dramatic; it grows almost painful in its passionate earnestness. Like the first, it is short, pithy, almost abrupt. Its musical cadence is perfect as the most exquisite line of Swinburne, yet it urges constantly with resistless energy toward the fateful trumpet-call in which the tragedy seems to culminate. This wonderful Fanfare (which, by the way, should be played behind, not on, the stage, as Mr. Herold had it done) brings me to my second point, viz.: the enormous dramatic expression attained through the use of two simple themes by a master hand. There are no words with which to describe this; it must be heard, must be felt. There is nothing finer anywhere in Shakespeare, and in the whole range of music—even in Beethoven—I know of nothing lovelier than the pianissimo episode in G flat that follows the second Fanfare. It is like a glimpse through the open portals of heaven. This Overture ought to be played again, and, if it is, I trust that the public will appreciate the fact that it has the opportunity of hearing it.

What with orchestral and quintet concerts, vocal clubs, piano lessons, etc., San Francisco may be said to be undergoing a musical revival. Yet I think it must be admitted that in the midst of all this Euterpean activity, the service of God comes in for a very minute share of the improvement. It has always stood to me as proof positive of the hollowness of our affected taste for Art that in this city, where people of a certain class talk about pictures (even buy one occasionally, when it is not too good), household art (fimsiest of modern fashions), and bric-a-brac, with all the garrulous gush of a just completed course of "High Art Made Easy," or "Aesthetics in Ten Lessons without a Master," almost every attempt to cultivate the better class of church music has met with the most signal failure, and the only thing that has been permanently able to hold its own has been the utterly despicable and bad. If I believed in the fashionable art culture—that is, if I imagined it to be a real thing—I might be somewhat surprised that these people who admire prints from Raphael and Dürer, photographs from Michael Angelo, or casts from the Greek marbles, should not have some idea of bringing the same kind of taste into their churches; I might ask whether a mere sense of the fitness of things ought not to have some little weight with music committees whose duty is to provide the music for Gothic churches and cultured congregations with their fervid and eloquent high-priced parsons? I might ask many things; but I do not ask them, because I do not believe in the sham culture; because I do not believe that most of these people care a button for their Raphaels and Durers, but have them because it's the proper thing; because I do believe that, in the utter degradation of most of the church music of this city, those who pay for it find what is thoroughly congenial and to their taste. It relieves for them the tedium of the hour or two of attendance that is enforced by the usages of good society—acts as a sort of escape-valve for the desperate ennui that overcomes them at the church door. It helps to pass the time. Good music wouldn't do that for them; it is not amusing. The bad stuff is amusing in more senses than they dream of; and, as they pay for it, I suppose they are entitled to their choice. Chacun a son goût, etc.

I got a taste of this sort of thing at the First Congregational Church (Dr. Stone's) last Sunday morning. Here they have an amateur organist who seems to know no more about the true manner of treating his instrument than he does about a proper style of church music, or any thing connected with his duties. He has a quartet of lovely good voices—a good soprano, respectable contralto, ditto tenor (whose nasal organ occasionally obtrudes itself upon the voice), and an even, though rather light-weight, basso. The organ is also quite good. With this material one might do something—if one had the brains. But what is done there is worse than nothing; it is offensive in the highest degree. The organist has not the good sense to select his voluntaries from the compositions of those who know how to write, so he sits there in solemn service and twaddles. He pours out treacle and water until one's stomach is fairly turned with it. Accompaniments and interludes are done in a similar style, with the added agony of occasional false relations, progressions of parallel fifths, etc., etc. Then comes the quartet, which takes up the hymn and jerks it out, literally, fragment by fragment. Why this is done, heaven only knows; but done it is, and somewhat after this style:

"Jeru—sa-lem—my hap—py home."

Now, imagine this in triple time, with the up-beat on the first syllable and a rest of a full beat where I have put a dash; add a staccato to each second syllable, and you have the thing as nearly as I can render it. It was very funny, but a little out of place. There was more of the same sort, but I have neither space nor patience for it. That the contralto sang "Flee as a bird to thy mountain" in the Offertory almost goes without saying; a week ago it was Schubert's "Elegy of Tears," and next week it may be "In the Sweet By and By." [I can not stop here to say what I think of this use of well-known secular songs in worship; I may come back to it another time.] The whole performance was shocking, and the contrast of it with the simple earnestness and fervor of Dr. Stone's words and manner was inexpressibly painful. It was a cheap pinchbeck setting to a gem—a Palais Royale frame to a picture by Flandrin. It was the more painful because entirely unnecessary. The soprano, Mrs. Howell, has a good style, and naturally correct taste; I have heard her sing beautifully. Mr. Jansen, the basso, can also sing well, and I fancy, prefers to. What this amateur organist should do, then, would be to endeavor to elevate the tone of his performance to the style of these singers, instead of dragging them down to his unmusical level; and if he has no respect for the congregation that employs and pays him, let him at least remember that what he does is portion of a Divine service, and that God is not to be fitly served out of the audacity of ignorance and utter incompetency.

The Sacred Concert given at the First Unitarian Church last Sunday evening, under the direction of Mr. S. W. Leach, was in many respects very enjoyable, and reflects credit upon that gentleman's good taste. The small chorus sang very nicely, and, although somewhat overweighted in the Anthem by Garratt—a noble composition, but quite evidently designed for a large chorus—gave evidence of careful, intelligent training. Mrs. Marriner-Campbell was heard in an Aria in the grand style—"Rejoice greatly," from the Messiah—and I think I never heard her sing so well. Her voice is of somewhat light calibre for this kind of thing, but what was lacking in volume was made good in the perfect neatness of the florid passages (and very difficult they are) and discreet management of the Cantabile. Mrs. Pierce also sang—a song by Wallace—modestly and pleasantly, and Mr. Clark wrestled with the "Cujus animan." He went at it as though he was afraid of it, and well he might be. Then there was a song by Mr. Campbell (not at his best), a vocal quartet and trio, over which I draw the kindly veil, etc., and some violin playing by Mr. Heyman, of which more anon. Mr. Hunt accompanied on the organ with considerable intelligence, but also with the customary occasional exhibition of the Achilles heel of the amateur who is blissfully ignorant of (and probably supremely indifferent to) his double counterpoint. Pray, observe, Mr. Amateur, that when a basso sings a song written in the treble clef it sounds an octave lower, and what are written as a series of parallel fourths become fifths through the inversion. Now, there are no such fourths in Mr. Marti's song, and you might have come blamelessly out of the affair had you not felt moved to add certain bits of obligato counterpoint to the simple accompaniment which the composer, in his professional ignorance, considered adequate for his purpose; or had you managed your stops more discreetly, or played your obligato bit where it belonged (if at all), an octave lower. What are the odds? Oh, bless you, none—none in the least. I suppose there is no law to prevent an amateur's uglifying a man's composition in public as much as he likes. Only that sometimes it may be a little rough on the composer—that's all.

I sincerely trust that none of those who heard Mr. Heyman play the violin at this concert will permit themselves to be prejudiced against Pergolesi's lovely "Tre Giorni" on account of that gentleman's super-dry and expressionless rendering of it. The song—not in any sense of the word "Pregiera," as stated in the bills—is one of the purest specimens of the Italian school, noble, simple, exquisitely melodious. It is with just such songs as this that I would supplant the sentimental trash now in vogue among singers, and when I recall Mrs. Norton's truly artistic singing of it at the Metropolitan Temple last winter, I marvel at the temerity of this young man, who seems to have no idea of singing upon his instrument, in attempting anything of this style. He played it like an easy étude, and not well at that. The Adagio of Mendelssohn (an uninteresting bit, out of the little, early, and almost unknown violin Sonata I take it) received the same dull, mechanical treatment at his hands, with the added disadvantage of not being always perfectly in tune.

Quoth Bierce, last week, to "Doppelkreuz": "You sin without much understanding." Ah, friend B., could you but hear him vocalize you'd grin. And straightway to your "sin" add final "g."

Mr. Herold's last programme certainly should have drawn a big house; it was varied, brilliant, and interesting. But the attendance was only moderate. I suppose the Symphonies keep people away. Some of them ought to, perhaps, but certainly not the pretty, cheerful "D major" of Haydn. I should imagine that the most fervent devotee of Strauss and Offenbach could stand that, although it must be admitted that after the stunning En avant of Gungl it did sound a little tame. The music was played very much as usual, and seemed to please the audience greatly.

BONBONS.—FRENCH AND OTHERWISE.

They were playing cards, when all of a sudden the game was interrupted, angry words passed, and the players arose: "See here, you're holding altogether too many aces." "What do you say, sir?" "I say you are a swindler." "I will call you to account for this unpardonable insult." "I am at your service at any time." "Here is my card, sir." (Throws down, "by mistake, another ace which he draws from his pocket.")

"John, it seems to me that you are not doing your work as well as you used to—not as painstaking as you might be." "I will tell you why, miladi. I thought that if I would make myself indispensable, when I came to go it would cause you too much inconvenience and regret. See?"

First pickpocket, on Sunday outing, to second ditto, who lounges along with his hands in his pockets: "I say, 'Arry, it isn't genteel to keep your hands in your pockets in that way."

Second pickpocket: "Oh, that's my way of observing the day of rest. I've got 'em in other people's pockets six days in the week."

"Why don't you marry?" said Pope Alexander VII. one day to Alcei, the Librarian of the Vatican.

"So that, Your Holiness, if an opportunity offers I may enter the priesthood."

"Well, then, why don't you become a priest?"

"I don't, Your Holiness, in order that if an opportunity presents itself I may marry well."

Restaurateur—"Chicken, twenty francs."

Guest—"I say, see here, the Exposition's nearly over, you know."

Restaurateur—"That's a fact! Chicken, forty francs."

"How did Your Excellency sleep last night?" said the proprietor of the hotel to the Russian ambassador.

"I scratched myself so that I must be a Cossack this morning, my friend."

Attendant at theatre—"Hi, Monsieur, there! Where's your overcoat? Leave your overcoat with me."

Spectator—"Overcoat? I'm not wearing any overcoat."

Attendant—"Go and find one, then. Do you want to take the bread out of my mouth? What am I here for, d'you suppose, eh?"

Mme. d'A. owns a horrible cur which answers—when it wishes to—to the name of Bijou.

The other day the Countess de H. says to her: "Oh, did you know that that darling Bijou of yours made me get £50 yesterday?"

"No, how?"

"I met a friend who had never seen Bijou before, and bet him it was a dog."

The late Clement Laurier once got into conversation in a café with a very excitable individual, who, getting rather the worst of the argument, said to his opponent hotly:

"Well, young man, if you are so positive in your statements, perhaps you won't object to defending them in another position. We will meet to-morrow with such weapons as you prefer."

"Oh, I'm not a duelist," said Laurier, "I won't fight."

"I knew you wouldn't—I knew you wouldn't," said the bully, triumphantly.

"And that was why you challenged me, eh?"

The Assistant District-Attorney was about to appear before the court, and he said unto his counsel: "How do things look?"

"Pretty black," replied the advocate.

"You think I'll be sentenced?"

"I do."

"To what?"

"Six months of enforced honesty." (The prisoner groans and faints.)

The nephew was the typical nephew of the comedies and novels; the uncle, the typical uncle. The former got himself into debt; the latter had to help him out of debt.

But the most long-suffering of men at last lose patience, and one fine day the uncle writes to his dear nephew that all is over between them. Not another penny.

The nephew flies down to his uncle's country seat and falls at his venerable relative's gouty feet.

"Uncle Peter, dear Uncle Peter, just this once. Aid me to straighten out this snarl in my finances and I will never, never come to you again."

"Oh, Roland, I know you too well. My sister's son—my only sister's son," says the old man, wiping away a furtive tear.

"Ah, your heart is touched; you will assist me once more?" says the young man.

"Listen," says the aged relative; "have you a rule?"

"A which?"

"A rule—a foot-rule?"

"Why should I have one? I ain't a carpenter."

"Go and find one immediately."

The young man, puzzled but hopeful, goes, and at the end of half an hour returns and says: "Uncle, dear, here is the foot-rule."

"Very well; measure this room, length, breadth, and height, so as to ascertain its cubic dimensions."

The young man, more puzzled than ever, sets about his task, and at last makes his report.

"Uncle, the room contains 3,040 cubic feet."

"You are sure of that?"

"Absolutely."

"Very well," says the old gentleman, rising to his feet and speaking in a tone of thunder; "and now, sir, if this room, which contains 3,040 cubic feet, were filled with double eagles packed so tightly that you couldn't ram, jam, or cram a three-cent piece into it, I wouldn't give you a penny. Git!"

JOHN BROWN'S LIEUTENANT.

The Romance of Richard Realf.

Strange and romantic was the career of Richard Realf, the soldier poet, who, last Sunday, was laid by his comrades in a suicide's grave. He told the troubled story of his life to no one; kept it a close-locked prisoner in the cave of his own peculiar gloom till death and the pen of an acquaintance in New York, through the medium of the Sun, released the secret. In the year 1856, when the war against slavery had begun in the Territory of Kansas, and the struggle between the "Border Ruffians" and the "Free State" men was in active progress, a young man, who made his appearance in Lawrence among the multitude of adventurers and champions of liberty who then gathered in that wild region, attracted notice. He was at that time possessed of rare personal attractions, and whispers of mystery and romance soon arose in association with his name. The remarkable beauty of his face, the softness and delicacy of his expression, the charm of his manner, the exceptional culture of his mind, his poetical qualities, and his large knowledge of English society and literature added attraction to his courage and heroic conduct. He was evidently an Englishman, perhaps thirty years of age, and his resemblance to the portraits of Lord Byron in early life, together with the peculiarities of his mind, and his tendency to romantic and chivalrous poetry, gave color to fanciful stories that soon got afloat, to the effect that he was related by blood or very nearly connected with the hero of Missolonghi and the author of "Childe Harold." It was believed by many, even, that he was an illegitimate son of Lord Byron, and the likelihood of his connection with the poet was increased, in that he was in receipt, from time to time, of remittances from England, which were sent, it was alleged, by one of the denizens of Newstead Abbey. He was regarded as one of the most heroic spirits, and most intellectual young man, on the Free State side. He took part in scores of war-like adventures against the "Border Ruffians," was always ready for a foray or a song, flitted from part to part of the newly organized Territory wherever danger was to be encountered, associated with John Brown in his adventures at Ossawatimie River, campaigned with Jim Lane on horseback and on foot wherever that wild, and haggard, and dare devil frontiersman found a foe, and often and again was seen, in uncouth uniform, with a Sharp's rifle over his shoulder, a smile on his face, and a chanson on his lips, gay as the troubadour touching the guitar of the romanza. One of his many exploits was at the defense of Mount Oread, in the vicinity of Lawrence, which all through that time was the centre of battle and danger for the Free State men, when, with a few kindred spirits, looking from the rude fort on the top of the hill, he saw the red-shirted Missourian enemy approaching from the river. The song with which he commemorated that exploit thus opened:

"All night within our guarded tents,
Until the moon was low,
Wrapt round as with Jehovah's smile,
We waited for the foe.

His intimacy with John Brown led that stern old ironside to take him into his confidence when preparing the Virginia adventure that culminated at Harper's Ferry and on the gallows-tree at Richmond. He was one of the conspirators who, with Kagi, formed at Ossawatimie the plan of campaign in the Virginia mountains, by which the Southern slaves were to be armed as a preliminary to their rising in bloody hostility to their masters. While engaged with Brown in this work he traveled from one place to another, providing ways and means, seeing the friends who could be relied upon, and guarding the secret the revelation of which would be ruin. He was so gentle in his manners and so kindly in his ways, that he was the last who would be regarded as bearing part in such a warfare. Finally, when John Brown had drawn up his scheme of government, and chosen his officers of State for the administration of a new condition of affairs in Virginia, he appointed Richard Realf to the position of Secretary of State in his remarkable cabinet. About the time that Brown disappeared from Kansas, on his way to Virginia, Realf, as well as Brown's other followers, also disappeared from Kansas, and those who were behind the scenes supposed he would be a participant in the conflict as well as an adjudicator of the government. News came of John Brown's fight against Robert E. Lee, at Harper's Ferry, and among the names of those who in the first dispatches were reported to be killed was the name of Realf. His body could not be found, and it was reported that he had been pursued by some of the Virginia troops, wounded, and driven into the Potomac, where he was drowned. As time passed on, however, it was learned to a verity that Realf had not perished in the fight, had not been with John Brown at Harper's Ferry, and though expected to join him there, had somehow failed to do so. The suspicions of the Free State men of Kansas were aroused, and charges were every where made that Realf had turned traitor to John Brown, had sold out to the Virginia State Government or to the Federal Government, and had all along been nothing but a spy in the camp of the invaders. Such was the view taken of the romantic young English poet who so often, on the plains of Kansas, had merrily risked his life for the principles of John Brown. Years passed away, and stories were from time to time circulated that Realf had been seen here, had been heard of there, had sailed for England, had buried his treason in suicide, or had fled, in self-upbraiding despair, to the uttermost ends of the earth. The stories of him among his friends were almost as numerous as those about Charlie Ross or John Wilkes Booth. It must have been four or five years after Harper's Ferry in 1859 that it was reported that Realf was in Texas, and that he was somehow connected with the press there; and this, of course, added color to the charges of treason to the Free State cause which he had borne. In course of time, however, these charges were taken up by Realf, who gave reasons for his disappearance which led his friends to believe that he had not been in his sound mind after the attempt at Harper's Ferry, and disposed of his alleged culpability. After the war, in which he served as a staff officer, he was next heard of in Washington, where he turned up as a broken-down man, all his physical attractions gone, cadaverous, impoverished, and soliciting employment. He obtained an humble place in one of the departments. From there he went to New York, hung around the outskirts of several newspapers, and got, perhaps, some remuneration for poems and other literary work. Falling into some financial difficulty there, he was arrested, taken to the Tombs, and so harshly treated by the police that his life was despaired of; and a letter written by him from the Tombs was as pathetic a thing as misery ever launched upon the world. He disappeared from there, as he had disappeared at and from so many places, and the next heard of him was some seven years ago, when he turned up in Pittsburgh as an applicant for work on the newspapers. His life as a frontiersman and soldier had told upon his constitution, and domestic troubles had come to him and weighed heavily upon his mind. Still he was capable of the exercise of his brilliant mental powers, and a few sketches printed in the Pittsburgh papers upon various topics of local interest elicited notice, and led to his regular employment upon the staff of the Pittsburg Commercial. His brilliant talents and his gentle manners soon made him friends on every hand, and he soon became assistant editor. He held his position until the Commercial was consolidated with the Gazette in the early part of 1877. While attending to his editorial duties Realf made also a reputation as an orator, speaking on the stump for the Republicans in several campaigns, and delivering several lectures. About 1865 he had married a woman who was his senior in years, and whose tastes were so far from harmonizing with his that they never got along well together. He applied for a divorce, and was successful in the lower courts, but the Supreme Court, on a technicality, set aside the decree and ordered a new trial. This occurred almost on the eve of a day appointed for his marriage with a young lady in Utica, New York, and proved a terrible blow to him. He wrote "an epitaph," which he sent to the Pittsburg Dispatch, and which led his friends to suspect that he at that time contemplated suicide. He was one of the first to join Francis Murphy in the temperance revival, and soon became one of that agitator's most ready and efficient allies. At this work he has been engaged for the past two years. Subsequently journeying to California, the wife, from whom he was unable to get a divorce, followed him, and, demanding an alimony which he was unable to pay, took out a warrant for his arrest, which circumstance led to his suicide. Frequently, while doing service in the ways that have been mentioned, Realf sent to the magazines poems of great beauty and transfused with the spirit of grief and loss, very subtle in their metaphysics and very transcendental in their thought. In regard to Mr. Realf's affiliation with Lord Byron, or with the Byron family, nothing definite is known to the present writer. The different circumstances that led to this belief in Kansas were not sufficiently definite to base a judgment upon. The fact that at the age of twenty-seven or twenty-eight he bore a striking resemblance to Lord Byron at the same period of his life, the reports that he received remittances from the Byron homestead, the fact that he knew a great deal of English high life, and had been most carefully educated in the literary line, the fact that he wrote poetry which his friends thought to be Byronic, the fact that he was an adventurer in the name of liberty, and that his campaign in the Free State war of Kansas was considered to bear a resemblance to Byron's campaign for the liberties of Greece, are poor evidences of relationship to Byron by blood, and are made poorer by the fact that in 1856 Realf could hardly have been more than twenty-six, whereas Byron's death occurred thirty-two years before that time. Realf himself never made allusion to the subject, and no one else could have alluded to it in his presence, so reserved was he in his manner. It was a strange and adventurous and unhappy life, lit up with gleams of romance, poetry, heroism, and exalted self-sacrifice, and ending with self-murder.

"Valhalla: The Myths of Norseland. A Saga in twelve parts. By Julia Clinton Jones," is the title and introduction of a neat little volume dealing in verse with Scandinavian myth, and legend, and the wild, weird stories of the old Norse gods. The subject is a fascinating one, and not often encountered by the general reader. It is the story of the origin of the world, the account of the creation as crystallized in the mythology of the frozen north, and told above the iceberg's crack and glacier's groan by even Loki's rebellious brood. All of the characters are grand, the fixing of divinity from natural surroundings, the looking up from Nature to Nature's God. To the student of Scandinavian literature the little volume of which we speak will be an additional treat; to those unacquainted with the beauties of the theme its contents will be a revelation. The whole story is pleasantly told in verse, and the introduction an intelligent résumé of the old Viking's plan. Miss Jones, the author, is not altogether unknown to letters, being remembered doubtless by the readers of the ARGONAUT as the writer of many pretty verses that have from time to time appeared in these columns. The undertaking of publishing a book was somewhat ambitious; but that it is well done and deserving is perhaps a sufficient reward for the many obstacles encountered and finally overcome.

The proposition of the Constitution-cobblers in reference to railroads and transportation companies is simply a device to confiscate the property of all common carriers—in a word, to steal all the railroads, steamships, coast vessels, stage-coaches, and freight-wagons, and turn them over to three politicians to manage. Three commissioners are to be elected "who shall have the sole power to establish rates of charges for the transportation of passengers and freights by railroad and other transportation companies." This means confiscation, and nothing less. The result of such a law would compel all transportation companies either to buy two commissioners or to suspend business. The delegate who votes for such a provision in the organic law is either wanting in intelligence or integrity.

The house of Brewster & Co., carriage makers, of Broome Street, New York, is the recipient of distinguished honors from the Exposition Française for their exhibition of the best carriage work. Mr. Henry Brewster, senior member of the firm, is made a Knight of the Legion of Honor. The gold medal is also awarded the house, together with five special diplomas to the foremen of the different departments. The significance of this incident is in the important fact that an American house stands at the head of the world's workshops in the production of fine carriages.

RESULTS OF TUESDAY'S ELECTIONS.

An Austerlitz for the Republican party; a Waterloo for the Democracy.

A Congressional gain to the Republicans of six, leaving the House of Representatives to stand Democratic by thirteen majority.

An utter defeat to the Greenback party: a popular, a national declaration against "fiat" money.

A pronounced rebuke to Kearneyism, Communism, Agrarianism, incendiarism, ignorance, idleness, crime, and the insolence of foreign interference in American politics in Massachusetts.

A set back to demagoguery in the defeat of Butler.

A solid Democratic South provoking a solid Republican North.

Defeat of Tammany under the dictatorship of the Irishman Kelly in the City of New York, showing that honest men outnumber rogues even in that city.

The reelection of the Hon. Roscoe Conkling as United States Senator for New York.

The reelection of Senator Cameron from Pennsylvania to the United States Senate.

New Jersey and Connecticut go Republican.

Ex-Secretary of the Navy Robeson elected to Congress from New Jersey.

Nevada Republican, electing John H. Kincaid to be Governor in place of honest old Broadhorns.

Hon. John P. Jones reelected United States Senator from Nevada.

Alexander H. Stevens returned to Congress from Georgia without opposition.

Cooper elected Mayor of New York city as Tilden's anti-Tammany candidate.

Wade Hampton reelected Governor of South Carolina.

Boston divides with San Francisco the shame of Kearneyism. It gave a majority for Butler.

Samuel Randal, of Pennsylvania, reelected to Congress, and will doubtless be elected Speaker.

Samuel Tilden, having captured the organization of his party in New York, will be its next candidate for Governor.

Democratic majority in the next Senate will be eight.

California will go Republican at the next election if the party is united. It will be united if the party fossils do not undertake to run the machine.

It is certain that the next President of the United States will be Republican.

It is probable that the next Presidential candidate of the Republican party will be General Grant.

At the Stairs.

"Come to the foot of the stairs, mamma,"
My coaxing darling said,
"And give us there our good-night kiss,
Before we go to bed."

To the warm nursery above,
Whence shone a mellow light,
The little bare feet clambering up,
The night-gowns fluttering white.

In the dark hall I stood and gazed,
Like Jacob when he dreamed:
Pure angels on their upward way
To me the children seemed.

Since then the little brood is less,
One pattering step I miss;
One fair, small face no more is raised,
To claim its good-night kiss.

Alas! the partings at the stairs
From those we fondly love!
Our household angels passing up
To the lighted rooms above!

"Prisoner, do you wish to say anything in your defense?"
"Nothing, your honor, except this—lemme off light; this is the eighth time I've been up before you. We're old coparceners, as it were."

"Cruel, cruel man," said the civilized person, "you eat your venerable pa."
"Ungrateful being," retorted the savage, "you let the worms eat yours."

They asked of the Miss X. which she preferred of the two brothers L.
She responded: "When I am with either of them I prefer the other."

Rich parvenu, who knows nothing of painting, to an artist—
"How shall I hang this picture?"
Artist—"I wouldn't hang it if I were you, but commute its sentence to solitary imprisonment for life."

DESERTED.

"What a glorious, all-satisfying country this Nevada desert would be if one were only all eyes, and had no need of food, drink, and shelter! Wouldn't it, Miss Dwyer? Do you know, I've no doubt that this is the true location of heaven. You see, the lack of water and vegetation would be no inconvenience to spirits, while the magnificent scenery and the cloudless sky would be just the thing to make them thrive."

"But what I can't get over," responded the young lady addressed, "is that these alkali plains, which have been described as so dreary and uninteresting, should prove to be in reality one of the most wonderfully impressive and beautiful regions in the world. What awful fibbers or what awful dull people they must have been whose descriptions have so misled the public! It is perfectly unaccountable. Here, I expected to doze all the way across the desert, while, in fact, I've grudged my eyes time enough to wink ever since I left my berth this morning."

"The trouble is," replied her companion, "persons in search of the picturesque, or with much eye for it, are rare travelers along this route. The people responsible for the descriptions you complain of are thrifty business men, with no idea that there can be any possible attraction in a country where crops can be raised, timber cut, or ore dug up. For my part, I thank the Lord for the beautiful barrenness that has consecrated this great region to loneliness. Here there will always be a chance to get out of sight and sound of the swarming millions who have already left scarcely standing-room for a man in the East. I wouldn't give much for a country where there are no wildernesses left."

"But I really think it is rather hard to say in what the beauty of the desert consists," said Miss Dwyer. "It is so simple. I scribbled two pages of description in my notebook this morning, but when I read them over, and looked out of the window, I tore them up. I think the wonderfully fine, clear, brilliant air transfigures the landscape and makes it something that must be seen and can't be told. After seeing how this air makes the ugliest sagebrush and the patches of alkali and brown earth a feast to the eye, one can understand how the light of heaven may make the ugliest faces beautiful."

The pretty talker is sitting next the window of palace-car No. 30 of the Central Pacific line, which has already been her flying home for two days. The gentleman who sits beside her professes to be sharing the view, but it is only fair I should tell the reader that under this pretense he is nefariously delighting in the rounded contour of his companion's half-averted face as she, in unfeigned engrossment, scans the panorama unrolled before them by the swift motion of the car. How sweet and fresh is the bright tint of her cheek against the ghastly white background of the alkali patches as they fly by! Still, it can't be said, he isn't enjoying the scenery, too, for surely there is no such Claude-Lorraine glass to reflect and enhance the beauty of a landscape as the face of a spirited girl.

With a profound sigh, summing up both her admiration and that despair of attaining the perfect insight and sympathy imagined and longed for which is always a part of intense appreciation of natural beauty, Miss Dwyer threw herself back in her seat and fixed her eyes on the car-ceiling with an expression as if she were looking at something at least as far away as the moon.

"I'm going to make a statue when I get home," she said—"a statue which will personify Nevada and represent the timeless, desolate, changeless, magnificent beauty, and the self-sufficient loneliness of the desert. I can see it in my mind's eye now. It will probably be the finest statue in the world."

"If you'd as lieve put your ideal into a painting I will give you a suggestion that will be original if nothing else," he observed.

"What is that?"

"Why, having in view these white alkali patches that chiefly characterize Nevada, paint her as a leper."

"That's horrid! You needn't talk to me any more," she exclaimed emphatically.

With this sort of chatter they had beguiled the time since leaving San Francisco the morning of the day before. Acquaintance are indeed made as rapidly on an overland train as on an ocean steamship, but theirs had dated from the preceding winter, during which they had often met in San Francisco. When Mr. Lombard heard that Miss Dwyer and Mrs. Eustis, her invalid sister, were going East in April, he discovered that he would have business to attend to in New York at about that time; and oddly enough—that is, if you choose to take that view of it—when the ladies came to go it turned out that Lombard had taken his ticket for the self-same train and identical sleeping-car. The result of which was that he had the privilege of handing Miss Dwyer in and out at the eating-stations, of bringing Mrs. Eustis her cup of tea in the car, and of sharing Miss Dwyer's seat and monopolizing her conversation when he had a mind to, which was most of the time. A bright and congenial companion has this advantage over a book, that he or she is an author whom you can make discourse on any subject you please, instead of being obliged to follow an arbitrary selection by another, as when you commune with the printed page.

By way of peace-offering for his blasphemery in calling the Nevada desert a leper, Lombard had embezzled a couple of chairs from the smoking-room and carried them to the rear platform of the car, which happened to be the last of the train, and invited Miss Dwyer to come thither and see the scenery. Whether she had wanted to pardon him or not, he knew very well that this was a temptation which she could not resist, for the rear platform was the best spot for observation on the entire train, unless it were the cow-catcher of the locomotive.

The April sun mingled with the frosty air like whisky with ice-water, producing an effect cool but exhilarating. As she sat in the door of the little passage leading to the platform she scarcely needed the shawl which he wrapped about her with absurdly exaggerated solicitude. One of the most unmistakable symptoms of the lover is the absorbing and superfluous care with which he adjusts the wraps about the object of his affections whether the weather be warm or cold; and she thought he could thus artificially warm her heart.

But Miss Dwyer did not appear vexed, pretending indeed to be oblivious of everything else in admiration of the spectacle before her.

The country stretched flat and bare as a table for fifty miles on either side the track—a distance looking in the clear air not over one-fifth as great. On every side this great plain was circled by mountains, the reddish-brown sides of some of them bare to the summits, while others were robed in folds of glistening snow and looked like white curtains drawn part way up the sky. The whitey-gray of the alkali-patches, the brown of the dry earth, and the rusty green of the sagebrush filled the foreground, melting in the distance into a purple-gray. The wondrous dryness and clearness of the air lent to these modest tints a tone and dazzling brilliance that surprised the eye with a revelation of possibilities never before suspected in them. But the mountains were the greatest wonder. It was as if the skies, taking pity on their nakedness, had draped their majestic shoulders in imperial purple, while at this hour the westerling sun tipped their pinnacles with gilt. In the distance half a dozen sand-spouts, swiftly-moving white pillars, looking like desert geni with too much "tanglefoot" aboard, were careering about in every direction.

But, as Lombard pointed out the various features of the scene to his companion, I fear that his chief motive was less an admiration of Nature that sought sympathy than a selfish delight in making her eyes flash, seeing the color come and go in her cheeks, and hearing her charming unstudied exclamations of pleasure—a delight not unmingled with complacency in associating himself in her mind with emotions of delight and admiration. It is appalling, the extent to which spoony young people make the admiration of Nature in her grandest forms a mere saute to their love-making. The roar of Niagara has been notoriously utilized as a cover to unlimited osculation, and Adolphus looks up at the sky-cleaving peak of Mont Blanc only to look down at Angelina's countenance with a more vivid appreciation of its superior attractions.

It was delicious, Lombard thought, sitting there with her on the rear platform, out of sight and sound of everybody. He had such a pleasant sense of proprietorship in her! How agreeable—flatteringly so, in fact—she had been all day! There was nothing like traveling together to make people intimate. It was clear that she understood his intentions very well: indeed, how could she help it? He had always said that a fellow had shown himself a bungler at love-making if he were not practically assured of the result before he came to the point of the declaration. The sensation of leaving everything else so rapidly behind, that people have when sitting on the rear platform of a train of cars, makes them feel, by force of contrast, nearer to each other and more identified. How pretty she looked sitting there in the door-way, her eyes bent so pensively on the track behind as the car-wheels so swiftly reeled it off! He had tucked her in comfortably. No cold could get to the sweet little girl, and none ever should so long as he lived to make her comfort his care.

One small gloved hand lay on her lap outside the shawl. What a jolly little hand it was! He reached out his own and took it; but, without even a moment's hesitation for him to extract a flattering inference from, she withdrew it. Perhaps something in his matter-of-course way displeased her.

To know when it is best to submit to a partial rebuff, rather than inake a bad matter worse by trying to save one's pride, is a rare wisdom. Still, Lombard might have exercised it at another time. But there are days when the magnetisms are all wrong, and a person not ordinarily deficient in tact, having begun wrong, goes on blundering like a school-boy. Piqued at the sudden shock to the pleasant day-dream, in which he had fancied himself already virtually assured of this young lady—a day-dream which she was not really accountable for spoiling, since she had not been privy to it—what should he do but find expressions for his mingled vexation and wounded affection by reminding her of a previous occasion on which she had allowed him the liberty she now denied. Doubtless helping to account for this lack of tact was the idea that he should thus justify himself for so far presuming just now. Not, of course, that there really is any excuse for a young man's forgetting that the ladies have one advantage over Omniscience, in that not only are they privileged to remember what they please, but also to ignore what they see fit to forget.

"You have forgotten that evening at the California Theatre," was what this devoted youth said.

"I'm sure I don't know to what you refer, sir," she replied freezingly.

He was terrified at the distant accent of her voice. It appeared to come from somewhere beyond the fixed stars, and brought the chill of the interstellar spaces with it. He forgot in an instant all about his pique, vexation, and wounded pride, and was in a panic of anxiety to bring her back. In a moment more he knew that she would rise from her chair and remark that it was getting cold, and she must go in. If he allowed her to depart in that way he might lose her forever. He could think of but one way of convincing her instantaneously of his devotion; and so what should he do but take the most inopportune occasion in the entire course of their acquaintance to make his declaration. He was like a general whose plan of battle has been completely deranged by an utterly unexpected repulse in a preliminary movement, compelling him to hurry forward his last reserves in a desperate attempt to restore the battle.

"What have I done, Miss Dwyer? Don't you know that I love you? Won't you be my wife?"

"No, sir," she said flatly, her taste outraged and her sensibilities set on edge by the stupid, blundering, hammer-and-tongs onset which from first to last he had made. She loved him, and had meant to accept him, but if she had loved him ten times as much she couldn't have helped refusing him just then, under those circumstances—not if she died for it. As she spoke she rose and disappeared within the car.

It is certainly to be hoped that the noise of the wheels, which out on the platform was considerable, prevented the recording angel from getting the full force of Lombard's ejaculation.

It is bad enough to be refused when the delicacy and respectfulness of the lady's manner make "No" sound so much like "Yes" that the rejected lover can almost persuade himself that his ears have deceived him. It is bad enough to be refused when she does it so timidly and shrinkingly and deprecatingly that it might be supposed she were the rejected party. It is bad enough to be refused when she expresses the hope that you will always be friends, and shows a disposition to make profuse amends in general agreeableness for the consummate favor which she is forced to decline you. Not to put too fine a point upon it, it is bad enough to be refused anyhow you can arrange the circumstances, but to be refused as Lombard had been, with a petulance as wounding to his dignity as was the refusal itself to his affections, is to take a bitter pill with an asafetida coating.

In the limp and demoralized condition in which he was left the only clear sentiment in his mind was that he did not want to meet her again just at present. So he sat for an hour or more longer out on the platform, and had become as thoroughly chilled without as he was within when at dusk the train stopped at a little three-house station for supper.

Then he went into one of the forward day-cars, not intending to return to the sleeping-car till Miss Dwyer should have retired. When the train reached Ogden the next morning, instead of going on East he would take the same train back to San Francisco, and that would be the end of his romance. His engagement in New York had been a myth, and with Miss Dwyer's "No, sir," the only business with the East that had brought him on this trip was at an end.

About an hour after leaving the supper-station the train suddenly stopped in the midst of the desert. Something about the engine had become disarranged which it would take some time to put right. Glad to improve an opportunity to stretch their legs, many of the passengers left the cars and were strolling about, curiously examining the sagebrush and the alkali, and admiring the ghostly plain as it spread, bare, level, and white as an ice-bound polar sea, to the feet of the far-off mountains.

Lombard had also left the car, and was walking about, his hands in his overcoat pockets, trying to clear his mind of the wreckage that obstructed its working; for Miss Dwyer's refusal had come upon him as a sudden squall that carries away the masts and sails of a vessel and transforms it in a moment from a gallant bounding ship to a mere hulk drifting in an entangled mass of debris. Of course she had a perfect right to suit herself about the kind of a man she took for a husband, but he certainly had not thought she was such an utter coquette. If ever a woman gave a man reason to think himself as good as engaged, she had given him that reason, and yet she refused him as coolly as she would have declined a second plate of soup. There must be some truth, after all, in the rant of the poets about the heartlessness and fickleness of women, although he had always been used to consider it the merest bosh. Suddenly he heard the train moving. He was perhaps fifty yards off, and, grumbling anathemas at the stupidity of the conductor, started to run for the last car. He was not quite desperate enough to fancy being left alone on the Nevada desert with night coming on. He would have caught the train without difficulty if his foot had not happened to catch in a tough clump of sage, throwing him violently to the ground. As he gathered himself up the train was a hundred yards off, and moving rapidly. To overtake it was out of the question.

"Stop! ho! stop!" he yelled at the top of his lungs. But there was no one on the rear platform to see him, and the closed windows and the rattle of the wheels were sufficient to render a much louder noise than he could make inaudible to the dozing passengers. And now the engineer pulled out the throttle-valve to make up for lost time, and the clatter of the train faded into a distant roar and its lights began to twinkle into indistinctness.

"Damnation!"

A voice fell like a falling star: "Gentlemen do not use profane language in ladies' company."

He first looked up in the air, as on the whole the likeliest quarter for a voice to come from in this desert, then around. Miss Dwyer, smiling with a somewhat constrained attempt at self-possession. Lombard was a good deal taken aback, but in his surprise he did not forget that this was the young lady who had refused him that afternoon.

"I beg your pardon," he replied with a stiff bow; "I did not suppose that there were any ladies within hearing."

"I got out of the car supposing there was plenty of time to get a specimen of sagebrush to carry home," she explained, "but when the cars started, although I was but a little way off, I could not regain the platform;" which, considering that she wore a tie-back of the then prevalent fashion, was not surprising.

"Indeed!" replied Lombard with the same formal manner.

"But won't the train come back for us?" she asked in a more anxious voice.

"That will depend on whether we are missed. Nobody will miss me. Mrs. Eustis, if she hasn't gone to bed, may miss you."

"But she has. She went to bed before I left the car, and is asleep by this time."

"That's unfortunate," was his brief reply as he lit a cigar and began to smoke and contemplate the stars.

His services, so far as he could do anything for her, she should, as a lady, command, but if she thought he was going to do the agreeable after what had happened a couple of hours ago, she was mightily mistaken.

There was a silence, and then she said, hesitatingly, "What are you going to do?"

He glanced at her. Her attitude and the troubled expression of her face as well as her voice indicated that the logic of the situation was overthrowing the jaunty self-possession which she had at first affected. The desert was staring her out of countenance. How his heart yearned toward her! If she had given him the right to take care of her, how he would comfort her! what prodigies would he be capable of to succor her! But this rising impulse of tenderness was turned to choking bitterness by the memory of that scornful "No, sir." So he replied, coldly, "I'm not in the habit of being left behind in deserts, and I don't know what is customary to do in such cases. I see nothing except to wait for the next train, which will come along some time within twenty-four hours."

There was another long silence, after which she said in a timid voice, "Hadden't we better walk to the next station?"

At the suggestion of walking he glanced at her close-fitting dress, and a sardonic grin slightly twitched the corners of his mouth as he dryly answered, "It is thirty miles one way and twenty the other to the first station."

Several minutes passed before she spoke again, and then she said, with an accent almost like that of a child in trouble and about to cry, "I'm cold."

The strong, unceasing wind, blowing from snowy mountain-caverns across a plain on which there was not the slightest barrier of hill or tree to check its violence, was indeed bitterly cold, and Lombard himself felt chilled to the marrow of his bones. He took off his overcoat and offered it to her. "No," said she, "you are as cold as I am."

"You will please take it," he replied, in a peremptory manner; and she took it.

"At this rate we shall freeze to death before midnight," he added as if in soliloquy. "I must see if I can't contrive some sort of a shelter with this sagebrush."

He began by tearing up a large number of bushes by the roots. Seeing what he was doing, Miss Dwyer was glad to warm her stiffened muscles by taking hold and helping; which she did with a vigor that shortly reduced her gloves to shreds and filled her fingers with scratches from the rough twigs. Lombard next chose an unusually high and thick clump of brush, and cleared a small space three feet across in the centre of it, scattering twigs on the uncovered earth to keep off its chill.

"Now, Miss Dwyer, if you will step inside this spot, I think I can build up the bushes around us so as to make a sort of booth which may save us from freezing."

She silently did as he directed and he proceeded to pile the brush which they had torn up on the tops of the bushes left standing around the spot where they were, thus making a circular wall about three feet high. Over the top he managed to draw together two or three bushes, and the improvised wigwam was complete.

The moonlight penetrated the loose roof sufficiently to reveal to each other the faces and figures of the two occupants as they sat in opposite corners as far apart as possible, she cold and miserable, he cold and sulky, and both silent. And, as if to mock him, the idea kept recurring to his mind how romantic and delightful, in spite of the cold and discomfort, the situation would be if she had only said Yes instead of No, that afternoon. People have odd notions sometimes, and it actually seemed to him that his vexation with her for destroying the pleasure of the present occasion was something quite apart and in addition to his main grievance against her. It might have been so jolly, and now she had spoiled it. He could have boxed her pretty little ears.

She wondered why he did not try to light a fire, but she wouldn't ask him another thing if she died. In point of fact, he knew the sagebrush would not burn. Suddenly the wind blew fiercer, then came a rushing sound, and the top and walls of the wigwam were whisked off like a flash, and they staggered to their feet, buffeted by the whirling bushes, a cloud of fine alkali-dust enveloped them, blinding their eyes, penetrating their ears and noses, and setting them gasping, sneezing, and coughing spasmodically. Then, like a puff of smoke, the suffocating storm was dissipated, and when they opened their smarting eyes there was nothing but the silent, glorious desolation of the ghostly desert around them, with the snow-peaks in the distance glittering beneath the moon. A sand-spout had struck them, that was all—one of the whirling dust-columns which they had admired all day from the car-windows.

Wretched enough before both for physical and sentimental reasons, this last experience quite demoralized Miss Dwyer, and she sat down and cried. Now, a few tears, regarded from a practical, middle-aged point of view, would not appear to have greatly complicated the situation, but they threw Lombard into a panic. If she was going to cry, something must be done. Whether anything could be done or not, something must be done.

"Don't leave me," she cried hysterically as he rushed off to reconnoitre the vicinity.

"I'll return presently," he called back.

But five minutes, ten minutes, fifteen minutes passed, and he did not come back. Terror dried her tears, and her heart almost stopped beating. She had quite given him up for lost, and herself too, when with inexpressible relief she heard him call to her. She replied, and in a moment more he was at her side, breathless with running.

"I lost my bearings," he said. "If you had not have answered me I could not have found you."

"Don't leave me again," she sobbed, clinging to his arm. He put his arms round her and kissed her. It was mean, base, contemptible to take advantage of her agitation in that way, but she did not resist, and he did it again and again—I forbear to say how many times.

"Isn't it a perfectly beautiful night?" he exclaimed with a fine gush of enthusiasm.

"Isn't it exquisite?" she echoed, with a rush of sympathetic feeling.

"See those stars: they look as if they had just been polished," he cried.

"What a droll idea!" she exclaimed, gleefully. "But do you see that lovely mountain?"

Holding her with a firmer clasp, and speaking with what might be styled a fierce tenderness, he demanded, "What did you mean, miss, by refusing me this afternoon?"

"What did you go to at me so stupidly for? I had to refuse," she retorted, smilingly.

"Will you be my wife?"

"Yes, sir; I meant to be all the time."

The contract having been properly sealed, Lombard said, with a countenance curiously divided between a tragical expression and a smile of fatuous complacency, "There was a clear case of poetical justice in your being left behind in the desert to-night. To see the lights of the train disappearing, leaving you alone in the midst of desolation, gave you a touch of my feeling on being rejected this afternoon. Of all leavings behind, there's none so miserable as the experience of a rejected lover."

"Poor fellow! so he shouldn't be left behind. He shall be conductor of the train," she said, with a bewitching laugh. His response was not verbal.

"How cold the wind is!" she said.

"Shall I build you another wigwam?"

"No: let us exercise a little. You whistle 'The Beautiful Blue Danube,' and we'll waltz. This desert is the biggest, jolliest ball-room floor that ever was, and I dare say we shall be the first to waltz on it since the creation of the world. That will be something to boast of when we get home. Come, let's dedicate the Great American Desert to Terpsichore."

They stepped out from among the ruins of their sagebrush booth upon a patch of hard bare earth close to the railroad track. Lombard puckered his lips and struck up the air, and off they went with as much enthusiasm as if inspired by a first-class orchestra. Round and round, and to and fro, they swept until, laughing, flushed, and panting, they came to a stop.

It was then that they first perceived that they were not without a circle of appreciative spectators. Sitting like statues on their sniffling, pawing ponies, a dozen Piute Indians encircled them. Engrossed with the dance and with each other, they had not noticed them as they rode up, attracted from their route by this marvelous spectacle of a pale-faced squaw and a brave engaged in a solitary waltz in the midst of the desert.

At sight of the grim circle of centaurs around them Miss Dwyer would have fainted but for Lombard's firm hold.

"Pretend not to see them; keep on dancing," he hissed in her ear. He had no distinct plan in what he said, but spoke merely from an instinct of self-preservation, which told him that when they stopped the Indians would be upon them. But as she mechanically, and really more dead than alive, obeyed his direction and resumed the dance, and he in his excitement was treading on her feet at every step, the thought flashed upon him that there was a bare chance of escaping violence if they could keep the Indians interested without appearing to notice their presence. In successive whispers he communicated his idea to Miss Dwyer:

"Don't act as if you saw them at all, but do everything as if we were alone. That will puzzle them, and may make them think us supernatural beings, or perhaps crazy: Indians have great respect for crazy people. It's our only chance. We will stop dancing now and sing a while. Give them a burlesque of opera. I'll give you the cues and show you how. Don't be frightened. I don't believe they'll touch us so long as we act as if we didn't see them. Do you understand? Can you do your part?"

"I understand; I'll try," she whispered.

"Now," he said, and as they separated he threw his hat on the ground, and, assuming an extravagantly languishing attitude, burst forth in a most poignant burlesque of a love-lorn tenor's part, rolling his eyes, clasping his hands, striking his breast, and gyrating about Miss Dwyer in the most approved operatic style. He had a fine voice, and knew a good deal of music; so that, barring a certain nervousness in the performer, the exhibition was really not bad. In his singing he had used a meaningless gibberish varied with the syllables of the scale, but he closed by singing the words, "Are you ready now? Go ahead, then."

With that she took it up, and rendered the prima donna quite as effectively, interjecting "The Last Rose of Summer" as an aria in a manner that would have been encored in San Francisco. He responded with a few staccato notes, and the scene ended by their rushing into each other's arms and waltzing down the stage with abandon.

The Indians sat motionless on their horses, not even exchanging comments among themselves. They were evidently too utterly astonished by the goings on before them to have any other sentiment as yet beyond pure amazement. Here were two richly-dressed pale-faces, such as only lived in cities, out in the middle of an uninhabitable desert, in the freezing midnight, having a variety and minstrel show all to themselves, and to make the exhibition the more unaccountable, without apparently seeing their auditors at all. Had they started up the show after being captured, Indian cunning would have recognized in it a device to save their lives, but the two had been at it before the party rode up—had, in fact, first attracted attention by their gyrations, which were visible for miles out on the moony plain.

Lombard, without ever letting his eyes rest a moment on the Indians so as to indicate that he saw them, had still managed, by looks askance and sweeping glances, to keep close watch upon their demeanor, and noted with prodigious relief that his wild scheme was succeeding better than he had dared to hope.

Without any break in the entertainment he communicated his reassurance to Miss Dwyer by singing, to the tune of "My Country, 'tis of Thee," the following original hymn:

"We're doing admir'ble—
They're heap much tickledee:
Only keep on."

To which she responded, to the lugubrious air of "John Brown's Body,"

"Oh, what do you s'pose they'll go for to do,
Oh, what do you s'pose they'll go for to do,
Oh, what do you s'pose they'll go for to do,
When we can sing no more?"

A thing may be ridiculous without being amusing, and neither of these two felt the least inclination to smile at each other's poetry. After duly joining in the chorus of "Glory, Hallelujah!" Lombard endeavored to cheer his companion by words adapted to the inspiring air of "Rally Round the Flag, Boys." This was followed by a series of popular airs, with solos, duets, and choruses.

But this sort of thing could not go for ever. Lombard was becoming exhausted in voice and legs; and as for Miss Dwyer, he was expecting to see her drop from moment to moment. Indeed, to the air of "Way Down upon the Swanee River," she now began to sing,

"O dear! I can't bear up much longer:
I'm tired to death;
My voice's gone all to pie-cee-cees,
My throat is very sore."

They must inevitably give out in a few minutes, and then he—and, terribly worse, she—would be at the mercy of these bestial savages, and this seeming farce would turn into most revolting tragedy. With this sickening conviction coming over him, Lombard cast a despairing look around the horizon to see if there were no help in their bitter extremity. Suddenly he burst forth, to the tune of "The Star-Spangled Banner":

"Oh, say can you see,
Far away to the east,
A bright star that doth grow
Momentarily brighter?
'Tis the far-flashing headlight
Of a railroad-train:
Ten minutes from now
We shall be safe and sound."

What they did in those ten minutes neither could tell afterward. The same idea was in both their minds—that unless the attention of the Indians could be held until the train arrived, its approach would only precipitate their own fate by impelling the savages to carry out whatever designs of murder, insult, or capture they might have. Under the influence of the intense excitement of this critical interval it is to be feared that the performance degenerated from a high-toned concert and variety show into something very like a Howling-Dervish exhibition. But, at any rate, it answered its purpose until, after a period that seemed like a dozen eternities, the West-bound overland express with a tremendous roar and rattle drew up beside them, in response to the waving of Miss Dwyer's handkerchief and to Lombard's shouts.

Even had the Indians contemplated hostile intentions—which they were doubtless in a condition of too great general stupefaction to do—the alacrity with which the two performers clambered aboard the cars would probably have foiled their designs. But, as the train gathered headway once more, Lombard could not resist the temptation of venting his feelings by shaking his fist ferociously at the audience which he had been so conscientiously trying to please up to that moment. It was a gratification which had like to have cost him dear. There was a quick motion on the part of one of the Indians, and the conductor dragged Lombard within the car just as an arrow struck the door.

Mrs. Eustis had slept sweetly all night, and was awakened the next morning an hour before the train reached Ogden by the sleeping-car porter, who gave her a telegram which had overtaken the train at the last station. It read:

"Am safe and sound. Was left behind by your train last night, and picked up by West-bound express. Will join you at Ogden to-morrow morning."
JENNIE DWYER.

Mrs. Eustis read the telegram through twice without getting the least idea from it. Then she leaned over and looked down into Jennie's berth. It had not been slept in. Then she began to understand. Heroically resisting a tendency to scream, she thus secured space for second thought, and being a shrewd woman of the world, ended by making up her mind to tell no one about the matter. Evidently Jennie had been having some decidedly unconventional experience, and the less publicity given to all such passages in young ladies' lives the better for their prospects. It so happened that in the bustle attending the approach to the terminus, and the prospective change of cars, every body was too busy to notice that any passengers were missing. At Ogden Mrs. Eustis left the train and went to a hotel. The following morning, a few minutes after the arrival of the Central Pacific train, Jennie Dwyer walked into her room, Lombard having stopped at the office to secure berths for the three to Omaha by the Union Pacific. After Jennie had given an outline account of her experiences, and Mrs. Eustis's equilibrium had been measurably restored by proper use of the smelling-salts, the latter lady remarked: "And so Mr. Lombard was alone with you there all night? It's very unfortunate that it should have happened so."

"Why, I was thinking it very fortunate," replied Jennie, with her most childish expression. "If Mr. Lombard had not been there, I should either have frozen to death, or by this time been celebrating my honeymoon as bride of a Piute chief."

"Nonsense, child! You know what I mean. People will talk; such unpleasant things will be said! I wouldn't have had it happen for anything. And when you were under my charge, too! Do hand me my salts."

"If people are going to say unpleasant things because I pass a night alone with Mr. Lombard," remarked Jennie, with a mischievous smile, "you must prepare yourself to hear a good deal said, my dear, for I presume this won't be the last time it will happen. We're engaged to be married."—Edward Bellamy, in Lippincott for November.

Mr. George C. Gorham, the secretary of the Republican Congressional Committee, and the author of the voluntary contribution circular, has written a letter explaining why he has not caused the President's speech at St. Paul to be printed and circulated as a campaign document. "I read the President's speech carefully, and looked anxiously for some word expressing a preference for the Republican party over the Democratic party. Finding no such expression, I have not caused the speech to be printed. If the President can yet be induced to say that Republican success in the Congressional campaign is desirable, with or without his reasons, I will print a million copies, and furnish them gratuitously as supplements to every Republican paper in the land." It appears from this letter that Mr. Gorham decides at his pleasure what shall and what shall not be printed as a campaign document. The Republican Congressional campaign is conducted on the platform of honest money. Mr. Gorham, it is understood, holds what are called Greenback views, which are incompatible with the Republican platform. The Republican President makes a clear, concise, and admirable statement of Republican doctrine and achievement, and Mr. Gorham, who sends out his own Greenback speech to those who wish it, declines to print and circulate that of the President, because the President does not say that Republican success is desirable. If Mr. Gorham exceeds his authority in assuming to decide what shall be printed, he ought to be dismissed. If he does not exceed it, Republicans have the right to know why a gentleman who does not hold with the party upon the chief issue of the campaign is intrusted with the choice of documents to be printed and circulated. Meanwhile it is an edifying spectacle, that of the secretary of the Republican Congressional Committee insulting the Republican President because in an address upon public affairs to a vast throng of citizens of all parties he speaks as a patriotic American and not as a politician.—Harper's Weekly.

Bill of Fare for Six Persons.—Sunday, November 10, 1878.

Oyster Soup.
Broiled Tahoe Trout.
Pigeon Pie. Lyonnaise Potatoes.
Green Peas. Young Beets.
Roast Veal. Sweet Potatoes.
Celery Salad.
Ice Cream and Strawberries.
Fruit-bowl of Peaches, Pears, Apples, Bananas, and Grapes.

To COOK LYONNAISE POTATOES.—Have some cold boiled potatoes; slice, pepper, and salt them, and fry brown in butter. When browned have some finely chopped parsley; sprinkle and mix well among them. Some fry finely minced onions with the potatoes, which gives them a nice flavor.

In a St. Louis restaurant you can get vegetables—and the same set of shells you ate over

NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Rates of Subscription, $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance. Postage prepaid. City subscribers served for 35 cents per 4 weeks. Single copies, 10 cents.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."
 Branch Office, Cooper's Bookstore, 746 Market Street
 Agent at San Jose—F. A. Taylor.
 News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders should be addressed.
 A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PIXLEY, }
 FRED. M. SOMERS, } . . . . . Editors.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1878.

Governor Stanford has broken the ice of a long silence in reference to railroad affairs. During all these years of railroad building—which have been years of angry discussion and jealous misrepresentations, of bitter personal vituperation, of newspaper controversies, of vexatious litigations, and of political contentions—the President of the Central Pacific Railroad has for the most part remained silent. The Dutch Flat swindle, so ably advocated by the Alla, and so generously condoned by permitting its editor to drive the golden spike; the long and bitter war of the Sacramento Union, which ended by its receiving its mortal wound; the Goat Island controversy, so eloquently championed by our Brother Pickering and both his journals, and so sweetly reconciled upon the Los Angeles trip, when the lamb lay down in the belly of the lion—these, and all the political questions at Washington, questions upon the solution of which hung the political lives and fortunes of senators, members of Congress, and the lesser official vermin that bite them, were allowed by President Stanford to pass, as though he was unmindful of their existence and of the men and motives that gave them prominence. He now communicates to the daily journals a well-matured paper embracing his views upon the question of corporations, their liability to legislative control, interference with fares and freights, with general reflections upon railroads, their relation to the owners and the community that has business with them. It is an able argument. It is an argument that will challenge the best reasoning of its opponents to answer. It is logical, free from passion, and its reasoning is based upon broad, general principles. "Civilization," says the Governor, "has its foundation in the rights of property and in the protection of individuals in the fruits of their industry. It is measured by the accumulation of the comforts, the elegancies, the luxuries, and the splendors of life, and by the intelligence of the people." These causes make a demand for labor, elevates it and makes it more valuable, and entitles it to the full protection of the law. Corporations are a modern invention, democratic in their character, may be made available by all classes of society, and are the means of defense afforded the poor man to resist the encroachments of the rich. It enables people of small means to combine, and thus by strength of numbers and coöperative association meet wealth upon equal terms. It is in fact a system of coöperation, enabling labor to compete with capital. The argument that State Legislatures have a right to control corporations because they create them is based upon a false theory. Corporations framed under general laws receive no special favors. The State does not create the corporation, nor provide it with property. It simply permits its citizens to form themselves into an association where they may aggregate their own property and their own labor as coöperative capital, giving to it the same, and no other, protection than it gives to individual wealth. The property of the corporation belongs to the individuals comprising it, as represented by their ownership of stock. The law gives a corporation some advantages over a copartnership, limiting personal liabilities, etc., but it is, after all, liable to all the requirements that govern individuals, and its property is subject to all the provisions that concern the possessions of private persons. A wrong done to an association of men under a corporate title, or any act of legislation or judicial decision depriving the corporation of its property, is a wrong to each individual owner. If it were not for corporations thus enabling individuals to aggregate their capital and combine their labor, all great enterprises could and would be monopolized by the men alone who possess great wealth. All attacks upon corporations are attacks upon the coöperative principle and a blow at the interests of the poorer class. Legislation inimical to corporations is, in its result, only friendly to the men of large capital. There is a natural jealousy upon the part of the masses against the managers of great enterprises leading to demagogism, and because the multitude is in opposition to the few, those managers are in a degree defenseless against wrong. The attempt upon the part of the public, either through legislation or by commission, to regulate the business of any corporation, and especially that of a railroad company, amounts practically to confiscation. No one can intelligently interfere with the inner workings of a railroad company, especially with reference to fares and freights. They are necessarily ignorant of the question they are called upon to consider. This part of Governor Stanford's argument is made clear by a plain statement of facts and figures, which we have not space to reproduce; nor is it necessary. The impartial and intelligent business man needs no argument to convince him of the injustice and stupidity of any attempt, by commissions or others, by politicians, or any body else, to regulate the complicated workings involved in the detail of establishing fares and freights over such a road as the Central Pacific. Different grades, different lengths of road, a thousand questions involved in the weight and bulk of goods, whether a road is doing a large or limited business, whether it runs through a sparse or populous country, whether the trade is balanced by a nearly equal transport each way—all these, and a multitude of other considerations, are involved in "fixing" fares and freights, and the idea of wrenching this part of the "control" from the managers and directors of a railroad is only another and a milder form of expression for confiscation. It is our judgment that these things are better regulated by competition and by the interests of the company. The interest of a railroad company runs parallel with the interest of the community with which it does business. No company nor corporation is so safely intrenched in power, nor so rich, nor so formidable, that it dares to wage a war upon the people with whom it does business. A railroad finds its prosperity in the general development of the resources and industries of the country. "A principle which all railroads recognize, and which they are compelled to recognize, is that of competition, and this is largely illustrated in the competition of the overland railroad with water carriage from Europe and the Eastern States by the way of Cape Horn to San Francisco; also, in the competition for business from Asia to the Eastern States and Europe with the Suez Canal route. The whole State, and even the State of Nevada, enjoys the benefit of competitive rates from the East to San Francisco. A denial of the right of railroads to meet competition would be a practical denial to the people of California of the benefits enjoyed from the overland railroad. It would be a practical denial to the railroad, in connection with the steamship companies, to compete for the business of Japan, with its forty millions of inhabitants and largely increasing trade; a denial of competition for the business of China, of India, and of Australia, and the other countries of the Pacific, as it would also the business of Europe as it sought the port of San Francisco, or sought an overland and quick transit to Japan or any of the countries bordering upon the Pacific Ocean. Locally it would deny to Sacramento, Stockton, Marysville, San José, Los Angeles, and other points along the navigable streams, the benefit of the competing rates whereby, if they so choose, they can move their property by water in consequence of the competition of railroads for about one-third of what they could before there was railroad competition. The attempt to give to others than the owners of railroads the fixing of the rates of freights and fares is so far an infringement upon the ownership of this property, because control is ownership; but ownership or control, where the benefits that may be derived are not to be enjoyed by those controlling, means simply disaster, absolute waste and destruction of property, especially when it is possible that control may be exercised by parties whose interests are to be subserved by a disregard of the rights or the interests of those who are entitled to the advantages to be derived from the property. If the control of railroads is to be taken from those who build them, and who are entitled to the fruits of their industry as other individuals engaged in other callings are, then railroad-building must cease, or else the State itself must assume all the responsibilities of their construction and operation. There is one way," says the Governor, "in which the State can regulate railroads and reduce their rates, and only one, and that is by purchasing them. The attempt to take control of them in any other way is to be likened only to the covetousness of him who would by fraud or violence take the fruits of another's industry. It is an exercise of the law of might. An attack upon railroads, like attacks upon all other species of property, is an attack upon labor, and more particularly common labor, because the road, from the time the first pick or shovel is put into the ground until it is completed, equipped, and ready to be put into operation, represents only labor, and labor largely of the most common kind. After it is constructed and equipped it has no usefulness, no earning capacity, except labor, and in a large part common labor is applied to it. Its benefits, whether to those who use it, who ride upon it, who freight upon it, or those who may own it, are directly the results of labor. While labor enters so largely into its management, in its development of the resources of the country, in its affording the means of transportation from remote distances, or the facilities it gives for the interchange of commodities, it is also creative of labor, of employment beyond that of any other labor-saving machine of the age. The railroad is peculiar in that, above all other property, it finds its own greatest prosperity in aiding the development of the industries and the resources of the country and its productions. No wise man will ever knowingly approve of any laws that absolutely or approximately prohibits its construction." This argument, as presented by Governor Stanford, is able and logical. We do not say that it is altogether unanswerable, but we do say it is not answered by the puerile and childish declaration that the owners of this railroad property have become rich, that they live in elegant mansions in town and city, and that they are generous in their indulgence of fast and blooded horses, and that they delight in the purchase of marble, pictures, and bronzes. All this is the argument of narrow-minded, mean, and jealous minds which have not the manliness to be honest, nor the sense to be fair. There may be moral considerations involved in the question of subsidies, legal controversies may grow up between the Government and the railroad company, or between foreign bondholders and the corporation, but they are not raised in this discussion, and are not fairly within the scope of the argument submitted by the President of the company in his communication to the public through the newspapers.

England is almost at war with the Ameer of Afghanistan, and is not free from the possibilities of a war with Russia that shall tax to the fullest extent the resources of her empire, and may involve an insurrection of her subjects in India. France, not yet recovered from the results of the German war, experimenting with a government republican in form, is called upon to watch against dynastic conspiracies, and to carefully preserve herself from the European complications. Russia keeps her armament in the field, and refuses the settlement of the Berlin Congress, threatens England's possessions in India, favors the cause of the Ameer, and proposes a renewal of the war with Turkey that may involve her with the leading powers of Europe. Turkey defeated, humiliated, her territory divided, her empire still invaded by hostile armies, with finances embarrassed, credit ruined, agitated by internal dissensions, is threatened with another great war, the objective point of which will be the Bosphorus and her capital of Constantinople. Germany is involved in serious domestic dangers through socialism, is at feud with the Church of Rome, is embarrassed financially, her Emperor has thrice escaped assassination. She fears that France will again give her battle for Alsace and Lorraine. Austria finds herself involved in a war as her part of the inheritance of the Russian-Turkish conflict. The two parts of the empire are not in political accord, and she trembles at the possibility of wars in which she may not be able to avoid taking part. The King of Spain has just escaped the bullet of the assassin. The Pope of Rome finds his resources from Peter's Pence on an alarming decrease. King Humbert, of Italy, has a crisis in his cabinet that threatens his kingdom with serious complications. The Khedive of Egypt is involved in the political troubles that surround Turkey. Denmark is disturbed by the revolt of the negroes in the Island of Santa Cruz. The King of Holland threatens to abdicate. The King of Greece was snubbed at Berlin. Our country is at peace with all the world. Our exports exceed our imports. Our tonnage and commerce are increasing. Our debt is decreasing. We are growing in population and wealth. Our crops of cotton, tobacco, grain, and wool annually increase. Our mineral resources multiply. We control the silver market of the world. We have no standing army, and no necessity for one. We may recall our ministers and plenipotentiaries from abroad, for we have no foreign complications. Let us all join in the Doxology.

The Pall Mall Gazette, representing aristocratic thought in England, a journal "written by gentlemen for gentlemen," complains that Secretary Evarts has availed himself of this period of England's embarrassments and foreign complications to assume a somewhat arrogant and dictatorial tone in reference to the question of the fisheries. It is the British ox that is now being gored. It was the British Bull that demanded the return of Mason and Slidell—and in the most insolent manner. Then we were in trouble, waging a war for our national existence. It was from the shipyard of a member of the English Parliament that the Alabama went forth, with British sailors and armament, to destroy our commerce, and light up the oceans with our blazing ships. It was English sailors and English ships that ran our blockades. It was English capital that invested in cotton bonds, it was England that first recognized the belligerency of the Confederation. What is sauce for the American goose must be sauce for the British gander.

Wellock, the English shoemaking agitator, who has been less than one year in America, and who is gopher No. 2 of the sand-lot, has given the business away. "Pay me my agreed stipend of $15 a week, or I will go to making shoes, at which business I can earn $25 a week."

PRATTLE.

The Call's theatrical reporter was as bright as a board and as deep as a duck pond last Sunday, in speaking of Miss Clara Morris' "magnetic power," whatever that may happen to be. It is something, it appears, which "seems to thrill in every fibre of her system, and quiver in the dewy depths of her blue eyes." Now, what is the use of a knowledge of the principles and bases of dramatic art to one who can write with such lucidity and precision without them? It was that kind of criticism that was the making of Garrick.

From Garrick to Dr. Johnson—who can help making the transition? What a disconcerting touch the old intellectual giant had! Whatever he laid his pen upon was straightway resolved into its constituent elements; it fell apart like a ship deprived of its iron by the magnetic mountain of the Arabian tale. Moving amongst the tower-builders, he could disdain to criticise the work that was wholly bad, and, himself a tower-builder, he knew that none was wholly good; so he neither condemned without allowance nor praised without qualification. Of the Deity (for whom he had ever a great respect) he once came near expressing a judgment entirely favorable: "He is," said he, "infinitely good"—then added, with his customary moderation—"as far as the perfection of His nature will allow." But the censor of the Bulletin says of the performance of the play Miss Multon, at a local theatre, that it had not a fault.

It would be grand to have a Johnson's intellect, but how glorious to have a Johnson's opportunities! Fancy the old Ursus arctos of Letters caged in San Francisco and gravely preparing for posterity his Lives of the Local Poets! Imagine Pope, Congreve, or Prior conceiving an epigram, and then ransacking his mental directory of California notables for the name of some luckless worthy whom it will fit without dignifying! No, no, my brother literary gladiators; so long as we have no nobler antagonists than one another let us not repine that our swords are lath and our shields plaster; for these may be mistaken as the outward and visible signs of a useful calling.

Perusing Swift, the other day,
Despair and envy made me pray:
"Dear Lord, if it be right and fit,
Give me such formidable wit;
If not, bestow upon me, please,
Such formidable enemies."

When Ajax smote Thersites black
And blue upon the scurvy back
That bore an everlasting pest,
Methinks the rascal fared the best.

To Fate I'd rather give the odds,
And rail, a fool among the gods,
Than, drubbing any dunce that drools,
Prevail, a god among the fools.

The September number of London Society, I learn from the "social" columns of the Call, contains an "elegant ode" (elegant, tasty, and recherché, I suppose) to Farina, by Hector A. Stuart. "London Society," it is naively added, "is a very exclusive publication, patronized chiefly by the nobility." It has hitherto been usual to consider this certainly rather exclusive publication a kind of limbus fatuorum, or fools' paradise, wherein self-crowned idiots chatter immortal nonsense to the far future, unheeded and unheard of men; but Shon Shenkin of the Call has his own opinion as to that, and, as Omar Khayyam justly observes,

"He knows about it all—HE knows—HE knows."

"Who drives fat oxen should himself be fat;
Who sings for nobles he should noble be.
There's no non sequitur, I think, in that.
And this is logic plain as a, b, c.
Now, Hector Stuart, you're a Scottish prince,
If right you fathom your descent—that fall
From grace; and since you have no peers, and since
You have no kind of nobleness at all,
'Twere better to sing little, lest you wince
When made by heartless critics to sing small.
And yet, my liege, I bid thee not despair—
Ambition conquers but one realm at once;
For European bays arrange thy hair—
Two continents, in time, shall crown thee Dunce!"

What Mr. Stuart is to literature Mr. George M. Ciprico is to art; the one makes poetry ridiculous, the other the drama; but neither is satisfied with his fame, albeit each dictates the very terms in which it shall be bruited about by good-natured journalists. (This, however, is not true regarding that not inconsiderable portion of their renown which I confer upon them myself.) With them the distinction of genius is not enough: Stuart will have himself a prince, and Ciprico now flames out as a count! A New York dispatch asserts that he is heir to an immense estate left by Count Ciprico, who died intestate in New York some twenty years ago, and whose property was taken by the State. True, it is not stated that George is himself a count, but it is well known that Italian counts in this country are mostly barbers. How stupid of us all not to have guessed his rank!

There is one thing not easy to understand: it is stated that Mr. Ciprico has abandoned the stage, and is coming to California as an insurance agent, in the hope of earning money enough to "fight the case." What! the Great American Tragedian, who, "at the Surrey, sir," won such imperishable garlands, leaving the stage to earn money! Ah, well, you ought to be happy, George; you made no mark in the performance, but as the central figure in the tableau with which it concludes, brandishing your newly found patent of nobility in the lime-light, you shine at last with a splendor that dazzles!

You're like the distant mortar's shell,
That pitching from the heavens fell,
And none had marked the rover
Till it accomplished all its arc,
Then, bursting, set afire the dark,
And all, thank God, was over!

Well, well, my lad, we'll dub you "count";
That title's but a small amount
For your retiring-pension.
To keep you from the stage away,
Lip-service we will gladly pay,
And call it art-subvention.

Every one, I should imagine, must be gratified that the case of Mrs. Bein (who chooses to call herself Miss Wilton) against the Sheriff and the Administrator of the late Alexander Austin's estate has been amicably arranged, without publicity being given to the letters in dispute. Still, it is to be regretted that there could not have been a decision on the point of law involved. If A writes to B, who dies before getting the letters, it is of some importance to A to whom those letters belong—particularly if B was of the other sex. From certain recent indications of heart-broken disappointment, I infer that in some quarters it is held that they belong to the newspapers.

Accused of trickery at cards, a fine
French Senator is driven to resign.
Of parliamentary justice wise the plan:
The rogue's expelled who cheats, at play, one man;
But he's absolved, who, cheating in debate,
Misleads the truth and ruins half the State.

As to cheating at cards, by the way, there is perhaps more allowance made for it in this than in any other civilized country. What is thought of it in France is sufficiently shown by the expulsion of the Senator. Three or four years ago an English officer of high rank, who was not only the son of a peer but an intimate personal friend of the Prince of Wales, was summarily dismissed from the army for cheating at a game of whist in another country. Does the American laxity in this respect argue a lower morality? Hardly. Card-playing is not considered a very respectable "institution" here, and we are not concerned to preserve its purity. The gambling that is done in the best European society—not only in the club, but in the drawing-room—is no less than shocking to an American who loses.

The London Truth asserts and proves that the man who lives by cards, or even wins much oftener than he loses, is necessarily, by the law of probabilities, a swindler. It has often enough been observed, I suppose, that, at any rate, the men who have distinguished themselves as swindlers in business frequently play a remarkably good game of cards.

"Silks? Gol dern my skin, I should say so!
Why, pardner, you jest bet yer life
Ther's more uv 'em made in this place—sho!
Ther's more'n you could crowd on yer wife
Ef you was a Mormon! An' sat'n,
An' ribbins, an' velvets, an' sich—
Praps, now, you've read in yer Lat'n
'Bout Greasus, who struck it so rich.
Well, Greasus would be—so I guess, sir—
Raised out by a bet of the snips
Repersent'n' them furblyows—yes, sir,
Their value his pile would eclipse!"

The continuation of this interesting statement can be found in the official report on the manufactures of Crefeld, Germany, by Mr. Bret Harte, United States Commercial Agent in that city. The back of the document bears the following indorsement, in the writing of Mr. Evarts:

"This report is instructive in matter and noble in manner, but it is thought by the Secretary of State that in so far throwing over the traditions of the Department as to state the value of the goods manufactured in his district in poetic numbers and figures of rhetoric, instead of the numbers and figures commonly employed, Mr. Harte has perhaps not imparted the information asked for in his instructions with such definiteness and precision as might have been desired."

If this cold-blooded official criticism should ever hear of Mr. Harte it is believed that the insult will not overlook him. No doubt his situation will throw him up at once.

With what slovenly blind looseness some people write, knowing vaguely what they wish to say, then assuming that they have said it, but darkly unaware what they have implied. Here is an example. The New York World starts an employment office for servants—not, perhaps, so grand a development of journalism as Arctic and African exploration, but useful, no doubt, in its humbler way. The editor explains that henceforth "no good servant in New York need be out of a place, and no respectable household need be without a good servant." Yet if he were asked if the number of respectable households in New York, and the number of good servants, are, and henceforth will remain, exactly equal, he would promptly reply that the supposition is absurd. I know a veteran journalist who, relating the death of a lady by drowning, added by the plainest implication that the body afterward leaped upon a sailor and dragged a boat out of him by the hair.

I once had, myself, the carelessness, in writing on "representative poets," to unmistakably imply that Mr. William D. Pollock was a goose, whereas the exact reverse was true—the goose was Mr. William D. Pollock. The error caused both Mr. Pollock and me considerable annoyance, but I am happy to say I have since embraced so many opportunities to correct it that Mr. Pollock is now satisfied to let the matter rest as it is.

Recorder Taylor fixed his sly
Sign manual on Danforth's eye:
"Witness my hand"—the stars revealed
The hand—"and seal"—the eye was sealed.
No man can see without his eyes,
No Supervisor supervise;
For "supervise" is "oversee"—
The blind can not; no more could he.
And so the business of the town
Instead of "looking up" looked down.
Resolving to resolve, the Board
Adjourned, convened again, and snored,
Discussed the question o'er their drinks
And (those who could) took forty winks.
But he, that stricken man, did take
But one long, lasting wink, awake.
Now, conscience pricking the Recorder,
He thought apologies in order,
And said: "O Board, upon my word,
I'm doosid sorry it occurred."
This, like the writing on the wall,
Brought Dan forth, and he stood up tall,
His face all radiant the while
With magnanimity's best smile,
His eye attempting in eclipse
To second the motion of his lips:
"No man shall out-acknowledge me—
By Jove, I'm sorer than he!"

It is only fair to both the gentlemen mentioned in the foregoing verse to explain that it does not aspire to be an accurate statement of fact in any single particular. It is, indeed, a shining example of imaginative literature, designed to show how a poetic fancy moulds everything to its requirements. I deeply regret the necessity of this explanation, but perhaps it is more honorable to make it; and honor is itself almost as good as the lesser sort of poetry.

A certain friend of mine, by the way, who writes things, is commonly accused by those of whom he writes them of thinking himself a Titan among the pigmies. It can hardly be from vanity, for he frankly confesses that the happiest and most prosperous period of his life was passed where he felt himself a pigmy among the Titans. My friend used to write things in London.

"Why," says Brown to Smith, "do you invariably affix a six-cent stamp to your letters?" "My dear fellow, I once had the misfortune to cheat the Government out of a large sum of money. This is my way of making restitution." "But why do you not restore the whole lump, as conscience money?" "This is a bad world, Brown: the sentiments are not as lively as they used to be, and I never feel more than three cents' worth of remorse at a time. But my system of restitution on the installment plan keeps down the interest."

Here is a noble quatrain from the poem mentioned last week as the work of a convict in the State prison at San Quentin:

"The room is too small,
The bunks cling to the wall,
And one 'con.' above another
Is compelled for to crawl."

The first line seems to be a reply to poor Col. Richard Realf, who in some verses in a recent issue of this paper declares: "Here's room for poets!" As to the convicts being compelled for to crawl above one another, the rhyming sort ought not to mind that very much, for that was their single occupation while free.

Fig trees are grown in Stockton. Why?
Because the temperature is high;
Men hop as fleas do,
The ground so hot. Dressmakers there,
Tailors who winter suits prepare,
And all who deal in things to wear,
Leave when the trees do.

President Hayes has dispatched to Bucharest an autograph letter, officially recognizing the independence of Roumania. The document was superscribed: "To Whom it May Concern," and on learning from the messenger the nature of its contents the Roumanian Government promptly indorsed it: "Doesn't live here," and returned it to the bearer.

Nothing can ruffle the editor of the San José Mercury. His mind is like the liquid metal which takes its name from his journal: if it were freed heaven knows what vagaries it would be up to, but confined in the pot of his skull nothing can disturb the stoic immobility of its dead-level repose, and it would bear up a cannon ball. Writing of the training-ship Jamestown, this tranquil and philosophical observer says it is "a moral hell, where theimps wear blue uniforms and brass buttons, and for pure and unadulterated depravity and wickedness would put their traditional prototypes to the blush." I am no critic of style, but it seems to me that when a man writes with the calm, grand dignity of a lion fresh from the headsmen's block it is because he has the same luminous perception of the end to be accomplished, and of the best means to that end, that the hen has.

THE LATEST MAGAZINE VERSES.

Through the Ivory Gate.

I had a dream last night,
Dream of a friend that is dead;
He came with dawn's first light,
And stood beside my bed.

And as he there did stand,
With gesture fine and fair
He passed a wan white hand
Over my tumbled hair.

Saying, No friendship dieth
With death of any day;
No true friendship lyeth
Cold with lifeless clay.

Though our boyhood's play-time
Be gone with summer's breath,
No friendship fades with May-time,
No friendship dies with death.

Then answer I had made,
But that the rapture deep
Did hold me hush afraid
To mar that rose of sleep.

So with closed eyes I lay,
Lord of the vision fair;
But when 'twas perfect day,
Only the day was there.

J. S., in Blackwood's Magazine.

Translations from Heine.

"ICH WILL MEINE SEELE TAUCHEN."

I will steep my fainting spirit
In the lily's calyx pale;
The lily, in tones that stir it,
A song of my love shall exhale.

That song shall vibrate and shiver,
Like the ever-remembered kiss,
That from her lips on mine did quiver
In hours of divinest bliss.

"ES LIEGT DER HERISE SOMMER."

'Tis summer, fiery summer
Upon thy cheeks divine;
'Tis winter, icy winter
In that little heart of thine.

'Twill not be so forever,
My own dear love that art;
On thy cheek it will be winter,
And summer in thy heart.

"SIE HABEN DIR VIEL ERZÄHLT."

They told thee much, much they invented,
The charges were many they made;
But that which my soul has tormented,
Well, that they have never said.

They made a great fuss, and their fretful
Complaints they envenomed with gall;
They called me base, heartless, ungrateful,
And you lent an ear to it all.

But the very worst thing, the most mulish,
Of that they knew nothing, not they;
The worst thing of all, and most foolish,
In my bosom was hidden away.

"WIR FÜHREN ALLEIN IM DUNKELN."

Alone through the dark we traveled
All night in the mail, and we
Were somehow drawn closely together,
As merry as well could be.

But when morning broke, we were startled,
For then we became aware
That Love had been traveling with us,
Without having paid the fare.

"ES FÄLLT EIN STERN HERUNTER."

A star is falling, falling,
From the radiant heights above;
That star, I see it falling,
It is the star of love.

Blossoms and leaves without number
Fall from the apple tree;
The tricky breezes take them,
And toy with them fast and free.

The swan on the mere is singing,
And to and fro he steers;
Faint grows his song and fainter,
He sinks and he disappears.

And now 'tis so still and dreary,
Nor leaf nor blossom remain;
The star into atoms is shivered,
And hushed is the swan's sad strain.

THEODORE MARTIN, in Blackwood's Magazine.

Ante Mortem.

How much would I care for it, could I know
That when I am under the grass or snow,
The raveled garment of life's brief day,
Folded, and quietly laid away,
The spirit let loose from mortal bars,
And somewhere away among the stars,
How much do you think it would matter then
What praise was lavished upon me, when,
Whatever might be its stint or store,
It neither could help nor harm me more?

If, while I was toiling, they had but thought
To stretch a finger, I would have caught
Gladly such aid to buoy me through
Some bitter duty I had to do:
Though when it was done, they said, maybe,
To others—they never said to me
The word of applause so craved, whose worth
Had been the supremest boon on earth
If granted me then: "We are proud to know
That one of our class has triumphed so."

What use for the rope if it be not flung
Till the swimmer's grasp to the rock has clung?
What help in a comrade's bugle-blast,
When the peril of Alpine heights is past?
What need the spurring pain roll
When the runner is safe beyond the goal?
What worth in eulogy's blandest breath
When whispered in ears that are hushed in death?
No! No!—if you have but a word of cheer,
Speak it while I am alive to hear!

MARGARET J. PRESTON, in Sunday Magazine for November.

FOLLY AS IT FLIES.

A True and Touching Story of Fatinitza.

"Sallie, who's that ugly-looking man down there?"
"Where?"

"End seat, first row of the dress circle."
"Blest if I know. Some old spoon, I s'pose."
The speakers were members of the Fatinitza chorus.
They each represented a voice and a movement.
Nothing more.

A soloist was busy, and they were free to whisper.
They were also free to stare at the audience.
More especially at everybody who was staring at them.
Everybody in this case was not numerous.

But the "old spoon" was one.
He was plain, without a doubt.

They were pretty, more especially the first speaker.
That is, they looked so—at a distance.

She was a sprightly maiden, whose paint and powder covered the ravages of thirty hard winters.
But her legs were well preserved—in cotton.

She could not "crook the pregnant hinges of the knee."
At least, not easily.

She was airily dressed in a material like gauze.
It was hot, and she had been singing.

She was evidently not accustomed to admiration.

She was indefinitely attracted to the "old spoon."

This was the third time she had appeared before an audience in the same place, in the same piece.

Every night the "old spoon" had occupied the same seat.
He was not a spoon.

He was more like a fork.

Every night his lorgnette had been fixed upon her.

There could be no doubt why he was there.

He came always for a short time and then departed.

Who could it be?

She knew she was old.

But evidently he did not.

And she did not tell anybody.

She had never been fortunate in drawing glances.

But that also was a secret of her own.

Her mouth had gradually become fixed in a broad grin from long and vainly attempting to lure the unwary.

That was a fact; but this was a conquest.

She made inquiries, deftly and quietly.

She obtained a little clue; then a big clue.

Then the truth stood bare and unconcealed before her.

He was a broker—a stock-broker!—a Big Board broker!

Her heart bounded with joy and rapture. A broker!

Then a bouquet came, without any card.

Then another. And another. And yet another.

Could she not become acquainted with the man?

If he would only speak; if he would only write!

Her heart had spoken long ago.

That charm, "a broker," had opened it as "Open,
Sesame," opened Ali Baba's cave of old.

At last, memorable night! a note!

A little note, on a little sheet of paper, in a little envelope sealed to his "little angel."

"Maiden, I have watched thee nightly,

And I think thou lovest me well."

"If you do, meet me at the stage door after the show, and we will sup together. If yes, wear the rose from this bouquet. HENRY."

And the bouquet was tied to the little envelope.

The rose! With trembling hands she carefully took it out.

Her heart sunk with fear when a leaf fell from it. What if it fell to pieces before the curtain went up?

What if he did not come? But her heart said he would.

Then a fear that he would not distinguish the rose.

Where should she put it?

If she had only thought to have that white bodice washed!

Would she pin it over the outline she called her bosom?

It might rub off in her movement on the stage.

Would she put it in her hair?

It might not be seen there; that was red.

She would wear it on her bosom.

She would gaze at him, and when he raised his lorgnette, as he was sure to do, she would point to it.

The evening came; the house was full, an ocean of faces!

Red faces—bearded faces.

White faces—smooth faces.

Long faces—short faces.

She looked at the end seat of the first row of the dress circle. That was vacant.

He was not there!

False, false, false! She could have cried.

But the paint would not stand it.

She could not take her part in the chorus.

What made her smile return so suddenly?

What made a flush mount to places where the paint could not hide it?

'Twas he, 'twas he! At last, at last!

He came, and stepping over the crowd that filled the aisle.

In the end seat of the first row of the dress circle.

His eye sought her out; his lorgnette was raised.

She pointed to the rose, and smiled.

He could not help seeing the smile she threw.

And he might see the rose.

He saw it! His lorgnette went down suddenly.

Then he stepped over the people and went out.

Happiness at last! At last happiness!

The broker was hers! Visions of diamonds, and carriages, and horses, and dresses flashed before her.

She thought not of the piece. If the stage manager had spoken to her she would have slapped his face. Was she not to sup with a broker? At last the curtain fell. The long agony was over. She looked very different when she had laid aside her spangled dress, and donned her jacket and hat.

She caressed the flower in her hand.

Melancholy fate! Julia insisted on going home with her.

They left the theatre together.

Outside stood a man. 'Twas he! Her heart gave a bound as if it would burst. Then it bounded back again.

'Twas not he!

No sign, no sign of him. Could he have broken his own engagement?

Pretending to have forgotten something she went back.

But no, he was not there!

'Twas no use waiting. He had broken his promise and her heart.

She was angry. She did not cry. She swore she would break his head if she ever got a chance.

And she went to bed, got up next morning, and went down to the theatre.

"For Miss Smugg," said the box-keeper, as he came in with a letter.

"Which Miss Smugg," cried three or four voices.

"Miss Sallie Smugg." And she came tremblingly forward.

Something told her 'twas from the broker.

She retired into a corner to read it, while all the Smuggs watched her enviously.

It was from the broker.

"I waited for you. You did not come. Why did you wear my rose if you did not mean to keep the engagement? Write and make an appointment if you will accept the adoration of HENRY."

"Box 16451 P. O., San Francisco."

So he was not false!

"Oh, the luxury of being falsely accused."

She refuse the adoration of a broker! Gracious heavens!

But she must be cautious. She must not be too eager.

So she wrote a little note:

"DEAR HENRY:—I didn't mean to deceive you. I lured you; but I didn't see you. I carried your rose in my hand, so as you might know me. But you wasn't there so I went strait home with Julie. Ill lure for you again tonight. Hoppy yure quit well, as this leaves me at present. Yure fond love, SALLIE SMUGG."

She sent this note to Henry, "Postoffice Box 16451, City."

Once more the curtain rose on the play.

Once more the "old spoon" came in and sat in the end seat of the first row of the dress-circle.

O bliss! O rapture!

He took out an envelope from his pocket, and pretended to write something upon it.

Then he had received her note.

Again the curtain fell. Again she stole forth from the theatre door to fly to his arms.

But his arms were not there.

He was not there.

Again that muffled figure by the lamp.

But he took no notice.

Again she waited, again she went back to the theatre, but no Henry!

Now she was mad, indeed.

A second disappointment was too much.

She called him very bad names.

Then she went to bed again, again got up in the morning, feeling angry, again went to rehearsal.

Again that box-keeper with a letter.

"For Miss Smugg."

"Which Miss Smugg."

"Miss Sallie Smugg."

'Twas the broker's handwriting.

"SALLIE:—You are a fraud. You have sold me twice. To-night I shall wait for you again. I will wear a light overcoat so that you may know me. Don't disappoint me again, or there will be a row. HENRY."

Then she was angry.

She wrote another little note.

"HENRY:—Yure a fule, a wooden-headed fule. If yu cannt distinguish better than that yuid better get a pair of dubble binoclers an wear a telescope. I lured for yu agane. Yu didnt cum. If yu cum to-night, I'll forgiv yu; but if yu dont yu can go to thunnder. I kin get plenty better fellers than yu. SALLIE."

"P. S.—I will wear a gray jackit."

And she sent it.

The evening came once more.

There was the "old spoon" in his accustomed place.

As he had done almost every night, he took a long look at her and disappeared.

She was happy again. Her "broker" had seen her, and to-night he would not fail her.

As the play was over, and the theatre door opened to give her egress.

There he stood surely this time.

There was nobody about.

The gray jacket amalgamated with the light overcoat, while a faint noise broke the silence, as of the enthusiastic meeting of a small boy's palate with a toothsome gumbdrop.

"Henry!"

"Sallie!"

"At last!"

"At last!"

A pause.

"Stop a minute!"

"What's the matter, Henry?"

"I think there's some mistake."

"I think there is."

"You are not Sallie."

"You are not Henry."

And the light overcoat and the gray jacket parted company.

"You are not Henry?"

"I am; but you are not Sallie."

"I am."

"There's some mistake."

It was not her "broker."

What was to be done? She had made some curious blunder. This was not the "old spoon."

Who was it, then?

A pause of a moment.

It was not the Henry she had expected; but what did that matter?

She might as well have an admirer.

"You are not the Henry I thought, but—"

"Well, you're not the Sallie I expected, but—"

"Let's go to supper, anyway."

So they went; and she told him all.

She described the "old spoon," and where he sat.

Nestling up against Henry's waistcoat, she said tenderly:

"I wonder who the fool was?"

Then Henry, struck by a sudden thought:

"By Jove! I know. He's not a broker at all. That's—"

NOTE.—From the Bugle, of October —, 1878: "If the manager of the California will kindly see that his company keep their eyes on the stage, and do not stare at the audience with such marked expression of interest, the performance will be more successful."

INTAGLIOS.

Life.

Grief should be the instruction of the wise;
Sorrow is knowledge; they who know the most
Must mourn the deepest o'er the fatal truth:
The tree of knowledge is not that of life. BYRON.

First Love.

Down under the hill, and there under the fir-tree
By the spring, and looking far out in the valley,
She stands as she stood in the glorious Olden,
Swinging her hair in her right hand damped;
The other hand toys with a honey-suckle
That has tipped up and is trying to kiss her.
Her dark hair is twining her neck and her temples
As tendrils some beautiful Balze marble.

"O eyes of lustre and love and passion!
O radiant face like the sea-shell tinted!
White cloud with the sunbeams tangled in it!"
I cried, as I stood in the dust beneath her,
And gazed on the goddess my boy-heart worshipp'd
With a love and a passion, a part of madness.

"Dreamer," she said, and a tinge of displeasure
Swept over her face that I should disturb her;
"All of the fair world is spread out before you;
Go down and possess it with love and devotion,
And heart ever tender and touching as woman's;
And life shall be fair as the first kiss of morning."
I turned down the pathway, was blinded no longer:
Another was coming, tall, manly, and bearded.

I built me a shrine in the innermost temple—
In the innermost rim of the heart's red centre—
And placed her there, sole possessor and priestess,
And carved all her words on the walls of my temple.
They say that he woo'd her there under the fir-tree,
That he won her one eve, when the katydids mocked her.
He may have a maiden and call her Merinda;
But mine is the one that stands there forever,
Leisurely swinging her hat by the ribbons.

They say she is wedded. No, not my Merinda,
For mine stands forever there under the fir-tree
Gazing and swinging her hat by the ribbons.
They tell me her children reach up to my shoulder.
'Tis false. I did see her down under the fir-tree
When the stars were all busy a-weaving thin laces
Made red with their gold and the moon's yellow tresses,
Slow swinging her hat as in days of the Olden.

JOAQUIN MILLER, in Harper's Bazar.

Little Tyrant.

Let every sound be dead!
Baby sleeps.
The Emperor softly tread!
Baby sleeps.
Let Mozart's music stop!
Let Phidias' chisel drop!
Baby sleeps.
Demosthenes be dumb!
Our tyrant's hour has come!
Baby sleeps.

GEORGE BIRDSEYE.

To The Rainbow.

O Iris! bringing balm for Summer's tears,
So lightly gliding down thy bridge of rose,
I know not why my spirit drinks repose
Soon as thy foot-fall the horizon nears.
Spell-bound I watch the crimson-shaded piers
As arch by arch the blooming pathway grows,
And where the richest flush of color glows
I trace thy trailing garments' folds and fears.
Have vanished, in one long and ardent gaze
Thy steps I follow down the heavenly slope.
Iris, be mine thy message! Let thy rays
Write out how I with destiny may cope.
Ah! spanned with light would be all coming days,
Could I but read thy oracle of hope.

FRANCES L. MACE, in Lippincott's.

An Autumn Picture.

Sky deep, intense, and wondrous blue,
With clouds that sail the heaven through,
And mountain slopes so broad and fair,
With here and there, amongst the green,
A maple or an ash-tree seen
In glowing color, bright and rare.
Green fields, where silvery ripples fade,
With cattle resting in the shade;
Far mountains touched with purple haze,
That like a veil of morning mist,
By gleams of golden sunlight kissed,
Seems but a breath of by-gone days.

And clover which has bloomed anew
Since shining scythes did cut it through,
And corn-fields with their harvest fair,
And golden-rod upon the hill,
And purple asters blooming still,
And sunlight melted into air.

DORA READ GOODALE, in Scribner.

A White Camellia.

Imperial bloom, whose very curve we see
A lovely sculptural symmetry control,
Looking, in your pale, odorless apathy,
Like the one earthly flower that has no soul.
With all sweet radiance bathed in chill eclipse,
Pure shape of colorless majesty, you seem
The rose that Silence first laid on her lips,
Far back among the shadowy days of dream!
By such inviolate calmness you are girt,
I doubt, while wondering at the spell it weaves,
If even Decay's dark hand shall dare to hurt
The marble immobility of your leaves!
For never sunbeam yet had power to melt
This virgin coldness, absolute as though
Diana's awful chastity still dwelt
Regenerate amid your blossoming snow.

And while my silent reverie deeply notes
What arctic quietude in your blossom lies,
A wandering thought across my spirit floats,
Like a new bird along familiar skies.

White ghost, in centuries past has dread mischance,
Thus ruined your vivid warmth, your fragrant breath,
While making you, by merciless ordinance,
The first of living flowers that gaze on death?

EDGAR FAWCETT, in Atlantic.

The Three Wise Men.

Three wise old men were they, they were they,
Who went to walk on a winter day.
One carried a club to dig for pickles;
One wore an ulster to keep off prickles;
The third, and he was the wisest one,
To kill the mosquitoes carried a gun.

"O dear!" cried one, "three wise women I see!
The only chance for our lives is to flee."
So they ran till they reached the great north pole,
And up in the steadiest way they stole;
Eus high at the top sat a Polar bear,
Which filled the three wise men with despair.

One used his club for a parachute;
One from the stock of his gun did shoot;
The third, in the ulster, fainter away,
And there he'd have lain to this very day,
If the three old women had not appeared,
And found them all more hurt than skinned.

One fanned the ulster into life,
For which he gladly made her his wife;
One caught the club man on her ladder—
'Twas hard to tell which felt the madder;
And the third, before he had time to ask it,
Carried the sportsman off in her basket.

JOEL BRUSH, in St. Nicholas.

FASHION GOSSIP.

As Tiffany & Co. among jewelers, or Arnold, Constable & Co. among dry goods dealers, so is the firm of H. P. Wakelee & Co. among druggists and perfumers, and a visit to their well appointed establishment will furnish proof that this reputation is well earned. Among the many novelties introduced by this firm none have so rapidly assumed the highest position in popular estimation as the well known "Camelline," and this success is an illustration of what can be accomplished by patient exertion, directed by science and skill. A prominent physician of this city some time since called the attention of the firm to the great injury to health caused by the various preparations in use for the improvement of the complexion, nearly all of which contain large quantities of lead, mercury, and other active poisons. A series of careful and expensive experiments were at once instituted for the purpose of discovering a substitute for these objectionable compounds, and the success which has crowned their efforts will be appreciated when it is stated that "Camelline," as shown by chemical analysis, is not only free from the least trace of poisonous material, but is generally pronounced far superior to any article heretofore in use. The great desideratum of safety and efficiency is thus attained, and ladies will find in "Camelline" an article exactly adapted to their requirements. Another preparation which has met with great favor is the celebrated "Auroline," manufactured by this house, identical in composition with that of Robare, of London, and surpassing that article on account of being freshly manufactured, thus presenting its peculiar properties in a more active and efficient condition. As our lady readers know, a few applications of Wakelee's "Auroline" changes the hair to that sunny golden hue, the theme of poets and an object of admiration to all lovers of the beautiful. Among the endless variety of toilet soaps displayed by this firm one brand lately imported, in our estimation, stands preëminent. It is the "Savon Royal," from the manufactory of Eckelaer, of Brussels, celebrated in Europe for its delicate perfume, the odor of the natural flower, and for all the qualities desired in soap for toilet use. Wakelee's Extra Cologne, although not new, demands attention, from the fact that connoisseurs in perfume claim that it equals in purity and permanence the famous colognes of Farina. Certain it is that many of the first families of San Francisco have for years used no other cologne, purchasing it by the gallon, while bottles of the various standard sizes in which it is sold are found upon the toilet tables of many of our city belles. Scarcely less popular are their sachet powders of varied perfumes, among which we noticed Musk, Jasmine, Violet, Heliotrope, and Jockey Club. Among the large stock of hair and tooth brushes from the well known Gosnell & Sons, and Prout & Harsant, of London, are to be seen some beautiful carved ivory brushes, mirrors, and toilet sets just imported from Paris. Another invoice will soon arrive, and we predict large sales of these elegant testimonials about holiday times. Although this house has long been noted for the success with which they cater to the refined tastes of their customers, by far the most important department of their business remains to be noted. We refer to their arrangements for the importation of pure drugs and chemicals direct from the leading manufacturers of the world, their extensive chemical laboratory for the manufacture of medicinal preparations, and the care used in dispensing upon physicians' prescriptions. Their books show that they have thus prepared since the establishment of their business over two million prescriptions, and we doubt whether there is another house in the United States which has a similar record. Like all old Californians, we have long known this firm, and we say to those among our readers who desire anything new, rare, and elegant in the way of toilet articles or perfumes, and those who appreciate absolute purity of material and skillful dispensing of medicines, to call upon H. P. Wakelee & Co.

Millinery.

Ladies' soft felt hats are made with generous brims, turned up at either right or left side, while the opposite flaps and drops down toward the back. The trimmings are mostly of black ostrich feathers for street wear, with loose cluster of roses. These hats are curved and bent to any angle that is believed to be becoming. One of the handsome and very picturesque hats, which is now much admired for opera or evening party, is in white felt, or in rich new velvets. Maroon velvet is made beautifully effective by a contrast of the new green called "endive." This shade appears in a satin piping on the edge of the brim, blending with the folded band of maroon velvet surrounding the crown. The whole is crowned with loose outside tips floating negligee over the hat. In color they partake of the same greenish-white shade above mentioned. The "Beef eater" hat is one of the novelties, appears in soft felt of all colors, trimmed in velvet and moss plush—in light shades for evening, with trimmings to match. We observed these latest styles at the millinery establishment of Mrs. E. T. Skidmore, 111 1/2 Market Street, some of the latest being of the Madame Virot and Schneider modes, Paris.

When Thomas drove up to deliver the usual quart of mixture, the gentleman of the house kindly inquired:

"Thomas, how many quarts of milk do you deliver?"
"Ninety-one, sir."
"And how many cows have you?"
"Nine, sir."

The gentleman made some remarks about an early spring, close of the Eastern war, and the state of the roads, and then asked:

"Say, Thomas, how much milk per day do your cows average?"
"Seven quarts, sir."

"Ah, um!" said the gentleman, as he moved off. Thomas looked after him, scratched his head, and all at once grew pale, as he pulled out a short pencil and began to figure on the wagon cover.

"Nine cows is nine, and I set down seven quarts under the cows, and multiply. That's sixty-three quarts of milk. I told him I sold ninety-one quarts per day. Sixty-three from ninety-one leaves twenty-eight, and none to carry. Now where do I get the rest of the milk? I'll be hanged if I haven't given myself away to one of my best customers by leaving a durned big cavity in these figgers to be filled with water!"

One-half of the world don't know how the other half live—and it is none of their business.—Yonkers Gazette. If this law were enforced, one-half the world would be out of business.

HOW TO FURNISH A HOME.

The Library.

The selection of a library being a matter that betrays the intellectual tastes and abilities of a man, we do not propose to select a library that will suit every one, but will offer a few suggestions to the purchaser of a library. Here a grand panorama of the intellectual achievements of the past are presented, and it requires some little care in selecting from the myriads of books a home library. We dropped into the establishment of A. Roman & Co., and looked over his magnificent collection of these treasures of the ages, and I concluded we would begin with "fiction," being desirous of first pleasing the ladies, who, it is said, are passionately fond of this class of reading. We observed a very neat and pretty edition of Dickens' works, in thirty volumes, bound in half calf; also "Waverley," in twenty-five volumes, in the same style of binding, and Irving's works, an edition in twenty-eight volumes. We noted also Lord Lytton's novels, in half calf, green and gold, a very beautiful edition; also Thackeray's works. For travels, we concluded to suggest Hare, and Bayard Taylor, and "Through the Dark Continent," by Stanley (just issued); and in literature, Disraeli's works, in nine volumes, and Danforth's English Literature, Schiller, and Goethe, in half calf, blue and gold; also Taine's History of English Literature, and Hallam's History of English Literature, and the works of Burke. In history we would select Bancroft and Hildreth's histories of the United States, and Hume's and Martineau's and Macaulay's histories of England; also a very neat edition of Parkman's works, not forgetting Rollin, Plutarch, and Hallam. Then in poetry, we would of course select the best English and American poets; Byron, Moore, Shelly, Shakespeare, and Tennyson, Longfellow, Whittier, Holmes, and Bryant. For Cyclopedias we would want the standard, Johnson's, Appleton's, Chamber's, and the "Britannica." These works above named for the library we found very elegantly bound, and at comparatively low prices. We had almost forgotten the juveniles, which we found here in a choice selection, beautifully illustrated, and we also ran across some elegant gift volumes for the holidays. In purchasing a library we found that here was one of the places that purchasers should visit.

The extraordinary popularity of the "Domestic" sewing machine proves conclusively its success as one of the favorites of the home. Its almost noiseless motion and ease in running, added to its possession of all the later improvements, led many manufacturers to imitate some of its most valuable features, thereby acknowledging its superiority. The "Domestic" has been steadily improving until it has almost attained perfection. Among some of its most prominent late improvements may be mentioned the new combination fly-wheel, by which the bobbin may be wound, without running the machine, also the self-threading shuttle, and the self-setting needle.

With Engravings, Oil Paintings, Etc.

The surroundings of a home mould and develop the character, we are told by a distinguished writer. If this be so, then how important it is that those surroundings be elevating and ennobling in their effects. The forms of beauty continually impressed upon the mind develop a taste for the good, the true, and the beautiful. In this age of art, culture the resources in this direction are almost exhausted. Steel engravings with oil paintings have long been popular, Etchings, with their effects in shading, are now reaching a high place among the works of art. A new process, called photogravure, has produced a new feature in art, and when adorning the walls of the parlor, library, or saloon, it adds much to the beauty of a home. We found at the establishment of E. Wolf & Co., under the Palace Hotel, some of the true specimens of art in paintings, engravings, etc. Among others in his choice selection of etchings we noticed one very fine work entitled "The Roman Emperor," by Alma Tadema. Also an elegant series of fifteen fine steel engravings for the library, by A. Liezen Mayer, one of the most celebrated of the modern German artists.

BOSTON DRESS REFORM.

California "Worth" Princess Suits, Skirts, and attachable Flounces: Cashmere and Merino Union Suits for ladies and children; ladies' and misses' shoulder-brace Corsets; Abdominal Corsets. No. 430 Sutter Street. A. W. BAKER, the only Dress Reform Agent in the city.

The courts are beginning to take notice of the relations of an editor toward persons with whom he is brought into confidential relations. A Rochester newspaper man, who was called upon to testify as to the manner in which he obtained certain information published in his paper bearing on a case at issue in court, declined to answer, alleging that a disclosure by him of the name of his informant would seriously injure his business as the publisher of a newspaper, and that as the information had been imparted to him under the pledge of secrecy as to the informant, he was as privileged as a lawyer who has received disclosures from his client. The court took his view of the case.

Ladies, why don't you get your riding habits made at Burr & Fink's, corner Post and Montgomery Streets, over Hibernia Bank?

The finest baths are at the Terrace, Alameda.

Currier, 103 Dupont Street, makes the finest PICTURE FRAMES.

This paper is printed with ink furnished by Chas. Enou Johnson & Co., 509 South Tenth Street, Philadelphia, and 59 Gold Street, New York.

A little daughter of a Connecticut clergyman was left one day to "tend door," and obeying a summons of the bell, she found a gentleman on the steps, who wished to see her father. "Father isn't in," said she, "but if it is anything about your soul I can attend to you; I know the whole plan of salvation." Mrs. Parker, of the Ladies' Depository, has opened a new store at 126 Post Street. Dolls dressed in all styles. New Lace Patterns.

Go to the Terrace Swimming Baths, Alameda.

Currier, 103 Dupont Street, has a fine assortment of VELVET FRAMES.

NEW

BOOKS

Illustrated History of Ancient Literature, Oriental and Classical. By John D. Quackenbos. A. M., M. D. 12mo. .... $1 50
England from a Back Window, with Views of Scotland and Ireland. By J. M. Bailey, the Danbury News man. 12mo. .... 1 50
The American Colleges and the American Public. New edition. With afterthoughts on college and school education. By Noah Porter, D. D., LL.D. 12mo. .... 1 50
Piccola. By N. B. Saintine. With ten steel plates by Leopold Fleming. 8vo. .... 2 50
The Hair of Charlton. A Novel. By May Agnes Fleming. 12mo. .... 1 50
Vesta Vane. A Novel. By "La King R." 12mo. .... 1 50
Lake Breeces, or the Cruise of the Sylvania. By Oliver Optic. The Great Western Series. 12mo. .... 1 50
Live Boys, or Charley and Nasha in Texas. A Narrative. By A. Morecambe. 12mo. .... 1 00
A Woman's Word, and How She Kept It. By Virginia K. Fawcett. 12mo. .... 1 50
Word-worth. A Biographical, Aesthetic Study. By Geo. H. Culver. 12mo. .... 1 50
Songs, Legends, and Ballads. By John Doyle O'Reilly. 12mo. .... 50
The Studio Arts. By Elizabeth Winthrop Johnson. 75
Shakings. Etchings from the Naval Academy. By a member of Class '67. .... 1 00

BANCROFT'S
721 MARKET ST. S.F.

FALK'S

MILWAUKEE BEER

Beer drinkers will, on trial of this superior article, be convinced that it is excellent and unsurpassed by any other in the market. It has a beautiful amber color, full body and fine flavor, and is for sale at all the leading places of resort in the city and vicinity. We request a trial.

CUTTING &amp; MURRAY,

Sole Agents, 206 Front Street, S. F.

KURRACHEE RUGS!

ASK FOR THEM IN THE LEADING Carpet Stores. Manufactured by WAKEFIELD RATTAN CO., 38 Geary Street.

CALIFORNIA ROOT TEA.

My family use California Root Tea, and find it the best and cheapest medicinal preparation they have ever had. It is a natural remedy, not a nostrum.

BUTTERICK'S

PATTERNS--NOV. STYLES.

Send stamp for catalogue. AGENCY, 124 POST ST., San Francisco.

HEALD'S BUSINESS COLLEGE,
No. 24 Post Street, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

Opposite Mechanics' Institute.

IMPARTS A THOROUGH PRACTICAL Education in all Commercial and English Branches, French, German, Spanish, Drawing, and Telegraphy. This school having greater facilities, and enjoying a more extensive patronage than any similar institution on the Pacific coast, continues to have its claims for recognition and patronage upon the good sense and enlightened judgment of the public.

LIST OF FACULTY.

E. P. Heald, F. C. Woodbury,
H. M. Stearns, A. R. Capp,
Mrs. C. Woodbury, T. R. Southern,
J. A. Chesnutwood, Mrs. W. J. Hamilton,
A. P. DuBief, F. Seragni,
R. Sorcini, Geo. Jebens,
Lloyd Baldwin, A. Vander Naillen.
For full particulars, call at the College, 24 Post Street, or address E. P. HEALD, President Business College, San Francisco.

J. J. BIRGE, DENTIST, 313 Kearny Street.

R. C. MOWBRAY, M. D., DENTIST
224 STOCKTON ST., corner Post, S. F.

GEORGE BARSTOW,
ATTORNEY AND COUNSELOR AT
Law, No. 309 California Street, San Francisco, Cal.

SAFES AND SCALES.

FOR SALE BY

JOHN MOLLOY, 54 CLAY STREET.

BACON & COMPANY
PRINTERS
CLAY ST. CORNER SANSON

INTERCEPTED LETTERS.

SAN FRANCISCO, November 7, 1878.

MY DEAR MADGE—I need hardly tell you that we devoted Monday night to Clara Morris. So did a great many other people, for the house was full; and they put on their best bib and tucker to do honor to the occasion. There were quantities of white bouquets out, and a few rash creatures even ventured upon opera cloaks. In fact, there was quite a general realization that the coming of the emotional Clara was an event, and you know, we women always signalize these things by putting on our war-paint. A few people, who had not found out that Miss Mutton was East Lynne hash, were quite disgusted with themselves for having invested three dollars in the same old cry, but the actress herself was the attraction after all. I can not see where Miss Mutton is any improvement on East Lynne, even if it is French. I don't believe I like the dignified "Miss Osborne" as well as the trisyllable "Miss Corney," nor "Matilde" as well as pretty "Barbara Hare." I know that "Maurice de Latour" is a perfect Nova Zembla beside "Archibald Carlyle," and "Miss Mutton's" son is not so easily forgiven as that of "Kabel." Of course the French excel in the more delicate lines of character-drawing, and they have an incomparable gloss of finish. I wanted with some curiosity to see how Miss Morris would make up as a middle-aged woman, but I found that she did nothing of the sort. It is true she wears a luxuriant crop of silver-gray hair, but there is so much of it that it suggests premature grayness. I really can not tell you whether her face was made up or not; in repose it looked fresh and blooming, but at moments, it became completely transfigured—old, haggard, drawn, agonized. I never experienced so much uneasiness for a stranger in the whole course of my life. I had heard and read so much of Clara Morris' paroxysms of pain, and the signs were so real, that I did not know half the time whether it was Clara Morris or "Miss Mutton" that was suffering. It was with inexpressible relief that I saw her called before the curtain after each act. What a peculiar way she has when thus called, of appearing with a face full of such unutterable sorrow that she might sit for the "Mater Dolorosa," and then breaking suddenly into a smile of such positive gladness that her eyes dance. My dear girl, that smile relieved me wonderfully. I dislike to be played upon like a harpsichord, but I am obliged to submit to it when I go to see Clara Morris. You will be surprised, therefore, when I tell you that through the first act and half the second I was the victim of disappointment. Miss Morris, for some strange reason, has chosen to affect in the earlier scenes that preternaturally quiet manner which Rose Eyttinger employs so much. She sank her voice to such a low pitch that we could not hear the spoken lines at all, and they must have had some difficulty in catching her words even upon the stage. She was nervous, gestureless, almost voiceless. I never conversed but once with this sort of woman, and she was a lunatic. It only took me five minutes to find out she was as mad as a March hare. Then the stillness seemed ominous. There is something catty about these ultra-quiet women, and I momentarily expected her to spring on me and throttle me. Miss Eyttinger's quiet never affected me, she was too transparently artificial; but I do not like to see a great genius like Clara Morris descend to such sharp contrasts to produce effect any more than I like to see her black her gums to make her teeth white. What an odious detail of the make-up is this same gum blacking. I wonder that so spirituelle a creature can use it, and she so dainty, too. She was a picture in her dress of that rare pure gray which is innocent of drab, so perfect a gray indeed as to seem a continuation of her abundant locks. She changed her dress later to a wine colored merino, and looked more entertaining than ever. I did not quite feel that we had Clara Morris back until she began to express the instinct of the mother in her interview with poor old "Mr. Behn," the tutor, which part Mr. Bradley played with a full appreciation of the old gentleman's uncomfortable position in the crater of a domestic volcano. From that moment to the end she was simply perfect. Her genius tends to the delineation of morbid passion, but it is superb. She has lost much of the old twang which used to offend the ear. I only caught it twice, and I think she caught it at precisely the same moment, for it disappeared in the next sentence each time. She has improved as all great ones do. The last act was an accumulation of agony, we piled upon woe, and about the most uncomfortable dramatic bit I ever sat through. I shall not soon forget her face bleached to deathly whiteness, nor her subtle knowledge of an invalid's fancies. Upon my word I felt as if I had the typhoid fever for about fifteen minutes, there was such an echo of old suffering in her peevish impatience, in her broken, unnatural voice, and that strange fancy of the fever-stricken, an irrelevant sentence coming into one's head and dining itself into one's brain with a hundred variations. It is simply wonderful, Madge. Go and see her. The stage was mounted very handsomely, and she was excellently well supported. Mr. Morrison as "de Latour" dusted his temples with the powder puff. This was his concession to middle age. I observe that a great many actors will consent to this temple leak of gray, but draw no wrinkle on their faces. Miss Corcoran played "Matilde" in a succession of green dresses, the first arsenic green, the second Nile green, the last bottle green, or peacock green, or something in that line. It was a pretty steep undertaking for her, but she managed the situation very well. She will be an actress some day. The children were played by Miss Henrie Bascombe and Miss Ida Aubrey. Miss Bascombe has considerable unformed talent, which answers very well in a child's part like this, and she got a round of applause for her longest speech, which seemed to do the little girl a great deal of good. Why not? Who does not like to applaud Miss Ida Aubrey is precocious. I need tell you no more than that. I was glad to see "Joskyns Tubbs" Jennings back again, and almost felt as if that delightful little Maud Harrison might fly in at any moment. He made a very nice old doctor, with a crusty exterior, and a heart of gold. I am inclined to think him a little monotonous, but he has been good in everything that he has played in San Francisco. Miss Wilkes electrified us by breaking out in a stave or two of—

"My sweet Johanna that lives in Harlem Lane."

This for her is positively frisky. I should never have suspected her of singing anything more cheerful than "Stabat Mater." She has a quiet, pleasing manner, and is very nice if they cast her properly. I observed that many sought an antidote to Miss Mutton by going to see Robinson Crusoe next night. Strange—is it not?—that Boston successes will not do here. Harvard was a failure, and Robinson Crusoe is a hit. I must indulge for once in the womanly privilege of saying "I told you so." Miss Atherton is a pretty woman—I may say a beautiful woman—and she is a good burlesque actress, too. I wish you could see her in her suit of goat skin, with only a dash of color let in, in the shape of a red wing in her cap, and a set of red ribs in her white Japanese umbrella. I remember the cudgeling of brains Lydia Thompson had to conjure up this costume, and what a hit it was. The correspondents thought it sufficiently a triumph of art to send descriptions of it all over the country. To read them one would think that the little burlesque queen must have looked like a moving mountain of perpetual snow. But Miss Atherton does not look at all like that. She has a commanding carriage, and seems quite unimpaired. She sang a lulling song with Willie Edouin in very jolly style. I do not think she has much natural vivacity, but she has stage experience, and she has a look of Maggie Moore which, to us, makes her seem merry, whether or no. A propos of resemblances, they cast the full blaze of the calcium light on Miss Searle the other night while she was singing—singing exquisitely, too—and for a moment she was the picture of what Minnie Walton used to be in the glory of her beauty, when Cherry and Fair Star was running at the old California. Poor old house, it has seen some jolly times. They have been reviving the hit of other days up there, in the shape of Frank Lawlor's "John Mellish," a remarkably fine piece of acting, which has failed to draw. It ought to have done better on its merits alone, but the impression was abroad that it was only put on as a makeshift until the arrival of Ada Cavendish, and makeshifts never draw. But to return to Crusoe. Little Bella Chapman put on a bewitching and much abbreviated set of skirts this week, and skipped about like a little humming bird, introduced a song and dance, a horrid clog dance by the way, and added one of the funniest little baby winks to her little repertoire. She is vastly amusing to me. I have come to the conclusion that Mr. Rice has brought a very good burlesque troupe with him, and I think he thinks so too, for he sat in front the other night and applauded vigorously. I never saw a man enjoy anything as he enjoyed his own show. Willie Edouin's man "Friday" is quite as remarkable a piece of acting as report made it. Burlesques always fizzle out toward the end, but in the first part there is more in "Friday" than can be taken in with a passing sense of pleased amusement. His difficulties with the English language are very amusing and the witticisms very happy. Willie Edouin was always an athlete, of a particularly elastic kind, but he divides his laurels in this troupe. I never saw such an india-rubbery set of men in my life. They are all good dancers, and the trail of the "Lone Fisherman" is over them all. (Also I saw several yards of the Evangeline ball fringe.) Harry Dixey, whom I think I remember as the elastic policeman, has a particular genius for contorting himself. As for Lou Harrison, he made quite a hit as the bold buccannier, and only needs a big voice, which may come with time. He is deeply imbued with the true spirit of burlesque, and accomplished a series of the most extraordinary exits and entrances. In fact Robinson Crusoe is a jolly burlesque; the music is well-selected, and there is not a weak one in the cast so far as the prominent parts are concerned. Why is it not always so? Little Oates and the Little Duke continue to attract at the Bush Street Theatre. They intended to replace it with La Marjolaine, but the public cried for more Duke, so they have been indulged. I doubt if they will permit it to be withdrawn even on Monday, for its music grows upon the fancy with constant hearing. Every one has caught fragments of it here and there, and whistle, hum, or pick it out on the piano, in the most distracted manner. It is really trying to pass a house in the piano quarter, for the strains of "Poor little man" float through every window with all its poor little accidental notes fearfully mingled, while some few have been bold enough to attempt "If you refuse my just demand," and are beating the martial measure of "To the camp." It is whispered that the music of La Marjolaine is even prettier. But I doubt it. There are rarely two such hits in a season. I will send you an arrangement of both operas as soon as they are issued, but the music dealers are very slow in getting them out. For the present adieu. Yours, BETSY B.

Railroad matters in the Western Addition are beginning to assume something like a tangible and practical shape. This portion of our city, by reason of its water view, perfection of drainage, freedom from dust, and health consequent upon pure air and good drainage, is the most desirable for residences of any part of the peninsula. For long years it has been cursed by a most vexatious railroad system, and has been retarded in its settlement and hindered in its prosperity. The building of the California Street Railroad has worked a miraculous change, and this part of the city is now beginning to feel the influence of a railroad well constructed, well managed, and run in sympathy with the people who support it. California Street, from Polk Street west, will be an avenue of palaces. "California Heights," as this part of the town has been very properly named, will in time become the location of the most elegant residences of the city, and will contest with Nob Hill its claim to be considered as the aristocratic quarter. A new cable road is to be constructed out Montgomery Avenue, through Union Street, to the Presidio. California Street road is to be extended direct to the Ocean, thus opening up to residences another range of heights, called "Pacific Heights," overlooking the bay, ocean, and Golden Gate. When the Union Street road is built, and the Clay Street road extended—as it must eventually be—and the California Street road is run to the ocean beach, the Western addition will be the place for elegant homes.

Where can one thoroughly enjoy a swim? At the Terrace Swimming Baths, Alameda.

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LOCKE.....PROPRIETOR.

MATINEE LAST
TO-DAY, PERFORMANCES
TO-NIGHT, & OF
TO-MORROW LE
SUNDAY PETIT
EVENING DUC.

MONDAY.....NOVEMBER 11th

First rendition in English of the vivacious Comic Opera, in three acts, by M. Chas. Lecocq, author of Girella, Girofla, Mme. Angot, and Le Petit Duc.

LA MARJOLAINE

ALICE OATES

AS "LA MARJOLAINE,"

Supported by the

ENGLISH COMIC OPERA CO.

Exquisite Costumes from Paris.
New Scenery by Graham.

CORRESPONDENCE.

WALTER M. LEMAN, Esq.—Dear Sir: In compliance with public sentiment, and in recognition of the claim which an honorable and almost unprecedented long professional career of more than half a century (twenty-five years of which have been spent on the Pacific coast) gives you to the remembrance of Californians, we tender you on their behalf, as a token of the esteem felt for you as an artist and a man by the citizens of San Francisco, a SEMI-CENTENNIAL COMPLIMENTARY TESTIMONIAL, at the Grand Opera House, on the evening of SATURDAY, Nov. 16.

In the hope that it may be indeed a Golden Benefit, we remain, with great respect, your obedient servants,

Hon. A. J. Bryant, Hon. Sam'l H. Dwinelle,
D. J. Staples, Jacob Shaw,
Hall McAllister, J. P. H. Wentworth,
Wm. G. Badger, W. C. Randolph,
Henry M. Black, Dr. J. M. MacNulty,
Hon. Phil. Roach, Dr. R. Beverly Cole,
A. W. Van Schmitt, A. N. Towne,
Paul Morrill, A. W. Stott,
Geo. W. Granniss, Ed. Cahill,
Mathias Gray, J. A. Jones,
Sam. C. Harding, R. W. Graves,
F. W. Van Reynegom, C. G. Jones,
J. K. Wilson.

TO HON. A. J. BRYANT AND COMMITTEE OF CITIZENS—Gentlemen: I accept the compliment tendered me with a high appreciation of the flattering terms in which it is conveyed, and assure you, with a heart grateful for your kindness, that no more gratifying incident has marked my long experience of fifty-one years on the stage.

I remain your obliged servant,
WALTER M. LEMAN.

MR. FRAZER,

(Late of New York),

DISTINGUISHED PROFESSOR OF
MODERN SOCIETY DANCING.
Private Schooling Exclusively.

ROUND DANCING A SPECIALTY

I WOULD MOST RESPECTFULLY

call the attention of parents, and young ladies and gentlemen of San Francisco, Oakland, and vicinity, to my eight-page circular, containing full information upon the treatment of Round Dancing, etc., and why so MANY FAIL IN THE ART. Read carefully all the circular contains, and I venture to say the advantages offered will please you. I EXACT NO TUTION where I fail in my undertakings.

J. WILLIAM FRAZER.

Circulars at M. Gray's Music Store, 105 Kearny Street, San Francisco, and W. B. Hardy's, Broadway, Oakland.

One of the most remarkable of books is a recently published work by Mr. J. Stanley Grimes, entitled Mysteries of the Heart and Heart Explained. There are, we take it, certain mysteries of the heart which can not be explained by the wisest head; and the head has also its mysteries, of which the explanation must be sought in the heart—and will be sought in vain. Nevertheless, some of the dark corners of each receive revealing beams of light in Mr. Grimes' book; the sources of feeling and thought, which, like those of the Nile, have been for ages hidden in deepest obscurity, being here traced and mapped with such surprising accuracy that the reader stands astonished at his own lack of penetration. The work is published by W. B. Keen & Co., of Chicago; for sale by Billings, Harbourn & Co., No. 3 Montgomery Street.

Gentlemen desirous of the neatness, elegance, and comfort of a perfect-fitting suit of clothes—business or dress-will, as a matter of satisfaction, do business with Burr & Fink, fashionable tailoring emporium, corner of Montgomery and Post Streets, over Hibernia Bank.

CALIFORNIA THEATRE.

BARTON & LAWLOR.....MANAGER
BARTON HILL.....ACTING MANAGER

Monday, November 11, for one week only, special revival after the most elaborate preparation of the Jarrett & Palmer version of

UNCLE TOM'S CABIN.

Now being played with unprecedented success in the towns and cities of Great Britain.

New and magnificent scenery by Voegtlin, including a great Plantation Scene and the wonderful Apotheosis.

BEAUTIFUL GATES AJAR.

Novel mechanical effects by Stackhouse and assistants, perfect cast of characters.

ALICE KINGSBURY AS TOPSY.

And a host of Real Colored Vocalists in their Jubilee Songs and Specialties. The entire production on a scale never before attempted in this city.

Monday, Nov. 18, first appearance here of the world's English Actress,

ADA CAVENDISH.

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER
F. LYTTER.....ACTING MANAGER
G. R. CHUMMAN.....TREASURER

The Dramatic Event of the Season—Engagement of Greatest Actress of the Day,

CLARA MORRIS,

Supported by the great legitimate Company of this Theatre.

This (Saturday) afternoon at 2 o'clock,

MISS MUTTON.

This (Saturday) evening, Nov. 9, Miss Clara Morris as Elizabeth Freelove in the Comedy of

A DAY AFTER THE WEDDING

Sunday evening, Nov. 10, special and last performance

PROOF POSITIVE.

Monday evening, Nov. 11, CLARA MORRIS as

MISS MUTTON.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—In consequence of the great press attendant on the engagement of Clara Morris, prices to the Matinee will be the same as night.

STANDARD THEATRE.

Bush Street, between Montgomery and Kearny

LESSEE AND MANAGER.....M. A. KENNE
BUSINESS MANAGER.....P. H. KIRK

CROWDED—CROWDED—CROWDED,

Nightly by the elite and fashion of the city to witness

RICE'S SURPRISE PARTY,

In the charming Musical English Burlesque, replete with choice Songs and Sparkling Opera Bouffe Music.

ROBINSON CRUSOE, ESQUIRE

ROBINSON CRUSOE, ESQUIRE

AND HIS

MAN FRIDAY,

MAN FRIDAY,

EVERY EVENING INCLUDING SUNDAY.

ONLY ROBINSON CRUSOE MATINEE TO-DAY

at 2 P. M.

227 Seats at the box office.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

New Greece. By Lewis Sargeant. Cloth.....$
The Europeans. A novel. By Henry James, Jr. do
The History of Indian Literature. By Albrecht Weber. Cloth.....
The Bible of To-day. By J. W. Chadwick. Cloth.....
Thanatopsis. By William Cullen Bryant. 8vo, ill., cloth.....
Psalms the Potter. By Prof. Mosley. Cloth.....
Jean Teterol's Idea. By Victor Cherbuliez. Cloth, $1; paper.....
Grammar Land. By M. L. Nesbitt. Cloth.....
Daisy Thornton. A novel. By Mary J. Holmes. Cloth.....
A Woman's Word. A novel. By Virginia F. Towne. send. Cloth.....
American Colleges—Their Students and Work. By C. F. Thwing. Cloth.....
The Haunted House. A novel. By Wilkie Collins. Paper.....
Play Days. By Sarah A. Jewett. Cloth.....
St. Nicholas. Bound volume, 1878. Cloth.....
Just received, a large assortment of New Juveniles.

BILLINGS, HARBOURNE & CO

BOOKSELLERS AND STATIONERS,

NO. 3 MONTGOMERY STREET.

The photographs of Messrs. Dames & Hayes, Market Street, are described by the lively female our species as "just too sweet for anything!" art critic, with the moderation that comes of a true judgment, nods his confirming head and says, "bet!" Thus appears the duality of the bases of it is in the feelings and in the intellect. The sens beauty is catholic, universal, and Messrs. Dame Hayes are its prophets and "ministers of grace." Every picture that bears their imprint is a school art. O Raffaele, Raffaele! if you could have had advantage of their study!

Attention is called to an advertisement in another column of J. William Frazer, the famous New York professor of dancing, who intends to locate here instruct in the Terpsichorean art—making a specialty of private lessons in round dancing, as preliminary to the accomplishment of graceful quadrilles—entirely new, novel, and sensible method. Frazer's circular.

HOW TO FURNISH A HOME.

[CONTINUED FROM ELEVENTH PAGE.]

With Mantels, Ranges, Etc.

The marbleized iron mantels so closely imitating the choicest foreign and American ancient and modern marbles have reached a perfection that can hardly be realized. In the imitation of agate, Egyptian, lapis lazuli, red and gray porphyry, and every species of marble is so close as to almost deceive the eye of an expert; the most difficult imitations of mahogany, osage, English, French, and American walnut, and various other woods, with veneering in French mahogany or California laurel, are, in a word, one of the wonders of the age. They are superior to the best qualities of slate and marble for mantelpieces, in hardness of finish, which makes them impervious to stains either of smoke, oils, or acids, and in their soft, rich color, which harmonizes more with the furniture. This new production has now become fashionable, and in furnishing a home one of the most durable ornaments. Open fire places are superseding the stove for the parlor, library, and salon in the city, and when adorned with these mantels finished with Black agate, nickel plate, and trimmed with gilt, bronze, or nickel trimmings, their elegance can only be known when seen. We observed these beautiful mantels at the large establishment of W. W. Montague & Co., Battery Street, where they may be obtained at rates much less than the cost of slate or marble, and in their elegance of design, quality of finish, and durability of polish, they will be found in every way superior. We noticed here also for those who desire to purchase stoves something elegant in tile finished parlor stoves with open grate front. These stoves are finished with tiling at the sides which are shaped into the most beautiful designs in flowers, vines, etc. We must not forget to mention the fine assortment in coal vases we found here, all elegantly finished in Japan finish in various colors, with neat representations of flowers, fancy portraits, etc.; also, the polished steel fire irons for open fire places, nickel trimmed, with ornate heads tipping the handles, closely imitating gold. One of the important features, if not the most important, in furnishing the house is not to overlook the culinary department. The very latest improvements for cooking and baking must be looked after; and in looking over the magnificent assortment here presented we found that the "Van" wrought iron range supercedes all others in the perfection of its construction and elegance of finish. In this range the fire-place is surrounded on three sides with a water back, presenting a large heating surface for hot water, making this the most durable and economical range ever offered to the public. The shelf, with pipe passing through it, is very useful and convenient for placing the covers of the range or setting dishes on to keep warm. The broiling attachment to these ranges is superior to any ever offered for family use, and equal in every respect the broilers now in use in the best hotels and restaurants; they are arranged for a charcoal fire, with smoke pipe attached to the main pipe to carry off all the smoke and odor from broiling meats. We noticed here, also, a new ware called the "Agate Iron Ware," which, in smoothness, lightness, and beauty of finish, and with its elegant tint inside and outside, has made it the favorite with all housekeepers. Every article almost in this department is represented in this beautiful ware. Elegantly mounted in nickel and silver the tea and coffee urns, etc., with their accompaniments, complete the furniture of the kitchen with that taste and elegance so pleasing to the eye of the housekeeper. The above leading firm in this department are supplying an immense demand for this ware in many of the most fashionable houses of San Francisco. W. W. Montague & Co. were the first to introduce this beautiful ware, and now make it one of their specialties.

Mosaic Tiling, Parquet Flooring, and Wood Carpeting

The nolla mosaic tiling are made in Valencia, Spain, and have been used for ages for floors in halls, vestibules, conservatories, bath-rooms, kitchens, laboratories, etc. These tile are considered by architects and builders far superior to any similar goods ever introduced into the homes of the Pacific Coast, on account of their richness in color, hardness, and smoothness of finish, and beauty of design. These tiles are used also for hearths, and are preferred to marble on account of their being completely proof against stains of all kinds. The hand-painted facing tile, for plaster ornamentation of painted-pieces, are exceedingly handsome, being perfect imitations of all kinds of flowers, birds, and animals, all in rich colors. This kind of tile is also used in single for side brackets, trays, lamp stands, etc. Beautiful designs are also used for wainscoting some of our most fashionable houses. The inlaid or parquet flooring is manufactured from oak, walnut, cedar, and other contrasting colors of wood, and when laid upon the floor resembles the rich mosaic inlaid work so common in Germany, France and Italy, and without which no room is complete there. This elegant flooring is laid down in ornamental designs, to suit the taste of the most fastidious, as almost every mathematical design may be represented. It has a beautiful surface finish, susceptible of high polish, and is easily kept clean and in perfect order. A beautiful effect is produced by laying a parquet border only around a room, relieving the carpet by the contrast. The wood carpeting is the most suitable for a library, dining or sitting room. These floors and carpeting are insect proof, and so tight that dust cannot penetrate them. The dust may be as easily cleaned from them as a piece of furniture, the result being a floor much more elegant, durable, and cheaper than one covered by a wool carpet. Our most fashionable residences are adopting these features in furnishing a home. We found all the above nearest and most elegant designs in tiling, parquet flooring, etc., at the establishment of W. H. Mahony & Co., 409 California Street, in this city. All the new improvements in this department of house furnishing will be found at this establishment.

With Mirrors.

Rich carvings in walnut, with veneering in French walnut, make a very beautiful frame for dining-room or library mirror, while the more elegant castings for frames in gilt are the most appropriate for parlor and bed-room mirrors. The upper part of the mirror frames in gilt are now ornamented with beautiful representations of mythological characters; among others the head of Ceres adorns the centre, while on either side Cupid reclines—in perfect imitation of his coy reign over the hearts of men and maidens; the side uprights represent columns and also antique carvings. The plain gilt mirror frames are the relics of the crude in art, in elaborate wall ornaments. The wonderful gilt castings in plaster of Paris, that are to be seen at the establishment of S. & G. Gump & Co., 581 and 583 Market Street, perfectly imitating the most delicate flowers and statuary, can certainly be said to be executed in all the perfection of this peculiar art. The window cornices are now made of the same design to correspond with the mirrors of each room. Rich carvings in primavera wood, California laurel, etc., are here found in every variety. This style of mirror is especially adapted to the dining-room.

Furniture and Upholstery.

Being desirous of giving some further items to the readers of the ARGONAUT on furniture and upholstery, we called upon one of the leading firms in this department—F. S. Chadbourne & Co., 735 Market Street, and give the result of our visit in the following: In chamber furniture we found that the Queen Anne and Eastlake designs are the latest and most extensively used. The woods entering into these elegant designs are ash and walnut. Mahogany is to some extent now being revived. The Queen Anne design is embellished with French veneering and marqueterie and white holly. The large and heavy and massive furniture, in elegant French veneering, is still sought after; the Queen Anne and Eastlake designs are, however, the most fashionable. The mirrors for these designs are now made of French plate glass, very thick, with beveled edge, while the toilet drawers are lined with silk velvets. In upholstery for the chamber, Indian cashmere and French raw silks in delicate tints are now prevailing. Lambrequins of the pole cornice pattern are very neat and graceful. For the dining-room we have the large pedestaled extension tables of the Queen Anne design, with the feet and supports richly carved in antique designs. The sideboards are of the same style to match the tables. The upholstery of the dining-room is of Russia leather in various colors. The frame-work of the chairs and lounges are massive and heavy; the upholstery is studded with nickel plated nails; also the trimmings are nickel plated on all the pieces. The lambrequins are also in Russia leather to match the furniture, trimmed and studded with nickel plated nails. The cornices are made of plain walnut. The pieces for the parlor usually consist of a divan and its accompaniments, in odd designs, no two pieces being of the same pattern. The number of pieces are selected in accordance with the size of the room. The stuff overwork is now largely used, the frame being hid entirely from view. The materials used are satin damasks—plain satin to a limited extent—while the more elegant Persian and Indian patterns are considered the most fashionable—and raw silks trimmed with silk plushes. Each piece of furniture is entirely encircled with an Eastlake fringe matching the tints of the raw silks, and hanging to the floor. Ebonyed and gilt furniture frames are being largely used. The former is often inlaid with elegant French marqueterie and beautiful designs in gilt. The coverings for this furniture used are the materials above mentioned. Draperies are hung upon gilt cornices of the very latest modern and antique designs. In some cases the cornices enter into the construction of the building. Long curtains reaching entirely to the floor are now used, the material matching the furniture. We noticed a very elegant ebonyed corner what-not inlaid with French marqueterie, with desk in a beautiful design to match. Cabinets of every description, hall stands, etageres, and numerous other articles of furniture. The above designs we observed at the establishment of the above mentioned firm. Although but a short time has elapsed since this firm entered upon business in this city, yet an unexampled prosperity has followed their attempts to please their numerous patrons. By the liberal patronage of the public this establishment has made such rapid strides in business that it now compares favorably with any concern in this department. The Standard Theatre of this city has recently been refitted and upholstered by this firm. The elegant hangings to the boxes of this place of amusement add greatly to its adornments, and it is but justice to add that its elaborate finish has elicited much praise from the public.

FASHION GOSSIP.

Latest in Parisian Modes.

The very latest novelty in carriage costume is of black silk and velvet, the skirt is en train, and is trimmed knee deep with bands of velvet. The overskirt is short and looped en bouffant, trimmed on the lower edge with flounces of black and white lace, falling one over the other. The basque is tight-fitting, and neatly finished on the lower edge with a piping of satin. Long loops and ends with double-faced ribbon tipped at the point behind, and flounces of the two laces, perfect the length of the sleeves. This makes a very rich carriage costume, and we are informed by a lady just from Paris that this is the style among the bon ton of Paris. Another very beautiful dress for in-door toilet is that of the Princess robe style. It is made of plum colored velvet, trimmed with satin of the same shade, richly embroidered in Persian patterns of gold and steel. Another novelty in walking costumes, from Worth, Paris, is a very rich lemon brocade silk. The palette is made of cloth of the same shade, and is trimmed with a broad band of moss cloth of a darker shade descending almost to the bottom of the dress. The buttons are in a double row, descending in front and on the lapels at the back. The button has a raised centre of half-globe glass, disclosing beetles and various insects, each button representing a different species of insect. Another elegant walking costume of the Princess pattern is made of olive brown silk, with trimmings in silk and jet embroidery, representing peacocks' feathers. The above styles we found at the fashionable establishment of Mrs. Romer, on the southeast corner of Kearny and Post Streets. This lady is now making up all the very latest of the Parisian modes for some of the most fashionable ladies of our city.

Coiffures.

The most graceful and becoming style of hair-dressing, to say the least, is desirable on the part of every lady; and one of the latest, and withal a graceful style is accomplished by waving the front in short, irregular curls, or laying the hair in graduated rings across the brow, and down upon the temples to the ears. At the back the mass of hair is taken up, and arranged in a natural coil and puffs, without any frizzed hair within, while a handsome comb appears at the top of the head in the centre. In making up this style of headdress when the hair is short, a large

REMOVAL.

I. W. TABER

The leading Photographer of this city, has just occupied his new and handsome parlors over the HIBERNIA BANK, CORNER MARKET and MONTGOMERY STREETS. Entrance on Montgomery Street. Elevator connected with building.

Easy of access. The handsomest Photograph Rooms in the city. Give him a call.

MADAME SKIDMORE

FINE MILLINERY.

THE LATEST PARISIAN STYLES CONSTANTLY RECEIVED.

1114 Market St., between Mason and Taylor, under Graham House.

switch is necessary to make up the coil. The price of such a switch will range from $12 to $20, according to quality. Another very graceful style, tasteful and elegant, for ball or evening party has just appeared: The hair is parted in the centre in front, and waved on the sides, with a few ringlets or frizzes falling on the forehead. Two small puffs slant from the left to right, while parallel with the puffs a cable coil slants also from the left to the right, reaching to the nape of the neck. Back of the coil and puffs a comb appears (made of the lady's own hair) on the head, and is placed in the hair sideways. At the back, fall from the comb on the left side, a feather made out of human hair descends to the nape of the neck. To finish the head-dress a small hair bow is placed on the top of the head in the centre. This elegant and fashionable head-dress may be seen at the hair-dressing establishment of Shephard & Co., No. 8 Stockton Street, near Market. In fact, all the latest and most fashionable styles in hair-dressing may be seen and had at this establishment.

Latest in Geot's Tailoring.

Although there is a tendency in fashionable circles in America to adopt the prevailing styles in London, yet the peculiar American cut and finish has made a style that is distinctly and completely American. Both styles in tailoring parlance may possess the same name while they possess entirely different features. Durability as well as neatness and elegance of trimmings are features peculiarly American. The most fashionable style for this season for business suit is the double-breasted sack. All the garments close higher than those prevailing heretofore. The fine trade have adopted these styles, and they are consequently the most fashionable. The changes from one month to another are not very marked yet the gradual change in rolling the garments higher, and in reducing the width of the shoulders has made a very great change in the styles prevailing three years ago. The business suits are made now without exception of fancy checks, the shepherd's plaid pattern being the prevailing style in various colors; plain black and white, however, is the most in favor. The serge faced suiting of a dark mixture is made up into four-buttoned cutaways. The styles in London for winter overcoats, which to some extent will be the prevailing styles in fashionable circles in America, are the frock great coat, with the waist cut longer than last winter, while the skirt is cut shorter; also the single-breasted frock great coat, which is made up in goods with a bold diagonal line, also in plain melton in medium colors. The single-breasted Chesterfield has become a great favorite. This style of overcoat is equally effective in dark as in light colors. Small patterns or plain goods are best suited. All these latest styles are made up at the fashionable and long-established tailoring establishment of J. N. Tobin, Montgomery Street, where all the latest fashions are always to be found.

General Purchasing Agency.

I have established myself as a General Purchasing Agent, at No. 424 Montgomery Street, in this city. An experience of over twenty years in this line of business, during which time my transactions have extended into almost every department of trade, warrants me in the assertion that I can satisfy the requirements of the most fastidious. My aim will be to give the same consideration to the purchase of others as if it were my own. All orders for the purchase of goods, from the least valuable to the most expensive, will receive my careful and patient attention, not only in the selection, but also in packing, etc., and prompt forwarding to destination. I make some descriptions of merchandise, for the purchase of which I have special facilities, viz: hardware, mining tools and machinery, musical instruments, watches and jewelry, pianos, druggists' sundries, crockery, china and glassware, chronos and engravings, wines and liquors (foreign and domestic), perfumery of all kinds. Commissions for "Women's and Children's Articles," of every variety, will be superintended by a lady thoroughly conversant with their wants. Goods selected in the London, New York, and Paris markets at lowest prices. Commission purchases at satisfactory rates. Remittances may be sent by mail, by registered letter, postal order, or express, at convenience of sender. Attention is directed to advertisement in another column.

Refers by permission to Jas. C. Patrick, Esq., Jacob Underhill, Esq., Louis McLane, Esq., B. M. Hartsborne, Esq., Hon. S. H. Dwinelle, T. F. Tracy, Esq., Geo. C. Hickox, Esq., Hon. E. F. Beale. Respectfully, L. T. ZANDER.

Novelties in Candies, etc.

Under the Baldwin one will notice a new candy establishment just opened, where will be found all the novelties in sweetmeats. The home-made candies, consisting of the caramel so popular among the young ladies, which many a young gent has found to the delight of his pocket, the delicious cream chocolate, and dainty French cream candies, are all here found in profusion. All the new flavors, those which only the sweetest man knows how to produce, will here be seen and appreciated. We are perfectly satisfied that the readers of the ARGONAUT, who happen to pass the Baldwin, will be attracted by the inviting appearance of this new establishment, and will not fail to enter and examine the elegant array of tempting sweetmeats that are to be found here. The above-named establishment is a branch retail store of Mercer's factory, 518 Kearny Street; also a branch of which is found at 17 Powell Street. This factory has been celebrated for the superior qualities of the candies manufactured there.

COMPLICATED WATCHES

CHRONOGRAPH, REPEATING, SPLIT SECONDS, ETC.

AND A LARGE STOCK OF GOLD and Silver Watches, Chains, Diamonds, Jewelry, Silver Ware, and Fancy Goods at

ANDERSON &amp; RANDOLPH'S

CORNER OF MONTGOMERY AND SUTTER STS., SAN FRANCISCO.

NEW IMPORTATION

Of the LATEST STYLES of

EMBROIDERIES

OF EVERY DESIGN.

ALSO, CANVAS OF NEW COLORS. Ladies' Shopping Baskets of unique shapes. Bronzes, Clocks, Ivory Carvings, Toilet and Fancy Goods, Vienna Bronze Ornaments.

The finest assortment of FANS in the city.

H. SIERING &amp; CO.

(SUCCESSORS TO LOCAN & CO.)

19 MONTGOMERY STREET, LICK HOUSE BLOCK.

NEW BOOKS AT ROMAN'S.

The Family Library of British Poetry. By Fields. 8vo, cloth.....$6 50
The Ceramic Art. By Jennie J. Young. Cloth..... 5 00
The Management and Diseases of the Dog. By J. W. Hill. 12mo, cloth..... 2 00
Hygiene of the Brain and Nerves and the Cure of Nervousness. By M. L. Holbrook. 12mo, clo. 1 50
Fortune of the Republic. By Emerson. Cloth..... 50
Primer of Design. By Barry. Cloth..... 25
New Greece. By Lewis Sargeant. 8vo, cloth..... 4 00
Bodley on Wheels. The favorite juvenile..... 1 50
Literary and Scientific Anecdotes. By Keddie. 8vo. 2 50
Practical Treatise on Casting and Founding..... 7 00
Daisy Thornton. By Mrs. M. J. Holmes. 12mo..... 1 50
A Woman's Word, and How She Kept It. By Virginia F. Townsend. 12mo, cloth..... 1 50
England from a Back Window. By J. M. Bailey, the Danbury News Man. 12mo, cloth..... 1 50
Mother Goose in Black and White..... 50
Addresses and Orations of Rufus Choate. Cloth..... 25
Personal Reminiscences of R. B. Forbes. 12mo, clo. 2 00
Jean Teteral's Idea. By Victor Cherbuliez. Paper, 60 cents; cloth..... 1 00
Just received—St. Nicholas, bound, 1878..... 4 00
King of Picture Books..... 1 50
An immense assortment of Juveniles, Books, etc., for Christmas presents.
Happy Family—New Blocks by Crandall..... 3 00

A. ROMAN & CO., 11 Montgomery Street, San Francisco.

Lick House Block, San Francisco.

DECKER BROS

PIANOS ARE THE

BEST KOHLER &amp; CHASE SAN FRANCISCO &amp; OAKLAND.

GILROY HOT SPRINGS.

SANTA CLARA CO., Aug. 27, 1878.

Virginia, Alabama, Tennessee, Arkansas, Kentucky, Mississippi, Minnesota, and New York abound in hot and cold mineral springs; but, if I am not mistaken, California presents more and better than them all. Our Paso Robles and Gilroy hot springs are as good for rheumatism, paralysis, and cutaneous complaints as the famous hot springs of Arkansas. The cold soda and Viechy water of Santa Clara County are as palatable and as efficacious as the waters of Saratoga; the cold sulphur and other waters of Napa County may be compared to the Virginia and Kentucky Blue Lick, and sulphur springs; the cold mineral waters of Sonoma, Plumas, and Colusa Counties are as good as the Bethesda waters of Minnesota or those at Iuka, Missisippi, while the hot springs of Sonoma, Napa, Plumas, Los Angeles, San Bernardino, San Diego, and Santa Barbara Counties are superior to any springs in the East, with the exception of those at Little Rock, Arkansas. A few days' sojourn at the Gilroy Hot Springs will convince anyone that this is one of the places among the many in California where the waters are of a high medicinal order, and where the pure mountain air is highly charged with ozone and healthfulness. These springs are situated in a detached spur of the Coast Range of mountains, about fifteen miles from Gilroy—which is upon the Southern Pacific Railroad, about eighty miles from San Francisco. The first part of the road takes you through one of the most lovely portions of Santa Clara Valley, after meandering through miles of orchard, farm and vineyard roads, you commence to ascend the foothills over a highway upon which a good team may trot all the way. The last three or four miles are through what is called Coyote Creek, which, while a little rough, is extremely delightful. The very last part of the road is through a miniature mountain valley called the Valle de los Osos. The entire distance of fifteen miles may be compared to a panorama incomparably beautiful in its succession of scenic attractions—scenery so varied in its picturesque loveliness that each succeeding mile develops new charms and surprises. The latter seven miles is delightfully embowered with wide-spreading branches of the oak and the sycamore, while a daisy, now and then, into and across a sparkling stream imparts additional zest to the drive. A sharp little incline from the creek, of about a quarter or a third of a mile, and you arrive at the springs, located on the western slope of the mountain, in the midst of a natural grove of oaks, sycamores, cypresses, pines, and firs. The springs are located about half way up between the bed of the creek and the summits of the highest range of foothills. The sides of these foothills are either wooded or patched with wild oats or other mountain grasses all the way up; and they serve as a sort of miniature Alps for those who love to recreate and perspire in their regular diurnal efforts to mount the tops. Once on the summit, and a magnificent landscape view is presented, taking in almost all of the Santa Clara Valley, the Bay of San Francisco, the Pacific Ocean, the city of Gilroy, and away down into the Pajaro and Salinas Valleys. There are several springs on the ranch; the main one, and the one which gives the place its importance, being 109 and 115 degrees in temperature, and composed of sulphur, magnesia, iron, alum, and a little arsenic—the iron predominating. The waters are used for both bathing and drinking, and are particularly efficacious in cases of rheumatism, neuralgia, paralysis, scrofula, general debility, and, say, general let-down. They are also remedial in cases of gout and chronic derangements of the liver, and produce temporary relief if not temporary cures. Consumption and kindred complaints receive no benefit whatever from the use of these waters in any way. This main spring pours forth a great volume continually, and only varies the number of degrees pre-ent above. The facilities for bathers are very complete. There are sixteen large hot rooms, provided with sprinklers of cool water. There is also a mud bath for the cure of rheumatism, scrofula, and other complaints. Then there are two plunge, or warming baths, respectively for ladies and gentlemen. In each of these is a cold shower, and connected with each plunge is a dressing apartment and a "sweat room." A large drinking fountain is erected over the main spring, which is only a few yards from the bath houses. This fountain is kept covered, so that no foreign substances can get into it at any time. The waters run from this fountain to the plunge and other bath houses. Near by are two cold sulphur springs, and six miles away is a natural soda spring, the waters of which, as they are dipped from the spring, sparkle and effervesce like Congress water. Pure cold water pushes down from the springs in the mountains, and is communicated to all portions of the premises. Many, if not most, of your readers will bear me out in the statement that at many of the springs in California even the proprietors are unable to give one satisfactory information as to the proper time and method of taking these mineral waters. Having visited most of the mineral springs in our State, and having met all kinds of people seeking relief from a whole catalogue of complaints, I have taken some pains to gather information on this point, and am prepared to disseminate it pro bono publico. In the first place, persons visiting the Gilroy Hot Springs, and seeking relief from rheumatism, neuralgia, and cutaneous diseases, should, the first day, take a ten-minute bath in the forenoon and afternoon, an hour before meals, or two or three hours afterward. The next two days take the fifteen-minute baths. Thereafter take your time with you, and take twenty-minute baths, then let the water out of the tub, place your blanket in the tub and get into it, cover yourself up, and stay from twenty minutes to half an hour; then dress slowly, with the door closed, until you get on your underclothes; then open the door, complete your dressing, and walk briskly to the fountain and drink one or two dipperful of the hot water; then exercise lightly until the effects of the bath disappear, and avoid all drafts. In from two weeks to two months, according to the character of the case, if you follow the above instructions, you will be well. You may eat, too, what is set before you, and drink as you would at home. For a person afflicted with gout I would recommend the above method of taking, with a daily mud bath for the most afflicted, and that the "victim" diet himself somewhat, abstain from red wines and spirits and eat all the asparagus he can get, and use lime juice on all meats, and to squeeze one or two times into his whisky, cold tea, or soda water. A bad case of gout may be "knocked in the head" in a few weeks if the patient will follow the above directions. For general debility I would recommend a plunge, bath of about ten minutes an hour before breakfast, an E tub bath of about fifteen minutes in the middle of the afternoon, and then a nap, and some good wine, and a good hearty dinner. To the obese person desirous of reducing himself, I would recommend a plunge bath of fifteen minutes either before or after breakfast, to be followed by a cold shower; then a fifteen-minute tub bath in the middle of the afternoon, to be followed by a blanket, or sweat bath, for half an hour, as above described; then he should let all things containing starch and sugar alone, and drink soda and sulphur water; in two or three days the reduction will commence, and will go on for two or three, or more weeks. To the entirely healthy person, only in pursuit of recreation, and lathes from a standpoint of pleasure, I would recommend a plunge and a shower in the morning of about five minutes each, and a tub and a shower of about five minutes each in the afternoon—or either one and not the other. The ranch upon which these springs and grounds are located contains four hundred acres. The place is owned and kept by Messrs. Koop & Arrick, whom I must confess, thoroughly understand their business—at least so far as making their guests comfortable, and giving them a quid pro quo for the money they spend. The hotel is one of the completest and best to be found at any of our watering places or health resorts; it is handsomely furnished throughout, all the rooms containing stationary wash-basins and other modern improvements. There is a large parlor, with piano, etc., and a dining room which will seat over a hundred persons. Then there is another large two-story building with seventeen rooms, and nineteen cottages. There is a post-office, express and telegraph offices, a bar, and billiard-room, fountains, and shade trees, stables, and carriage and saddle horses. A daily stage is run between the springs and the railroad each way, and there are numerous delightful drives and walks. The proprietors can accommodate 200 people, although they have had at one time 240. The hotel rates are liberal and the baths are free. There are about fifty seekers after health and recreation here at the present time. The wives of both of the proprietors are pleasant and cultivated ladies, and they, also, do all in their power to make the patrons of the place thoroughly comfortable and at home. The place is not what is usually termed a fashionable resort, and one can be perfectly independent in regard to dress, and may even health and strength, while both are often frittered away by dress and dissipation at gay and more stylish places. It is a delightful place to bathe and hunt and fish and sleep and dream and rest and forget the busy, whirling city, with all its work, worry, and disappointment. The fine mountain air and incomparable waters tone us up more than a whole pharmacy of cures, and we rejoice at its many attractions and its accessibility.

ARLINGTON HOTEL,

SANTA BARBARA, CAL.

NO HOTEL ON THE PACIFIC

Coast can surpass the ARLINGTON in the airy cheerfulness and convenience of its arrangements. None can equal it in the natural and artistic beauty of its surroundings. The readers of the ARGONAUT will be pleased to know that the problem of combining solid comfort within doors, inexhaustible pleasure without, and calm contentment all the time, at a very economical rate of expenditure, has been solved at the ARLINGTON, and is respectfully submitted by GEO. T. BROMLEY, Manager.

BERKELEY GYMNASIUM.

The Berkeley Gymnasium (a preparatory school to the University)—a first-class boarding-school establishment in the interests of higher education, and in opposition to the ramming system of the small colleges and military academies of the State. The next term will commence July 24th. Examination of candidates for admission July 22nd and 23rd. By request, instructions have been provided during the summer months for students preparing for the August examinations at the University. For catalogue or particulars, address—

JOHN F. BURRIS, PRINCIPAL,
BERKELEY, CALIFORNIA.

NOTE.—We desire to call special attention to the organization of our Grammar Department, separate from the Academic, and solicit the patronage of parents and guardians of small boys.

SURE REMEDY FOR BALDNESS.

Prescription Free to any person who will agree to pay $1, when a new growth of Hair, Whiskers or Mustache is actually produced. Sanderson & Co., 2 Clinton Place, New York.

THOMAS BOYSON, M. D.

(University of Copenhagen, Denmark).

PHYSICIAN AND SURGEON. Office

and Residence, 112 Kearny Street. Office hours, 11 A. M. to 1 P. M., 6 to 8 P. M., Sunday 11 to 1 only. Telephone in the office.

R. P. &amp; H. N. CLEMENT,

ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW.

No. 2, 3, and 4 SHEPHERD BUILDING,
Montgomery Street, N. E. corner of Clay, San Francisco
(P. O. Box 707.)

GEO. W. FRESCOTT. IRVING M. SCOTT. H. T. SCOTT.

UNION IRON WORKS

(Founded 1849.) Post Office Box 2128.

COR. FIRST AND MISSION STREETS,
SAN FRANCISCO

MANUFACTURERS OF
Compressed Engines,
Air Compressors,
Rock Drills,
Portable Hoisting Engines,
Marine Stationary and Portable Boilers,
Baby Hoist, complete.

CONSTANTLY ON HAND AND FOR SALE,

Direct-acting Pumping and Hoisting Engines,
Upright and Stationary Engines,
Quartz Crushing and Amalgamating Machinery,
Blake's Rock Breakers,
Smelting Furnaces,
Quicksilver Pumps,
Chloridizing Furnaces,
Cornish Pumps,
Steam Pumps.

All manufactured by us of the best materials, design, and workmanship, and furnished at lower rates than by Eastern manufacturers.

PRESCOTT, SCOTT &amp; CO.

CHAS. N. FOX. M. B. KELLOGG.

FOX &amp; KELLOGG,

ATTORNEYS AND COUNSELORS
AT LAW, San Francisco, Cal.

Office, No. 530 California Street, Rooms 1, 2, and 3.

FRANK KENNEDY,

ATTORNEY AT LAW, 604 MERCHANT STREET, Room 16. Probate, divorce, bankruptcy, and all other cases attended to.

REMOVAL.

S. B. WAKEFIELD &amp; CO.

STOCK &amp; EXCHANGE BROKERS,

Have removed from 314 Pine Street to 322 Pine St., cor. Leidesdorff, San Francisco.

REDINGTON'S

FLAVORING EXTRACTS

ARE THE PERFECTLY PURE
and highly concentrated Extracts of

FRESH FRUITS

Prepared with great care. They are put up in superior style, in a bottle holding twice as much as ordinary brands of Extracts.

Comparing quality and contents, none other are nearly so cheap. Wherever tested on THEIR MERITS, they have been adopted in preference to all others, and now are the

STANDARD FLAVORING EXTRACTS

Of the Pacific Coast. Dealers will find them to give better satisfaction to the consumers than any other kind and are respectfully requested to give them a trial.

REDINGTON &amp; CO.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

O. F. WILLEY &amp; CO.,

IMPORTERS AND MANUFACTURERS OF

FINE CARRIAGES AND WAGONS

No. 427 MONTGOMERY ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

Agents for the sale of Wagons manufactured by
BREWSTER & CO., New York,
W. D. ROGERS, Philadelphia,
C. S. CAFFREY, Camden, N. J.,
WOOD BROTHERS, New York,
H. KILLAM & CO., New Haven,
COOLING BROS., Wilmington

ALSO, AGENTS FOR

HARNESS MANUFACTURED BY WOOD GIBSON,
TOMPKINS & MANDEVILLE, AND
A. H. DUNSCOMB.

Also, a fine assortment of Robes, Blankets, Nets, Whips, etc.

MILLER &amp; RICHARD,

SOLE MAKERS OF

EXTRA-HARD METAL
SCOTCH TYPE.

SPECIAL AGENTS FOR

THE CAMPBELL, HOE, AND PEERLESS
PRESSES.

No. 509 COMMERCIAL STREET.

And 205 Leidesdorff Street, San Francisco.

RUPTURE.

BUY NO TRUSS

Until you see what has been accomplished by DR. PIERCE'S late invention.

Call, or send for New Illustrated Book. Prices reduced.
MAGNETIC ELASTIC TRUSS
CO., 609 Sacramento Street, San Francisco.

CALIFORNIA FARMERS'
MUTUAL

Fire Insurance Company

[ESTABLISHED IN 1874.]

Paid up Capital .....$200,000
Assets exceed..... 326,000

PRINCIPAL OFFICE 209 SANSOME ST.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

THOS. FLINT, President. J. W. FOARD, Manager.

FERD. K. RILEY .....Secretary.

I. G. GARDNER.....General Agent.

COMMERCIAL

INSURANCE COMPANY OF CALA,

FIRE AND MARINE.

Principal office, 405 California Street, San Francisco.

JOHN H. WISE, President.

CHAS. A. LATON, Secretary.

THE STATE INVESTMENT

—AND—

INSURANCE COMPANY, FIRE AND MARINE

CASH ASSETS.....$450,000

Principal Office, 218 and 220 Sansome Street, San Francisco

OFFICERS:

A. J. BRYANT, President.

RICHARD IVERS, Vice-President.

CHAS. H. CUSHING, Secretary.

H. H. WATSON, Marine Surveyor

OPHIR SILVER MINING COMPAny.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 5th day of October, 1878, an assessment (No. 34) of one dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Cosmopolitan Hotel Building, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 10th day of December, 1878, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on MONDAY, the 30th day of December, 1878, to pay delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors.
C. L. MCCOY, Secretary.

Office—Cosmopolitan Hotel Building, 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

SIERRA NEVADA SILVER MINING

Company.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Directors, held on the twenty-second day of October, 1878, an assessment (No. 56) of three dollars ($3) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 47, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the twenty-seventh day of November, 1878, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on WEDNESDAY, the eighteenth day of December, 1878, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

Office—Room 47, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

BELCHER SILVER MINING CO.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Gold Hill, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Trustees, held on the eighth day of October, 1878, an assessment (No. 16) of one ($1) dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 12, Cosmopolitan Hotel Building, 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 12th day of November, 1878, will be delinquent, and advertised at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on TUESDAY, the third day of December, 1878, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors.

JNO. CROCKETT, Secretary.

Office—Room 12, Cosmopolitan Hotel Building, 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

FRANCES A. NELSON, plaintiff, vs. DAVID P. NELSON, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to David P. Nelson, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony heretofore and now existing between the plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is hereby expressly made, and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded. Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 13th day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.
By W. STEVENSON, Deputy Clerk.
GEO. L. WOODS and JOHN J. COFFEY, Attorneys for Plaintiff.

WAKELEE'S AUREOLINE

PRODUCES THE BEAUTIFUL Golden Hair so much admired. Superior to the imported article by reason of its freshness and the care used in its production.
PRICE, LARGE BOTTLES, $2.

Manufactured by
H. P. WAKELEE & CO.,
DRUGGISTS,
Corner Montgomery and Bush Streets, San Francisco.

MUSIC BOXES

OF ALL DESCRIPTIONS AND OF Standard Reputation, playing from one to over one hundred airs. The largest and best assortment in this city. MUSICAL BOXES WITH CHANGEABLE CYLINDERS always on hand. New and interesting styles constantly received. Call and examine our stock.
REPAIRING OF MUSICAL BOXES thoroughly done in all their particularities.

M. J. PAILLARD & CO.,
MANUFACTURERS AND IMPORTERS,
120 Sutter Street, San Francisco.
Branch of House, 680 Broadway, New York.

ALASKA COMMERCIAL CO.

No. 310 SANSOME STREET,

WHOLESALE DEALER IN FURS.

RE-OPENED.

HAYWARD WAREHOUSES

Are now receiving

GRAIN ON STORAGE.

THE PATRONAGE OF FARMERS and others is respectfully solicited. Storage, one dollar per ton for the season. Advances and Insurance effected at the lowest rates.
Refer by permission to Chas. Webb Howard, President Spring Water Valley Company, Bray Bros., M. Waterman & Co., San Francisco; John Zelle, Hayward's; J. West Martin, President Union Savings Bank, Oakland.
R. H. BENNETT, Proprietor.

J. C. MERRILL & CO.

SHIPPING

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Agents for the

SANDWICH ISLANDS AND OREGON PACKET LINES.

204 AND 206 CALIFORNIA ST. - - San Francisco.

NEWTON BOOTH, C. T. WHEELER, Sacramento,
J. T. GLOVER, W. W. DODGE, San Francisco

W. W. DODGE & CO.,

WHOLESALE GROCERS,

Northwest corner Clay and Front Streets, San Francisco.

THE VERTICAL FEED.

THE ONLY POSITIVE SUCCESS IN all departments of sewing. Lightest running shuttle machine in the market. The New Davis Vertical Feed Sewing Machine, 130 Post Street.

MARK SHELTON.
P. S.—Howe, Florence, Wheeler & Wilson, Grover & Baker, Domestic, Weed, Willcox & Gibbs, for sale at $10 each.

RARE ENGRAVINGS AND ETCHINGS,

CHRISTMAS, 1878.

JUST RECEIVED, A LARGE COLLECTION of fine Engravings specially purchased in Italy for the Christmas trade. Nothing can be more appropriate for a holiday or wedding present than a fine Engraving, which is suitable for home decoration and at the same time rare. W. K. VICKERY would respectfully invite an inspection of his Engravings and their prices.
Please note address—22 Montgomery Street, opposite the Lack House.

COMMENCING SUNDAY, JULY 14, 1878.
Passenger trains will leave San Francisco, from Passenger Depot on Townsend Street, between Third and Fourth, as follows:

8.30 A. M. DAILY for San Jose, Gilroy, Hollister, Tres Pinos, Pajaro, Salinas, Soledad, and all Way Stations. At Pajaro, the Santa Cruz R. R. connects with this train for Aptos and Santa Cruz. At Salinas the M. & S. V. R. R. connects with this train for Monterey. Stage connections made with this train.

10.40 A. M. DAILY for San Jose and Way Stations.
P. M. DAILY (Sundays excepted) for Gilroy, Pajaro, Hollister, Tres Pinos, and Way Stations. Stage connection made with this train at SANTA CLARA for Pacific Congress Springs.

4.40 P. M. DAILY for San Jose and Way Stations.
6.30 P. M. DAILY for Menlo Park and Way Stations.

SUNDAYS AN EXTRA TRAIN will leave for San Jose and Way Stations at 9.30 A. M. Returning, will leave San Jose at 6.00 P. M.

EXCURSION TICKETS to San Jose and other points, and return sold on Saturdays and Sunday mornings. Good for return until following Monday, inclusive.

Also, Excursion Tickets to Monterey—good from Saturday until following Monday, inclusive.

A. C. BASSETT, Superintendent. H. R. JUDAH, Asst. Pass. & Tkt. Agt.

SOUTHERN DIVISIONS.
Passengers for points on the Southern Divisions of the road will take the cars of the Central Pacific Railroad via OAKLAND, leaving SAN FRANCISCO via Ferry Landing, Market Street, at 4.00 P. M. daily, and making close connection at GOSHEN for Sumner, Mohave, LOS ANGELES, Wilmington, Anaheim, Colton, Colorado River, and Yuma.

SAN FRANCISCO AND NORTH PACIFIC R. R.

Commencing Monday, October 7th, 1878, and until further notice, Boats and Trains will leave San Francisco: (Ticket Office, Washington Street Wharf.)

3.30 P. M., DAILY, Sundays excepted, Steamer "James M. Donahue" (Washington Street Wharf), connecting with Mail and Express Train at Donahue for Petaluma, Santa Rosa, Healdsburg, Cloverdale, and way stations. Making stage connection at Lakeville for Sonoma; at Geyserville for Skaggs' Springs, at Cloverdale for Ukiah, Lakeport, Mendocino City, and the GEYSERS.

Connections made at Fulton on the following morning with Fulton and Guerneville R. R. for Korbel's, Guerneville, and the Redwoods. (Arrive at San Francisco 10.35 A. M.)

8.00 A. M., Sundays only, Excursions, Steamer "James M. Donahue," connecting at Donahue with trains for Cloverdale and way stations. RETURNING—Trains will leave Donahue at 4.40 P. M., and arrive at San Francisco at 6.55 P. M.

Freight received from 7 A. M. to 2.30 P. M. daily (except Sunday).

TICKET OFFICE, WASHINGTON STREET WHARF.

ARTHUR HUGHES, Gen. Manager. A. A. BRAN, Sup't. P. E. DOUGHERTY, Gen. Pass. and Tkt. Agent.

OCCIDENTAL AND ORIENTAL STEAMSHIP COMPANY

—FOR—
JAPAN AND CHINA,
Leave Wharf, Cor. First and Brannan Streets, at noon, for YOKOHAMA AND HONGKONG.

Connecting at Yokohama with steamers for Shanghai,

GAELIC, OCEANIC, BELGIC.

November.....16 December.....17 January.....16

February.....18 March.....15 April.....16

May.....16

Cabin plans on exhibition and Passenger Tickets for sale at No. 2 Montgomery Street.

For freight apply at the Pacific Mail Steamship Company's Wharf.

T. H. GOODMAN, Gen'l Passenger Agent.

LELAND STANFORD, President.

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP CO.

First-class steamers with unequalled accommodations for passengers will leave San Francisco:

FOR YOKOHAMA AND HONGKONG, On the 1st of every month.

FOR SYDNEY AND AUCKLAND, via HONOLULU, November 23, and every fourth week thereafter.

FOR NEW YORK, via PANAMA, CENTRAL AMERICAN, MEXICAN, and SOUTH AMERICAN PORTS, HAVANA, and all WEST INDIA PORTS, on the 5th and 20th of each month.

FOR VICTORIA, B. C., PUGET SOUND PORTS, and PORTLAND, Oregon, on the 10th, 20th, and 30th of each month.

WILLIAMS, BLANCHARD & CO., Agents, Corner First and Brannan Streets.

PACIFIC COAST STEAMSHIP CO.

Steamers of this Company will sail from Broadway wharf for PORTLAND (Oregon), every five days, direct, and for LOS ANGELES, SANTA BARBARA, SANTA CRUZ, SAN DIEGO, SAN LUIS OBISPO, and other Northern and Southern Coast Ports, leaving San Francisco about every third day.

For day and hour of sailing, see the Company's advertisement in the San Francisco daily papers.

TICKET OFFICE, No. 214 MONTGOMERY ST., NEAR PINE.

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO., Agents, No. 10 Market Street, San Francisco.

C. P. R. R.

COMMENCING MONDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1878, and until further notice,

TRAINS AND BOATS

WILL LEAVE SAN FRANCISCO:

OVERLAND TICKET OFFICE AT FERRY LANDING, MARKET STREET.

7.00 A. M., DAILY, VALLEJO Steamer (from Market Street Landing), connecting with the trains for Napa (Stages for Sonoma), Calistoga (The Geysers), and Sacramento. Connecting at Davis (Sundays excepted) for Woodland and Knight's Landing, and at Woodland for Williams and Willows. (Arrive San Francisco 8.10 P. M.)

7.00 A. M., DAILY, LOCAL PASSENGER Train (via Oakland Ferry), arriving at San Jose at 9.45 A. M. Connecting at Niles with train via Livermore, arriving at Tracy at 11.30 A. M., and connecting with Atlantic Express. (Arrive San Francisco 6.05 P. M.)

8.00 A. M., DAILY, ATLANTIC Express Train (via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R.), for Sacramento, Marysville, Redding (Portland, Or.) Colfax, Reno (Virginia City), Falls (Eureka), Ogden, and Omaha. Connects at Galt with train arriving at Iowa at 3.40 P. M. (Arrive San Francisco 5.15 P. M.)

SUNDAY EXCURSION TICKETS TO SAN PABLO AND MARTINEZ AT REDUCED RATES.

10.00 A. M., DAILY, (VIA OAKLAND FERRY), Local Passenger Train to Haywards and Niles. (Arrive San Francisco 6.05 P. M.)

3.00 P. M., DAILY, SAN JOSE Passenger Train (via Oakland Ferry and Niles), stopping at all way stations. Arrive at San Jose at 5.20 P. M. (Arrive San Francisco at 9.35 A. M.)

3.00 P. M., DAILY, NORTHERN Railway Passenger Train (via Oakland Ferry) to San Pablo, Martinez, and Antioch. (Arrive San Francisco 9.35 A. M.)

4.00 P. M., DAILY, SOUTHERN Express Train (via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R.), for Lathrop (and Stockton), Merced, Madera, Visalia, Summer, Mojave, Newhall (San Buenaventura), and Santa Barbara, LOS ANGELES, "Santa Monica," Wilmington, Santa Ana (San Diego), Colton, and Yuma (Arizona Stages and Colorado River Steamers). Sleeping cars between Oakland, Los Angeles, and Yuma. (Arrive San Francisco at 12.35 P. M.)

4.00 P. M., SUNDAYS EXCEPTED, Vallejo Steamer (from Market Street Landing), connecting with trains for Calistoga (The Geysers), Woodland, Knight's Landing, and Sacramento, and at Sacramento with passenger train, leaving at 9.35 P. M., for Truckee, Reno, Carson, and Virginia. Sleeping cars between Vallejo and Carson. (Arrive San Francisco 11.10 A. M.)

4.00 P. M., SUNDAYS EXCEPTED, Sacramento Steamer (from Washington Street Wharf) for Benicia and Landings on the Sacramento River. (Arrive San Francisco 8.00 P. M.)

4.30 P. M., DAILY, THROUGH Third Class and Accommodation Train, via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R., connecting at Lathrop with train arriving at Los Angeles on second day at 11.55 A. M. (Arrive San Francisco 7.30 A. M.)

4.30 P. M., DAILY, LOCAL PASSENGER (via Oakland Ferry) to Haywards, Niles, and Livermore. (Arrive San Francisco 8.35 P. M.)

5.00 P. M., DAILY, OVERLAND Emigrant Train (via Oakland Ferry and Northern Railway), to Ogden, Omaha, and East. Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

FERRIES AND LOCAL TRAINS.

FROM SAN FRANCISCO, DAILY.

To Oakland.		To Alameda.	To Folsom.	To East Oakland.	To Niles.	To Berkeley.	To Delaware Street.	To Downtown San Jose.
A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.	A. M.
B 6.10	12.30	A. M. 7.00	P. M. 8.00	A. M. 6.10	A. M. 7.00	A. M. 7.30	A. M. 8.00	A. M. 6.10
7.00	1.00	B 7.00	B 9.00	7.30	10.00	7.30	8.00	7.00
7.30	1.30	8.00	10.00	8.30	11.00	8.30	9.00	8.00
8.00	2.00	9.00	P. M. 9.00	9.30	P. M. 9.00	9.30	P. M. 9.00	9.00
8.30	3.00	10.00	B 5.00	10.30	4.30	10.30	11.00	10.00
9.00	3.00	11.00	12.00	11.30		P. M. 4.30	3.00	11.00
9.30	4.00	P. M. 11.00		P. M. 11.00		5.00	4.00	12.00
10.00	4.30	12.00		12.00		5.00	5.00	1.00
10.30	5.00	1.00		1.00		5.00	5.00	2.00
11.00	5.30	2.00		2.00		5.00	5.00	3.00
11.30	6.00	3.00		3.00		5.00	5.00	4.00
12.00	6.30	4.00		4.30		5.00	5.00	5.00
12.30	7.00	5.00		5.30		5.00	5.00	6.00
.....	7.30	6.00		6.30		5.00	5.00	7.00
.....	8.10	B 7.00		7.00		5.00	5.00	8.00
.....	9.00	B 8.10		8.10	A. M. 7.00	5.00	5.00	9.00
.....	10.30	* 10.30		9.20	P. M. 7.00	5.00	5.00	10.00
.....	B 11.45	B 11.45		10.30	3.00	5.00	5.00	11.00
.....				B 11.45		5.00	5.00	12.00

CHICKERING

PIANO WAREROOMS,

31 POST ST., Mechanics' Institute Building.

ELEGANT PLANOS.

L. K. HAMMER,

Sole Agent for Pacific Coast.

EST Owners of Chickering Pianos are specially requested to leave orders for tuning at warerooms, 31 Post Street.

MUSIC

KNABE PIANOS,

IRVING PIANOS, ROGERS' UPRIGHT PIANOS,

Prince Organs, Waters' Organs, Sheet Music.

BANCROFT, KNIGHT &amp; Co.,

733 MARKET STREET.

PIANOS

SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED PIANOS.

Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.

WOODWORTH, SCHELL &amp; Co.

12 Post Street San Francisco.

JOE POHEIM

The Tailor,

203 Montgomery St. and 103 Third St., has just received a large assortment of the latest style goods. Suits to order from $30.00. Pants to order from $5.00. Overcoats to order from $15.00.

EST The leading question is where the best goods can be found at the lowest prices. The answer is at

JOE POHEIM,

203 Montgomery St. and 103 Third St.

Samples and Rules for Self-Measurement sent free to any address. Fit guaranteed.

THOMAS H. HOLT,

NOTARY PUBLIC, No. 326 1/2 Montgomery Street. Residence, 1803 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF the Standard Gold Mining Company, San Francisco, Cal., Nov. 7, 1878.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company, held this day, Dividend No. 15 of one dollar per share was declared, payable on Tuesday, November 12, 1878. Transfer books closed on Saturday, November 9, 1878, at 12 o'clock P. M.

WM. WILLIS, Secretary. Office, Room 29 Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, third floor, San Francisco, Cal.

GENUINE SALE.

NICOLL, THE TAILOR

HAVING TO MAKE ROOM FOR

the daily arrival of new styles of French, English, and Domestic Goods from his New York and London houses, will display a very large quantity of uncalled-for garments at greatly reduced prices, as follows:

Pants.....	from $5 00
Suits.....	" 12 00
Overcoats.....	" 15 00
Vests.....	" 2 00
Coats.....	" 7 00

Gentlemen, before ordering anywhere, will do well to call and inspect our daily arrival of French, English, Scotch, and Domestic Goods.

No. 305 MONTGOMERY STREET.

ROSS'

MILLINERY EMPORIUM,

UNDER THE BALDWIN.

PACIFIC BUSINESS COLLEGE, 320 POST STREET, San Francisco.

THE SPIRIT OF '78.

An Opportunity such as was never before offered to the San Francisco Public.

T. H. BOYD,

An Artist of rare ability, long known to the public as being connected with some of our most prominent Photographic Galleries, and latterly of the firm of Messrs. I. W. TABER &amp; T. H. BOYD, noticing the wants of the people for first-class pictures at a reasonable price, has retained the elegant and commodious apartments,

NO. 26 MONTGOMERY STREET,

where he has every facility for doing work of a superior kind, and proposes to make his prices so moderate that none need have an excuse for having an inferior picture taken, either of themselves or their children. Never before were such full-length Cabinets—interior or rustic—taken for the low figure of five dollars per dozen; the popular Gray Tint Vignette Cabinets at six dollars per dozen; and the truly elegant Cameo Glacé—the favorite of all—usually costing ten and twelve dollars per dozen, at Boyd's will only cost you eight dollars. His card-size Photos, for the Cameo Glacé finish, will be four dollars per dozen, and the Gray Vignettes only three dollars.

His apartments are all that could be asked for—large, commodious, and first-class in every particular; every convenience, in fact, that tends to enhance the comforts of his patrons. His skylight is the largest in the city, thus giving him a volume of light to be controlled at his will, and so secure an effect in light and shade that can not be obtained with a smaller light. Every improvement of modern times that makes exposures shorter has been secured, so that pictures of children will now be taken so quickly that it is the exception if a superior picture is not obtained.

He also desires to specially call the attention of his old friends and patrons who have visited him at the Yosemite Gallery, that he has all the negatives of the Photographs taken in the Gallery, and can supply copies desired at very short notice and at the reduced prices.

Pay him a visit and judge for yourselves.

YOSEMITE ART GALLERY

No. 26 Montgomery St., near Sutter.

THE CAL. FURNITURE M'FG CO.

HAVE FIVE TIMES AS MUCH

FURNITURE

As any other house on this Coast, which has been purchased so low that we CAN and WILL sell at such prices that the poor can gratify their WISHES and the rich their TASTE. At the old stand,

NOS. 224 AND 226 BUSH STREET, S. F.

HERRMANN'S

FALL STYLES

ARE NOW OUT AT

336 KEARNY STREET, BETWEEN BUSH AND PINE, &amp; 910 MARKET STREET, ABOVE STOCKTON.

SEND FOR ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE.

PALACE HOTEL RESTAURANT,

FIRST CLASS IN ALL RESPECTS.

QUIET AND DESIRABLE PLACE for Ladies, Gentlemen, and Families. EST Entrance south side of Court. A. D. SHARON.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—THE STATE INVESTMENT AND INSURANCE COMPANY.—Dividend No. 66.—The monthly dividend for October will be paid on November 10th, at their office, Nos. 218 and 220 Sansome Street.

CHS. H. CUSHING, Secretary. San Francisco, November 3, 1878.

L. T. ZANDER,

No. 424 MONTGOMERY STREET, between California and Sacramento, San Francisco.

COLLECTOR.

Rents, Bills, and Accounts collected, and prompt returns made.

ZANDER'S PURCHASING AGENCY.

Orders for the purchase and shipment to the interior of goods of every description executed with promptness and care, at a small commission over cost.

MORRIS, SCHWAB &amp; CO.

FINE-ART DEALERS.

FREE ART GALLERY.

A complete assortment of ARTISTS' MATERIAL, GOLD FRAMES, etc.

19 AND 21 POST STREET.

WAREROOMS, N. W. CORNER KEARNY AND SUTTER STREETS.

SHERMAN, HYDE &amp; CO.

SHEET MUSIC, MUSIC BOOKS, MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

SEWING MACHINES.

GROVER &amp; BAKER SEWING AND Embroidering SILKS, Pure Dye, Full Weight. To the trade and at retail. J. W. EVANS, 29 Post Street.

MARBLEIZED IRON MANTELS.

IN ELEGANCE OF DESIGN, QUALITY of finish, and durability of polish, they are every way superior to slate or marble. In point of economy, also, they cost very much less, are stronger, and certainly far more durable than either.

ALL SIZES AND STYLES

ENAMELED GRATES.

FRENCH COOKING

RANGES

All sizes, suitable for Hotels, Restaurants, Families, and Boarding-Houses.

W. W. MONTAGUE &amp; CO.

NOS. 110, 112, 114, 118, &amp; 120 BATTERY ST.

PALMER BROS.

726 TO 734 MARKET ST.,

Have a full assortment of

LADIES' AND GENTS' FURNISHING Goods, Toilet Articles, Corsets, Embroideries, French and Valenciennes Laces, a fine assortment of Veilings and Rubings, and the largest stock of

MILLINERY GOODS,

And the best stock of BOYS' CLOTHING AND HATS &amp; CAPS In the city.

INDEPENDENT LINE

—FOR—

ASTORIA AND PORTLAND, OREGON.

The Splendid Low-pressure, Side Wheel American Steamship

GREAT REPUBLIC,

JAMES CARROLL.....Commander

Will sail from Spear Street wharf, for the above ports,

On SATURDAY, Nov. 16, at 10 A. M.

Steerage Passage.....$2 00

Cabin Passage.....7 00

In Bridal Rooms.....10 00

Freight.....at Lowest Rates

For freight or passage apply at the office on Spear Street wharf. Tickets also for sale at No. 3 New Montgomery Street, under Grand Hotel. P. B. CORNWALL.

BUY YOUR SHIRTS AT BEAMISH'S

The Argonaut.

VOL. III. NO. 19.

SAN FRANCISCO, NOVEMBER 16, 1878.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

THE DIARY OF A WOMAN.

Translated for the Argonaut from the French of Octave Feuillet.

[CONTINUED FROM LAST NUMBER.]

"I thank you for this information," I said, "and if Madame Godfrey is really a dangerous companion you may be sure Cécile will break off all association with her; and now I will explain to you in a word what seems so inexplicable in the conduct of Monsieur d'Eblis. Monsieur d'Eblis has confidence in his wife; and allow me to assure you, never was confidence better placed. I know Cécile from her infancy; and, notwithstanding her giddy ways, with or without Madame Godfrey, I will guarantee that she is incapable of even an impure thought."

"Oh, mon Dieu! yes, up to this time, certainly," replied the Prince. "All women are virtuous at first, but when they lead that kind of life bad thoughts come quickly, and bad actions more quickly still. It is strange, but it is true."

"Prince, those are but the souvenirs of your former life—souvenirs of the time when you questioned whether there were any honest women in the world."

"Ma foi! I think now just as I did then, that there are very few. Pardon me, and allow me to explain that I am speaking of those fast, independent women of the world, who never are at rest. Have some faith in my experience, Madame, which is considerable for its age. You have a daughter. Born of you, and educated by you, she could only grow up a virtuous woman. Notwithstanding that, I caution you against the weakness of ever allowing her to enter into those rounds of society, with all their temptations. And I am now going to say something about them which is horrible. We men have a maxim which has become an axiom; it is that, however virtuous a woman may have been, she ceases to be so after passing through the excitements of a carnival, or even (you will shudder) after a cotillion of three or four hours. Then a physiological phenomena takes place which I may merely suggest to you: It is no longer a woman we are holding in our arms, no longer a human, thinking, conscient being; she has become—how shall I express it?—a sensitive plant, ready to shrivel and wilt at the first touch. All that is then necessary to cause the bad action to succeed the bad thought is a simple opportunity. She is always a virtuous woman, only—she falls! It is useless to add—understand me well, Madame—that there are some who escape. And to return to your cousin: although she throws herself recklessly into the current, I am willing on your guarantee to believe that she will be found among them; but it will be an event to be spoken of in history."

I did not attach to these impertinent theories more importance than they deserved, but the words of the Prince, without leaving on my mind the slightest shadow as far as Cécile was concerned, did not the less confirm the opinion I had formed from my own observations as to the strange and perplexed condition of her home.

A circumstance which followed very closely upon my conversation with Monsieur de Viviane helped to enlighten me. Cécile and her husband dined with me one day. She was looking beautifully, and, dressed in a dazzling toilet, was going to a ball that evening with Madame Godfrey, who came for her at half-past nine. My grandmother, being somewhat indisposed, kept her room, so that my daughter and I were left alone with Monsieur d'Eblis. She ought to have been in bed, but like most children she had to be told several times before getting through with that important ceremony, and at the request of her guardian I had granted her a little delay. When Cécile had left, feeling a little embarrassed at this kind of tête-à-tête with Monsieur d'Eblis, I seated myself at the piano. Monsieur d'Eblis was on the sofa at the other end of the room. While playing I don't remember what melody of Chopin's, I heard him chatting in a low tone with my little daughter, whom he always made much of, and of whom he was very fond. After a few moments they became quiet. As I had a mirror before me, I looked into it and saw Monsieur d'Eblis with his elbows on the table and his head in his hands. A moment after my child crept very quietly to my side and pulled me gently by the hand. I leaned toward her without stopping, and heard her whisper:

"Mother, he is crying."

When my little child told me this, a sudden faintness, accompanied by something like intoxication, seemed to spread itself through my veins—through my very being. Such moments as these in a woman's life are formidable indeed. The door opened, they came for the child, I kissed her, she went and kissed Monsieur d'Eblis, and then left us.

I continued playing without daring to raise my eyes again to the mirror, and tried to collect my thoughts and take in what was passing. The sudden emotion of Monsieur d'Eblis, as seen by my daughter and myself after his wife had gone, left me in no doubt as to his being profoundly unhappy. Further than that I could discover nothing. But if I could not read his heart, I read too clearly my own, and what I discovered in so doing frightened me indeed. I could no longer deceive myself as to the nature of the interest which was urging me on to study with so much curiosity the secrets of Cécile's home. I loved her husband, and I loved him enough to wish for the breaking up of his home, and even to rejoice in the thought of it.

There have been thousands of occasions in this life in which I have found that it did not depend upon ourselves whether we have or do not have wicked thoughts, but that it depends entirely upon ourselves whether we transform them into acts. I have also realized that the best, and perhaps the only, way of combating and conquering our bad passions is not to oppose them with abstract arguments about right, or conscience, or honor, but to act effectively against them, and in some way force the hand to do good while the heart wishes evil. My resolution taken, I wanted to carry it out without delay.

It necessitated, in the first place, a frank and complete explanation with Monsieur d'Eblis. This was a trial, the dangers of which I could not conceal from myself, although I was far from foreseeing how serious they really were to be. It seemed necessary to brave everything, and, in my enthusiasm, I felt certain of success. I all at once left the piano and advanced toward Monsieur d'Eblis, who pretended to be reading very attentively.

"I wish to speak with you," said I. "Let us go into the garden, if you please."

He looked at me with great astonishment, rose without replying, and followed me. Our hôtel of the Rue Saint Dominique has preserved by rare good fortune its parish garden, to which high walls, groups of gigantic plane trees, a spouting fountain, and an arched conservatory give the sweet and solemn look of a close in a Spanish monastery. There are two or three steps by which one enters it from the salon of the ground floor. Although we were in the middle of November, the evening was exceptionally beautiful and warm. We took a few steps in silence, and I hear now, and shall hear all my life, the peculiarity of that silence, disturbed only by the crackling of the dry leaves under our feet, and the murmur of the little jet d'eau.

At last, with all the courage which I could gather, I said: "Monsieur, you know to what a point I carry my love of order and horror of disorder. It is a passion, a mania, about which you often joke me, but which you at the same time excuse, do you not? Well, will you allow me to try to re-establish order in a home in which I am deeply interested?"

"In what home, Madame," said he, rather sternly, taking a place near me on the bench where I was sitting.

"In yours, to be sure. Don't doubt that I feel all the bearing of my indiscretion; but if my friendship for Cécile and for yourself is not sufficient to excuse it in your eyes, remember that you were willing to ask my advice before marrying Cécile, and that I recommended you to do so. You must now let me redeem the responsibility which I took at that time."

"But I do not reproach you for anything, Madame."

"And you are right. It would be very unjust to do so, for if you had followed the advice which I took the liberty of giving you—at your own request, however—you would both be happy now, whereas neither of you are so."

"Excuse me, Madame, but it seems to me that Cécile, at any rate, to whom I give entire liberty, ought to be perfectly happy."

"Cécile does not complain," said I, with some vivacity. "But to suppose that she can be perfectly happy when you live your way and she hers, when you neglect her, when you prove to her more and more that you care neither for her affection nor her reputation, is to suppose that she has neither heart, intelligence, nor honor, and I know she has all these."

"Mon Dieu, Madame," replied he, his voice trembling with emotion, "neither have I the habit of complaining; but really you force me to at present. Tell me, have you ever reflected upon the fate of a thoughtful man, fond of work and ambitious of the honor which it brings, who has dreamed of the joys which study must give in the calm and contemplative atmosphere of a home, and whom a wife drags with her day and night through all the noisy inanity and perpetual folly of a worldly life? It is all well enough for him to think that duty, and prudence even, command him to follow her, until at last he finds that his whole existence is being exhausted in it; that this foolish child takes him, degrades him, destroys his intellect, his future, his dignity, his life; and then, what can you expect, naturally his heart fails him, and he stops short, discouraged by everything and resigned to everything."

Surprised and almost alarmed at this violent outburst of a soul usually master of itself, I said more frankly:

"Come, let us see now. In all sincerity, have you faithfully made every possible effort to reform Cécile's tastes?"

After a long pause: "I have made none," said he, coldly.

"Then you are very guilty. I told you formerly, and I repeat it to-day with the same conviction and with the same certainty: Cécile was a spoiled child, but her faults were only upon the surface; she loved and respected you, and you had great influence over her, and there are no sacrifices that you might not have obtained from her."

"And by what right could I have demanded them?" asked he. "My conscience forbade it. What had I to give her in place of the pleasures that she sacrificed to me? One demands such sacrifices only from the woman whom one loves."

"Only from the woman whom one loves! Grand Dieu! Do you speak of Cécile? What? When you married Cécile you did not love her!"

"Never!" said he, with emphasis, and added, speaking very low and quickly: "Ah, I did not deceive her. God is my witness. I have deceived only myself and... you!"

At that word the whole truth came to me. In dismay I arose, and a cry escaped me: "Ah, wretched man, what have you done!"

"I have done," answered he "that which you can understand better than any other person—I have sacrificed myself. Ah, Madame, I did not seek this interview. I would rather have avoided it, for it will undoubtedly separate us forever. Be it so. But since we have got so far... my heart must at last unburden itself... you must know all... Ah! let me finish... I speak, you see, with profound respect. Well, will you please recall what you must remember. When Roger revealed to me his fatal passion for you, when I saw that I must choose between you and him, that I could no longer love you without condemning him to despair—to suicide perhaps—I sacrificed myself, and then by a courageous effort which I thought might be successful, which I thought was sincere, I tried to place my love upon this child whom you loved, who was enveloped in light reflected from you, in your charms, in your tenderness. Yes, I thought I loved her, but it was you I loved in her. And if I knew that these words were to be the last I should ever utter in your presence, now, as then, it is you only, you only in all the world, whom I do love!"

I listened to this in a kind of stupor, my eyes looking into the darkness. All at once, at the bitter thought of my lost happiness, my tears flowed in spite of myself. He leaned forward and witnessed my emotion.

"You are weeping," said he. "Is it true? Is it possible? You also—you loved me? You have suffered as I have? Ah, Dieu! don't say it; don't let me think it, if you would not have me lose all the reason and all the honor which remain to me."

I placed my hand gently on his arm, and said: "It is not I, Monsieur, I hope, who will ever cause you to lose your reason or your honor; but I have loved you—I do love you still. If you are worthy of hearing such an avowal from an honest woman, I am about to know it. I cannot stifle the sentiments of my heart, but I can at least, and I expect that you will also, raise them high enough to purify them. We will not separate like two weak creatures who fear to become the playthings of their passions; but bravely preserve our mutual affection, give it a new character, and make it an almost sacred bond uniting us as accomplices for good. You know what task I contemplated before learning all the truth. I hold to it more than ever now. Help me loyally to accomplish it; help me to regain for you the heart of your wife. I promise you to help her regain yours. Will you? If you say yes, I shall esteem you so highly that I offer you my hand in token of it, and with entire confidence—otherwise, farewell!"

He reflected some seconds; then, without a word, he held out his hand. I arose immediately, and we entered the salon together.

"You will send Cécile to me to-morrow," said I. "I must begin to preach gently to her. I will not tell you to be kind to her, for you are too kind to her already. Scold her, on the contrary; she will be delighted, I am sure, to be scolded by you. It is indifference which ruffles us."

He bowed, took a few steps, and turning said:

"Mon Dieu! I forgot. Do you know that I leave town to-morrow with my general, for a month or six weeks, on an inspection in the provinces? Isn't it annoying?"

"Perhaps not," said I; "for during her widowhood Cécile will be necessarily more at home, which will be a step in the right direction; and on your side you will have time for reflection. On your return you will know better whether you are really able to keep the engagement which you have just made, rather quickly and rather lightly, perhaps."

"No," answered he, in his sweet, strong voice, "not lightly. I understood you instantly. My life was gone; your friendship restores and saves it. What you propose is exalting, it is heroic—but you will carry me even to its heights on your wings. Adieu till our next meeting, and count upon me."

And then he left me. I passed a sleepless, but a happy night. I was satisfied with myself, for I had overcome a great temptation. If this should ever be read by a woman after having met in life a man whom she longed to press for one moment to her heart, even if she died for it, she will understand me.

Cécile came the next afternoon to say that her husband had left the same morning for Brittany.

"My dear," said she, "that cold man astonished me. He begged me to write him every day. Can you conceive of such an idea? I suppose, however, that he does not really think or care much about it, and it is well that it is so, for certainly I shall not write him every day."

"Why not?"

"Have I the time? It would be ridiculous. I will send him dispatches: 'Is all well with you? Me also. A thousand kisses.—CÉCILE.' That's quite enough."

"But tell me, Cécile, will you not remain at home a little more during the absence of your husband?"

"Remain at home? What do you expect me to do at home? And then what difference does it make? Whether my husband is present or whether he is absent amounts to about the same thing as far as I am concerned."

"I beg of you, Cécile, let us talk seriously for one moment."

"Yes, my angel."

"Are you not somewhat tired of the life you lead?"

"No, my treasure."

"Well, then, I shall begin to love you less."

She threw herself upon my neck: "That is not true."
I tried for sometime to lead her into a more serious and confidential way of talking, which she did not absolutely resist, but flew from one thing to another, evading me always with her nonsense. I saw that my undertaking was to be more difficult of accomplishment than I had at first supposed, and that the dear child had acquired a decided taste for her giddy mode of life. I still felt persuaded, however, that I could by persevering find some way to get hold of that brave heart of which I knew the essential virtues.

She was already defending herself with greater difficulty when the Prince de Viviane was announced, and was evidently glad to have a pretext for escaping from me. She arose, threw out some sarcastic remarks to the Prince, for she still owed him a grudge for what she called his stupidity—that is to say, his indifference to her—and left. As I accompanied her as far as the ante-chamber, she said, laughing:

"Ah, my pretty preacher, I am going to take my revenge. You reproach me, or would reproach me for my style of life, which is rather gay, I confess; but if you consulted my husband, I imagine that he would prefer to leave me to my round of amusements than to see me seated by the side of my fire four or five times a week in company with such a gentleman as you have there. What do you think?"

"What! Does Monsieur d'Elbis blame me for receiving the Prince?"

"Not precisely, but I really think that he is still jealous on his friend Roger's account, for he can not bear your Prince; and the truth is, my dear, that he comes pretty often, and I assure you people talk about it."

"Well, my dear," said I, "I will prove to you that I know how to profit by such good advice, and I hope that you will imitate my example."

"Yes, my love, I adore you," and away she went.

I rejoined the Prince while meditating on the malicious insinuation of Cécile. She had, however, only hastened a resolution already taken. The assiduities of the Prince had in fact become very marked for some time past, and began to annoy me. Nevertheless, while his wit amused me, his language never denoted anything but perfect respect for me, the amendment in his way of living continuing after his return to Paris; and as this amendment was somewhat my own work, I thought a great deal of it. It did not, therefore, enter my mind to dismiss him in a way that would wound him. I desired simply to remove from our relations with each other that appearance of too great intimacy which he tried more and more to give them. In the course of our conversation, he himself afforded me the opportunity which I was looking for, by asking if I would be at home that evening. "Yes," said I, laughing, "I shall be at home, but not to you."

"Why not to me?"

"Because your time is too valuable, my Prince, for me to abuse it to that extent."

"You have had enough of me?"

"I have not had enough of you, but I do not want too much," replied I in the same tone. "Come, you do not wish to compromise me, do you?"

"I beg your pardon," said he, gayly.

"Ah, so much the more reason, then. I have friendship for you, but I will be obliged to you if you will make yourself somewhat scarcer."

I was surprised at the serious expression which spread suddenly over his features.

"I must explain myself then," said he. "I wished to wait a little longer, but I see that the time has come. It is true that I have multiplied my visits without scruple, because my sentiments for you justified the indiscretion in my eyes. I have loved you, Madame, for some time past. Pardon me! I know perfectly well who I am speaking to. I know that such an avowal made to a woman like you has but one possible interpretation. To offer you my heart is to offer you my hand. You have made yourself mistress of my life. You have through your goodness made a new and a better man of me. Will you not be kind enough, charitable enough, to finish your good work? May I not hope that you will deign to become my wife?"

This unexpected proposal caused me surprise and annoyance rather than uneasiness. Wishing to spare the Prince the mortification of too sudden and absolute a refusal, I said to him, hesitating a little, that I was sincerely grateful for so marked an evidence of his esteem, but that he took me unawares—that I was unable to complain of so unexpected a proposal, as I had in some sort induced it in spite of myself, but that my mourning was still too recent to admit of my even discussing the matter, and I therefore begged him not to speak of it any more.

While he said he was willing to accept the longest delay that I could impose, he insisted with some warmth that he ought to obtain a less indefinite answer and one word of hope. As I could not honorably afford him that satisfaction, I found myself under the necessity of giving him a more decided refusal. I told him very positively, though in a polite manner, that I had firmly resolved to consecrate my life to my daughter and never to marry again.

He was grieved, doubtless, but above all it appeared to me that I could distinguish spite, vexation, and wounded pride in the face and voice of the Prince after I made him this formal declaration. I found, under the refined manners of the man of the world, a spoiled child, whose caprices were laws, and who could not resist breaking the playthings which were refused him. His pale, almost pallid face became painfully contracted, his lids moved convulsively, while wicked looks shot from his eyes at me. He said in broken accents that I would make a desperate and wicked man of him, that I would plunge him again into that mire from which he had come but to please me, that I could not at my time of life have serious intentions of remaining a widow, that I was doubtless looking for a better match; I would regret it some day, perhaps, and repent refusing him my hand; misfortune sometimes made people wicked; and many things of the same kind, which were in the worst taste possible. I realized with sadness the fact, that wherever vice has passed there remains a residue of mire at the bottom, and I was soon to realize it more fully.

(CONTINUED IN NEXT NUMBER.)

The wages of Ah Sin are seventy-five cents for a dozen pieces.

PAPA'S LETTER.

I was sitting in my study
Writing letters, when I heard
"Please, dear mamma, Mary told me
Mamma mustn't be 'sturbed."

"But I've tired of the kuty,
Want some ozer fing to do!
Writing letters, is 'ou, mamma?
Tain't I wite a letter, too?"

"Not now, darling; mamma's busy;
Run and play with kitty now."
"No, no, mamma, me wite letter—
Tain't 'ou will show me how."

I would paint my darling's portrait
As his sweet eyes searched my face—
Hair of gold and eyes of azure,
Form of childish witching grace.

But the eager face was clouded,
As I slowly shook my head,
Till I said: "I'll make a letter
Of you, darling boy, instead."

So I parted back the tresses
From his forehead high and white,
And a stamp in sport I pasted
Mid its waves of golden light.

Then I said: "Now, little letter,
Go away, and bear good news,"
And I smiled, as down the staircase
Clattered loud the little shoes.

Leaving me the darling hurried
Down to Mary in his glee:
"Mamma's witing lots of letters;
I've a letter, Mary—see!"

No one heard the little prattler,
As once more he climbed the stair,
Reached his little cap and tippet,
Standing on the entry stair.

No one heard the front door open,
No one saw the golden hair
As it floated o'er his shoulders,
In the crisp October air.

Down the street the baby hastened,
Till he reached the office door:
"I've a letter, Mr. Postman!
Is there room for any more?"

"Cause this letter's doin' to papa:
Papa lives with God, 'ou know.
Mamma sent me for a letter,
Does 'ou fink 'at I tan go?"

But the clerk in wonder answered:
"Not to-day, my little man."
"Den I'll find anozzer office,
'Cause I must do if I tan."

Fain the clerk would have detained him,
But the pleading face was gone,
And the little feet were hastening—
By the busy crowd swept on.

Suddenly the crowd was parted,
People fled to left and right,
As a pair of maddened horses
At the moment dashed in sight.

No one saw the baby figure—
No one saw the golden hair,
Till a voice of frightened sweetness
Rang out on the autumn air.

'Twas too late—a moment only
Stood the beauteous figure there;
Then the little face lay lifeless,
Covered o'er with golden hair.

Reverently they raised my darling,
Brushed away the curls of gold,
Saw the stamp upon the forehead,
Growing now so icy cold.

Not a mark the face disfigured,
Showing where a hoof had trod;
But the little life was ended—
"Papa's letter" was with God.

—L. M.

Temptation.

A mighty angel on the jasper wall,
Sitting serene o'er sin and death's control,
Heard a great voice through the white spaces call—
"Haste to the succor of a tempted soul!"
He spread his pinions, and adown the night
Flew to that sombre room, where you and I Stood, trying with faint lips and faces white
To say that sad, that awful word, "Good-bye!"

Without, the strong tides sobbed upon the shore,
Like some great soul convulsed with mortal pain;
The sea-wind shook the mournful sycamore
Upon the terrace, black with wintry rain.
Within the fire was dead, and, like a pall,
Silence and gloom hung over hall and stair;
The pictured faces on the carved wall
Frown down upon us in our deep despair.

"Cold is the way of duty—hard and cold,
And sweet is love," you murmured—"must we part?"
I felt your kisses in my hair's warm gold,
Weak—unresisting—I lay on your heart
Until the angel touched me. Then my eyes
Were opened, and I saw the pit below
Our falling feet—the Hell in Heaven's guise—
Joy's phantom semblance hiding deadly woe.

And ah! these coward lips grew strong to slay
My heart and yours. The dread word of farewell
I spoke unflinching; I put away
The clasping hands that held me like a spell.
I buried deep—yea, out of mortal sight—
The love that was my life, and watched you go
Through the dark shadows of that bankrupt night—
The rest—my sad soul and the angel know!

Oh, friend, across the distance, lone and far,
Call not to me—I can not heed nor stay;
The feet that walked by duty's pale cold star
Will turn no more, nor falter on the way.
Then call me not. My weary eyes are wet,
But 'twixt us, keen and bright as at the door
Of the lost Eden, lo! a sword is set—
There stands the faithful angel evermore!

ETTA W. PIERCE.

FABLES AND ANECDOTES.

By Little Johnny.

The Fable of the Two Sweet Singers.—How the Paternal Instinct works in Real Life.—The Glassware Man who overthrew the Decalogue.—Some dreadfully Sanguinary Stories touching the Butchering Business.—Miscellaneous and Assorted Horrors too Numerous to Mention.

One day there was a jackus a passin by a winder, and he herd a yung lady singin, and he stopped, the jackus did, and pinto his ears strate a hed of his nose, you never seen sech ears, biggern he was his ownself! After the jackus had harked a wile he flopt his ears back til they tutchted his tale, and then he stretcht out his kneck and let down his chin, and brado so friteffe that it broke all the windoes in the house! And wen it was all over it was mity stil in that house, I can tel you, jest like some boddly was ded.

But bime by the ole man he stuck his hed out the windo, and he sed to the jackus: "Mebby you dont like the music wich is made in this house."

Then the jackus he sed: "I dont kanow wether I ot to like it or not. I got a mity fine voice, but no car."

Uncle Ned he says one time there was a mule wich moved away from the place were it lived, cos its master sold it to a other feller. But after a long time he bot it back, and wen it was brot hme agin it see a jackus, and the mule it had never saw a jackous be fore. So it loked awile, the mule did, and then it sed: "My feelins tels me that feller is my little boy."

So the mule it went up to the jackus, and sed: "Little feller, dont you know me? Time the ole man, yes, in deed, you see yure daddy be fore you, ded shure!" And then the mule it snoozled him with its nose, reel loving. But the jackus he roled his eys up sollom, like preachers eys, and didnt say nothing, but one time Billy, thats my brother, he spoke rite out loud in church.

The mule said a other time: "My son, wen you are grode up, and hav got childerns of yure own, yule understand how I kanew you. Its the paternal instinct, wich speeks to a fothers hart like the crack of a wip, yes, in deed, my boy, the paternal instinct is jest the biggest thing in this world!"

But the jackus it was the mules fother, and the biggest quodderped wich wocks the face of the erth is ephalents, but wales is the gratest wich plows the deep.

And now lle tel you a little story wich Mister Gipple tole me. Once there was a revivel of lidgion in the town were Mister Gipple kep a glas ware store, chiny and crockry, too, and evry boddly was a goin jest wild with good, no more swearin, and drinkin wisky, and fishin on Sundy, and steelin wotter mellons. One day there was a feller tendin store for Mister Gipple, and a mity good woman she cum in with a bible, and she loked at the feller out of her eyes, and then she sed: "Yung man, do you keep the divine comandments?"

The feller he was from Sacrymento and didnt kano wot them was, but he spoke out reel quick, and see: "Yes, mam, we do, but the boss was tryin to git em out of his way yesterday, and wile he was a settin em a side he broke evry one of em. But we have got sum better ones comin from San Francisco, you come in nex week."

A other time it was all Temprence, and the wimmen fokes was all crusaders, and one of em she went up to a man wich she seen was a stranger in town and she sed, the wuman did: "Mister, are you a Son of Temprence?"

The man he sed: "Ime a son of ole Jake Bartle, wich keeps the slotter house on the Marysvil road."

Then the wuman she sed: "Yes, yes, I kno, but are you a Good Templer?"

Then the man he sed agin: "No mom, I never worked at it a our in my life, but Ime a mity good hand at killin cafs." But I bet Mister Brily, the butcher, can beat him at that, yes, in deed!

One Sunday me and my mother was goin to church, and wen we was passin thro the grave yard we seen Mister Brily, dressed up reel slick, with his coat on, and not any apen. And there was a labm wich was cut onto a toobm stone, and I sed: "Wot a nice labm!"

But Mister Brily he sed: "You cant tel, Johnny, you cant tel. Labms is mity deceeven with their jackets on, fore you can see their buties they got to be gone over."

Then I ast Mister Brily wot "gone over" ment, and he said: "Wy, Johnny, you see, a animal is like the wimmin fokes, wich is only part meat, and the rest is close, but wen I have took my kanife and gone over a labm or a calef it aint got enny more outside follswoddles, nor inside flapdoodles, and such humbuggin wanity, but is jest as God made it."

One time my father he was in a slotter house, and was mity intrested in wot he see, and ast lots of questens. And after a wile he seen a man settin out side on a box, a smokin, and my father he sed it was a fine day, but the man didnt say it wasnt.

Then my father he sed: "Do you blong about here?" And the man he only jest nodded, but didnt make no remarks.

After a wile my father he sed how menmy sheeps was kild a week, but the man he sed: "Dunno."

Then my father he ast: "Who kanifes em?" But the feller he only jest chuckted his thubm over his shoulder, tord a other man, and went on smokin.

Then my father he sed: "I spose its mity slow werk for to skin em?"

Wen my father had sed so the man jumpt up off the box like he was shot, and snappt his fingers loud like a gun, and sed: "Slø, he blue blasted, you wite handed galoot! Ime the dandy skinner of the Golden West, thats wot I am, and if any feller wants to try me on lle skin all round him! lle skin any livin man for 20 dollars a side, and put up the munny!"

But my father he didnt want to be skun.

Snakes they skins their own selles evry year, and one time me and Uncle Ned we see a snake doin it, and we set reel stil and watcht, and wen the snake got it all off Uncle Ned he spoke up and sed to the snake: "So far so good, my fine feller, but how are you a goin to git yure innards out less you got a kanife?"

Saddles is made of pig skins, and the hoptode has got jolly big worts on hisn.

SAN RAFAEL, November 13, 1878.

OLLA-PODRIDA.

We recall no modern incident where the ludicrous and the pathetic are so blended as in the recent larceny of the mortal remains of A. T. Stewart. Only to think of it! Breaking into a cemetery, burglarizing vault, sarcophagus, and casket, to bear away "the poor handful of earth that lay mouldering there." "The offense is rank and smells to heaven." Was it some medical student, who thinks a rich man's anatomy different from a poor man's frame? Does he think perhaps that, hid away in some secret cavity of the corpus, in some hidden recess of bone, or brain, or nerve, or ligament, he will find the secret that led to the dead man's great wealth? Was it stolen by some necromancer, to conjure up the devil with? Was it taken away by some poor devil whom he had crushed in business, that he in turn might avenge the wrong by sending his bones to be ground for a fertilizer or for chicken feed? Was it untimely ripped from the womb of the grave by some mercenary idiot, who thinks the widow will pay and no questions asked? And now suppose it is brought back, who shall identify the body? And if it is not brought back, what becomes of that splendid memorial cathedral, with its chime of bells, and painted glass, and graceful spire, erected to pray through all coming time for the repose of the rich man's unquiet soul? If the police are at all efficient they ought to get upon the scent of this plunder, and bring these offenders to condign punishment. If it is true, as many good people believe, that the translated dead look down from their mansion in the skies, and see what is going on in this comical world of ours, what must have been the sensation of the departed Mr. Stewart when he saw the muffled body-snatchers, with dark lantern, iron bar, and jimmy, burst the cerements of his grave, and silently steal away with all that was mortal of him in a gunny sack or india-rubber bag. How he must have regretted that he was not en rapport with his friend Hilton, so that he might have table-tipped him by spiritual telegraph! "the deep damnation of his taking off." This stealing of dead men's bones will doubtless lead to cremation as a more satisfactory mode of disposing of the mortal remains. Instead of "dust to dust," it will be "ashes to ashes." If Stewart had been cremated, his ashes might have been so precipitated that they could have been worn by his bereaved widow in a mourning pin, or preserved in an ornamental urn upon her dressing table. They might even have been made into toilet soap. We would not indulge in these grim, sepulchral jokes over the dead body of a good or gracious man, who, after a life of usefulness, had been quietly inurned; we should wish him the repose he had fairly earned. But when a narrow-hearted, miserly, cold, and selfish rich man dies, we have so little sympathy with him that we confess to a little pleasure in knowing that his bones are liable to be disturbed, and some of his money is to be expended upon honest men in their search for his otherwise quite unimportant and worthless remains.

If we are wanting in respect for rich men dead, we fully compensate for it in our regard for rich men living. Somehow when the millionaire has thrown off his immortal part—to wit, his money—and gone to join the innumerable throng in that bourne where there is no wealth of houses or lands, of bonds or jewels, where only a single sixpence is required to pay the grim old ferryman that transports us all across the dark and fathomless stream, we have no respect for him. About the sordid, grasping, miserly rich man there are but two parts—his body and his money. His carcass lies rotting in its coffin, liable to be stolen and dragged off over boarding-house balconies and iron pickets to be made merchandise of. We can of course have but little concern for that. The money is left, and we must follow it and give our consideration to him who is its happy possessor. Soul? The dead money-grabbers have none while living, and we have never heard of any theological code that provided them one—ready-made—when they threw off the mortal coil. But rich men living! Ah! these command our admiration and our homage. To the rich man we bow in profoundest respect. To them we expose our weak spot. We take off our hat and make bare our bald head. We defer to their judgment. When they smile we smile. When they utter chunks of wisdom we bolt them and dip, as ducks gulping corn. There is a halo around the rich man's pocket that dazzles our vision with its brilliancy.

Speaking of rich men we learned yesterday that General Beale is the owner of one hundred and ninety-six thousand of the best and most fruitful acres in California. It is said that all the grants that gave this vast estate were forged—not that General Beale forged them, or had any knowledge concerning them—that they cost comparatively nothing; that a hundred-vara lot in San Francisco cost more than this vast domain. This property was acquired when the General was Surveyor-General of California, and it was him of whom President Lincoln made the joke that when he went out of office "he was monarch of all he had surveyed." This land is crossed by the Southern Pacific Railroad. It is used for a sheep pasture; it is doubtless taxed for less than one-tenth part of its value. None of it is cultivated. It is being held that time, future immigration, and the enterprise of other men may give it value. It has no church, nor school house, nor improved road upon it. It is a desert, unoccupied, and unused, except for the herds of its non-resident landlord. If it were taxed as other and not more valuable lands are taxed to the poor men who till them, it would bring a large revenue to the State. If it were owned in small farms and properly cultivated it would maintain a population of ten thousand souls; it would have doubled its present worth and given value to other lands; it would give occupation to railroads; it would contribute to the prosperity of San Francisco. Now it contributes nothing to the State, and only serves to enrich one man, and he, an absentee, spends his money beyond our borders. And yet the Constitutional Convention, now engaged in the preparation of an organic law, hesitate as to the propriety of doing anything in the direction of compelling these vast landed estates to be either divided or made to contribute their quota to the maintenance of a State government. At the same time this mob-fearing body of wisdom seriously propose to give over the absolute control of the Southern Pacific Railroad to three politicians elected by the people—who "shall have the sole control to fix the rates of freight and passage;" a railroad built without subsidy through an unsettled part of the State, reaching out to the Rio Grande in Texas in order to grasp and bring to San Francisco the vast future trade of the great empire of Arizona and the valley of Mexico, and whose prospects of ultimate profit is in a distant future. This Southern Pacific Railroad enterprise is doing for our city, more than all the rich men, corporations, merchants, and business men of the State beside. It is extending the jurisdiction, the business, and commercial area of the city, to a great, productive, and unoccupied country. It is opening up to us a future business, the extent and value of which the unthinking city trader has no conception or appreciation of. It is giving us a grasp upon a valuable trade, and is inviting to our port a business that in the future will be of inestimable value. The Southern Pacific corporation has no subsidy, no lands, and is asking no aid, yet in San Francisco there is an ignorant, mean, and jealous prejudice against it difficult to understand. Half the press are continually denouncing it; all the politicians are making capital in abuse of it; a Constitutional Convention threatens to go to the voting masses with propositions to confiscate it; the sand-lot mob meet before the dwellings of its promoters, and with bonfires, blasphemy, and threats of personal violence seek to intimidate the men who are building it, and who are giving labor to honest workers. Such narrow-minded ignorance, such mean and jealous stupidity, we never saw before in any community. If this road is built to the Gulf of Mexico—which is its objective point—it will bring to our city all the trade of that great empire of undeveloped wealth. If the system of California railroads, now being carried out by Governor Stanford and his associates, is left to be developed, without needless interference, the Rocky Mountains will bound our commercial jurisdiction on the east, and it will bring to our port the splendid commerce of Asia and the islands of the Pacific. If the narrow-minded political newspaper and sand-lot bigots are permitted to arrest the development of this enterprise, the Sierra Nevada hills will bound our trade eastward, and we shall find ourselves, like Portugal, locked in between the ocean and the Sierra, with a limited trade and a limited political influence. It seems a pity that San Francisco can not produce one man who has breadth of statesmanship enough to recognize this fact, and boldness enough to give the fact utterance. It is shameful that the press is cowardly, mercenary, selfish, and stupid; that it is left to an "obscure literary paper of limited circulation" to announce what everyone ought to know; and the most absurd thing of all is the howling of the jackass mob at the only concern that gives labor and the only men who spend money generously. If the community—of course we mean that portion of it that is disinterested and intelligent—would consider this work that the Southern Pacific Railroad Company is now doing, and its relation to the future prosperity of San Francisco; would contemplate in all its bearings the effect of a new southern transcontinental road, owned and operated in the interest of this city, it would be convinced that it is the most important enterprise ever undertaken upon this coast. If Tom Scott could be permitted to accomplish the building of a road to San Diego, to be controlled by him in the interest of eastern capital, it would strike a most serious blow at San Francisco. Thanks to the enterprise of Governor Stanford and his associated railroad builders, this danger is now indefinitely postponed. The time will come when our citizens will understand and appreciate this contest for railroad supremacy; when they do, they will do justice to the railroad men of this coast and give them a credit well deserved, but now withheld, under the influence of demagoguery in politics, bigotry in journalism, jealousy in business circles, and ignorance among the masses.

If Harry Mighels is beaten for Lieutenant-Governor of Nevada, it serves him right. He is the editor of the Carson Appeal, and has been guilty of the unpardonable crime of speaking out in meeting. He has indulged the bad habit of expressing his own opinions, without reference to the mob that clamors and the crowd that crawls; and then when nominated he refused to bend the thrifty hinges of the pregnant knee that coin might follow fawning. He went upon the stump, and stood up and looked the hoi polloi in its dirty face, and said that if he had written any thing that he was sorry for he was glad of it, and in a spirit of Christian generosity was willing to accept any apology, and be forgiven for any offense that he had willfully perpetrated. Just how Daggett—another editor—succeeded in getting to Congress we do not know. He ought—in the logic of politics—to have been defeated. If he has been a fearless, honest, and intelligent journalist, we can not understand how he could have received the popular vote. It is a suspicious circumstance at least, and while we have respected Mr. Daggett for the possession of many admirable qualities as a newspaper man, we have a right to demand of him an explanation of his success; by what arts he wooed the fickle Desdemona, and won the love of Nevada's voters. This election in Nevada sets us a bad example. We have editors who as Lieutenant-Governor might grace the State Prison. We know of only two who would honor a seat in Congress.

The laboring man who proposed in the Constitutional Convention to disfranchise all who availed themselves of Chinese labor moves a sweeping reform. Not one Irishman, or German, or other foreigner would be entitled to vote. Every man who hires a Chinese servant, or drinks tea, or smokes cheap cigars, or eats Chinese rice, or walks on Chinese matting, or purchases fish, fruit, and vegetables from a Chinese peddler, or wears a shirt washed at a Chinese laundry, or eats vegetables raised in a China garden, or wheat harvested by Chinamen, or fruit gathered by them, or rides upon a railroad made in part and kept in repair by Chinese, would be eligible to exercise the privilege of the elective franchise.

We have an idea the Americans are as fond of military titles as the Europeans are of titles of nobility. A Jew boy baby was christened "Baron Nathan" when he grew up he had a baron's coronet engraved upon his cards, and so all his life passed as Baron Nathan. Our suggestion is this: let all the American boy babies be christened with military titles, and thus all the General Jones, Colonel Smiths, Major Browns, and Captain Robinsons, will be genuine.

FOAM.

"The earth hath bubbles as the water hath, and these are of them."
—Macbeth.

B. B., of Massachusetts, tastes the squintessence of defeat.

The Boston Post says Old Ocean never had a corn on his under-tow. This may be the current opinion, but some Bunyan should show how many feet a tidal wave can move.

The best scholar, and the only one who went through the four years' course in three, at the Newport, Rhode Island, High School, was a colored girl eighteen years of age. This raises a hue and cry.

Moody weighs 240 pounds. Poor lean sinners cannot keep the straight and narrow path at his 2:40 gait.

The Post-office Department has ruled that a husband has no control over his wife's letters. They are writefully hers. Woman's rights are not to be always left.

The British Royal Society, by delicate experiments with thermo-electric apparatus, find that mental work causes an increase of heat; even to attract a person's attention raises the temperature. How cool and comfortable the heads of some people must feel!

Pious young ladies in England distribute tracts in sealed and scented envelopes, through the mails or in person, to the delight of the young men receiving and opening them in secret. It is not stated how many per cent are attracted to Christianity.

Colonel Forney writes of his interview with Gambetta: "He said he had heard of Me and had read some of My writings." The congregation will now join in singing:

"That undivided tract
Known as 'Ye Nowhere Nigh,'
Situate skyward, over the left,
In Elizabeth Martin's eye."

Mortimer Collins, writing of the "Art and Accomplishment of Verse," advised students of rhythm to find new variations among French poets, and mentioned Victor Hugo's two hundred lines running in this style:

"Mon page, empris mon escarcelle
Selle
Mon cheval de Calatrava
Va!"

The popular legend of Gambrinus who turned into a beer-barrel, as told by Prof. John Fiske, might appear thus:

A LEGEND OF LAGER BEER AND BELLS.

Gambrinus—though it was his sweetheart's guilt,

Suspended violin, and violin

Din,

And rushed into the woods himself to hang.

Sprang

Upon a bough and even fastened cord.

Awed,

He sat with rope on neck and paused in thought,

Fraught

With doubt and scorn of all this melancholy

Folly.

And while his musings turned the air to blue

Hue,

There came a stranger tall in coat of green

(Scene!)

With most officious offer to assist—

"Whist!"

Said he, "Thou shalt attain a lofty niche,

Rich,

Shall see thy sweetheart with regret and thirst

Burst.

But I, in thirty years, thy soul the game

Claim.

Gambrinus signed the compact, for he held

(Yelled)

That thirty years were long by pleasure blessed,

Guessed

The devil his soul in any case might Blight!

By Satan's aid he planned the carrillon;

Won

The Teutons' hearts by not too tonic beer.

Sheer

Delight induced the emperor to proclaim

Same

"The Duke of Brabant, Count of Flanders, too."

Whew!

Now how Gambrinus eyed his old sweetheart,

Tart!

But keeping clear of whim-en did not cease,

Peace.

For thirty years beneath his belfry's chime,

Time

Was slain and borne away on lager-bier,

Here

He sat with burghers and with noblemen,

Then

There came a message most imp-ortunate

Straight

Was he to "come below ere midnight's prime

Chime."

But Flemish schoppen sent the imp to deep

Sleep,

From which he did not wake till next noon came.

Shame

Prevented a return to Hell, and thus,

Plus

An imp } infernal, lived Gambrinus on,

A nymph }

On,

A tranquil century or so, till he

(Spree!)

(Esprit?)

From mere ro-tun-dity swelled to a ton,

Tun!

Through the "Telegraph" people can, by placing a wire in the mouth, "receive immediately the full flavor" of a dainty dish miles distant connected with a powerful battery—like knowing a kind heart or a beautiful face only by rumor. Ribot says the universe, with its light, colors, forms, harmonies, and aesthetics, exists for us only as a sum of states of consciousness. Fancy the sum of the states of consciousness experienced at a banquet, being a Flap and a cold wire on your tongue! This would be the Iron-y of Fête!

SAN FRANCISCO, Nov. 13, 1878.

An elegant wedding was that of William H. Booth and Miss Katherine K. Trowbridge, celebrated at Trinity Church on Wednesday evening last. The bridegroom is well known in society circles as a gentleman of wealth, generous impulses, and superior business talent. He is not an "old citizen," having come to the Pacific direct from Louisville, Kentucky, not more than seven years ago. The bride has been in the city only five months, but during that time has made many friends by her many gentle and womanly qualities. The groomsmen were Edwin B. Booth, Louis B. Parrott, Edmund Trowbridge, and James A. Miller; the bridesmaids, Miss Edith Ogden, Miss Jennie Ogden, Miss Katie Ogden, and Miss Hattie Rice. The bride wore the loveliest of gris de laer dresses, made in the Marguerite de Valois style, with high collar, sleeves of dentelles de Flandres, and a wealth of the same filmy material distributed elsewhere in elegant profusion about the garment. The train was of fabulous length, and covered with sheeny waves of raveled silk. The veil, which was as soft and voluminous as a summer cloud, was edged with orange blossoms and little lilies of the valley. The bridal jewels were diamonds. The bridesmaids wore tarlatan draped over white silk, the costumes being uniform in make, and only distinguished by the colors of the flowers and ribbons worn as wedding-favors. The Church lent its highest dignity to the ceremonial, the Right Reverend William Ingraham Kip, Bishop of California; the Right Reverend J. D. H. Wingfield, Rev. Dr. H. W. Beers, and Rev. Charles N. Spaulding participating. The bride and groom went smiling to the altar under the gaze of two thousand pairs of envious eyes. The blessing of heaven was invoked in a hymn sung to the sweetest melody in the opera of Der Freischütz. While the service was in progress a gentle melody was played by organ and violin, and when the knot was finally tied the wedding cortege paced gravely out of the church to the harmonious nuptial measures of Mendelssohn, which will continue to be played on similar occasions until some nobler bridal march is invented. There were flowers in graceful devices everywhere, in the chancel of the church, and in the parlors of the Palace Hotel, where the reception was held a little later—arches, bells, wreaths, stars, monograms, baskets, and bouquets, pure white contrasted with brilliant red. At the reception good society was well represented. Conspicuous among many extremely handsome toilets were those of the immediate friends of the bride and groom. Mrs. Howard, the bride's sister, wore a pale blue satin with Louis Quinze panniers over pale blue silk, panniers and sleeves puffed with gauze and bands of silk of the same delicate hue. Mrs. Jenks, mother of the bride, wore a brocaded silk of a shade of strawberry, opening over a gros grain of the same color. Miss Nellie Trowbridge was attired in a pale pink silk cut Princesse, covered with illusion caught up with bouquets and roses pompons. The dress of Mrs. James M. Barney, wife of the groom's chief business associate, was a rich black Princesse velvet with long train, bodice heart-shaped, covered in front and on the train with myriads of jets; the sleeves and neck trimmed with Venetian lace. Her principal ornament was a diamond cross that blazed like the Great Carbuncle. Miss Laura Belden wore a pink silk in wattleau style, covered with illusion and satin ribbons; Miss Louise, her sister, who made her social debut, a white gros grain train directeur covered with plaitings of white silk gauze. Mrs. A. N. Towne was observable for one of the handsomest costumes of the evening. There was a regal repast and dancing. The bridal gifts were of great cost and elegance. The entire arrangement of the wedding showed not only good taste, but a careful provision that prevented the haste, errors, and inconveniences incidental to complicated ceremonials and large gatherings. After the reception the happy couple went at once to the new and elegant home prepared for them at the corner of Fillmore and McAllister Streets.

A gentleman who signs himself "A Friend," writes to inquire what disposition to make of his knife and fork when he is at table in company and his appetite prompts him to ask for more. There are occasions, of course, when a diner-out may with propriety ask for more, but they are limited. For instance, he may be at a boarding house, where the fare is lenient, or he may be dining almost en famille, or he may be at table informally with two or three; in all these cases there are presumed to be only a few courses, and there may be a repetition of any one of them without physical injury or a violation of the rules of good-breeding. As the number of guests and courses increases, individual freedom is diminished. If there is a meal of a dozen courses, it would be manifestly improper for any person to ask for more of any one of them, unless he were familiarly acquainted with every guest. In such cases every one is expected to eat what is set before him, and permit his plate to be taken quietly away when the next course is served. In the case mentioned, when it is allowable to ask for more, usage is divided in regard to the disposition of the knife and fork. Sometimes it is left on the table, raised from the cloth by some convenient object, but oftener sent away with the plate. The last way is better than to have knife, fork, and spoon stacked upon a piece of bread like soldiers' muskets at parade. When sent away, a clean plate and knife and fork should always be returned.

It is altogether probable that what is called society will be soon "stirred from centre to circumference," by the details of a scandal that has been trying to assert itself now for two or three years. Time and again it has popped to the surface, to be instantly pulled back by the ears and crammed again into solitary confinement—but now the jailors are getting weary with constant watching, while the ghost of disgrace is as active as ever and bound to have its own way if it takes till the crack of somebody's doom. We know just enough of the whole plot to say that it is very interesting. Portions of it have been discussed at long and short lunch parties, and talked over in funeral carriages, and rolled a savory morsel under select and wicked wagging tongues. But welded together and made a connected whole reality whips romance right out of the road, and fact crowds fancy clear over the wall. Scandal is an unclean thing, but how society fondles it; what a welcome it has in nearly every household. So, if the mystery is not soon solved; if the daily press fail with the banner of a superior enterprise in its hand, we shall be obliged to publish the thing in cipher, and leave those who don't want to know anything about it to dig out the details.

Nous transcrivons purement et simplement l'anecdote, telle qu'on nous l'a racontée. Une de nos dames les plus distinguées, dans le cercle le plus brillant de la société, voulait essayer sa chance dans les dangereuses spéculations de la "Bourse," et naturellement, avant de prendre une résolution aussi importante, elle demanda timidement l'opinion de son mari. "Pas de stocks, ma chérie," répondit laconiquement le grave sénateur, dont le noble front fut jadis orné de la couronne ducale. Sur l'insistance de sa femme, le vieillard hochait sa vénérable tête, blanchie par l'âge et les soucis d'Etat, et prononça de nouveau comme un arrêt définitif, "non, pas de stocks, ma chérie." Notre charmante duchesse avait un peu d'argent; comme toutes les femmes elle se laissait tenter, et entraînée d'ailleurs par la tournure florissante du marché minier, elle se décida à aventurer sur les eaux du "Stock Exchange" le pain quotidien de la famille. Puis s'armant de courage, elle s'adressa à un "Bonanza King" et lui dit avec son plus malin sourire, "Placez cet argent pour moi." Le roi de la finance se garda bien de refuser, "d'ailleurs comment résister à une femme," surtout à une duchesse et fit gracieusement ce qu'on lui demandait. Les stocks du "North End Comstock" augmentèrent, les actions de la noble dame montèrent en conséquence, et le "Bonanza King" avec une magnanimité à nulle autre seconde, dans l'histoire, lui envoya un chèque de $75,000, comme résultat de l'opération. C'est, dans la soirée, alors que la dame trônait élégamment dans son salon, entourée d'un cercle nombreux et brillant d'invités, que le chèque arriva. Elle jeta un coup d'œil furtif sur la signature, sourit malicieusement et de l'air le plus tranquille et le plus satisfait du monde, elle cacha dans son sein le précieux billet. Bientôt les invités partirent et le duc et sa dame se retirèrent pour goûter un sommeil réparateur. C'est le moment qu'avait choisi la malicieuse duchesse pour informer son "lord et maître" du résultat heureux de l'opération financière. Il avait déjà enlevé son paletot, son gilet et ses bottes quand, tout en jouant, elle lui tendit le chèque et lui dit finement, "Comment trouvez-vous cela, mon cher." Le grave sénateur, assis sur le bord du lit, chercha ses lunettes à monture dorée, lut attentivement les chiffres, la signature cabalistique, puis regardant dessous ses lunettes avec un sourire sarcastique et affectueux tout à la fois, lui rendit le chèque, ôta son pantalon, et avec la plus respectueuse révérence, dit à la victorieuse duchesse: "Prenez-le, ma chère, il est à vous de droit, puissiez-vous le porter aussi gracieusement que vous l'avez gagné." Une pudique rougeur colora les joues de la modeste duchesse. Ils se mirent au lit. Le bonheur était peint sur leur visage. Ils furent heureux cette nuit-là; les rêves les plus doux et les plus agréables visitèrent leur sommeil.

Social life in Oakland has not recently been disquieted by many events of importance. Miss Harmon entertained the literary clubs last week with a supper, and dance afterward. Among the ladies present were Misses Houghton, Green, Sinton, Ward, Crane, Johnson, Eells, Raymond, Stanley, and Mrs. Wheaton, Mrs. Houghton, Mrs. C. P. Eells, Mrs. Perine, Mrs. Havens, and Mrs. Rathbone. The chivalry of Oakland was represented by Messrs. Paxton, Johnson, Tuttle, Hamilton, Sinton, Houghton, Havens, Graham, Froelich, Pillsbury, and Perine.

A boarder at fashionable hotel, who is not consumptive, wishes to know whether one invalid in a badly-ventilated room has special privileges which four hundred healthy diners are bound to respect. Also whether it is permissible for the lady who wishes to display a well-rounded bust to arbitrarily regulate the little opening of the window through which a breath of the free air of heaven endeavors to reach and inflate the gasping lungs of robust manhood. Your putative invalid is your real despot; if feminine, more terrible than the terrible infant of tradition. We have no answer ready.

Bancroft & Co. have in preparation for the holidays a society volume to be called the Elite Directory of San Francisco and Oakland, a work intended to contain the names, address, and reception days of society people, and the membership and relative standing of fashionable clubs and social organizations. We have seen the general plan of the volume, and it is to be commended to the attention of society people as being something very desirable, and in good form and taste. New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and St. Louis all have their society crystallized in this shape, and the San Francisco work will be better than them all. As a private address and carriage directory the book will be invaluable, as a calling reference something very desirable, and as a segregation of our society people very interesting. Within a week or two circular notes will be addressed to heads of families, and if those receiving them will fill blanks and return at once to the publishers as directed they will materially assist in making the work complete and correct. It is intended to have the volume ready for New Year's and the calling season.

Customer (in quest of a particular brand of cigar)—Are those these?

Dealer (affably)—Yes, sir, these are those.

Kearney returns to us upon payment of $400 in advance—cheap. The prodigal politician, having fed upon the Butler husks in Massachusetts, comes back to us lean, hungry, and repentant. The sand-lot will kill for him the fatted calf, and on Thanksgiving Day Tipperary, Kilkenny, Schleswig-Holstein, and the suburban precincts of Père le Chaise will turn out their warriors and statesmen to give him welcome home again. Then Wellock, and Carl Brown, and Bob Ferral, and Henry George, and Beerstecher, and O'Donnell, and the subsoil of the dirty Democracy, and all the native-born party demagogues, will wheel into line; Kearney will tongue-walloper them with vulgar and blasphemous slang, organize them with his shillalah, and the politicians of either party will stand in awe of a misnamed labor party.

As things look to-day with reference to the Constitutional Convention, there is about one chance in ten that the result will be indorsed by the vote of the people. There is an effort at legislation in detail that is calculated to defeat the whole scheme. It was a bad time to call such a body together; dry seasons, hard times, and labor agitations do not favor constitutional reforms. For this probably abortive effort—that will cost one million of dollars—we may thank the Democracy. There was no especial necessity of a new Constitution. It was not demanded by the people, and there is every probability that it will be repudiated when submitted for adoption. We have one consolation in the fact, that we have a good enough Constitution if we would legislate in the spirit of its provisions.

Governor Stanford says the railroads of this State pay $500,000 annual taxes. The Chronicle questions the accuracy of the statement, and estimates that they should pay three times that amount if the value of the property was justly estimated. The Chronicle newspaper is—if we are correctly informed—valued by the assessor at less than ten thousand dollars. It is worth a quarter of a million of dollars, and the Messrs. De Young would not sell the journal for that price. The Call can not be purchased for even a larger amount. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars would not buy the Alta California. The same amount would be a fairly estimated value for the Bulletin. A million and a half of dollars would not purchase the journals of San Francisco, and they are not all of them assessed upon a valuation of $50,000—not equal to the assessment upon one railroad building in this city. The ARGONAUT is assessed upon a valuation of six hundred dollars; it is worth twice as many thousands. Yet the entire press is complaining of unequal assessments. The Chronicle should pay twenty-five times the amount it does to support the government, and would then do nothing more in proportion than does the poor man with a homestead, or the laborer with his horse and dray. We constantly complain of the inequality of assessments. We know the rich avoid the payment of their just dues. We know they escape their duties to society, but in illustration of shirking taxes there is no class so conspicuous as the men who own newspapers.

The new book house of Billings, Harbourn & Co. places us under obligations for a whole library of new books, which we have no time to read, and no place to review. It is a great temptation to introduce to the ARGONAUT a department for the review of new works, and when we get just a little older, and a little richer, and increase the size of our paper by eight pages, and stitch and cut it, and put an initial picture page upon it, and make it what it ought to be, and what it is to be—the best, and brightest, and cleanest of weekly journals—we shall devote some columns to well-considered book reviews. Then we shall pay up our obligations to Bancroft & Co., Roman & Co., Billings, Harbourn & Co., and the leading publishers of the East. Among the books lying upon our table New Greece, by Lewis Sergeant, and published by Cassel, Pattee & Galpin, looks up appealingly to us from its clear print, fair paper, elegant maps, and beautiful binding, and almost moves us to fling away the pen and read. From Little, Brown & Co., of Boston, comes The Addresses and Orations of Rufus Choate, and The Personal Reminiscences of R. B. Forbes, a well-known merchant who came to California in 1845—a book full of narrative and incident that are valuable to all who are interested in our early history. An elegant book of poems by Whittier, The Visions of Echara, and Other Poems, which must be of the highest merit because written by Whittier, and because printed by Houghton, Osgood & Co. The White Horse of Wootton, by Charles J. Foster, from Porter & Coates of Philadelphia. The Studio Arts, by Elizabeth Winthrop Johnson, and Grammar Land, or Grammar in Fun, both published by Henry Holt & Co. of New York. This last book we shall read simply to learn how anybody can get fun out of grammar. We never could, and we have resentful recollections of Lindley Murray that we shall be glad to have modified. Eventide at Bethel, by J. R. Macduff, M. D., author of Mind and Words of Jesus, Footsteps of St. Paul, etc. This book we shall not read for obvious reasons. The Reverend Doctor Macduff can not "lay on" any of this sort of literature with us; life is too short. We have no unkind feelings toward Robert Carter & Brothers, who print the book, for they have appropriately bound it in blue. The same publishing house issue The Broken Wall of Jerusalem. What it is all about we do not know; but we just looked through the broken gap, and guessed that as the title and table of contents was not in our line we would not read it until we see what Sam Williams, of the Bulletin, says about it. We sincerely hope Messrs. Billings, Harbourn & Co. will continue to send us nice books, and look to the future for their recompense, which, by the way, seems to be the Christian idea as the proper mode of compensating for good deeds. If rewards of conscience, deferred payments, and promises will pay for books we are willing to lay in a complete library.

Donn Piatt says that the Republican party is the organized rascality of the country; that the Democratic party is the organized ignorance of the country, and that the Nationals are "the fellows who don't like it."

Try to see yourself through the eyes of those around you.

PRELUDES--IN DIVERS KEYS.

"Wilt thou have music? Hark! Apollo plays."

Sitting down to write about a concert that took place a week ago is, in some respects, not unlike the talking over of a dinner which, by virtue of some special quality, has lingered long enough in one's memory to provoke posthumous reflection or discussion. In both cases there is very apt to lurk somewhere among the unclassified senses—a subtle set they are, with their occasional tangling up of things until one is at a loss to know whether the almost impalpable impression is that of a flavor, an odor, or a note in some iridescent Chopinesque chord—a key note to which, as it were, one's entire impression of the event is attuned. Now it is the heavy, musky odor of a truffle (or is it its flavor?), now the bouquet of the Château Yquem (flavor, odor, and Chopin in one), and now the cadence of a voice, the far-off echo of a horn, or clinging sweetness of violin or cello tone that guides the uncertain memory through the labyrinth of confused and confusing recollections; or have we, perchance, brought away with us only the flavor of an ill-dressed salad, the worse one of an antipathetic neighbor, or the supreme misery of "sounds that were rude and harsh, and would not blend!" Be that as it may, I think that criticism a week after the event—be it of dinner or music—is likely to be far more just than the snap judgment of daily reporting possibly can, in that it is less apt to be influenced by either the glamour or annoyance of first impressions. One gets over many things in a week.

The Schmidt Quintet Concert, November 8th, second of the series, brought a programme of the composite order—neither fish nor flesh. There was just enough chamber music to be tantalizing without satisfying, and more than enough of the virtuoso-operatic style to be wearisome. The whole thing was a mistake, including the débutante. Miss Dietz, who was announced as a pupil of Mr. Carl Formes (the great basso accompanied her on the stage and sat there, seemingly in the capacity of prompter) proved to be in no sense ready for a début, and her performance would be scarcely entitled to notice were it not for the fact that the good nature (or ignorance) of some of my brethren of the daily press has induced them to say things that are likely to mislead the young lady and her friends, and I think that in such cases it is only common charity to point out the true state of affairs. Making due allowance, then, for the nervousness that is apt to attend a first appearance, and the effect that this nervousness necessarily has upon the quality of the voice, intonation, execution, etc., I am compelled to find either that Miss Dietz has very little voice, and that of a disagreeable quality, or that she has been very badly taught. From the pleasant manner in which she sang the cantilène of her little encore song I infer that the fault lies in her teaching, and this opinion is confirmed by the ambitious character of her selections, as well as the extremely stagey nature of all the points she aimed to make. They were invariably bad; forced, hard, unnatural, and very imperfect in execution. Most of them, indeed, could only be well done by a good singer of great routine, and I am forced to conclude that the advisers of this young lady are entirely ignorant of what good singing consists of, or they sadly underestimate the critical powers of a general audience. What Miss Dietz may be able to do when she shall have been taught how to produce her voice properly it is at present utterly impossible to say; but she has still everything to learn and much to unlearn. The other début was that of Mr. Henry Kopitz, who plays the flute delightfully. His tone and execution are both admirable, and he phrases like a good singer. Perhaps when he plays again he will remember that there are many better compositions for his instrument than those selected for last Friday night, and that Mr. Schmidt's audiences are entitled to the best. Mr. Clifford played Ernst's Othello Fantaisie with plenty of dash and spirit, and got most of the difficult passages out in very good form, but the playing it at all was a mistake. The piece is too much for him at present, and one should never undertake a solo-piece in public until it becomes easy—that is, until it is technically behind one. Miss Alice committed the same error in her selection of Chopin's Ballade in G minor. The composition is technically, as well as intellectually, beyond her present grasp. She struggled through it bravely enough, despite two very sore fingers, and played a few bits quite beautifully—notably the last page; but it was not Chopin. A Quartet of Mozart and the two middle movements of Saint-Saëns' Piano Quintet were the really musical numbers of the programme, and thoroughly enjoyable they were; especially the Quartet, which could hardly be played better, and made one long for more quartet and less solo playing. I refuse to believe that any audience prefers the fade "Fantasies" by Ernst, Terschak, etc., to the better class of chamber music, especially when it is as well played as we get it at these concerts. But then, I don't understand the business side of concert giving, and Mr. Schmidt evidently does.

Writing from Paris, in 1851, Ferdinand Hiller speaks of "a young composer, Gounod, who formerly achieved the prix de Rome at the Conservatoire, but of whom but little has since been heard in public, who has just completed an opera, Sappho, for Madame Viardot-Garcia, of which much is expected." Since the date of Hiller's letter, this "young composer" has written many operas of which great anticipations went out into the world, to be realized only in a single instance, that of his Faust. His latest work, Polyeucte, which has just been performed after the most careful preparation and rehearsal, is reported from Paris to have made a fiasco d'estime—a new way of putting it—and this seems to have been the fate of them all. The Reine de Saba managed to keep the stage for a year or two, probably on account of the magnificent decorations that had been prepared for it, and Romeo and Juliet gets an occasional performance. But of Gounod, the composer, the world knows only Faust. Nor is this strange. In this one opera he said all that he had to say; the rest is mere iteration. He found in "Faust" a subject peculiarly suited to his genius, which is, after all, not for the stage. With his purely subjective—introspective, say—treatment of harmonic and melodic material, he could not hope to find many, and may be considered very fortunate in having found the one. "Hamlet" might have fitted him; and it has always seemed to me to be a great pity that, if it had to be set to music at all (of course, it was an absurd idea), the text should not have fallen into his hands, instead of being given to Ambrose Thomas to be sugar-coated and wrapped up in tinsel and pink tissue paper.

I understand that Mr. W. S. Lyster, who is at present in Europe looking up recruits for what he hopes to make a very fine English Opera Company, is meeting with encouraging success. He expects to give a season in this city en route for Australia. Either Strakosch or Mapleson ought to be along in course of the winter; probably Strakosch. Mapleson's company is too expensive, I fancy.

Mr. Hugo Mansfeldt gave a concert at the Metropolitan Temple last Wednesday evening, assisted—as the programme stated—by a number of his pupils, and I can not but think that Mr. Mansfeldt did a very unwise thing. When one pays seventy-five cents for admission to a concert, one is entitled, firstly, to get what one pays for—that is, a performance of the pieces announced in the programme—and, secondly, to at least a respectable performance of them. Mr. Mansfeldt, with his pupils, gave neither the one nor the other. He announced "new concertos" by Liszt and Saint-Saëns; for the former he had four young ladies to bang away at the Fugue (Finale) from Schubert's Fantaisie in C, op. 15, while he made the horrible muddle more horrible by playing on the organ a portion of the orchestral accompaniment which Liszt has added to it; and of Saint-Saëns he gave no concerto at all, but a transcription of a poème symphonique, to which he also applied the organ without stint or sense. He announced the "Schubert-Liszt concerto" as "first time in California," whereas the piece has twice before been played here in public—once, in its original form, by a pupil of Mr. Oscar Weil, and since by Mr. Carl Wolfsohn. What was written down as a "Spring Song, by Rubenstein," turned out a trashy Italian duet; a violin obligato to a song by Kuecken resulted in some of the most uncouth fiddle scraping that ever was scraped before an audience. (That the scraper preferred the key of D to the original one of D flat was not altogether unreasonable). In other words, Mr. Mansfeldt took people's money, and gave them, not what he promised in his bills, but a very inferior article that he ought to have been ashamed to bring before the public under any circumstances. Pupils are scarcely legitimate objects of criticism; they do as well as they have been taught. But when a teacher trots out a batch of his élèves in an ambitious programme, and charges seventy-five cents to hear them, he should have something better to offer than Mr. Mansfeldt seems to; and when he anticipates that such an exhibition will bring an accession to his list of pupils, he exhibits a sublime confidence in the ignorance of the public that I can not find warranted even in San Francisco.

At the same hall, Mr. Gustave Hinrichs, on last Saturday afternoon, gave a matinée d'invitation with a number of young pupils, which I am the more gratified to mention as it formed the most perfect contrast to the pretentious affair of Wednesday evening. Here everything was modest and imbued with the right spirit; the programme was excellent, and the execution of it, mostly, surprisingly good. Some half dozen young ladies, from ten to about sixteen years of age, played the piano-forte part in trios and quartets of Haydn, Gade, and Beethoven; several difficult solo-pieces were very creditably performed, and one young lady—of about fourteen years, I should say—played Mozart's Concerto in D minor (first movement, cadenza of Reinecke), with quartet accompaniment, really very well indeed. Apart from the fact that Mr. Hinrichs' pupils play with commendable neatness and precision of touch and rhythm, it is very encouraging to find a teacher who devotes himself to the cultivation of a taste for good music, and has succeeded in making it enjoyed and understood, as it seemed to be by these young ladies.

The novelties for the next Quintet Concert are a Serenade by Hiller, a charming work; String quartet of Rubinstein, and Suite of pieces for violin, by Ries. These last are quite new and exceedingly beautiful. Mrs. Marriner-Campbell will be the vocalist.

Mr. Herold's Symphony this week was the "Miscellaneous," composed by Schubert-Beethoven-Mendelssohn; an allegretto symphony, let us say, in which the tempo moved along so placidly as to make the lively Saltarello finale very difficult of achievement. It is not easy after three continuous movements of jog-trot to work into a rattling vivace, and I was not surprised to hear this one go rather tamely. The Schubert movement was very nicely played, as was also the allegretto of Beethoven. In this the exact tempo was very happily found—rather a delicate thing to do—and the result was a charming effect of quiet humor. The performance of the Tannhäuser overture seemed to me the worst I have ever heard. Setting aside all other considerations, this overture is so much too difficult for our orchestra that the mere attempt to play it is nothing less than absurd. They get through it, to be sure, but they make it sound positively ugly. Now, the composition is not very beautiful (as music) at the best, and can only be made interesting by a masterly, virtuoso performance; it got a shocking bad performance, and was correspondingly hideous. Hauser's little "Cradle Song," arranged for the string band, was quite as badly done, probably because it is very easy and was not considered worth the trouble of study. But it is worth the trouble, as any good violinist could show Mr. Herold. I have heard amateurs play it, in its original form, infinitely better than it was done on Wednesday. The "Strauss Waltz" was a treat; I enjoyed it thoroughly. Hope we shall have more of them and less Wagner.

HEART HISTORIES.

We were talking of our mutual acquaintance, Penserosa. Said Psyche: "I watched her to-day as she sat by the desk, leaning her head on her hand, with such a pathetic, wistful look on her face. I thought of her lonely life, no one near her who loves her best, one dreary round of teaching day after day, and the question came to my mind: what has rendered her so solitary among others—what trouble has she borne? We see only a commonplace little woman, but we do not know what history she may have had. We see only the present; the past may have buried love, happiness, and joy that once came to her, giving enchantment to the common air. That quiet self-contained exterior may hide the ruins of a wasted life."

"You are right," said Madam Pansy, "for no woman reaches the age of twenty-five without a heart history."

"I never see a woman struggling along through life without thinking the same thing."

"Alas! how many are there who go through life lonely and unloved whose hearts are filled with grand capabilities of loving?"

"How many are there who love blindly, passionately, and wake to find their idol but common clay!"

As they talked I thought of the old German song, "Schön Rohtraut." A page loved the king's daughter, and he often attended her as she rode in the forest.

They dismounted one day and sat side by side under a forest tree. Suddenly impelled by a love that he could not resist, he bent forward, and his soul settled in one long kiss on her laughing lips. As they rode home silently through the darkening shadows, he said:

"Wert thou made Empress to-morrow it matters not, for the thousand leaves of the forest know that I have kissed Schön Rohtraut's mouth."

All of us, sooner or later, kiss Schön Rohtraut's mouth; sooner or later Love will come to the heart, bringing either great pain or great joy.

Poor Penserosa! In the great Hereafter will what she has missed on earth be made up to her?

I know a woman who said, when a question affecting her whole future was placed before her for decision: "I'll be happy if only for a week, a day, an hour; let come what will, I shall have had my day."

Jean Paul says as surely as every mountain has its valley every heaven-stormer finds his hell. So I wonder if those who clutch happiness with such eagerness do not find that it turns to ashes in their grasp, or does the memory of that happiness, even when withdrawn, sanctify their lives and give enchantment to the commonest duties?

Watch that quiet, placid woman sitting yonder, with her child in her arms; once in a while a shadow crosses her face. Ah, if we could but read, what hopes and fears, what anguish and longing might that calm face reveal. We all wear masks, but sometimes they slip aside and reveal the worn face beneath.

Between the ages of twenty and thirty whatever happens in a woman's life makes a deep impression; younger, the mind is so elastic that it can throw off grief more readily; older, the feelings are dulled by what has gone before.

A heart trouble will leave then a scar never to be effaced. The wound may heal and be hidden so carefully that it can not be seen, yet at times the old sorrow wakes into life, and again the old agony has to be endured.

Nature writes the heart histories on the face so that he who is observant may read as he runs. There are lines so faint that they can not readily be perceived, nevertheless they are there, and although we do not recognize them, yet their presence lends an expression to the face that attracts our attention.

We all strive to mask our faces, and conceal whatever sorrow has imprinted, but I think if the mask were raised more often, and we could see the lines of care, trouble, and disappointment, we would be much kinder, much more gentle toward one another.

Cherry Ripe little thinks, as she walks up the street, with an abstracted air and a faint smile on her lips, that I know she is thinking of her trip to the mountains and her handsome fellow-traveler. The memory of the kiss on Schön Rohtraut's lips, you know, lent enchantment to the common air, and I have no doubt the page lived in Dreamland most of the time afterward. I tax Cherry Ripe with being in a world apart from us, and a blush and confused smile confirm my opinion. She is still living in Arcadia, and we know that in that happy land people are perfectly natural; there is no shadow on her face, but oh, if by some mischance the gate should be shut on her never to open again, then the story will be painted on her face with a brush so fine and a touch so delicate that only the gathering years will bring it out in full distinctness.

Bonbons.—French and Otherwise.

A female teacher threatens to keep an unruly boy fifteen minutes after school.

"I wish you'd make it half an hour," says the appreciative youth, "for you're the prettiest teacher in this town."

Madame A (piscatorially to young and eligible gentleman)—"How do you like my daughter's hands?"

"They are exquisitely shaped," he replies, "but I think their skin is rather dark."

"Oh! that is not true," exclaims the astonished mother; "they are not dark; they are only dirty."

Parson (sternly)—"How could you come to church to be married to a man in such a state as that?"

Bride (weeping)—"It wasn't my fault, sir. I never can get him to come when he's sober."

"I am a tramp," pleads he; and, pointing to his worn shoes, continues, pathetically, "this is my sole offense."

The judge, clerk, and officer all fainting, the prisoner escapes.

"Sandy, what is the state of religion in your town?"

"Bad, sir; very bad! There are no Christians."

Davie and myself, and I have my doubts about it.

MY EXPERIENCE AS A LUNATIC.

The Confederate force of General Early had gained the mastery in the Shenandoah Valley, and our demoralized battalions were falling back precipitately through Winchester.

Sheridan dashed upon the scene, and his presence, like a spell, checked the retreat and infused new courage into the disordered mass. Our battery reached knoll to the left of the pike, and unlimbered in front of a timbered slope, on the brow of which the Confederates had posted a heavy battery. The infantry line on our front was advancing splendidly, and I saw the gleaming crest of bayonets fall when the order came for a charge on the double-quick. * * *

Bright sunshine was streaming through the open curtain, and seemed to have awakened me from prolonged slumber. Slowly my scattered senses gathered from dim unconsciousness, and as thought assumed definite form the scene of the battle-field again flashed before me.

"What of the charge?" I inquired, anxiously, making a desperate effort to rise.

The sharp, unnatural tone of my own voice startled me, and my strength was unequal to rustle even the covering of my couch.

"Do not try to talk now, Charley; you will be stronger very soon." It was the voice of my wife. In a moment I realized that I was home, on the shores of the northern lake. I glanced through the window, and the waving branches associated with my thoughts of the battle scene were not there, but the snow lay heavily on the fields glistening in the sunshine. Many months must have passed away, a blank period in my existence.

As I recovered my strength and comprehension I learned the critical ordeal I had passed in surviving a severe wound that caused a fracture of the skull, and necessitated the operation of trepanning.

Still many months more elapsed before I was again abroad. The war was ended, and the people were rejoicing in the restoration of peace. I was tendered and accepted the old position I had resigned in response to the call to arms—teacher of mathematics in the academy of my native town.

The old routine of the position was familiar enough, but close attention to its duties shortly developed the fact that my nervous system had not recovered from the severe shock it had sustained, and my mental powers were impaired.

As nearly as I could define the effect produced, the injury seemed to have interrupted the harmonious action of the brain, and the right and left lobes appeared to operate independently, and take separate and distinct cognizance of emotions and sensations conveyed by the medium of the senses. Every thought seemed to have its duplicate, necessary to a complete impression. When I studied a single problem, and the solution occurred, immediately would follow the solution again, as if emanating from a second mind, acting in conjunction, but always a little slower in its perceptions. This derangement, vexatious and confusing at first, continued to increase as I devoted myself to mental labor, until finally I was compelled to abandon my position in the academy.

The necessity was indeed a hardship, as it left me without the means of sustenance. My brave and devoted wife bore up nobly under the affliction, and insisted that I should indulge the repose that my critical condition demanded. Meantime she turned the fine musical facilities acquired in better days to good account, and we continued to live comfortably for a time on the proceeds of her labor. Comfortably, did I say? No, it grieved me constantly to see her toil so arduously, with the double responsibility of household cares. And I knew that her assumed cheerfulness was the cover of painful solicitude she experienced on my behalf.

This anxiety did not favorably affect my derangement. It grew more marked and depressing. Vague fears haunted me by day, and harrowed the long, sleepless hours of night. The strange perception of a double intellect became so far defined that the senses were sympathetic. The sounds that reached my ear were repeated, as if by echo; taste and touch were fanciful and erratic, and at night weird, fantastic forms flitted before my eyes, and real objects assumed the semblance of what they were not, and drove me to the verge of delirium; while the effort constantly exerted to retain my reason only the more prostrated the mental powers.

Ultimately my malady reached a stage at which I seemed to realize both physical and mental double existence. At times I could distinctly see the form and features of my second self, directly confronting and gazing upon my more immediate self. And then my own voice addressed me, and we conversed together—myself and my second self—now concurring in common misery, and then in tantalizing and horrible imprecations.

The terrible delusion became unbearable and I felt that reason could not much longer retain command of the disordered faculties. It was a night when my mental agitation had reached a high degree. My wife had fallen asleep, overcome with constant care and watching. I was pacing the sitting room of our chamber, about the hour of midnight, as was my habit. Occasionally I reclined on a sofa, in the hope of catching a slight respite from the distress of my terrible hallucination; but it was for a moment only.

I lay down again on the sofa. My brain seemed whirling in a blaze of fire, and I sprang up stricken with madness. The horrible spectre stood before me and mocked me with a fiendish grin of derision. I grasped a heavy piece of furniture and dashed at it with the fury of a maniac. The spectre seemed palpable to the blow, and yielded. I saw it vanish in darkness that spread before me, and my tormenting second self was gone. I broke forth in frantic laughter, that returned in a hundred echoes around me, and I sank exhausted, unconscious to the floor.

The morning sun was shining in upon me when I awoke to returning consciousness. A cool perspiration oozed from my forehead. I rose on my elbow, and, for some moments, endeavored to recall my identity and the recollections of the night. Then a horrible conviction came upon me. Great heavens! It was she! It was my poor devoted wife—the reality of the form I had dashed down and destroyed in my frenzy!

Overwhelmed with remorse, I rushed wildly from the house and fled I knew not whither. The greater grief that had come upon me reanimated my mental power, and I became calm in despair; but I shrank cowardly from the desolation my own hand had wrought.

It was some weeks after the dreadful night I have described that I reached New York City without detection, a greater portion of the distance working as one of the crew of a canal boat. I wandered along the wharves of the metropolis, searching anxiously for some means of escaping the country, and longing even to flee the fellowship of civilized man. The opportunity was finally discovered in a ship about sailing around Cape Horn for the Pacific Coast, on board of which my services were accepted in a menial capacity.

I was soon safe from discovery and pursuit, and free upon the boundless waters—free as one could feel with the remorse of a hellish deed upon his soul, and the abandonment of all hope of a happy hour in life again.

I need not describe the experience of a long and tedious sea voyage, and the hardships and indignities put upon me in consequence of inefficiency and total ignorance of seaman's duties. To me it was of little account. But the change of life and scene, and the sea air, had a wonderful effect in repairing my mental and physical strength. It was on a bright September morning that I first spied the hazy shores of California, and in a day or two thereafter sauntered along the streets of San Francisco, alone in a new world, with only the companionship of bitter recollections.

As necessity required I sought employment, and managed to sustain myself, leading a listless, purposeless sort of life. But the monotony soon became oppressive, and the apprehension of ultimate discovery excited renewed anxiety. Frequently I fancied the recognition of a familiar countenance on the streets, that kept me in painful uncertainty.

The day came in which my worst fears were realized. The miserable wretch in whose house I was sojourning delivered me into the hands of justice. By what means he discovered my identity I could not determine; but I met my fate boldly; for remorse had so far embittered my existence that I disdained longer to struggle for its continuance.

"Gentlemen," I exclaimed, as the officers inclosed my wrists with iron shackles, "take your accursed reward! I am Charles Harden, the murderer, from —"

They dragged me to the prison, and the officers of the law came and questioned me. I told them all, and they transferred me to more secure confinement, lest I should escape again the retribution of crime.

Long I lingered in the solitude of a gloomy cell, awaiting the final decree of fate, until calm indifference succeeded despair, and gradually every emotion, even life itself, seemed to subside into a dream.

But a day came when my sensibilities seemed reanimating, like one emerging from a trance. Slowly my mind manifested activity, and in time I recalled my identity; then suddenly the recollection of my whole life flooded back upon me, and all the weight of its great burden of remorse again descended.

An old man, whose kindly countenance had become familiar to me as in a vision, appeared and sought to rally my despondency with words of hope and encouragement.

"You have had a long, bad spell, Harden," he remarked; "but you are coming around all right now, and will soon be out in the world again."

Then I was not in a prison, but an insane asylum. Thank heaven, my wretched guilt had not been discovered.

And then I learned from the old man the circumstances of my arrest as a lunatic, and the nature of my affliction. In the operation of trepanning at the hands of unskilled surgeons, a small splinter of the fractured skull had been left adhering in a position to irritate the membrane of the brain, and this trifling oversight had caused the insanity attended with such sad results, to blast the happiness of my life forever, and stamp my memory with the ignominy of murder.

The derangement had been effectively repaired by the skillful surgeon of the asylum, and my mind now rapidly recovered its original power. But what availed it, I reflected bitterly; and why had I been restored from peaceful lunacy to a consciousness to which death would be a relief.

One morning the old attendant of whom I have spoken interrupted my gloomy meditations with a countenance more than usually cheerful, that seemed to radiate the light of some hidden hope.

"Harden," he remarked, "you are growing vigorous again in both body and mind. I have a message for you that may excite you a little. Do you think you can stand an agreeable surprise?"

"Anything agreeable to hear would indeed be a surprise," I replied. "But, my dear friend, I fear the world could now hardly afford a message to me sufficiently pleasurable to inspire any appreciable excitement."

"Well, if you are confident to that extent, I will permit the bearer of the message to impart it directly to you."

The old man withdrew, and presently returned with a companion. A thrill, premonitory of some great surprise, startled me as I heard the approaching footsteps.

I raised my eyes. Great heavens! they met the old love-look of my wife, ready to advance into my arms.

The ardor with which I returned her embrace was assuring that my power of nerve was restored.

The last great hallucination was dispelled, and a ray of gladness burst in upon my heart, streaming through the dark cloud of despair that had hung over me those long and wretched years. I laughed and wept by turns. And then I drew the recovered treasure of my life more firmly to my breast, fearful I was still in a dream, that might vanish and leave me again in misery and despair.

"And how did you follow me here?" I demanded, when sufficiently collected to make the inquiry.

"There is your address," my wife replied, handing me an Eastern paper containing the following paragraph, copied from a San Francisco paper:

"FOR STOCKTON.—An unknown man was taken from a boarding house on Sansome Street yesterday, and brought before the Commissioners of Lunacy, and by them committed to the Asylum at Stockton. From what could be gathered from his incoherent talk, his name is Charles Harden, from New York city, and he imagines himself to have committed some serious crime. His insanity is caused by fracture of the skull, which had been imperfectly trepanned."

"And who was it that I struck down and killed?"

"Your own reflection in our pier-glass mirror, which was shattered to atoms the night you disappeared."

And so it was my own second self, and none other.

We remain in California, my wife and I, for its air is genial and its skies blue and bright; and if at times I recall the recollection of those long years of wretchedness and despair, it is that the contrast may only render the present more peaceful and happy.

R. B.—

AN INCIDENT OF OUR VOYAGE TO CALIFORNIA.

"If we double Cape Horn, as we're in hopes for to do,

There's lots of sperm whale on the coast of Peru."

—Old Sea Song.

In looking over the journal I kept daily of the voyage of the Mary Jane around Cape Horn to San Francisco, in the winter of '49 and spring of '50, I wonder at the great importance we then attached to small matters. But for more than six months her narrow deck was all of a little world to nineteen of us. We were the most democratic-republican company that ever went in search of the Golden Fleece. We organized, bought the vessel, loaded her, and sailed her. Midshipman Easy could not have asked for more liberty than we voted to ourselves. All the officers, from captain to cook, and all the sailors were owners, and had an equal voice and vote as to what ports we should enter on the voyage, and even the question as to whether we should try the passage by the Straits of Magellan or Cape Horn was submitted to a vote of "all hands." Several of the crew had been captains and mates. About half were landmen. Notwithstanding this incongruous material, and the anomaly of the cook being an equal owner with the Captain, and the fore-castle having the power to out-vote the cabin, discipline was observed, and there was not, throughout the voyage, any serious trouble or difficulty. The nearest approach to a row was as we lay becalmed in the Gulf of Tehuantepec. As we neared Cape Horn it was found that the supply of fresh water was becoming short; so we entered Good Success Bay, in Terra del Fuego, on February 6, 1850, and filled twenty casks, intending to obtain an additional supply at Juan Fernandez. In trying to double Cape Horn we were forced down to latitude 60 degrees, and did not reach Crusoe's Island until March 6. The facilities here not being good, and the wind being fair, we concluded to run to the Gallapagos Islands, and there replenish our water casks. We arrived at Charles Island, one of the group, on the 21st March, but found it more difficult to obtain water than at Juan Fernandez. We however bought fresh beef, bananas, and other fruit, from the convicts, caught large quantities of fish, ran over to Albemarle Island, hunted tortoise, of which we caught more than fifty, made an examination of our supply of water, and concluded that, with average weather and wind, we could reach San Francisco before our supplies would be exhausted. By April 5 we had been forced by the wind on to the Mexican coast. It then left us, and we found the Mary Jane becalmed in the Gulf of Tehuantepec. For some days we endured the steady roll and flapping sails. The long swell then ceased; the sun poured on us his direct rays with more than tropical fervor; the sea became glassy, and seemed filled with insect and animal life.

"The very deep did rot; O Christ!

That ever this should be!

Yea, slimy things did crawl with legs

Upon the slimy sea."

On the 12th, Judge O'Brien, who was steward that week (he has since joined the pioneers on the other side of the river), reported that there was but half a cask of water remaining. As this would hold out but a few days, we were immediately put on an allowance of a quart a day. The calm still continued; the sun rose out of the ocean each morning a ball of fire; the sea became a mirror, and the reflected rays seemed more intense than those that beat down upon us. By the 19th the supply of water was nearly gone, and still the calm continued.

"Day after day, day after day

We stuck, nor breath nor motion,

As idle as a painted ship

Upon a painted ocean."

On the 23d the last of the water from the cask had been distributed. At the Gallapagos Islands we found a Marshpee Indian named Reed, from Sandwich, Massachusetts, who had been left sick from a whale ship at the convict settlement on Charles Island. He begged so imploringly to be taken to California that we gave him passage. When we were becoming short of water he stated that when a boy he had worked in a New England rum distillery, and thought he could devise a plan to distill fresh water from the ocean. His plans failed. We had, however, several of the crew who were accustomed to the use of tools, and full of inventive resources. Van Norden and Young, who had the reputation of having made an effective gun-lock from a cabin-door hinge and the blade of a broken case-knife, undertook to create a distilling apparatus. As their success was of vital importance I find my journal filled with the anxious details of their efforts. The cook's largest kettle, holding about ten gallons, was filled with salt water, the cover was luted on with a composition of wood ashes and dough, the nozzle of the cover was inserted into a gun-barrel, from which the breech had been removed. This gun-barrel led through the side of the galley, and then through a keg filled with cold water. Under the outer end of the gun-barrel was fastened a demijohn, in the mouth of which was inserted a funnel. A fire was kept up under the kettle; when the water boiled the steam passed through the gun-barrel, and when it came in contact with that part surrounded by the cold water in the keg it was condensed, and the fresh water trickled from the gun-barrel down through the funnel into the demijohn. It took several days to get this simple apparatus into practical operation, but when completed it answered the purpose. With the fire burning day and night it distilled five gallons a day, which gave two pints to each person. The calm continued until April 25th, so that in twenty days we had only moved thirty-two miles. The water was carefully guarded, and accurately measured to each person at eight bells in the morning. It became the standard of value by which all other things were measured. Spirits and tobacco had long before become the luxuries which money could not purchase. They yielded to the universal solvent, fresh water. When I read or think of what was done or said during that weary month I wonder at the thinness of the cloak of civilization that covers our original savage nature. Deprivation and hunger intensified selfishness in some. In others it created a disregard of a neighbor's rights. Others it made prudent, economical, and painstaking in preparing for a worse future. Those who liked liquor could now procure it with water. The use of the liquor but increased thirst. Some would stint and save from their allowance until they had accumulated a half dozen bottles; others would club together, make tea or coffee, have a good time, and then go thirsty until the next allowance was served out. Some soon found that life could be supported on two pints a day, and made this answer, neither seeking to save, to borrow, or to lend. In three weeks we were divided into classes. We had wealthy aristocrats, a middle class, and the unprovided poor. The aristocrats were those who had stinted themselves to save and accumulate, those who, from some peculiarity of constitution, required less water than others and could thereby save, and those who had liquor and tobacco to part with for water. The middle class comprised those who used no liquor or tobacco but would not try to save, feeling that they could not live on less than the two pints daily. The poor composed those who could not resist having a good time, who would part with water for brandy, and those who would evaporate it in making tea and coffee and drink at one time more than was necessary because it had thus been made more palatable. At last, on the night of the 25th, a breeze sprang up, and, close hauled to the wind, we pointed her bowsprit away from the infernal cauldron of the Gulf of Tehuantepec. But with sails close-hauled to the wind the fire in the galley stove burned badly, and not more than half the supply of water could be distilled. Next day our poor and middle classes suffered for their daily allowance. All day the wind continued in the same direction. Various plans were devised to improve the draft of the stove without practical success. Unless the wind changed, or the vessel altered her course, the supply of water would again be short the next day. The spirit of envy and jealousy was now aroused. Soon all those known not to have saved a supply of water were called to meet in the "dog watch" that evening, at the windlass. At this meeting eight were present, and various plans were proposed. A few urged that the Captain should be asked to change the course or "lay to," so that more water could be distilled; others argued that there was plenty of water, sufficient for all, if those who had it were made to divide it with those who were suffering; they contended that there was common danger of dying from thirst, and all alike should be made to share the danger; that each life was equally valuable, and that there should be no favored class; that water was a necessity of existence, and that no man had the right to control or monopolize the necessities of life, however obtained. We had as one of our number a sober, careful, prudent descendant of the Puritans named Dennis, who had stinted, economized, and saved, until he was wealthy in the possession of five pint bottles of water. At this meeting Dennis was denounced as being miserly and selfish, as a grasping monopolist, ungenerous and stingy, as the enemy of all those who were suffering, and it was proposed that this water should be taken from him and divided. Of course Dennis had not been invited to the meeting, neither had he been asked to relieve their necessities. I may add by way of parenthesis that Dennis is still living, the same prudent, sober, careful man; and now, after twenty-eight years, if water were sold at a dollar a bottle, he could, without using his credit, purchase more than half a million. If the improvident and unthrifty had been more numerous, we might have had our first serious difficulty, but no plan to despoil those who had saved and accumulated met the approval of all present at the meeting. The discussion continued until the watch was called which dissolved the assemblage, to meet again for definite action on the next night. At midnight the wind came around fair, and the Mary Jane was pointed for Cape St. Lucas. A roaring fire was made under the kettle, and the fresh water trickled into the demijohn in a shower of drops. The meeting was forgotten, and never again convened. We were on our course with a fresh breeze and all were happy, our only fear being that all the gold would be exhausted from the mines before we reached them. We entered the Golden Gate on the twenty-fifth of May, 1850, and cast anchor among a thousand sailless, idle vessels swinging listlessly with the tide. We sold vessel and cargo, divided the meagre proceeds and sought the mines. After twenty-eight years about half are left, scattered from Arizona to the Oregon line. The others "are with the saints, we trust." B. B. REDDING.

November 12, 1878.

The following legend is told concerning the introduction of lace-making in Flanders: A poverty-stricken but pious young girl was dying of love for a young man whose wealth precluded all hopes of marriage. One night as she sat weeping at her sad fate a beautiful lady entered the cottage, and, without saying a word, placed on her knees a green cloth cushion, with its bobbins filled with fine thread which on autumn evenings float in the air, and which the people call "fils de la Vierge." The lady, though of romantic bearing, was a practical manufacturer. She sat down in silence, and with her nimble fingers taught the unhappy maiden how to make all sorts of patterns and complicated stitches. As daylight approached the maiden had learned her art, and the mysterious visitor disappeared. The price of lace soon made the poor girl rich. She married the man of her choice, and, surrounded by a large family, lived happy and rich, for she kept the secret to herself. One evening, when the little ones were playing round her knee by the fireside, and her husband sat fondly watching the happy group, the lady suddenly made her appearance among them. Her bearing was distant; she seemed stern and sad, and this time addressed her protégé in a trembling voice, "Here," she said, "you enjoy peace and abundance, while without are famine and trouble. I helped you; you have not helped your neighbors. The angels weep for you and turn away their faces." So the next day the woman arose, and, going forth with a green cushion and its bobbins in her hands, went from cottage to cottage, offering to all who would be taught to instruct them in the art she had herself so miraculously learned. So they also became rich, and Belgium became famous for its manufacture.

The Inter-Ocean says: "Three young Chinamen are now studying law and will soon be admitted to the bar. Would it not make Denis Kearney 'rare' to have one of them prosecute him for his wash bill?" How absurd. Denis has no wash bills. He scorns them as the attributes of the "bald-headed, blue brimstone, bad smelling bondholders," who are likewise "lecherous, hell-born sons of damnation." While Conkling waves the bloody shirt Denis waves his dirty shirt, and a wash would ruin him.

TO A WOODPECKER.

O speckled saxon!
Pecking on the other side
Of lonely trees—
This one, the next one,
Rapping smartly; with a slide
Of ghostlike ease—
Eluding vision
Centred where you ought to be
And never are—
Prince of incision,
Rest thy surgeon's industry
And stop thy jar.
Thou fickle-fighted
Carpenter of tall decay,
Another time
I'll be delighted
To point thee worms all day
In vellumed rhyme.

SACRAMENTO, November 5, 1878. JOHN VANCE CHENEY.

Crows.

One day a crow,
Black as a sloe,
His breast foul thoughts enslaving,
Sat by a stream,
Where, in a beam,
A snow-white dove was laving.
"O dove elate!"
He cried with hate,
And shook with exultation—
"I'll make you black
As any hack
In my denomination!"
From out his breast
He plucked with zest
A plume, where he was sitting—
And fixed the thing
In the pure wing
Of the white dove, unwitting.
And then he flew
The valley through,
And out of grass and willows,
From fence and rock—
A graceless flock—
He called his dusky fellows.
Oh, rich the sight!
With shrill delight
They chatter all together:
"Good neighbors, see!
The white dove—she
Hath got a smutted feather!"
From out the woods
They drew the broods
Of doves, with their exclaiming;
Disturbed they stood,
Nor credence showed,
Nor spake aught to her shaming.
Loud screeched the crows,
The victim rose,
The wind dislodged the feather.
"We judged aright:
The dove is white,"
The fair ones cooed together.
If true we live,
The good will give
Their confidence to cheer us;
When slander's lie,
And hope would die,
Heaven's searching truth will clear us.

SAN RAFAEL, November 5. M. E. SUTHERLAND.

The Morning-Glory.

I planted, when a little child,
A morning-glory seed,
But when the first two leaves sprang up
I said: "Alas! a weed
Has come instead of my sweet flower!
These cloven, ill-shaped things
Are no more morning-glory leaves
Than my two arms are wings!"
And so for the mistaken seed
Childlike I grieved—till, lo!
The germ sent forth its truer life,
The leaf I'd learned to know.

Perhaps some lives that here have failed
Their truer selves may find
In the glory of the Morning
That leaves this world behind.

PORTLAND, Oregon, November 10. HENRIETTA R. ELIOT.

To a Dream.

O'er mountains and seas away,
Across the semblance of a day,
Within the vagueness of a night,
In airy visions rapt, bedight,
Beyond a mortal's ken or sight,
You wander in the land of dreams
Lit by the iridescent beams
Which fall through banks of shade.

Why dost thou listen, heart? To hear
Those voices lost—are they yet dear?
Why mount beyond the clouded spires,
Charmed to thy fate by unseen lyres,
To gaze unmoved on smouldering fires
Where rapt Oblivion has her seat,
And Darkness, Death, and Silence meet,
Whose colors never fade?

Return, O wanderer, return!
Seek rest within thy mortal urn.
Hast lost all love for it, or fears?
Why tempt the distance of those spheres,
Or wlog that phantom cloud which nears
A path to mortal souls untrod—
That highway of the awful God,
Of Nothingness and Death?

Return, O wanderer! Rest thy pinions
Within thine own, thy fair dominions,
Else, caught upon thy lonesome way
By some foul vision born to slay,
Thou fall an unresisting prey,
And this, thy house, the fair domain,
Returns to dust and naught again
Like some forgotten wraith.

BERKELEY, October 21, 1878. FRANK R. STARR.

PONY GLASSES OF FRENCH BRANDY.

Il faut croire au mariage comme à l'immortalité de l'âme.
—Balzac.

Je n'aime ni n'estime la tristesse, quoique le monde ait entrepris de l'honorer de faveur particulière. Ils en habillant la sagesse, la vertu, la conscience. Sot et vilain ornement.
—Montaigne.

L'expérience, c'est le nom que la plupart des hommes donnent à leurs folies et à leurs chagrins.—A. de Musset.

C'est une plaisante chose que la pensée dépende absolument de l'estomac, et que, malgré cela, les meilleurs estomacs ne soient pas les meilleurs penseurs.—l'oltair.

Les courtes absences animent l'amour, mais les longues le font mourir.—Mirabeau.

Se borner à parler sans cesse de son amour, pauvre moyen pour réussir! Si les discours flattent les femmes, les actions seules ont le pouvoir de les convaincre.—Ovide.

Le premier jour d'un aveu, l'on s'amuse,
Le second, on se plaint de l'importunité,
Le troisième, on écoute avec moins de fierté,
Le quatrième, en tremblant, on refuse,
Le cinquième, on se trouble, on résiste à demi,
Le sixième, en chemin, à regret, on s'arrête,
Le septième, l'on perd la tête,
Le huitième, tout est fini.

Une dame proposait à Chamfort de la marier avec une de ses amies. —Madame, répondit-il, il y a deux choses que j'ai toujours aimées à la folie, ce sont les femmes et le célibat. J'ai perdu la première passion, il faut que je conserve la seconde.

La contrainte est la mère des désirs.

Le mariage est quelquefois un licou qui attache l'homme et la femme au chagrin.—Erasm.

La chasteté est un trésor précieux que nous portons dans des vases d'argile.—L'éclésiaste.

Les femmes sont coquettes par état.—J. J. Rousseau.

Notre choix fait nos amitiés, mais c'est Dieu qui fait notre amour.—Mme. de Staël.

Un homme pieux disait: Si j'ignorais l'existence de Dieu, j'adorerais le soleil et les femmes.

Pourquoi donc ne vous mariez-vous pas, demandait-on à un célibataire endurci. —Le mariage, répondit-il, est une chose si sérieuse que ce n'est pas trop d'y penser toute sa vie.

On lisait à Rome l'inscription suivante sur le tombeau de deux époux: Arrête, passant, et vois la merveille! Un homme et sa femme qui ne se querellent pas.

LA MARCHANDE D'AMOURS.

—Venez, Monsieur, que je vous accommode,
Achetez-moi de ces oiseaux si doux
Qu'on nomme Amours. Voici l'amour jaloux, L'amour timide. —Ils ont passé de mode.
—L'amour grondeur, —Je le laisse aux époux.
—L'amour paisible. —Il n'est pas de mon âge.
—L'amour heureux. —Jour et nuit il s'endort.
Mais, dites-moi, n'auriez-vous pas en cage
L'amour constant? —De vieillesse il est mort.
—Sauve qui peut! Je prends l'amour volage.

En amour, ce sont moins les occasions qui nous manquent que nous qui les manquons.

L'oreille est le chemin du cœur, et le cœur l'est du reste.

Une dame qui avait montré beaucoup d'insensibilité envers un jeune homme qui lui avait offert ses hommages, ayant appris qu'il était allé les porter à une autre personne qui lui était inférieure de tous points, l'accueillit un jour avec des sarcasmes sur son bonheur de second ordre. —Madame, répondit-il, j'ai fini par m'apercevoir qu'il vaut mieux manger une pomme que de regarder toujours un ananas.

Aimer, c'est prier.

La prudence est l'hypocrisie de la pudeur.

L'amour est comme la rose que l'on cherche à cueillir en dépit des épines.

—Eh! bonjour mon ami, comment vous portez-vous?
—Très-bien, je vous remercie. —Et votre frère? —Il est marié depuis six semaines. —Marié! lui! oh, le pauvre garçon, moi qui l'avais laissé si bien portant!

Des zéphirs que Flore rappelle,
Je voulais chanter le retour;
Je vis Chloé... qu'elle était belle!
Je ne pus chanter que l'amour.
Je lui consacrai dès ce jour
Tous mes vœux, mes vers et ma lyre.
C'est pour Chloé que je respire,
Je ne chante qu'elle et l'amour.—Horace.

Tout ou rien, c'est la devise de l'amour.

On ne saurait trop aimer qui nous aime. Deux amis se recontrent.—Eh bien! dit l'un à l'autre, marié depuis six mois, es-tu heureux en ménage!—Ah! ne m'en parle pas, quand j'épousai ma femme, je l'aimais tant que je l'aurais mangée!—Et maintenant?—Maintenant? je regrette de ne pas l'avoir fait.

Au sermon, une femme parle très-haut à une de ses voisines assise à côté d'un monsieur qui sommeille. A la fin, le curé impatient l'interrompt ainsi:—Madame N., ne parlez donc pas si haut. Vous allez réveiller Monsieur N.

November 11, 1878.

L. G. J.

NOTICE.

The ARGONAUT is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Rates of Subscription, $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance. Postage prepaid. City subscribers served for 25 cents per week. Single copies, 10 cents.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."
 Branch Office, Cooper's Bookstore, 716 Market Street
 Agent at San Jose—F. A. Taylor.
 News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders should be addressed.

A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PINLEY, }
 FRED. M. SOMERS, } . . . . . Editors.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1878.

The ARGONAUT contains of late but little politics. It is becoming to us a hateful theme. But the exercise of political duties and the formation of correct political opinions are responsibilities that no good citizen in a republican form of government has a right to shirk or attempt to evade. We have but limited respect for the citizen who boasts that he is "no politician;" meaning thereby that he takes no interest in political affairs. There is in this State—and the class is growing in every other—a large and intelligent body of independent voters who owe no allegiance to party, and do not hold themselves bound by any rules of party discipline. It is to this class that we belong. By education, by conviction—and perhaps, in presence of the formation of a "solid South," we may say, by birth—we are Republican. We believe the Republican party has been the party of patriotism; that the country owes to it the fact, that it was not divided by the war of the slaveholder's rebellion. We believe it holds in its organization more of the honesty and intelligence of the nation than the Democracy. We believe its rank and file are more largely comprised of native-born Americans, and we believe native-born Americans are superior as citizens to any class that immigrates to us from foreign lands. Every act of Mr. Lincoln, and every act of his administration—reviewing them now in the light of history—we approve. The acts of General Grant, as military chieftain and President, we approve. The shortcomings of his administration are errors resulting from his misplaced confidence in bad men, which we overlook as mistakes and not crimes. The present administration is simply weak. It is honest; and in this respect no one doubts that the President is a safer and more prudent chief magistrate than his Democratic opponent would have been if elected. The finances of our nation are being honestly and intelligently administered. We are sustaining our honor, maintaining our credit, and paying our debts. Our foreign affairs are being so managed that we are avoiding diplomatic complications and upholding our national dignity. So that we have very good reason to hope that we may consult our personal wishes, and do our duty, by giving our support in national politics to the Republican party, reserving to ourselves the privilege of withdrawing that support if in our judgment the party shall not deserve it.

In State matters we shall even to a greater degree depend upon our own personal judgment in governing our political course. Of the politics of California we are thoroughly well informed, and we know the men who are leaders of all parties. We know the motives that govern them; we know the party history, and the party intrigues, the personal scheming, wire-pulling, and devilry of all the cliques and combinations. We are well advised of just what is going on to-day in political circles, and we know that in the Republican organization there is a profound intrigue on foot to make for the Republican party very mean and contemptible nominations. Men are aspiring to be nominated as Governor, as members of Congress, and for places on the State ticket, who are utterly unworthy of public promotion; men who are of bad habits, who have sold themselves in public life, who are dishonest, and who would steal if they had the opportunity, and who get drunk and gamble. Our allegiance to the Republican party will not induce us to give these men, nor any one of them, our vote or our support. If they carry the convention by intrigue and combination we will bolt the ticket, and support the Democracy, provided it has for its nominees better men. This sentiment is abroad in this State; this feeling will govern the votes of thousands of intelligent Republicans. The rank and file of the party is honest, thinks for itself, and will not be dictated to by the political harlots. The party drabs who make politics a business, live upon party intrigue, and thrive upon the pickings and stealings of office. For ourselves and for the class we claim to represent, and do represent, we demand fair play, open dealing, an honest convention, and decent nominations. California is a Republican State, and has been for twenty years. The Republican party is always successful, by a large majority, when it conducts itself honestly and decently, and is always beaten when it follows cliques and gives itself over to intrigue and dirty work. The same spirit that revolted against it and sent it to defeat still exists: the same men that rebelled and overwhelmed it still live, and the same determination is resolutely maintained to submit to nothing that is not manly, and fair, and honest. It may be that the congressional vote of California will be the controlling one in event of throwing the Presidential election into the House of Representatives. The next election may be a very important one. Let no one, however, think that there can be any party issue so prominent that the independent branch of the Republican party in California will submit to anything but fair play. The ARGONAUT aspires to become the organ of honest politics in this city and in this State. It will be either that or nothing.

The Republicans of the North affect to be very much surprised, and to feel great indignation, that the South has become solidly Democratic. The fact is, doubtless, to be regretted as calculated to keep alive the sectional strife, and for an indefinite period to prolong the political controversy that now exists. It is perhaps also to be regretted because it is likely to bring about a solid Republican North, presenting the anomaly of a great people dividing, not upon questions of local interests or governmental policy, but upon prejudices growing out of the war and color prejudices between two races. Yet it is not surprising that this condition of things exists. The South is Democratic not from choice, nor because that is the party with which its people would naturally affiliate, but from circumstances. The South held negro slaves, believed in slavery, prospered by this institution; its welfare was bound up in it. The North antagonized that condition of things, and in time, the question having become a political one and a war having grown out of it, the Republican party became pledged to its extinction. The Democratic party, in a half-hearted and inefficient way, became the apologist of slavery, and thus the ally of the Southern people. The war ended with victory over the South, over slavery, and over the Democracy. It left an angry feeling against the political party that had wrought the annihilation of its peculiar institution that had cost the South so much of blood and treasure, and had so humiliated its pride. This feeling was deeply intensified by the great mistake of the Republican party: that great party blunder and political crime that, having justly enfranchised slaves, gave to ignorant blacks political privileges and made them the law-makers, the magistrates, and the executive officers of their former masters. The people of the South resented this as an insolent endeavor of the victors to put upon them a social indignity. This was natural; any one would have resented it. There is not a Northern man of honest mind that under like circumstances would not have felt the same way. If California should become embroiled in a war concerning the Chinese of this State, and the result should be our defeat, and to the Chinese should be given political privileges which, with a majority of numbers, would enable them to elect a Chinese Legislature, a Chinese Supreme Court, send a Chinaman to Congress, and place the administration of municipal law under the control of Chinamen, and the police star upon the breast of the Chinese, is it probable that we would meekly kiss the hand that smote us this political blow? And if from Washington there came a band of mercenary carpet-baggers to stir these heathen to the exercise of their rights that they might plunder the people, and grow rich by the loot of office, would we welcome them? If the Government should send soldiers and arms to enforce with bayonets and the show of power this tan-colored supremacy, is it likely we would patiently endure it with patriotic forbearance and Christian resignation? We take it that the Southern people are about an average sample of Americans, and that they have done, and are doing, and will continue to do, just about that which Northern men would do under like circumstances.

There is great irritation at the South; less now than ten years ago. The policy of President Hayes has worked well, and is still working well. The South is solidly Democratic, but we fancy that it is about as well for the whole country that it should be so, as that we should have a darky preacher in the Senate from Mississippi, a negro barber and blackleg from Louisiana, and a few members ranging in color from ebony black to pumpkin yellow in Congress. We do not perhaps estimate at its full value the voting privilege in the hands of the ignorant blacks, and are not perhaps as indignant as we ought to be at the intimidation that keeps the electoral urn out of the control of the mass of black ignorance that swarms in certain southern localities. We are not defending white Democratic riots, nor whisky-drinking patriotism upon the part of that kind of chivalry that is proportionately brave as its opponents are black, unarmed, and defenseless. Perhaps we do not quite fully believe all the stories of Southern violence that come to us by way of Washington about election times; nor quite credit the fresh blood clots that are added to the Republican party shirt just as it becomes necessary to elevate it as the party banner. We think, on the whole, considering the past history of our nation, and the relations borne by the South to the North, that the Southern people are doing very well; we believe in continuing to let them alone a little longer. The Democratic party can not live at the South as a united organization except by the pressure of Northern interference. When that ceases the party will go to pieces. Local dissensions will divide it, jealousies will grow up among party leaders, local questions will arise, and when the color prejudice has worn away the black vote will be solicited, and will be divided between contending factions. The people of the South are naturally anti-Democratic. In a few years there will be coming to Congress and to the Senate "independent" members, and they will on all general questions vote with the party of gentlemen, of patriots, of intelligence, of Americans, and thus strengthen the great national Republican party, in the preservation and building up of which is involved the best interests of all parts of the republic.

It is desirable that the next Presidential election should pass off with less of party and sectional feeling than was displayed at the last one. Our nation was never in greater danger than when, after election day had passed, the country stood in doubt as to who was rightfully chosen its President. It was a dark hour when the country, driven to the alternative of choosing between force and a peaceful compromise, was pausing in doubt between the two. The most desperate day of the rebellion was bright and hopeful in comparison with this most perilous and eventful hour. Happily the danger was passed by a very questionable settlement, with the result of which the South has never been satisfied, and the North has never been convinced was honest. Under the questionable conditions involved in securing his office, Mr. Hayes had no other alternative presented him than a peace policy toward the South. The withdrawal of troops, of Federal officials, of carpet-baggers, has always seemed to us both wise, just, and politic. To let the South alone, and leave the political and industrial relations between the races to adjust themselves, seemed to us to be the only honest course that could have been pursued. It has been successful. There is order reigning throughout the South; there is comparatively but little friction now between the races; affairs are adjusting themselves upon a rational and natural basis. Labor and capital are in harmony, land and labor are coming into friendly relations, and society is adjusting itself as it would never do if disturbed by Federal interference, the show of bayonets, or the exhibition of military power. It is true that within the past few weeks we have heard of Democratic white insolence at Republican meetings in South Carolina; we have been informed of intimidations in Louisiana, and the election returns seem to indicate that the negro had not been fairly dealt with politically. But we accept those stories as likely to be exaggerated and of suspicious authenticity. We shall expect them to fly thick and fast in the next Presidential election. This is the kind of political material that fires the party heart and makes possible a solid Republican North. If the Democratic party leaders were not beetle-headed lunatics—greedy, selfish, narrow-minded, jealous fools—there might be a possibility that out of all this party chaos there might come national order and safety. There are men in the Democratic party who, if called to the front, could achieve a Presidential victory, and one that would not be a national calamity. There are moderate men in the South whose councils would be patriotic, and whose administration of political affairs would be safe and honorable. Unfortunately for that party and the country, these men are not in party power and their counsels are not heeded. Quite another kind of men are at the party front. The leadership of the national Democratic party is in the hands of political criminals, ultra, impenitent, and fanatical rebels, foreign adventurers, desperate, dishonest, political party knaves.

Hence it is not improbable that the North—alarmed, fearful of misrule, of local dissensions, and of a possible renewal of the civil war; jealous of disturbing again the order and quiet that seems to have settled down upon the country; afraid of disturbing the progress and material prosperity that appears to have been again inaugurated; anxious lest this spark of communism, agrarianism, and social discontent should be fanned into a burning flame—should again call to the chief magistracy of the nation one who has demonstrated his capacity in civil administration and his chieftainship in more troublous times. This state of affairs alone could result in the nomination and reelection of Grant.

It is amusing to watch the wild waving of hands over the buzzing of the Chinese Bee in the journalistic bonnet. Seward, too, is a gadfly of uncomfortable dimensions, and, refusing to sip the cheap logic of the newspapers here, is being roundly and soundly abused for having a mind of his own, and presuming to take the broad instead of the narrow view of our much mixed Mongolian problem.

PRATTLE.

In Nebraska they are crossing the various breeds of barnyard cattle with the bison—or buffalo, as we all prefer to call it, on the principle that it is just as well to call a dog a cat as anything—and have already nearly succeeded in eliminating the “hump” from the newly produced creature, which, nevertheless, is very like a bison. This shows ye, statesmen, what might be done by man to correct the extravagance of nature in your case. In two or three generations your ears would be considerably reduced by judicious crossings with the jackass.

On the evening of All Saints' Day the cemetery at San Buenaventura was brilliantly illuminated, in accordance with an old Spanish custom. The dead who were living there were deeply touched by the compliment, and manifested their sense of it all they knew how: their liquids prattled more merrily along the water-pipes, and their gases, endowed with a new levity, possessed the atmosphere with a more eloquent emanation. Zymotic diseases are the language in which the dead address the living.

If Tennyson had not written we should still have had Mrs. Windle. It is better to have both, but it would be good to have either. It is from Mrs. Windle that I prefer to learn the story of Excalibur, which, it may be well enough to explain to the unlearned (people who have read the Call without profit), was a sword with “a winking hilt,” and “a blade of thrustful, deffful scope.” This extraordinary arm a maiden carries down to the bottom of the sea, and “divines its knight.”

“Then rears her alta-conch at morn,
Whose telephone he hears,
And comes as proud as purchased scorn,
And soft as pity's tears.”—

Which, by the way, it would be charitable to shed right here; you will never find a person who better deserves them than this poor lady whom her friends lack either the sense to persuade or the power to restrain.

If there is no hell what follows? That the delights of heaven are by no means uniform, and range from the ecstatic down to the merely endurable. This is a necessity of human nature. Reader, it is not conceivable that you and I are to have in the next world no greater happiness than the editor of the Call, who never hesitates to use the editor's malevolent power of unbalancing a human intellect by a confirming nod. I am quite serious: every time that an editor accepts and prints literary matter of a worthless kind from an amateur writer he does its author an irreparable injury. In weak and intractable minds the rage for writing once kindled is inextinguishable; each gratification is a new incitement, and the luckless fool's ambition, which like the Lord's Prayer might once have been inscribed upon a nut-shell, grows by indulgence until the wall of a mad-house is too narrow for its display.

I knew a lady of good social position and considerable property who was devastated body and soul by getting a story about a boarding-house into a country newspaper. It fired her heart with literary ambition, and she married the editor. This miscreant no sooner got hold of her money than he used it to sell out his paper, and was compelled to become the Prime Minister of a hog ranch while she was still a comparatively young woman. The last time I saw the poor creature she had straws in her hair, and her hair in her eyes; and informing me that six times seven was a hole in the ground she inquired if I thought the class-leader of the ARGONAUT would accept an epicure on the Modoc war. Suggesting the superior poetic justice of an epicure on toast, I backed away.

With a view to somewhat lighten the labor of “committees on resolutions of respect,” the following are deferentially submitted as models. The introduction of rhymes, it is thought, will give a novel value to this kind of literature; as the note of the swan has an added charm when sung, although it kills the poor bird to sing it;

Whereas, kind Providence was willing To take A. B. without a shilling—
Resolved, that his lamented death
Quite takes (as it took his) our breath.
Resolved, our sympathy we grant
To his wife's mother's cousin's aunt,
Resolved, his love and care surrounded
The Ancient Order that he founded.
Resolved, our loss is his great gain—
We'll ask his monthly dues in vain.
Resolved, the members of this Order
Wear handkerchiefs with a black border,
And at his funeral all weep,
Let none presume to fall asleep.

Constrained by future events to expound his policy and announce its successor, the President utters his understanding to the following effect: “I endeavored by doing my whole duty to make the South Republican; the experiment, having failed, will be discontinued. It cost me the support of the most powerful men in the party, but for the defection and treason of these hell-born miscreants I feel no resentment. Henceforth I shall enforce the laws of the United States, even against those who break them, for I can better endure the unjust accusation of cherishing partisan antipathies than I can the sight of a Southern Democrat. The sun of the agricultural fair has forever set in the politics of this country; the régime of toast-and-psalmody is behind us. Let the drums beat, and if any man attempt to haul down the bloody shirt spot him on the snout!”

On Monday evening last, a man
From China, just arrived to San Francisco, walking out with glee
To sate his queerness,
Perceived a monstrous, surging crowd
Denouncing some one with a loud
And terrible displeasure; so
He stood aside to see the show.
Next day, conversing with a John
Who'd long resided here, upon
The things he'd seen, he said: “My friend”—
They both spoke English; I contend
That Chinamen, when they're alone,
Speak any language but their own.
The reason—if you wish to learn it
Try theirs, you'll mighty soon discern it.
And so the stranger said: “My friend,
It was my pleasure to attend
An indignation meeting. Bless
My soul! they're bitter here. I guess,
On foreigners, and wish to throne
In pow'r their Yankee selves alone.
And it appears to me that they
Are cruelly severe on Bay.”
“On Bay?—severe on Bay?—who's he?”
“Why, Colonel Bay.” “Oh! Colonel Bee,
He calls it.” “But they called it Bay!”
“I daresay—that's their Yankee way.”

“Isn't it pretty near time for Governor Irwin's proclamation appointing a day of fasting and prayer in remembrance of the late lamented English grammar?”—Evening Post. The prayer could probably be managed, but as for the fasting, why, if all the men who knew and loved the deceased should meet at one table, there would not be enough of them to let alone the smallest beefsteak.

Speaking of the Post, I am reminded that in writing, the other day, of “Doppelkreuz,” the musical critic of that journal, I rather broadly implied that he was a liar. In his article of last Saturday, “Doppelkreuz” has the fairness to explain that he was misled into making an untrue statement, and I, therefore, withdraw my offensive remarks. This I do the more cheerfully because, although my respect for this gentleman's talent had made me covet him as an enemy (heaven knows my penury of enemies with brains), this revelation of his candor suggests the superior advantage of his favor. I have had some experience in intellectual hostilities, and of all antagonists the candid one is the one whom I least like to encounter.

Candor is not only a sign of power, it is an element; for, like the grace-thrust of the swordsman in the story, it is so captivating to the arbiters that even though bloodless it will win the crown unless met with a parry of equal charm. Candor can be overcome only by superior candor, and in him who has it not by nature the effort kills—his heart is broken in his body. Candor is the garrison's lime-light flooding their own defenses to encourage the assailants. It is that ominous message, “Sir, I am weak in cavalry, but let us engage.” It is the “Gentlemen of the Guard, fire first,” of Fontenoy—was it not? One's most contemptible enemies confess one's errors; it is the really formidable fellow who admits his own.

Bob Ingersoll's new lecture—“Some Mistakes of Moses”—forth has come!
Wherever Moses, Bob, did make,
From lack of knowledge, a mistake,
God made as bad an error, quite,
In naming you to set it right.

A propos de rien, the Chicago Journal has discovered “a clashing of poetic thought: Southey says: ‘All things are that seem;’ but Longfellow says: ‘And things are not what they seem.’” I don't remember the Southey dictum, but the Longfellow proposition happens to be one of three spicified assertions which he forbids us to make. The Journal man has not only found a mare's nest, but appears to have been born in one.

The Secretary of State has promised Senator Sargent to obtain, if possible, the Chinese Ambassador's views on the question of Chinese immigration. He may spare himself the trouble, if he fears it will give him any; the Ambassador has already “defined his position” in the matter with something of oriental ingenuity, but with unmistakable meaning. A gentleman now in this city, Mr. Charles Arne Webster, of Cambridge, Massachusetts, informs me that he met His Excellency at the house of a friend of Mrs. Webster in Washington, and ventured (with some audacity, one would think) to ask him if he favored unrestricted immigration to this country from his own. The Ambassador without a moments' hesitation replied: “I come to Melica, fleely, alltime, much I like, hap good time. How I say: ‘One mo' Chinaman no come; Melicans no like. Heap go back, you sunnygun! Dam!”

Beginning at about this time every year, all the newspapers here and hereabout publish with fatigueless persistence the information that in cooking fresh mushrooms they should be stirred with a silver spoon. If there are any murderous ones among them the forehanded spoon will promptly go into mourning. Well, it won't; the test is entirely worthless, and in families that put faith in it there will be worms'-meat and plenty of it. I feel, however, that I owe an apology to my editor for saving life on this page of the paper.

France, England, Portugal, renew
Their war on other's vices,
To make Dahomey's king eschew
His human sacrifices.

Lo! through the wrong the right arrives!
Of power when they've bereft him
He'll need and cherish the few lives
Their sabres will have left him.

“And so, Brown, the doctors did not quite know what ailed your father.” “No, but he was getting no better, and they decided on performing one of those dreadful surgical operations in which the patient's life depends upon the chance that they have correctly diagnosed his disease; it would either cure him or kill him instantly.” “Well?” “Well, they have just performed it.” “And was it successful?” “It was a perfect fiasco!”

The Rev. Mr. John W. Ricks,
He bigamied once too many
With Pepper (Miss Sally)
And Peckham (Miss Polly)
And got himself into a secular fix.
“Twere better not bigamy any.”

For Sally Pepper she peppered him well,
And Polly Peckham she pecked him,
Till his life was so bot
That he up'd and he got Away to the House of Correction to dwell,
And bade the Corrector correct him.

In a poem which, from its severe restraint and its icily classical diction, I take to be Mr. Joaquin Miller's (though from its contemplative piety I might think it Mr. Charles Warren Stoddard's), the bard beautifully apostrophizes Italy as the “Mother of Monks!” It is to be hoped the dear old lady is proud of her progeny; after Cæsar, Cicero, Marcus Aurelius, and that litter—Petrarch, Dante, Tasso, and similar fry—the world had a right to expect that in mothering again she would make a supreme effort. I fancy I see her standing in attitude of benediction among her latest brood, passing her hands caressingly over their gleaming tonsures as if they were keys of an organ and she were executing upon them some glorious religious anthem. But away down under their blubber the juices of the fat rogues are dancing merry measures and their hearts footing it fealty to “The Devil's Dream.”

In point of historical fact, Italy is not the mother of monks; the monastic system was founded in the fourth century by Pachomius, an Egyptian. Owing to the obvious superiority of the cenobitic to the ascetic method of doing good, the system was so popular that before its founder (unfortunately) died Egypt had the advantage of 76,000 monks and 27,000 nuns, who lived in holy contemplation of their great toes, to the incalculable profit of humanity and civilization.

The monastic system, however, destroyed the stylistic, and for that it is difficult to forgive it. To sit for sequent years exalted atop of a pillar in all weather, with never a clean shirt nor a fair-minded meal, seems to me the most beautiful, as it is no doubt the most acceptable, form of Christian life and service. It is too nice for anything.

How I “made it to stocks” I explained to my dear:
“I'd a corner in ‘Julia’”—artlessly here
The lady corrected me ere I could warn her;
“You mean you had ‘Julia,’ sir, in a corner,
Why should I have laughed? But I did, and, O my!
The thunder and lightning that fell from her eye!
But I cooled with this calm disavowal her blood:
“Small margins of fancy don't signify ‘mud.”

A “good understanding” is now said to exist between the Emperors of Russia and Austria.

All monarchs are wise in the fancies of fools who have seen 'em;
Behold two crowned heads with but one understanding between 'em!

By the way it's a lucky thing for the rest of us that the good understandings between kings do not very much outlast those among thieves, whose alliances are dissolved by prosperity and adversity alike; for if successful they quarrel over the booty, and if caught inform on one another as witnesses for the State. Even when royal alliances have a religious basis it is not much better; when Philip of France and Richard of England set out to conquer the Holy Land it was stipulated in their treaty of friendship that they should meet with their armies at Messina. They did so and instantly fell to fighting! Had their good understanding continued many a brave lad who turned up his toes at Messina would have gone farther and fared—well, about the same.

Le Figaro, jocundest journal,
Declares the Chinese must go,
But adds, with a frankness infernal,
Whence, whither, and wherefore none know.

The Chinamen question, good neighbor,
Is simple as any can be:
How stop them from selling us labor,
And make them keep selling us tea?

THE LATEST MAGAZINE VERSES.

Glamour.

Come out of doors, O mother, and see what a wonder is here:
Up through the snows of the mountain the flowers of spring appear.
Come out on the roof, O mother, and see how along the ravine
The glacier ice is covered with the springtime's leafy green!

There are no flowers, my daughter; 'tis only because thou art young
That blossoms from under the mountain-snows appear to thee to have sprung.
There is no grass on the glacier; the blades do not even start;
But thou art in love, and the grass and flowers are springing in thy heart.

—“Unwritten Literature of the Caucasus,” in Lippincott's.

Holiday.

Half-Greek adown the Highland glen
And singing to the open sky,
I passed beyond the ways of men
And found my vale in Arcady.

The bees were drowsy on the slope,
The air was wondrous sweet and still,
And all my heart beat high with hope
Of marvels on the Grecian hill.

The light cloak from my shoulder flew,
My bare brown limbs were light and free;
The lark, whose rapture thrilled me through,
Was but a singing bird to me;

For I was Greek in Hellas' prime,
And singing to the clear, bright air,
And Grecian bees were in the thyme
And the lost charm in all things fair.

Hills beyond hills from blue to gray
Faint to the misty highland sky,
But I have been an hour away
In my own vale of Arcady.

From tree to tree the whisper creeps,
“Look, sister, at the wayward man!
His are the eyes of one who sleeps
Within the vale Arcadian.”

“Hush, hush!” the pine-tree sighs, “and look.”
The lav'rock peeps from heather sweet,
And headlong streams the highland brook
To break in laughter at my feet.

J. S., in Blackwood's Magazine.

Enamored Architect of Airy Rhymer.

Enamored architect of airy rhyme,
Build as thou wilt, heed not what each man says,
Good souls, but innocent of dreamers' ways,
Will come, and marvel why thou wastest time;
Others, beholding how thy turrets climb
Twixt theirs and heaven, will hate thee all their days;
But most beware of those who come to praise.
O wonder-smith, O worker in sublime
And heaven-sent dreams, let art be all in all!
Build as thou wilt unspoiled by praise or blame,
Build as thou wilt, and as thy light is given;
Then, if at last the airy structure fall,
Dissolve, and vanish, take thyself no shame—
They fail, and they alone, who have not striven.

T. B. ALDRICH.

“The Swelling Sea.”

[FROM THE OANISH.]

The birds of the North flew onward,
The lichen its odor shed;
The crescent moon was pale
As a water-lily dead—
Torn from its parent stem and floating
For weeks on its watery bed.

The northern light burned brightly—
The circle was broad and low;
The rays were like whirling pillars of fire,
With green and crimson glow.

The dying man lay in his hut—
“Oh, where shall we bury thee?
Shall we bury thee on the mountain,
Or under the swelling sea?”

“Shall we bury thee on the mountain,
In the eternal snow,
Where the spirits of the mist shall dance
While thou liest still below?”

“Or wilt thou be sunk in the sea—
The blue and swelling sea?
The birds of the tempest shall whirl above,
And the seals play merrily.
He mournfully smiled, and whispered low,
“In the sea, the swelling sea.”

JANET FRASER.

Brahma.

[TRANSLATED FROM OSHELAEEDIN RUMI BY RITTER.]

I am the mote in the sunbeam, and I am the burning sun;
“Rest here!” I whisper the atom; I call to the orb, “Roll on!”

I am the blush of the morning, and I am the evening breeze;
I am the leaf's low murmur, the swell of the terrible seas;

I am the net, the fowler, the bird, and its frightened cry,
The mirror, the form reflected, the sound and its echo, I;

The lover's passionate pleading, the maiden's whispered fear,
The warrior, the blade that smites him, his mother's heart-wrung fear;

I am intoxication, grapes, wine-press, and must, and wine,
The guest, the host, the tavern, the goblet of crystal fine;

I am the breath of the flute, I am the wind of man,
Gold's glitter, the light of the diamond, and the sea-pearl's lustre wan;

The rose, her poet nightingale, the songs from his throat that rise,
Flint sparks, the taper, the moth that about it flies.

I am both Good and Evil; the deed and the deed's intent,
Temptation, victim, sinner, crime, pardon, punishment;

I am what was, is, will be; creation's ascent and fall;
The link, the chain of existence; beginning and end of all.

ÆSTHETIC NUPTIALS.

Sir Babington Ogle was an æsthetic young man, who wore his hair down his back and talked of the higher culture. He delighted in the finer kinds of modern blank verse, as blank of meaning as of rhythm, and turned up his eyeballs voluptuously before pictures of scraggy, cadaverous women, drawn, not from life, but apparently from death, in dissecting rooms. To dissent upon the Greeks (not those of to-day) and their beautiful religions, to have a consumptive wife dressed in sage-green, to lie on his back and wonder whether there was not an “Eighth Lamp” of architecture overlooked by Ruskin, and to comport himself generally like a gentleman in need of physic—such seemed to be Sir Babington's ideals of life.

He had published a small book of poems, which many mammas and their daughters pronounced quite too delightful; and he appeared to have become the centre of a coterie of enthusiastic young women who looked upon him with languishing adoration. Sir Babington, however, possessed £15,000 a year, and this makes a man cautious. He accepted female homage without repaying it in kind, just like a statue on a pedestal. Perhaps he had caught some fair æsthetic one yawning over his poems; perhaps he had discovered a hollow ring in the voices that chorused assent so glibly to everything he said. Anyhow, he was wont to complain of the false-heartedness of society, and he was as expert in keeping out of matrimonial traps as an old coon out of gunshot.

Sir Babington had a friend who did not admire the baronet's æstheticism, which he vulgarly called “bosh.” This fellow, one Jubb, whom Sir B. playfully styled the Ostrogoth, professed ideas of the most primitive Philistinism as to the duties of men with money. If he had had his way they would always have been looking after their estates, riding, killing game, and eating beef.

Jubb's temple of culture was the Agricultural Hall on a Show-day. As to women, his taste ran toward the fleshly school of Rubens, and he would parody Shakspeare, saying:

Let me have maids about me that are fat,
Sleek-headed girls and such as love to laugh,
You Culla has a lean and dismal look,
She sighs too much: such girls ain't weddable.

An old comradeship, dating from Eton Christ Church, allowed Jubb to speak out his mind candidly to Ogle—a privilege which he never let rust for want of using. So one day when the pair were conversing together about what the younger Dumas calls l'eternel féminin, the Ostrogoth elicited that the Baronet had the ambition of being “loved for himself,” like the Lord of Burleigh. “Oh, what next?” exclaimed matter-of-fact Jubb, whose face was like a full cheese. “Why, Babby [pet for Babington] just consider what manner of man you are, and ask yourself whether any woman with eyes and ears can fancy your gloomy phiz and pedantic jargon. Be content to take a girl who'll marry you for your money and fall to liking you afterward, when she has changed you into a new creature. I promise you she won't be long about it.”

“Povero!” muttered Babby, indulgently, as he blew a puff from a pink cigarette ceilingward, “you think all women are creatures of matter. You have never heard of the affinity of souls?”

“No; where can you buy it?” asked the Ostrogoth ironically.

“You can't find it in the mephitic atmosphere of a society where sordid calculations about money grow over men's and women's minds like the most inodorous kitchen-garden produce—onions, to wit—upon a fat soil,” answered Babby, elegantly. “Give me a girl who shall love me at sight, and be loved, owing to the mute contact of our hidden sympathies—a girl full of soul and yet uncorrupted by fashion, beautiful yet modest, poor but not greedy of pelf. . . .”

“Don't you wish you may get her?” grumbled Jubb.

“Oh, she exists somewhere,” ejaculated Sir Babington, half closing his eyes as if gazing into an ideal world. “She is my affinity, and we are fated to meet.”

“Well, I'll help you look for her if you like,” answered the Ostrogoth with an uncultured laugh; and he slapped the Baronet's thigh so smartly that the latter gave a jump and a yell. Then he walked out, repeating: “Affinities, onions, mute sympathies—why, the fellow is as cracked as a bell!”

In saying that he would help Babby to discover his “affinity,” the Ostrogoth was only joking, but as he wended his way through the streets a diabolical idea occurred to him of a sudden. Amongst his very miscellaneous acquaintance shone a young actress, “Miss Gildersleeve,” née Moggie Lightfoot. She was a pretty, light-hearted baggage, who had the merriest heart, and the finest appetite for diamonds, consols, champagne, and other such trifles. Quick-witted, too, she understood a wink as well as a nod, and never required to be told twice which way her interests lay. Jubb and she were old friends, and there was nothing in a small way which she would not do to gratify him.

Jubb called on Miss Gildersleeve and said: “Look here, Moggie, can you play at virtue, true love, and the rest of it, for three weeks or so—just long enough to net a fool, and cure him of his folly?”

“The game is hardly worth the candle,” replied Miss Gildersleeve. “One fool more or less won't hurt.”

“I'll make the game worth your while,” said the Ostrogoth.

“That's another thing,” answered Miss Moggie. “Unfold your plan.” And she proceeded to listen very attentively while the Ostrogoth explained that he wished his friend Babby to fall in love with her. He would contrive a meeting between them. She would have to play the part of an æsthetic orphan living on a small annuity, but taking lessons at South Kensington with a view to performing high jinks in the spheres of art. Babby must not suspect her of being mercenary or anything else that was prosy; she must study Ruskin, and try to look grave and forlorn. For this purpose it would be well that she should do Banting a little, seeing that she was growing a trifle plump.

“Let be,” said Moggie; “I can manage this matter without living on rusks. You say the man has fifteen thousand a year?”

“Yes, but that's no business of yours; for mind, this is only a joke.”

“Of course,” answered Moggie. “And he is a baronet?”

“Yes; but I say, Mog, no nonsense, you know,” said the Ostrogoth, with a sudden misgiving. “Babby is an old chum of mine, and I don't want him to come to any harm. If you're thinking of becoming Lady Ogle, you're mistaken. Babby believes in ‘affinities,’ and I want to cure him once and for all, but nothing more.”

“All right,” said Moggie, and she winked. Her light hair was fluffed all over her forehead like a poodle's, and her blue eyes shone with a droll light, demure and mocking.

She looked at that moment a very knowing poodle; and when the Ostrogoth had departed she snapped her fingers after him; then she approached a cheval-glass and took a long and careful survey of herself.

A month after this Sir Babington Ogle had had his hair cut, and was wearing a proper-looking coat, hat, and gloves like the Philistines. Nobody had bidden him thus renounce the garments of high culture, but it is noticeable that when a man is in love he tries to look his best, and somehow drops into observance of the prevailing fashions, whether æsthetic or not. Sir Babington had fallen deeply in love with Miss Moggie Lightfoot, and he flattered himself that she believed him to be nothing more than a government clerk with £200 a year. As for her, he thought her a Miss Ida Beauregard, an artist of lovely talent, who would one day eclipse Burne-Jones, and who meanwhile had let her virgin heart catch fire at the flame of his looks and burning discourse.

How had they met? One day, as he strolled through Kensington Gardens, dreaming of rhymeless verses, colorless paintings, lifeless women, or what not, an æsthetically attired maiden (bronze-brown dress, etc.), passing by him with a drawing portfolio under her arms, had suddenly stumbled and fainted. Perhaps it was the heat; perhaps too æsthetic diet; anyhow, Sir Babington raised the fair sufferer in his arms, and leading her to a seat, chafed her hands, sprinkled her face with water, and presently had the satisfaction of seeing her recover consciousness, and beam gratitude on him through the softest pair of blue eyes ever set in a maiden's face. As a crowd had gathered to stare at the affecting scene, Sir Babington offered the fair one his arm, and conducted her out of the gardens to a cab; and there the interview ended for the day. But “Miss Beauregard” had given an address to her preserver, and the next day he called there to inquire how her health was faring.

From that time Sir Babington was as one caught by the ears. The deep change that had suddenly been effected in him was illustrated by the fact that twenty-four hours had not elapsed after his first visit before he had placed himself unreservedly in the hands of the hair-cutter. Three days afterward he had a new suit of clothes, and was waiting outside the South Kensington Museum at the hour when the pupils from the School of Art come out. The next day, and the next, and for three days after that he was waiting there again, till at length, some ten days having elapsed, his friend the “Ostrogoth,” noticing the alterations that had taken place in him, thought the time had come for having a joke at his expense.

Be sure the Ostrogoth had laughed in his sleeve to see how well Miss Moggie had played his cards; but, as we know, he did not want matters to be pushed too far. He only desired to explode the doctrine of affinities.

Alas, man proposes, but it is woman who disposes. When a man enters into partnership with a member of the other sex he must expect to her to look after the profits and keep them. It was a fine sunny morning when the Ostrogoth called at Sir Babington's chambers for the purpose of informing him of the hoax that had been played. He was in some trepidation from wondering how Babby would relish the revelation, but he trusted to cheek to carry him through.

Sir Babington's valet ushered him in at once, and there in Babby's study sat the Baronet and Moggie side by side. And Moggie had a white bonnet with orange-flower blossoms in it.

“Ah! here's my best friend,” cried Babby, rising radiant.

“Here, Jubb, let me introduce you to my wife!”

“What!” cried the Ostrogoth, feeling the room spin round him.

“Yes, we were married privately this morning,” said Babby, in triumph; “short engagements are best, are they not, Ida darling? Here, shake hands with my best friend, Jubb.”

“Happy to make your acquaintance,” said the new Lady Ogle, with a true bridal smile and blush.

The Ostrogoth, of course, kept his secret, and Miss Gildersleeve, alias Lightfoot, alias Beauregard, made Babby a capital wife.—London Truth.

In the bill of declaration of rights Dr. O'Donnell proposes to insert the following clause: “God created all men free and equal who are eligible to become American citizens.”

A large delegation of Chinese are preparing to emigrate to Ireland as the only country where the Irish are powerless to influence unfriendly legislation against them.

Distinguished Divine (to recent convert)—“We propose to baptize you by the Turkish bath method. It is really the only means to scrub your years of sin out of you!”

If electricity forms the aurora borealis, and is powerful enough to light up half a hemisphere, why may it not be utilized to light cities?

The pithy paragraph rightly thrown brings down Goliath.

Bill of Fare for Six Persons.—Sunday, November 17, 1898.

Chicken Gumbo.
Boiled Barracouta, Genoise Sauce.
Lima Beans. Celery.
Beefsteak. Mashed Potatoes.
Roast Pork, Apple Sauce.
Jerusalem Artichoke Salad.
Charlotte Russe.

Fruit-bowl of Apples, Grapes, Pears, and Bananas.

HOW TO MAKE GENOISE SAUCE.—Put two ounces of butter in a small saucepan. Set it on the fire, and when melted, mix in a tablespoon of flour; stir for a minute, add a quarter of a carrot sliced; stir occasionally, and when nearly fried add a pint of broth, half a pint of claret wine, a small onion and a clove of garlic chopped, two cloves, a bay leaf, two stalks of parsley, one of thyme, salt, and pepper. Boil gently about one hour and three quarters, and strain. Put it again upon the fire with about half an ounce of butter. Boil gently about ten minutes and it is ready for use.

Treat served with Genoise sauce is considered a recherche dish.

INTAGLIOS.

Regret.

He offered a kiss in the morning—
I coldly turned away;
For an idle word that I overheard
Had rankled a night and day.
I knew in truth it was nothing
That he would have blushed to own,
That point and sting of the trifling thing
Grew out of my heart alone.

But a vexed, unquiet spirit
Weighs no matter aught,
And the sore smart of a jealous heart
Puts reason out of sight.
I let him go in the morning
Without the kiss he sought;
And the day was long, but I nursed my wrong
With many a bitter thought.

One bitter thought, God help me!
Did not enter my brain,
That kiss of mine, by word or sign,
Would bring me so much pain.
But as the evening shadows gathered
My heart began to yearn,
With a quickened sense of its influence,
And I longed for his return.

Leaning against the window
That overlooked the street,
I strained my ear his step to hear
In the crowd of hurrying feet.
Far off in the dimmest distance,
I should have known it well;
But there came instead a muffled tread,
And the sharp alarm of the bell.

Some griefs, though deep and bitter,
Find at last their cures,
But some retain the old, old pain
As long as life endures.
I did not know in the morning
When I coldly turned away,
That I should miss and mourn that kiss
Down to my dying day.

A Song of Modern Love.

Give me that branch of lilac, dear,
Full of what sweet crushed fragrances!
Out of your breast, as if so near
It lay to where your breathing is
That it is perfumed with your breath!
I would be caught but what I am,
Your lover—just no less, no more.
I would not have the right to claim
One flower, and lose the right to implore;
With joys possessed, such sorrow entereth.

I take the flower pleaded for,
And it becomes my very own.
Where is its charm? Upon the floor
I strew the poor bruised blossoms down,
And he may gather them who will.
I touch your hand—to let it go!
I kiss your lips—and turn aside,
And know that if it were not so,
Long, long ago our love had died:
God save your lord that I may love you still!
—London World.

Defiance.

Catch her and hold her if you can;
See, she defies you with her fan,
Shuts, opens, and then holds it spread
In threatening guise above your head.
Ah! why did you not start before
She reached the porch and closed the door?
Simpleton! will you never learn
That girls and time will not return!
Of each you should have made the most;
Once gone, they are forever lost.
In vain your knuckles knock your brow;
In vain will you remember how
Like a slim brook the gamesome maid
Sparkled, and ran into the shade.
WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR.

My Lady's Crown.

She has not that rare beauty which the most
Of women have whom men consider fair,
Yet, fairest of all features, she can boast
A crown of rich, luxuriant yellow hair.
No miser, gloating o'er his glittering hoard,
Looks on his clinking coins with joy more rare,
Than gaze I on the wealth of beauty stored
Within my loved one's golden hair.
Dear lady of my earnest love, the years
Work changes in the spirit of men's dreams;
The fondest love oft dwindles itself in tears,
Or seeks a solace in life's sordid schemes.
Be thy love mine, and wealth I'll share
While gazing on thy glorious yellow hair.

For Love's Sake Only.

If thou canst love me let it be for naught,
Except for love's sake only. Do not say—
"I love her for her smile—her look—her way
Of speaking gently—for a trick of thought
That falls in well with mine, and certes brought
A sense of pleasant ease on such a day."
For these things themselves, beloved, may
Be changed, or change for thee—and love so wrought
May be unwrought so. Neither love me for Thine own dear pity's wiping my cheeks dry—
Since own love will perforce to weep who bore
Thy comfort long, and lose thy love thereby;
But love me for love's sake, that evermore
Thou mayst love on through love's eternity.
ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING.

A Rough Guess.

Oh, what if the world were empty,
Would the bells be ringing,
And the bats flit over the dancing-halls
To the owl's and north wind's moan?
Oh, how would the ghosts fright each other!
And the sun staring away,
And the flowers reach to the tree-tops,
And the fishes drink seas in a day!
Nay, men might be wholly missing
From the earth, and the many years
Would, no doubt, do much more business
Than when constantly dreading our tears.
ROSE HAWTHORNE LATHROP.

Sonnet.

Oft through the mazes of the Roman mart
And quaint Trastevere I have strolled alone,
And in Saint Peter's—miracle of stone—
Have felt the awe of God pervade my heart.
The stately city in its every part
Has to mine eyes its grand all shown;
Its loves, and pains, and sufferings I have known;
Its dizzy carnival, its peerless art!
The Vatican recalls delicious days,
And, with the flawless, mellow moon o'erhead,
Through august ruins I have wandered free;
But ah! I marvel at all, yet dare not praise—
On yonder green Campanian lies dead
And what is Rome's magnificence to me?
F. S. SALTUS, in Appleton's Journal.

FASHION GOSSIP.

The bright, cool days of the autumn are turning ladies' thoughts in the direction of novelty hunting and shopping generally, and as a consequence both thoroughfares and places of business are daily thronged with the fair sex, bound on their commercial errands. The vicinity of Post and Kearny Streets is particularly noticeable for its active and busy appearance, and the reason of the increased activity may be found in the fact that the newly opened dry goods store of O'Connor, Moffatt & Co. is attracting every one's attention, and drawing crowds of curious and interested visitors. The opening of so immense a stock is a notable event. Its contents are too varied for us to give more than a superficial idea of them, but among the leading lines may be quoted the finest assortment of woolen dress goods in the city, which includes all the many varieties of serges, Pekinades, alpaca, cashmeres, camel's hair goods, merinos, and cloakings. In camel's hair fabrics is the "Schoodas" cloth, now more popular than the original make, and presenting a smooth, twilled surface, instead of the rough, hairy appearance of the former. This ranges from $1.50 to $2.00 per yard. The "Armada," a heavy worsted material, shot with brilliant threads of various colors on a twilled ground; the "Yenadize," a velvet brocade, in dark shades on a light groundwork; and the "Amee" cloths, another exceedingly elegant variety—all novelties—come at $1.50 to $2.50, and are the most serviceable, as well as the most beautiful goods ever offered in the market. Black cashmeres of excellent qualities may be had at 50 cents up to $3.00 a yard; and good camel's hair as low as the first-named price. Silks are another strong feature at this establishment. Bonnet, Ponsion, Bellou, and all the leading French makes are represented, and a very fine make known as the "Orientale," at $2.00 a yard, will rival any other $3.00 silk now offered for sale. There is every variety of brocade, velvets, satins, and trimming silks in all colors, and an unusually full choice in light evening silks and satins. In ladies' hand-embroidered underwear great bargains are being offered, and there is already a great "run" on certain articles of ladies' toilets, as corsets, balmar skirts, merino underwear, and hosiery. The "Sirene" is the special make of corsets presented at this store, and deserves especial mention for the perfection of its shape and the elegance of its make-up. It comes in several different prices, and is therefore attainable by almost any purse. The selection of the fancy goods portion of this stock has been a particularly happy one. The eye is greeted immediately on entering by rows of the newest fashions in rich colored neckties, bows, ribbons, and exquisite laces, such as all persons of taste must delight in, and there is a correspondingly choice selection in dainty linen neckwear. A satin brocaded ribbon, in different widths and colors, is one of the notable garnitures of the season, and is here shown in several styles. The O'Connor & Moffatt glove bids fair to become a great success. It comes in three grades, and is made expressly for the firm, every pair being warranted by them. A really good glove, one that fits perfectly and will wear evenly, is a great desideratum, and persons who appreciate such real bargains are always on the lookout for them. It is safe to say that more people will find their "haven of rest" from ill-fitting, worthless band coverings in this new make of glove than in any that has yet made its appearance. We must not leave the matter of strictly wearing apparel without enumerating the specially attractive white goods counter, where can be found the linens, lawns, shirtings, flannels, and other goods suitable for underwear, in great variety, and for prices that defy competition. Household comforts in the shape of blankets, spreads, toweling, and all kinds of nappy form a distinct feature, and one that for quality and quantity can not be too highly praised. In short, the lady of fashion, searching for the latest and most recherche of expensive adornments for her person; the careful housewife, for the necessities and luxuries of her home; the bride for her trousseau, and the mechanic's wife, carefully striving to practice the sweet virtue of domestic economy, and make her small store go to the greatest possible advantage; all these will find no surer place to succeed to their utmost satisfaction in suiting their various needs and desires than this charming store, now already on the high road to a settled and prosperous career.

For the Toilet.

Beauty is the fond wish of many a maiden. How to add to Nature's charms is one of the problems that every young lady is desirous of solving. The teeth are one of the cares that must not be overlooked. How to preserve them so that their charming beauties will heighten the powers of fascination is one of the problems, while the complexion must be soft and pure as Nature first bestows as one of her rarest gifts. When sunburn, tan, or freckles steal unawares upon the faces of our ladies, thereby marring their beauty, what shall be done? So many cosmetics have appeared containing poison, that leaves its traces in skin eruptions, that our young ladies become frightened at the direful effects of their toilet articles. At last we have it, says one—but only to find that the new article put upon the market aggravates instead of alleviating or emending the difficulty. Purity in toilet articles was at last solved by the chemists, and an article appeared possessing an excellence that made it one of the necessities as a toilet article. The horrid skin eruptions caused by using poisonous cosmetics must be cured; and when Dickey's Creme de Lis proved by its use that it positively cured the eruptions and beautified the complexion, that it removed freckles, sunburn, and tan from the face, then its presence on the toilet table became a necessity; and now every lady who desires a perfect toilet keeps this invaluable article among her toilet paraphernalia. The fact that this article has been sanctioned by the highest chemical and medical authorities, and that not only a large amount is now sold upon this coast, but that its sale extends to Mexico, the Eastern and Southern States, is a sufficient testimonial of its popularity as a cosmetic. Mr. Wenzell, pharmacist, corner Market and Stockton Streets, very kindly gave us the above information, and we are sure that the ladies who keep a perfect toilet will agree with us in the statements above made as to the qualities of the famous Creme de Lis, for what fashionable lady has not heard of this exquisite toilet article and tested its merits fully? Mr. Wenzell tells us that his sales of this favorite toilet article are very heavy, and that without exception it has given perfect satisfaction. The colognes manufactured here have been for some time very popular. The delicate Heliotrope—fragrant and delightful—the Overland Bouquet, Occidental Bouquet, each being elegant extractions from flowers; also, the Park Bouquet and Musk Rose, being combinations that contain some of the rarest aromas, are all elegant and exquisite additions to the toilet. The cologne in the above and other flavors, among which we may also mention the Patchouli, are, with the Creme de Lis, necessities that every lady should have. We noted also an extensive assortment in sachet powders, elegantly perfumed here, with many other articles for the toilet. Besides the imported toilet goods extensively sold here, we found that Mr. Wenzell has systematically arranged a large Prescription Department that is complete, thereby making his establishment one of the most thoroughly equipped and reliable pharmacies on the coast. Prescriptions here are carefully put up, at the very lowest rates, and to the entire satisfaction of every customer.

Latest Styles in Boots and Shoes.

For ladies' walking shoe the "Neilson Tie" is still a favorite, appearing in bronze or French kid. For winter wear the cork-soled button boot in French kid and morocco vamp appears. For gents the button boot is made with cork soles for winter wear, with London toe, mostly in French kid. For party the London toe also appears, with patent leather front and French morocco tops. The Bellow-tongued Balmoral with cork soles has now become one of the specialties. For the opera a very neat button gaiter appears, with patent leather foxings and French kid tops. The seamless Oxford Tie, for dress shoe, appearing in French calf, is very neat, and is becoming quite a favorite. The Duke Alexis, cork sole, for winter wear, is made of French calf with French kid or morocco tops. The Napoleon boot, with grain top and French calf front, appears, with Scotch double soles. We observed all these styles at the establishment of John Utschig, 326 Bush Street. The very latest styles, more especially for gents, are here made to order. The ladies will here also find some of the latest novelties in this department made to order. We found here the hunting boot for sportsmen, made with New York toe, and in the most durable shape for winter sporting wear.

Fine Art.

As every one can not possess the original from the hands of the masters, the copy must be resorted to. Photogravure has supplied this want in art; and now the photographic aquatint on copper which leaves a pleasant dead surface in the print, combined with the photographic copying of detail, will reproduce as near as possible a faithful rendering of lights and darks in shading appearing in the original. This process has now brought the finest works of art within the reach of every one. We examined some of these fine reproductions of the masters at the establishment of E. Wolf & Co., under the Palace Hotel, and noted among others the "Lion's Bride," by G. Max. Also a pair of large pieces entitled "Going to the Festival," and "The Return." In the first the representation of the maid resting in confidence on the arm of her gay lover, both in anticipation of the pleasure before them, is very faithful, and elegantly executed. "The Return" represents the scene changed, the mate supports her lover who has parted so freely of wine that he finds it rather difficult to meander homeward. The look of mortification appears very plainly on the face of the maid, which is certainly sketched true to nature. Another piece, "Hunting on the Nile," by Hans Makert, is very finely rendered. In the foreground the swartly Egyptian forms appear in a gondola laden with fowls, etc., and are in the act of hauling in the net. A crocodile has been caught, and is being dispatched by the spears of the hunters. The background represents Egyptian ladies on the shore shooting with bow and arrow at the flying fowl overhead. The piece is spirited and would make a very unique ornamentation for the dining-room. We observed here also very rich engravings in water colors, by Fores, London, mostly equestrian sketches, also some elegant French etchings by Meissonier. Among others "The Flemish Smoker," "The Reader," and "The Flute Player; also, some very fine engravings of "Pompeian Life," by Coumans. We found here also a large collection from the French and German masters in cabinet size, also photographs by the Berlin Photographic Society of all the composers, authors, statesmen, and orators of the past and present.

Instead of bridesmaids, fashion in France now prescribes two tiny pages, who are chosen from the prettiest of the boy relatives of the bride or bridegroom. They are dressed in velvet of the bride's favorite color. At a recent wedding the tiny court dress worn was of sapphire velvet, with white silk stockings and velvet shoes with diamond buckles. A bouquet composed of a rosebud, an orange blossom, and a branch of myrtle is attached to the side. They perform the usual rôle of the bridesmaid, carry the bride's bouquet and gloves, and, in addition, meet her and assist her from and to the carriage steps.

The Emperor of China antedates all the potentates of the Old World in being able to confer the oldest decoration of history. This is the Yellow Tunic, made of yellow silk, and has on the back a dragon—the arms of the Chinese Empire—embroidered in gold and black silk. It is the most distinguished order in China, and is conferred only on extraordinary occasions. Only two Europeans have ever received it—the Englishman, Colonel Gordon, who rendered great service to the Chinese Government during the Taping rebellion, and the French engineer, Giguel, who built a military arsenal in Northern China.

We love most things because they are lovable, we love them for their own sakes; all but a tooth—no man ever loved a tooth for its sake.

BOSTON DRESS REFORM.

California "Worth" Princess Suits, Skirts, and attachable Flounces: Cashmere and Merino Union Suits for ladies and children; ladies' and misses' shoulder-brace Corsets; Abdominal Corsets. No. 430 Street Street. A. W. BAKER, the only Dress Reform Agent in the city.

This paper is printed with ink furnished by Chas. Eneu Johnson & Co., 509 South Tenth Street, Philadelphia, and 59 Gold Street, New York.

Mrs. Parker, of the Ladies' Depository, has opened a new store at 126 Post Street. Dolls dressed in all styles. New Lace Patterns.

Gentlemen desirous of the neatness, elegance, and comfort of a perfect-fitting suit of clothes—business or dress—will, as a matter of satisfaction, do business with Burr & Fink, fashionable tailoring emporium, corner of Montgomery and Post Streets, over Hibernia Bank.

NEW

BOOKS

A Modern Symposium. Subjects—The Soul and Future Life, and the Influence upon Mortality of a Decline in Religious Belief. By many authors. 12mo. . . . . $1 25
Play Days. A book of stories for children. By Sarah O. Jewett, author of Deephaven. 12mo. . . . . 1 50
Lessons in Cookery. Handbook of the National Training School for Cookery, to which is added, The Principles of Diet in Health and Disease. By Thomas K. Chambers, M. D. Edited by Eliza A. Youmans. 12mo. . . . . 1 50
Daisy Thornton and Jessie Graham. By Mrs. Mary J. Holmes. 12mo. . . . . 1 50
The Boy Trappers. By Harry Castlemon. 12mo. . . . . 1 50
The White Horse of Wootton. A story of love, sport, and adventure in the midland counties of England and the frontier of America. By Charles J. Foster. 12mo. . . . . 1 50
The Dinner Year-book. By Marion Aarland, author of Common Sense in the Household. With colored plates. 12mo. . . . . 2 25
Swedenborg and Channing. Showing the many remarkable agreements in the beliefs and teachings of these writers. By B. F. Barrett. 12mo. . . . . 1 00
Helene. A love episode. By Emile Zola. Translated from the French by Mary Neal Sherwood. 12mo. . . . . 1 25

Elegant Fantasies in Stationery

Received this week.

BANCROFT'S

721 MARKET ST. S.F.

THOMAS BOYSON, M. D.

(University of Copenhagen, Denmark),

PHYSICIAN AND SURGEON. Office and Residence, 112 Kearny Street. Office hours, 11 A. M. to 1 P. M., 6 to 8 P. M. Sunday 11 to 1 only. Telephone in the office.

KURRACHEE RUGS!

ASK FOR THEM IN THE LEADING Carpet Stores. Manufactured by WAKEFIELD RATTAN CO., 38 Geary Street.

CALIFORNIA ROOT TEA.

My family use California Root Tea, and find it the best and cheapest medicinal preparation they have ever had. It is a natural remedy, not a nostrum.

BUTTERICK'S

PATTERNS—NOV. STYLES.

Send stamp for catalogue. AGENCY, 124 POST ST., San Francisco.

HEALD'S BUSINESS COLLEGE,

No. 24 Post Street, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

Opposite Mechanics' Institute. IMPARTS A THOROUGH PRACTICAL Education in all Commercial and English Branches, French, German, Spanish, Drawing, and Telegraphy. This school having greater facilities, and enjoying a more extensive patronage than any similar institution on the Pacific coast, continues to base its claims for recognition and patronage upon the good sense and enlightened judgment of the public.

LIST OF FACULTY.
E. P. Heald, F. C. Woodbury,
H. M. Stearns, A. B. Capp,
Mrs. C. Woodbury, T. R. Southern,
J. A. Chesnutwood, Mrs. W. J. Hamilton,
A. P. DuBois, F. Serenji,
R. Sorcini, Geo. Jensen,
Lloyd Baldwin, A. Vander Naillen.
For full particulars, call at the College, 24 Post Street, or address E. P. HEALD, President Business College, San Francisco.

J. J. BIRGE, DENTIST, 313 Kearny Street.

R. C. NOWBRAY, M. D., DENTIST 224 STOCKTON ST., corner Post St. S. F.

THOMAS H. HOLT, NOTARY PUBLIC, No. 326½ Montgomery Street. Residence, 1803 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

GEORGE BARSTOW, ATTORNEY AND COUNSELOR AT LAW, No. 309 California Street, San Francisco, Cal.

SAFES AND SCALES.

FOR SALE BY

JOHN MOLLOY, 54 CLAY STREET.

INTERCEPTED LETTERS.

SAN FRANCISCO, November 15, 1878.

MY DEAR MADGE:—I have but a bit of a budget for you this week. The theatres have been doing so well that they have not changed their bills excepting at the California. They have actually had the hardihood up there to bring out Uncle Tom's Cabin, and several people with an hour or two on their hands have strolled in, doubtless to seek some quiet retreat where no one would be apt to look for them. It is only because of the non-arrival of Miss Cavendish that this tiresome old ducky has been resurrected once more, but I begin to fear his final burial time will never come. I suppose in the original he was a decent old body—as the country folks say—but he has come to be nothing but a peg to hang "Eva's" precocity on, or a central figure in a band of howling dandies, who kick and shout in imitation of the negro minstrels but give us nothing of primitive negro music. Yet I like to watch them. How instinctive it is with the creatures to show off. When I see one of them obtruding himself to the front of the line—as every blessed one does in his turn—the children's most opprobrious epithet "smarty" rises to my mind. But, after all, their delight in themselves is as harmless as it is thorough, and if an Uncle Tom revival can so easily make a few creatures happy perhaps it is just as well to keep on trotting the old gentleman out ad infinitum. They got up some very pretty scenery for the occasion; the plantation scene especially was exceedingly beautiful. Voegtlin, you know, has such a knack in striking foregrounds that the stage seemed twice its size and crowded at that. You remember, in Cleopatra's barge, how bewilderingly the painted figures and the real were combined, that it was only after the curtain had been rung up two or three times that we were able to distinguish between them. He uses the same effect in the plantation scene. That dear little Adams child, who made such a hit in the Celebrated Case, played "Eva." What an exceedingly elastic part this is. I have seen "Evas" of all ages from six to twenty-five and generally detest them quite heartily. But little Maud Adams, a microscopic dot of a creature, is as fresh and natural as a flower yet—and leaves out all the priggishness. It is a trying thing for a little baby like this to go through a long part. Jack yawned till I thought he would take in the whole stage, so we were obliged to leave at eleven, and the "apotheosis" had not yet come off. I am not quite sure that that is the term to use of apotheosis, but I am sure that it must have been pretty late before that little one got the apotheosis off her mind and was tucked in bed. I pity a child actress. Poor little forced plant. She can never sit in front and believe in all those wonderful things as happier children do, and ought to do, and how really horrible it is to play dead, and play drowned, and all sorts of things like that, and tumble off steamers on to a mattress, and be yanked up by an awkward supe, and passed around with a sublime disregard of bones and joints. Never mind. Perhaps she will be a great actress one day, and all these things will go into her reminiscences. Alice Kingsbury, the elfin star, who comes out periodically like the comets, played "Topsy." I have seen a great many pretty bad "Topsys." The worst I ever saw was the genuine negress who played it when "Uncle Tom" was galvanized into life at the Grand Opera House. The next worst I saw at the California last week. You will be surprised at me, for I would rather see Alice Kingsbury than Maggie Mitchell in "Fanchon," you know, but I do not want to see her over again in "Topsy." Her mirth is simply ghastly. Mr. Wells got himself up in rather an extraordinary way to play "St. Clair." That is to say, he had his hair frizzled to such a degree as to be entirely too suggestive for a gentleman living in his part of the country. Like Lewis Morrison, in Miss Merton, he indulged in the Montague touch—a powdered temple lock. I should not wonder if he came to be a very good actor some time. He is very neat and tasteful in dressing, has a nice appearance and a good voice. He used a good deal of tremolo as "St. Clair," also he wept profusely and frequently into a cardinal silk handkerchief. Joking apart, he played it almost better than it deserved, if it is fair to say such a thing, and he and "Eva" made quite an interesting pair. I could pardon them under the circumstances, as no one else made any attempt to do anything of the sort. Miss Cobb played the languid "Mrs. St. Clair" in a mildly scornful way. She was very fond of curling her lip. I used to think that a very fine expression in the old days, but I look upon it now simply as a disease. Fancy a woman's lip curling up into a ringlet when she felt scornful, when really all she does is to drop the corners down and look excessively disagreeable. Miss Cobb looked quite radiant in pink and white face, and what a nice voice she will have when she has quite learned to use it. You asked me when they intend to get a leading man at the California. My dear girl, it must be the intention to carry on the institution without one, for Ada Cavendish is coming next week, and who is to support her? I am prepared to be delighted with the English actress. They say she is not pretty, but if lithographs are to be relied on, she has a throat like a swan, and nothing is prettier in woman than a round, white, well curved, well set throat. She is said also to have the enviable gift of magnetism, and a voice like silver bells. Better than all, she is credited with being the prettiest speaker of the English language on the stage. They may say what they like of foreign tongues, English is a rich, strong, beautiful language when it is purely spoken, as we hear it once or twice, or three times at most, in a lifetime. And when so spoken it is almost always on the stage. Barry Sullivan had some odious ways; he was so autocratic, so overbearing, so prone to hurl his inflections at you simply to give a new reading. But the language peeled out from his lips like the tinging of a clear bell. It was as beautiful to listen to as a song. I remember, too, a little woman who came to San Francisco, and played a brief but luckless engagement with her star husband, Herr Bandman. I do not recall a feature of her face, but I have never forgotten the tones of her voice. It was clear, sweet, and eminently lady-like, and her English the purest I have ever heard. Later we had Miss Fanny Morant in The Danicheffs. You admired her more than I did, if I remember, for, although the words dropped from her lips like clear-cut diamonds, she had a student voice and a bravurique of manner which destroyed the effect. When Mme. Modjeska was studying English she looked around in vain for models from whom to copy, and it was with considerable interest that she went the first time to see an actress who had been named to her as a representative of the American stage. The delicately attuned ear of the artist recognized even in the babel of a foreign language any particular grace or expression, and she had already selected from among the stock company those whose mode of speech pleased her most before she could say good morning in English herself. The fair Pole watched every word that fell from the lips of the representative American actress as if it were a pearl. After the first act she gazed with a sort of pensive wonder at the audience, who seemed to enjoy themselves thoroughly, but an attentive observer could easily see that Modjeska had not yet found her model. I heard her afterward plaintively ask one of her counselors, "Is it better that I should speak like this?"—whereupon she gave a remarkably clever imitation of the representative American. She intended it in all innocence, but that delicate exaggeration which one is apt to give in imitation made a caricature of it, and it was very funny indeed. The American lady has a fashion of prolonging her vowel sounds to an absurd degree; and when the Countess Bozenta lifted her voice and let the vowels roll like billiard-balls, as long as they would, there was a mock tragedy about it that would have cured the original very soon if she could have seen herself reproduced. I wonder, by the way, if Modjeska's English is improved with practice. I observe that the critics still mention her accent in their notes on Frou-Frou. Odd that she should make a success in that worn out little play, isn't it? I can not imagine a Frou-Frou without the Dunning drawl. Talking of English, what remarkable contortions of sound the beautiful Alice used to achieve. If Miss Cavendish has half the charm of speech they say she has, I could forgive her a mouth like Soldene's, and a nose which turns up till it doubles over. But the lithographs promise nothing so dreadful. She will open in The New Magdalen, in which she made a hit in New York, although, like a willful woman, she did not want to. I almost feared she might be wild enough to open in Jane Shore. Then we are to have that exceedingly unpleasant person, "Miss Gwilt," presented to us some time during the season. I remember that Miss Eleanor Carey made her first appearance as "Miss Gwilt." Miss Carey was a very pretty girl and rather a nice little actress, but I never admired anything in her so much as her sublime confidence in attempting "Miss Gwilt." I do not like Mr. Wilkie Collins' heroines. They are generally either fiends or lackadaisical dots, and "Miss Gwilt" is as pronounced a specimen of underground brimstone as I ever encountered in fiction. But then Wilkie Collins knows just about as much of women as we know of bachelor halls and clubs. Mercy Merrick is rather a clever sort of girl, but even she does not come well recommended to families. We are to have a surfeit of new things next week to compensate for this. In the first place, at the Bush Street Theatre, Alice Oates, who has recovered from the several degrees of fever with which she is said to have been threatened, is to give us another chef d'œuvre of Charles Lecocq, the author of Le Petit Duc, Girofle-Girofla, and La Fille de Madame Angot—the pretty, and breezy, and very naughty little opera, La Marjolaine. The libretto is very Frenchy and suggestive, and so positively broad in its language that "the Little Duke" has actually had to cut some of it out—ye gods!! But the music is said to be as catchy as the breath of love itself, and to waltz from the blushing beginning to its happy and tearful end. I do not dare tell you the story of "Sweet Marjoram," the music must do that, for our language wants elasticity. In spirit and movement the opera comes very near Girofle-Girofla; so much so that it is classed as a companion piece by those who have heard it. Oates and Connell have strong parts, and there is enough for the others to do to make it interesting for the audience. So much for La Marjolaine. Then, too, we are to have Jane Eyre, with charming Clara Morris. It has never been my good fortune to see Jane Eyre played to my taste. For some reason the hero always seemed to me to be rather the "Kawjester" of Bret Harte than the "Rochester" of Charlotte Brontë. Somehow, when a leading man puts a smoking cap askew on his head, and growls and snaps and snarls at everything, I think always of that meaning line in the condensed novel, "He flung his bootjack at my head, and I knew he loved me." He is not a bit like the lordly "Rochester," with a ballet mistress in the past, an animated French doll in the school-room, and a lunatic in the attic, as pleasant adjuncts to his cheerful love-making. I have seen but two "Jane Eyres," Charlotte Thompson and Maggie Mitchell. It is high treason not to praise Maggie Mitchell in everything, but when she is naughty she always reminds me of a fractious youngster, and when she is good she is so goody good, and preaches so pedantically, that she seems like a nice little Sunday-school girl putting pennies in the box for the heathen. I hardly see where Clara Morris will find room for much acting in Jane Eyre. It does not seem enough for her, but I am quite sure that whatever she does will be a study and a delight, even if it be a painful delight, although there is nothing harrowing in the story. I wonder, how I wonder, that people do not write plays for her that will lift her acting to a higher plane. There should be a place for her somewhere between this French sentimentalism and the heavy tragedy of a "Medea" or a "Deborah." She should at least command the sympathies when she plays upon the emotions. They tell me she was charming as "Lady Elizabeth Free love" on Saturday night. I think I should like her in comedy if that glad smile which breaks upon her expressive face now and then tells anything of the other side of her nature. I ought to have gone to the Grand Opera House to see the Chinese company to have something to tell you, you are always so anxious to hear something about the theatres, but there is really nothing very absorbing about a Chinese play, and somehow people do not go to the Grand Opera House any more. I would rather go again to hear Le Petit Duc or Robinson Crusoe. This last is having such a good time of it that they are prolonging the run indefinitely. Alice Atherton is very popular, and she looks very stunning in her beautiful costume. I have not heard of a burlesque doing so well since the wonderful days of Ixion. Wait till next week, and we shall see how Jane Eyre, Mercy Merrick, and La Marjolaine prosper.

Yours expectantly,

BETSY B.

There is a very choice bit of gossip afloat in theatrical and theatre-going circles regarding the domestic relations of Miss Clara Morris and her husband—a Mr. Harriott. The fire was lighted by an article recently published in the New York Dramatic News, purporting to be the gist of an interview between Miss Morris and an intimate female friend, in which the theatrical wife abuses and upbraids the husband, charging him with cruelty and meanness of every description and degree. As soon as the papers arrived from New York, it is stated that Harriott, the husband, went about to the news stands buying up every copy that money could tempt from dealers. This proved a master movement to keep the matter quiet, for no sooner was the bit of strategy known than regular subscribers were besieged, and their copies of the Dramatic News passed from hand to hand. Of course the subject-matter of the interview is denied by both Mr. and Mrs. Morris, and the usual proclamation for a libel suit issued; but, notwithstanding contradictions, sides are being taken in the clubs and on the street where theatrical people and their affairs are generally talked about, and there is a great demand for the Dramatic News.

Mr. George R. Chipman, the treasurer of Baldwin's Theatre, advertises a benefit bill for next Sunday evening that can not fail to attract. Bishop and O'Neill appear in the fifth act of Richard III, and Jennings, Rose Wood, and Lewis Morrisio will all engage with novelties. An entertainment worth one's money and attention.

Mr. Geo. B. Ricman, who has for so long a time been the efficient private secretary of the photographic firm of Bradley & Rulofson, takes the active management on Monday next of the new photographic parlors of Taber & Co., over the Hibernia Bank. There is activity in the new firm.

When Miss Mary Anderson, says Puck, goes on the stage as "Juliet," she takes her chewing-gum out of her angelic mouth, and sticks it against the wing, to be finished when the scene is over. Therefore it is that she remarks to "Romeo": "Stay but a little; I will gum again."

A girl in Oil City, Pennsylvania, saw a deceptation trick in a pantomime, and was so frightened that she had spasms and died.

STANDARD THEATRE.

Bush Street, between Montgomery and Kearny.

LESSEE AND MANAGER.....M. A. KENNEDY.
BUSINESS MANAGER.....P. H. KIRBY.

The most pleasing attraction in the city,

RICE'S SURPRISE PARTY.

This (Saturday) afternoon, last

ROBINSON CRUSOE MATINEE.

LADIES' MATINEE TO-DAY, AT 2 P. M.

This evening, Nov. 16, last night but one of the great success

ROBINSON CRUSOE, ESQUIRE.

Monday, Nov. 18th, first time in this city of the charming Musical Burlesque,

BABES IN THE WOOD.

Seats at the box office six days in advance.

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LOCKE.....PROPRIETOR.

REAPPEARANCE OF

ALICE OATES.

Matinee to-day, to-night, and to-morrow (Sunday) evening, last performances of

LE PETIT DUC.

MONDAY, NOV. 18,
First rendition in English of the vivacious Comic Opera, in three acts, by M. Chas. Lecocq, author of Girofle-Girofla, Mme. Angot, and Le Petit Duc,

LA MARJOLAINE.

ALICE OATES as Marjolaine, the Sweet Majorum, supported by the

ENGLISH COMIC OPERA COMPANY.

Exquisite Costumes from Paris. New Scenery by Graham.

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER.
F. LYSTER.....ACTING MANAGER.
G. R. CHIPMAN.....TREASURER

This (Saturday) afternoon at 2 o'clock,

CLARA MORRIS

Will appear in her great part,

CAMILLE.

This (Saturday) evening, first appearance of MISS MAV HART as Pauline in the

LADY OF LYONS.

Sunday, Nov. 17, Benefit of

MR. GEORGE R. CHIPMAN,

(Treasurer), on which occasion a bill of unparalleled attraction will be presented, including the romantic drama of BLOW FOR BLOW, the fifth act of RICHARD III, and the celebrated melo-drama, ROBERT MACAIRE.

Monday evening, Nov. 18th, CLARA MORRIS as Jane Eyre in

THE GOVERNESS.

CALIFORNIA THEATRE.

BARTON & LAWLER.....MANAGERS.
BARTON HILL.....ACTING MANAGER.

Monday, November 18, brief engagement of the world-famous Actress,

ADA CAVENDISH,

Who will appear in her great impersonation of

MERCY MERRICK,

In Wilkie Collins' own dramatization of his thrilling story, entitled

THE NEW MAGDALEN,

Supported by a powerful cast of characters.

In preparation, Wilkie's latest and best play,

JANE SHORE.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

MacLeod of Dare. A novel. By Wm. Black. Paper, 10c; paper, 60c; cloth, $1 50
Pleasant Ways in Science. By R. A. Proctor. Cloth 3 50
The Dinner Year-Book. By Marion Harland. Cloth 2 25
Prince Bismarck's Letters, from 1844 to 1879. Cloth, 1 00
Art and Art Industries in Japan. By Sir R. Alcock. Cloth, 6 00
Young Folk's History of Germany. By Charlotte M. Yonge. Cloth, 1 50
Helene. A Love Episode. By Emile Zola. Paper, 75c; cloth, 1 25
The Bodleys on Wheels. A story for young folks. Cloth 1 50
The Virginians in Texas. A novel. Paper, 75c
Eventide at Bethel. By J. R. McDuff. Cloth, 1 25
Flower Painting. By Susan N. Carter. Paper, 50c
Outlines of Ontological Science. By Henry N. Day. Cloth, 1 50
The Blessed Bees. By John Allen. Cloth, 1 00
A Domestic Encyclopedia of Practical Information. By T. S. Goodholme. Cloth, 5 00

NEW STATIONERY, NEW BOOKS

Received daily.

BILLINGS, HARBOURNE &amp; CO.,

BOOKSELLERS AND STATIONERS,

NO. 3 MONTGOMERY STREET.

THE ART OF ROUND DANCING.

Nothing is more graceful than the modern measured and mazy waltz; nothing so essential to society success, and enjoyment, and popularity than the reputation of being a good round dancer. Hence the information to those not as yet possessed of the accomplishment that Professor J. William Frazer, late of New York, has decided to locate in the city and instruct in the art. His method is that of private instruction and in explaining the system, and its elements of success Mr. Frazer says: "I have found by many years of experience, where classes assemble for instruction in dancing (square dancing excepted), that, two hours being the regular time allotted, each pupil receives only about five minutes personal instruction from the Professor. Say about twenty-five to thirty members. Larger classes even less personal attention."

Whereas the pupil who takes private lessons, one hour being the allotted time, has the benefit of an hour's instruction. During this time the pupil will accomplish more positive training than one month in a public dancing school, besides doing away with publicity and embarrassment of a new beginner. After a young lady, gentleman or child gains confidence in themselves and dances moderately well, then they can resort to the Ball Room in perfect confidence. It has been a rule among the profession, as fast as pupils become anything of a round dancer, to place the pupil with those who are unproficient, causing the pupil who is proficient to dance incorrectly, worry through and gain no headway. This is of no benefit to the advanced scholar. The beginners should not be allowed to dance, where they have not acquired a fair knowledge of the art, with those who have a correct motion. Hence private lessons gives the pupil the full benefit of correct Terpsichorean art, under professional guidance only. No awkwardness or embarrassment can come from strictly private lessons, and the pupil can not fail under such auspices. I have had large public classes and found dissatisfaction among many because more personal attention was not shown them. I came to the firm conclusion that the only proper method to pursue and give general satisfaction is as stated above. And I find it is the only method to pursue and be successful with pupils in a short space of time. Financially, a public school is, by far, more profitable to the Professor. But pupils will receive a more thorough course, actual attention, reasonable satisfaction by private instruction. But I have heard many say: "If we take private lessons in round dancing, how are we to acquire quadrilles?" (How many understand square dancing who are ignorant of round dancing?) My answer is: Quadrilles can be learned in a very few lessons. It being a second consideration, first become a good round dancer, then let quadrilles follow, and you will be more easy and graceful, attributing it all to your knowledge of waltzing. By close observation one can learn the figures in all square dancing at sight. If you undertake it, secure a good partner, who understands the figures, and after a few times of actual rehearsal, you are familiar with Quadrilles. Not so in round dancing, for that is an art and study, and requires time and practice to acquire it. All pupils under my instruction will have an opportunity to acquire all my novelties in square dancing when private parties are given, after they have become reasonable round dancers." This statement of the Professor is practical, sensible, and valuable. He evidently understands what he is talking about, and as to his capabilities as an instructor in the Terpsichorean Art the following communications abundantly testify:

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., October 26, 1878.
We, the undersigned, are personally acquainted with Mr. J. William Frazer, and can recommend him to the public as a gentleman of highly cultivated ability and worthy of the patronage of those who may wish his services.

FRANK H. BALL, 520 Market Street.

H. W. PEARSON, Cosmopolitan Hotel.

JNO. S. MITCHELL, Cosmopolitan Hotel.

D. S. MOULTON, 575 Market Street.

CHARLES E. PERKINS, with Gladding, McBean & Co.,

T. A. MOULTON, Oakland.

I. C. COWLES, 967 Broadway, Oakland.

Office of G. F. Child, agent for Steinway & Son's Pianos and M. Gray's Sheet Music, 911 Washington Street, OAKLAND, CAL., October 26, 1878.

Having been a former resident of Dayton, Ohio, I take great pleasure in stating that I am personally acquainted with a large number of Mr. Frazer's private pupils of that city. They comprised the sons and daughters of the wealthiest and most highly cultivated people, and I am aware of the fact that no teacher of dancing ever came to Dayton who gave such universal satisfaction.

Respectfully,

G. F. CHILD.

OAKLAND, November 12, 1878.

I can cheerfully and willingly recommend Professor Frazer as a scientific and successful teacher in the art of dancing. His methods are entirely new and his manner is calculated to inspire confidence.

W. H. O'BRIEN,

Drill Master at California Military Academy.

CALIFORNIA MILITARY ACADEMY,

OAKLAND, CAL., November 12, 1878.

We the undersigned, cadets at the above Academy, being under the personal instruction in Round Dancing of the skillful master of the art, Mr. J. William Frazer, and having taken only our second lesson, pronounce him beyond a doubt a teacher of great science. His manner of instruction is very simple and to the point.

J. H. REXFORD,

W. H. MOODY,

LOUIS R. SOHNS,

P. F. MANGE,

E. G. ZELLE,

J. L. WHITE,

and others.

Mr. Frazer will occupy as a dancing academy the large and spacious apartments over M. Gray's new store on Post Street as soon as they are properly furnished, which will be in ten days or so. One room will be elegantly fitted up as a reception parlor, with which the practice and instruction room will be in direct communication. The terms of tuition are $25 for twenty lessons, under the contract system—that is, an agreement that the pupil shall acquire the art in that number of lessons, or continue free of charge if a longer time is required to become a reasonably proficient dancer. There is, however, a ten-lesson system for $25, which the Professor recommends to those who learn rapidly. If ten lessons are not sufficient the additional $20 will secure the remaining ten lessons, which the Professor guarantees will finish the pupil. To those who exact exclusive attention and instruction the terms will be $3 per hour, with the privilege of segregating such pupils eventually into sets of practice fours as may be deemed desirable. For additional information, rules, and regulations of the new academy, testimonial letters from the East, and particulars of the contract or private tuition system, it would be well to obtain one of Mr. Frazer's circulars, which can be had by addressing care of M. Gray, 117 Post Street, or 7 Cameron Block, Oakland. Office hours from 11 to 1.

DIAMONDS.

The most attractive assortment of

DIAMONDS, WATCHES, JEWELRY, ETC.,

And Novelties, for the selection of wedding and other presents, at

GEO. C. SHREVE &amp; CO.'S,

110 MONTGOMERY STREET.

SULLIVAN'S.

The largest, cheapest, and best assortment of LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S

CLOAKS AND SUITS

Can be found at

SULLIVAN'S, 120 KEARNY STREET.

THE SPIRIT OF '78.

An Opportunity such as was never before offered to the San Francisco Public.

T. H. BOYD,

An Artist of rare ability, long known to the public as being connected with some of our most prominent Photographic Galleries, and latterly of the firm of Messrs. I. W. TABER & T. H. BOYD, noticing the wants of the people for first-class pictures at a reasonable price, has retained the elegant and commodious apartments,

NO. 26 MONTGOMERY STREET,

where he has every facility for doing work of a superior kind, and proposes to make his prices so moderate that none need have an excuse for having an inferior picture taken, either of themselves or their children. Never before were such full-length Cabinets—interior or rustic—taken for the low figure of five dollars per dozen; the popular Gray Tint Vignette Cabinets at six dollars per dozen; and the truly elegant Cameo Glacé—the favorite of all—usually costing ten and twelve dollars per dozen, at Boyd's will only cost you eight dollars. His card-size Photos, for the Cameo Glacé finish, will be four dollars per dozen, and the Gray Vignettes only three dollars.

His apartments are all that could be asked for—large, commodious, and first-class in every particular; every convenience, in fact, that tends to enhance the comforts of his patrons. His skylight is the largest in the city, thus giving him a volume of light to be controlled at his will, and so secure an effect in light and shade that can not be obtained with a smaller light. Every improvement of modern times that makes exposures shorter has been secured, so that pictures of children will now be taken so quickly that it is the exception if a superior picture is not obtained.

He also desires to specially call the attention of his old friends and patrons who have visited him at the Yosemite Gallery, that he has all the negatives of the Photographs taken in the Gallery, and can supply copies desired at very short notice and at the reduced prices.

Pay him a visit and judge for yourselves.

YOSEMITE ART GALLERY

No. 26 Montgomery St., near Sutter.

Where can one thoroughly enjoy a swim? At the Terrace Swimming Baths, Alameda.

WE ALWAYS SAY to our lady friends go to Sullivan's, 120 Kearny Street, for handsome SUITS or CLOAKS.

Terrace Swimming Baths, Alameda, now open.

Try E. H. Hubbard's Parisian Cream for the complexion. 923 Market Street.

The finest French and purest home-made candies found at Vogeley's, 915 Market Street, between Fifth and Sixth.

The finest baths are at the Terrace, Alameda.

Mrs. Parker, of the Ladies' Depository, has opened a new store at 126 Post Street. Dolls dressed in all styles. New Lace Patterns.

Go to the Terrace Swimming Baths, Alameda.

DECKER BROS PIANOS ARE THE

COMPLICATED WATCHES

CHRONOGRAPH, REPEATING, SPLIT SECONDS, ETC.

AND A LARGE STOCK OF GOLD and Silver Watches, Chains, Diamonds, Jewelry, Silver Ware, and Fancy Goods at

ANDERSON &amp; RANDOLPH'S

CORNER OF

MONTGOMERY AND SUTTER STS., SAN FRANCISCO.

NEW BOOKS AT ROMAN'S.

Helene. By Emile Zola. Paper, 75c; cloth, $1 25
Water Gypsies. By Meade. Cloth, 1 00
Eventide at Bethel. By Macduff. 2 25
Dinner Year-Book. Marian Harland. 2 25
All Around the House. By Mrs. H. W. Beecher. 1 50
His Heart's Desire. By Shippen. 1 50
Thirty Years at Sea. By Shippen. 1 50
Europeans. By H. James, Jr. 1 50
Recollections of Writers. By Clarke. 1 75
Heir of Charlton. By Fleming. 1 50
Drift from Two Shores. By Bret Hartley. 1 25
Primer of Design. By Barry. 1 25
Margarethe. By Mrs. A. L. Wister. 1 50
Flower Painting. By Putnam. 75
Macloed of Dare. By Black. Cloth, $1 50; paper, 60

Just received, an elegant assortment of Russia Leather Goods, Stationery, etc.

OPEN EVENINGS.

A. ROMAN &amp; CO.,

11 Montgomery Street,

Lick House Block,

San Francisco.

CANNEL COAL.

A SUPERIOR QUALITY OF GRATE COAL for sale by

MIDDLETON & FARNSWORTH, 14 Post Street, and 718 Sansome Street.

JOE POHEIM

The Tailor,

203 Montgomery St. and 103 Third Street, under the Russ House, near Bush Street, has just received a large assortment of the latest style goods. Suits to order from $20. Pants to order from 5. Overcoats to order from 15.

237 The leading question is where the best goods can be found at the lowest prices. The answer is at

JOE POHEIM,

203 Montgomery St. and 103 Third St. Samples and Rules for Self-Measurement sent free to any address. Fit guaranteed.

MME. B. ZEITSKA'S

FRENCH, GERMAN, AND ENGLISH INSTITUTE

FOR YOUNG LADIES,

922 POST ST., BETWEEN HYDE and Larkin.

KINDERGARTEN connected with the Institute. The next term will commence October 2d. A limited number of Boarding Pupils received. MME. B. ZEITSKA, Principal.

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATOR,

WILLIAM DOOLAN,

Office No. 12 Nevada Block.

R. P. & H. N. CLEMENT,

ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW,

NOS. 2, 3, AND 4 SHERMAN'S BUILDING, Montgomery Street, N. E. corner of Clay, San Francisco (P. O. Box 707.)

ROSS'

MILLINERY EMPORIUM, UNDER THE BALDWIN.

BEST KOHLER &amp; CHASE SAN FRANCISCO &amp; OAKLAND

THE MOTHER'S ADVICE.

My girl, you must not fall in love,
With virtue or with wit;
Unless there's rank or money too,
To gild the pill a bit.
Wit's but a frisky thing at best,
And virtue stale becomes—
Stick to the solid pudding, Jane,
And marry for the plums!

Never let good looks beguile your heart
To throw itself away;
What after all's a handsome face?
'Twill wrinkle up some day.
Gray hairs will show, eyes will grow dull,
When man's cold winter comes—
Stick to the solid pudding, Jane,
And marry for the plums!

Don't ever let me hear you say
A word of "mutual flame!"
That's not the way to win the trick
In matrimony's game.
Besides, such flame, though hot at first,
Soon dries and quenching comes;
Stick to the solid pudding, Jane,
And marry for the plums!

Love's very well for wanton larks,
Your Ovids, Muses, and so sing,
But for a girl that's well brought up,
'Tis an indecent thing.
I never loved your father, child,
Just ask him; here he comes—
Stick to the solid pudding, Jane,
And marry for the plums!

I know a youthful face has charms
For girls just fresh from school,
But oh! I have no child of mine
Will be so great a fool!
Young men are often wild and gay,
Old age discreet becomes—
Stick to the solid pudding, Jane,
And marry for the plums!

'Tis very well for vulgar folks,
To talk of hearts and darts;
But girls like you should be above
Such sentimental parts.
A knock 't is that man so rich—
Though he has toothless gums;
Stick to the solid pudding, Jane,
And marry for the plums!

Just move that ringle, love, and, as
You sit, take care to show—
That pretty foot; blush—if you can—
That's it! you're perfect so!
I'll leave you to receive the beau:
Here old Sam Liguorish comes—
Stick to the solid pudding, Jane,
And marry for the plums!

The Profane Owl—A Fable.

A certain Profane Owl who sat up late o' Nights, and kept a large Collection of Straws for the Purpose of ascertaining the Direction of the Wind, was asked by the Fox whether his Party could not gain Possession of the Public Treasury.

"Your Question," said the Profane Owl, winking his left Eye, "reminds me of the Horse who said that he could trot a Mile in a Minute if it were not that the Distance was too great for the Time. I see only one Reason why you can not succeed."

"What is that?" said the Fox.

"The other Party has too Tam many Votes," replied the Owl.

MORAL.—The Census should be taken after the Process of Incubation has been completed. A Fox who wagers 4 to 3 against a foregone Conclusion is apt to lose his Friends' Money.

My flapjack! 'tis of thee—
That agrees with me—
Of thee I sing!
Thou that with pork are fried,
Then butter on one side
With ample syrup thick applied—
Thou luscious thing!

Oh! savory morsel mine!
What taste is like to thine,
Well buttered one?
I love to watch thee fry,
To see the cook test thee on high,
And stick thee with a fork to try
If thou art done!

An Expensive Breakfast.

There seems to be a diversity of opinion about one of Cleopatra's breakfasts. It was the most costly breakfast that has ever been served to a single human being. I will, therefore, tell what I know about it.
After having partaken of Cleopatra's necklace, Mark Antony determined to devise the costliest breakfast ever given. After several days of gastronomical meditations, not having found what he was looking for, he summoned his cook to his presence, and told him that if he could get up a dainty breakfast for a lady, which should be composed of as few and as small dishes as possible, and at the same time, be most costly, he would reward him accordingly.
Several weeks afterward the cook entered Mark Antony's study and told him that he was ready to serve the dainty breakfast asked of him, and that it was composed of one olive only. At the appointed hour the cook entered the dining-room, followed by one hundred men carrying the olive in its artificial envelope) on their shoulders. They deposited it on a table, and fifty carvers were set to work on it.
After several hours of hard work the triumphant cook placed the olive before the Egyptian queen, who looked at it with amazement, still with perfect delight. The olive had been prepared in the following way: After having been stoned, it was stuffed with a rich custard, then put inside of a boned canary, which was used to stuff an ortolan. The latter was placed inside of a boned oriole, which was used to stuff a thrush, which thrush stuffed a boned lark. A boned snipe was stuffed with the lark and placed inside of a robin, which was used to stuff a plover, and which latter bird filled a quail, which was then placed inside of a pigeon. The pigeon filled a woodcock, the woodcock a partridge, the latter a grouse, the grouse a pheasant, the pheasant a chicken, the chicken a guinea fowl, which was placed inside of a goose.
The goose filled a turkey, the turkey a swan, the latter an ostrich, which was used to stuff a sheep; the sheep a calf, the calf an antelope, the latter a pig, the pig a deer, the deer a bear, the bear a heifer, the heifer an elk, the elk an ox, the ox a hippopotamus, the latter an elephant. The olive was then roasted in its envelope, which envelope was thrown away, and the olive only was saved.

One reason why more people did not go into the Ark is, that Noah neglected to advertise in the daily papers. There is a great moral lesson contained in this fact.

MODJESKA'S NEW WARDROBE.

The following is a description of Madame Mod-jeska's toilet in Frou-Frou: Her first appearance is in a riding habit of black cloth, with black beaver hat, gloves, and riding whip. The next costume is a combination of white silk and white moire antique, made with low basque, short sleeves, and full train.
The moire, in two broad revers at the sides and front of the skirt, is finished by ruffling, which also ornaments the neck and sleeves. A bow of blue and white ribbon, with very long ends, is pendent from the right shoulder, and a collar of blue ribbon, with bouquet of forget-me-nots at the throat, and another on the left side of the corsage, completes the costume. A third striking toilet is a morning dress of white embroidered Canton crepe, bordered with heavy fringe; scarf draped across the left shoulder and partial sacque; high neck and short sleeves. This costume, which throughout is in negligé style, is highly artistic in effect. Madame Modjeska next appears in a superb dinner toilet of Nile green satin, elaborately draped, and combined with white illusion embroidered with pink roses. The corsage is low, with elbow sleeves and long white kid gloves, and here she assumes a diamond necklace and earrings of surpassing richness. A cloak of crimson satin, lined with white, is thrown over her shoulders. A fifth toilet is a home dress of mauve brocade and blue satin, made princess, with flowing train of the brocade, low square neck, elbow sleeves, a blue satin vest laced across, and simulated satin petticoat. The next succeeding costume is a demi-toilet of cream-colored cashmere combined with wood-colored silk, made high neck, long sleeves, and vest laced across with wood-colored silk cord. The costume worn in the last (dying) scene is a close-fitting black cashmere, with black lace scarf thrown over her head.

A Scale-y Story.

"A major" loved a maiden so,
His warlike heart was soft as "Do."
He oft would kneel to her and say,
"You are, of light, my only 'Re."
"Ah! if but kinder you would be,
And sometimes sweetly smile on 'Mi."
"You are my life, my guiding star,
I love thee near, I love thee 'Fa."
"My passion I can not control;
You are the idol of my 'Sol."
The maiden said: "Fie! ask papa.
How can you go on thus? Oh, 'La!"
The major rose from bended knee,
And went her father for to "Si."
The father thought no match was finer,
This "major" once had been "a minor."
They married soon, and after that
Dwelt in ten rooms all on "one flat."
So happy ends the little tale,
For they live on the grandest scale.
—For Humana.

Gossip About Books and Authors.

Two new volumes are promised by Tennysoo.
Gerald Massey, the poet, was born in a mud hut.
Algernon Charles Swinburne is heir to a baronetcy and drinks more than a fish.
A new work by Jules Verne, entitled Dick Sands,
the Boy Captain, will soon be published.
Henry W. Longfellow is seventy-one years old, and wears well the dignity of the gentlemen and the poet.
Whittier is seventy years old, and a most quaint and kindly person. He uses, habitually, the Quaker
"thee" and "thou."
The Macmillans have just published a volume of Matthew Arnold's poems. Mr. Arnold has been called "the poet of delight."
Oliver Wendell Holmes, author of the "One Horse Shay," has been elected an honorary member of the Carriage Builders' Association.
R. H. Stoddard, whose productions in poetry and biography are as valuable as they are charming, writes with his left hand, his right being paralyzed.
Alexander Dumas, Jr., has a very small library, a single book-case containing all his books. They include Homer, Dante, Shakespeare, Montaigne, Moliere, and a very few others. Before all stands the Bible, which is the book that Dumas studies the deepest, and reads with the greatest pleasure.

Jew d'Esprit.

The Israelites used a separate plate
For all flesh, and fowl, and fishes;
And though they enjoyed all the food they ate,
'Twas certainly in Jew dishes.

A man met a Burlington boy walking toward town on the Agency road eating an apple. "How many apples have you?" asked the man. "One-half as many apples as I have eaten, added to twice as many as I am going to eat, less five that a beggar boy took away from me, divided by two-thirds of the number
I dropped in the orchard when I saw the dog, plus six which I ate on the orchard (once before the man saw me, will equal one-fifth of all that I tried to get?"
How many apples did he have?

Oh, give us the month with the rollicksome R
That brings in the yellow-sown yam;
That waltzes the breeze of the brine from afar,
And neareth the oyster and clam.
Ye yeaman that yawl for the yearling yam,
Ye oysters that oysters provide,
Ye clammers that claw for the clammy clam,
May blessing thy business bestride!

One of the newest London fashions is a revival of the old long Chesterfield man's coat for women's wear. It may be worn with a skirt of the same material or another, according to fancy. It has pockets at the waist, and simulated ones at the back.

The Parisiennes wear their short costumes much shorter than New York women do, and have in addition a fashion for looping them up directly in the back, showing about two inches of the white or colored petticoat.

The latest fancy in stockings is for white polka dots in silk embroidery on black silk feet and legs, while the toes, heels, and upper half of the leg of the stocking are white.

L. T. ZANDER,

No. 424 MONTGOMERY STREET,
between California and Sacramento, San Francisco.
COLLECTOR.

Rents, Bills, and Accounts collected, and prompt returns made.

ZANDER'S PURCHASING AGENCY.

Orders for the purchase and shipment to the interior of goods of every description executed with promptness and care, at a small commission over cost.

GEO. W. FRESCOTT. IRVING M. SCOTT. H. T. SCOTT.

UNION IRON WORKS

(Founded 1849.) Post Office Box 2128.

COR. FIRST AND MISSION STREETS,
SAN FRANCISCO

MANUFACTURERS OF

Compressed Engines,
Air Compressors,
Rock Drills,
Portable Hoisting Engines,
Marine Stationary and Portable Boilers
Baby Hoist, complete.

CONSTANTLY ON HAND AND FOR SALE,

Direct-acting Pumping and Hoisting Engines,
Upright and Stationary Engines,
Quartz Crushing and Amalgamating Machinery;
Blake's Rock Breakers,
Smelting Furnaces,
Quicksilver Pumps,
Chlorinating Furnaces,
Cornish Pumps,
Steam Pumps.

All manufactured by us of the best materials, design, and workmanship, and furnished at lower rates than by Eastern manufacturers.

PRESCOTT, SCOTT & CO.

CHAS. N. FOX. M. B. KELLOGG.

FOX &amp; KELLOGG,

ATTORNEYS AND COUNSELORS
AT LAW, San Francisco, Cal.

Office, No. 530 California Street, Rooms 1, 2, and 3.

FRANK KENNEDY,

ATTORNEY AT LAW, 604 MERchant Street, Room 16. Probate divorce, bankruptcy, and all other cases attended to.

REDINGTON'S

FLAVORING EXTRACTS

ARE THE PERFECTLY PURE
and highly concentrated Extracts of

FRESH FRUITS

Prepared with great care. They are put up in superior style, in a bottle holding twice as much as ordinary brands of Extracts.

Comparing quality and contents, none other are nearly so cheap.

Wherever tested on THEIR MERITS, they have been adopted in preference to all others, and now are the

STANDARD FLAVORING EXTRACTS

Of the Pacific coast. Dealers will find them to give better satisfaction to the consumers than any other kind and are respectfully requested to give them a trial.

REDINGTON &amp; CO.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

O. F. WILLEY &amp; CO.,

IMPORTERS AND MANUFACTURERS OF

FINE CARRIAGES AND WAGONS

No. 427 MONTGOMERY ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

Agents for the sale of Wagons manufactured by
BREWSTER & CO., New York,
W. D. ROGERS, Philadelphia,
C. S. CAFFEY, Camden, N. J.,
WOOD BROTHERS, New York,
H. KILLAM & CO., New Haven,
COOLING BROS., Wilmington

ALSO, AGENTS FOR

HARNESS MANUFACTURED BY WOOD GIBSON,
TOMPKINS & MANDEVILLE, AND
A. H. DUNSCOMBE.

Also, a fine assortment of Robes, Blankets, Nets, Whips, etc.

MILLER &amp; RICHARD,

SOLE MAKERS OF

EXTRA-HARD METAL
SCOTCH TYPE.

SPECIAL AGENTS FOR

THE CAMPBELL, HOE, AND PERLESS
PRESSES.

No. 529 COMMERCIAL STREET.

And 203 Leidesdorff Street, San Francisco.

RUPTURE.

BUY NO TRUSS

Until you see what has been accomplished by DR. PIERCE'S late invention.

Call, or send for New Illustrated
Book. Prices reduced.
MAGNETIC ELASTIC TRUSS
CO., 609 Sacramento Street, San Francisco.

CALIFORNIA FARMERS'
MUTUAL

Fire Insurance Company

[ESTABLISHED IN 1874.]

Paid up Capital .....$200,000
Assets exceed..... 320,000

PRINCIPAL OFFICE 209 SANSOME ST.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

THOS. FLINT, President. J. W. FOARD, Manager.

FRED. K. RYLE.....Secretary.

I. G. GARDNER.....General Agent.

COMMERCIAL

INSURANCE COMPANY OF CALA,

FIRE AND MARINE.

Principal office, 405 California Street, San Francisco.

JOHN H. WISE, President.

CHAS. A. LATON, Secretary.

THE STATE INVESTMENT

—AND—

INSURANCE COMPANY, FIRE AND MARINE

CASH ASSETS.....$450,000

Principal Office, 218 and 220 Sansome Street, San Francisco

OFFICERS:

A. J. BRYANT, President,

RICHARD IVERS, Vice-President,

CHAS. H. CUSHING, Secretary,

H. H. WATSON, Marine Surveyor

OPHIR SILVER MINING COMPAny.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 5th day of November, 1878, an assessment (No. 34) of one dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Cosmopolitan Hotel Building, No. 203 Bush
Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid
on the 10th day of December, 1878, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on MONDAY, the 30th day of December, 1878, to pay delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors.
C. L. MCCOY, Secretary.
San Francisco, California.

SIERRA NEVADA SILVER MINING

Company.—Location of principal place of business,
San Francisco, California. Location of works, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Directors, held on the twenty-second day of October, 1878, an assessment (No. 56) of three dollars ($3) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 47, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery
Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid
on the twenty-seventh day of November, 1878, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on WEDNESDAY, the eighteenth day of December, 1878, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses
of sale.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.
Office—Room 47, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street,
San Francisco, California.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—THE STATE

INVESTMENT AND INSURANCE COMPA-NY.—Dividend No. 66.—The monthly dividend for October will be paid on November 10th, at their office, Nos. 218 and 220 Sansome Street.

CHS. H. CUSHING, Secretary.

San Francisco, November 5, 1878.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF the Standard Gold Mining Company, San Francisco, Cal., Nov. 7, 1878.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company, held this day, Dividend No. 15 of one dollar per share was declared, payable on Tuesday, November 12, 1878. Transfer books closed on Saturday, November 9, 1878, at 12 o'clock M.

WM. WILLIS, Secretary.
Office, Room 29, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery
Street, third floor, San Francisco, Cal.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California
in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

FRANCES A. NELSON, plaintiff, vs. DAVID P.

NELSON, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth
Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to David P. Nelson, defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff, in the District
Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco,
and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served
out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days;
otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court
dissolving the bonds of matrimony heretofore and now existing between the plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds
set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference
is hereby expressly made, and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 17th day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk,
By W. STEVENSON, Deputy Clerk.

[SEAL.]
GEORGE L. WOODS and JOHN J. COFFEY, Attorneys for Plaintiff.

CHICKERING

PIANO WAREROOMS,

31 POST ST., Mechanics' Institute Building.

ELEGANT PIANOS.

L. K. HAMMER,

Sole Agent for Pacific Coast.

Owners of Chickering Pianos are specially requested to leave orders for tuning at warerooms, 31 Post Street.

MUSIC

KNABE PIANOS,
IRVING PIANOS, ROGERS' UPRIGHT PIANOS,
Prince Organs, Walters' Organs, Sheet Music.

BANCROFT, KNIGHT & Co.,
733 MARKET STREET.

PIANOS

SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED PIANOS.

Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.

WOODWORTH, SCHELL & Co.
12 Post Street San Francisco.

PIANOS

NO. 12 TYLER STREET, S. F.

These Pianos are all three-stringed, with ivory keys, not imitation.

MR. FRAZER,

(Late of New York),

DISTINGUISHED PROFESSOR OF
MODERN SOCIETY DANCING.

Private Schooling Exclusively.

ROUND DANCING A SPECIALTY

I WOULD MOST RESPECTFULLY call the attention of parents, and young ladies, and gentlemen of San Francisco, Oakland, and vicinity, to my eight-page circular, containing full information upon the treatment of Round Dancing, etc., and why so MANY FAIL IN THE ART. Read carefully all the circular contains, and I venture to say the advantages offered will please you. I EXACT NO TUITION where I fail in my undertakings. I will occupy the large and spacious rooms over Mr. Gray's Music Store in about ten days. Those wishing hours for instruction must apply early, as my time is fast being engaged. Office hours, 11 A. M. to 1 P. M., at Mr. Gray's.

J. WILLIAM FRAZER.

Circulars at M. Gray's Music Store, 117 Post Street, San Francisco, and W. B. Hardy's, Broadway, Oakland.

GENUINE SALE. NICOLL, THE TAILOR

HAVING TO MAKE ROOM FOR the daily arrival of new styles of French, English, and Domestic Goods from his New York and London houses, will display a very large quantity of unsold-for garments at greatly reduced prices, as follows:

Pants	from $3 00
Suits	" 12 00
Overcoats	" 15 00
Vests	" 5 00
Coats	" 7 00

Gentlemen, before ordering anywhere, will do well to call and inspect our daily arrival of French, English, Scotch, and Domestic Goods.

No. 535 MONTGOMERY STREET.

PACIFIC BUSINESS COLLEGE,

320 POST STREET, San Francisco.

DECORATION OF THE LEGION OF HONOR. AWARD OF THE GOLD MEDAL. FIVE DIPLOMAS OF MERIT!

THE PARIS EXPOSITION HAS AWARDED THE DECORATION OF the LEGION OF HONOR to MR. HENRY BREWSTER, senior member of the firm of

BREWSTER & CO.

(OF BROOME STREET,)

CARRIAGE BUILDERS,

Of the city of New York. Also, the Gold Medal, and five Diplomas of Merit to the several foremen of departments, for an exhibition of Thirteen Carriages, a Park Wagon, Pleasure Vehicles, and a Racing Sulky, at the late Exposition, as a recognition of the superior excellence of the work of the firm.

W. J. DONLEY, the representative, is now in San Francisco, and may be found at O. F. Willey & Co's, or at the Baldwin.

Messrs. O. F. WILLEY & CO., 427 Montgomery St., are Sole Agents in California.

BREWSTER & CO. (OF BROOME STREET,)

Broadway, 47th and 48th Streets, New York City.

MADAME SKIDMORE FINE MILLINERY.

THE LATEST PARISIAN STYLES CONSTANTLY RECEIVED.

1114 Market St., between Mason and Taylor, under Graham House.

REMOVAL.

I. W. TABER

The leading Photographer of this city, has just occupied his new and handsome parlors over the HIBERNIA BANK, CORNER MARKET AND MONTGOMERY STREETS. Entrance on Montgomery Street. Elevator connected with building.

Easy of access. The handsomest Photograph Rooms in the city. Give him a call.

THE CAL. FURNITURE M'FG CO. HAVE FIVE TIMES AS MUCH FURNITURE

As any other house on this Coast, which has been purchased so low that we CAN and WILL sell at such prices that the poor can gratify their WISHES and the rich their TASTE. At the old stand,

NOS. 224 AND 226 BUSH STREET, S. F.

HERRMANN'S

FALL STYLES

ARE NOW OUT AT

336 KEARNY STREET, BETWEEN BUSH AND PINE,
& 910 MARKET STREET, ABOVE STOCKTON.

SEND FOR ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE.

ARMY AND NAVY GOODS, REGALIA AND LODGE SUPPLIES.

A. J. PLATE & CO.,

No. 510 SACRAMENTO STREET.

PALACE HOTEL RESTAURANT,

FIRST CLASS IN ALL RESPECTS.

QUIET AND DESIRABLE PLACE for Ladies, Gentlemen, and Families. 227 Entrance south side of Court. A. D. SHARON.

BUY YOUR SHIRTS AT

MORRIS, SCHWAB & CO. FINE-ART DEALERS. FREE ART GALLERY.

A complete assortment of ARTISTS' MATERIAL, GOLD FRAMES, etc.

19 AND 21 POST STREET.

WAREHOUSES, N. W. CORNER KEARNY AND SUTTER STREETS.

SHERMAN, HYDE & CO.

SHEET MUSIC,
MUSIC BOOKS,
MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

SEWING MACHINE,

The only really light-running lock-stitch Sewing Machine in the market.

"DOMESTIC" PAPER FASHIONS

Elegant, stylish, and reliable.

J. W. EVANS, 20 Post Street, San Francisco.

FOR PARLORS, OFFICES, HALLS
BED-ROOMS, CHURCHES,
STORES, ETC., ETC.

THE LARGEST STOCK AND
the greatest variety on the Pacific Coast.

500

DIFFERENT SIZES, STYLES, AND PATTERNS to select from.

W. W. MONTAGUE & CO.

NOS. 110, 112, 114, 118, & 120 BATTERY ST.

PALMER BROS.

726 TO 734 MARKET ST.,

Have a full assortment of

LADIES' AND GENTS' FURNISH-
ing Goods, Toilet Articles, Corsets, Embroideries,
French and Valenciennes laces, a fine assortment of Veil-
ings and Ruchings, and the largest stock of

MILLINERY GOODS,

And the best stock of
BOYS' CLOTHING AND HATS & CAPS
In the city.

INDEPENDENT LINE

—FOR—

ASTORIA AND PORTLAND, OREGON.

The Splendid Low-pressure, Side Wheel American Steamship

GREAT REPUBLIC,

JAMES CARROLL, Commander

Will sail from Spear Street wharf, for the above ports,

On SATURDAY, Nov. 16, at 10 A. M.

Steerage Passage $2 00

Cabin Passage 7 00

In Bridal Rooms 10 00

Freight at Lowest Rates

For freight or passage apply at the office on Spear Street wharf. Tickets also for sale at No. 3 New Montgomery Street, under Grand Hotel. P. B. CORNWALL.

BEAMISH'S

The Argonaut.

VOL. III. NO. 20.

SAN FRANCISCO, NOVEMBER 23, 1878.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

THE DIARY OF A WOMAN.*

Translated for the Argonaut from the French of Octave Feuillet.

BY JAMES C. WARD.

[CONCLUDED FROM LAST NUMBER.]

At last, feeling that he was wanting in respect to me and to himself, he begged my pardon, excused himself, tried to turn his frenzy into a joke, and left me on pleasant terms enough, begging me, in spite of all that had happened, not to withdraw my friendship from him. I promised—but to myself I promised the contrary. From never having had much confidence in him, I now had none at all.

Five or six days passed, when, astonished at not seeing Cécile again, who was unaccustomed to leave such intervals between her visits, I determined to go to her house, but without much hope of meeting her, for she lunched every day with one or another of her friends. I found her, however, but in company with the Prince de Viviane, who was seated in front of her at the side of the fire. On seeing him there, a painful sensation, a wringing of the heart, took possession of me. I knew that up to that time the Prince had never set foot in her house, and that she had complained bitterly of it. This change of habit annoyed me, and my annoyance was not lessened when I understood, from some allusions which escaped them, that this visit had been preceded by another a few days before, and what was more, that they were to meet in the evening at Madame Godfrey's, where they were both to dine. I could not help establishing some connection between these strange circumstances and the equivocal and almost threatening words which the Prince had left me for adieux. He knew my sisterly love for Cécile. Had he formed this plan for the purpose of at least disturbing me in offering my dearest friend attentions which I no longer wanted from him? Had he determined to reach my heart through hers, and revenge himself upon me through her? Disgraceful and detestable as such a design was, I was not so inexperienced in life as to ignore the fact that the soul of a libertine was capable of conceiving it. This man, it is true, in offering to marry me had appeared to give proof of sincere and honest feelings, but as I was handsome he saw no other way of getting possession of my person.

I waited impatiently for his departure, and was scarcely alone with Cécile before I was on my knees to her. Kissing her hands, I said:

"Do let me speak to you, will you?"

"Speak, golden mouth! But speak quickly, for I must dress. You know I dine out."

"Will you give me a very great pleasure, my dear? Don't dress. Send an excuse to this Madame Godfrey, of whom not much good is said, and come and dine with your old, old friend."

"Ah, there you go again," said Cécile, laughing, but with a certain amount of frankness. "We might as well clear this matter up at once. I am willing. What do you reproach me with positively? Am I behaving badly? Come, now, can you believe that? No, you do not believe it. You know that I am now just what I always have been—a little creature with quicksilver in her veins, who loves the movement, the excitement, the gayety, the compliments, the dance, and all the tra-la-la of life; but yet an honest little creature who does no harm, who is devoted to her friends, and who is faithful to her husband. What more do you want?"

"My dear child, I do not blame you for loving pleasure, but I do blame you for loving that alone. You had once, allow me to remind you, a more serious and a truer conception of life. In our young girl talks, we imagined something better than this incessant dissipation, this intoxication in which alone you delight at present. We gave a place, and a large place, in our future existence to more intimate, more choice, and more worthy pleasures. Mon Dieu! you do nothing wrong, it is true; but you do nothing good—you do nothing, for example, to elevate your tastes, your sentiments, your ideas; you are developing only in the direction of your faults, and then, believe me, this continual levity in your carriage and language is not without danger in the long run. For all the serious things of life bind, enchain themselves together; honesty and virtue are serious things, and have need of something serious on which to lean. They fade away in the uncertainty and frivolity of an existence which is all outside. They lose in it, little by little, that consistency and solidity which are essential to them, and without which they have not the strength necessary to govern our passions. It is thus that a woman finds herself disarmed before the slightest temptation, the least seduction. And now let me beseech you, my dear child, to pause on the brink of this precipice; and allow me to add that the absence of your husband furnishes you with an excellent opportunity, and even imposes it as a duty."

She listened, alas! with a sort of impatient absence of mind, heating the carpet with her little foot.

"Well, suppose it is so," replied she. "It is possible there may be some truth in your sermon. I will think it over; but as for this evening, I promised Madame Godfrey solemnly, and go I must."

"I pray you not to."

"But come, now, why this insistence? Why do you hold so particularly to my not going this evening to Madame Godfrey's? Come, be frank. It is on account of the Prince de Viviane, whom you were put out to find at my house?"

"Mon Dieu! perhaps it is so," said I.

"Ah, well, that is amusing at any rate. It appears, then, that you would reserve him exclusively to yourself."

"I reserve him so little that I have refused his heart and his hand, both of which he offered me five days ago. If I betray this secret, it is because I feel myself obliged to put you on your guard against a man whom I believe to be infinitely dangerous. I shall be easy now, for, supposing he contemplates making love to you, as he seems disposed to, you will be prepared as to the sincerity of the sentiments he will express to you. I know your delicacy of feeling and your pride, and I know what reception a rejected lover may expect from you when daring to ask you to console him."

She rose up before me, her eyes flashing fire.

"I don't believe you," cried she; "I don't believe a word you have told me. Acknowledge the truth—you are jealous—that's it."

"Cécile, can it be you who are talking to me?"

"Yes, it is me, and I say you are jealous. What! For two years you have been in the habit of seeing the Prince tête-à-tête every day, or nearly so, and it is all right and proper; but because he comes to my house twice by accident, all is lost. Come, now, you are jealous, mon Dieu! Well, don't be uneasy. I will send you back your Prince. I don't want him."

"Ah, my poor child, whence comes that tone? Do you realize that you are offending me?"

"On the contrary, it is you who have been offending me for the past hour; and indeed you always are offending me by treating me as though I were a child without any sense or a woman without any honor. Come, good evening! Let me dress myself."

Half dazed with surprise and grief, my eyes sought hers, but in vain. She avoided my look, and I walked toward the door.

"Charlotte," said she, "come, let me take your hand."

"No," said I, "you do not deserve it," and I left her.

I went home with an aching heart. In the first moment of my grief it seemed as though everything was giving way about me, everything leaving me. I was parting from the dearest friendship of my life, and at the same time I was losing that immense interest connected with it, and on which I had counted to give occupation and peace to my heart. I found in consequence of Cécile's obstinacy that it would be impossible for me to fulfill the engagement I had made with her husband. How could I ask him henceforth for his co-operation and good will in a reconciliation toward which his wife refused to lend herself? How inform him of this sad truth? How could I even see him again?

Upon reflection, however, my agitation became quieted little by little, for I said to myself that it was impossible that Cécile was entirely transformed and hardened to such a degree as to have become a person absolutely different from her former self. I remembered that she had before this had these attacks of ill-humor and anger with me, which she had always regretted, and that her excellent heart soon gained the upper hand. I hoped that it might be so now, and that she would come to me the next day confused and repentant.

But I was not destined to pass the next day in Paris. I received early in the morning from Madame Hemery, the housekeeper of Madame de Louvercy, a letter which informed me that my mother-in-law was very ill, and wished to see me and her little granddaughter. I forgot every other trouble, and left for Louvercy with my daughter.

My mother-in-law had a violent attack of bronchitis, which from the first presented symptoms alarming to her physician; but the pain was soon relieved, and eight days after our arrival she was out of danger. I had a great mind to return to Paris, but that seemed impossible, as it was already December, and it was understood that each year I was to bring my daughter to her grandmother's to spend the holidays, from which we were separated by only a short interval, so I had no excuse for curtailing my sojourn.

About that time there came a letter from Cécile which relieved me of a portion of my anxiety, but still left enough to trouble me, and pretty seriously, too. Here is her letter, which a little later was to play an important part in a very sorrowful event:

CECILE D'EBLIS TO CHARLOTTE DE LOUVERCY.

"MY WELL BELOVED CHARLOTTE:—I have been running to your house ever since Monday like a crazy creature. The news of your departure frightened me, and I was obliged to return to my home with a mountain pressing down upon my heart. Oh, ma chérie, say that we have not quarreled. When you refused to give me your hand the other evening, it seemed as though my good angel had abandoned me, and that I was falling to—I don't know where. Oh, my Charlotte, I did not believe one word of the base things I said to you. I beg your pardon upon my knees. You have a thousand times reason to blame my miserable course of life; but the cause of all is that I am unhappy, frightfully unhappy. My husband is an excellent man, full of merit and honor, but he has one terrible fault—he does not love me. For a long time I have been aware of it, almost from the first, and that is what kills me. He does not maltreat me. Grand Dieu, no. He is kind to me, but with a kindness that chills me. He does not love me. Well, what can a woman do who knows that? There is but one remedy—not to think, not to reflect, but hanging bells on her head and bells on her heels, try to drown herself in their noise; and even that does not always suffice. There are moments when my heart fails me, when my head loses itself entirely, when I feel almost on the point of doing something desperate, of committing a last and irreparable folly. You can see whether I have need of your love. As for myself, I adore you! CECILE."

This letter frightened me, not only on account of the disordered state of mind with which it was stamped, but above all because of the strange insistence with which Cécile for the first time complained of the wrongs of her husband, of which before that she had appeared so little sensible. One would say that she had been searching for grievances, so as to create or prepare excuses for herself, and had suddenly discovered them.

I answered her the same day in a long letter. I tried to calm her excitement by assuring her, first, of my tender friendship for her, one moment ruffled, but not the less remaining entire and unalterable; then I tried to prove to her that her husband had sinned toward her only in the excess of his kindness; that she could not seriously reproach him for not having abandoned his work, his career, and his future, to take part in all the pleasures of his wife; that she would have been the first to blame him, and even to suffer in her pride for his doing so; that in justice it would be more natural for her to be sorry for her want of affection, since he had made many sacrifices for her and she had made none for him; that perhaps—that certainly, even—in the secret recesses of his heart Monsieur d'Eblis had reproached himself for all that she had reproached him with; that it depended entirely upon herself to melt the ice that had formed between them; and that I had reason to believe the smallest effort on her part to get nearer to her husband again would be received by him with unbounded gratitude; that, finally, I had promised myself to try and put an end to the unfortunate misunderstanding between them, and if she would but aid me a little, the new year, which she was soon to begin, would see happiness again settling at her fireside at the same time that she settled down there herself. I ended by saying that her husband had begged her before his departure to write to him almost every day, and I entreated her to respond to this request with less levity than she had at first shown, as it certainly was not a mark of indifference.

Somewhat reassured after having sent the letter, I was still more so upon receiving a few days after from Cécile a rather short note, in which she seemed to show considerable calmness and wisdom. She thanked me very affectionately, and said that I was right and that she had spoiled her own happiness; but she had decided to repair every wrong. She awaited the return of her husband with impatience to commence an immediate reform; but nevertheless she added she awaited him with trembling, because her attachment for him had always been mingled with a little fear.

This language, though in singular contrast with the tone of her preceding letter, seemed to me to be natural and true, and knowing that Monsieur d'Eblis was to return to Paris the following week I felt freed from all the painful apprehensions I had brought with me to Louvercy.

On the evening of the 17th of December, Madame de Louvercy, my daughter, and I were just finishing dinner, when we thought we heard the sound of bells and the cracking of a whip in the avenue. We all three listened with surprise, for we were living very retired. With the exception of the curé and the doctor who came during the day we received no one, and we were still farther from expecting the visit of a stranger, because the weather was extremely cold. It was freezing very fast; snow, which had been falling since the day before, covered our woods, and seemed to separate us from the rest of the world. One becomes very inquisitive in the country. My daughter ran to the window.

"It is a carriage," cried she. "I see the lights which keep coming and coming."

I arose also, passed my handkerchief over the glass to remove the frost from it, and perceived in fact the dark form of a carriage which stood out from the background of snow, and came on slowly toward the château along the side of the frozen pond. Apart from the feeble tinkling of the bells no noise was heard, the wheels sliding rather than rolling over the thick white carpet which covered the ground.

My mother-in-law and I were looking inquiringly at each other, when the door suddenly opened, and we could not suppress a cry of surprise on seeing Cécile enter. She came towards us in her blunt and rapid way, kissed her aunt and then me, laughing in a nervous manner.

"I wished to surprise you," said she. "My husband wrote me that he could not return for eight days, and I took a notion to pass the eight days with you, and here I am—only I came near remaining on the road in the snow-storm. We were more than three hours in coming from the station. I am chilled. I shiver all over with the cold."

In fact, she was shivering in all her members. I was struck at the same time by her paleness, and the changed look which her features bore, but I attributed this to the cold and the discomfort which came with it.

While her aunt gently scolded her for her folly, and at the same time thanked her for her kindness in coming, I made her sit down before the fire, and then gave her to have dinner brought for her. But she would eat. She said she had dined at Mantes. Then she late with a feverish volubility the incidents of her trip, the trouble she had had to find a carriage at the station, the fright of her maid in the midst of the woods covered with snow. She stopped at times, and remained with her eyes fixed on something before her. Then she hastily took up her recital again, and with it her childlike laugh. About nine o'clock Madame de Louvercy, who was still suffering a little, begged to be excused, and went up to her room.

"You will do well," said I to Cécile, "to go and rest also. You look very tired. We will talk to-morrow at our ease."

"No, no," said she; "I am rested. Let's go to your room. We can talk there better than in the salon."

My room was the same which I had occupied six years before, during my first visit to Louvercy, in the tower of the château. I preferred it to any other because of the recollections which it brought me. Besides it joined the one my grandmother had used, into which I had put my daughter, Cécile and I went to it, preceded by Madame Hémery, the housekeeper, who carried a candle. She stirred up the fire and left us. Hardly had she disappeared before Cécile threw her hat upon the bed, and went quickly to shut the double door, which had been left half open; then returning to me with an unnatural step, she fixed her eyes on mine with a frightfully wandering expression, placed her two hands on my shoulders, and speaking in a low, dull tone, which I shall never forget, she said:

"Charlotte, I am ruined."

A deathlike chill passed through my veins.

"Mon Dieu!" said I, in a whisper, "what do you mean?"

"It is the truth," replied she, in the same tone, "I am ruined."

For some moments I was entirely overcome, without being able to move or to speak; then questioning her with a look:

"The Prince?" said I.

She moved her head sadly in sign of affirmation.

"You are his mistress?" asked I, lower still.

"I have, been his mistress... yes... yesterday... on leaving the ball... how? why?... I do not know!... I gave myself... for no reason... without any passion... without any desire... without any excuse... like any miserable woman of the town."

I saw her totter, and sustained her and aided her to get to a sofa, on which she sank down. I fell on my knees before her, and with my head in my hands I burst into tears. At the end of a moment I felt her hand passing gently over my hair.

"Good Charlotte," murmured she, "do you weep for me? Ah, I had been virtuous up to that time, I assure you. And to think that I never more can be so... never... that I have that mark on my brow... that shame in my heart, for the rest of my life! Can it be true? Is it possible? Great God, what an awakening! Ah, if they knew... if they only knew!"

"Oh, my poor child!" said I, kissing her hands. She withdrew them.

"No, no," said she, "I beseech you! I am no longer worthy of that. I have become horrible to myself. Ah, my God, have pity on me! Make me crazy, I beseech you!" and she convulsively joined her suppliant hands.

"And now," cried she, raising herself suddenly, "what am I to do? For I lied just now when I told you that my husband was not to return for eight days. He comes to-morrow. To-morrow! Do you hear? That is why I ran away—that is why I came to throw myself into your arms, to ask you what I must do. I can not see him again—I can not. He was so kind to me—so kind! And he is so honest, he is!"

"Ma chérie, you must see him again," said I through my tears.

"What, can you wish it? It is impossible—unless I tell him all. Yes, I want to tell him all, whatever may happen afterward. Let him kill me, or let him forgive me, I shall at least be delivered. Is it not so? I must confess. Do you advise me to?"

I said nothing.

"Then," said she, standing up, "there is nothing left me but to die."

I forced her gently to sit down again, and I sat beside her.

"Be calm. Let us be calm, my Cécile, I beseech you. Let me think—reflect. It is all so sudden—so confusing. Let us see. You ask me if you ought to confess your fault to your husband. Mon dieu! I hardly dare say no—for after all it is a good thing to do, and yet I scarcely think it is wise. In the first place, these are offenses which men rarely forgive, and besides he would revenge himself, your husband would. You would name no one, I know that well enough. But he would inform himself. It would be difficult to keep the truth from him, and you can foresee what would happen then. Finally, ma chérie, even in putting aside that danger, even supposing a pardon, I think that confessing your fault would be to hazard—yes, even to lose certainly—the little happiness that might still be hoped for between you."

"What happiness, grand Dieu! can I hope for, or give to him, with the secret of this crime between us?"

"As for the fault," replied I, "you alone would know of it, and alone would suffer from it. It seems to me that it would almost aggravate it to cause your husband to share in its grief and shame, and it is something of an expiation for you to keep all its bitterness to yourself."

"I could not," said she, in a whisper, shaking her head dejectedly.

Her beautiful hair, all undone, covered her shoulders and partly hid her forehead and her face. Her arms hung lifeless by her sides, and her eyes were looking into vacancy with a gaze fearful to behold. It was so heart-rending an image of absolute despair that anything seemed right which would raise her courage a little.

"Ma chérie," said I, pressing her to my heart, "you thought that you were not beloved—that is what has been the cause of your ruin. I do not wish to extenuate your fault, which has been great, but you are nevertheless not without excuse—at least, you thought so."

"Excuse!" exclaimed she, bitterly. "I had not the shadow of one."

"Remember, you wrote me not long ago that it was the indifference and neglect of your husband which drove you to this irregular and giddy life. Do you remember?"

"I was lying," said she, in a gloomy tone. "You knew it."

"It was I who was discouraging my husband. It was I who was neglecting him. I preferred my stupid pleasures to his affection, to happiness, and to honor. That is the truth. You yourself predicted where it would lead me. No, I have no excuse—not one."

"Well, notwithstanding all that has happened, we must not despair. Let us see. Shall I tell you what I would do if I were at the same time guilty and repentant as you are? Shall I tell you to what sentiment, to what hope, I should cling?"

"Tell me."

"Listen: I would pass the rest of my life trying to repair my fault by conduct entirely opposite to that which rendered me so guilty and so miserable. I would confine myself to my simple duties, as I would were I in a cloister. I would make myself beloved and blessed by the one whom in one weak moment I had had the misfortune to wrong. I would deny myself anything to please him, I would live only to consecrate and devote myself to him, and do for him finally what a nun does for her God. And then I assure you that a day would come in which I could feel almost consoled and pardoned."

Her eyes brightened, and she kissed me.

"I think you will save me," said she. "Yes, it seems to me as though that might be possible. Only I can no longer think—my head is no longer right. So, then, you really think I may look upon him again?"

"Certainly you may, and you ought to do so."

She regarded me with the look of a frightened child, adding: "And kiss him?"

I made a sign that she might.

"Then," replied she, "I must leave for Paris to-morrow, for he will be at home at four o'clock."

"Yes, you must do so, ma chérie. You must be there at the moment of his return. I will take you myself to the station for the nine o'clock train."

And so it was arranged. We were to imagine that a dispatch came from Monsieur d'Eblis to explain this sudden departure to Madame de Louvercy. I waited upon Cécile to her room. I helped her to undress, and I did not leave her until I had seen her in bed. Entirely exhausted by so great an excitement, she seemed at last more calm and about to go to sleep. I kissed her again, and went myself to seek a few moments of repose, but I did not find them.

A little after seven o'clock the next morning, when it was scarcely light, I arose and went to Cécile's apartment. I knocked at her chamber door, but no one answered. I went in. Two candles were almost burnt out on her mantelpiece. I went to the bed; it was empty. Very much surprised, I cast a rapid look around me. All her yesterday's toilet—her dress, her fur cloak, her hat—were here and there on the pieces of furniture where we had left them. In one corner of the chamber her trunk was opened, and the trays turned upside down. I had noticed in it the evening before, not without some surprise, a light ball dress of mauve colored silk, which Cécile told me that her maid Julia had put in the trunk by mistake. The dress was no longer there. It seemed as though I was almost losing my senses, and a vague feeling of terror crept over me. I was about to ring or call, when my eyes fell upon a letter placed so it would be seen on the marble mantelpiece between the two lighted candles. I seized it; it was addressed to me, and I recognized Cécile's handwriting. On opening it, this is what I read:

"My dearly beloved Charlotte, positively I can not bear to see him again. Notwithstanding my faults, I am yet too honest for that. I am about to die, ma pauvre chérie. Forgive me for the pain I am giving you. I think that God, after all, will receive me with kindness because He sees how much I suffer. I loved life so dearly, but there is no other way, you see. I had already thought of it last night as I came from the station to the château. All along the road, when I saw the deep snow over the country, I said to myself that I wished I was lying in it and asleep forever. That is the death which I have chosen. I have read, I don't know where, that one does not suffer much, and that after the first shock is passed one sleeps quietly. I hope it will be so with me. You know where to find me, ma chérie. You remember I told you once that I wished to be buried there? I don't believe that is possible, but I wish at least to die there. It was there that he told me that he loved me—there that he asked me to be his wife. Alas! yes, I was very willing—for I loved him dearly, and I was very proud of his love, which I have not known how to keep. Tell him all. I desire you, I beseech you, to do it. Tell him of my crime, of my infamy; but tell him also of my repentance, won't you? It was you he should have loved, it was you he should have chosen. I always thought so. You alone were worthy of him. How I wish he would see it now! It is my last wish. You are both free, and then, if you owe me your happiness at last, you might have more pity, you might both of you forgive more sincerely your poor little dead one."

"THY CECILE."

This letter has often been bathed with my tears, but it was not at that moment. I was beside myself; neither thought, nor voice, nor tears were left me. All at once the idea that each moment lost might prove irreparable brought me to my senses. I ran to my room. I called one of my servants, Jean, my husband's old soldier, who had remained in my service and in whom I had great confidence. I told him in a few words that I had to go into the park, and that I wished him to accompany me. He was evidently struck with the change in my voice and the expression of my features, but he did not say anything. I got ready and he was ready in an instant, and we left the château by the stable door so as not to attract attention.

I had, however, to confide to this man all that I dared tell about the frightful truth. I commenced, therefore, as we walked along this explanation which I had hastily prepared: Madame d'Eblis, I said, had retired the night before in a feverish condition, the consequence of the fatigue of the journey through the snow. In her agitation she told me, as though dreaming some very strange things—that her head was burning, that she wanted to go out, to go into the park, to sleep in the snow. Unfortunately I had not attached much importance to these feverish words, particularly on seeing her go soundly to sleep; but this morning when I went to see how she was, I had not found her in her room, and I had satisfied myself she was not in the château. Other indications also led me to fear that her fever had increased during the night, and that in a delirious condition she had tried to realize her unfortunate reveries; that at first we would look for her traces near that retired portion of the park called the Hermitage. I supposed in her wanderings she could not help going in that direction, because the Hermitage had always been a favorite spot in her walks. Finally, that I had notified no one but myself, because I wished to spare Madame de Louvercy any share in my anxieties while there remained to me the least glimmer of hope.

Jean, after his first exclamation of surprise, had an idea which had not occurred to me. He retraced his steps quickly as far as the lodge, and sent the concierge to look up the family physician. Then we recommenced our walk which the depth of the snow rendered very difficult and very slow (which I was not sorry for). Several roads leading from the château to the Hermitage crossing each other, we took the shortest. On it the snow presented an even and undisturbed surface: no one had passed over it. A little hope entered my heart; but on the turn of the first avenue, Jean who was ahead of me stopped suddenly, uttering a cry. I ran forward, and saw with feelings of inexpressible anguish the tracks of two little feet, of two narrow, well-made shoes, which alone disturbed the surface of the pure white field. We looked sorrowfully at each other.

"Come, let us go on quickly," said I, in a low tone, and we hastened our steps still more. Following for a long time, alas! these tracks, in the midst of the frightful silence of the woods, under the gray sky, hanging so low and looking so gloomy on that sad winter morning, they led us almost out of the park; then they turned suddenly and were lost in the path which traverses the coppice, and which ends a few steps from the Hermitage.

"Madame is right," said Jean, in a whisper; "she is there."

He saw that I stopped and was tottering. He begged me to lean on his arm; but I could not do that, the path was too narrow for us two. I passed before him and went forward. Yes, in fact, she was there!

I have described elsewhere in these pages this glade of the Hermitage, its exceptional and poetic solitude, its groups of very old trees placed here and there apart from each other, its little arched fountain, its air of profound retirement. She was there! At the egress of the path my first look discovered her, and yet one could scarcely perceive her. She was lying there in her pale colored dress and laces, the head a little raised and leaning against one of the large beech trees which shaded the fountain. A little snow had fallen during the night, which had covered her with a kind of gauze. I remember, also, that from time to time light flakes became detached from the branches over her head, and floated gently down upon her.

I threw myself down beside her. "Cécile! Cécile!" cried I. I knelt, I took and pressed her cold hand, colder even than the snow. Nothing... the heart no longer beat... her color had become bluish... she was dead!

Ah, poor, dear child! It was then that my tears came back again.

And yet I could not believe it. In spite of the sad attestations of my companion, I hoped still. Remembering that the distance was short from the park limits to the huts of the charcoal burners, I told Jean to try to carry her to them. We might be able to warm her there and cause her to revive. The brave man, who wept like a child, took her up rigid as she was in his arms, and we directed our steps, I following him, to the huts. What a walk! What a scene! The desolate look of the country about us—the beautiful dead body in its ball dress, assumed, I always thought, from a strange, coquetish feeling, and a desire to have her death in harmony with her life, and also, without doubt, that her last look might remain with us more touching, more graceful, and more worthy of our pity.

While the inhabitants of the hut came round about her to assist me, I begged Jean to run to the château and bring the doctor, who ought to have arrived. But of what use is it to give these heart-rending details? The doctor came only to confirm the awful truth. Two hours later they bore her to the château.

I repeated to my mother-in-law the explanation which I had given to Jean, removing all idea of voluntary suicide. Cécile had had an attack of fever and delirium, she had gone out unconsciously in the middle of the night, the cold had seized upon her and killed her. The feverish condition in which they had seen her the night before lent to this explanation a great appearance of truth.

At noon a dispatch was sent to Monsieur d'Eblis, asking him to come immediately, as his wife was seriously ill. He arrived the same evening. Madame de Louvercy and I received him. As soon as he saw us he understood that all was over, and wished to be left alone with the body of poor Cécile. For a long while we could hear him sobbing bitterly by its side.

The day after, Cécile reposed forever in the little cemetery of Louvercy, not far from the grave she once entered alive.

Monsieur d'Eblis remained with us during the week. We saw but little of him. He was most of the time either shut up in his room or making long, solitary excursions in the park. He was much absorbed, very gloomy, and very silent. He never questioned me. He seemed to receive without any hesitation and without suspicion the account I gave him in explanation of the death of his wife, which I repeated to him with such details as were necessary to make it appear more probable.

One month later, some days after my return to Paris, about the middle of January, he came to see me. After a few words of little importance, and somewhat incoherent, he arose, approached me, and, placing a finger on my hand, said: "Come, Madame, why did she kill herself?"

This took me by surprise, and yet I was able to answer him without difficulty: "What! Cécile did not kill herself." "You are hiding it from me," said he; "you are hiding it from all the world; but I am sure that she did kill herself."

"You must be better informed than I am, then," said I; "and that is impossible, as I was there and you were not."

"Pardon me," said he, "but I know that all the details you have given me as to the circumstances preceding this accident are imaginary. For instance, you have singularly exaggerated the condition in which you left Cécile the evening before. Julie, her maid, went into her room just after you went out of it, and she found her sad, preoccupied, but very calm. She went in a second time, a little after midnight, because she heard some noise there. Cécile had arisen, and had put on her dressing gown. She told the girl that she was well, but, not being able to sleep, she was going to write to kill time until she felt sleepy. She appeared to have been weeping, and was very pale, but completely mistress of her senses, of her will, of her words. There was no appearance of that delirium which could have driven her, according to your account, to an act of folly. So you have deceived me. Oh, you have done it for some excellent reason, I am sure; but at any rate she has killed herself. Why? Can you tell me?"

"Once more," replied I, with as much firmness as I could command, "I know nothing of the kind."

"So you will not—you can not—tell me, the cause of her suicide?"

"If there has been a suicide, I am ignorant of the cause."

"You are not in the habit of prevaricating, my poor woman. Very well. Again pardon me. I will not urge you any more. I know enough as it is. She killed herself on the eve of my return, before having seen me again, so as not to see me again. If this is so, she did well."

How shall I describe what was passing in my mind, in my heart, in my conscience, during this terrible inquest? It never entered my mind to make so bad a use of the last feverish words of Cécile as to betray her secret with them; but when her husband, in spite of me, in spite of all the efforts I had made to hide it, had divined that secret, what course of conduct should I pursue? I could not absolutely decide to denounce and disgrace the friend who had confided in me; and, besides, I said to myself that I ought by all possible means to spare Monsieur d'Eblis the resentment, the bitterness, the degradation of one of those outrages so insupportable to a man of honor. I preferred to pierce his heart with a wound which was clean at least, rather than humiliate it—fill it, perhaps, with more grief, but at any rate with no shame. And, finally, if I allowed him to believe in Cécile's guilt, he could not help looking for her accomplice immediately and engaging him in a deadly quarrel.

"Well, sir," said I, resolutely, "since you wish it—yes, she did kill herself. Why? I think I do know why, and you shall know also."

I opened the little bureau in my boudoir, and took from it the letter which Cécile had sent me from Paris after our quarrel, and a very few days before the fatal event. In this letter, which I have transcribed in full a few pages before this, she tried, you will remember, to excuse her wrong doings on account of those of her husband. She complained in the strongest terms of not being beloved by him, and with an appearance of great sincerity, which, however, was so only in appearance, as she acknowledged to me afterward. She said she was very unfortunate, tired of her life and its dissipation, and ended by this cruelly equivocal phrase: "There are moments when my heart fails me, when my head loses itself entirely, when I feel almost on the point of doing something desperate, of committing a last and irreparable folly."

I held out the letter to Monsieur d'Eblis. He looked at the date and then read it; and while he read, the contraction of his features was such that I almost regretted what I had done. When he reached the end, his arms dropped by his sides, and, raising his eyes (which were sunken and troubled) to mine:

"Mon Dieu!" murmured he, "is it possible?"

I wiped my wet cheeks without replying. He read again that unfortunate letter. Not wishing to have any doubts enter his mind, I finished convincing him by saying that Cécile had passed the evening which preceded the catastrophe in reiterating that she had come to the end of her strength, that she had run away from Paris the evening before his return, as she was not able to bear the thought of beginning life again near him, and under the weight of his disapprobation and contempt. I added that I made use of every argument and all my tenderness in order to quiet her, and too easily I thought I had succeeded, seeing that after all the misfortune had come upon us.

"Then," cried he, his voice choking him, "it is I who killed her!"

He sank into a chair, and remained for a long time with his head in his hands, the tears trickling down between them. I suffered terribly on seeing him in this condition, but knowing only the choice between two evils, I felt persuaded that I had spared him the more bitter of the two. It was already night and quite late. Monsieur d'Eblis, somewhat recovered from his first emotions, arose, thanked me in a soft, affectionate tone of voice for having told him the truth, hard as it was for him to bear, and left me.

It is two months to-day since this scene took place between us. During the following night—yes, during all the days and nights since then—I have asked myself if it might not be followed by consequences which I had not foreseen, and still less wished I acknowledge. I will explain myself here with the utmost sincerity. The first impression made upon me by the death of Cécile had been clear of any afterthought. It was a blow which confounded me, which plunged me into the very depths of despair; and I may not be believed when I say that after time had commenced its tranquilizing work the thought never entered my mind that a union with Monsieur d'Eblis had become possible. Cécile's last note, her final farewell, ought to have been sufficient to remind me of it. We were both free, and both innocent of the sad events which made us free. I did not feel in my conscience, nor could I conceive that there was in his, any obstacle which could hereafter be raised between us to separate two hearts bound together for so long a time by the sincerest affection.

However, from the day in which for the purpose of removing Monsieur d'Eblis suspicions I had given him Cécile's letter, and on which he thought himself guilty of her suicide, I asked myself if I had not put into the conscience of that honest man scruples of which I might become the victim. Would not his generous and sensitive soul think, after my piously false revelation, that an expiation, a reparation was due to her who was no more? I can not, however, desire that, and yet unfortunately many things tend to make me believe that it is possible: Monsieur d'Eblis' extreme reserve of manner toward me, the rarity of his visits, his continued and increasing dejection. This is the sad and formidable trial which I am undergoing, or which threatens me. It is at this crisis that I had the idea, that I indeed felt the necessity, of recalling frankly and without reservation all the events of my life from the day of my marriage. I then again took up my diary. I have told it all, confided everything to it, so as to be able afterward to seek in it an inspiration for my future conduct. Well, in all truth, I can find nothing there, neither an act, nor a sentiment, nor a thought, which might restrict the liberty which God has rendered me—nothing which can prevent my accepting the happiness which I dreamt of formerly, which for so long a time has been refused, and which at last seems permitted me.

But he? Ah! I hope still that his manner, his silence, may be explained by the excessive grief which I felt it my duty to afflict him with, by his mourning still so recent, by the propriety which commands it. Yes, I hope so; but if, after all, I am deceiving myself! If the falsehood that I risked to save Cécile's honor, and to protect his, should rise up between us and alone separate us! Then what is to be done? I dare not think of it.

Eight days later, March 20, 1878.—Nothing is wanting which could add to the severity of my trial. It is complete, relentless.

Monsieur d'Eblis came in this evening just after I had put my child to bed. He wished to see me alone, and I received him in my boudoir. Hardly was he seated when he said:

"Madame, I am about to take leave of you. I am going away."

"Going away!" I exclaimed.

"Yes. I have obtained the position of Second Military Attaché to Russia. I go to-morrow evening, and I beg permission to come to-morrow morning and take leave of my little ward, whom I do not wish to awaken this evening."

For some moments I was unable to utter an intelligible word. He continued, in a low tone. "Heretofore we have understood each other so well, that we will understand each other now, I am sure. When you revealed to me the true cause of Cécile's suicide, I understood immediately, knowing you so well, what duty you imposed upon me. I understood that you commanded me to love and respect in death her whom I had so misunderstood while living. That is what you wish, is it not? I obey you. But for it to have any weight, I must leave this place and go away from you."

I did not answer. He arose and said:

"Adieu, then! I have loved you very much. I may say that I have loved you more than honor even, for you will think meanly of me to hear that when it seemed as though I had discovered that Cécile had injured me, and had killed herself to end her remorse, frightful as was the thought, my miserable heart admitted it even with a secret joy, because it separated me from her and gave me back to you again."

While he uttered these words, the unhappy man looked at me inquiringly, with an expression in which doubt and anguish seemed to mingle. I remained silent. He pressed my hand and left me.

And now let me see. Can I let him go away? Is it possible? Had I ought to? Can I? O my God! tell me. I have loved him so dearly! Ah, my God! I do love him so very much! And now shall I let him exile himself, and go to his death perhaps, when with one single word I can keep him forever by my side? He will believe me if I tell him the truth; besides, I have Cécile's last letter—the confession of her fault, written with her own hand. She herself has given me permission—she has even recommended me to give it to her husband.

Ah! it is but just after all, and we two have sacrificed ourselves for so long a time! Happiness awaits us. Nothing separates us from it but an excessive, an unhealthy, a truly foolish scruple. No, I will not let him go! I am decided as to that.

I was up all night thinking it over. All night I saw again the dear little friend of my childhood on her bed of snow, and I have sworn to do for her that which I should have wished her to do for me—protect her good name to the very end, and, even at the expense of my own happiness, even at the expense of my life, defend her honor at all hazards, and leave my poor little dead one pure and white in the memory of all. Sleep in peace, ma chérie! Only God and I know your fault!

I have just burned her mournful note, the only proof, and have written to Monsieur d'Eblis begging him to spare me his last farewell. I shall never see him again. I am alone, alone forever. But you remain to me, my daughter. I write these last lines by the side of your cradle. I hope some day, my child, to place these pages among your wedding presents. They will, may be, make you love your poor, romantic mother. You will learn, perhaps, that passion and romance are rendered good for us sometimes with God's assistance—that they elevate our hearts and teach us the higher duties, the greater sacrifices, and the purer joys of life. I weep, it is true, while telling you so; but, believe me, there are tears which even angels might covet.

An Oakland cat was in the cellar of its home, and seeing a crab went up to examine it. A moment later the cat was helping the crab up stairs at a rate of a mile a minute. To a crab such a rate of speed must have been a luxury.

"I never knew a fashionable woman who did not think more of a fool than of an upright, sensible man," says Talmage. And everybody knows he is a favorite with the ladies.

Two lovers in New Orleans were struck with yellow fever at the same time. They both recovered and were married, after which they both relapsed and died.

An able man shows his spirit by gentleness and resolute actions; he is neither hot nor timid.—Chesterfield.

Keep clear of the man who does not value his own character. The ideal saint of the young moralist is cut from sappy timber.

True prosperity builds up the soul rather than pocket-books.

The vigorous idea keeps warm though wrapped in few words.

Faith that asks no questions kills the soul and stifles the intellect.

A MYTH OF MAIDENHOOD.

There was a maiden in a moonlight tower,
Silent, and all about was still;
The wind went creeping down the hill,
While she was watching, hour by hour,
A little budding flower.

Of Gothic windows, carved, mossed, and quaint,
In the gray wall were only three;
Under one slept the pale and wave-haired sea,
Hushed to a low, bewildering plaint,
Sad as a lover faint.

The second to the still, eternal snow
Of far-off mountain ranges turned;
On the dark fir and drooping cedars burred
The full moon, with its motion slow
And soft, enraptured glow.

The third looked on wild violets in a vale,
Hiding their lips beneath the grass,
While the light with searching ripples pass,
And the stars faintly flush and pale
The olive's smoky mail.

Low crept the winds, with wondrous love and power,
Through the still dusk and vibrant air,
The sweetness of the moving earth to bear,
As she sat, watching, hour by hour,
That slow unfolding flower.

She saw the sea's vague lapse and misty bar
Where the sky bent its shadowy wings;
She saw the pines, as immemorial kings,
Loom on their throne-lands cool and far
Against the evening star.

Each hidden purple violet breathed to her
Its worship without word or shape;
So stood of old, on his Egyptian cape,
With golden sandal-wood and precious myrrh,
Some Isis worshipper.

Nor useless any trembling song went by
From blossoms filled with drowsy bees,
Or midnight voices of wind-harried seas,
Which burden, as a human cry,
Wide earth and wider sky.

Old books she had wherein with deathless love
All her deeds shone forth as stars;
From dying nations, fratricidal wars,
Her spirit, as the olive-seeking dove,
Over waste fields did move.

And she was carving, every happy night,
A statue tall and wise and fair,
Timing her tasks to moonlit beats of air,
And throbbing stars, and restless might
Of the wave's rare delight.

And often thus a universal moan
Shook still that sleepless tower,
Moving her chisel with mysterious power,
Where she had shined herself alone
With that awakening stone.

Theo swung her cresset lamp in circles slow,
The while, with close and eager thought,
Her purest dream, her white ideal, was wrought—
The sun-god, on his bended bow,
Had no diviner glow.

For this she garnered every transient gleam
From the revealing heart of earth;
So ever, fed by love, and hope, and mirth,
Pure, simple, passionless, supreme,
Rose that fair maiden's dream.

NILES, November, 1878.

CHARLES H. SHINN.

"Love's Young Dream."

They sat together 'neath the shady bowers,
The rustling leaves aloof the silence broke,
They whiled away the summer's golden hours—
They knew not bow, for neither spoke.

The gentle zephyrs stole so softly through
The fragrant flowers to kiss her blushing cheek;
The rapturous moments all too quickly flew,
They live in bliss, but neither cared to speak.

She on his manly bosom rests her head,
He toying with her golden tresses as they fall;
Love speaks, though not a single word is said—
The kiss and rapt embraces tell it all.

No whispered word of fondest love
Floats on the summer breeze. No voice is heard
The rustling leaves and babbling brook above
But humming bee and happy mated bird.

What to them is all mankind beside?
What to them the pains of worldly care?
The joys in store when she shall be his bride
Fills up brimful the blissful measure there.

The lovely spot to both was sacred made,
And cherished ever for each other's sake,
Where long they lingered 'neath the fragrant shade
And dreamed of love, but neither spake.

SAN FRANCISCO, November 20, 1878.

PHILMORE.

At the Gate.

We said good-bye: your little hand
A moment lay in mine alone.
That moment spanned a far-off land
Where gracious skies were always blue,
Where trusting hearts were always true,
And melody had perfect tone.

We said good-bye: your lips and mine
Met once and parted—only once.
It was not chance nor yet design—
Somehow it happened—and 'tis sweet
To think again our lips may meet,
And I—shall not be such a dunce.

SAN FRANCISCO, October 20, 1878.

Our actions are like the terminations of verses, which we rhyme as we please.—Rochejoucauld.

Last words of a lady who was hugged to death weep for me. I die happy."

A Chat about Folk at the National Capital.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 11, 1878.

Californians have always taken so prominent a part in the social as well as political life of the nation's capital, that I think a few paragraphs about those best known here may be of interest to the ARGONAUT's readers, and especially to those who, although no longer with us, are most kindly remembered in our city. Not a few here would join me in wishing that ex-Senator Stewart's wife and his daughter were not so perfectly content in San Francisco that they find no time to spend in Washington, where their many lovable qualities were always highly appreciated. Mrs. Hooker was an especial favorite of mine, and I have rarely seen a young girl who so admirably combined domestic traits with the accomplishments and personal attractions which made her so popular in every ball room in which she appeared.

Our city residents, although our population is of a nature that each winter witnesses a marked change of character in our social drama, have the excellent characteristic of rarely forgetting old friends; and although a score of years has passed since Dr. Gwin's family were the acknowledged social leaders here, their names are still mentioned frequently, and their entertainments, especially Mrs. Gwin's fancy ball, are yet rated among the most illustrious social events our gay capital city has ever known.

The return of Associate-Justice Field, of the Supreme Court, gave a full bench to the highest judicial body in the land, and now his handsome wife, who has been shopping in New York, has come to reside over their beautiful home on Capitol Hill, fronting on the picturesque eastern half of the Capitol grounds, and commanding a view not only of the entire eastern front of the building, but overlooking a large portion of the city. California may fairly claim to have as a representative among the wives of the Justices of the Supreme Court, the youngest and prettiest.

Postmaster-General Key and family, on their return hither, could not speak too warmly in praise of what they enjoyed on the Pacific Slope, and the hospitality shown them in your generous land. Mrs. Key and her elder daughter have now gone to Tennessee to visit the younger children, who are at Mr. Key's residence near Chattanooga. The elder daughter, who was with her parents and sister in California, will make her début in society here this winter. She has been highly educated, and is a modest, sensible girl.

Mrs. Manier, of San Francisco, has been spending a few weeks here, and will probably remain some time longer. Mr. Manier is now visiting New York, and their daughter has gone to a Wesleyan Institute in Tennessee.

Senator Sharon's return is anticipated with pleasure, and it is hoped that the rumor that his daughter will accompany him is true.

The news telegraphed that Senator Jones was secure of reelection was most acceptable here where he and his winning young wife are generally esteemed. They had a charming coterie in their home on Capitol Hill last winter, when his sister and niece, and two of Mrs. Jones' agreeable young friends from Cincinnati, aided the hostess in making their Monday evening receptions delightful.

The marriage of Miss Brown, of this city, a younger sister of Mrs. Morton, of San Francisco, is soon to take place at her parents' residence, just beyond the city limits, at Mount Pleasant. Every year a member of that family marries.

Clara Morris once gave me an enthusiastic account of her triumphs in your city, and I thought her ambition had received a greater stimulus there than any where else. The enthusiasm of her San Francisco audiences inspired her. I have felt decidedly for her physical sufferings, which I have witnessed too often not to know are at times excruciating. When she was here a year ago I was with her behind the scenes, when her pain was so great that she was forced to have a physician in attendance to administer morphine hyperdermically between the acts of Miss Mutton. Knowing that even her iron will must ultimately give way under the strain of physical anguish and nervous excitement, I said to her one day during the engagement she played here, in October, 1877: "Why do you not take a year of rest?" She answered: "I have a reason for continuing to act in spite of my health, but what it is I will not tell even my best friends until the time comes. If it is told after I am dead, people will say: 'What a good woman she was;' but if known while I am alive, they will say: 'What a fool she was.' There is just that difference which death makes in the estimate of one's motives."

On Thursday of this week a grand-daughter of Edward Everett, Miss Charlotte Everett Wise, is to marry Colonel Archibald Hopkins, chief clerk of the United States Court of Claims. The late Lieutenant Wise, the father of the bride-elect, was the author of Los Gringos.

Colonel Harry Thornton, of San Francisco, who has been here attending to business in which two of your greatest mining corporations are involved, has gone to New York to spend a week, but will, on his return, make an argument before the Secretary of the Interior. His niece, the wife of Lieutenant Commander Watson, went to Frankfort, Kentucky, to visit her husband's relatives, when he set sail on his vessel—the Wyoming—for a cruise in the Mediterranean.

MISS GRUNDY.

Now that, in defiance of the Monroe doctrine, royalty, in the person of the Princess Louise, has obtained a foothold on this continent, and the court will be established in Canada's capital, there will naturally occur amongst society people a certain nervousness as to the matter of court etiquette. For that anybody who is anybody will consent to remain un-"presented" is not for a moment to be supposed. We shall all go to see the new Governor-General (who is also a Marquis) and the new Governor-General (who has the advantage of being a Princess), and we must needs know how to behave ourselves when in their august presence. It will not do to go in the wrong kind of clothes at the right time of day, nor in the right kind at the wrong time. We must know how to shake hands with the Marquis, and whether to shake hands with the Princess; where to set our rubber over-shoes and hang our hats. Those of us who are women must know how nearly to let their dresses come off—whether they are to slip down to the waist and drag a proportionate length on the floor, or fall to the ankles and be all train. Then there are various rites and ceremonies of introduction, a code of bows, a complicated system of smiles, to be mastered. What kind of visiting cards are we to use in calling on a Princess, and are we to double down all four corners? These are matters of serious importance, worthy of attentive consideration prefaced with prayer. In this emergency, as in all others, the people look to the press for guidance, and they shall not suplicate in vain. The ARGONAUT does not propose to help them out any (we are profoundly accomplished in all these matters—were brought up in a court, though some called it an inquiry), but space is valuable and we beg to merely direct inquiring minds to the New York Herald for particulars. That enterprising journal has secured from the Lord Chamberlain of Her Majesty the Queen of England a compendium of the rules and regulations which govern conduct in cases of "presentation at court." By careful study of this authentic manual almost any one may hope to acquire such a deportment as will insure him the cordial welcome of not being kicked out; the rules are adapted to the capacity of even the least intelligent curbstone broker or his female—our millionaire operators of the Big Board can master them at a glance. It is very gratifying that Lord Beaconsfield's partiality to royalty and its belongings has enabled free-born American citizens, by merely crossing the Canadian border, to enjoy all the advantages of European travel.

Une aventure assez plaisante eut lieu, dernièrement, à San Francisco, dans un des nos hôtels le plus à la mode, je dirai même, l'hôtel le plus grandiose de la ville. Le jeune homme était beau et distingué, à la tournure élégante et cavalière. Elle, au contraire, était d'un âge douteux; elle avait déjà passé le méridien de la vie, et était, ce qu'on nomme vulgairement "sur le retour." Cinquante hivers au moins avaient blanchi sa tête, et elle portait fièrement et noblement le poids d'un demi-siècle de vertu. Jamais de sa vie, elle n'avait eu une "liaison amoureuse." Bref, c'était un modèle parfait, et l'on pouvait admirer en elle l'image vivante de la pudeur. Les femmes d'une beauté respectable qui ont passé un certain âge, atteignent trop vite et, à regret bien souvent, ce degré de perfection. Notre vénérable dame s'était retirée paisiblement dans sa chambre où n'avaient jamais pu pénétrer les traits de Cupidon, et après avoir pudiquement ramené sur sa couche les draperies protectrices de sa vertu, elle se laissait aller aux douceurs du sommeil. Notre galant jeune homme s'était, lui aussi, retiré de bonne heure, laissant selon la coutume de l'hôtel, ses bottes à la porte de sa chambre. C'est alors que la catastrophe arriva. Un méchant farceur porta les cothurnes de notre nouveau Paris devant la porte de notre antique Hélène, et là, pendant toute la soirée, ces bottes accusatrices se dressaient et semblaient profaner la pureté bien connue de l'endroit. Le garçon d'hôtel les nettoya, et elles persistèrent avec une effronterie éclatante à rester devant le seuil où dormaient paisiblement la vertu et la bonté. Le lendemain, c'était la fable de tout l'hôtel; la plaisanterie circula d'étage en étage, et sur tous les visages, on pouvait remarquer un petit sourire moqueur. Quand la trop confiante dame, après avoir achevé sa toilette matinale, se préparait à descendre à son déjeuner, elle aperçut les bottes. Jugez de son étonnement et de sa colère! Elle comprit immédiatement la noirceur de la plaisanterie; la rougeur de l'indignation et de la vertu outragée empourpra son visage. Elle alla droit au jeune homme et lui dit, les larmes aux yeux: "Je n'aime pas une pareille plaisanterie, c'est mal, indigne d'un gentilhomme, c'est cruel et peu généreux." "Mademoiselle," répondit timidement le jeune homme, "je compatis à votre infortune, vous êtes fâchée, et certes, vous en avez le droit, je comprends votre juste indignation, mais grand Dieu! imaginez-vous quelle doit être la mienne!"

If matinées were abolished in San Francisco a large number of cultivated and agreeable women of good social position would never, or seldom, see a play. Every observant person who has lived long in San Francisco, and had his attention called to the matter, must have noticed—and we hope deplored—the growing indisposition on the part of our young men to take ladies to the theatre. They like well enough to go themselves, the good young men, but they find "women a nuisance, you know." Many of them, if ever seen at the theatres in company with ladies, are obviously doing duty in the capacity of son, brother, or city cousin; they look bored, and they go out between the acts. Of course as there is a reason for everything there is a reason for this. Our young man is of a peculiar kind of young man; he differs in many particulars from the Eastern variety of his species. The one particular which concerns the matter of this our present complaint is that he has less affection for "the girls." Whether this is owing to the enervating climate, or whether the greater variety and picturesqueness of the vices in San Francisco, as compared with other cities, bewilder him and weaken his affection by dispersing it amongst many alluring wickednesses, of which Youngwomankind is only one, we need not here inquire. As we do not intend to prescribe a remedy we are not concerned to ascertain the seat of the disease. It is sufficient to know that our young unmarried men do not adequately admire our young unmarried women; no young unmarried men could—it takes us experienced oldsters to manage a just and sufficient recognition of these divine creatures' merits. Not caring for the ladies, the young men steadfastly decline to ruin themselves in theatre-tickets and carriage hire for their advantage; for it must be remembered that a pocket already nearly depleted by billiards, wines, cigars, club-debts, and such-like necessities, is prone to economize in luxuries. And so it happens that to our young women the matinée is a blessing—they can attend it without an escort and snap their slender fingers at the thrifty young males who stare at them for nothing as they emerge. We have intimated that we would not suggest a remedy for this unpleasant state of things, so we won't; but it may be that if our young women would make the act of taking them to the theatre less costly to the poor fellows who have so many other expenses to meet, it would be unnecessary to import better and fresher young men from the East.

Bonbons.—French and Otherwise.

The surgeon-in-chief sent for one of his junior assistants, who, hastening to his superior's presence, found him just sitting down to a superb roast fowl and a delicious pâté.

"Ah, Smith," cries the chief, "have you breakfasted yet?"

"No, doctor," replies the assistant, radiantly.

"Then go and get your breakfast and come back; you will have lots of time."

M. de Carneran, presiding magistrate of the Parliament of Trevaux, was an honest and capable man, but of so lively a temper that he could not brook the slightest contradiction. Once upon a time he had to lecture before a village audience on—"of all things—"Moderation." He began:

"Gentlemen, moderation—shut the door, there's too much draught!—Gentlemen, moderation is one—will you be so good as to shut that door?—Gentlemen, moderation is one of the greatest virtues—hi, there; ——— it all to ———, are you going to shut that ——— door; ——— you?"

X. is reading his new play to the actors who are to present it, and fears that they may not see as clearly as he does the fine points and systematic developments of his characters.

"I read very indifferently," he says, apologetically, "and I fear that, perhaps, I do not set before you my creations in all their breadth, proportion, light, and shade."

"Oh, no," cries the star, with warmth, "I have fully entered into, and become permeated with, the spirit of my rôle. Why," she continues, enthusiastically, "I can already see my costume for the first act before me."

"Well, I will take it, though it is rather dear; pay you half cash, and owe you the rest. That do?"

"It will."

In the course of time the creditor, thinking the bill has run about long enough, calls upon the purchaser.

"Me dear boy," says the purchaser, "you ain't living up to your contract. If I were to pay you the rest I wouldn't owe it to you, and the understanding was that I should owe it to you."

A policeman captures a pickpocket with his hand in a gentleman's pocket.

"Je vous ai mort aux droits!" he cries—"I have got you dead to rights."

"I wasn't going to take this gentleman's pocket-book, s'help me."

"But you had it in your hand."

"I was at putting it back. I was only practising so as to keep my hand in for the Exposition, when I shall be too patriotic to employ my skill upon anybody except foreigners. Vive la France!"

He had arrived much later than he was due at his friend's suburban residence, and so set himself about making apologies.

"You see, it wasn't my fault. As there was no traveler to go by it, the train did not start. Besides, I had missed it. But for that there would have been a passenger and it would have started."

A Provençal and Norman were discussing the relative merits of oil and butter. Each had exhausted all the arguments that could be adduced for his side, when the Provençal cried triumphantly:

"Let's see you anoint a king with butter!"

A beau sabreur who was perhaps waiting for his inheritance addressed a little rustic who was boo-hooing on a heap of stones. "What is the matter, my lad?" quoth the kindly dragoon. "Ou-ou-ou!" wept the child. "Feyther be dead." "Poor little cove," sympathized the kindly giant; "here is a shilling for you; and if only your father had been mine I would have given you half a crown!"

Elegy in an Irish country churchyard. Sorrowing "widow-man" has just erected the invariable draped urn in memory of the late placens uxore; to him critical old lady, having duly inspected the same: "An iligant monyement, so it is, sor; as nate a patterned water jug as iver I see, and a claim white towel reposin' peaceful-like on the top av it. Well, well, it's herself was the orderly woman, the heavens be her bed!"

An old lady was being examined as a witness. To almost every question asked, the counsel on the opposite side would jump up and say, "I object as irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent." This appeared to annoy the old lady, who seemed inclined to make a personal matter of it. Finally the interrogatory was put, "Did you see those men in that field on that day?" "Maybe what I saw wouldn't be evidence," was her answer, "because I saw them through glasses. I am old and wear spectacles."

An art critic, going into a gallery in a state of mild inebriation to criticise some pictures, sees himself in a glass, and taking out his note-book, writes as follows: "First room; head of a drunkard, no signature; has a great deal of character; red nose remarkably truthful. Must be a portrait from life; think I've seen that face somewhere."

"Tim," said the parson severely, "suppose that the Lord should call you just as an oath was on your lips?" "I shouldn't go," said Tim.

PRELUDES--IN DIVERS KEYS.

"Wilt thou have music? Hark! Apollo plays."

With regard to this matter of musical criticism, I want to say just a word. For a week past I have been literally bombarded with questions—written and verbal—as to why I have attacked Mr. Mayer; why I have been so hard on Mr. Heyman; why I have found fault with some of the performances of Mr. Herold's orchestra, etc. A lady says: "Why, I thought that Miss Schmidt was a personal friend of yours, and that you considered her very talented; why, then, do you (for I know it is you) pitch into her playing of the Chopin Ballade?" Why, my dear madam, it is precisely because I consider Miss Schmidt to be a very talented young lady that I think it of great importance that when she commits a serious error it should be pointed out to her—that if she blunders she should be made aware of it, kindly but firmly; in other words, that she should have the helping hand of honest, intelligent criticism, and such criticism, if any, shall she have from me. When I was invited by the proprietors of this paper to write for them upon musical subjects, I assumed that in calling upon one possessed of some experience and accurate knowledge in these matters, and placing the department unreservedly in his hands, it was their intention that it should become a vital, living thing, rising above the level of mere routine reporting, and unfettered by considerations of any sort excepting only those of truth and fair dealing. This assumption I based upon the well-known character of the paper, and upon this assumption I have written. I have endeavored—and hope that I always shall—to deal fairly with whatever has come before me, and have known neither friend nor foe. But it is difficult in criticism of any kind to be always sparing of the feelings of those whose performances are under consideration. These feelings lie so near the surface, and the skin is apt (especially with musical people) to be so very tender, that it is oftentimes only a matter of the merest accidental collision—the lightest touch, perchance—that causes the abrasion. Then, straightway, a howl! Let me say that I am somewhat familiar with this sforzando furioso that goes up from the throats of wronged sopranos, ill-used violinists, and outraged pianists, and that it does not produce the slightest effect upon me. I have done my own howling in my day—been criticised, and did not like it. But I came, in time, to recognize the truth of much of it, and hope I benefited by it. And when I hear the plaintive wailings of the unfortunates and their friends, it troubles me no more than do the yells of the naughty boy afflict the surgeon who is cutting a splinter out of his hand. To be sure, one must know somewhat of anatomy in order to cut wisely and so as to be really helpful; one must know how to avoid arteries and nerves, and what is the proper application to heal the wound afterward. But then, if one is quite certain that the splinter is there, and that it ought to come out, there should be no hesitancy, no trembling, no uncertain use of the lancet. It is just in this certainty that the whole matter lies. This business of musical criticism has long been in the hands of reporters, who, lacking the technical knowledge necessary for real criticism, have mostly—and very wisely—glossed over matters in general terms; praising much, and forbearing to censure lest they might do so unjustly—not always forbearing, indeed, nor always exercising the best judgment in glossing over matters. But it may be said that the more critical of them have in the main shot so wide of the mark that the absurdity of their shooting at all was speedily recognized; they did but little harm. The harm that has been done may be attributed mostly to the species that I call "musical toadies," the hangers-on of certain cliques and coteries, with friends to serve and cronies to praise; the small natures with room in them for petty malice and feline spite; the little, scribbling musicians of the press. It is these who have lifted into notoriety the small fry that has for a long time past kept the musical status of this city at so low a level; one had but to pousser a bit—to flatter the soi-disant critic—in order to be favorably noticed, howsoever bad or trivial a performance might be. I shall not attempt any defense of any criticism that I have written or may write in the future. Those of my readers who are at all familiar with the subject must admit that I know whereof I speak, and that my praise, as well as my censure, has been in the main correct. I am aware that it is the custom to speak of musicians as a jealous set. This, however, does not concern me. I know that no written or spoken word of mine is prompted by any such feeling, and can trust to the future for an indorsement of every word that I write. Nor shall personal considerations find any place in my work. I can heartily respect and admire Mr. Herold, and yet take umbrage at certain faults in his orchestra; I can continue my very pleasant acquaintance with Mr. Mayer, and yet consider it my duty to point out the unworthy and trivial manner in which he conducts the music of his church. I may have a great personal dislike for an artist, and yet respect and admire his work. I love good music, and despite the bad, and so long as these columns remain in my charge they shall be devoted only to the encouragement of what is worthy in music, and to the condemnation of what is trivial and unworthy, wherever I may find it.

Regarding Herr "Doppelkreuz" of the Post, I as a musician can not afford to have any controversy with a man who writes musical puffs for candy.

A concert given by, or for, Miss Cecilia Adler, at Pacific Hall, on last Monday evening, presented some curious features. Let me mention the pleasant ones first. They consisted of the singing by Mr. Jacob Müller of the baritone part of "La ci darem," which was in many respects an agreeable surprise—the voice appearing fresher and the manner much more artistic than when last I heard him—and a song by Proch, which was excellently sung by Miss Leonore Simons. This young lady has a mezzo-soprano voice of fine timbre and good compass. She does not always sing well, but seems to be trying to. I fancy, however, that she is following false gods—bad models. Mr. Joseph Rekel also accompanied on the piano-forte with good taste and nice discretion. The task of playing the accompaniments through a long and varied programme is one of much greater difficulty than is generally imagined, and a thankless one at that. (Since Mr. Herold's piano-forte days we have not had a really good resident accompanist; Miss Alice Schmidt occasionally does a nice thing in that direction, but she is rather exclusive, and rarely plays except for her brothers.) Of the little concert-giver—she seems to be about twelve years old—one may say that she has certainly a nice voice, of rather agreeable quality and considerable power. But why this little child, immature in voice, and only in the very alphabet of her musical education—if musical it be at all—should be permitted or encouraged to sing in public is incomprehensible. I dare say she has some talent. She sings the music correctly and pretty well in tune; but she sings like the merest child after all, and as such it appears to me that her proper place is not in the concert-room, but at her studies. I should be sorry to think that she sang by the advice of her teacher, Madame Fabbri, although that lady's appearance at the concert implied her consent, at least. Surely Madame Fabbri's experience as a singer must make her aware that her little pupil has still everything to learn, and that she will require a great deal of careful training before she is fit to sing in public; and it can certainly not be considered a wise or healthy beginning of the education of a young child to bring it before a promiscuous audience, to be flattered and applauded for its unripe and crude efforts. The guardians of this little girl are evidently pursuing a wrong course with her—one which, if persisted in, is more than likely to bring about a result quite the reverse of what they anticipate. The residue of the concert was mere rubbish.

Said a well known singing-master to me the other day: "After all, there is no branch of music-teaching in which there is so much barefaced humbug and swindling practiced as in ours. I know something of most of the singing-teachers in this city, and I don't believe there are more than a round half dozen out of the whole lot of them—over a hundred—who know, or have ever really tried to know, anything about the voice. The most of them trade upon the ignorance and vanity of their victims; their only capital is impudence and the ability to flatter." I know a little about this matter myself, and my friend's statement of the case is undoubtedly quite correct. I do not know that San Francisco is much worse off in this respect than most cities of its size, but in one respect it is most unfortunate. Considerably removed from the great routes of travel, and isolated, as it were, it forms a species of cul-de-sac into which are tumbled all sorts of wrecked and broken-down opera singers, some of whom have drifted in on the wave that has sent them—with failing voice and powers—constantly further and further from the centres of art; others remaining as the flotsam and jetsam of opera companies stranded on our somewhat dangerous shores; and still others, humbugs à la hausse aus, as the Germans would say. Not one in a hundred of them knows even how to sing, much less how to teach. Every community is full of people with "voices"—often enough without—who imagine that with their voice and their talent they have but to go through a short course of solfeggio to be ready at once to undertake the most difficult rôles of the Grand Opera; people who have been praised by ignorant friends, and perhaps, after some public appearance, flattered by equally ignorant newspaper critics; the stuff, in other words, of which dupes are made. These unfortunates are taken in hand by the so-called artists, who, after assuring them that they have remarkable voices and wonderful capabilities, proceed to prepare them for a great career by plunging them into the most ambitious parts before they have any idea of forming or sustaining a tone. The sopranos are started with Norma or Lucia, the tenors never think of anything more modest than Raoul or Stradella, and the contraltos straightway fall to a critical examination of their figures in order to prepare for a début as Orsini—or, should there perchance remain any lingering preference for skirts, as Rosina. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the victims are never taught to sing at all. They are simply coached in a few arias and scenas; they are flattered and used as bait. When enough of them are ready for it, and a sufficient acquaintance established in social circles to work off a goodly number of tickets, a concert is announced. Then the music-sharps of the press are assiduously cultivated, the pupils sell tickets (often buy, and give them away to friends—claqueurs) and the concert—in which Miss Blank sings the Casta Diva, and Mr. Blanker Mapari, with enormous effect—takes place. We all know the sequel. Everybody is praised as the coming baritone, tenor, or what not, and more pupils (dupes) are secured. Or, perchance, it is an opera that is performed. This pleases the dupes more than a concert, for they have costumes, footlights, an orchestra, etc., and can say afterward: "When I sang Leonore," or "When I wore that lovely dress as the Queen of the Night." All this can be fitly characterized by only one word; it is a swindle. I do not refer to the mere money that is literally stolen from the pockets of the pupils and their friends—that is a small matter; but to the broken and ruined voices, the blasted hopes, the misdirected work, the false and unworthy ambitions, that result from this chicanery and charlatanerie. We have had débuts in plenty during the past ten years; where is there to be found a single desirable result from the hands of one of these teachers I have described? Where is there to be heard a pupil of such as these who retains any freshness or charm of voice, or who has learned to sing any of the simple and beautiful songs that should form the basis of our home music? They teach nothing of singing, nothing of music. They merely foster the taste for the flash and glitter of what is, after all, to music what the scenic drama is to literature. They do nothing but harm, absolutely nothing, to those who come under their influence, and had I the making of the "code" I would have a law subjecting every proposed singing teacher to the most rigid examination, and it should be felony to teach without a diploma and license.

S. E.

BOOK REVIEWS.

We have received The Outlines of Ontological Science, by Henry N. Day. This is an invaluable work. It is full of most wonderful, abstruse, logical, and metaphysical learning. It discourses of philosophical psychology, theology, and cosmology; it treats of the province, the nature, the gradations, the stages, the limitations, the forms of knowledge; of personal dependence, spontaneity, and autonomy; of vital force and cosmic phenomena; of pantheism, hylozoism, theism, and of primary dualism. The theories of Descartes are explained, and those of Hegel and Ulrici refuted. It is the best book that Billings, Harbourn & Co. have ever sent us; the publishers, Putnam & Son, can now retire on their laurels, and go out of business. The work is so far beyond our comprehension that we know it must be most valuable for its learning. It ought to be at once supplied to John Swett and Professor Knowlton, for the girls' high schools. If translated into the German it would make a splendid text book for Professor Herbst's Cosmopolitan School. Every poor child in the city should be furnished with a copy.

John Allen was a young gentleman resident of Michigan, attending the agricultural college at Lansing. He was called home by the death of his father, and found it necessary with his brother Will to work the farm for the support of his mother and the family. He found seventeen old-fashioned bee-hives with swarms of the common black bee upon the place. He ascertained that with an investment of $50, and an expenditure of $19.70, there had been a net gain $156 in one year. Taking these figures for data he made the following table as a calculation of the increase and profit for five years, beginning with five hives, and calculating an increase of three swarms from each old one. Thus the old one and the three new ones would give four swarms in the fall for each one had in the spring:

Hives.		Value.
5 × 4 =	20	5 × $10 =	$ 50
20 × 4 =	80	20 × 10 =	200
80 × 4 =	320	80 × 10 =	800
320 × 4 =	1,280	320 × 10 =	3,200
1,280 × 4 =	5,120	1,280 × 10 =	12,800

And so John Allen went to bee-raising. He commenced with thirty-seven swarms, and in one season cleared a net profit of $3,776.72. How he did it is narrated most pleasantly in his book entitled The Blessed Bees, for sale by Billings, Harbourn & Co. All this was done in Michigan; cold, bleak, desolate Michigan. California is the bee State of America; so we commend its perusal to everybody who raises bees, who wishes to raise bees, and who is fond of good, choice honey on hot biscuits and buckwheat cakes.

From Henry Holt & Co. we are in receipt of a volume of their Leisure Hour Series, entitled The First Violin, by Jessie Fothergill. As we do not play the fiddle, and have no leisure hours, we have given the book to the fiddler that our musical critic so cruelly excoriated a few days since. We do not intend, as a rule, to give books and other presents to all who fall under the lash of our criticism; there are not books enough to go around. There is another reason why we do not favor this work on violins. We have had a quarrel with a fiddler, and he got the best of the affair by becoming its historian.

The ARGONAUT, ambitious to become the vehicle of thought, invites thinking and writing men to contribute occasionally to its columns. General Thomas H. Williams promises us an article upon "Swamp Land Reclamation;" General H. M. Naglee, of San José, a paper upon "California Wines and Brandies;" B. B. Redding will give us an article upon the "Thermal Belt;" "Irrigation of Desert Lands" is in preparation by a gentleman thoroughly and practically conversant with the subject; Dr. Stebbins encourages us with the hope of a paper upon "Education;" and Governor Stanford with a full and complete article upon "Railroad Management." We feel that we have a right to ask of men who think, that they help to educate and guide the unthinking masses. Only one man in one hundred is capable of giving direction to popular sentiment; and if these inspired few shall so immerse themselves in business or pleasure as to neglect this duty it is not surprising that the world goes wrong. We respectfully submit that a journal like ours is a better medium for the discussion of serious questions, and for the utterance of well-matured and deliberate opinions, than the daily, newsy, commercial press. Our coast of the Pacific has many important questions peculiar to itself, and understood only by men who live here. Weekly journals in England rank foremost. Scientific and literary men are prominent contributors. Such statesmen as Gladstone are not unmindful of their duty to the public, and are not indifferent to the opportunity afforded them for giving publicity to their opinions. We could name, upon this coast, a hundred intelligent gentlemen, each one of whom has some speciality of occupation, or particular direction of thought, upon which he could write, with but little effort, an interesting and instructive paper. We meet these gentlemen; we bore them to write. They promise; they forget; they are too busy, and some of the very best minds are too modest to write over their own signatures. The result is that the direction of popular thought is left to the professional newspaper writer, or to the Bohemian who contributes for pay, or to the political orator who is as selfish as he is ambitious. Oratory has lost its persuasiveness; the profession of the law no longer directs opinion; the pulpit has but small audience of thinking men; the stage makes no effort to instruct—so that the moulding and direction of public opinion is left to the press. The daily press is devoted to news, to sensations, to partisan interest, to local prejudice; is a slave to its counting room. It is either non-committal or combative. It is either silent or aggressive. It is indifferent or partisan. It is rarely judicial, and never disinterested. We do not claim that the ARGONAUT is what it ought to be; but we declare our willingness to make it what it might be if its directors had the cooperation of those intelligent minds who could and should aid in moulding and directing thought upon the Pacific Coast.

When your Englishman attempts a stroke of enterprise in business look out. One has bought the famous cable of Paris. But he did not secure the tackle, and will be no ascents—only a balloon on the ground.

THE LATEST MAGAZINE VERSES.

Visions in the South.

I.
Her human heart was given,
False heart for a ruby true;
Her eyes were made of heaven,
And sold for the sapphire's blue.

False opal is on the finger
Where loving lips had kissed,
Where loving eyes did linger
Collar of amethyst.

The old jewel-monger chuckles
At the gift of my lord the earl,
And he bows to the diamond buckles
And the Gargantua pearl.

But her place the poet passes
With a sigh for love astray,
And he turns from her opera-glasses,
To the farce that the players play.

II.
My lady's the lily of ladyhood,
And when she has passed the stair,
The trebled scent of a spring-tide wood
Is sweet on the troubled air.

For her be vagrant verse of mine,
But a wedding she hap to dine;
And, wheresoever she hap to dine,
A seat at her host's right hand.

For her be dozen-of-hutton gloves,
And dozens of sweet champagne,
But never the least of all the loves
Will come at her call again.

III.
'Tis May, my love, on the Southern sea,
And night comes softly on,
And the moon shines fair as never to me
A moon of the Northland shone.

And oh! but my soul is beating, love,
With a passionate thought of thee,
And my lips of themselves repeating, love,
The name that is dear to me.

O moon, in the mantle of rugged cloud
That ridest the Northern night,
Breathe low to my love in her London crowd
Of the South and its dear delight.

Breathe low to my love how the Southern moon
Leans down to the passionate sea;
Breathe low to my love how the South winds swoon
On the breast of the passionate sea.

—J. S., in Blackwood's.

"Drifting Down."—A Thames Barcarolle.

Drifting down in the gray-green twilight,
O, the scent of the new-mown hay!
Soft dip the oars in the mystic shy light,
O, the charm of the dying day!
While fading flecks of bright opalescence
But faintly dapple a saffron sky,
The stream flows on with superb quiescence,
The breeze is hushed to the softest sigh.
Drifting down in the sweet still weather,
O, the fragrance of fair July!
Love, my love, when we drift together,
O, how fleetly the moments fly!

Drifting down on the dear old river,
O, the music that interweaves!
The ripples run and the sedges shiver,
O, the song of the lazy leaves!
And far-off sounds—for the night so clear is—
Awake the echoes of by-gone times;
The muffled roar of the distant weir
Cheered by the clang of the Marlow chimes.
Drifting down in the cloudless weather,
O, how short is the summer day!
Love, my love, when we drift together,
O, how quickly we drift away!

Drifting down as the night advances,
O, the calm of the star-lit skies!
Eye-lids droop o'er the half-shy glances,
O, the light in those blue-gray eyes!
A winsome maiden is sweetly singing
A dreamy song in a minor key;
Her clear low voice and its tones are bringing
A mingled melody back to me.
Drifting down, in the clear calm weather,
O, how sweet is the maiden's song!
Love, my love, when we drift together,
O, how quickly we drift along. —London World.

The Cricket on the Hearth.

[IMITATED FROM THE FRENCH OF BERANGER.]

In the evening I sit near my poker and tongs,
And I dream in the firelight's glow,
And sometimes I quaver forgotten songs
That I listened to long ago.
Then out of the cinders there cometh a chirp
Like an echoing, answering cry—
Little we care for the outside world,
My friend the cricket and I.

For my cricket has learnt, I am sure of it quite,
That this earth is a silly, strange place,
And perhaps he's been beaten and hurt in the fight,
And perhaps he's been passed in the race.
But I know he has found it far better to sing
Than to talk of ill-luck and to sigh—
Little we care for the outside world,
My friend the cricket and I.

Perhaps he has loved and perhaps he has lost,
And perhaps he is weary and weak,
And tired of life's torrent so turbid and tost,
And disposed to be mournful and meek.
Yet still I believe that he thinks it is best
To sing, and let troubles float by—
Little we care for the outside world,
My friend the cricket and I.

A Flower in a Book.

A withered flower shall raise
A ghost of vanished days;
From crumbled leaves a rose,
All fragrant souled, shall rise
Within the heart and eyes
Of one who, dreaming, knows
The dust that was a rose!

J. J. PIATT, in Atlantic.

OLLA-PODRIDA.

A most extraordinary people are the sons of Erin. The do so fly into a perturbation at the slightest of provocations. When George Gorham was once asked at Platt's Hall which he liked best, the Irishman or the negro, he wittily replied: "Show me the Irishman and show me the negro, and I will answer the question." All those Irishmen in San Francisco who lack intelligence, and whose minds are not ballasted by good sense—we mean the ignorant, political, agitating, sand-lot Irish, with a sprinkling of native-born American drolls and demagogues—are metaphorically up in arms against Colonel Bee for an indiscreet remark comparing the Irish unfavorably with the Chinese. Now Colonel Bee is the paid attorney of the Chinese; to chant their virtues and sing their praise is his duty, for this he is retained. The Chinese are his clients; they are arrayed at the bar for American opinion, charged with the most heinous of crimes; the counts of the indictment are: (1) That they are destroying our civilization; (2) that they threaten by the rivalry of their cheap labor to drive our working population to starvation and death; (3) that they threaten to overrun our country and themselves by force of numbers, usurp our land, and reduce us and our civilization to the lower standard of theirs.

To all this Colonel Bee pleads not guilty, and in defense of his clients he proclaims their virtues, and portrays in glowing colors all their admirable qualities. In the enthusiasm of his advocacy he says: "The Chinese are better than the Irish." In this Colonel Bee is clearly wrong; first, because the Chinese are not better than the Irish; and second, because this question is not the one at issue. He pleads for them that they are under the protection of a national treaty; that they are here by virtue of law, and entitled to protection from violence through considerations of humanity. The Colonel does just what all lawyers do in defense of their clients. There is an Irishman now under indictment for murder, and when his lawyer comes to plead his case before the jury he will grow eloquent in delineating his many virtues, in arguing the impossibility of his crime, and in the recital of all the better acts of his life; he will grow pathetic in his appeal to the sympathies of the jury; he will exert all the ingenuity of his subtle mind to extricate his client from his peril, and appeal to court and jury for a verdict of "not guilty." Now, Colonel Bee is doing the same for his clients, and while there is no Irishman in the land who would not applaud the criminal advocate for his earnest defense of the prisoner charged with crime, we ask how can they blame the Chinese advocate that he is also zealous in defense of his criminals—even indiscreet in the cause his clients? This sand-lot business, where an ignorant mob of foreigners are endeavoring to regulate the government of the country that has been indiscreet enough to adopt them, has seemed to us all along as a very absurd proceeding. But when it undertakes to interfere with private and professional utterances, it becomes disgusting to the last degree.

Now, if I were an Irishman, and anybody should say that anybody else was better than I, I would not go dancing down to the sand-lots among the fleas and William Wellocks and Carl Brownes to assert the dignity of my nationality. I would not, in passionate, cheap, and wordy resolution, nor in angry, vituperative, vulgar speech, thus attempt to vindicate the character of my race or the superiority of the blood that coursed my veins. Certainly I would not do this if I were of Irish birth. The Green Island, that maintained the inviolability of its soil when Danish pirates and Roman legions conquered and subdued the larger islands of Britain; the land that justly boasts that it was once the seat of European learning; the land that claims with pride the noble names of so many men of intelligence, patriotism, and eloquence—is belittled by its unworthy sons, who talk of hanging men who may happen, honestly or otherwise, to think that the mug of the low Irish is not the highest type of national beauty, or that his intelligence, sobriety, and industry do not exceed all the virtues of all the world beside.

There are people in America—a great many at the East, some in California, and now and then one in San Francisco—who resent these sand-hill protests of naturalized and unnaturalized foreigners as unbecoming, and as impudent and meddlesome interference in matters that ought not to be turned over to their exclusive control. Colonel Bee is one of that class; and, while we do not justify the Chinese advocate for making odious comparisons between his clients and the countryman of Brian Boru, we do suggest that it would be more dignified, modest, and becoming if these people would be less noisy, less jealous, and less clamorous over the invasion of this country by an alien race—if they would remember that only a short time ago they came to the country candidates for citizenship and suppliants for the national protection.

Now for the third time a public meeting of Irish citizens has been called upon to protest against this invidious comparison of themselves with the Chinese. We wonder it has not occurred to Bob Ferrall, Harry George, and other intelligent and enlightened Irish citizens, that this too frequent and always angry protest might not disclose a sensitiveness on their part, and indicate that they were not quite confident that Colonel Bee's charge had not in it some grains of truth. Under a similar charge would Englishmen or Frenchmen or Germans rush to the sand-lot, and, with noisy declamation and passionate gesticulation, argue the question of their equality in intellect and morals with the Chinese? The truth is, the Chinese are the superiors of all of us in very many particulars, and the sooner we recognize the fact the sooner will we be able to cope with them in this struggle for a continent. We have always underrated the Chinese, and thus armed them with double power. To regard the Mongolian as an inferior race is a great mistake. On one occasion, a great many years ago, the Hon. Eugene Casserly, at a public meeting—called for a discussion of the Chinese question—said, in substance, that they "were a dangerous immigration, because of their superior skill in many departments of labor; because of their patient industry and their habits of economy." He pointed to the stone structure known as "Parrott's" building, at the northwest corner of California and Montgomery Streets, to illustrate their skill as mechanics. The stones of this structure were cut, fitted and marked at the quarries in China, and sent here ready for erection. The Chinese are more industrious workers than any other of the lower class of foreigners who come to this country. They will work more hours; they are to a less degree eye-servants; they are more cleanly in their personal habits. As domestic servants, they are more faithful and more honest. They are more temperate, and out of their indulgences grow fewer quarrels and less disturbance of the public peace. They are more economical; they are better workers in all those trades that require delicate manipulation of the fingers: this makes them dangerous competitors to laborers who have families to support, and especially to those of idle and dissipated habits.

Their superior people are the superiors of our superior classes in many respects. As merchants, they have been tried in a fair competition and rivalry with commercial houses of the largest capital and the largest experience, and the result has been that after half a century of endeavor in China, English and American merchants have for the most part given up the struggle. In the city of San Francisco there is to-day no single house doing a respectable Chinese trade. C. Adolphe Low & Co., Macondray & Co., and others, who once had a large intercourse with China, now find themselves playing a very inferior second to the Chinese merchants. The Chinese have abundant capital of their own, do their own importing and banking, and, except in exchange, have no necessity for the aid of any outside capital.

In several important branches of mechanical industry they now take the lead, and it is not improbable that if all social, political, and business restrictions were withdrawn, that with their skill, industry, cheap labor, economical habits, large capital, and we presume low interest, they would become formidable rivals in many leading branches of manufacture; and we see no good reason why they would not become competitors in all. Allow them to buy land, and give to their property and to themselves the protection of the law, and there is a presumption that it would not be a long time before they became the only agriculturists, fruit growers, and wine producers of this State.

They are better farmers than the Dutch or Scotch, better gardeners than the Italians, better orchardists than the Americans, better vine-growers than the French. In fishing they have no equals. In mining, they have devised schemes for working river beds that Yankee ingenuity never conceived. In point of statesmanship, the final competitive trial is yet to come off. In the Burlingame treaty they obtained the better of us, and we now await the contest at Washington, between the Chinese Embassy and our Department of State, with a well-grounded apprehension that Chinese statecraft and subtlety will achieve a triumph over the proud Saxon.

Just so long as our people indulge themselves in the vain delusion of their superiority of race, and rely upon it, they will find that they are working at great disadvantage. This question of the conflict of races between the Eastern and the Western; between Christian civilization and heathenism; between Confucian philosophy and the religion of Christ; whether the redundant and over-crowded population of Asia shall overflow upon this western and sparsely settled coast, is one for national consideration. It must be met by the thinkers and statesmen of the country, and must be settled after all upon the narrow grounds of self-interest and national policy. From its consideration must be discarded all sentimentalism, and all the nonsense of the "fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man," of America being the "asylum of the oppressed," and the "refuge of all fleeing from tyranny." All this balderdash of bigots and demagogues must be ignored. This question will never be properly considered as long as the low and ignorant of other nationalities are permitted to make of it a party question for their own political advancement. Intelligent men resent this sand-lot business as impertinence. This howl that "the Chinese must go" comes back from the East a broken echo. It is not a question between domestic servants, to weigh the merits of Biddy or John; if it were, Biddy would stand with her hands on her hips outside the kitchen door. It is not a question confined to daily laborers and menial servants, but it involves considerations touching the financial, commercial, and industrial future of America. It is not to be determined by ward politicians and flannel-mouthed orators, but by statesmen in our national councils. It is not to be influenced by the prayers that come from between the nose and chin of sanctimonious Chinese missionaries, but addresses itself to that intelligent religious sentiment that regards patriotism and love of country as an element of Christian civilization.

P.

The color of a girl's hair is regulated by the size of her father's pocket-book. If the latter be plethoric the girl's tresses are golden or auburn. If the old man's wallet is lean we hear the daughter spoken of as only "that red-headed gal."

A Maine wife put her husband up at auction, and no one bid. Then she put up an old billy goat, and the animal brought $4.

Bill of Fare for Six Persons.—Thanksgiving, November 28, 1878.

Eastern Oysters.
Ox Tail Soup.
Stewed Terrapin.
Veal Cutlets Fried. Potato Croquette.
Asparagus. Green Peas.
Fillet of Beef, with Mushrooms.
Roman Punch.
Roast Boned Turkey. Cranberry Sauce.
Water-cress Salad.
Mince and Pumpkin Pies.
Fruit-bowl of Apples, Figs, Pears, and Grapes.
Almonds, Walnuts, Raisins, and Prunes. Coffee.

TO FRY VEAL CUTLETS.—Procure your cutlets half an inch thick; coat them with the yolk of eggs well beaten; dip them in bread crumbs and grated lemon peel. Put some fresh lard in the pan, and when boiling put in the cutlets. When they are well cooked take them out and keep them hot; dredge into the pan a little flour; pour in a little water; add salt, pepper, and mushroom catsup to taste. Cook quickly until a light brown. Arrange the cutlets in a circle around the dish, pour the gravy in the centre, garnish with fancy cut carrots and parsley, and serve hot.

TO MAKE ROMAN PUNCH.—See Vol. I, No. 26.

PONY GLASSES OF FRENCH BRANDY.

A, B, C, D, MATRIMONIAL.

D'après Balzac, on se marie par :
Ambition—Cela est bien connu.
Bonté—Pour arracher une fille à la tyrannie de sa famille.
Colère—Pour déshériter des collatéraux.
Dédain—D'une maîtresse infidèle.
Ennui—De la délicieuse vie de garçon.
Folie—C'en est toujours une.
Gageure—C'est le cas de lord Byron.
Honneur—Comme George Dandin.
Intérêt—C'est presque toujours ainsi.
Jeunesse—Au sortir du collège, en étourdi.
Laideur—Craignant de manquer de femme.
Machiavélisme—Pour hériter promptement d'une vieille femme.
Nécessité—Pour donner un état à notre fils.
Obligation—La demoiselle ayant été faible.
Passion—Pour s'en guérir plus sûrement.
Querelle—Pour finir un procès.
Reconnaissance—C'est donner plus qu'on a reçu.
Sagesse—Cela arrive encore aux doctrinaires.
Testament—Quand un oncle mort vous grève son héritage d'une fille.
Usage—A l'imitation de ses aïeux.
Vieillesse—Pour faire une fin.
X—Terme de l'inconnu.
Yatidi—Heure de se coucher chez les Turcs, et qui en signifie tous les besoins.
Zèle—Comme le duc de Saint-Aignan qui ne voulait pas commettre de péchés.

Corneille disait du duc de Richelieu : Il m'a trop fait de bien pour en dire du mal. Il m'a trop fait de mal pour en dire du bien.

Badinez avec la vie, elle n'est bonne qu'à cela.—Voltaire.

Un grand obstacle au bonheur, c'est de s'attendre à un trop grand bonheur.—Fontenelle.

La bonté est une vertu, mais ce n'est pas toujours par vertu qu'une femme a de certaines bontés pour quelqu'un.—E. Joly.

Les amants ont dans leur langage une foule de mots dont chaque syllabe est une caresse.—Rocheperdre.

Un rien est de grande importance,
Un rien produit de grands effets.
En amour, en guerre, en procès,
Un rien fait pencher la balance.
Un rien nous pousse auprès des grands,
Un rien nous fait aimer des belles,
Un rien excite nos talents,
Un rien dérange nos cervelles.
D'un rien de plus, d'un rien de moins,
Dépend le succès de nos soins.
Un rien flatte, quand on espère,
Un rien trouble, lorsque l'on craint.
Amour, ton feu ne dure guère,
Un rien l'allume, un rien l'éteint.

L'amour fait passer le temps ; le temps fait passer l'amour.

Pour être heureux, il faut ne s'inquiéter ni des comment ni des pourquoi de la vie.

En amour, un geste, un sourire, un coup d'œil, un baiser, un soupir, tiennent lieu de langage.

—Madame, je vous aime, je vous aime de toutes les forces de mon cœur, disait un amant passionné à une dame. —Et qu'aimez-vous en moi, Monsieur ? —Votre vertu, Madame. —Alors, pourquoi vous efforcez-vous tous les jours à me faire perdre ce que vous aimez tant ?

Alphonse Karr ayant engagé un jardinier l'envoya sur sa propriété et lui donna pour habitation un charmant pavillon, au milieu d'un parc plein d'oiseaux chanteurs. Quelques jours après, le jardinier lui écrivit : Monsieur, je ne puis dormir dans votre parc, les rossignols hurient tout la nuit.

Monsieur R., membre du Bohemian Club de San Francisco, m'exprima un jour cette pensée pleine de justesse : C'est quelquefois par vertu qu'on est libertin.

Les lettres d'amour sont l'aliment de l'amour.

Les femmes, les chats et les oiseaux sont les êtres qui perdent le plus de temps à leur toilette.

Il est des douleurs dont tes remèdes sont inconnus, et pour lesquelles la nature n'a point produit de baume.—Balzac.

Un écrivain se trouvant dans un salon fut prié de donner, en peu de mots, son opinion sur les femmes. —Mesdames, dit-il au bout d'un moment de réflexion,

Vous savez mieux plaire et séduire,
Vous savez mieux aimer que nous,
Vous avez un parler plus doux,
Vous avez un plus doux sourire ;
Mais, pour compléter votre empire
Et nous mettre, en tout, après vous,
Mesdames, il me faut bien le dire,
Vous savez mieux tromper que nous.

Une jeune fille de seize ans se laisse aimer, une femme de trente ans se fait aimer.—A. Ricard.

Quand un objet fait résistance,
L'anglais, fier et vain, s'en offense,
L'italien est désolé,
L'espagnol est inconsolable,
L'allemand se console à table,
Le Français est tout consolé.

Mais que fais-tu donc, Marie ? Voilà plus d'une heure que tu perds devant ton miroir ! disait une dame à sa fille, charmante personne de dix-sept ans.—Ce que je fais, maman ? répondit la jeune coquette, j'admire ton plus bel ouvrage !

SAN FRANCISCO, Nov. 17, 1878. L. G. J. DE FINOD.

THE TWO MUSES.

My fire burnt low—at intervals
Struggling for life it flared and sank,
And shapeless shadows on the walls
Towered up, and into corners sank.
The black brand crackled, bent, and broke,
And through the soot the eager spark
Worried like busy worldly folk,
And burrowing died in dirt and dark.
In the dead silence loud the clock
Remorseless ticked each second's flight—
Heart-beats of Time, with quiet shock,
Driving Life on to Death and Night.
Well, let Life go ! My weary heart
Is sick of things that only seem ;
Love is a sham, and so is Art,
And Faith the ghost of Hope's vain dream.
A curse is on this world of ours,
Where Faith, Love, Art, are all a lie ;
Beneath the curse the spirit cowers,
And their best gifts the gods deny.
As thus I mused in desperate mood
I raised my eyes, and, faintly seen
In the dim light, a figure stood,
With prayerful face and vesture mean.
Her eyes were shy with half alarm,
Wan were her cheeks, and pale her hue,
And o'er her breast her white bared arm
With modest grace her drapery drew.
"Who art thou, and what dost thou here ?
Speak, can I help thee ?" Then, "Alas !"
She said, "how own the name I bear—
So fallen, so changed from what I was.
"Once in the far and golden time,
When Freedom wore its fairest hues,
When glorious Greece was in its prime,
They called me by the name of Muse.
"My feet from worldly soil were free ;
The Furies lent to me their rods ;
My praise was Immortality,
My home—the temple of the gods.
"All for my favors sought. To none
I gave them but the true and tried,
Heroic, godlike men alone,
Whose Life by Faith was purified.
"Now in the public mart my strings
For every want I fain must strum,
And hide beneath a shawl my wings,
And sing when I were better dumb.
"Must smile to hide my heart's despair,
Must starve, or cringe to greed and lust ;
Of all who hear me—oh, how rare
The few whom I can love and trust !
"How many mock my decent dress ;
Their thoughts are low, their works are base ;
They shock me with their vile caress,
Until ashamed I hide my face.
"Fallen so low, I stretch to thee
My hands, and cry, Oh ! are there none
To lift me, save me, honor me,
As once in Greece in ages gone ?
"No one of all the venial throng
That take my name upon their lips,
To shield me from the shame and wrong
That shadow me in such eclipse ?
"No one above this sordid mart,
With godlike spirit shrined in man,
Who with pure soul will worship Art,
Not woo her like a courtesan ?
"Not pandering to the world's low taste,
With skill to tempt and to degrade ;
Not like a broker, greed-debased,
Who makes of Art a vulgar trade ?"
"Yes, one at last, though weak and poor,"
I cried, "I pledge this heart of mine,
Content to labor, wait, endure,
To win at last one smile of thine."
What sudden change ! An aureole globed
That radiant face—a Grecian dress,
With pale and perfect draperies, robed
Her pure and stately loveliness.
Serene she smiled, and at her feet
Prostrate I fell, and bowed my head,
And silence came as calm and sweet
As silence to the peaceful dead.
Then suddenly a laugh pierced through
My ears—I raised my eyes—the Muse
Had vanished ; in her stead a new,
Suainge figure stood—in high-heeled shoes.
A creature like a biscuit rare,
Painted and dyed—hair, eyes, and face—
Tight-laced—her back and bosom bare—
All chiffons, jewels, silk, and lace.
With head thrown back and glance askant,
She laughed, and leered, and beckoned me.
"Great God !" I cried, "what dost thou want ?
And who art thou ? and where is she ?"
"She ? Who ? My queer old sister ? Oh !
Dear solemn prude, pray who can tell ?
Gone back to Greece, I hope. You know
That here she's quite impossible.
"Poor thing, I pity her ; but then
She's such—so tiresome, too,
And dresses so—and bores the men
About the Beautiful and Fine.
"She had a grand success a while
In Athens, when the world was young ;
But here, we've changed in dress and style,
And she's old, nervous, and unstrung.
"And so take care ; you're young, mon cher,
And just beginning in your art ;
Don't be imposed upon by her,
But trust me if you want a start."
With that she finger-tipped a kiss,
Laughed, pirouetted on her toe,
Kicked out her train, and, with a hiss
Of rustling silks, turned round to go.
"Now, don't forget—don't be a fool ;
I count upon you ! Well—good-bye.
Sundays, you know—cards, dancing, pool,
And everything that's chic and sly !
"Stop, here's my card—I'd quite forgot."
With that she vanished, and I read :
"Madame la Muse—née la Cocotte,
Rue de Parnasse"—and went to bed.—Blackwood's.

LETTER FROM ENGLAND.

How they Live in an English Country House.

OCTOBER 2, 1878.

Away from the stir and bustle of the great city, right in the heart of Blankshire, where the air is fresh and cheering, the trees still clothed in their many tints of green, varied with autumn reds and yellows, where life seems idyllic, with shepherds and dairy-maids, and each copse and wood might be the haunt of nymphs and fairies, dryads and hamadryads !

We are at Saint Runwold's Priory ; not an ecclesiastical house, as its name would imply, but a comfortable mansion with all modern appliances of ease and refinement, and with nothing left of the old monkish establishment save the refectory, which, with its dark oaken wainscot and open raft-ered roof, does duty as the entrance hall to the more modern dwelling. This is the home of the Walronds, and has been in their possession since the time of Henry VIII.

It is from Saint Runwold's that I now write this letter, but how can I describe the charm of the place and all belonging to it. The house is on an eminence, with a terraced front, and gardens sloping to a rapid trout stream ; beyond there are park and blue hills, and around there is again park with noble oak trees, but resplendent in beeches, graceful with their silvery sides, and magnificent in their towering foliage. There are dells where the dappled deer are herding, and the bracken seems alive with four-footed game ; you hear the cry of the peacock, and far-off through the trees, you see the displayed plumage of some amorous male, glinting in the sunlight.

At this season here the days all pass in much the same manner. Breakfast is at half-past eight, when all meet. Some have been up for hours, rambling on foot, riding, sauntering about the garden, or at the home farm ; but at the stated time they are expected to assemble, and laggards are not waited for. Cutlets, grilled trout, fried soles, kippered herring, deviled kidneys, home-cured bacon deliciously broiled, and new-laid eggs are on the table, hot, whilst on the side-board are to be found a cold magnificent ham, a boiled round of beef, game and chicken pie. Tea and coffee, with hot milk or rich cream, are dispensed by the ladies, and if any one desires to quench his thirst with a tankard of home-brewed, he has the opportunity of doing so. This meal is made delightful by its perfect ease and self-help. The conversation is light and cheerful, about what one has seen or expects to see ; sometimes a letter just received gives a story of some one known to most of those present, and is told with facetious addenda by the narrator. There certainly is not much strain on the intellect, for has not every one there a hard but enjoyable day's work before them.

The great feature in the programme is the meet of the hounds—not the grand pack, but the puppies, who are to be blooded after the chase of some fox cubs, whose whereabouts are well known to the keepers. All the ladies who like may attend the meet, for there will be pony carriages for those who do not ride. The squire will be there cheering and directing, and to see him and his hearty ways is of itself a sight worth some trouble to obtain. But the music of the puppies, as it breaks forth when, led by one or two old hounds, they first come upon the scent of their future quarry ! How jubilant ! How clanging ! Now shrill with expectation, now deep and dissonant with fearful anger. The fox cub has got away, and the little pack stream out, soon however to return, for the puny victim dares not go far from home. Anon the voice of the huntsman is heard to sound the fatal "who-oo," and the youngsters are tearing to pieces the carcass of their quest. But all of the breakfast party are not here, some have gone to the woods to shoot pheasants, and others—lovers of the gentle sport—have taken their rod and basket, and are away up the stream, to the haunts which the trout love best. There are scarcely any left at home. All are out in the sun, getting health, and good looks, and cheerfulness.

Seven is the hour for dinner ; evening dress is the rigid rule, and the ladies' toilets are works of art worthy of Mayfair or Belgravia. There is an excellent dinner, superb wine, and a flow of talk, which is general round the table. This as it does not last long is not unpleasant.

After dinner there is the billiard room and cigars for gentlemen, just to give the ladies time to settle in the drawing-room, and then all meet again, and enjoy music, or a rubber, and sometimes the chairs and tables are put on one side and the young people dance.

I have now told you how a day passes in an English country house. I can truly say for myself, that coming from the unrest of a new country, there is a delight in the even but energetic flow of life in these happy English homes, which far from disqualifying a man for noble endeavor, stimulates him to do bravely and unselfishly the work he has before him.

To be one of a great people, striving and struggling to lay broad and deep the foundations of a nation which shall have a grand and glorious future, is what a man may well be proud of, but this pride will be chastened and purified by the knowledge that amidst defective institutions, and undeveloped social laws, there are enfolded states of being where the human heart blossoms and flowers with a beauty, which, in the midst of our sterner endeavor, we must strive to preserve for the ages yet to come.

There have been many men who left behind them that which hundreds of years have not worn out. The earth has Socrates and Plato to this day. We are indebted to the past. We stand in the greatness of the ages that are gone, rather than in that of our own. But of how many of us shall it be said that, being dead, we yet speak ?—Becher.

A little girl recently testified innocently to the life of drudgery experienced by the average "queen of the household" who does her own work. Somebody asked the child if her mother's hair was gray. "I don't know," she said, "she is so tall for me too she the back of her head, and she never sits down."

If the girls don't quit wearing these abominable wide belts squeezing will soon be one of the lost arts. No man of delicate feelings likes to embrace a leather trunk, even if there is a woman in it.

NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Rates of Subscription: $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance. Postage prepaid. City subscribers served for 35 cents per week. Single copies, 10 cents.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."
 Branch Office, Cooper's Bookstore, 746 Market Street
 Agent at San Jose—F. A. Taylor.
 News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders should be addressed.
 A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PIXLEY, }
 FRED. M. SOMERS, } Editors.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1878.

Why this quarrel should exist between the Central Pacific Railroad Company and the public we do not at all understand, nor why the owners and managers of the railroad should not be the most popular men in the community. Is it the fault of the public or of the directors? Or is it the result of misunderstanding? Is it true that the corporation is oppressive, tyrannical, and unjust? Or is it true that the people are jealous and fault-finding—unappreciative of the benefits and unmindful of the advantages that have followed the construction of the transcontinental road? Has the press been honest in discussing this question, or has it been prejudiced, one-sided, and dishonest? How does it happen that politicians find it necessary to ride as a hobby this anti-railroad prejudice? How does it occur that even the labor class, to whom it has furnished an immense amount of employment, are not upon friendly terms with it? We recall to mind the early agitation of the transcontinental railroad; we remember the railroad meeting once at old Musical Hall that transformed itself into an overland wagon road and mail route meeting—this being of possible accomplishment, while the rail and steam-car were regarded as something for the next generation. We remember the pony express as an achievement of which we were vastly proud. We recall the enthusiasm at the passage of the railroad bill, and that the earliest opposition arose because it was feared the parties were not in earnest, that the road across the Sierra was impossible, and that the whole scheme was only to result in aid of the Dutch Flat wagon road. We do not disregard the fact that State, county, and national subsidies have been granted the company. San Francisco gave $600,000, which it has been repaid a hundred times; Sacramento gave $250,000, that it has had returned ten-fold to its treasury; Placer County gave something, all of which, principal, interest, and napkin, has been returned to it. The General Government has given to it generous subsidies, and no national money has been better expended than in aid of this great national and transcontinental highway. Maine and Florida may complain of the amount, but it ill-becomes California to do so.

When this road received its charter San Francisco had less than a hundred thousand population; now it has three hundred thousand. Then it had less than a hundred million of taxable wealth; now it has three hundred millions. Then San Francisco was an experiment; now it is a great, fixed, promising commercial emporium. Then the Asiatic commerce had not chosen its route; now the oriental trade is pouring its volume through our port. Then there were no foreign banks of importance upon our coast; now we are becoming one of the great centres of exchange. Then the north was a wilderness and the south a desert; now Redding northward and Los Angeles southward are suburbs of our city. Then Arizona was an undiscovered country; now it is one of the treasure boxes of the continent and a most inviting field for enterprise. Then Nevada was a land of sage-brush and scoria; now it is the Aladdin's lamp, the cave of Monte Cristo, the valley of diamonds of Sindbad the Sailor. Then lands in the San Joaquin were unattractive, worthless deserts; now they are valuable, growing day by day more valuable as the railroad gives them facilities for developing their inexhaustible resources. Then the Chronicle was a theatrical thumb programme of gratuitous circulation; now it is an enterprising journal of wide circulation. Then the agitators of the sand-lots were at home in their native bogs; Kearney was fishing or wrecking off the coast of Ireland, Wellock was cobbling in London; now they are aspiring to become the leaders of a great national party, are forming an organic law for California, and are ambitious to work reforms and fix fares and freights for the railroads that brought them to the country.

The railroad has done everything for this coast. Its touch worked magic; it brought us population and wealth; it gave us commercial and political recognition; it gave value to every homestead lot and commercial building in our city, and if it has impaired values anywhere, or worked injury to any part of the coast, we do not know it. The men who conceived it, who worked its accomplishment, who carried it so far on its way, and who, with all their energy and all their resources, are still pressing forward in the construction of other roads, are decent citizens; they are of reputable social position; they are honorable in their business relations; and hence we ask whether all this prejudice, passion, and resentful feeling may not be the result of misconception, or of lack of reflection, or because it has been excited, stirred up, and hounded on by a selfish, cowardly, and mercenary press and ambitious political demagogues? With the railroad we have no relations; with its owners, no personal friendships; and there is no umbilical cord between us and its treasury. We never received a dollar from it, except what has been fairly earned by a part column of advertisement; but we have a sense of right, of fair play, of decency, and we have an all-absorbing interest in California and in San Francisco. With the welfare and prosperity of the State and city we are deeply identified; and we know this, that just to the extent and limit of this railroad system will extend the commercial jurisdiction of our city of San Francisco. Every merchant knows that the trade of the city extends eastward just so far as the Central Road was built. All along the route to Ogden our commercial empire is written by empty boxes, kegs, and bottles, scattered along the route; beyond Ogden every indication of trade points to Chicago, St. Louis, and the East. The race of construction between the Central Pacific and the Union Pacific Railroads was a competition for trade; it was a race for business empire; it was a conflict between the East and the West for commercial and business jurisdiction. It would have added millions to our merchants' wealth if another hundred miles had been constructed by the Central Pacific people. The East has stolen the trade of the valley of the Great Salt Lake that justly and properly belongs to us.

The same conflict is now going on southward between Tom Scott and the Southern Pacific corporation. The contest is now for the trade of Southern California, New Mexico, Arizona, the Mexican States of Chihuahua, Sonora, and the great valley of Mexico. It is a splendid prize for which these athletes in the railroad ring are contending. If Stanford and company succeed, all this trade comes to our port, enriches our people, stimulates our industries, and builds up San Francisco to become one of the greatest and richest of the commercial emporiums of the world. If Tom Scott succeeds, he will steal away our trade, and leave our port, in comparison with what it ought to be, an embarcadero for hides and tallow. While this contest is going on, while these railroad wrestlers are straining every nerve and putting forth every exertion for the prize of victory, our editors, politicians, and sand-lot orators are anxious to arrest this work, stop the progress of railroad construction, and are prepared to throw up their thumbs in exultation at the defeat of an enterprise upon which is hanging the future greatness and prosperity of our city, and in the success of which every business man, property owner, mechanic, and laborer is deeply interested. A Constitutional Convention, supposed to represent the higher intelligence of the State, deliberates whether it will not put an iron band around the throat of this southern railroad enterprise, and give the chain into the hands of three party politicians to have authority over it. We know the technical lawyer's argument that gives to the sovereign political power the right to control corporations; we will not here either dispute or discuss it, but content ourselves with declaring that such a step would be most unwise and most impolitic. Let us build our railroads before we persecute the men that own them. Let us secure this road to the Rio Grande and to the Gulf of Mexico before we steal it. We commend this view of the railroad question to Mr. Estee and the other party politicians, who would ride into office upon this false and malicious misrepresentation of an enterprise that underlies the prosperity of both our city and State.

We are not especially interested in the question whether the company is performing its obligations to the Government—transporting troops and mails and paying interest on its bonds. Let the company and the Government settle this controversy between them. It is undoubtedly true that the railroad company has received an enormous grant of lands. It is also true that the building of the road has given them value and made them available; that the purchaser can better afford to pay $2.50 or $5 per acre with a road, than without a road to have the lands for nothing. The railroad company is selling as fast as it can, because it is for the interest of the corporation to have people, farms, and villages along its line rather than unoccupied lands. Its business is to transport passengers and convey freight, and not to hold property for a speculative rise that would never come. It is a mean and narrow jealousy that voices the complaint that the road is making money and the stockholders are getting rich. We believe this is true; and we are quite sure there is no editor so unselfish, no politician so patriotic, and no sand-lot agitator so disinterested, that he would not be willing to grow rich in the same way. The fact is—and it is a redeeming feature and an argument in favor of the policy of letting these people alone and calling off the political and newspaper dogs—that all the money being earned by the Central Pacific Railroad, California Pacific Railroad, California and Oregon Railroad, the Napa Valley Railroad, the Sacramento Valley Railroad, San Francisco and San José Railroad, the steamship company, Oakland Ferry Company, Contract and Finance Company, and every other branch of the business, is being used in the construction of the Southern Pacific Railroad. It is being pushed ahead in anticipation of trade; it is reaching out for it even in advance of population; it is stretching out its tentacles for a commerce that is growing. There may be other parts of this State that have a right to complain of unjust discrimination. It may be that there are other localities that have been injured and harshly dealt with, but the merchants and citizens of San Francisco have no cause for dissatisfaction.

In order to appreciate what the road has done for the entire State, let us reflect upon our isolated condition before we had it. A long and perilous steamship journey over two oceans, and the hazards of crossing an unhealthy tropical Isthmus; a tedious stage ride across the continent; a mountain trade of mules and oxen drawing ponderous prairie schooners; passengers in stage-coach and mud-wagons at fearful prices; six dollars to Sacramento; two hours to Oakland; corners in merchandise till it came around the Horn or over the Isthmus; twenty-two days from San Francisco to New York, with Panama fever thrown in. Let us conceive a conflict between the railroad managers and the proposed commissioners: a dead conflict and lock-out, the engines rolled into the roundhouse, the fires put out, the cars switched off upon side tracks, the trade, business, and passenger traffic of the entire State asked to stand still till a suit at law should determine whether the railroads should be run by the men who built and own them, or by the commissioners proposed by this Constitutional Convention. Then our business community would appreciate the value of this system of railroads now centering in San Francisco. They might, also, get a better idea of the Chronicle's angry vituperation, the sand-lot's ignorant and noisy abuse, and the politician's selfish and mischievous demagoguery.

General John F. Miller and the Hon. John F. Swift, of San Francisco, are being discussed as candidates of the Republican party of California for Governor. John H. Jewett, of Marysville, is also mentioned in connection with the office. Mr. Swift has been seeking recreation and health during the summer in the mountains of Switzerland. General Miller has been seeking fame in the Constitutional Convention, and John H. Jewett has been minding his own (banking) business at home. Estee, also in earnest search of the gubernatorial seat, has been seeking reputation at the cannon's mouth; he has fired himself off against the railroad in the Convention. George Evans has taken to the political highway—is driving his own team, gathering up passengers for inside seats, and blowing his own horn. His horn is a locomotive steam whistle. Horace Davis is standing around conspicuous corners, so that if the gubernatorial office should ever be driven to the necessity of seeking the man it may have no difficulty in finding him. Modesty prevents us from naming the best man for the office, and it is unnecessary. He could not be nominated, and if he were could not be elected, and if he were elected would never be available for any other position. The next Governor of California will be a Republican, and the State will send to Congress four Republican members.

Mr. George C. Gorham is in San Francisco for his health, for recreation, to visit his boys, to spend his vacation, to regain strength for his arduous duties as Secretary of the Senate. We are assured, in confidence, by his most intimate friends, that he is taking no part in California politics, that he will not interfere, and that he is not engaged in putting up a party deal. We are quite confident that Mr. Gorham's mission to this coast at this time is not political, and that he is not endeavoring to manage party affairs. Mr. Gorham is conscious that his day of power has gone by. He has no adherents outside the Federal offices; he has not friends enough in California to form a base-ball club. La Grange, Shannon, Carr, Page, and Tom Rogers are but the ragged remnants of a once proud following, no longer formidable and no longer worthy of even watching. The Gorham scare is over. We had it once ourselves; but having fought the substance we do not propose to fight the shadow. We are not afraid of ghosts, and we propose to whistle our way through this political graveyard without fear of raising anything worse than a bad smell from the graves of his dead and buried party friends.

Mr. Page's political enemies authorize us to withdraw his name as a candidate for Governor, and to announce that he is a candidate for renomination to Congress at the earnest request of his three friends. The Hon. Alexander Campbell will perhaps make his congressional candidacy a warm one.

AFTERMATH.

Before the next issue of our paper the statesman, patriot, and orator whom Ireland has loaned to America that he may reform her republican institutions, will be back to his adopted sod. Our streets will be ablaze with enthusiasm to receive this eminent opponent of property, government, and God. After his victorious achievements in cis-Alpine Massachusetts, he comes back clothed in a blue Roman toga. His triumphal chariot is a Pullman palace car; in his pockets barbaric spoils of golden twenties, sent him by the toilers of San Francisco. His queen, his heirs apparent, and a prince of the royal blood accompany him. As he marches through our streets surrounded with a torrent of brown shillalahs and a sea of upturned mugs, with bummers, politicians, and lecherous, bloated bond-holders bound captive at his chariot wheels, he will proclaim the purpose of his coming, namely: "To astonish the Eastern people," "to obtain power on the Pacific slope," "to punish his enemies for wrongs done him," to make the city of San Francisco pay him $50,000, "to reconstruct the Constitution," and "to take the law-making power into his own hands," leaving only one conundrum to be solved: Which is crazier, the crazy fanatic who leads, or the ignorant mob that follows?

The stock market opened on Monday morning, the Comstock Lode having a value of $80,000,000. Tuesday afternoon, at the 2½ o'clock call, its value was $48,000,000—a decline of $32,000,000, or forty per cent. The half of $32,000,000 represents very nearly all the money in circulation in California. This is simple, unadulterated gambling; every dollar that somebody lost, somebody won. The men and women who are in this stock deal are simply gamblers; they are entitled to no sympathy; and those people who go around with scornful countenances, or in angry denunciation that they have been inveigled into stocks and ruined, ought to have the fire engines play on them. There are two classes of persons playing at this game of stocks—knaves and fools. Our sympathies are entirely with the knaves.

"Thus, in England neither the Tory nor the Whig parties have a clear record on the tariff question," quoth the Bulletin in one of three nearly consecutive ungrammatical sentences. There is no Whig party in English politics; there is in English politics no tariff question. Our well-informed contemporary means the Liberal party—called "Whig" by neither itself nor its opponents; and by "the tariff question," if he does not mean the question of protective duties he does not mean anything. As to that, we fancy the "record" of each party in England is tolerably clear. The English subject who advocates "protection to home industries" may have almost anybody for his first audience; but he will assuredly have Her Majesty's Commissioners in Lunacy for his second.

Clearly, our contemporary must have fallen asleep some thirty-five years ago, during the agitation in England for repeal of the Corn Laws, and has only just waked. He supposes the contest to be still going on—Whig and Tory fighting one another on "the tariff question," as viciously as ever.

Whatever may be the merits of Protection as a political dogma, it will have to be admitted that the proselyting measures of its latter day apostles are not always as moral as they might be. In the American edition of Chambers' Encyclopedia the article on Protection, if there was one, has been cut out, and this charming bit substituted by the American editor: "PROTECTION—PROTECTIVE DUTY, in Political Economy, terms applied to a practice found necessary in the United States of discouraging, by heavy duties and otherwise, the importation of foreign goods, it having been proved that such a practice increases the prosperity of the country at large." Turning to the article "Free Trade," we find its key note struck as follows: "A dogma of modern growth, industriously taught by British manufacturers and their commercial agents." These are neat things, truly, to appear in what purports to be, and no doubt by arrangement with the original publishers was required to be, an American reprint of a British work! It is, we suppose, hardly necessary to add that this edition is published in the city of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; but whether its publishers, Messrs. Lippincott & Co., are interested in iron works we are not informed.

That good little man, Johnny Skae, and his amiable friends, having formed a charitable syndicate for eleemosynary purposes, gave to the widows, orphans, and adult imbeciles of our community Sierra Nevada at $260 per share. They are now (Wednesday) kindly taking it back at $70 per share. This is the benevolent organization that was instituted to give all persons an opportunity to get a slice of the new bonanza, and (unlike the grasping monopolists who control the Nevada Bank) to distribute the new discovery, and keep it from being gobbled up by the greedy dynasty of Bonanza kings.

Certain skinless persons appear to have been disturbed by recent touches of our musical critic's playful finger; they have been so shrinking into themselves that there is precious little left of them but voice, and if they go on contracting their sensitive tissues they may hope to soon attain to the enviable because unassailable condition of the "bodiless nymph," Echo, who can't be scratched, yet is able to talk back when reviled. It is true these victims of our fury have not as yet "sung out" in their own natural tones; they have been piping through the goosequills of their friends in the newspapers. But although the hand is the hand of Esau, the voice is unmistakably the voice of Jacob. We presume our musical critic can take care of himself in this controversy; we mention the matter here only to base upon it a little preachment, not for the profit of either the supersensitive musicians or their superserviceable champions—heaven forbid!—but for the advantage of local art and letters.

Our local artists and journalists forget that San Francisco now contains more than a quarter of a million of inhabitants; they do not understand that if they elect to remain provincial this community does not. Time was, when everybody knew everybody, and criticism was necessarily a mere expression of personal likes and dislikes, having nothing in the world to do with merit. It is the same now, but no longer necessarily. The honest and intelligent censor who has the interests of art or letters always clearly in mind, and who does not believe that the best way to serve his friends is to "butter" them, will be as warmly hated as heretofore, but he can be no longer silenced. He needs no longer fear the combined malevolence of the little souls of the mutual admirationists, who, having never felt any but "personal motives" themselves, can understand nothing else in others—who construe all censure as attack, all praise as puffing a friend. With these creatures, "You scratch my back and I'll scratch yours" is the guiding principle and rule of literary conduct; they recognize no higher and better one in others, nor believe in the possibility of its existence. These bats and owls of our provincial darkness blink, flutter, squeak, and hoot prodigiously in the dawn of a better era, but, like the "moon-eyed leper," they have got to "go," and they may as well make up their minds to it. It ought not to take very long to make up such small parcels, either.

That he is a good fellow; that he is a personal friend; that he is poor and has a sore toe; that his no shirt proves him a self-made genius; that he is a fair judge of whisky; that he may hit back—these are pretty reasons for withholding censure from an actor, musician, writer, lecturer, preacher, who is thought to have done bad work! Bah! Is there no better way to serve a friend than to encourage him in his folly?—no surer way of founding a local art and literature than by disgusting the efficient worker by crowning him and the incapable with the same cheap laurels? Where every gawk and looby can show you half a hundred of the "complimentary press notices" which his conceit mistakes for fame, pray what incentive has the man of sense? The crown is polluted by the grease of brainless brows; to proffer it is to insult him. You ought to be ashamed of yourselves, you men who write puffs of work no whit better than your own!

If there is one kind of writer we detest with a higher and more holy detestation than another it is your "genial" one—the rogue who has no word of censure for anything or anybody. Oh, he is such a fraud!—fair and smiling without, but full of rancor and dead men's bones within. The fellow whom everybody thinks he likes, and who appears to like everybody in return, is the basest hypocrite in all this world. He will swallow down his grievances as if they were fish-balls, but do you think he digests them? What does his heart do with the bitterness which that organ necessarily and naturally secretes if none of it ever slips from his tongue or runs off his pen? Your gentle humorist "whose wit never wounds;" your amiable critic who "loves to dwell upon what is excellent;" your cheery, sunny-tempered censor who begs you to consider your nose pulled, with such a suave and captivating manner that it is quite a disappointment that he does not pull it—away with them to the headman's block! Their consideration for the feelings of others—their studious abstention from offending—it is the noonday virtue of the literary harlot, the platform temperance of the talking teetotaler, who goes home and fuddles himself into a horrible example with the kerosene from his bed-chamber lamp.

The Alta, discussing the late convulsion of the stock market, with a magnanimity that ever distinguishes that highly intelligent journal, very generously defends the bonanza firm from the charge of robbing those mythical widows and orphans who are so feelingly brought forward by the press whenever its proprietors have lost money in stock gambling, and says: "We can hardly accept the conclusion that its members are so selfish, so avaricious, that the mite of the widow, the crust of the orphan, the milk of the infant, is coveted by them." We agree with the Alta. We are quite confident that if the Nevada Bank vaults were opened there would not be found in them the mite of a widow, the crust of an orphan, or a baby's milk bottle. It is quite possible that there might turn up a sixty thousand-dollar mortgage on a printing office. We know there are plenty of women in the stock business, fat and rosy widows, lean and scrawny ones, divorçées, ancient maidens, sharp visaged wives, all catching like hens in a barn-yard, offering mites for points. We know plenty of orphans, worthy, bald-headed, copper-lined old gamblers, but they never deal in crusts; and the ordinary stock infant is a sharp boy with his teeth cut, who has discarded the milk-bottle for the whisky cocktail, lo, these many years.

It is amusing to observe how keenly sympathetic the press becomes when there is a break in stocks. It assumes at once the attitude of the metaphorical pig under the gate, and squeals for the whole community. If people do not want to lose their money in gambling, let them refrain. If they gamble and lose, let them dry up. This nuisance of railing at those who win is as meanly contemptible as it is absurdly comical. This thing has now been going on for twenty years, and the man or woman, widow, wife or maid, orphan or infant, parent, guardian or trustee, lawyer, merchant, mechanic, miner, or laborer, who indulges himself or herself in the vice of stock gambling, must take the consequences. To squeal is cowardly. There is no element of sympathy in this business; every man for himself—saute qui peut—when the crash comes, and the devil take the hindmost.

We should dearly love to know what is passing in the mind of a man engaged, for the moment, in sending off to this paper a literary contribution, accompanied by a private note asking its acceptance by the editor, to whom, in neither the article nor the note, does he disclose his name. It seems to us that this person's notions of civility have so bewildering a perversion, and his caution so colossal a development, that he must be an insult and a terror to himself.

A writer in an Eastern journal assures us that we can keep the "crow's-feet" from the eyes of our daughters until they (the daughters) are past middle age by merely compelling them to sleep on their backs. It kills a girl to sleep habitually on her back, but between having "crow's-feet" and being "crow's-meat" no girl of sense would hesitate a moment from any caws.

An Alabama judge of election was deliberately destroying a half-bushel of negro Republican votes. A Northern man remonstrated: "Have you not sworn to preserve the purity of the ballot-box?" "Yes, and I am throwing out the impurities."

"The ARGONAUT, we observe, purloins a good deal of matter from the Courier and then calls names."—Boston Courier. True, we took for many months some three or four columns weekly of your matter without credit. But we always took it a week or two before you got it, dear. Then calling you "the monumental thief of American journalism"—which you really are—we ceased our depredations.

A Cincinnati paper, too, complains that we do not "credit funny paragraphs." This is a true bill; we do not—we are only concerned to make it apparent that they are not ours. The man who writes "funny" paragraphs for fame, or the newspaper that prints them for glory, has no rights that we feel bound to respect; and if we do anything to trifle with the feelings of the one or impair the circulation of the other we are pleased to know it.

The Theosophists, having cremated the body of Baron Palm, have consigned his ashes to the sea. This would seem, in this utilitarian age, to be a very great waste of material. If the Baron's body had been consigned to the sea before burning it would have furnished fish food.

We do not believe that it is possible for "General Evans, of Tuolumne," or, as he is perhaps better known, "Senator Evans, of San Joaquin," or, to come down to his simple appellation, "George Evans, of Stockton," to be either nominated as the Republican party candidate for Governor, or in event of nomination, to be elected. His political backing is strong, but his candidacy would give the party a severe wrench.

The literary woman who has written and published every kind of book mentioned in the catalogue of the Mercantile Library, and made a fortune enabling her to fill the columns of the Post for consecutive weeks at the Colonel's own prices, is very sure to end by malignantly sending us a poem as long as her leg, with the threat that if we don't publish it she will send it elsewhere. There is nothing so merciless as disappointed literary ambition.

"One can not visit San Rafael for a night without being struck with the vast superiority of the gas which is produced in that charming resort."—Bulletin. Why, there is no gas in San Rafael—not a cubic foot, so help us! Down near the railway station a saloon-keeper has rigged up, and keeps going, the head-light of an old locomotive engine, and it really has quite a brilliant local effect. But if the Bulletin man, when on the boat going up to San Rafael the other evening, had stuck to his Napa soda, as advised, he could never have mistaken that lonely luminary for a double row of gas lamps, with other rows intersecting them at right angles. No, there is no gas in San Rafael.

COLUSA NICK.

My hero is not a myth. He is neither a "Starbottle" nor a "Hawkhurst," nor a "fighting Tarantula from Tuolumne." On the contrary he is a veritable personage living to-day in the town of Colusa, in this State, and is known to nearly every man, woman, and child in Yuba, Sutter, and Colusa Counties. All through that section of country his drolleries, funny sayings, and witticisms are as familiar as household words, and it is an even chance that any man selected at random from among a crowd of the older residents would regale you with one of Nick's jokes in the course of a half hour's conversation, or employ it to point the moral of an argument. Nick is sui generis.

In my California experience, which has brought me in contact with as many original and humorous characters as it is the average lot of ordinary mortals to meet, I have never seen his like. His humor, though sometimes coarse, is bright and crisp, and always flows without seeming effort, popping and sparkling with the effervescence of champagne when occasion prompts the discharge of the metaphorical cork.

His jokes and witty sayings are not laboriously cudged from an unwilling brain in the quiet of a sanctum, written, rewritten, and studiously embellished, but they burst spontaneously, and oftentimes when least expected, from the confines of an inexhaustible fund of humor, and upon the slightest provocation.

And his fun bears no sting of malice. Hit where it may, the victim never thinks of taking offense. To "get mad" over one of Nick's shafts of wit would be the height of folly, for the exhibition of the wound inflicted would provoke an avalanche of ridicule from a non-sympathizing community that would completely overwhelm the complaining party and speedily convince him that it were better to have suffered the pain in silence than have sought such relief. And Nick is thoroughly impartial in the distribution of his favors, but sends his pointed arrows wherever the humor suggests, regardless of politics, creed, nationality, color, or "previous condition of servitude."

Nick is a Pioneer—An Argonaut of '49. Arriving in Marysville in the early dawn of her prosperity, his open-hearted and open-handed ways, his proclivity for fun, and his quaint and original sayings soon made him exceedingly popular. No convivial party was complete without him. Those who missed the cracking of one his jokes listened eagerly to its repetition by others, and if the after relation were imperfect it was only necessary to disclose the name of the author to secure its acceptance and hearty approval.

One of his first practical jokes is well, and by some sadly, remembered to this day. A citizen, whom we will call Brother Randolph, fancied that a neighbor was appropriating his chickens, and confidentially communicated his suspicions to Nick.

"I'll tell you what to do," said Nick, taking him cautiously aside; "you go home and gather in your chickens, and then tie a piece of red yarn on the left wing of every one of them. Tie it under the feathers where it won't be seen, and then when you see a chicken which you think is yours, you can easily prove property if it has your mark on it!"

The idea struck Brother R. as a capital one, and he acted promptly upon it. But in the meantime Nick had not been idle. Procuring a wholesale supply of red yarn, he spent that night among the Marysville hen-roosts, and few chickens there were in town next day that did not bear Brother R.'s private mark.

The joke soon bore fruit. Brother R. not only claimed his own, but his neighbors', and, in fact, everybody's chickens. The best citizens of Marysville were accused of stealing his fowl. Chicken coops were invaded with search-warrants, criminal prosecutions were instituted, actions were commenced in Justice's courts for the recovery of the feathered property, suits for slander were threatened, the lawyers reaped a rich harvest of small fees, and the town was kept in a hubbub until the chicken complication was finally settled. And when it leaked out that the whole thing was "one of Nick's jokes," those who had been the maddest were perforce compelled to laugh loudest and treat oftentimes to turn the tide of ridicule that threatened to overwhelm them.

Nick was never addicted to partisan politics. Being a Virginian his natural leanings are toward the Democracy; but it has always been his pleasure and his boast that he "don't care for party, but works for his friends." In 1852 he was porter and salesman with the house of John C. Fall & Co.—then doing the largest business of any concern in Northern California. Mr. Fall became a candidate for the State Senate, and Nick was of course active in his behalf. On the morning of the election Mr. Fall handed him the key to his safe and said:

"Nick, I am very anxious to win this fight. You will find about $500 in the safe. Take it and spend it among the boys where you think it will do the most good."

Nick was very active that day. Wine flowed like water, "the boys" were flush and happy, and the noisy indications were all favorable to the election of Mr. Fall. Late in the afternoon, and just before the closing of the polls, the latter stepped into the Magnolia Saloon, and there was Nick holding forth to a crowd, flourishing aloft in his right hand a bundle of ballots, and, in tones inspired by a free indulgence in wine, offering to bet on Fall's election.

"Do you think I've won, Nick?" asked Mr. Fall.

"Won? Why, of course you've won! No doubt of it. Dead sure as four aces," responded Nick.

"What makes you think so?" asked Mr. Fall.

"Why, I've plumped a hundred and twenty-four of them fellers into the ballot box this afternoon," said Nick, triumphantly shaking his tickets.

"Let me see them," said Mr. Fall.

Nick handed him a ballot; he gave it a single glance, and his countenance fell.

"My God, Nick, you've beaten me!" he exclaimed, and it was true. Some cunning fellow of the opposition had taken advantage of Nick's hilarity and substituted for the genuine ballots bearing Mr. Fall's name bogus ones, on which the name of James E. Stebbins, his opponent, had been substituted, and John C. Fall missed being a California Senator by five votes.

There is but one well authenticated instance of Nick having again taken part in a political contest, and that was on an occasion, some years since, when W. T. Ellis, a present prominent merchant of Marysville, was a candidate for the office of City Treasurer. On election day, so the story goes, he quietly slipped a twenty-dollar piece into Nick's hand and informed him that he would be glad of his assistance, which was promptly tendered. During the day the candidate visited the polling places, but saw nothing of Nick, and finally went to Nick's house, where he found him lying on the lounge, smoking and reading the paper, utterly unmindful of the political contests waging without.

"Why," said Mr. E., in surprise, "I thought you were going to work for me!"

"I have," coolly responded Nick.

"But I gave you twenty dollars to spend for me," said Mr. E.

"That's so," replied Nick. "I spent a dollar of it among the boys, and it took the other nineteen to convince me."

It might be inferred from this anecdote that Nick's political conscience was somewhat elastic, but it is probable that he preferred exposing his character to that suspicion rather than lose so good an opportunity for perpetrating a joke.

Another illustration in point: When Hon. James A. Johnson, our present Lieutenant-Governor, returned home after his second term in Congress, he desired to take the stage from Colusa to Marysville, but there was a slight obstacle in the way. Governor, then Congressman, Johnson has always been too honest a man to profit pecuniarily from his official positions, and on this occasion lacked sufficient money with which to purchase a ticket by the stage, and was compelled to borrow it. Nick heard of the matter, and when next he met Johnson said to him, with great seriousness:

"Doc,"—the Governor is popularly known as Doc. Johnson in the Third Congressional District.—"Doc, I've always been your friend; I worked for you both times when you was elected to Congress, but this lets me out. I'm ashamed of you, Doc, I'm ashamed of you."

"What's the matter, Nick?" asked Johnson.

"Doc, I thought you was a statesman. I thought you had a little sense; but I've come to the conclusion that you're a d—d fool!"

"Why, Nick, that's pretty hard talk. What in the world do you mean?" asked Johnson.

"Well," said Nick, "here you've been two terms in Congress, and have to borrow a little ticky two dollars and a half to buy a stage ticket. Now, I aint no statesman, but you just bet your life if I'd been four years in Congress I'd have owned a quarter section of the Northern Pacific Railroad."

Some years since Nick left Marysville, and took up his abode in Colusa, where he opened a saloon which he now keeps, and his relation of his early experience in his new home was exceedingly interesting and amusing. I will endeavor to tell his story as nearly as possible in his own style:

"When I went to Colusa," said Nick, "I wanted to get the trade of them lop-eared Missourians, so I went down to the bay, and I laid in a stock of the best whisky that had ever been seen in that town. But, don't you know, them six-toed Missourians would come in and take a horn of that whisky, and turn up their noses, and they wouldn't come back again. I tried to find out the reason, and one day one of 'em told me. 'Why,' said he, 'it's too powerful weak!' Then I sent down and got a lot of Barbary Coast tanglefoot. That suited 'em better, but they said it didn't take a good hold. Then I mixed up some benzine and sulphuric acid, and they said it was pretty good, but it wouldn't stay by a feller. So at last I went to work and made up a decoction of poison oak and buckeye, and called it the 'Sheep-Herders' Delight.' You oughter seen them huskies for it. One drink of it would set a feller to turnin' flip-flaps. A peddler come into the place one day and took two drinks of it, and managed to get away. About two hours afterwards he came back and said he'd been robbed of his pack. I knew the effects of the 'Sheep-Herders' Delight,' so I went out and hunted around, and found his pack where he had hid it in the bushes and forgot all about it. I tell you it's a mighty popular drink over there."

During the War of the Rebellion Colusa was a very hot-bed of treason, its inhabitants being mostly from Arkansas, Missouri, and the Southwestern States. Shortly after the commencement of hostilities, Nick, who was an unswerving and earnest Union man, determined to celebrate the Fourth of July.

"There was one American in the town besides me," said Nick. "Well, we went and got an old anvil, and we took her down on the bank of the Sacramento River and loaded her up, and about daylight we commenced banging away. We'd fired about a dozen salutes, and just as day was breaking we saw half a dozen things in the river that looked like ducks coming towards us. In a little while they reached the bank where we were, and we saw that they were a lot of Missourians, with their clothes tied to their heads and rifles in their hands swimming the river. When they reached the shore the head man, a big husky more than six feet high, climbed up the bank, and planking the butt of his rifle on the levee, sung out:

"I say, stranger, what's the war?"

But this happened, if it happened at all, in the comparatively early days of Colusa, which has since become more cosmopolitan in her population and now boasts of all the concomitants of civilization and refinement. She has good public schools and churches and an excellent town and county government. Most of the Southwestern people are Campbellites, and they have erected a neat little church in the town for their peculiar worship.

Nick, for some reason, became a great admirer of "Brother Porter," the pastor, and lost no opportunity in sounding his praises. One Sunday he took a friend to his favorite church, and, after the services were over and they were walking quietly home, his friend broke the silence by remarking:

"Nick, that's a nice little church and a good preacher, but it's a new thing to me to see a congregation stand up when the minister prays. They always kneel in my church."

"Why," exclaimed Nick, "you don't s'pose Brother Porter would let them huskies kneel in that new church, do you?"

"And why not?" asked his friend.

"Because if he did," responded Nick, "John Boggs, Frank Goad, Bill Harrington, Doc Glenn, and all them money-lenders would snake out their pencils in prayer-time and figure up their interest money on the backs of them new pews."

Coming down on the Sacramento boat soon after, I was heartily glad to meet Nick as a fellow-passenger. His droll sayings and funny stories soon transformed a tedious journey to a pleasure-trip.

"And how is Brother Porter's church getting on?" I asked.

"It's all right now," said he; "but it had a mighty close call a while ago, and—you—hear—me!"

"How so?" I inquired.

"Well," said Nick, "you see ther was one o' them cussed Missourians come to town with a jackass, and bought a lot right alongside the church, and every time that jackass would squeal the whole congregation would run out doors. For a little while 'twas a question whether the church or the jackass would have to move, but Brother Porter he jest threw hisself and rassled with the Lord, and you bet that jack-ass had to go."

Up to a very recent date most of the light freight destined for Colusa was taken there on the tops of the stages from Marysville. On one occasion a Colusa undertaker was the consignee of several burial caskets, which loaded on the top of the stage gave it a decidedly funeral appearance, and attracted the attention of an old lady passenger on the back seat. Nick was her vis-à-vis, and her extreme nervousness soon excited his interest and curiosity.

The old lady finally spoke to Nick in tremulous tones:

"Are those—those—corpses, on the top of the stage?"

"Oh, no, marm," replied he. "They're only empty coffins."

Both relapsed into silence for a few minutes, when the old lady asked: "Why do they carry them on the passenger coach?"

At this moment the spirit of mischief took possession of Nick. His eyes twinkled, and his sympathies for the elderly female's nervous sensibilities vanished in the provocation for a practical joke.

"You've never been to Colusa, have you, madam?" he asked, confidently and mysteriously.

"N—n—no, sir!" she stammered.

"Well, yer see, it's very dangerous going up and down, and around these mountain curves, and so they take them coffins along for the passengers in case of accident," said Nick softly.

"To—to—to send the bodies to Colusa?" she inquired.

"Oh, no!" said Nick. "They bury 'em right alongside the road. 'Twouldn't be any use to take 'em to Colusa after they was dead, you know. They wouldn't enjoy their visit."

The old lady buried her face in her handkerchief, and when, with a sigh of relief, she alighted from the stage at the end of her journey, she was utterly ignorant of the fact that the entire distance traveled had been across a vast plain.

One more of Nick's jokes, which will be best appreciated in San Francisco, and I will close. Your readers doubtless all remember the Pioneer celebration of 1875, the twenty-fifth anniversary of the admission of California into the Union; how the '49ers congregated here from all parts of the State, and were not received by their metropolitan brethren; how they couldn't get any lunch at Woodward's Gardens; how mad they got therat; how the balloon collapsed, and Tommy Newcomb got his arm broken; and how the failure of the celebration was made entirely disastrous through the mismanagement of the excursion around the harbor on the steamship Great Republic. Nick was one of the pilgrims, and came as a member, or guest, of the Society of Pioneers of Colusa.

The morning after the trip around the Bay I met Nick on Montgomery Street, and as the affair was the general subject of adverse criticism I was curious to see what he would say about it.

"Well, Nick," I said, "I suppose you went on the excursion. How did you enjoy it?"

"Yes," replied he, "I went, and had a bully time. I just rung in with the Cap'n, and had all the boned turkey and champagne I wanted." And after a pause he added: "But a lot of our party from Colusa made a mistake and didn't go."

"What mistake did they make?" I asked.

"Well, you see," said Nick, "a lot o' them six-toed, lop-eared Missourians had come across the plains in bull teams, and never seen a steamship, and they mistook the Long Bridge for the Great Republic, and thought that a pile-driver was the smoke-stack, and I'm d—d if them huskies didn't stand on that bridge all day long waitin' for 'em to cast off the lines."

I have presented these few jokes as samples culled from a seemingly inexhaustible stock that increases as the days go by, for Nick, although fairly advanced in years, has lost none of that keen sense of humor and love of fun that have made his name famous where he has lived. Kind-hearted, open-handed, chivalrous, and brave, he is a fair specimen of a large class of Pioneer Californians who are rapidly yielding to the inexorable march of old Father Time, and who are erroneously supposed to have lived only in the creations of romantic brains.

FRANK W. GROSS.

SAN FRANCISCO, November, 1878.

There is a wide difference between admiration and love. The sublime, which is the cause of the former, always dwells on great objects and terrible; the latter on small ones and pleasing; we submit to what we admire, but we love what submits to us; in one case we are forced, in the other we are flattered into compliance.—Burke.

The end of the honeymoon. Young bride (much hurt)—"Edwin, you have been whistling and singing all day, and it is our last day, too! Anyone would think you were glad to get back to town again."

Young husband—"So I am. (Happy thought occurs to him here.) With you, pet—with you, of course."

As the lion's foot carries in its velvety surface hidden claws that can rend you, so does nature carry concealed beneath its fair surface a vengeance, a hell that will torture or slay you for every violation of their required duties.—Chas. Ellis.

Every event that man would master must be mounted on the run, and no man ever caught the reins of a thought except as it galloped by him.—Holmes.

INTAGLIOS.

A Legend of the Forget-me-not.

When Psyche lost her Lord, the Lord of Love,
Weeping alone she wandered
Listless by every well-known field and grove,
And on her lost Love pondered.

Lastly, by Lethe's stream her footsteps strayed;
And "Oh!" she said, in sighing,
"That I might dip, and my past life be made
Like dreams with daylight dying!"

The big tears from her blue eyes raining down,
Fell on earth's pitying bosom;
Sudden there sprang amid the sedges brown,
Blue as her eyes, a blossom.

And o'er her head soft rustling sweet and low,
As though some bird's wing fluttered,
In those love tones whose loss was all her woe,
"Forget me not!" it uttered.

No more, no sight, no touch; these words alone;
And "Ah!" she cried, "forget thee?"
Nay, but half Love in our glad life was known;
Half Love is to regret thee.

"Forget thee? Nay, these flowers my tears begot
Shall be to me a token
Of Love; they shall be called Forget-me-not,
The name to cheer me spoken."

So well, sweet river-flowers, we welcome you,
Earth with faint sadness scenting—
Born of the tears from Psyche's eyes of blue,
For her lost Love lamenting.

Snares.

Bright were the threads the lady wrought,
And bright the web she wove, and spun,
While the gay balls, upon the floor,
The little cat harried, one by one,
And in their gold and purple play
Saw only feints of flying prey.

Around the lady suitors pressed,
This pale with passion, with pride;
These watched the flashing of her hand,
And those the fair face, violet-eyed;
One sang, one sued, one sighed, and each
Hung on the honey of her speech.

And as I saw the lady's smile,
Now here, now there, indulgence shed
Glances beneath a drooping lid,
Tremor of lip, and bend of head,
To me the lithe cat's bounding play
Had counterpoise of nobler prey!

Analogy.

The maples in the forest glow;
On the lawn the Fall flowers blaze;
The landscape has a purple haze;
My heart is filled with warmth and glow,
Like living coals the red leaves burn:
"They fall—then turns the red to rust;
They crumble, like the coals, to dust,
Warm heart, must thou to ashes turn?"

Harvest Languor.

Who has not seen thee oft amid thy store?
Sometimes whoever seeks abroad may find
Thee sitting careless on a granary floor,
Thy hair soft-lifted by the winnowing wind;
Or on a half-reapen furrow, sound asleep,
Drowned with the fume of poppies, while thy hook
Sparcs the next swath and all its twined flowers;
And, sometimes, like a gleaner thou dost keep
Steady thy laden head across a brook,
Or by a cider-press, with patient look,
Thou watchest the last oozings, hours by hours.

KEATS.

Fading Flowers.

Her yellow stars the jasmine drops
In mellowed masses, one by one;
The hollyhocks fall off their tops,
The lous-blossoms all white, 'till the sun;
From brazen sunflowers, orb and fringe,
The burning burnish dials and dies;
Sad Autumn sets a sullen tinge
Upon the scornful peonies.
Ah! well a day!
Life leaves us so.
Love dare not stay;
Sweet things decay.

OWEN MEREDITH.

No More.

How did Love speed? The sweet moon sailed
In robes of dusky gold last night,
Untid our tender glory paled
Before the ruddy dawn of light;
Love lay enshrined in bridal bowers,
And kissed the sweets that come and go
From far-off fields—from all the flowers
That blow.

How did Love wake? The early beams
Had pierced the rose-leaf where he slept,
And rising from his perfumed dreams,
Into the dewy world he leapt,
Singing, soared upward into light—
"For day is but a little pain,
And then 'tis night, with soft delight,
Again!"

So Love returned when twilight fell,
And found his flowers dying—dead;
The queenly rose he loved so well
Lay in his arms with drooping head.
"Ah, Love!" she cries; "thy kisses burn:
But Death has wooed my lips before;
If Love once flies—no more!
No more!"

LAUNCE LEE, in Hood's Comic Annual for 1879.

Autumn's Last Rosary.

The squirrel gloats over his accomplished hoard,
The ants have brimmed their garner with ripe grain,
And honey-bees have stored
The sweets of Summer in their luscious cells;
The swallows all have winged across the main;
But here the Autumn melancholy dwells,
And sighs her tuneful spells
Amongst the sunless shadows of the plain.
Alone, alone,
Upon a mossy stone,
She sits and reckons up the dead and gone,
With the last leaves for a love-rosary;
While all the withered world looks drearily,
Like a dim picture of the drowned past,
In the hushed mind's mysterious far-away,
Doubtful what ghostly thing will steal the last
Into that distance, gray upon the gray. Hoon.

The Deceiver.

O wanton wind, I'm watching you,
As o'er the world you wander—
I saw you steal that silver dew
From those dear daisies yonder.

A lily queened the river's bank;
Yet in your arms you caught her—
You bowed her head until she drank
Her shadow in the water.

Then singing loud you laughed and leapt
Along the lolling meadow:
But there the lovely lily slept
Forever with her shadow.

W. I. STRINGHAM.

SHAKSPEARE AND ROYALTY.

Scarcely two centuries ago the "plain people," as Mr. Lincoln used to call them, were not considered by the ruling classes of any consequence whatever. In other times they were thought fit only to build monster castles, and useless walls, and worthless pyramids; and when these monuments to folly and superstition were completed the human machines that built them were thrown aside with the broken tools and the scaffolding, or they were sent to be annihilated in war; to be slaughtered like so many cattle in bloody conflicts—conflicts the cause of which they did not know, the justice or injustice of which they were kept too ignorant to understand. Therefore, when we think of the times in which he lived, it is not strange that Shakspeare takes royalty or the titled nobility for all his characters, with few exceptions—the exceptions being his witches, eccentrics, madmen, and fools. Not a single representative of the middle classes of thrifty, intelligent, independent people, such as abound in this age, finds a place in the plays of Shakspeare, and for the good reason that there were no such classes in the days of which he wrote. In those times every man was either connected with a reigning family or he was a vassal and dependent; there were few, if any, "well-to-do people" in those ages, outside of the nobility.

Shakspeare's plays, with all the richness of sentiment, "sweet as damask roses," and wonderful many-sided genius displayed in them, have, I think, educated many to believe that kings and princes are usually great men. The wise sayings and sparkling epigrams the immortal poet puts into the mouth of nearly every royal character are delightful reading. Yet many people—especially in Europe—get to associating Shakspeare's speeches as the real emanations of the royal personages who utter them. Of course none of the Henrys, nor Richard, nor Lear, nor Hamlet, ever was capable of originating any part of the golden or witty words the great bard makes them utter, or of acting as he makes them act. It is not improbable that in reality Richard III. was something such a man as the late Mr. Vasquez. Possibly he was a little better educated, but he was like Vasquez—a low and vulgar murderer. Hamlet, if the truth was known, was, quite likely, about such a character as our Emperor Norton—his only distinction being that outside of being born a prince, he assumes to be crazy. Whether he was or not, one or two facts was all that Shakspeare required to evolve out of them a great drama.

That these plays, abounding in sweetness and light as they do, have nevertheless kept back Republican institutions in Europe, and retarded freedom in many places, there can be little doubt. They have done this by the impression they convey to the ordinary reader, that there is a divinity that "doth hedge a king." Now if any proof were required to show the absurdity of the statement that there is a particle of divinity about a king, it is only necessary to quote Thomas Jefferson, who, when a foreign minister ninety years ago, visited every important court in Europe. Mr. Jefferson's fame and mission were such that he was allowed to meet personally all the illustrious emperors, and kings, and queens of that period. And after he had made the grand tour he wrote home to his daughter, that, taking them as a lot, and considering their early advantages, they were the stupidest men and women he had found in all his travels. Not one of them was capable of writing a readable public document, nor even an intelligent letter. He said there was always behind every throne a power that ruled it absolutely. The speeches of every sovereign he met were always written by some minister or secretary. The battles they were supposed to have fought were invariably planned by some one else. Then the author of the Declaration of Independence described, one by one, the personal habits and eccentricities of the royal highnesses he had seen. His descriptions are both amusing and painful; amusing when they show how ridiculously a king can act, and painful when they narrate his often indecent conduct. If the crowned heads of Europe have personally grown in grace, or scholarship, or statesmanship since then, the fact is yet to be ascertained.

There is not to-day, with two exceptions, a reigning monarch who has natural or acquired ability enough to make an efficient viceroy of a thriving church. One of the exceptions I make is Dom Pedro II., of Brazil, by far the ablest sovereign living, yet Dom Pedro has capacity enough to qualify him for an average country judge—no more. He is more erratic than brilliant. And yet there are those who talk about our adopting some figure-head of a king one of these days, so as to make of ours a "strong government."

There is just one other type of kingly prerogative which I will mention now, and that is the extremely religious one. Like him of whom Spencer wrote three hundred years ago:

"And on his heart a bloody cross he bore,
The dear remembrance of his dying Lord,
For whose sweet sake that glorious badge he wore,
And dead, as living, ever he adored."

It is no attack upon vital Christianity to say that kings who have been religious bigots, have frequently become the most cruel and bloodthirsty in all history.

EDWARD CURTIS.

SAN FRANCISCO, November, 1878.

It ought not to be forgotten that the famous music house of Kohler & Chase is now at 137 and 139 Post Street. The new store is large, commodious and well lighted. Messrs. Kohler & Chase are agents for the "Decker Bros.," the "Emerson," and the "Fischer Upright" pianos, and the celebrated Mason & Hamlin organs. They have also the largest and finest stock of band instruments in the city. Their Oakland house is at the corner of Washington and Ninth Streets. It would be superfluous to add anything to this information in the way of commendation; the firm of Kohler & Chase is to music in San Francisco what Mr. John Murray was to be to English literature.

BEFORE.

Gayly the candidate
Seeketh the bar,
Where thirty citizens
Throng from afar.
Singing "In search of thee
Hither we come;
Candidate, candidate,
Set up the rum."

AFTER.

Hark, 'tis the candidate
Hastening home;
Vainly the citizens,
Seeking him, roam.
"Light is my pocketbook,
Lighter my vote:
Citizens, no you don't,
Not if I know."

FASHION GOSSIP.

Ladies' Dress and Fancy Goods.

As the winter season approaches the ladies are desirous of making their purchases in the most satisfactory manner. Fashion naturally leads in this as in every other department in which the ladies are interested, and a few suggestions presented in the way of items we feel assured the fashionable readers of the ARGONAUT will kindly receive. Where to purchase all the novelties in winter goods being an item in this direction we beg leave to submit the following as the result of our visit to one of the leading fashionable houses in the city. We found, upon entering the establishment of Doane & Henshelwood, corner Montgomery and Post Streets, that they have been and are now making extensive sales of ladies' dress goods in plain black and broadened silks and armures; also, colored silks, bourette cloths, and plain black as well as all the winter colors in velvets. We found here an extensive assortment of ladies' dress goods in the morning department, embracing drap d'Alma, Henrietta cloth, cashmeres, French mohairs, and the camel's hair goods; we found the favorite shades to be the dark or navy blue, dark green, various brown shades, plum color, and garnet—the latter being the new shade in camel's hair goods. The Scotch plaids are now assuming some popularity, and are being selected for young ladies' street suits. Mr. Doane informs us that he has just received all the high grade novelties in silk mixed wool goods; also, some of the latest novelties in bourettes, invisible plaids, etc. We found here also an extensive assortment of ivory portemonnaies, card cases, match safes, fancy work boxes, etc., and the very latest designs in French, German, and Japanese fans. In ladies' lingerie, embroidered silk and satin ties, Breton lace bows and Chantilla lace bows may be classed among the specialties. Among the novelties in lingerie we noticed a very delicate gold braid interwoven with black lace and plaited white ruffles. In ladies' handkerchiefs we noticed embroidered handkerchiefs in unique and elegant designs; also, the embroidered initial, the latter being classed as novelties. These handkerchiefs are a specialty, and are made to order. The embroidery is in cotton, and in fast colors. The Harris seamless kid glove is now quite a favorite, and may be found here in an extensive assortment. All the latest shadings in ladies' and children's silk and cotton hose may here be obtained, also the celebrated Cartwright & Warner make of underwear for ladies and misses, also ladies' union suits. In table linen, the very best make may here be found, embracing the justly celebrated John S. Brown & Son's make, of Belfast. The table-cloths and napkins to match, made of the best Irish linen, may be obtained here at prices that are exceedingly low. For damp and rainy weather the gossamer waterproof sold at this establishment now fills a want long felt by ladies who have experienced the unpleasant sensation produced by our damp atmosphere while on the streets shopping. These waterproofs are very light and entirely proof from rain and dampness. Gossamer coats for gents may here also be found. This firm was the first to introduce these goods and their immense sales of this class of goods indicates the appreciation of the public in their enterprise in this direction. We would call the attention of the gents also to a very choice assortment in cigar cases and pocket-books, etc., in Russia leather to be found at this establishment.

Velvet Frames, Albums, Etc.

Photographs are now being framed in frames that give them a place among mantel and cabinet ornaments. Velvet and fire gilt frames for cabinet or card photographs are considered the most appropriate, although carved frames are to some extent favorably looked upon as appropriate for this class of pictures. One of the neatest of cabinet ornaments is the velvet album standing on easels. The trimmings of the velvet frames are very elegant, being mostly trimmed with satin and gold. The firm of E. Wolfe & Co., under the Palace Hotel, have a very fine selection of these frames and albums, and in their specialty in gold frames in Grecian designs we feel warranted in saying that the most fastidious will here find something to their taste. These elegant ornamentations are here made to order by the most skillful gilders. Regilding of mirrors and picture frames is here done also in the most satisfactory manner. Some very fine passepartouts we find here in an extensive assortment. Some new styles of flat frames for engravings, with finely engraved ornamentations in the corners, are here to be seen. Among some of the specialties we notice some fine gold and ebony brackets and wall-pockets. Also the Vienna fire gilt and enameled frames for cabinet photographs. As no picture is complete without a frame, so its beauty may be enhanced by a judicious taste displayed in selecting this necessary ornamentation. Some of the most fashionable ladies have here found every style of frame for home decoration that can be obtained, and by their liberal purchases have expressed their entire satisfaction in the display here presented.

Bartlett's Book Sale.

The standard works of the greatest English, French, and American authors, embracing history, fiction, travels, and poetry, may be seen at No. 3 Dupont Street every night, selling at a terrible sacrifice at auction, the works of Hume, Macaulay, Walter Scott, Shakspeare, in elegant cloth and library binding; also the choice works of fiction, embracing Bulwer, Wilkie Collins, Charles Reade, Jules Verne, Holland, Holmes, and numerous others; also, the best English and American poets, are being sold at the very lowest rates. This is one of the rare chances to buy a library at the very lowest rates.

BOSTON DRESS REFORM.

California "Worth" Princess Suits, Skirts, and attachable Flounces; Cashmere and Merino Union Suits for ladies and children; ladies' and misses' shoulder-brace Corsets; Abdominal Corsets. No. 430 Sutter Street. A. W. BAKER, the only Dress Reform Agent in the city.

This paper is printed with ink furnished by Chas. Enea Johnson & Co., 509 South Tenth Street, Philadelphia, and 59 Gold Street, New York.

Currier, 103 Dupont Street, makes the finest PICTURE FRAMES.

Where can one thoroughly enjoy a swim? At the Terrace Swimming Baths, Alameda.

Currier, 103 Dupont Street, has a fine assortment of VELVET FRAMES.

The finest baths are at the Terrace, Alameda.

NEW

BOOKS

The Story of Liberty. By Charles Carleton Coffin. 4to. $3.00
The Blessed Lies. By John Allen. 12mo. 1.00
Outlines of Ontological Science, or a Philosophy of Knowledge and Being. By Henry N. Day. 12mo. 75
Stock Breeding. By Manly Miles, M. D. 12mo. 50
The Young Adventurer, or Tom's Trip across the Plains. By Horatio Alger, Jr. 12mo. 25
The First Violin. A novel. By Jessie Fothergill. 1.00
Leisure Hour Series. 1.00
Astronomy. By R. S. Hall. Handbooks for students and general readers. 60
Fra Angelico. Artists' Biographies. 50
Just How. A Key to the Cook Books. By Mrs. A. D. T. Whitney. 1.00

BANCROFT'S
721 MARKET ST. S.F.

ARMY AND NAVY GOODS,
REGALIA AND LODGE SUPPLIES.

A. J. PLATE & CO.,

No. 510 SACRAMENTO STREET.

THOMAS BOYSON, M. D.

(University of Copenhagen, Denmark),

PHYSICIAN AND SURGEON. Office

and Residence, 112 Kearny Street. Office hours, 11 A. M. to 1 P. M., 6 to 8 P. M. Sunday 11 to 1 only. Telephone in the office.

KURRACHEE RUGS!

ASK FOR THEM IN THE LEAD-

ing Carpet Stores. Manufactured by
WAKEFIELD RATTAN CO.,
38 Geary Street.

CALIFORNIA
ROOT TEA.

My family use California Root Tea, and find it the best and cheapest medicinal preparation they have ever had. It is a natural remedy, not a nostrum.

BUTTERICK'S

PATTERNS—NOV. STYLES.

Send stamp for catalogue. AGENCY, 124 POST ST.,
San Francisco.

HEALD'S BUSINESS
COLLEGE,
No. 24 Post Street,
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

Opposite Mechanics' Institute.

IMPARTS A THOROUGH PRACTI- cal Education in all Commercial and English Branches French, German, Spanish, Drawing, and Telegraphy. This school having greater facilities, and enjoying a more extensive patronage than any similar institution on the Pacific coast, continues to base its claims for recognition and patronage upon the good sense and enlightened judgment of the public.

LIST OF FACULTY.
E. M. Heald, F. C. Woodbury,
H. M. Stearns, A. B. Capp,
Mrs. C. Woodbury, T. R. Southern,
J. A. Chesnutwood, Mrs. W. J. Hamilton,
A. P. DuBois, F. Seregni,
R. Sorcini, Geo. Jebens,
Lloyd Baldwin, A. Vander Naillen.
For full particulars, call at the College, 24 Post Street,
or address E. P. HEALD,
President Business College, San Francisco.

J. J. BIRGE, DENTIST, 313 Kearny Street.

R. C. MOWBRAY, M. D., DENTIST
224 STOCKTON ST., corner Post, S. F.

THOMAS H. HOLT,
NOTARY PUBLIC, No. 326½ Mont-
gomery Street. Residence, 1803 Stockton Street,
San Francisco.

SAFES AND SCALES.

FOR SALE BY

JOHN MOLLOY, 54 CLAY STREET.

R. P. & H. N. CLEMENT,
ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW,

Nos. 2, 3, and 4 SHERMAN BUILDING,
Montgomery Street, N. E. corner of Clay, San Francisco
(P. O. Box 797).

JOHN BACON & COMPANY

INTERCEPTED LETTERS.

SAN FRANCISCO, November 22, 1898.

MY DEAR MADGE:—I wondered on Monday night where I had seen Ada Cavendish before. I knew it could not have been in the flesh, for there has always been an over and a content between us. But she perplexed me with an intangible memory which I only settled this morning. I was turning over the leaves of some English novels, when I found her. The strong individual features, the sweep of her draperies, the pose of her body, flashed upon me familiarly from many a wood cut. They are hideously unflattering, but I knew them instantly, and I have irrevocably made up my mind that when a London novel is illustrated the artist goes to Ada Cavendish's Theatre—the Olympic, is it?—and studies her. She is a very graceful woman sometimes. She has the pretty trick of falling into a striking posture with startling quickness, and she fumes—my dear girl, she drops down as dead as a door nail and as limp as a silk handkerchief, so that you have a second of genuine uneasiness. Her voice is soft, gentle, and low, an excellent thing in woman, as a matter of course, but a very bad thing for the California Theatre acoustics. I suppose no one back of the fourth row in the dress circle heard one word. Moreover, she has such a habit of quickening her utterances with emotion, so that I doubt if she is always distinctly audible even on the stage. I like her well. "Mercy Merrick" never seemed to me less like a heroine and more like a real woman. She identifies herself so thoroughly with the situation of the moment, though never forgetting that she is an usurper, that you can not help being absorbed. I tried my best to get up a little sympathy for "Grace Roseberry." I always do as a matter of principle. I conceive it my duty to take issue with Mr. Wilkie Collins, but he made her such an essentially disagreeable person that I am reluctantly compelled to go back on virtue in distress. I must say that Miss DeForrest extended every aid within her power to sustain Mr. Wilkie Collins. "They" say she played it well. Certainly she presented a strong contrast with the gentle-voiced shrinking creature, upon whom she piled her reproaches with an adamantine hardness, and with a rasp which pierced one's tympanum painfully. In fact the variety of voice and accent in the cast was something remarkable. Miss Cavendish's exquisitely modulated and essentially English; Miss DeForrest's American, and the trail of the elocutionist over it all; Mr. Barton Hill's swi generis; Mr. Lawlor's, full of McCullough echoes, and very little like that of a curate of the Church of England. Mr. Lawlor did his best to look like one of those rosy cherubim, the minor English clergy, but he could have stepped out and sung "Muldoon the Solid Man" for us without striking the audience as being very inappropriate. He was as nervous as a debutante, and devoted his energies to his watch chain with an assiduity and strength which abundantly testified to his having "just returned from an agricultural district." Somehow, although they did their best, the cast seemed incongruous, and Miss Cavendish not in her element—handicapped at every turn. What a strong, fine face she has—a Celtic face I should think, for her eyes are deeply, darkly, unmistakably blue, and get no shade of black even from a pair of dark, expressive eyebrows. You should see her smile. It is a complete transfiguration; more so even than the smile of Clara Morris, for a spirit of mischief leaps into her eye, which is very captivating. There is about her an utter absence of straining for effect, which I like immensely. She wears her own hair, neither gilded nor with that long, superfluous switch which always dangles down actresses' backs when they wear flowing hair. She dresses with character, but plainly and inexpensively—in fact, dear Madge, in one scene a little too inexpensively; for when she hands over a pair of very tiny bracelets and a dollar-store locket; in fact the entire parure rattles and jingles with such a suggestiveness of that eminent bazaar that it becomes ridiculous. Thoroughly English as Miss Cavendish is, it is easy to see that she takes kindly to French method. She has none of the airs of the English tragedy queen, even in her strongest scenes. I remember how Miss Pateman used to lift her great voice when "Mercy Merrick" turns at last, stung to desperation by "Grace Roseberry's" taunts, and asks, "Who are you?" until the rafters trembled, and the gods almost kicked the beams out of the gallery. I shall never get over the loss of Miss Pateman, but after all, Madge, it struck me as being rather more like the red thing when Miss Cavendish came close to the story "Grace," and asked her the question with ominous quiet. It had a more dangerous sound than the shriek of a virago. To be sure she had the hysteria afterward, but then you know women always do something like that. We can't keep anything up very long, even a good mad. Then, too, in "Mercy's" confession to "Julian Gray" there was all the quiet of hopelessness, and very little of the stage sob. What a pretty picture she made as she fell at his feet in one of those expressive attitudes which she understands so thoroughly. Oh, she is very interesting, Madge, and it is better to be interesting than to be beautiful. I fancy that she holds the same place with the London public as that spoiled darling of fortune in Black's last novel, "Miss Gertrude White." Of course you have read McLeod of Dare, and will agree with me that there is a stroke of genius in his giving that commonplace name to that commonplace creature, who unwittingly became the heroine of such a romance. What a detestable mix she is to be sure. Do not think I am comparing Miss Cavendish to her, excepting as a London favorite. Miss White's debut in "something tragic" was anticipated with interest. I can not but very much regret that Miss Cavendish's debut in a new part at home is quite the sensation of the London theatre-goers, and when she essayed tragedy it must have brought out the dilettanti, the artists, and the critics in full force. Imagine even the first night in London of The New Magdalen or Miss Guillot! Yet she is not a great actress, though to me infinitely charming. I can look over the strange fact that she does not use her hands well, and that she flutters about too much. In fact, I believe I like to see her flutter; for, though she approaches a degree too near the description of a "fine woman," she is shapely, round, and supple. Mrs. Saunders made a very nice "Lady Janet Roy," but she always gives me the impression that she is going to break out in low comedy. In fact everything seemed to be a makeshift. Mr. Lawlor is not at all adapted to the part of "Julian Gray," and the Reverend "Julian," as you know, figures quite conspicuously in the play. Mr. Hill played "Horace Holmercroft" fairly, and both he and the Reverend "Julian" contrived to make it very patent to the audience that they were both palpably out of place and very poor support to the distinguished actress. It was very evident that Miss Cavendish held the same opinion. "There was much better care shown up at Baldwin's in the production of Jane Eyre. An audience is so easily taught with little things, why not indulge them? There is such an air of "Thornfield" being a will-appointed house, and I really believe nothing so conveys this impression as the good training of a couple of servants, a pompous butler, and an attendant footman—a little matter which can not have cost twenty minutes' extra rehearsal. They tell me the dramatization is from Miss Morris's own pen, and I can quite believe it, for she has caught—as much as the stage can catch—the weird and eerie spirit of the lonely Yorkshire girl, who drew her inspiration from the bleak solitude of the moor. How little she could have known of plays or players, or dreamed that these fancies of her brain, springing up in the glowing coils of the broad rectory fireplace, could ever leave their homely habitation for such scenes; that her solemn, gloomy hero would pace the boards of a theatre, or plain, dark, little "Jane Eyre" shine before the footlights. After all, it is neither "Jane Eyre" nor "Rochester" that we see, though something near akin; for Clara Morris has preserved the quaint phraseology of Charlotte Brontë, and thus to some extent the glamour of the romance. The uncanny moonlight plays its part, too; and we know nothing of "Mrs. Rochester" but the clank of her chains and the shriek of her voice. In fact, it is the only time I have ever seen the play of Jane Eyre when it left upon me any of the feeling with which I read the book. I really believe this is due almost as much to Mr. O'Neill as to Clara Morris herself. I manufactured upon my own responsibility last week a deep-seated prejudice against this gentleman which I expected would be lasting. It was entirely due to his "Armand Duval." He went through this part in a manner exceedingly distasteful to me—his brow corrugated with an expression of acute distress, his voice breaking badly on the home-stretch of every gust of passion. I acknowledge that he dissipated the impression this week. It is not easy to play "Rochester." They always do make such a cad of him. But Mr. O'Neill inspired me with respect for his mere make-up. He did not try to be pretty or romantic. He wore a full beard, not at all becoming, but which made the hero a manlier-looking fellow than the everlasting mustache. Also, he quite discarded the snappish bear element, and was simply an embittered man of the world. I observed that Miss Morris gave him a very cordial hand-shake before the curtain, and he deserved it. You should see Clara Morris in a short frock and gingham apron and a pair of strap slippers. She looks like an overgrown girl with an old head on young shoulders. She has some very natural ways, and chews the corner of her apron with as much gusto as if it were the best gum. This act does not seem pertinent to the story, except to introduce the detestable "Mrs. Reed" and her brood; and yet I suppose it bears upon it and is necessary. But there are only three acts in the play, and everything is very hurried. The second act is rambling, but interesting. It introduces the mask party, but not "Rochester's" own masquerade. The little "Adele" is there in the briefest of petticoats, and is altogether a very leggy youngster. Miss Marie Ravel excellently made up as "Grace Poole," glides hither and yon in a manner which could lead a blind bat know there was a mystery. The masquerade is kept quite comfortably near to the family living-room; is, in fact, ridiculously convenient when "Mr. Rochester's" wedding is interrupted. But these, of course, are dramatic licenses. The brother of the masquerade bride appears with a much inflected visage, a shaky-looking wig, and a pair of topping clerical whiskers, and also mysteriously darts hither and thither and yon. Yet, for all, everything is admirably worked up, and the scene closes with "Rochester's" presentation to the multitude of people in their night-gowns of "Jane Eyre" as his bride. In the next scene I felt really quite awful—I don't mean awfully awful, as the slang goes, but awed—for upon my word, Madge, they commenced the marriage service and went right through it according to Hoyle—no, I don't mean that, I mean line by line from the ritual—until I really felt quite as miserable as if I were at a genuine marriage service. It seemed a little sacrilegious, too, but I suppose it was all right. Of course, the grand scene is "Jane Eyre's" renunciation. I felt pretty solemn over that, too, for the woman played it as if it were something holy. You can not think how unclear it made the performance of last week seem, for Clara Morris beatifies the French cocotte, and does not satisfy in so doing. I looked at her as she raised her hand to heaven in beautiful words of appeal, words which, sinner as I am, seemed almost too sacred for the stage, and I wondered: How do her sympathies lie? No one is a stickler for propriety nowadays, but I was just thinking I have seen Clara Morris many times, for I am one of the warmest admirers of her superb genius. In all those times I have seen her play the parts of only three good women, "Julia," "Alice," and "Jane Eyre." I never admired her more than as the little English primrose. To my thinking she never played more beautifully, more feelingly, than in her renunciation of "Rochester" and his love. After all, there is something in the sweet, the clean, and the true which strikes a resonant chord in human nature. The triumph of the good is sure to delight every one, from the gallery box down to the fiddler nodding in the orchestra. Unfortunately a little devilry is necessary to a good dramatic situation. In this instance "Mr. Rochester" supplied it. I dislike exceedingly, after having my feelings wrought up to such a pitch, to have them brought down with such a bang. Of course, it was necessary to dispose of "Mrs. Rochester" rather summarily, but it seemed too bad that five minutes after all this sublimity of self-sacrifice they should be in each other's arms congratulating themselves that the old girl was out of the way. I did not ascertain just what disposition they made of her. In the original she was burnt to a cinder; I got an idea here that she was impaled on the carving-knife, but Miss Marie Ravel was not perspicuous. After all this misery, you could hardly expect me to make merry with La Marjolaine and The Babes in the Wood, but I did and was literally restored to naturalness by naughtiness and nonsense. The "Sweet Marjoram" is naughty though its music is nice, and the "Ribes" and "Cock Robin" is nonsense of the most maudlin and mellow variety. How I laughed at Edouin in the school-room scene, where he prances so wildly about with all the naturalness of the red-headed imp that he is; how I skipped, in imagination, the rope with cunning Ella Chapman; how I involuntarily kept time with the boys in the gallery to the mischievous and witching measures of the can can song; how I raised the approving palm when Marian Singer and her chorus gurgled out in that captivating "The man in the moon is winking;" how I held my breath for the fragile little humans who did the "Cock Robin" business, and how finally I came away with the opinion that the Babes in the Wood was just as good a burlesque as Robinson Crusoe. As for La Marjolaine, so handsomely put upon the Bush Street Theatre stage with appropriate scenery and gorgeous costumes, I hardly know what to say about it. The libretto is as broad as our moral law is long, the plot as Frenchy as French can be, and the music a delightful interpreter of some very questionable situations. Imagine virtue being awarded a sequence of medals by vice, a woman possessing these medals marrying a man only in name; a series of very gay y plots and counter-plots to get her involved and disgraced, in which noble pursuit the husband encourages a club of gay young bachelors; her final fall—to the eyes of the world—in which her only regret and biggest tears are over the supposed loss of the next medal; her separation from the brevet husband, and marriage at last to the fellow discovered in the closet, and you have a very good idea of the story of "Sweet Marjoram." It can not safely be recommended save to the perfectly pure in heart, and then there is a degree of embarrassment that nothing but the delightful music can chase away. And now I have told you everything of four remarkably strong theatrical attractions all in one week, all doing well, and all well worth an evening's attendance if for nothing more than a counter-irritant to the cramp of Sierra Nevada. Tout à tous, BETSY R.

FASHION GOSSIP.

Latest from Paris.

During the wintry season short dresses are almost without exception now selected for the walking costume. The colors adopted are intended to assimilate to the entire costume. Scotch plaid is to some extent becoming one of the fashionable materials. The indoor toilet preserves more the elaborate in detail and elegance in material. One of the latest, and withal a very rich style, is made of silk of the grey pink shade and cherry colored satin. The skirt is trimmed with a high houllonne, framed on each side with a ruche of cherry color faye, and crossed with barrettes of the satin. The corsage is made with a point at the front and at the back, the material being surah satine, plaited cerry color. The collar is composed of grey houllonne ruches, and cherry barrettes. The sleeves, of grey silk, are made with reverses same as the collar. A heavy drapery of the surah satine, trimmed with a latticed fringe appears, and large square pockets to match the collar and sleeves complete the costume. Another elegant style is made of Bordeaux velvet. The skirt is perpendicularly plaited, and is fixed under a dress, the front of which is formed in a drapery. The dress is shaped at the front so as to form a large waistcoat; at the back the pau d'habit falls over the skirt cut in a pointed way. All the contours are bordered with a narrow, light ecru lace, which gives the whole costume a rich and elegant appearance. On the drapery three rows of passementerie appear. The collar and sleeves are also made to match with lingerie of plaited white ruche. These styles are now, with all the latest, being made to order at the extensive parlors of Madame Lewis, Thurlow Block, corner of Army and Sutter Streets. We noted also a very elegant Princess robe in ecru and blue silk. Also another made of a rich bronze brown brocade velvet; and three magnificent bridal tresses made here. The fashionable circles have justly pronounced this establishment as the leading fashionable dressmaking establishment of the city.

Latest Fashions in Furs.

The beauty of shape and design in furs this season shows the taste of our furriers has followed the culture and refinement that has swept over the world of fashion. Perfection of finish has been reached in this department. The buttons and, indeed, all the trimmings are covered with fur, matching the garment. The garments are lined with quilted satin, mostly of the dark brown shades. In this department the large circular cloak, made of rich Lyons silk, is lined with squirrel. The "Dolman" has deep wide sleeves and fur collar; it is made of thick black silk, lined with dark squirrel, and bordered with black beaver, pointed with the white hairs. The Parisian silk Dolman is trimmed with black fur. The seal skin sacque still retains its popularity, and is manufactured from the finest South Shetland and Alaska seal skins. The sacques for gents and ladies are very similar in design. The seal sacque has the English rolling collar, and is lined with quilted satin, while the buttons are covered with seal fur and ornamented with seal tassels suspended by thick cords; the lining is of a dark shade. The fur hats appearing this season are very picturesque, and are styled the "Florence," the "Alpine," and the "Brighton." The hats are mostly trimmed with a bird made of fur and a long ostrich feather. The linings of the hats are made of satin. All these latest styles we observed at the fashionable fur establishment of H. Liebes & Co., 113 Montgomery Street. A very fine assortment may here be found of all the very latest in this department. This establishment is the oldest in the city, and has long received the fashionable patronage of the city.

On the 26th and 27th days of this month—that is next Tuesday and Wednesday—at ten o'clock A. M. sharp, at No. 649 and 651 Market street, the auction firm of H. M. Newhall will sell by catalogue the largest and best assortment of elegant furniture that was ever offered in San Francisco. The large stock of the California Furniture Manufacturing Company goes to the hammer under a peremptory order of sale that will give splendid bargains. Such a chance for Christmas gifts of articles of real value is seldom offered.

Next week is to be the last—positively—of the "Rice Surprise Party" at the Standard. This will be regretted by the patrons of that place, but they will be consoled with something equally good.

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER.
F. LYSTER.....ACTING MANAGER.
G. R. CHIPMAN.....TREASURER

This (Saturday) afternoon at 2 o'clock, last appearance of

CLARA MORRIS

AS JANE EYRE IN THE GOVERNESS.

Saturday and Sunday evenings,

BLOW FOR BLOW,

FIFTH ACT OF RICHARD III,

And MR. JENNINGS in his inimitable songs.

Monday, Nov. 25, and till further notice, production first time in this country of the powerful English Drama, by Edmund Yates,

NOBODY'S FORTUNE,

Or THE GREAT GOLD ROBBERY.

In active preparation, a new Comedy, adapted from the Spanish, by Jose Godoy, Esq.

STANDARD THEATRE.

Bush Street, between Montgomery and Kearny.

LESSEE AND MANAGER.....M. A. KENNEDY.
BUSINESS MANAGER.....P. H. KIRBY.

The most pleasing attraction in the city.
Fourth Week and still crowded nightly. Brilliant success of

RICE'S SURPRISE PARTY.

This (Saturday) afternoon, at 2 o'clock first

BABES IN THE WOOD MATINEE

LADIES' MATINEE TO-DAY, AT 2 P. M.

This evening and every evening, including Sunday, at 8 o'clock, the great success, Byron's fascinating Musical Burlesque;

BABES IN THE WOOD.

BABES IN THE WOOD.

BABES IN THE WOOD.

Seats at the box office six days in advance.

CALIFORNIA THEATRE.

BARTON & LAWLOR.....MANAGERS.
BARTON HILL.....ACTING MANAGER.

Last Week but one and complete triumph of Miss

ADA CAVENDISH.

Monday, November 25, and every evening during the week, and at

SPECIAL THANKSGIVING MATINEE,

Thursday, Nov. 28, and at Regular Matinee Saturday, Miss Cavendish will appear as

JANE SHORE,

In Wills' latest and best play of that name, supported by a strong cast of characters.

Seats at the box office.

In active preparation, Wilkie Collins' thrilling drama,

MISS GWILT.

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LOCKE.....PROPRIETOR.

Matinee to-day, to-night, and to-morrow (Sunday) evening,

LA MARJOLAINE.

ALICE OATES

As Marjolaine, the Sweet Marjoram, supported by the

ENGLISH COMIC OPERA COMPANY.

Exquisite Costumes from Paris. New Scenery by Graham.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

Iris, the Romance of an Opal Ring. By M. B. M. Toland. Cloth, $3; morocco.....$7 00
Genevieve de Brabant. A legend in verse. By Mrs. Chas. Willing. Cloth..... 3 00
The First Violin. By Jesse Fothergill. Cloth..... 1 00
Edith Murray. A novel. By Joanna Mathews. Clo. 1 50
Evelyn's Folly. A novel. By Bertha M. Clay. Clo. 1 50
The French Revolutionary Period. By Henri Van Laan. 2 vols. Cloth..... 3 50
Just How. A Key to the Cook Books. By Mrs. A. D. T. Whitney..... 1 00
Boswell's Life of Johnson. New edition, cloth..... 2 00
Picturesque Arizona. By E. Conklin. Cloth..... 2 00
On the Road to Riches. By J. Fred Waggoner. Clo. 1 50
Songs, Legends, and Ballads. By J. Boyle O'Reilly. 1 50
A Shocking Story. By Wilkie Collins. Paper..... 1 50
Raymond. By Andre Theunet. Paper..... 30
The largest stock of PRAYER BOOKS, HYMNALS, and BIBLES, on the coast.

NEW STATIONERY, NEW BOOKS

Received daily.

BILLINGS, HARBOURNE &amp; CO.,

BOOKSELLERS AND STATIONERS,

NO. 3 MONTGOMERY STREET.

Patronize a Home Industry.

The delightful aroma of a good cigar is one of the true enjoyments of life. Poets and philosophers have lent their talents in praise of this luxury. One of the true comforts of life it has been pronounced by its votaries ever since its adoption as an article of luxury by the Caucasian race. One of the most important of our industries it has grown to be, until millions are today invested in the manufacture and sale of this truly American commodity. The trade on this coast has become one of first importance, and a competition is now being carried on so extensively in this department that it has, to a great extent, lowered the old-time prices hitherto prevalent. The New York brands have been heralded with such hue and cry in the trade on this coast that very naturally a fierce competition arose through the difference of prices presented by the New York brands. While other California manufacturers were consulting and planning to drive the New York trade back from whence it came, the firm of E. Briggs & Co., 645 Market Street, of this city, quietly entered upon a plan to successfully compete with the New York manufacturers. The five-cent cigars introduced by the New York trade possessed an appearance, it is true, that added to their sale. To produce a cigar at the same price with a superior flavor was the real problem to be solved, was the judicious conclusion of this enterprising firm. By experiments made in the judicious blending of the different grades and qualities of tobacco this firm has at last succeeded in producing a cigar that gives better satisfaction than any New York five-cent cigar made of domestic tobacco. Our climate is better adapted for the manufacture of cigars than the Eastern climate, and, therefore, when the cigar is properly made by blending the different grades and qualities of tobacco, the cigar must necessarily be of a superior quality. These cigars are made entirely of pure tobacco, without the use of any coloring or other deleterious matter whatever, and possess a flavor that has justly made them very popular. In the manufacture of these cigars none but white labor is employed. Mr. Briggs informs us that in manufacturing cigars that white labor produces a better smoking cigar, in the intelligence displayed in the selection and proper blending of the different grades and qualities of tobacco. The Chinaman is but an imitator, while the white laborer exercises a judgment that is of the first importance in the proper selecting and blending of the tobacco to produce the desired flavor. Messrs. Briggs & Co. have been making heavy sales in their specialty cigars, owing to the fact that the public are beginning to realize that they can obtain a cigar in every way superior to the New York cigar for the same price, and that, when they have once tried these cigars, that they produce better satisfaction in flavor than any other cigar of the same price in the market. Having tried these cigars we do not hesitate to pronounce them in every way deserving of the popularity they are assuming in the market; and we are satisfied that the readers of the ARGONAUT will agree with us who have tried these cigars. We do not propose to give to our readers any praise of an article that does not meet with our entire approbation; and we feel fully warranted in saying that the enterprise of Messrs. Briggs & Co. is well deserving of praise from the public. This firm have also every grade of imported cigars and tobacco, so that the taste of the most fastidious may here be satisfied in goods of domestic or foreign manufacture.

The notable art collection of Mr. Vickery, of No. 22 Montgomery Street, has recently been augmented by the addition of a large number of new engravings, reprints from the old masters, etchings, etc., for which his studio has already become widely known to the art-lovers of San Francisco. The approaching Christmas Holidays—the season of friendly offerings—can be commemorated by no more appropriate or acceptable gifts than fine pictures. There is something in them peculiarly suited to express sentiments of love or friendship, while they have an individuality of their own which never permits them to grow old or pall upon the taste. Articles from this collection have the added advantage of being without their duplicates here. A large invoice is expected during the coming week, among them many representations of the modern schools. The excellent article, Frederick Keppel, on "The Golden Age of Printing," from a late number of Harper's Monthly has been reprinted in pamphlet form, and may be obtained from Mr. Vickery. For the accommodation of visitors, the studio will remain open during the evening.

WE ALWAYS SAY to our lady friends go to Sullivan's, 120 Kearny Street, for handsome SUITS or CLOAKS.

Terrace Swimming Baths, Alameda, now open.

The finest French and purest home-made candies found at Vogley's, 915 Market Street, between Fifth and Sixth.

If you want the 'nobbist' suits in town—best material and latest style in cut—why don't you go to Burr & Fink's, corner Montgomery and Post streets, over Hibernia Bank?

The finest candies in the city are to be had at the Clarendon, 213 Kearny Street, of Love & Goldstein. Try them.

Mrs. Parker, of the Ladies' Depository, has opened a new store at 126 Post Street. Dolls dressed in all styles. New Lace Patterns.

Go to the Terrace Swimming Baths, Alameda.

Try E. H. Hubbard's Parisian Cream for the complexion. 923 Market Street.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, CITY
and County of San Francisco—In Probate Court.
In the matter of the Estate of JOHN BLISS, deceased.
Notice for publication of time appointed for proving will, etc.

Pursuant to an order of said Court, made on the 19th day of November, A. D. 1878, notice is hereby given that Monday, the 6th day of December, A. D. 1878, at 11 o'clock A. M. of said day, and the court room of said Court, at the new City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, have been appointed as the time and place for proving the will of said John Bliss, deceased, and for hearing the application of C. H. PHELPS for the issuance to him of Letters of Administration with the will annexed, when and where any person interested may appear and contest the same.
Dated November 19th, 1878.

THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.
[SEAL OF COURT.] By WM. A. STUART, Deputy Clerk.
CHARLES P. ELLIS, Attorney for Petitioner, 66 Nevada Block.

DIAMONDS.

The most attractive assortment of

DIAMONDS, WATCHES, JEWELRY, ETC.,

And Novelties, for the selection of wedding and other presents, at

GEO. C. SHREVE &amp; CO.'S,

110 MONTGOMERY STREET.

THE SPIRIT OF '78.

An Opportunity such as was never before offered to the San Francisco Public.

An Artist of rare ability, long known to the public as being connected with some of our most prominent Photographic Galleries, and latterly of the firm of Messrs. I. W. TABER & T. H. BOYD, noticing the wants of the people for first-class pictures at a reasonable price, has retained the elegant and commodious apartments, where he has every facility for doing work of a superior kind, and proposes to make his prices so moderate that none need have an excuse for having an inferior picture taken, either of themselves or their children. Never before were such full-length Cabinets—interior or rustic—taken for the low figure of five dollars per dozen; the popular Gray Tint Vignette Cabinets at six dollars per dozen; and the truly elegant Cameo Glacé—the favorite of all—usually costing ten and twelve dollars per dozen, at Boyd's will only cost you eight dollars. His card-size Photos, for the Cameo Glacé finish, will be four dollars per dozen, and the Gray Vignettes only three dollars.

NO. 26 MONTGOMERY STREET,

His apartments are all that could be asked for—large, commodious, and first-class in every particular; every convenience, in fact, that tends to enhance the comforts of his patrons. His skylight is the largest in the city, thus giving him a volume of light to be controlled at his will, and so secure an effect in light and shade that can not be obtained with a smaller light. Every improvement of modern times that makes exposures shorter has been secured, so that pictures of children will now be taken so quickly that it is the exception if a superior picture is not obtained.

He also desires to specially call the attention of his old friends and patrons who have visited him at the Yosemite Gallery, that he has all the negatives of the Photographs taken in the Gallery, and can supply copies desired at very short notice and at the reduced prices.

Pay him a visit and judge for yourselves.

YOSEMITE ART GALLERY

No. 26 Montgomery St., near Sutter.

LADIES' SILK SUITS

BLACK AND COLORED.

LARGE ASSORTMENT AND VERY CHEAP AT

SULLIVAN'S,

120 KEARNY STREET.

DECKER BROS PIANOS ARE THE

COMPLICATED WATCHES

CHRONOGRAPH, REPEATING, SPLIT SECONDS, ETC.

AND A LARGE STOCK OF GOLD and Silver Watches, Chains, Diamonds, Jewelry, Silver Ware, and Fancy Goods at

ANDERSON &amp; RANDOLPH'S

CORNER OF

MONTGOMERY AND SUTTER STS., SAN FRANCISCO.

MR. FRAZER,

(Late of New York),

DISTINGUISHED PROFESSOR OF MODERN SOCIETY DANCING.

Private Schooling Exclusively.

ROUND DANCING A SPECIALTY

I WOULD MOST RESPECTFULLY

call the attention of parents, and young ladies and gentlemen of San Francisco, Oakland, and vicinity, to my eight-page circular, containing full information upon the treatment of Round Dancing, etc., and why so MANY FAIL IN THE ART. Read carefully all the circular contains, and I venture to say the advantages offered will please you. I EXACT NO TUITION where I fail in my undertakings. I will occupy the large and spacious rooms over Mr. Gray's Music Store in about ten days. Those wishing hours for instruction must apply early, as my time is fast being engaged. Office hours, 11 A. M. to 2 P. M., at Mr. Gray's.

J. WILLIAM FRAZER.

Circulars at M. Gray's Music Store, 117 Post Street, San Francisco, and W. B. Hardy's, Broadway, Oakland.

CANNEL COAL.

A SUPERIOR QUALITY OF GRATE COAL for sale by

MIDDLETON & FARNSWORTH,

14 Post Street, and 718 Sansome Street.

NEW BOOKS AT ROMAN'S.

My Queen. A novel. By a San Jose lady. $1 50
Iris, or the Romance of an Opal Ring. By Mrs. Dr. Toland. Illustrated, cloth, San Francisco. 8 00
Stories from Virgil. Designs by Phidias. 2 00
Genevieve of Brabant. Ill.; cloth. 5 00
Evelyn's Folly. By Bertha Clay. 1 50
Orators and Oratory. By Matthews. 12mo, cloth. 2 00
Edith Murray. By J. H. Matthews. 11mo, cloth. 1 50
Beatrice Cenci. By Guerrazzi. 12mo, cloth. 1 75
Just How. A Cook Book. By Mrs. Whitney. 16mo, cloth. 1 00
Mrs. Younan's Cook Book. 12mo, cloth. 1 50
Keat's Love Letters. 16mo, cloth. 1 50
For Percival. A novel. Paper. 75
Outwitted at Last. A novel. By S. A. Gardner. 2 50
The First Violin. By Featherhill. 16mo, cloth. 1 00
French Revolution. By Van Laan. 2 vols., cloth. 3 50

JUST RECEIVED,

A large assortment of Christmas Books in all styles of bindings.
Elegant Russia Writing Desks and Photograph Albums, Pocket Books, Satchels, and Inkstands.

OPEN EVENINGS.

A. ROMAN &amp; CO.,

11 Montgomery Street,

Lick House Block,

San Francisco.

For the best New Crop Japan

“ “ English Breakfast

“ “ Formosa Oolong

“ “ Mixed

...GO TO...

LORING'S

922 MARKET STREET,

Manufacture of "THE PRESIDENT COFFEE"—put up in air-tight cans, retaining its purity, freshness and aroma.

APPLICATION TO BECOME SOLE

TRADER. — Notice is hereby given that I, EMMA S. HOWE, wife of Charles W. Howe, of the city and county of San Francisco, State of California, will apply to the County Court of said city and county and State aforesaid, on MONDAY, the 23d day of December, A. D. 1878, the same being a day of the November term, A. D. 1878, of said County Court, for the judgment and decree of said Court, authorizing and permitting me to act as a Sole Trader, and as such to carry on and conduct in my own name, in said city and county and State aforesaid, the business of buying and selling merchandise, buying and selling real and personal property and mining stocks, and to keep boarding and lodging-house, and to loan and borrow money on mortgage or otherwise, and to do and perform all acts connected with or incident to said different branches of business.
EMMA S. HOWE.
San Francisco, Cal., November 18th, A. D. 1878.

BEST KOHLER & CHASE
SAN FRANCISCO
& OAKLAND.

THE OLD LOVE REVIVED.

"MY DEAR BELLE:—I reached Mrs. Thorne's at 5 P. M., and found five wide-awake maidens, in the prettiest possible modern traveling costumes, and five young men who had come by boat and rail. My new address is Derwent Grange, Bellula. Any letter so directed will reach your expectant."

"KATE HAMMOND."

"MY DEAR BELLE:—Last evening I really felt prepared to be brilliant, when Mrs. Thorne, who is a charming hostess, generally without fault, made a fatal remark, just as we stepped from my lovely rose-colored room, and stood looking down into the large, softly lighted hall which opens to a conservatory on one side, and to a drawing-room on the other. 'Now, Kate, I want you to be very charming and fascinating to-night, for particular reasons,' she said. My dear, had she drawn a circle of magic art, and danced round me to enforce silence by all the powers of witchcraft, she could not have done so more effectively than by those simple words, and her evident desire for me to 'shine.' I was paralyzed then, but petrified later, when Mrs. Thorne came leading a man to present, who, I knew by the expression on his face, was the 'reason' for expected charms. But oh, when I heard the 'Allow me to present Mr. Lawrence,' and when I looked up and saw Ralph Lawrence's face—well, after exactly one minute's pause, I raised my eyes again to find him still there. 'Something must be done, and, despite our past enmity, quarrel, and years of separation, we must talk now. But there I stood in my yellow silk, tongue-tied, and, after staying up to the precise second required by etiquette, my gentlemanly Lawrence retired to the genial fascinations of Miss Gray, a blonde, inevitably in blue."

"You never fully understood this Lawrence-Hammond case. First, why we fell in love, secondly, why we fell out. If it puzzles my friends half as much as myself, they have my sympathy. You know the facts of our meeting—father bringing to our house this wonderfully promising young lawyer, working his way from that soil most productive of great men—poverty. At first I pitied him, in view of the hard struggle he was having in life; then I admired his noble patience and splendid intellect; then I liked him as a whole, and finally I loved him entire. I, the proud, cold Kate, worshipped Ralph Lawrence (burn this letter), and he truly loved me. I say it wonderingly, for, although careless of most men's esteem, before him I felt strangely humble, so poor in soul and spirit, that his, with all his strength of mind and heart, should choose me for his dearest one. Why, Belle, even now as I write, feeling his cold eyes on me yet, and hearing his indifferent tones of last night, I thrill at the memory of his love as no man's wealth of devotion can thrill me now. Neither Ralph nor I ever knew how our engagement was broken."

"You remember Maurice Gray? I hate him! He was the root of all these far-reaching branches of estrangement—No! I will not give his weak soul the credit of being the root of anything in my life. He was rich, pleasant, and very devoted—Ralph poor, jealous, and very earnest—I, vain, young, and foolish—what wonder these elements had an explosion? Yours, K. H."

"DEAR BELLE:—This is the most beautiful home I ever saw—may, ever dreamed of. It is of rough gray stone, with many windows and bow-windows, piazzas—great, little, and noddling—tall chimneys, towers, and turrets; and all of this picturesque set down on the greenest lawn, with royal groupings of flowers; this slopes to deep, cool woods, beyond which the lake glistens, and soft-curved mountains rise."

"Now, Belle, I want to ask you for a candid answer. Don't you think it a little strange that Mr. Lawrence should markedly avoid me? Not that I care, Belle, if he dislikes me! But somehow, when he refuses to act in some Shakespearean tableau—Romeo to my Juliet—then takes the trouble to black up for Othello to Miss Gray's Desdemona, I feel very strangely, and am fully persuaded that mortifying the pride is not good for my spirit, however it may sanctify others!"

"Of course, you understand it's only a question of pride on my part; but one night, Belle, pride flew away, and my heart lay 'folded down in purple state' of old-time memories, when Ralph sang a little ballad in his clear, rich tenor, with the well-remembered tender expression on the closing refrain:

'Loyal je serais durant ma vie!'

And my eyes filled with tears as I remembered how he once sung to me alone. But, oh! back, tears—up smiles, as I saw Ralph coming; and as he drew near, with those true words on his lips, I suddenly felt mildly angry at him, myself, every one. I greeted him with, 'Like all men, you sing the truest songs.' He answered, gravely, 'Like all honest men, I try to sing, live, and be the truest possible amid so much that is changing.' Ah, well, it may be so. Good-bye, dear. K. H."

"MY DEAR BELLE:—We went on a picnic to the ruins of a castle, famous in its day, but never so much visited as now, where vines creep over its once hospitable walls, and birds build where once was human life and human gaiety. Among the ruins remains one room intact, but reached only by a trembling old staircase. It is said of this deserted room, that she who is brave enough to step over its threshold will be blessed with a vision of her true lover—her future liege."

"I decided to try the feat, but Ralph openly objected, and came to me pleading. How angry I was that he, treating me with such obvious indifference, should now display to them all how powerful his influence; but I gave my version of his influence, and went, watched by the frightened faces of all, while Ralph stood on the first landing of the stairs—there bending so as to be exactly under the doorway above, then curving out, and back to the door. Why he stood on that particular spot was a wonder and an irritation to me, as I stepped proudly past him with one glance."

"On I went, calling back gayly, 'The vision is beginning to shine through the door!' Now the stairs bent. I felt a little dizzy; Ralph shouted, 'Come back, Kate, for my sake!' That spurred me on. I flung back the dusty door—there was a binding crash—and I lay in Ralph's arms, he once more calling me his love—his own."

"Fright and tumult reigned supreme, until I, finding myself unhurt, arose and quieted the party by laughing bravely, saying: 'No more visions will haunt that room, for I have broken door-sill and charm—the golden entrance to futurity.' Did Ralph know that weak place? Did he catch me in his arms? Was he there, or was it all a vision? Not a doubt. But that evening he wore his arm in a sling, and his face was white with pain and weariness, for, Belle, with miraculous strength he caught me in his fearful fall, and saved my life—my life! What is it to him that he should save? Or was it true he called me Love again? If I thought he did—but why am I writing so wildly? Ralph is kind, and anxious for me as my friend, nothing more; and now I am in my senses; then I was dreaming—vision-seeking. Good-bye. K. H."

"MY DEAR:—I am almost ashamed to tell—am in direct contrition, that the end of my story must be so ordinary, following the old, old way. Dramatic justice demands my future misery; but facts decide otherwise, so listen to my fate. After all the party but myself had gone—at least, I thought so—I turned to see Ralph Lawrence, too, waving farewell, and at his side stood Mrs. Thorne, who had persuaded me to stay, smiling innocently as a babe. Then the whole 'current of my being' was a boiling geyser of indignation at being so trapped, so planned for, by Mrs. Thorne. Would Ralph think I stayed, knowing he was to stay? Should I seem intimidated? Certainly not, if plain words could help it. 'Are you to stay, Mr. Lawrence? You are the last one I should have supposed would linger.'"

"And evidently the last one you desire, judging from your expression, but it is impossible for me to go now," Ralph Lawrence answered so simply that my anger fell a little, and I left him, standing on the sunny piazza, with really an agreeable smile of good morning."

"Then Mrs. Thorne's management, she so prides herself on, was begun. Her first move was, I admit, a very wise one; she carefully told me of Ralph's being unable to travel, because of the strain on his arm, and then she said no more."

"I blamed myself, pitied him, felt penitent, and would atone, if possible, for my thoughtlessness; and by the next morning, when Mrs. Thorne drove off on some errands, and I knew Ralph was lying alone in the library, I ran down stairs, opened the door, so that retreat was impossible, and entered very much as though I was there to confess petty larceny, stammering out: 'Would you like me to read? I thought you might be lonely.' If the table had walked over to Ralph and delivered that little speech, he couldn't have looked more surprised; it wasn't pleasant."

"The silence was so profound, that you might have heard half a pin drop. I broke the stillness with my usual 'tact and tenderness.' 'Don't feel you must accept the offer—I don't want to—I only—'

"Kate, please leave a little of the pleasure that the thought of remembering me gave—yes, indeed, read or sing, play, dance, sit still, if you will, only—but don't think me delirious, and look so frightened. Can you find some book here to please you?"

"With great concentration, I looked for that book, finally choosing Carlyle's 'Chartism' as surely safe ground, giving only abstract truth and calm logic; but there being one little nettle of possible personality I alighted on it by reading the 'happy' chapter, which so grandly shows the ideal living, with no care for easy happiness when life has work, duties, results to accomplish—Ralph interrupted:

"It is fitting that you read me that, Kate; for if ever man needed such thoughts 'tis I, now happiness has left my life; not that I claimed it for my right, but it came so freely and fully, I scarcely grew used to the loss."

"Here Mrs. Thorne entered, looking so pleased over the tableau, that a mild desire rose in me to spoil it, not to be managed for, smiled over; so I arose, saying: 'Carlyle and happiness together are too much for any sick man, so I'll take Carlyle and leave you the happiness of quiet.'"

"You are taking both with you, Miss Hammond," was the response."

"Safe in my own room, the confusion, doubt, of my excited thought that evening might have suffocated me then and there; but a call came to join in a sail on the lake, and drove all thought away but that of enjoyment. I could be only restfully quiet, drifting on the bright water, hearing Ralph's clear voice singing through the stillness of the night:

'Oh, take me to thy heart again,
I never more will grieve thee;
All hope is dead and joy is fled,
If I indeed must leave thee.'

I think I did take him to my heart then."

"The next day my head ached so violently that I lie down I must, and keep still, Mrs. Thorne insisting that my place should be in the library, on the comfortable great sofa. And there Ralph found me at twilight. He drew his chair to the sofa, gently put his hand on my head, and spoke to me tenderly."

"No one can tell why two hot tears rolled down my cheeks, but, Belle, I did feel so tired resting—resisting all the cravings of my heart! He looked into my eyes very steadily for a moment; then—would you be very much shocked?—kissed the tear-drops, before he said:

"I have thought of many ways to try to re-win you, dear, but my love is so great that I have not patience to try a longer road if asking you to be my wife will bring you back to me. Will it, Kate?"

"What I said I don't know, and I don't believe Ralph does; but when Mrs. Thorne came in, an hour later, Ralph held my hand, with the same dear ring on it that pledged us so long ago, and he said:

"Kate is my promised wife, Mrs. Thorne. Can I ever thank you enough for this summer's visit?"—so I must have said 'Yes.'"

"Once before we were engaged and very happy, but now I can only quote Miss Mulock's words: 'The tenderest thing on earth is an old love revived.'"

"K. H."

At a recent court ball one of the fair queens of society, wife of a foreign diplomatist, was the object of Count Bismarck's attentions, and many observed that her beauty had produced a great impression on the famous statesman. The count, with that audacity of conquest which is his especial characteristic, extended his hand to pluck, without leave, a flower from the splendid bouquet which the lady carried. She rapped his knuckles with her fan, saying—'Pardon, Monsieur le Comte, but that flower is not a German State. You must ask for it.'"

Write—"Ah, husband, do you see this beautiful carving? How delicately cut is the pure white stone!" Husband—"Yes, very pretty." Wife—"But, William, you have no taste for art, you don't enjoy these things as I do. Just notice this splendid column of immaculate marble, with the touching question, so beautifully carved, 'Do they miss me at home?' Husband—"Yes, I see; and here is her name on the footstone, 'G. A. B.' Yes, they miss her, if that was her name." And there came silence."

L. T. ZANDER,

No. 424 MONTGOMERY STREET,
between California and Sacramento, San Francisco.

COLLECTOR.

Rents, Bills, and Accounts collected, and prompt returns made.

ZANDER'S PURCHASING AGENCY.

Orders for the purchase and shipment to the interior of goods of every description executed with promptness and care, at a small commission over cost.

GEORGE W. PRESCOTT. IRVING M. SCOTT. H. T. SCOTT.

UNION IRON WORKS

(Founded 1849.) Post Office Box 2128.

COR. FIRST AND MISSION STREETS,
SAN FRANCISCO

MANUFACTURERS OF

Compressed Engines,
Air Compressors,
Rock Drills,
Portable Hoisting Engines,
Marine Stationary and Portable Boilers
Baby Hoist, complete.

CONSTANTLY ON HAND AND FOR SALE,

Direct-acting Pumping and Hoisting Engines,
Upright and Stationary Engines,
Quartz Crushing and Amalgamating Machinery,
Blake's Rock Breakers,
Smelting Furnaces,
Quicksilver Pumps,
Chloridizing Furnaces,
Cornish Pumps,
Steam Pumps.

All manufactured by us of the best materials, design, and workmanship, and furnished at lower rates than by Eastern manufacturers.

PRESCOTT, SCOTT & CO.

O. F. WILLEY &amp; CO.,

IMPORTERS AND MANUFACTURERS OF

FINE CARRIAGES AND WAGONS

No. 427 MONTGOMERY ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

Agents for the sale of Wagons manufactured by

BREWSTER & CO., New York,

W. D. ROGERS, Philadelphia,

C. S. CAFFREY, Camden, N. J.,

WOOD BROTHERS, New York,

H. KILLAM & CO., New Haven,

COOLING BROS., Wilmington

ALSO, AGENTS FOR

HARNESS MANUFACTURED BY WOOD GIBSON,

TOMPKINS & MANDEVILLE, AND

A. H. DUNSCOMBE.

Also, a fine assortment of Robes, Blankets, Nets, Whips, etc.

MILLER &amp; RICHARD,

SOLE MAKERS OF

EXTRA-HARD METAL

SCOTCH TYPE.

SPECIAL AGENTS FOR

THE CAMPBELL, HOE, AND PEERLESS

PRESSES.

No. 529 COMMERCIAL STREET.

And 205 Leidesdorff Street, San Francisco.

ANNUAL MEETING.—MEXICAN

Gold and Silver Mining Company.—The annual meeting of the Mexican Gold and Silver Mining Company will be held on TUESDAY, December 5th, 1878, at one o'clock P. M., at the office of the Company, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, Cal. Transfer books will be closed on Saturday, November 23d, at 12 o'clock P. M.

C. L. MCCOY, Secretary.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

IZETTA GOODHUE, plaintiff, vs. STEPHEN GOODHUE, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to David P. Nelson, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now and heretofore existing between plaintiff and defendant upon the grounds set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which special reference is hereby made, and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded therein.

Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 14th day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

[SEAL.] THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.

By J. H. PICHERS, Deputy Clerk.

WOODS & COFFEY, Attorneys for Plaintiff.

CALIFORNIA FARMERS'

MUTUAL

Fire Insurance Company

[ESTABLISHED IN 1874.]

Paid up Capital .....$200,000
Assets exceed..... 326,000

PRINCIPAL OFFICE 209 SANSOME ST.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.,

THOS. FLINT, President. J. W. FOARD, Manager.

FRED. K. RULE.....Secretary.

J. G. GARDNER.....General Agent.

COMMERCIAL

INSURANCE COMPANY OF CALA,

FIRE AND MARINE.

Principal office, 405 California Street, San Francisco.

JOHN H. WISE, President.

CHAS. A. LATON, Secretary.

THE STATE INVESTMENT

—AND—

INSURANCE COMPANY, FIRE AND MARINE

CASH ASSETS.....$450,000

Principal Office, 218 and 220 Sansome Street, San Francisco

—OFFICERS:—

A. J. BRYANT, President,

RICHARD IVERS, Vice-President,

CHAS. H. CUSHING, Secretary,

H. H. WATSON, Marine Surveve

GOULD &amp; CURRY SILVER MINING

Company.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 18th day of November, 1878, an assessment (No. 34) of one dollar and fifty cents ($1.50) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately, in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 66, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 23d day of December, 1878, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on TUESDAY, the fourteenth day of January, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors.

ALFRED K. DURBROW, Secretary.

Office—Room 66, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

OPHIR SILVER MINING COMPAny.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 5th day of November, 1878, an assessment (No. 34) of one dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Cosmopolitan Hotel Building, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 10th day of December, 1878, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on MONDAY, the 30th day of December, 1878, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors.

C. L. MCCOY, Secretary.

Office—Cosmopolitan Hotel Building, 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

SIERRA NEVADA SILVER MINING

Company.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Directors, held on the twenty-second day of October, 1878, an assessment (No. 56) of three dollars ($3) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 47, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the twenty-seventh day of November, 1878, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on WEDNESDAY, the eighteenth day of December, 1878, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

Office—Room 47, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

FRANCES A. NELSON, plaintiff, vs. DAVID P. NELSON, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to David P. Nelson, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony heretofore and now existing between the plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is hereby expressly made, and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 13th day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

[SEAL.] THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.

By W. STEVENSON, Deputy Clerk.

GEORGE L. WOODS and JOHN J. COFFEY, Attorneys for Plaintiff.

CHICKERING

PIANO WAREROOMS,

31 POST ST., Mechanics' Institute Building.

ELEGANT PIANOS.

L. K. HAMMER,

Sole Agent for Pacific Coast.

Owners of Chickering Pianos are specially requested to leave orders for tuning at warerooms, 31 Post Street.

MUSIC

KNABE PIANOS,
IRVING PIANOS, ROGERS' UPRIGHT PIANOS,
Prince Organs, Waters' Organs, Sheet Music.
BANCROFT, KNIGHT & Co.,
733 MARKET STREET.

PIANOS

SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED PIANOS.

Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.

WOODWORTH, SCHELL & Co.
12 Post Street San Francisco.

REDINGTON'S

FLAVORING EXTRACTS

ARE THE PERFECTLY PURE
and highly concentrated Extracts of

FRESH FRUITS

Prepared with great care. They are put up in superior style, in a bottle holding twice as much as ordinary brands of Extracts.

Comparing quality and contents, none other are nearly so cheap. Wherever tested on THEIR MERITS, they have been adopted in preference to all others, and now are the

STANDARD FLAVORING EXTRACTS

Of the Pacific coast. Dealers will find them to give better satisfaction to the consumers than any other kind and are respectfully requested to give them a trial.

REDINGTON & CO.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

RUPTURE.

BUY NO TRUSS

Until you see what has been accomplished by DR. PIERCE'S late invention.

Call, or send for New Illustrated Book. Prices reduced.

MAGNETIC ELASTIC TRUSS
CO., 609 Sacramento Street, San Francisco.

PALACE HOTEL RESTAURANT,

FIRST CLASS IN ALL RESPECTS.

QUIET AND DESIRABLE PLACE

for Ladies, Gentlemen, and Families. 237 Entrance south side of Court. A. D. SHARON.

SURE

REMEDY FOR BALONESS.

Prescription Free to any person who will agree to pay $1, when a new growth of Hair, Whiskers or Mustaches is actually produced. Sanderson & Co., 2 Clinton Place, New York.

GENUINE SALE.
NICOLL, THE TAILOR

HAVING TO MAKE ROOM FOR

the daily arrival of new styles of French, English, and Domestic Goods from his New York and London houses, will display a very large quantity of uncalled-for garments at greatly reduced prices, as follows:

Pants.....	from $3 00
Suits.....	" 12 00
Overcoats.....	" 15 00
Vests.....	" 2 00
Coats.....	" 7 00

Gentlemen, before ordering anywhere, will do well to call and inspect our daily arrival of French, English, Scotch, and Domestic Goods.
No. 505 MONTGOMERY STREET.

PACIFIC BUSINESS COLLEGE,
320 POST STREET,
San Francisco.

DECORATION OF THE LEGION OF HONOR.

AWARD OF THE GOLD MEDAL.

FIVE DIPLOMAS OF MERIT!

THE PARIS EXPOSITION HAS AWARDED THE DECORATION OF the LEGION OF HONOR to Mr. HENRY BREWSTER, senior member of the firm of

BREWSTER & CO.

(OF BROOME STREET,)

CARRIAGE BUILDERS,

Of the city of New York. Also, the Gold Medal, and five Diplomas of Merit to the several foremen of departments, for an exhibition of Thirteen Carriages, a Park Drag, Pleasure Vehicles, and a Racing Sulky, at the late Exposition, as a recognition of the superior excellence of the work of the firm.

W. J. DONLEY, the representative, is now in San Francisco, and may be found at O. F. Willey & Co.'s, or at the Baldwin.

Messrs. O. F. WILLEY & CO., 427 Montgomery St., are Sole Agents in California.

BREWSTER & CO. (OF BROOME STREET,)

Broadway, 47th and 48th Streets, New York City.

MADAME SKIDMORE

FINE MILLINERY.

THE LATEST PARISIAN STYLES CONSTANTLY RECEIVED.

1114 Market St., between Mason and Taylor, under Graham House.

I. W. TABER

The leading Photographer of this city, has just occupied his new and handsome parlors over the HIBERNIA BANK, CORNER MARKET AND MONTGOMERY STREETS. Entrance on Montgomery Street. Elevator connected with building.

Easy of access. The handsomest Photograph Rooms in the city. Give him a call.

Mr. GEORGE B. RIEMAN, for many years the leading man at Bradley & Rulofson's, is now connected with this establishment, and will personally superintend the business.

THE CAL. FURNITURE M'FG CO.

HAVE FIVE TIMES AS MUCH

FURNITURE

As any other house on this Coast, which has been purchased so low that we CAN and WILL sell at such prices that the poor can gratify their WISHES and the rich their TASTE. At the old stand,

NOS. 224 AND 226 BUSH STREET, S. F.

CALIFORNIA SPOOL SILK.

The Extra 100 Yards. Quarter Ounce. Ounce Spools. Embroidery Silks.

THE BEST IN USE.

Manufactured in San Francisco, supporting eighty-five white women and girls. Sold by all first-class dealers.

BUY YOUR SHIRTS AT

MORRIS, SCHWAB & CO.
FINE-ART DEALERS.

FREE ART GALLERY.

A complete assortment of ARTISTS' MATERIAL, GOLD FRAMES, etc.

19 AND 21 POST STREET.

WAREROOMS, N. W. CORNER
KEARNY AND SUTTER STREETS.

SHERMAN, HYDE & CO.

SHEET MUSIC,
MUSIC BOOKS,
MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

SEWING MACHINES.

GROVER & BAKER SEWING AND
Embroidering SILKS, Pure Dye, Full Weight. To the trade and at retail.

J. W. EVANS, 29 Post Street.

MARBLEIZED IRON MANTELS.

IN ELEGANCE OF DESIGN, QUALITY of finish, and durability of polish, they are every way superior to slate or marble. In point of economy, also, they cost very much less, are stronger, and certainly far more durable than either.

ALL SIZES AND STYLES

ENAMELED GRATES.

FRENCH COOKING

RANGES

All sizes, suitable for Hotels, Restaurants, Families, and Boarding-Houses.

W. W. MONTAGUE & CO.

NOS. 110, 112, 114, 118, &amp; 120 BATTERY ST.

PALMER BROS.

726 TO 734 MARKET ST.,

Have a full assortment of

LADIES' AND GENTS' FURNISH-

ing Goods, Toilet Articles, Corsets, Embroideries, French and Valenciennes Laces, a fine assortment of Veilings and Ruchings, and the largest stock of

MILLINERY GOODS,

And the best stock of

BOYS' CLOTHING AND HATS &amp; CAPS

In the city.

JOE POHEIM

The Tailor,

203 Montgomery St. and 103 Third Street, under the Russ House, near Bush Street, has just received a large assortment of the latest style goods.

Suits to order from.....$20
Pants to order from..... 5
Overcoats to order from.....15

The leading question is where the best goods can be found at the lowest prices. The answer is at

JOE POHEIM,

203 Montgomery St. and 103 Third St.

Samples and Rules for Self-Measurement sent free to any address. Fit guaranteed.

BEAMISH'S

The Argonaut.

VOL. III. NO. 21.

SAN FRANCISCO, NOVEMBER 30, 1878.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

OLLA-PODRIDA.

Money! If there is any thing in this world that has met with long, persistent, cruel misrepresentation, it is this thing used as a measure of values and known as a circulating medium to regulate the exchange of commodities, commonly called "money;" in its broader sense, embracing everything of value, and called "wealth." Regarding, as we do, money as the one most desirable thing in this world; as of more importance than health, fame, education, social station, reputation, and all the other gifts besides, we have been deeply pained to hear it so cruelly misrepresented and persistently and hypocritically abused. We say hypocritically, because all the philosophers and savants of the olden time who have endeavored to depreciate its worth, and all the preachers and poets, orators and demagogues of these later days who decry it, have spent their lives and periled their souls in attempting its acquisition. The godly man who preaches from the text, "Lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where moth and rust doth not corrupt nor thieves break through and steal," gets paid for his homily; and if he did not get his monthly or semi-annual "scrip," would strike on his congregation, and, in answer to his own prayers, accept a call at a salary where the figure was higher and the collection sure. The poet who versifies his contempt for coin is thinking how much the publisher will pay him for his poetical disdain of the only thing he writes for. Solomon foolishly exalted his wisdom above his shekels, and handed himself down to an immortality of ridicule, when he declared that money was the root of all evil. The very reverse is true: money is the source of all good. Who would not rather be out of health than out of money? To be sick at home, coddled by your wife, attended by the best physicians that money will hire, with every comfort and luxury that money will buy, anxiously inquired for by solicitous relatives who hope to inherit your estate; a grand funeral, with millionaires for pall bearers; a funeral sermon that magnifies your good qualities and opens wide for you the pearly gates of the New Jerusalem; and a monument builded of bronze, or marble, or granite, to commemorate your many virtues, and to hand down your honored name to posterity—is not this better than to live on to old age a healthy, starving, ragged, foot-sore, and weary tramp? What is the use of good digestion, if you have scant and poor food or none at all? What's the good of being healthy, if you are weary from daily toil, or cold from destitution? Who would exchange money for the chance of being famous? or who, being famous and poor, would not exchange his reputation for coin? Or who is there, in ancient history or in our present time, that, searching for this world's honors, has not had his eye on the main chance and looked out to feather his nest for old age?

We accept the history of Diogenes, the early Christian fathers, monks, and hermits, as somewhat apocryphal, and prefer to believe that the ancients were not unlike the moderns, and there is not a grumbling Diogenes of our acquaintance who would not exchange his tub for a palace on Nob Hill, nor any of our modern priests, padres, monks, or hermits who would do much of the sack-cloth and starvation business as the order is represented to have done in the days gone by. As for education, who would not rather be rich than learned? There may be some scholars, thinkers, and writers, some book-worms, students, and philosophers, who would not come out of their libraries, shut up their books, and throw down their pens under the temptation of all the pleasures that wealth affords; we say there may be, but they are not at the University at Berkeley; they are not teaching nor writing for newspapers in San Francisco. Every lawyer at our bar, every doctor who gives a pill, every quill-driver, each of us, everybody, is working for money. Money gives social station, and without money no one can maintain any social status in any good society in any civilized land. Society demands good clothes, a clean shirt, gloves, and polished boots. It is even more exacting: it demands a claw-hammer coat, white necktie, clothes of fashionable cut, and imperatively requires that you shall rendezvous at the place of social entertainment in a carriage. You shall entertain in return for being entertained; you shall dine and wine the dinner-givers. We know there are traditional good societies where only blood and breeding tell. It is so in the Quartier St. Germain in Paris, and there dukes keep boarders for hire. It is so among the nobility in England, the heirs of a long line of landed ancestors; but they never refuse a matrimonial alliance with the scion of a banker or the heir of a fat brewer. Hannah Rothschild marries an English lord, and her sister is about to ally herself to a French duke of noble blood. On Beacon Hill, Boston, the descendants of the old pirates of the Spanish Main, of slave-dealers, and codfishers, are respectable only as long as the money lasts. The descendants of the first families of Virginia and the Huguenots of South Carolina were respectable as long as the niggers lasted. The aristocracy of those patrooms who owned vegetable gardens on Manhattan Island dies out when the money gives out. And, as for San Francisco, there has never been but one kind of good society here, and that is the circle that is on top when stocks are up.

There is another curious thing regarding money; those who have it and those who have it not affect to despise it and to think it of but little consequence; they speak lightly of it, and in their expressed opinions concerning it place it last of all the virtues they do not possess. The very rich men delight to say to their poor friends that wealth is a great burden; it entails duties and responsibilities that are more than commensurate with the pleasures it confers; that all they can get from their great wealth is clothing, board, and bed; that they are slaves to their possessions; that true comfort lies in the enjoyment of moderate means, and that if they could consult their own wishes they would retire to their places at Menlo and enjoy the delights of a quiet and easy life. Of course they do not mean it, because we rarely hear that a railroad, bonanza, merchant, or money king ever abdicates his throne or passes his crown to the heir apparent so long as life and health and reason last. But the most comical thing of all is when we poor folk get together and philosophize upon the vanity of wealth and the vexations of its possession; we would not swap places with these ignoble money grubs; we would not exchange our nobler faculties, our love of books and travel, our ease and independence, our sense of manly virtues, for their poor, groveling love of pelf. We affect to despise and pity rich men, in fact to bewail the miserable fate that chains them down to the gathering and holding of money, while we nobler souls are airily poised on freer pinions and sublimely floating above them in a higher and purer atmosphere. And yet we are all the time eating our lives with jealousy, and biting our tongues in vexation at our infernal poverty.

We poor people take great delight in finding fault with the rich, that they are not generous, that they do not endow more charities at their death, or begin the building of their monuments when alive by some great, noble deed. We take pleasure in thinking what superior rich people we would be. How charitable, how generous, how comprehensive would be our ideas of the responsibility that attaches itself to wealth. We are quite sure that we do not respect a man simply because he is rich, but it is marvelous what hidden excellencies we discover in him when we ascertain that he is. It is surprising that we should keep up all these affectations when the only business of all the people in all the world is to make money. San Francisco is our "all the world," and we judge other people's worlds by ours. There is not a man or woman in this city that does not desire more money. No one has enough—no one has yet acquired all that he desires. All are toiling for coin. The priest, preacher, and rabbi wrestle in prayer at the altar for coin. The judge, the lawyer, the politician, the orator, are learned, zealous, and eloquent for coin. For coin the artist paints. Professor Knowlton teaches for coin. Money inspires the poet, the actor, the merchant, the mechanic. All, all are toiling for the only one thing needful. Kearney agitates for coin. Wellock works for fifteen dollars a week. The price of the Bulletin is twenty-five cents; Call and Chronicle, only fifteen cents, delivered by carriers. The Alta is on it, and Colonel Jackson, of the Workingman's organ, accepts advertisements at reduced rates as a partial remuneration for his earnest labors for the public welfare.

That all men are mercenary we lay down as a rule—an almost universal rule; we know of but one exception in all our broad circle of acquaintance. We know of but one enterprise that we can conscientiously assert was undertaken, and is now being carried on, with an unselfish purpose to promote the public good. And even the ARGONAUT—in deference to an established custom among journals—allows its carriers to receive thirty-five cents a month for its delivery; and in order to encourage our boys to habits of business thrift, permits them to receive ten cents for a single copy.

The conflict of the stock gamblers is over. It was a hot encounter all along the Comstock line. Judea and Ireland met in financial battle; the troops were massed at the north end, and there the strife raged fiercest, there the profoundest strategy was exercised, there the blows fell thickest and heaviest. The smoke has lifted, the dead and wounded have been carried to the rear, and all Jerusalem mourns. The Egyptians have spoiled the Israelites of raiment and jewels, of stock and shekels, and thus history reverses and reproduces itself. Why stocks went up or why they went down, who put them up or who put them down, whether they will go up again or whether they will not, are conundrums that are now engaging stock operators. Whether they do go up, or stay where they are, or go down, seems to us a matter of very little importance. Now that the fight is over, we regard it as of no more consequence than the siege of Jerusalem under Titus. We were in neither fight, and to ourselves and others who kept out, either from principle or cowardice or want of coin, there was no danger of being hurt. Very few outsiders were interested in this last deal. It was a duel between two gambling stock circles; a challenge boldly flung by the Anglo-Californian Bank, Glazier & Co., certain wealthy Israelites, and their allies, Skae, Morrow, Head, and others, to the bonanza people. Ireland took up the glove, and the strife was an angry and bloody one. It was not intended to be an idle pageant on cloth of gold, but a battle between the money giants. The financial walls of Jerusalem were breached by the heavy battering rams of the Nevada Bank. Whether Johnny Skae is taken prisoner of war and held as a hostage for the good behavior of his allies, or whether he has gone over to the enemy bag and baggage, we do not know. We know there are weeping and wailing all the way down California Street. There is gnashing of teeth in Leidesdorff Alley and its adjacent cellars. But not one broker has failed, and no money has been lost. A little coin—not much—has changed hands; imaginative paper fortunes have not been realized. A man who sits down with a hundred dollars at a faro bank, has good luck, plays red chips, wins ten thousand dollars, does not draw out, loses it again, and goes away in the morning full of champagne and without a cent, has lost a hundred dollars and not ten thousand. There is apt to be more cry than wool when this devil of the stock exchange shears the old gambling ewes and wethers that seek to play themselves off for innocent lambs as soon as they are fleeced. This mock sympathy, under cover of which the Chronicle personally abuses Mr. Flood for results which no one man can control, finds no response from intelligent thinking men.

The present Senate of the United States has 39 Republicans, 36 Democrats, and 1 Independent Democrat. After the 4th of March, 1879, it will have 33 Republicans, 42 Democrats, and 1 Independent Democrat. The present House of Representatives has 137 Republicans, 156 Democrats. After the 4th of March, 1879, it will have 130 Republicans, 148 Democrats, 15 Greenbackers. This result proves that the Republicans, instead of gaining, have lost the Upper House, and have not held their own in the Lower. While the Democrats have gained States in the South, they have lost Connecticut and New Jersey, with Representatives from New York, but in each section this was owing more to local causes than to any national issues at stake. Roscoe Conkling will succeed himself in the Senate, and this places him, where he has already been, in the front rank of Republican candidates for the Presidency; whereas the success of Conkling takes from Samuel J. Tilden the hope, if he had any left, of being the chosen leader of the Democracy. It also turns a large trump-card against General Grant, whom the newspapers have been writing up most assiduously. It has killed off Blaine of Maine, damaged Thurman of Ohio, but helped Hendricks of Indiana and Bayard of Delaware. Let us examine further: The crystallized South gives 138 electoral votes; the North, 106; leaving the doubtful States of California 6 votes, Connecticut 6, Ohio 22, Pennsylvania 29, New York 35, New Jersey 9, and Oregon 3 votes. With the Southern vote, only 47 votes more are required to elect the President. Where, then, is there security for the Republicans, provided the Greenbackers and Workingmen unite or make terms with the Democrats? Suppose the South nominate some Greenbacker, upon whom they could all agree, from Pennsylvania with 29 votes, and they secure Indiana's 15 votes, with Oregon's 3 votes; this would elect the President. Butler will not be a candidate for the Presidency, but he has a strong following in the Bay State, and the idea of becoming "the power behind the throne" would be a temptation for him to consolidate the Democratic and Labor elements; and, with a harmonious joint ticket, even in Massachusetts the Republicans will find it no easy task to save that State. But between this and the Presidential election there is time enough for things to change; and what we want to observe is the fact that neither of the parties has such an assurance of success that it can afford to spare any exertion. Assume that the Democracy misuse their power during the coming Congress, where will the Democratic party end? This cry of a solid North and South is losing its significance, for the people know it only proves a union of the honest and responsible elements of society banded against dishonest government. There is no honest Republicanism in the South (they tried it until they bankrupted every State where Republicanism prevailed), or it would certainly have an effective strength to-day. Every one knows that in the city of New York there was no honest Democracy at the last election, or the Republicans could not have carried that State. The union of the non-partisans even, in California, is proof positive that men will abandon old parties to accomplish results. If they have done so, why will they not do so again? When they do so again, our country will have arrived at that political millennium when intelligence and honesty, holding the balance of power, will compel parties to the performance of their duties. The great, intelligent, independent middle class of society is beginning to make itself felt in local, State, and national politics.

The Call, in estimating the chances of Democratic or Republican success in the coming gubernatorial election, says, and properly, that the party which does the most in checking Chinese immigration will be the one which will control the State at the next election. This we think is true, and we commend the suggestion to both parties in Congress. This is California's opportunity to secure intelligent legislation upon the Chinese question. That Chinese immigration must be restricted—kept within reasonable bounds—is the opinion of all intelligent classes. That the "Chinese must go" is the slogan of demagoguery and ignorance.

M. M. Estee has assured us that he is not a candidate for Governor; he has also made the same declaration to the Constitutional Convention of which he is a member. This relieves the press from the responsibility of telling whether he lies about him in that connection; we believe freely.

THE COOK AT EURISCO SAW-MILL.

Away up among the Sierra Nevada Mountains, about five miles from the town of T—, there stood, in the spring of '71, a large saw-mill owned by the Carlyle Brothers. They had agreed to furnish a large amount of timber to a certain company who were to build an immense dam during the summer, and the mill was got in running order as soon as possible. The mill was five miles from any habitation, and stood in a lovely glen, with huge mountains rising on three sides of it: a lonely place it must be admitted, but soon to be made lively by the buzzing of saws, shouting of teamsters, and shrieking of the whistle.

The mill with its surrounding buildings formed quite a little village. There was the large barn, with its corral for the tired oxen to repose in on Sundays; two or three cabins scattered around, for the accommodation of the men, and the dwelling-house, which stood near the mill, and consisted chiefly of a large dining-room, where the hungry boys went to rush in to their meals immediately after the whistle blew. But this spring, just before the opening of our story, George Carlyle, the elder brother, had a wing containing parlor and bed-room, built on, and had moved his wife out there.

She was a delicate little woman, who thought the change would do her good. The brothers also determined that they would, if possible, get a white woman to do the cooking for the mill crew, as they had borne the infliction of Chinese cookery long enough. But where to get one was the question. A woman who would go to that lonely place and cook for ten or fifteen men was not to be easily found. However, the younger brother, Dan, who was the head sawyer, was obliged to go down to Sacramento to get some new machinery, and he volunteered to find one.

He reached Sacramento, ordered his machinery, and, the day before he started back, set out to find a cook. Passing the store of an old acquaintance on J. Street, he entered, thinking that perhaps his friend could aid him in the search.

A lady stood by the counter dressed in deep mourning. Her veil was down and he was unable to see her face. He greeted his friend warmly, and then said:

"Mr. Bronson, I am in trouble, and I want you to help me out of it if you can. You see the boys have got tired of Chinese cooking up at the mill; and, as my brother has built on an addition to the house, and moved his wife out there for the benefit of her health, we thought we would try and get a woman to do the cooking this summer. I have rashly agreed to find one, and am perfectly at a loss where to look. Can you tell me where I would be likely to succeed?"

The lady standing by the counter threw up her veil and turned her face toward the speaker. It was the face of a woman of perhaps twenty-two, a very beautiful face, in spite of the shadow of sorrow in the brown eyes.

"I beg your pardon," she said, while a flush rose to her cheek, "how far is it to the mill of which you speak?"

"Five miles from T—," he responded.

"How many men to cook for?" she asked.

"From ten to fifteen," was the reply.

"My father owned a saw-mill once, and I cooked for the men," she said. "I think I could satisfy you if you will let me try. I assure you I am quite a good cook. Will you take me?"

Dan tried to hide his surprise. "Yes," he said, "when can you come?"

"When the mill starts. When will that be?"

"A week from Monday."

"I will be in T— on Saturday," she said.

"Very well," said he: "I shall meet you there and convey you and your baggage to the mill. What name shall I inquire for?"

"Mrs. Winchester," she replied, and passed quickly out of the store.

Mr. Bronson laughed. "Well, Dan, you don't seem to need a great deal of help from me in this matter."

"Who is she, anyway?" asked Dan.

"She is a widow who has been in here twice before, looking for work; but I should certainly have hesitated before recommending a young and lovely woman like her to you, to go up there and cook for a saw-mill crew. You must take good care of her."

"I'll try to," laughed Dan, and so the subject was dropped.

When he reached the mill the first thing his sister-in-law asked him was if he had got a cook. He said yes, and told her of his success.

On Saturday he took the light express wagon and drove into town. He arrived there just as the stage drove up. A lady in deep mourning and closely veiled alighted. Dan knew her and approached.

"This is Mrs. Winchester, I believe."

"Yes."

"Which is your trunk?"

When they reached their destination, Mrs. Carlyle came out to welcome the new "cook," and show her to her room. She saw at once that she was a lady, and wondered not a little at her accepting such a situation when she was so manifestly well fitted to fill a much higher one. But she was still more surprised to see how naturally she took hold of things in the big kitchen, and went to cooking as if she had been used to it all her life; and Saturday evening found such a supper served up as only a thoroughly good cook can serve.

On Sunday the rest of the mill boys arrived with their blankets and baggage, prepared for their summer's campaign. The cook was, of course, talked about a great deal, and many were the curious and admiring glances at her as she quietly waited on the table; but they were gently rebuffed in their manner toward her, and loud in their praises of her as a cook among themselves.

On Monday morning the whistle blew at six o'clock, and immediately after breakfast there was a loud noise of escaping steam to be heard, and the white clouds wreathed round the roof of the mill. A log was rolled on the "carriage," and "dogged" steam was let on. Dan grasped the lever; the saws buzzed; the carriage started forward, and, in a few moments more, the first cut of the season had been made. And now, while he stands with his hand on the lever, I will describe the head sawyer and part owner of this establishment. He is a man of about thirty, tall, and well formed, with curling hair, and handsome black eyes. He wears a mustache and beard, and when he smiles shows a set of strong, white, even teeth, that evidently do not belong to a tobacco chewer. He is a man of education, with a great deal of mechanical genius. His brother, some ten years his senior, keeps the books and is general overseer in the lumber yard.

The crew, a motley assortment of men, mostly young, were pleasant, rollicking fellows; hard workers, all of them. Their favorite topic of conversation was the "cook." What a splendid cook she was, and how handsome; but how very quiet. None of the boys except Dan had as yet spoken a word to her, except to say good morning, and to ask for more tea or coffee at the table. That there was something mysterious about her was evident. In the first place it was a strange thing for a beautiful, lady-like woman like her to come up among the mountains to cook for a saw-mill crew, for Dan had told them that she was from Sacramento. And again, on the third evening of her arrival, after her work was finished and she had retired to her room, as Dan and Archie Carrington, the engineer, were coming up the track into the mill, they heard the faint, sweet tones of a violin coming from the direction of the house. They crept softly around and stationed themselves in the shade of a large madroño tree that grew close to the house. They saw her seated by her window in the moonlight, playing softly on a small violin. She was evidently a perfect mistress of the instrument. They listened enchanted until she ceased playing and then went carefully away. As they passed round the house they saw Mr. and Mrs. Carlyle seated by an open window. They had also been listening to the music.

Dan went over to his room in the loft of the mill, and lay awake a long time wondering what kind of a fairy he had picked up down in the city, and Archie went down to the cabin and electrified the boys by telling them that "the cook could play the fiddle." The news so excited the boys that the entire brigade arose from their beds and stole cautiously out to the shade of the friendly madroño, but the cook had disappeared, and no sound came from within, so they were obliged to crawl back disappointed to their bunks; but the next night, and many a night after, saw silent listeners beneath the tree.

Mrs. Carlyle, who was a pleasant, sociable little woman, was anxious to know something more of Dora Winchester other than that she was a widow, handsome, a good cook, and played the violin; so she asked her one day to tell her something about herself and her past life, and elicited the facts that her mother had died when she was born; that her father and an old Spanish nurse brought her up until she was old enough to be sent to school; that her father taught her to play the violin; that her nurse had taught her to cook, but had died when she, Dora, was sixteen; that about a year later her father had built a saw-mill near N—, and she, much against her wishes, had cooked for the men; that she had done so for more than a year when the mill was accidentally burned, uninsured, and the loss seemed more than her father could bear and he died soon after; that she went to live with an aunt of hers (her only living relation) who lived in the next county—had studied and obtained a certificate, and taught school for one term. While teaching she had met her husband; he was the owner of a quartz mill in the same town. They were married when her school closed. She had lost him a short time ago, and being once more obliged to support herself was looking for employment when she met Mr. Carlyle at Sacramento.

Mrs. Carlyle wanted very much to ask how it was that the widow of the owner of a quartz mill was obliged to work for a living, but as Mrs. Winchester evinced great reluctance about speaking of her affairs she forbore; but having lost two children herself, she could not resist asking Mrs. Winchester whether she had been similarly afflicted.

Yes, she had lost a little girl, she said, and such an expression of anguish came over her face that Mrs. Carlyle ceased her inquiries and never again had courage to renew them.

Just back of the mill, a little to the left, was a deep, cool cañon that extended back into the mountains, and here in the afternoons, for the short hour of rest she had between dinner and supper, Mrs. Winchester would go, and return with her hands filled with strange wild flowers, great green maple leaves, and long wreaths of honey-suckle, and once in one of her rambles she found a little brown bird with a broken wing. She took it tenderly in her hands and brought it to the mill. As she passed by, Archie, who was throwing down wood for his engine, from the slab-pile, asked her what she had found. She showed it to him, and he asked her eagerly if she wanted a cage for it. She said she would like one; and he said he would make her one that evening. She thanked him and passed on.

After supper that evening he went to the kitchen door, and asked her how large she wanted the cage. She told him, but begged him not to go to any trouble, as almost anything would do to hold the birdie in until it got well. Archie went over to the mill, whither he was immediately followed by all the "boys," who were very curious to know what business Archie could possibly have with the cook. When he told them he had so many offers of assistance that in an incredibly short space of time the cage was completed. Archie took it over to her, and was rewarded with a bright smile and a gratified "Oh, thank you! Why, how quick you have been!"

"The boys helped me," he said, "or I couldn't have done it quite so soon."

"Tell them I am ever so much obliged," she said, and Archie went back to the waiting crowd and described the important interview minutely.

As the long summer evenings came on Mrs. Carlyle would beg Mrs. Winchester, after she had finished her work, to come and sit on the porch with her, and Dora, who liked to oblige the kind little woman, would comply with her request. There they were frequently joined by Mr. Carlyle and Dan, and the conversation would become general. These were precious hours for Dan, for to tell the truth, this old bachelor of thirty, who had resisted the fascinations of many a fair one, and thought himself proof against female charms, had discovered that there was a weak spot in his armor, and that Mrs. Winchester had unknowingly discovered it. And so the long days of summer crept by, and September came, with its yellowing leaves.

One lovely afternoon, about the middle of September, as Dora came down from the cañon with her arms filled with beautiful crimson and gold leaves and long, green ferns, she found that the mill had stopped. Wondering at the cause she reached the house, and met Dan coming down the steps. She inquired the cause of the stoppage, and he told her that Archie had caught his hand in the machinery and crushed it quite badly; that his brother had taken him to town to the doctor, and that he would try while there to get another engineer.

She was sorry for Archie, for he was a bright, pleasant fellow, always full of fun. She expressed pity for his misfortune and passed into her room, which she decorated with the leaves and ferns she had brought from the woods. She then went to prepare supper. An hour or two later Mr. Carlyle drove up with a stranger on the seat beside him. She was setting the table. Dan came on to the porch.

"Here is George with our new engineer," he said.

Dora turned, with a plate in her hand, and glanced out of the window. The plate fell to the floor with a crash.

Dan looked in and laughed. "Accidents will happen," he said.

She made no reply, but picked up the pieces and went quickly into her room. Her face was deathly pale, and her eyes had a tearful look in their brown depths.

"O my God, pity me!" she moaned, sinking into a chair, and rocking herself back and forth. After a little she went and resumed her work, and only the pallor of her face betrayed her recent emotion.

The new engineer came up the steps. He glanced into the kitchen and saw her there. A deep flush overspread his handsome face. He was a man of medium height, but strongly built, with fair wavy hair and a blonde moustache. His square chin deeply cleft, and the steely glint in his blue eyes, showed him to be a man of indomitable will. He passed into the dining-room with the rest of the men. Dora waited quietly on the table, but her hand shook visibly as she handed him a cup of tea. He glanced up at her, but she averted her head and refused to meet his eye.

After supper Dan lingered a moment in the dining-room. "What do you think of our new engineer's looks?" he said. "Why, how pale you look," he continued, without giving her a chance to reply. "You are working too hard, I fear."

"Oh, no," she said, hastily; "it is only the warm weather, and I walked rather too far this afternoon. Your engineer is a fine-looking man, I think. Where is he from?"

"George found him at T—. I don't know where he is from. He gave his name as Fairchild, I believe—Norman Fairchild."

Dora did not sit on the porch with Mrs. Carlyle that evening, but went to her room, and Dan was disappointed. He stole round to the madroño to listen for some music, but all was silent within. He waited an hour or so, hoping she would play a little, and then went to his room. If he could have glanced into the "cook's" room he would have seen her kneeling by her bed, clasping in her hands a tiny curl of golden hair, and weeping convulsively.

Autumn was dying slowly. The days passed much as usual at the mill, except that the "cook" got paler and paler, and her eyes grew larger and darker every day. The men all noticed it, and attributed it to over-work. Well, the season would soon be over, and then she could rest.

The new engineer understood his business thoroughly. He was a splendid worker; he not only attended to his engine but frequently helped the "off-bearer" take away the lumber from the saws. He had not as yet spoken to the cook; in fact, he seemed rather to avoid a meeting with her, but he inquired all about her from the men, who cheerfully gave him all the information they possessed.

One evening as she stood alone on the porch—Mrs. Carlyle having gone over to the mill with her husband—Dan came up the steps and joined her. She turned toward him with such a wan white face that he was fairly frightened.

"You are ill," he said, anxiously. "I am sure you work too hard, cooking for us thankless savages. Don't you think you had better give it up?"

She looked wearily away over the dark mountain to where the moon was just rising, and said she had been thinking of leaving for some time, but thought she would stay until the season was over as it was such a short time. Two weeks would finish her contract, and then they would shut down.

"And then where will you go?" he asked, eagerly.

"I don't know," she said, slowly. "I have not decided yet."

He hesitated a moment, and then said: "Mrs. Winchester—Dora—I have been wanting to ask you something for some time; may I ask you now?"

She turned her frightened brown eyes upon him and read at a glance what it was he would ask her. "Wait a moment," she said, "I must tell you something first. You believe me to be a widow?"

"Yes," he said, his face paling in the moonlight.

"I am not," she continued, quickly; "my husband is living, and I have never obtained a divorce. I know I can trust you to keep a secret. Good night," and she disappeared. Dan stood like a statue.

"I am ready to hold the light now for you to swedge your saw," it was his brother's voice just behind him.

"I believe I won't swedge it to-night," he said. "I guess I'll have time in the morning."

"Where is Mrs. Winchester?" asked his sister, who saw at a glance that something had gone wrong.

"She has gone to her room, I believe, and I guess I'll follow her example and go to mine. Good night." And he went down the steps two at a time; but instead of going to his room he turned off on a log road and went up into the cañon. Daylight was dawning when he returned, and the engineer was getting up steam. Dan fixed his saws, and went in to breakfast. Dora's pallid face showed that she had not rested any better than herself during the night.

The day was one of those which are often found in the last of autumn, when the air is warm and sultry, and the blue smoke hangs over the mountain tops. Dora moved wearily about her work. Mrs. Carlyle came on the porch and called her to look at a fire on the mountain side. "What a queer kind of a day it is," she said. "I feel as though something were going to happen."

About nine o'clock Dora had finished her work, and going into her room commenced packing her trunk. She was going away; she could not stay here and endure the life she had been living for the past few weeks. She would tell Mr. Carlyle at noon that he must get some one to fill her place. Suddenly above the noise of the mill she heard a shout, and then another; then the mill was suddenly stopped, and, looking from her window, she beheld men running from all directions into the mill. A presentiment that something terrible had happened flashed over her. Mrs. Carlyle came into her room with a white face.

"The mill!" she gasped. "I fear there has been an accident; let us go!"

Dora ran quickly toward the mill, outstripping her feeble companion. As she entered she saw a crowd of men stooping over a terribly mangled something that lay on the floor, while the saws were terribly stained with crimson blood. She saw at a glance who it was that lay upon the floor.

Dan stepped forward and caught her arm. "This is no place for you," he said, hastily.

"Let me go," she cried, wildly; "he is my husband."

Dan dropped her arm and stepped back, while the look of horror deepened on his face. She knelt on the floor and took her husband's head in her arms; but she saw that he was dead, and sank down in merciful unconsciousness. It seemed that he had been helping the "off-bearer" take away the slab from a large log. After the carriage had gone back he stooped to pick a piece of bark from beside the saw, and they supposed he must have tripped and fallen forward. His body was almost severed.

They buried him on the mountain side above the mill in the shade of a group of whispering pines. Dora would have it so, and at the head they caused a marble slab to be erected, bearing this inscription:

NORMAN FAIRCHILD.
Died October 20th, 1871, aged 33 years.

Those awful stains were washed from the saws and the floor, a new engineer was procured, and the mill started again to finish the contract. Mr. Carlyle was obliged to find a new cook, as Dora was confined to her bed after the terrible shock she had received. Mrs. Carlyle nursed her tenderly, and in a few days she declared herself quite recovered, and announced her intention to leave. Mrs. Carlyle begged her to remain with her as a companion, but she was firm. So one day in the last of October she finished the packing which had been so fatally interrupted. She took down the withered leaves and long green ferns with which she decorated her room, and, throwing them from the window, watched them float away in the autumn wind. Then she opened the cage containing the little brown bird. His wing had healed, and he had become very tame. He hopped out on her hand and uttered a chirp, as though to say good-bye, and then flew out into the shade of the madroño, where he trilled a song of joy at once more regaining his freedom. Dora was to leave the next morning, and that evening as she stood by the window in Mrs. Carlyle's parlor, pale and quiet in her black dress, Dan came in.

"It is a lovely moonlight night," he said. "Won't you come out and walk for a few minutes? I have a question to ask you."

She looked up at him. He was very pale, and there was a pleading look in his eyes that she found hard to resist.

"Yes," she said, "I owe you an explanation." She wrapped a shawl around her and they passed out.

"Let me tell you my wretched story first," she said. "Four years ago, after my father died, I went to live with my aunt. I obtained a certificate, and taught school eight months. While teaching I became acquainted with Mr. Fairchild. He was the owner of a quartz mill in the vicinity, and was, as you know, a handsome man. He was also a good friend of my aunt's, and I was almost constantly thrown in his society. From the first he evinced a great deal of interest in me; and I—well, I had never before met a man for whom I could care. He seemed to possess a kind of magnetic power over me. I knew he was a very determined man and had a quick temper, but he took good care to show it as little as possible during our engagement. We were married as soon as my school closed in the fall, and went to San Francisco on our wedding trip. He was kind and attentive to me, but I saw all too soon that I must submit to him in everything, or live in war. When we returned we lived near the mill, and here my trouble began in earnest. He dictated to me in everything. He seemed to love me, but certainly had a strange way of showing it. I could scarcely endure his jealous watch on all my actions. No one visited me except my aunt. He was not unkind in his manner toward me, but seemed to rejoice in his power over me.

"When my baby, my little Gracie, was born I hoped he would change, and love the little one as well as I did; and though he seemed pleased at first, he soon began to grow jealous of my attention towards her. She was a delicate little thing, and when awake fretted if out of my arms. Norman scolded a great deal, said I was spoiling her with so much attention, and would sometimes try to make me lay her in the crib and let her cry herself to sleep, but this I utterly refused to do. She was a beautiful little thing, and was all I had to love, and I worshipped her. As she grew older she evinced the greatest fear of her father, and could not be induced to go to him, and that seemed to aggravate his dislike for her. One day when she was about ten months old she was unusually fretful. I knew the child was not well, and did my best to soothe her. When Norman came in in the evening I was trying to get her to sleep, but she cried incessantly. 'I am afraid she is not well,' said I.

"Nonsense," said he, and crossed the room with a black look on his face. 'You are making a fool of yourself and of her too. Give her to me. I'll see that she stops her everlasting crying.'

"I begged him in terror to let her be, and I would soon quiet her. But he took her from me, and holding her on one arm, held me back with the other. The child's fear of her father increased her screams. I implored him to let me take her, but he refused. She suddenly ceased screaming, and looking at her in terror, I saw that she was in convulsions. I sprang for my child, and tore her from his grasp, but before I could do anything for her she was dead.

"I dimly remember shrieking frantically and calling him a murderer, and then I knew no more for several days. When I came to myself again Aunt Ellen stood by my bedside. As the knowledge of what had happened came over me I was almost frantic. 'Where is my baby?' I cried. I tried to rise from my bed, but was too weak, and fell back weeping bitterly. Knowing that this was best for me, my aunt gently tried to comfort me, and presently, when I grew calmer, gave me a little curl of golden hair and told me where my baby was buried.

"I could not bring myself to ask for my husband, but that evening I heard his voice in an adjoining room inquiring for me. But I refused to see him, and the next day my aunt told me that he had gone to Nevada to see about an interest which he owned in a silver mine, and would probably be gone several weeks, and had left orders that I was to stay with her until he returned. He had merely told her that the little one had gone into convulsions and died, and she was surprised at my refusing to see him. My strength returned rapidly after he had gone, and in a few days I was able to be around again. My aunt's duties called her home, and she tried to persuade me to accompany her. But this I utterly refused to do. She then urged me to get some one to stay with me during his absence. I promised to try, and she went home. My plans were already formed. Packing up a few of my most cherished possessions, and procuring a widow's dress, I left home as quietly as I could. He had always kept me well supplied with money, so that I had sufficient for my needs. I took an assumed name, and soon reached Sacramento. I tried to find employment as a teacher, but failed, and was looking for work when I met you. He must have traced me here. I don't know what his intention was, unless to make me believe that he had not lost his old power over me, and that it was impossible for me to get away from him. I don't know what he has done with his property. One thing is certain, I shall never trouble it."

Dan had remained perfectly quiet during her recital, and only his clenched hands and deeply-labored breathing showed how deeply he was affected by it.

"And now that you are free once more where are you going?" he asked.

"I shall go back to my aunt," she said; "I know I can find employment there as a teacher."

He hesitated a moment. "May I ask you my question now?"

"Not now," she replied, hastily. "Come to me in a year, and then you may ask it." For she well knew what the question would be.

"A year is a long time to wait. Will you give me hope?"

"Yes," she said in a low tone; "and now I must go. Good night."

* * * * *

Passing by a fine ranch midway between M— and R—, in one of our best farming counties, one beautiful evening last May, I saw a pleasant sight: a tall, dark man was romping on the grass in front of the house playing with a pair of rosy-cheeked, curly-haired twin boys, about three years old; while beyond them, in the shelter of the porch, rocking a beautiful baby girl in her arms and smiling at the revelers on the lawn, sat a lovely brown-eyed woman, whom I knew could be none other than "The Cook of Eurisco Saw Mill."

E. A. T.

PATTERSON, Cal., November 12, 1878.

The Yellowstone Canon.

This great gorge has been recently explored by Professor Hayden, the chief of the Geological Survey, who had penetrated it once or twice before. It seems to surpass in grandeur and interest even the famous cañon of the Colorado, made familiar to us by the daring and perseverance of Major Powell. It is 3,000 feet deep, the walls being almost vertical. It is so dark at the bottom of this awful chasm that stars are plainly visible in the sky at any hour in the day. The loneliness of the place is dreadful. Waterfalls are numerous. The four highest and grandest ones are called the Tower, Shoshones, and Upper and Lower Yellowstone falls. The lower fall has a plunge of nearly 400 feet; the others average about 100 feet. The average width of the river in the cañon is less than 600 feet. The celebrated geysers were reexamined by Professor Hayden, to ascertain whether the phenomena had developed any new features. "Old Faithful," the largest of the group, is still subject to hourly eruptions, the intervals of activity occurring as regularly as the ticks of a clock. When at work "Old Faithful" projects a stream of hot water 200 feet in the air. The party camped for seven days within sixty yards of this geyser, the mild temperature of the spot greatly mitigating the rigors of the weather, which was severely cold and tempestuous, snow having fallen to the depth of two feet in some localities. The suffering experienced by the men was intense. The expedition endured many hardships, and met with many thrilling adventures. The crossing of the swift mountain streams in that region was often attended with extreme peril to both human and animal life. The animals were frequently led along the most dangerous defiles. One mule bearing a heavy pack missed its footing and tumbled over a precipice 1,600 feet high. The men peeped over the brink and saw a pile of bones and mule meat at the bottom, but no time was spent in efforts to recover the pack. Wild game abounded, and the men could sit by their camp fires and shoot moose, elk, deer, and bear.

Macaulay thus foreshadows the Kearney movement: "I remember that Adam Smith and Gibbon had told us that there would never again be a destruction of civilization by barbarians. The flood, they said, would no more return to cover the earth; and they seemed to reason justly, for they compared the immense strength of the civilized part of the world with the weakness of that part which remained savage, and asked from whence were to come those Vandals who were again to destroy civilization? Alas, it did not occur to them that, in the very heart of great capitals, in the very neighborhood of splendid palaces, and churches, and theatres, and libraries, and museums, vice, ignorance, and misery might produce a race of Huns fiercer than those who marched under Attila."

When Charlotte Corday stabbed the terrible Marat to death in his bath, July 13, 1793, an effusive Frenchman embraced, as he called her, "the angel of assassination." A sense of gratitude as strong will pervade the minds of the good men of New York city, as they give credit to Samuel J. Tilden for his brave and successful assault upon Tammany Hall. But the parallel bids fair to be completed. Tilden, like Charlotte Corday, will have to die for his destruction of a great tyrant.—Forney.

On state occasions his Excellency Chin Pan Lin chalks his queue.

LORELEI.

Below a cliff the curled waves drift
With gleams coruscant in the light,
And on the white cliffs sloping height
The bright sun-lances break and shift.

And from the cliff a mystic song
Floats onward on the flowing tide;
Shine sun or stars, the echoes glide
In melting magic streams along.

A woman leans above the swell
Of billows on the sapphire sea,
From whose full lips flow thrillingly
Wild cadences of subtle spell.

Her white limbs gleam like pearls along
The lucent shimmering waves below;
'Tis joy to gaze upon their snow,
But death to listen to her song.

What time a boatman slips adown,
The wild sweet notes ring o'er the wave,
And if he pause to hear, a grave,
Sea-bound, he gaineth by the sound.

Wherefore a rower passeth by Averted-faced, afraid lest he Should see the white form's symmetry
And hear his death-song ringing nigh.

NORTHUMBRIA, November, 1878. MAY N. HAWLEY.

ow say you, Gentlemen of the Jury?

The downward path in pain she trod,
Loathing the thing she did;
The question is with her and God:
To live? To starve? Who bid,
Or bids, us mortals live or die?
And who shall draw the line,
And in a sea of misery
High duty's task define?

Is it to pine beneath God's sun,
To wither inch by inch?
To steal, to filch, to leave undone
Our purer self? The pinch
Of poverty is hard to bear;
'Tis hard in vain to ask;
And there are those who well could dare,
Yet find no fitting task—

Those upon whom once fortune smiled,
And after frowned as black,
By Fate or cheated or beguiled;
And those who knew to lack
From their first breath of vital air
To life's last throb of pain.
Ah, who amongst us here shall dare
Fling that first stone—Disdain?

And in such grief, is she who falls
Guilty of desperate crime?
The suicide not less appals.
Which is the fitting rhyme
To such a life, to such a fate?
Pause, happier hearts, and say,
Ye who have wealth and large estate,
Yet sometimes go astray.

OAKLAND, November, 1878. HARRY A. CARTRIGHT.

San Francisco.

Though night has come upon the hills, I stay,
And my eyes, resting in their downward glances,
Fall on the fair young city of Saint Francis—
The dim Sierra fading fast away,
The fleet of anchored ships, the noble bay
Upon whose rippling waves the moonlight dances,
And Golden Gate through which the fog advances
That soon will hide the scene with cowl of gray.
O City watching by Balboa's sea!
When greed of gain and lawlessness are past,
Thine is the future, and sure faith I hold
Thou wilt have brighter days, for thou wilt be
A home of science, art, and song, at last,
As Rome and Athens were in days of old.

SAN FRANCISCO, November, 1878. R. E. WHITE.

On Hearing the Song, "Leaf by Leaf the Roses Fall."

Slowly and still the twilight shades are stealing,
Gently the thronging night-birds sing and call;
Softly from out the purple distance pealing
Sweet tones are telling how the "roses fall!"—

Voices so apt in Nature's silent teaching
They hold the spirit in a mystic thrall,
Waking within the heart an ardent reaching
For the cool bank whereon the "roses fall."

Leaf after leaf, they say, the rose is falling;
Drop after drop, they sing, the springs run dry;
But, with a sudden thrill of hope, they're calling—
Fountain and flower shall freshen by and by.

Once more the rose, now stripped, and sere, and trodden,
Shall spread her fragrant petals to the sun,
And where the cool, dark shadows reach and broaden,
Gleaming and clear the dancing stream shall run.

So, in this life, when all our hopes are shattered,
And the worn spirit faint and sick has grown,
When the false friends whose lips had smiled and flattered
Have left us broken hearted and alone,

Sweet Faith shall point us to inviting mountains,
Whereon the springs of love are never dry,
Where flowers are blooming by immortal fountains
In the eternal gardens of the sky.

OAKLAND, November 20, 1878. MARY L. CLOUGH.

A Portrait.

Brown hair that glints with gold when sunbeams meet
Amid its meshes; eyes so darkly blue
They seem like purple violets wet with dew;
Lips dainty red, and ripe, and very sweet;
A rounded chin where chasing dimples gleet;
A little hand whose warm clasp thrills you through;
A form like that which greeted Cupid's view
When Psyche came; and tripping bids of feet.
So bright and beautiful is she I love.
The far-off stars, the worlds that hang remote,
Can show no form so lithesome and so fair.
Delicious dreams with her forever move,
And ringing notes of music near her float,
Within that realm where her kind rule is su-

NEW LONDON, CONN., Nov. 10, 1878. THOS. S.

THE HANGING IN GEORGETOWN.

The pioneers will recollect that Coloma, the spot where the gold was first found, was, in those early days, a sort of Mecca—the end of a long journey, whence the diggers were wont to “branch out.” There was an Oregon man of the name of Hudson peace to his soul, for he is long since dead) slipped away from Coloma in 1849, and found a gulch which was rich beyond anything then known. He returned to Coloma, gathered six friends, and, each packed like mules, left the sleeping hamlet at midnight for this secluded and unknown spot. This was about September of the year named; and the seven worked steadily till November, when they were discovered. The rush came in by thousands, for the eagerness to get hold of rich diggings then was as strong as it is now. The finders were circumscribed at once as to the amount of ground they were to have; but, having had nearly a two months’ quiet swing, they were content that others should reap some of the fruits they had already bountifully secured, for their average to the man had been $200 a day.

We almost neglected to record the name given to the gulch; it was called by the little party in honor of the man who found it the Oregon Gulch. Upon these diggings becoming known the town of Georgetown sprang into being; a large party of Georgians, who found the Hudson party, made their camp at the head of the ravine, which has ever since been known as “Georgetown.” The Oregon Gulch was taken up from its source to Canon Creek, into which it emptied, and Georgetown became at once a famous place. The “Round Tent,” during 1850, known in nearly every mining camp in the State, was bigger there than usual, and the hard-earned money was bet upon the gambling tables not in ounces, but pounds. In digging to the bed-rock along the gulch aforesaid, some of the Georgia miners (for it was they who introduced what is called the “long tom,” and there it was they first put it into practical use) had thrown out a square piece of gold so perfect that it seemed as if it had been run in a mould. It was thrown up among the debris, being nearly three and a half inches square (for it was too long to pass through the iron slots of the “long tom”), to be picked up by a worthless chap who had a hard-working woman for a wife. This nugget of gold the woman kept for a long time, giving everything else to her husband, who as persistently got drunk and gambled away their earnings as the day followed the night. On this occasion the husband got drunker, if it could be, than ever, and knowing that his wife still had the nugget secreted somewhere, tried to force her to give it up. This she refused to do. Mad-dened by rum, and the hope of gain from the gambling tables then groaning under loads of gold, he grasped his gun—an old musket—and shot her, the ball passing through the woman’s stomach; and when the murderer was taken with the smoking weapon in his hand, and the wife said it was he who committed the deed, giving the reason, and pointing to the spot in the cabin where she had hidden the bar, that man’s fate was sealed!

Of course the agony of the poor woman was great. She was shot at nine o’clock at night, but when mortification set in the next morning she became easy; and then, like the true woman that she was, she commenced to beg for her husband’s life, although she knew her own was ended. The poor thing died so easily in the afternoon that it seemed as if she had simply gone to sleep.

Then it was the hard, rough hands which had so gently nursed the woman grasped the man. He was a short, stout, burly fellow from Sydney, clad in a red woolen shirt and common pants. He was led out by two powerful miners, followed by the whole camp, to a little knoll south of the town, where the tall sugar pines grew. Some sailor climbed a tree and tied a rope to the limb. The man saw it all; had been taken to see his dead wife, but had nothing to say—not a request, not a prayer to make. They lifted him into a wagon, built a sort of platform on it, tied his feet and hands, put the rope around his neck, and a thousand willing hands pulled the wagon away, and as the evening sun, just dipping behind the hills, cast strange, low shadows upon that wild scene, there, at the end of the rope, was the swinging body in the red shirt.

The Coroner cut him down the next morning, and his picked jury rendered a verdict of “Served him right.”

SAXON.

Mrs. William C. Ralston, having returned from Europe to confront the vile accusations that have been so cruelly and so cowardly made concerning her, is now at the Palace Hotel. She is intending to ascertain by proceedings at law what are her rights as the heir, and by will the legatee, of her deceased husband. She has met the accusation of mental incompetency and compelled the discontinuance of proceedings that ought never to have been commenced. She declares it to be her intention to reside in California, and to establish her sons here where their father lived and died. To attack and assault this lady as some journals have done since her return seems to us to be most unjust, unkind, and altogether uncalled for. Those newspaper proprietors who, when the husband was in his power, were his most abject slaves and flatterers, are now the first to assault and slander his defenseless widow. Those whose friendship for William C. Ralston survives his ability to serve them, and who have kindly memory of his many generous qualities, and his many acts of public service, will deeply deplore this attack. All gentlemen will recognize the impropriety of dragging her name into the public print when no good purpose can be served thereby. If the race of gentlemen has not entirely run out, and the age of courtesy to women entirely gone by, there will be some who agree with the ARGONAUT in deprecating this most cruel and cowardly assault.

There are theatrical people who stoutly assert that Joaquin Miller never wrote one single line of the play called The Danites, but lent his name to it for a moneyed consideration. Who the mischief would purchase the use of Joaquin’s name?—which is Cincinnatus Hiner.

A march composed by Rossini, but never published or performed, has been officially distributed to the military bands at Rome, and promises to become very popular. The maestro presented it to the Italian Government in return for the order of San Maurizio bestowed on him by Victor Emmanuel.

THE WAY MEN DRESS.

I have been much struck during my residence in California with the disregard men show to dress. American men are all stubbornly independent in this respect, and it is needless to add, are in consequence notorious the world over for their want of taste and slovenly manner in dressing. Of course there are exceptions to this rule, and I am happy to say that these exceptions are daily increasing; but they are few and far between, especially in California. In all countries, except America, to be scrupulously neat and exact in all conventional forms of dress is an essential element in a gentleman’s character; and people are able to recognize by his dress the class to which a man belongs as accurately as a sailor can tell the nationality of a ship by the general trim and set of her rigging and sails. The dress of the man of the present day, taken at its best, is hideous enough, heaven knows! Then why deform it further by making bad combinations of color and shape? Many men purposely never give the subject a moment’s thought, for fear of being considered foppish. Perhaps they do not reflect that by going to the other extreme they make themselves quite as snobbish, and unconsciously class themselves with those nature’s noblemen who avoid cold water on principle. A careless, slouchy man is seldom cleanly, is always uncomfortable—as nothing ever fits him—spends twice as much on his clothes as there is any necessity for, and, lastly, shows a lack of respect for the ladies he associates with. For these strong reasons, and as it is quite as easy to wear the right thing as the wrong, I can not imagine why people will make themselves uncomfortable and extraordinary. In the East, men are beginning to be well dressed; that is to say, they finally acknowledge that hats of a certain shape go well with coats of a certain shape, and that every gentleman should take off his dusty office-clothes and put on his evening suit for dinner. The fastidious reader will at once see the advantage of doing the latter, as it necessitates a clean shirt. Then again, ladies always dress for dinner—why should not men do the same? Ah! it may be said, ladies have nothing else to do. My answer to this ungallant evasion is, that ladies invariably dress with a detailed elaboration in comparison with which a man’s unbecoming uniformity of garb is as nothing. But, comparisons aside, a man who knows how to put on his clothes can dress thoroughly in fifteen, or at the outside twenty, minutes, and surely every man can spare that time. It is refreshing, on going to your club, to find everybody in evening suit, and it makes you feel fresh and good-natured yourself to put one on. It is rare in San Francisco to see a man properly dressed in the evening at a club, or a theatre, or even a private dinner table; and I have seen men not in evening suits at dinner-parties and even balls; and “as for going to all the trouble of tying a white cravat just to call on a lady,” who ever heard of such a foolish custom? Now, I won’t be positive, but I think I have. The hardship and roughness of the life of ‘49 have given way to the ease and refinement which naturally follow wealth and women. San Francisco can boast of a greater amount of luxurious refinement and elegance in private houses and hotels than almost any other city in the world. In fact, everything has kept even with the times except the men’s dress. This is not at all in harmony with their surroundings, and could be greatly improved. No man is more of an American by right of birth or by feelings than I am, and nobody takes a greater interest than I do in everything American. I constantly hear foreigners making malicious remarks about America and Americans, and I want the time to come when it will be impossible for them to do so, even about such a trivial matter as dress.

GRINGO, JR.

Some Artists.

With the near approach of Christmas our artists have settled down to the most industrious spell of work that has yet overtaken them. Especially is this the case with Rix, Tavernier, Strauss, and Robinson, who are all engaged in filling orders for the holidays, bringing out from their ensels some of the most exquisite little gems that brush and colors can produce. Tavernier has returned from Monterey, and is now located with Rix in studio No. 6, Mercantile Library building, where the talented pair can be found every day between the hours of 11 and 3 o’clock, ready to do artistic service in the shape of sketches in oil, pastel, or water-colors to the satisfaction of the purchaser. Rix is doing some captivating twilights, and Tavernier has on the easel subjects in delicate summer landscape and rugged coast marine. The little landscapes that Strauss is now painting in pairs are something superb and should be seen by those not yet possessing specimens of his work, and the sketches of Robinson when once seen are certain to be appreciated, as delightful subjects for pictures. And just here we want to give a brief bit of advice to those who spend money for pictures, and who desire to get a satisfactory return for the money so expended. Deal directly with the artist, and avoid as a snare and a delusion the commission merchant or frame peddler, who has more interest in the disposal of rejected and unsalable canvases from the East than he has in the work of our acknowledged home talent, for the reason that the speculation is his own or the commission larger. Avoid the influence which is always sure to meet you, and visiting the artists give an order to them which will bring you a single picture, or a pair, that will have attached oftentimes the added value of your own suggestions and be correspondingly valuable. Then again you save the percentage to dealers, have your own taste suited in the matter of frames, and possess an association with the canvas that is always pleasant. In this manner, and by this method, there are hundreds of our moderately wealthy or well-to-do people who can have our local artists represented on their walls, or who can make glad the hearts of appreciative friends and acquaintance by a Christmas gift as acceptable as it assuredly will be valuable. Think of this, and if there is anything in the suggestion remember that nearly all our artists can be found at their studio addresses, and that they have qualities and canvases that will make the visit interesting.

In no other city in the country, says a correspondent of the Pittsburg Commercial, is there such an army of half-educated, half-witted, no-mannered, vulgar, hobbledoy girls as one meets constantly upon the Washington streets.

THE STORY OF THE FRENCH BANK.

"After" Poe's "Bells."

I.

How the people curse the Bank,
The French Bank;
What perjury and fraud those Commissioners did outflank!
How the jingle, jingle, jingle
Of the coin which took its flight
Would gladden those who mingle
On the streets, by twos and single,
With felicitous delight,
Crying coin, coin, coin,
After those who did purloin
From the safe and solid vaults of that safe and solid Bank—
From the blank, blank, blank, blank,
Blank, blank Bank!—
From the safe and solid vaults of the French Bank.

II.

Hear the wise and learned Courts—
District Courts:
What "concurrent" jurisdiction attaches to their skirts!
With how little true compunction
They issue an injunction,
And by the shrewd manoeuvre
Of a sharp and cunning lawyer
Appoint a Bank Receiver
In due form,
Thus by getting jurisdiction,
Secure the malediction
Of a rival forum.
Oh, the wealth of "latent" justice in the Courts!
How it gushes forth in dignified transports;
How it sports
And supports
The bailiffs of the Courts,
The lawyers and the sheriffs of the Courts,
Courts, Courts,
The lawyers and the bailiffs of the Courts.

III.

Hear the shrewd and crafty lawyers—
Brazen lawyers!
What a real source of terror are these artful peace-destroyers
Hear their blandness to the Bench
As they quote their bad Law French.
Hear them try to hoodwink juries.
How they scream themselves in furies.
Too much horrified to speak,
They can only shriek, shriek,
All the time,
In a clamorous appealing to the patient Court and jury,
In a mad expostulation with the weary, worn-out jury,
Speaking higher, higher, higher,
With a desperate desire
And a resolute endeavor
Now to win the case or never—
With a perseverance almost sublime.
Oh, these lawyers, lawyers, lawyers,
What terrible annoyances
They all are!
How they jangle, clash, and roar.
What a horror they outpour
On the bosom of the palpitating air!
Yet their clients are aware
By their wrangling
And their jangling
That for fees alone they care;
Yet the clients of these lawyers,
As they wrangle
And entangle,
Well know them to be wicked fell destroyers,
By the wrangling and the jangling of the shrewd and crafty lawyer
Of the lawyers, wretched lawyers,
Of the lawyers—peace destroyers—
By the wrangling and the jangling of the lawyers.

IV.

Hear the staid Appellate Court—
Supreme Court—
What depths of legal wisdom its opinions do import!
How its writ of Prohibition
Squelched the coveted Commission
Of the Gallagher Receiver of the Bank,
And transferred to that high forum,
With its wise and august quorum,
The Bank case for argument in Banc!
But the people, ah, the people,
The dear, deluded people,
The Teuton, the Latin and the Frank,
Who by toiling, toiling, toiling
Months and years without recoiling,
Saved a pittance to deposit in the Bank—
They are men and they are women,
They are Irish, French, and German,
But they're fools;
For 'twixt Sheriffs and Receivers,
Bank Directors, Courts and lawyers
With no souls,
They are plucked like silly geese,
Or like sheep shorn of their fleece,
By the Sheriffs and Receivers,
Bank Directors, Courts and lawyers,
Like mere tools.
And they seem to think it nice
To be plucked like silly geese
By these ghouls,
These cold, inhuman ghouls,
So plausible and fair,
Who feast on human souls
Entrusted to their care.
But beware, oh, beware,
For in the dead of night,
When shut out from human sight,
They are ghouls;
And they stalk, stalk, stalk,
All alone;
With their King alone they walk,
With their King alone they talk,
With Satan—their King—all alone,
Devising "legal" measures,
How by law to reach those treasures,
How to reach that bright six millions of gold coin;
How to keep the case in Court,
The Court of last resort,
Or a Court of any sort,
Until those glittering millions are all gone.
How to keep the case in Court,
In the Court, Court, Court,
Until the whole six millions are all gone!

H. N. C.

"I meant no harm," said the Rev. Joseph H. Beale, Methodist, of Wallingford, Connecticut, when arraigned before church committee on a charge of kissing seven young women. And he didn't do any harm—they had all been kissed before by the deacons.

PRELUDES--IN DIVERS KEYS.

"Wilt thou have music? Hark! Apollo plays."

They are right, after all, who call the violin the king of instruments; it needs but that it find itself in the proper and to assert its sovereignty right royally. We are apt to forget it. The tricks of the modern virtuoso school—the aganini-DeBeriot-Leonhardisms, so to speak—have belittled it, until in our day the dignity, the nobility, of its true style seems to be almost lost out of sight; to be a popular concert violinist is nearly the same as to be a saltimbancha. The Quintet Concert of last Friday night was a valuable lesson to such of our young violin aspirants as still fancy that attainment of a certain facility in staccato, pizzicato, and y-rocketts generally, constitutes a violinist. They will have learned that it is in the purity and warmth of his tone, the wealth and refinement of his phrasing, the neatness and accuracy of his passages, that the true artist seeks his effects; at the genuine violinist aims, firstly, lastly, and always, to get upon his instrument; that his ambition is to make music, and let the applause depend upon his having accomplished it, instead of upon his astonishing the audience by a display of difficult and unmeaning gyrations. The Suite of pieces furnished Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr., the welcome opportunity to illustrate all this, and he performed his task with a completeness that I may say surprised even those who were most sanguine of his possession of the true stuff. His playing of the Suite was simply admirable; the Prelude, with its almost symphonic breadth; the Romanza, tender, impassioned, and yet broad and dignified; and the weird, almost aboriginal Scherzo—they were alike beautifully interpreted. Score, say I; we must have the Suite again. The String quartets—three movements from the Op. 47 of Rubenstein, bendied by Schumann, and Minuetto by Mozart—were beautifully done, and their warm reception by the audience seemed an endorsement of my request for more quartet, and is solo playing. This is the purest form of instrumental music that we have; and if, as I hear reported, we are to see our quartet after this season, we ought to get all the ensemble playing we can out of it, for heaven only knows when we shall get another. The Trio (Serenade) by Hiller, with its interesting forms and rhythmically quaint Intermezzo, together with the Finale from the Saint-Saens' Quintet, presented Miss Alice at her best, while I thought the cello solo there dry, both as a composition and performance. Mrs. Armer-Campbell, who gave a very delicate rendering of a Berceuse from Dinorah (a hazardous selection, by the way, for the concert room, since the dramatic situation forces upon the composer a form so fragmentary and capricious that, removed from the stage, it becomes almost an absurdity), finished a delightful surprise in a pretty German song by Jöken, which she sang with a warmth of voice and manner that I was not prepared for. The song of Bizet—rather interesting as a composition—furnished some debatable points. I did not like Mrs. Campbell's conception of it, but fancy that she studied it in Paris, and there they certainly ought to know how these things are intended to be sung.

In looking over a folio of piano-forte pieces by Stephen Heller the other day, I chanced upon an old friend whose acquaintance I feel assured it will delight every pianist to make: his Ländler and Walzer, Op. 97. The set consists of twelve short waltzes in the style of Franz Schubert; they are exquisitely melodious, full of sentiment, and not at all difficult to play. We all know how delightful Heller can be when he chooses, and in this work we have him at his best.

Mr. Herold's programme of last Wednesday afternoon consisted for me—of the Preludes by Liszt, Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor, and the Entr'acte to the third act of "Lohengrin" by Wagner; not a bad menu, by any means, albeit in which the gentle Leipzig might have suffered from the gorgeousness of his surroundings had he been made of stouter stuff. As it was he stood the test right manfully; and, indeed, with this Concerto he might well face any place in any programme, with the odds greatly in favor of his carrying off the honors. It is one of the brightest and loveliest compositions for the piano-forte—brilliant, graceful, and yet over difficult. The Preludes was, on the whole, a very satisfactory performance, though it suffered considerably from the inefficiency of the string force. The composition is extremely brilliant, and full of a certain vivid picturesque quality that renders it very attractive, especially in this market. Liszt chooses to call it a Poème Symphonique, and as it is of composition (most of it, at least); the second theme is very like the trio to the Scherzo of Schubert's C major symphony. I suppose he is entitled to call it what he likes; but no more "symphonic" in form or structure than are most of the Rhapsodies, and not nearly so much so as dozens of piano-forte pieces I could name. It is a Fantaisie for orchestra—precisely that and nothing more. Mr. Herold's furious tempo for the Entr'acte almost took away my breath at the outset, but when I had become accustomed to it it seemed right, and I rather liked it. It made it go off splendidly, and helped to cover up the weakness of the fiddles.

We had this Entr'acte up for discussion lately, a musical pundit and I, and my friend contended that for concert purposes the last dozen measures should be cut, and a new one substituted by adding a few measures to follow the last trillissimo in G; this new finish to preserve the jubilant character of the piece, which he conceived to be weakened by a quiet ending of it as it stands. Although at first I seemed to agree with him (the carrying it past the fortissimo certainly seems unwarranted on merely looking at the score), the performance of last Wednesday convinced me that Mr. Herold is right in ending as he does—only that, in order that this anti-climax should not be misunderstood, there should be some word of explanation. In the opera this piece fills a place somewhat analogous to the Wedding March in the "Midsummer Night's Dream," i. e., it is played between the acts as a "curtain music," but has its place and motive in the logical development of the drama. The second act closes with the procession of Elsa and Lohengrin (accompanied by king and nobles) to the cathedral, where the marriage is about to take place, and the third opens with a chorus of the guests who are accompanying the happy couple to their apartments after the festivities which are supposed to have been held in the great hall of the castle. It is these festivities that are intended to be portrayed by the joyous rush of the Entr'acte; the scene itself is hidden from view by the curtain, but the sound of its jubilant strains makes us participants as it were, and merging it at the close into the quiet and melodious bridal chorus is after all the only possible logical or poetical termination of it. It is part of the Wagnerian theory that the mere formal structure of a musical composition should be a consideration entirely secondary to its dramatic character, and in this piece he has furnished a most happy illustration of the theory without any sacrifice of beauty or formal consistency.

I have been asked: "Who should study Bach, and what is to be learned from him?" I reply: Everybody and everything. He is meat for every stomach, the weakest as well as the strongest, and almost all that is worth knowing in music can be learned from him. I have only to hear people say that they "don't like Bach" to be convinced that with them the musical feeling is not more than skin deep.

The Orchestral Matinées are suspended until after the holidays. The fourth Quintet Recital, which falls on next Friday, 6th prox., will bring the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto, Piano-forte Quartet by Schumann, String Quartets by Hayden and Schubert, and songs—notably Reinecke's lovely ones with violin obligato—sung by Mrs. Tippet. S. E.

Church Music.

EDITOR ARGONAUT:—As criticisms on church music seem to be in order, will you permit one who can speak more from the heart than the book to make a few suggestions. Your critic is evidently one who is a thorough musician, but in his articles on church music he criticises a performance as he would a "Schmidt recital"; he overlooks the fact that in our church service the music is intended simply as an accessory of worship, not a display of talent or skill. Taking Dr. Stone's choir as an illustration, the music is expected to be, and usually is, adapted to the occasion. The praise service is as deeply interesting and savors as much of devotion as the prayer service, and the notes of some touching chant, or the lifting power of some grand Te Deum, have their place in soul-worship. We listen to our song service not to criticise it as a performance, but as a vehicle for our emotions. In some churches congregational singing prevails (a chorus by the masses), in others a quartet of harmonious voices lead in the song service like the preacher in the prayer. Cathedral music, so to speak, is not adapted to our Protestant churches. Bach's Fugues would have no place; even an organ voluntary would not tolerate them. Such a composition as "God is a Spirit," sung by a "Whitney quartet," is simply sublime, but I do not think your critic could enjoy it. "Paradise," as sung by the quartet, is touching and simple, and even "The Sweet By and By" has its place in our worship. The hushed silence that prevails during the utterances of the choir before spoken of is proof enough of the deep interest felt in the music. Your critic evidently judges of church music from a German standpoint, so to speak, and classes it as a performance, while we forget to consider it in any such light, so that it is adapted to the time and place. B.

[The editor has referred this criticism to the gentleman whom it chiefly concerns, and he says in reply:]

Criticisms "from the heart" are very difficult matters to deal with. I have known most excellent hearts to beat responsive to very bad music, or be deeply stirred by the most atrocious poetry, and can even imagine such a one of commendable rhythmical correctness, and yet in fullest sympathy with Mr. Mayer and his peurile twaddle. The fact is that "B."—like many others—has simply misapprehended the standpoint of the critic, even as he evidently fails to quite comprehend the standpoint from which church—or any other—music should be judged. It is precisely as "an accessory of worship" that I demand that the musical portion of a church service should be conducted in a reverent spirit, and with decency; that it should be musically clean. In order to be so it should be entirely free from the tawdry prettinesses with which a certain class of organ-players (not organists, by any means) delight the more ignorant and disgust the cultivated portion of their hearers; it should have nothing pretentious in its character, and nothing that will serve to distract the attention of the congregation from the worship, or attract it to the mere music. I cannot undertake in this place to make clear to "B." what I mean by "good music"; firstly, because it would lead too far for my space, and secondly, because from the status from which he writes I fancy it would be a hopeless task. I can only assure him that the music at Dr. Stone's church is not good music, in any sense of the word—not even respectable, decent music. That a portion of the congregation likes it is no concern of mine; what I have heard from more than a dozen sources since first I wrote about the matter convinces me that there is another portion that fully appreciates and coincides with my strictures upon it.

It is now known that the eucalyptus was discovered in 1792 by a French expedition in search of the famous admiral, La Perouse. This expedition was a double failure; it did not find La Perouse—it did find the eucalyptus. It did not restore a great man to France, and it did play the aged Henry with every Californian landscape by defacing it with blotches of unsightly blue, and loading the atmosphere with unpleasant, and no doubt unwholesome, odors. We are almost sorry La Perouse was lost.

BOOK REVIEWS.

More books! One from Roman & Co., by Mrs. Henry Ward Beecher, for us to review. How, in the name of reason, are we to review this book? It is about housekeeping and cooking. We do not know anything about either. If we ask our wife to review it, she is not going to admit that any body knows any more about housekeeping than she does; and how can we advise concerning the cooking receipts unless we try the dishes? Ninety-six pages of receipts! It would take a year. At the end of that time we should be dead, of over-feeding. If our readers want to review this book let them buy it.

C. P. Somerby, a book publisher in New York, sends us a work entitled "The Ethics of Positivism," by Giacomo Barzellotti, Professor of Philosophy at the Liceo Dante, Florence, price $2, and writes us that unless we review it and send him a marked copy of the paper he won't send us any more books. This has placed us in a very embarrassing position. The senior editor took the work home, read it carefully through several times, and could make neither head nor tail of it. It defends the theory of absolute moral obligation against the claims of empirical expediency. Modern psychology is fully entered into; Locke, Hartley, Hume, Auguste Comte, Stuart Mill, Bain, Spencer, Paley, Bentham, Kant, Schelling, are fully, completely, and exhaustively considered. Our senior editor acknowledges that he never read any one of these books, knows nothing about psychology, nor the physiological theories of any one of these writers; he tried hard to master this book, was threatened with softening of the brain, and is now off on leave of absence, duck-hunting, to recover his mental equilibrium. Bierce tackled it and went to grass on the first round. We then sent it to our musical critic. He returned it with the remark that it was written in a measure with which he was not familiar, and thought it must be by some new composer. "Betsy B." sat up all night with it after her return from the theatre, and thinks there might be a very nice comedy or melo-drama got out of it by Boucicault, if the copyright is not reserved. So we give it up; the book is too deep for the ARGONAUT. We shall send the book to President LeConte, of the University, and if he can not understand it we shall have it analyzed by the Professor of Chemistry, and the result we will send to the publisher; and in the mean time if he is publishing any primers or story-books within our comprehension we trust he will send them along. We send him this copy of the ARGONAUT marked.

From Putnam & Sons, through Billings, Harbourn & Co., comes Thanatopsis, elegantly printed, and artistically illustrated by Linton. There have been but few American poets, and these have written but few poems. Bryant is one of America's best poets, and Thanatopsis is his best poem.

Bonbons.—French and Otherwise.

At the masked ball, and by way of establishing one's self: "Does not my face seem familiar to you?" "Ye-es; I seem to have engaged you once, at some time or other, as my deputy sub-acting assistant coachman, but at present—"

Takes up with some one else and vanishes.

Who knows how it was that Chateaubriand became a member of the Académie?

This is how: 1. At l'Abbaye-aux-Rois Mme. Recamier had a spaniel. 11. One day M. Charles Lenormand gave a piece of cake to the dog, and Mme. Recamier said to Father Ballanche: "He is a man of taste." Father Ballanche drew Chateaubriand to one side and said: "He is a man of singularly good taste." With much emphasis, Chateaubriand cried aloud: "M. Lenormand has the best taste of any man I ever saw."

In due course Chateaubriand entered the Institute.

"Waiter!"

"Sir!"

"This turbot is simply frightful. It is falling to pieces."

"You are unjust, sir (with sadness). If you knew its age you would think it didn't begin to show it."

At the office for the issue of sporting permits X. meets the Dr. B.

"Hello, Doc; how goes it? Where'r you off to?"

"Off to get my license to kill something."

"Why—where's your diploma?"

First Bather—"What are all these things I feel at the bottom?"

Second Bather—"Torpedoes, mister!"

"You oughtn't to drink," says a friend. "See how it makes you stagger when you try to walk."

"Thaz ariz," says the wretch. "I ossent try to walk; thaz whaz matter."

The Asiatic cholera is said to have made its appearance in Japan. We commend this fact to the attention of our health officers, and we also commend to their very careful perusal an article in this ARGONAUT from the pen of an eminent scientist who declares that artesian water in San Francisco is unhealthy and poisonous. The Morning Call and the Evening Bulletin are encouraging the sinking of these wells for domestic use. Their motive is of course apparent. We admit that the war against Spring Valley justifies almost any strategy. But the laws of war among civilized nations do not justify the poisoning of wells and springs. Representing the non-belligerents in this strife, we suggest that the health office employ Mr. McAlpine to give them a report upon this matter.

Mr. Taylor, one of the Directors of the Glasgow Bank, was arraigned in the dock of the very Police Court in which he formerly presided as chief magistrate. He does not like it.

That man that doth not know those things which are necessary for him to know, is but an ignorant man, what he may know besides.

THE LATEST MAGAZINE VERSES.

After Dark.

When Twilight gathers in her sheaves,
And wheeling swallows skim the flume,
The plow-man, turning homeward, leaves
His plow mid-furrow in the broom,
And through the melancholy eyes
The orange drops its milk-white bloom.

The old delights that go and come
Through sorrow, in the falling dew,
Like waves that wore a wreath of foam,
The darker that the waters grew,
Flow round my solitary home
At evening, when the stars are few.

So, sad and sweet as bridal tears
For broken homes, to see withdraw
The child we love, have gone the years
We climbed the frosty hills, and saw
Descend on all the frozen meres
The sunlight breaking through the thaw.

Like one who in the driving snow,
When all the untrodden paths are dim,
Hears far-off voices, faint and low,
Across the woodland calling him,
I hear the loved of long ago
Singing among the seraphim.

And as the soft dissembling light
Falls, shadowing into dusky red,
I think how beautiful the night
With gathering stars is overspread,
Like seeds of many an old delight
Through sheaves of sorrow harvested.—Harper.

Expectation.

We rode into the wooded way;
Below us wide the shadows lay;
We rode, and met the kneeling day:
We said, "It is too late."

The sun has dropped into the west;
The mountain holds him to her breast—
She holds and lushes him to rest.
For us it is too late.

"To see the leaf take fire now,
To see, and then to wonder how
The glory pauses on the bough,
While painting grass-tops wait."

When lo! the miracle came on—
A roadside turn—a moment gone—
And far the sun low-lying shone;
The forest stood in state.

Transfigured spread the silent space;
The glanour leaped about the place,
Touched us, swept from face to face.
We cried "Not yet too late!"

But one who nearer drew than all,
Leaned low and whispered: "Suns may fall
Or flash; dear heart! I speak and call
Your soul unto its fate.

"Tread bravely down life's evening slope.
Before the night comes do not grope!
Forever shines some small sweet hope,
And God is not too late."—Harper.

Dawn.

With a ring of silver,
And a ring of gold,
And a red, red rose,
Which illumines her face,
The sun, like a lover
Who glows and is bold,
Wooes the lonely earth
To his strong embrace.

Eve.

In millions of pieces
The beautiful rings,
And the scattered petals
On the rose so red,
The sun, like a lover
Who is weary, flings
On the lonely earth
When the day is dead.—Scribner.

One Out-of-Doors.

A ghost—is he afraid to be a ghost?
A ghost? It breaks my heart to think of it.
So nothing that wavers in the moon, at most;
Something that wanders, something that must flit
From morning, from the bird's breath and the dew.
Ah, if I knew—ah, if I only knew!

Something so weirdly wan, so weirdly still!
O yearning lips that our warm blood can flush,
Follow it with your kisses, if you will;
O beating heart, think of its helpless hush.
Oh, bitterest of all, to fear we fear
Something that was so near, that was so dear!

No—no, he is no ghost; he could not be;
Something that lides, forlorn, in frost and blief,
So nothing shut outside in the dark, while we Laugh and forget by the familiar fire;
Something we call the wind, whose tears
Sound but as rain-drops in our human ears.

SALLIE M. B. PIATT, in Atlantic.

In the Dark.

Dark among thy pines, thou troubled river,
All day long thy restless waters moan;
Through the busy summer fields, unbreeded,
Faintly over farm and village brown,
Still thy sorrowful murmur everywhere
Haunts the homes of men beneath the noon-tide glare.

But when Night along the misty valley
Steals, and shuts the door of force and mill,
Hushing all the stir of town and traffic,
Then arise the winds that do thy will.
Then, O river, calling through the hills,
Heard afar, thy voice the darkening silence thrills!

All day long the heart unblest is sighing;
Toil and thought rebuke its yearning prayer;
Life needs many things, nor stays for pity;
But Night comes at last. Day's strife and care
Are forgotten; then, O heart of mine,
Have thy way; the silence and the dark are thine!

—Appleton.

HOW TO MARRY IN RUSSIAN.

Marriage in the Catholic and Greek Churches is a sacrament. Under the old-time régime it was ever regarded as a religious ceremony, to be properly performed only by the priest, and with proper observance of rites, before the holy altar of the God who was invoked to bless and sanctify a union between the man and the woman. Marriage in these late and more secular days has become a simple matter of civil contract. It is regarded by the Protestant and non-religious world as a sort of co-partnership, and is entered into in a sort of hap-hazard, hit-or-miss style quite in accordance with the little importance that is attached to it. We will not in this article discuss the question whether the mariage de convenance, arranged by parents, as is the European custom, is or is not better than the marriages of love and chance brought about in our country; whether imprisonment behind convent bars is a better preparation for the trials and temptations of married life than the promiscuous intercourse of sexes in our public schools.

It is certainly true that with us the marriage ceremony is very lightly considered. We have two extremes: the ultra-fashionable, that makes display of trains and marriage veils, of jewels, gifts, and rich trousseaux; that flouts itself in long processions of bridesmaids and groomsmen up the centre aisles of churches, and holds a matinee of fashionable display before God's altar. We have the marriage ceremony where the bride and groom steal secretly before the civil magistrate, and, in hastily mumbled words of the busy justice, take upon themselves the obligation of married life. We have, too, the quiet domestic ceremony, so fitting and so appropriate, where the maiden is taken from her home a bride, the solemn rites consecrated at the domestic altar, amid the select circle of cherished friends, and departs amid the kisses, tears, and blessings of parents, brothers, and sisters. All this is preliminary to the introduction of an account of the mode of betrothment and marriage sanctioned by the Greek Church, which seems to us more fitting and beautiful, more appropriate and solemn, than that of any other religious ceremony we know.

Previously to the marriage the intention of the contracting parties is proclaimed three times in the church. No nuptial ceremony can be performed outside of the church, or with closed doors. The ceremony is not only encompassed with solemnity, but publicity, every precaution being taken to guard against anything like a private marriage. The ceremony of betrothal is almost as solemn as the nuptial ceremony itself. In the first place the parents give their blessing, which is a ceremony beginning with prayer. A holy picture, the symbol of the blessing, is waved in the form of a cross over the heads of the couple, who are kneeling before the parents. This picture is carefully preserved by the couple, and accompanies them everywhere. The parental blessing is called in Russian obrasovanie, from obras—a picture. On this occasion, in the presence of the parents, the first kiss is given—the seal of a holy promise and faithful love.

The ceremony of betrothal is solemnized in church immediately before the wedding; in the case of royalty several weeks intervene between the betrothal and the nuptials. The bridegroom having arrived at the church, a lady is then sent to conduct the bride to the sacred edifice. As a general thing the parents do not accompany their daughter, as she is now to pass from their guardianship forever. A friend, who is generally the near relative of the groom, acts for the parents. He places the couple before the altar, and puts in their hands a lighted taper, which they hold during the ceremony. After a form of prayer, the rings, which have been previously placed on the altar, are taken from thence by the priest, and, with these words are put on the fingers of the couple: "The servant of God [here the name is given] is betrothed to the maid of God." "The maid of God [here the name is given] is betrothed to the servant of God." Then follows the benediction from the officiating priest. After this, the friend who acts for the parents advances and interchanges their rings three times. This ceremony being concluded, the priest pronounces the blessing, and the young couple stand before God and in the sight of man pledged to each other for weal or for woe. The brilliantly lighted church, the gorgeous robes of the priests, the incense floating upward, the bridegroom and bride crowned with golden crowns, standing amid the richly-decked audience, make an impressive pageant.

As the couple approach the altar the choir sing "Glory be to Thee, our God, glory be to Thee!" The bride and bridegroom then place themselves on a pink silk mat in front of the altar, and, after various prayers of supplication, the crowns are brought from the altar on a plate, and blessing one he places the crown on the head of the bridegroom, saying: "The servant of God [naming him] is crowned for the maid of God," that is, united under this crown; the blessing then follows. The same ceremony is repeated in the case of the bride. Those who marry a second time are not crowned. Singing ensues, after which the priest hands a cup of wine and water three successive times to the couple, who drink of the contents. This common cup, as it is termed, is symbolic of that common cup of fortune of which married couples are supposed to drink in common. The procession then follows; the priest places the hand of the bride in that of the bridegroom, and, taking their hands in his, leads them around the altar, while behind walk persons holding the crowns above their heads, the choir chanting in solemn strains.

After the crowns are removed from the heads on which they have been placed, the couple kneel before the holy pictures in the church in prayer, while the choir chant the Te Deum. On their rising, the relatives and friends approach and offer their congratulations; after which, in company with the priest, or the holy picture which had been given them by the parents, and which had lain on a desk in the church, they return home, where the parents present them bread and salt. The marriage feast follows, of which the priest generally partakes.

Whether married life in Russia, thus solemnly begun, is of a higher type than marriage in other countries we know not; but, certainly, a service so solemn must have its effect upon the most thoughtless, impressing them with the fact that marriage is a serious obligation entered upon, a high and holy duty incurred, and not a simple pastime, or contract entered into for a few weeks or months, but forever.

ARTESIAN GREAT BORES.

"And there Isaac's servants digged a well."

The Bulletin-Call, prompted only by a desire for the public good, are waging an unrelenting war against the Spring Valley Water Company. They desire the city to have and own the property, but are not willing to obtain it in the only honest way it can be attained, namely, by purchase at its real value.

In order to depreciate Spring Valley the Bulletin-Call advise everybody to dig artesian wells—that is, everybody but themselves. Mr. Pickering has a splendid place for an artesian bore at his residence on Bush Street, and we are expecting every day to have him commence the work. Some three months since, Mr. B. B. Redding communicated to the ARGONAUT a paper, showing conclusively that the artesian water upon this peninsula contains uric acid, receives the seepage from the sewers, closets, and other places of foul deposits, and is dangerous to the health of the city. On the 15th of last July the Bulletin wrote the following eulogistic notice of William J. McAlpine, engineer, of New York:

"The name of William J. McAlpine, of New York, is associated with the greatest engineering works on the eastern side of the continent. He was at one time chief engineer of the Erie Railroad. He devised a plan, and carried it into execution, of furnishing Brooklyn, New York, with a supply of water from Long Island. He was also the engineer who constructed the Albany, New York, and the Chicago water works. The reconstruction of the Erie Canal was also accomplished by him. He is regarded as one of the most eminent engineers now living."

Mr. McAlpine was subsequently engaged by the Austrian Government to remove obstructions to the navigation of the river Danube. He is an eminent engineer and all that the Bulletin said of him is well deserved. This gentleman, who is now visiting our coast with an invalid daughter, having read the article referred to in the ARGONAUT, and his attention being called to the discussion of a question with which he is entirely familiar, called at our office and gave expression to the following views as to the quantity and quality of the supply of artesian well water upon this peninsula. He says that all the wells that could be sunk in this city would not furnish an aggregate permanent supply of six millions of gallons a day of water suitable for domestic purposes. He says, further, that there are some mechanical and other purposes for which such waters as can be procured from wells in the city may be used, but as soon as their true quality is generally understood they will never be used for domestic purposes.

In discussing the quality of artesian water, Mr. McAlpine says that water readily seizes hold of, or enters into combination with, almost every substance with which it is brought in contact, and what is important in the present examination, is that it eagerly absorbs, and reluctantly parts with, those substances which render it most objectionable for domestic uses. The impure gases from combustion, and those which arise from the vast masses of refuse, decaying vegetable and animal bodies which abound in the fouler parts of a large city, all float in the atmosphere over large populations, and are seized upon by the falling rain water, and materially injure the quality of what would in the country be very pure water. When the fluid reaches the surface of the earth, it is brought into contact with the decaying vegetable and animal products, which it rapidly dissolves and incorporates, and when the rain water passes into the interstices of the earth, or porous rocks, its great solving power enables it to decompose and incorporate the earthy and mineral matter with which it comes in contact.

The water which is obtained from wells within the city, must necessarily contain all of the contaminations which have been enumerated, viz: from the impure gases always existing in the atmosphere over the city; from absorption of the effete animal and vegetable matter which is so abundant on the vacant lots and grounds around the dwellings of certain classes of the population; from the earthy and mineral salts in the soil; and from the leakage of stables, privies, imperfect house-drains and sewers—the most hurtful and repugnant of all contaminations. Water which is brought into contact with excrementary matter imbibes therefrom the most deadly and disgusting of all pollutions to which it can be subjected. The Arab, Turk, East Indian, and the Chinese, only half civilized, hurry such matter from sight, and deposit it where its emanating gases and germs will perform the functions of natural dissolution, without coming into contact with any air or water which man is compelled to breathe or use. It is only among the civilized Caucasians, and in their densely populated cities, that these obviously necessary sanitary measures are disregarded, and men, women, and children are forced to drink the deadly and disgusting water obtained from wells within a city.

Many of the open privies, earth closets, water closets, and leaky house-drains and sewers discharge their contents into the adjacent soils, and the water from the next rain, percolating through this filthy soil, becomes contaminated with it, and flows on to the nearest well. If a deep well is sunk through the upper porous soil, and one or more layers of clay, the smooth exterior surface of the iron pipes offer a ready conduit to the contaminated water, which will then enter the pipe at the bottom of the deepest well and poison the whole supply therefrom. I have been informed, and have observed, that a great many of the sewers of the city have been very badly constructed, of loose, porous brick masonry of inadequate thickness, laid up with common mortar of very bad quality, and that these sewers leak into the adjacent soil a considerable amount of their contents. So far as this leakage occurs, it is a terrible source of corruption to any contiguous wells of water.

The enteric fevers and zymotic diseases, which prevail to so frightful an extent in many of our American cities, have been traced directly to the use of water from wells which have been polluted by the admixture of sewage matter and drainage therefrom. The chemical analysis of the water from many of the old, long-used wells in European cities, and from those formerly in use in some of the American cities (some of which yet continue), show how foul and corrupt all such sources must be, under the similar conditions which, we have endeavored to demonstrate, must exist in almost every well, shallow or deep, to which now or hereafter a resort is had for any portion of the supply for domestic uses.

In vindication of the position taken by the ARGONAUT with reference to artesian water, we print this statement of Mr. McAlpine. If the Bulletin and Call have believed that artesian water was proper for domestic use, and are now convinced that every family that uses it for domestic purposes is being poisoned, it will be their duty, as it will be their pleasure, to warn the community of its danger. The health of the city is of more importance than to punish the Spring Valley Water Company by depreciating the value of its property in order to steal it.

Pony Glasses of French Brandy.

APHORISMES DE LA PHYSIOLOGIE DU GOUT.

Les animaux se repaissent; l'homme mange; l'homme d'esprit seul sait manger.

La destinée des nations dépend de la manière dont elles se nourrissent.

Dis-moi ce que tu manges, je te dirai ce que tu es.

Le Créateur, en obligeant l'homme à manger pour vivre, l'y invite par l'appétit, et l'en récompense par le plaisir.

La gourmandise est un acte de notre jugement par lequel nous accordons la préférence aux choses qui sont agréables au goût sur celles qui n'ont pas cette qualité.

La table est le seul endroit où l'on ne s'ennuie pas pendant la première heure.

La découverte d'un mets nouveau fait plus pour le bonheur du genre humain que la découverte d'une étoile.

Ceux qui s'indignent ou qui s'enivrent ne savent ni boire ni manger.

Celui qui reçoit ses amis et ne donne aucun soin personnel au repas qui leur est destiné n'est pas digne d'avoir des amis.

Convier quelqu'un, c'est se charger de son bonheur pendant tout le temps qu'il est sous notre toit.

L'homme est le grand gourmand de la nature.

L'homme repu n'est pas le même que l'homme à jeun.—Brillat-Savarin.

La conviction est la conscience de l'esprit.—Chamfort.

Les cœurs peuvent s'aimer, même quand les caractères ne s'accordent pas. Une dame écrivait à son amant: Je ne puis vivre avec toi, ni sans toi.

Plus l'amour vient tard, plus il est ardent.

Une critique d'art examinait les sept Sacrements peints par Poussin. —Celui du mariage est le plus faible, dit-il. —C'est qu'un bon mariage est difficile, même en peinture, lui répondit le peintre.

Deux moines, chemin faisant,
Se demandaient: Dans le monde,
Lequel est le plus plaisant
D'avoir une femme brune ou blonde?
—Frère, dit l'un,
Le poil ne fait pas la femme,
Mais, pour résoudre le cas,
La meilleure, sur mon âme,
Est celle que l'on n'a pas.

Les femmes ne vivent que des émotions que donne l'amour. Une vieille dame avouait qu'étant jeune elle avait beaucoup aimé. —Oh! s'écriait-elle, les bons chagrins que j'avais en ce temps-là! —A. Houssaye.

En amour, aujourd'hui vaut mieux que demain; le bonheur que l'on diffère est toujours du bonheur perdu.—A. Ricard.

On pardonne les infidélités, mais on ne les oublie pas.—Mlle de Lafayette.

L'amour est un traître qui nous égratigne lors même qu'on ne cherche qu'à jouer avec lui.—Ninon de Lenclos.

Pour les femmes du monde, un jardinier est un jardinier, et un maçon est un maçon; pour quelques autres plus retirées, un maçon est un homme, un jardinier est un homme.—La Bruyère.

—Ce coquin de X., c'est l'avant-dernier des hommes! —Pourquoi l'avant-dernier? —Parce qu'il ne faut décourager personne.

On est plus heureux dans la solitude que dans le monde, parce que dans la solitude, on pense aux choses, et que dans le monde, on est forcé de penser aux hommes.—Chamfort.

Ah, malheureux qui péchez sans plaisir,
Dans vus erreurs, soyez plus raisonnables,
Soyez au moins des pêcheurs fortunés,
Et puisqu'il faut que vous soyez damnés,
Dammiez-vous donc pour des fautes aimables.

—Voltaire.

Un homme qui avait épousé une femme galante dont il était très-entiché, parlait constamment de ses charmes, de ses qualités, de ses séductions. —C'est inutile de nous faire son éloge aussi souvent, lui dit un de ses amis, nous la connaissons mieux que vous.

Les femmes demandent si un homme est discret, comme les hommes demandent si une femme est belle.

—Laissez-moi tranquille, disait une jeune fille à un vieillard qui voulait lui prendre un baiser.—Mais, ma chère demoiselle, à mon âge, vous pouvez m'embrasser sans péché. —C'est justement pourquoi je ne le veux pas, répondit la petite friponne.

Un mauvais danseur s'excusait ainsi auprès de sa danseuse:

Pour vous, si je sors de cadence,
Tout ce que vous pouvez penser,
C'est qu'un homme, en votre présence,
Ne sait plus sur quel pied danser.

SAN FRANCISCO, Nov. 24, 1878. L. G. J. DE FINOD.

FORWARDED BY A PRESENTIMENT.

I had been living in Oakland but a short time, and crossed the ferry every day to business in San Francisco. One evening I was watching from the ferry-boat the lights of San Francisco receding in the distance, and was absorbed in the beauty of their dancing, flashing, many-colored rays. Long lanes of brilliant lamps were coming into view and then giving place to others; all these shining avenues of lights, from my shifting point of view, seeming to revolve upon a common centre, while the thousand lights upon the hills were reflected in the calm water of the Bay. Gradually a feeling of dread crept over me: a curtain seemed to fall over the lights, excluding from my view all save one, a bright red lamp upon the water front—the danger signal to my awakening apprehensions. I turned suddenly and saw him for the first time, a tall, athletic man, his face covered with a long black beard, standing near, and evidently watching me. As I turned he stepped toward me, and I noticed that we were alone upon the afterdeck. I jumped away from the rail and hastily joined the crowd at the bow of the boat. There I laughed at my foolish fears, and looked in vain for the fellow who had alarmed me. I saw him no more that night, and began to curse my cowardice, for there was nothing at all remarkable in the circumstance that we two were alone upon that part of the deck, and there really was nothing suspicious in the movement he made toward me. However, I slept but little that night, and felt uneasy for several days afterward. This apparently trivial incident made so great an impression on my mind that I bought a revolver, carefully loaded it, and carried it always with me.

For some weeks I saw nothing of the man, and although I had ceased to think of him, I continued from habit to carry the pistol. One night I had been working late in my office, and was hurrying down California Street to take the last boat for Oakland. When near the corner of Battery I was seized as before with the same feeling of terror, and instinctively my hand was upon my revolver. At the corner I met the same black-bearded stranger and recognized him immediately. He stopped full in front of me, and extending his arm to bar the way, he said: "My friend, do you know that your life is in danger on these streets at this hour of the night?"

I had with me a considerable sum of money that had been handed to me in the evening, and which in my hurry I had forgotten to deposit in the safe.

"Yes," I answered, as I drew and presented my pistol, "I know that, and am prepared to defend it."

The instant he saw the pistol he fled up Battery Street and disappeared. Had I raised an alarm, I should have been detained and would have missed the last boat, which, indeed, I barely succeeded in catching.

I did not mention the occurrence to any one, as my business often obliged me to remain in the city until late in the evening, and if my family knew of it they would be constantly alarmed for my safety. Something told me that I had not seen the last of the man, and I carefully examined my pistol every morning. I made cautious inquiries at the police office, but nothing was there known of such a person as I described. I became nervous and excitable from constant apprehension and walked nowhere alone at night.

Some months had passed, when one day, feeling that a ramble among the hills would do me good, I took an early boat to Sausalito, and strolled for several hours through the cañons among the hills. Again that nameless terror came upon me, and I was hurrying through the woods along a narrow path leading to the road, when a sudden turn brought me face to face with the tall unknown. For the first time I saw his face distinctly. It was an intelligent countenance, but there was something relentless in its expression, and the eyes looked wild and cruel. For a moment I stood transfixed with fear and amazement. He bent his piercing eyes on me and laughed a hollow, mocking laugh. My blood curdled.

"Aha!" he exclaimed, "I had no idea of taking a life over here. But I am always ready for business. Excuse me, sir," he continued, with a fiendish smile, "do you realize that you have not long to live?" As he spoke he thrust his hand into his breast pocket.

I saw that I had a madman to deal with. When the truth flashed upon me I recovered my coolness and self-possession in a moment. My only chance for life lay in getting the first fire.

"If you want my money," said I, at the same time carrying my hand to my pistol-pocket, "here it is." He laughed again that cruel laugh.

"I don't ask for any money, all I want now is to secure your life."

I heard something snap in his pocket. Quick as thought I whipped out my pistol and fired. He fell back dead, his hand still clutching something in his pocket. I withdrew his hand, and was horrified to find that it grasped, not a pistol, but a packet of papers.

What had I done? Had I made a mistake? The danger of my situation burst upon me. Were I discovered upon the ground I would be apprehended and charged with murder! Upon the impulse of the moment I thrust the pistol into his hand and ran. I reached the road unobserved, and got to the boat in safety.

The night which followed was one of terrible anxiety and apprehension. I knew that the body must have been found before dark, as the path was much used by workmen on their way home at night. Morning and the newspaper came at last. I tore open the paper, and this was the first paragraph that caught my eye:

"SUICIDE AT SAUSALITO.

"Yesterday afternoon the body of M. P. M. Dodge was found in the woods at Sausalito. He had shot himself through the brain, and the pistol with which he committed the act was still firmly clutched in his hand. Disappointment in business has been assigned as the motive for the deed. The deceased had been only six months on this coast. A packet of circulars found in his pocket led to his identification. They bore his name as the special traveling agent of the Purely Philanthropic Life Insurance Association. The company have lost in him their boldest and most fearless operator. There was no insurance on his life."

The reading of that paragraph lifted a great load off my mind. I had slain a life insurance agent, and it was justifiable homicide after all. No jury would find a different verdict. I was safe, but said nothing.

SAN FRANCISCO, Nov. 22, 1878. WM. A. LAWSON.

FABLES AND ANECDOTES.

By Little Johnny.

Affecting Narration of the Sausage-Eater Consuming his Son.—The Dog that went to Dinner with a Snake, and was Surprised at the Meal.—The Man that Disembowelled the Boa and was Devoured by the Boa's Dinner.—The Joking Culture and the fawning Ophidian.—The Author's Uncle Edward ventures upon a Pleasantry, and is Sut Upon.—Two Fish Stories of Great Merit, and many other Amazing Matters not hitherto Recorded.

One time there was a butcher, and Mister Brilly he is a butcher too, and his boy is Jack Brilly, the wicked sailer, and that's the sort of thing for me, hooray for a life onto the oton wafe! And the butcher he made sossidges.

One day a little boy come in the shop wich had busted a bras button off his jacket, and he snap it in the sossidge meat, and then he dasset ask for it out. Nex day the boys father was to the butchers hous to dinner, and thay had sossidges, cos the butcher he knew the boys father was offle fond of em, but the boys father he got the bras butten in his mouth. Then he take it out and looked at it a wile, and then he sed: "Xcuse me, but were did you git the pig wich these sossidges is made out of?"

And the butcher he sed: "I disremember."

And the man wich was a cryn like his hart was busted he sed a other time: "Xcuse me, but I gess you got the rong pig by the ear, and hav chop up my Charly."

Then the butcher was a stonish, but he thot the man had gon crazy, and must be humerd, so he sed, the butcher did: "Thats a fack, but it was a mistake, and if you dont let on Ile giv you a other boy."

Then the man he briend up and sed: "Xcuse me, but wile we tock it over I gess Ile jest hellup myself to a other plate of thish."

My Uncle Ned, wich has ben in Injy and evrywere, he says once there was a big snake in a sho, and the sho man he put a dog in the cage for the snakes dinner, and the dog was a live. The dog he loked at the snake a wile, and then he went and smelt it with his nose, like it was a posy, and the snake it lay reel still, but wank its ey, much as to say: "I me a mity nice nose gay wen I open out."

Then the dog he set down and thot a other wile, and then he sed: "Thats the biggest sossidge wich I have ever saw. I like sossidges, but I dont bleef thish can be et to one meal by eny dog livin'!"

But bime by he was et his own self, and when he was nice swollered the snake it wank its eye a other time, much as to say: "The man wich invented self-stufn sossidges wasent eny friend to dogs."

One time in Injy a man wich was in the woods he see a offle big snake wich had over et itself and cudent creep it was so big a round the stumk of its belly, and the man he sed: "You wicked reptile you got a caf in their!"

But the snake it jest loked up out of its eyes in to the mans eyes, sollem, like sayn: "Give you my werd of onner, hope to die, honest Ingin'!"

But the man he sed: "I kanow you, you wrascle, cos yure the same feller, I gess, wich et my wagon, there isnt any use tryin for to be a farmer wile you are in this naberhood."

So the man he kild the snake and cut it open for to let the caf out, but it was a tiger, and it et the man up, the tiger did, in a minnit, and Uncle Ned he says this fable teaches that a good deed is sure of its reward.

My father he said: "Johnny, did you ever hear of the man wich found a froze snake and warmed it in his busom, and wen the snake got nice and cumftable it bittim?"

And I sed: "Yes, evry fool has herd that."

Then my father he sed: "Wel, Johnny, the goodnes isnt all on one side, cos one time a snake found a man wich was cold, and the snake warmed the man in its busom too."

Then I sed: "Wot did the man do wen he had got the chil off of him?"

And my father he sed: "Wel, Johnny, he dijested."

One time there was a vultor, and vulturs dont hav enny fethers on their necks, and there was a rattle snake, and the rattle snake it sed to the vultor: "You better pul up yure collar, ole man."

But the vultur it sed: "You better pul down the skirts of yure skin, cos yure bones is a sticken out."

You jest ot to hear Billy, thats my brother, play the bones like he was a nigger, but fiddle strings is made out of cats.

One morning my mother she sed: "Did you hear that dreedle cat las nite, I think its too bad that cats is let make such noises wen fokes wants to sleep."

But Uncle Ned he spoke up and sed: "I gess if you was as ful of fiddle strings as cats is you wude make a noise in the world too, mebbey."

Then my mother she sed: "Wy, Edard!" but my father he lay down his knife an fork, and looked a wile at Uncle Ned, and then he put on his spettacles and looked a other time, and Bildad, thats the new dog, he rose up his hed an took a look hisself, but Mose, wich is the cat, he snook under the sofy like sayn, "Settle it yure own selfs."

Then my father he sed: "Edard, it aint ben the custom in this famly for to be a end man in a nigger minstel pformance, but if you are con vined that the famly intrest requires you to be one you better git Johnny for to rite yure jokes, cos them wich Adam rote is gittin mity shaky."

Then Bildad, thats the new dog, lay down agin, and Mose, wich is the cat, lay down on top of Bildad, and Uncle Ned he wisseled to hisself but didnt say no more.

A ephalent had went to a river for to drink, and he was so dry he put his trunk way down deep as he cude, and was wagglin it a round in the water dlited. And there was too offle big fishes. And one fish it said to the other, one did: "Now there is a wern wich is fit for to set before a king."

And the other fish it sed: "Yes, and you beter let it a lone, or you will be set before one yure own selfe, cos I bet its got a hook in it like the anker of a 3 decker."

Jack Brilly says one time a nigger fel of a ship, and the sailers throte him a rope, wich he cot by the end, and they was a hollin him a board when a shark snap him rite in 2. And just then a Suthern planter, wich was a pasinger, he come on deck, an loked over, and seen the shark do it, and he was excited, and he hollered to the sailers: "He has took yure hook, boys, he has took yure hook! Fetch a other one quick and git a fresh nigger!"

NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Rates of Subscription: $1 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance. Postage prepaid. City subscribers served for 35 cents per week. Single copies, 10 cents.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."
 Branch Office, Cooper's Bookstore, 746 Market Street Agent at San Jose—F. A. Taylor.
 News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders should be addressed.
 A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PINLEY, {
 FRED. M. SOMERS, { Editors.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1878.

One of the wealthiest, most successful, clear-headed, and honorable of our great mine managers asked us a few days since if we operated in stocks; upon being informed that we did not, he said: "You are wise, you can sleep nights; for you, who have other occupation, who can by no possibility inform yourself of the true condition of a mine, can have no part in its management, to invest in it is gambling pure and simple." The working of mines and the dealing in mining stocks are inseparably connected, and from the nature of things must be so. It is almost as nearly correct to say, if there were no stock transactions there would be no mines, as to say, if there were no mines there would be no stock gambling. The two things will go together. The Comstock mines have built the Stock Exchange on Pine Street; the Stock Exchange has opened the Comstock fissure, and timbered it to the depth of twenty-two hundred feet, has constructed the Sutro tunnel, and has developed a system of engineering more remarkable than elsewhere in the world. From this lode (and it has encouraged the development of others) hundreds of millions of minted gold and silver coin have been put into the world's circulation. The whole superstructure of the State of Nevada rests upon its mines. San Francisco is enriched by them, and the greater part of its property is directly attributable to them. Out of the deep silver mining of the Sierra railroads are built, farms are occupied and cultivated, manufactories employed, mechanics, merchants, and an army of laborers furnished occupation. It is natural that a class of stock and mine operators should grow up whose only business it is to deal in these properties. Of this class, one subdivision will give its especial attention to the working of the mines, and another to dealing in their stocks. It is as unjust to say that stock dealing is dishonorable as that mining is dishonorable; the two are inseparable. Out of this business comes a banking system peculiar to it, and interwoven with it. The Bank of California, the Nevada Bank of San Francisco, and to a lesser extent private banks and individuals, have loaned money upon stocks, simply because certificates of mines having value are natural security for borrowing money, and are easily convertible. Brokers have just as naturally advanced money upon stocks, because it is their occupation to deal in them. All of this is recognized in older communities as a natural condition of things—effects resulting from natural causes.

Stock gambling is new to California because it is a new State; the same cause would have produced the same result in any other country. If these unexampled discoveries of mineral wealth had been made in England, France, or Germany, there would have been much greater excitement in London, Paris, or Berlin. The people of California are undoubtedly predisposed to gambling. Our State was settled by daring and adventurous spirits. The gambling of the early days disclosed the fact that we all loved to take the chances of the green cloth. We are not quite assured that all men are born sinners; the doctrine of total depravity is not halt as well assured as the fact that all men are born gamblers. Of all the races or classes we know the Digger Indian is the lowest, and we have seen squaws, bucks, and paposes gambling off their grub and blankets in the sage brush of Nevada. The purest, best, and most intellectual people we know gamble at church fairs. The sweetest of females play poker at lunch parties. We have seen it from the Prince in his purple to the peasant in his blouse, at the Kursaals in Europe. Our preachers and judges gamble in stocks; our fashionable clubs are fashionable gambling halls. Senators choose their first terms by the toss of a coin; and good and perfect as we know ourselves to be, we have felt the tide of desire running through our veins as we have us, and seen our friends and acquaintance indulging themselves in the exuberance of paper wealth. When the tide runs out, and we see upon the shore the dead carcasses of our drowned friends, we rejoice that we did not venture, and realize the fact that we are virtuous from cowardice, and not from principle, and that the only reason we do not gamble to win is because we are afraid to lose. Let us then take things as we find them; let us make the best of conditions that are inevitable; let us admit that we have a stock-gambling class, and that it is indispensable to us; that it is composed of good and bad men; of honorable and dishonorable; that its results are of mixed good and evil. But in the name of an indulgent Providence, let our newspapers cease writing all their useless homilies upon its immorality, all their angry vituperation at its managers, and all their sorrowful and hypocritical sermons at the presumed calamities that result from it in the losses to innocent people, who have been induced to risk their mites, and crusts, milk bottles and sugar-teats, in this seductive business.

The mines and the mining operations of the Sierra are bringing to our State untold millions of wealth; not only that which comes in dividends, but that which results from distribution to laborers, mechanics, and merchants. The management of mines is not what it ought to be, is not as open and as honest as it ought to be; and this is an additional reason why people who are neither miners nor stock-jobbers should not invest in them. The hazard of the mine is increased by the hazard of the street; the tricks and manipulations of trustees are among the chances to be considered in the venture; lying reports of humbug experts, false assays of paid chemists—all these things are parts of the dangerous machinery that should warn intelligent business men to keep away from the game they "do not understand." We are not at all disposed, either, to join this yelping pack of hungry wolves who, having gambled and lost, unite in a howl against the successful. We are not disposed to think that the class represented by Squire P. Dewey, or by those dealers who have lost their money, are any better than the men who have won it. We question the hypothesis, that if those who have been impoverished by stock ventures had become millionaires or mine managers, they would have been more honest, more open, more generous than the men who have succeeded. To become jealous of, to misrepresent and lie about, the victors in a contest, or the winners in a game, is a part of humanity and is a proof of the doctrine of total depravity. When this game of stocks was first begun, we were indignant when any honest man or woman was overreached by fraud, or any innocent person was seduced by misrepresentations to the loss of his money. We saw with deep regret that this great swirling maelstrom of stock gambling was drawing into its vortex the gains of honest labor, and was destroying many branches of legitimate industry. But this has now been going on for twenty years; we have stood upon the brink of this seething cauldron, and nearly all of us have tried to breast its dangerous waters; adventurous ones have disappeared and never more been seen; suicides have gone down; families in it have wrecked their domestic peace; as into the opening chasm where Mettus Curtius cast himself, we have thrown lives and properties, hopes and ambitions, and still the chasm yawns. Our fountain of sympathy has dried up, and we have become callous and indifferent to the fate of that great class of fools and idiots who still think that, with their little brains and small accumulations, they can outwit and overreach the subtle intellects that so craftily and with large means manipulate the stock market. This large mob of seedy and brainless idlers, who herd in Leidesdorff Alley and swarm in its adjacent cellars, have no place in our sympathies. This throng of draggle-tailed and unsexed females, who, like moths, go sailing around the fires of this gambling hell, have our best wishes that they may tumble in and be burned. The man of mature intellect, who has reached the age of twenty-one years and who risks and loses his money in this business, has no right to bruit his losses in the public ear. The leading mine managers, bankers, stock brokers, and heavy operators do not desire to gather this school of little fish in their nets, nor, as a rule, do they; the meshes of their seines are too large to catch this small fry. Here comes in the petit larceny operations of the curb-stone broker, confidential points from the beer cellar, wild-cat mines, that have no existence save in the imagination of the small swindler who exploits them, and no value. It is from this class that come up the howl of anger and the wail of agony when the break comes. If all Leidesdorff Street could have been taken by the heels and shaken, when Sierra Nevada was $260 per share, there would not have been heard the jingle of silver upon its pavement; and yet when the market breaks it is in Leidesdorff Street that the banshee howls its notes of wildest despair. It is among the impecunious loafers of Virginia City that Mr. Mackay is in peril of personal violence, restrained by the honest toilers of the Miners' Union. Those who have everything to gain and nothing to lose, who are too proud to work, too cowardly to steal, and too lazy to beg, are the indignant ones who turn their mercenary faces to the Nevada Bank and curse, because its vaults contain money that, in their imaginations, they ought to have had means to gamble for and luck to win.

We have passed through a "deal" the wildest, and we believe the wickedest, that has ever been put up. Under the manipulations of an unchristian syndicate the whole line of the Comstock was inflated in value. A pool of resolute men were to hold Sierra Nevada beyond the reach of the bonanza kings for the declared purpose of giving a great dividend-paying mine to the people. The wealth of this bonanza was to be distributed, and not concentrated. It was to give us the harvest of a new crop of millionaires. It caught the credulous, and it caught themselves. Who has lost or who has won, it is as impossible as it is unprofitable to conjecture. California is no richer and no poorer than it was before this deal began. Some money has changed hands; some coin that was in Seligman's bank and in Glazier's office has had a winze sunk into it, been crosscutted and mined out, and through the clearing-house and stock exchange gone into somebody's else bank or broker's shop. The lesson is a profitable one, and it is simply this: Let this mining and stock gambling be confined to the class which makes it a business, and let other people keep out. There have been fewer innocent victims to this deal than to any other; there will be fewer in the next than this, and finally the disease will cure itself—will regulate itself; mining and stock operating will become more legitimate; wild-cat mining and curb-stone thieving will peter out; there will be a class and a money capital that will operate upon the bourse; mines will be worked, and discovered, and developed; mining will continue to be, what it now is, a great and profitable industry, enriching the coast, encouraging all other legitimate enterprises, and itself develop an extent and magnitude of which we have at present no real conception.

There never was a silver mine that gave out. The Comstock will be worked for a thousand generations, and wherever silver has been found upon our continent it will continue to be found. Every mine that has ever given a dividend, or that has yielded a profit over its working cost, is the promise of a continuing mine, and is evidence of other mines in that vicinage. The mines of the Ural and the Andes, of Hungary and Mexico, still exist; the mines described by Herodotus, and those discovered by the early Spaniards, are not yet exhausted. Silver mining is, and will be, a question of engineering and machinery. The silver mines of this coast are as enduring as the Sierra Nevada, the Sierra Madre, and the Cordilleras, in which they are found. San Francisco is the capital of the empire in which these mines exist. Its future is largely involved in their working and development; its growth and prosperity to a large extent depend upon their success. These mines are now challenging the attention of the world, and inviting to our coast a splendid capital. Regarding mining as one of our greatest, most enduring, and profitable industries, we should be glad to see mine management honorably conducted; should be glad to see these paroxysmal "deals" less frequent, and should be glad if our business community and our press writers would take a somewhat broader, more comprehensive, and generous view of the whole subject than they seem to do.

Kearney occasionally scintillates a truth. His opposition to the railroad does not blind him to the folly and crime of providing for the election of railroad commissioners to control fares and freights. The drayman and the workingman has the sense to know that if this great enterprise is placed under the control of a political commission it will prevent the extension of the work and injure the State. The lawyers and politicians in the Convention know the same thing, but lack the moral courage to assert an unpopular truth. In this respect Howard of Los Angeles, Judge Terry, M. M. Estee, and others, might profitably learn of Kearney. We have but little patience with the statesmanship that, setting itself afloat upon a chip, sails complacently down the popular current, and swings into and out of every side eddy that it encounters as breeze or wave may direct it. The obstinate, wrong-headed, pragmatical, honest ass that we think Kearney to be is the superior of all such statesmen in our opinion.

The Hon. George Evans avows his candidacy for the Republican nomination for Governor, admits that he is actively canvassing for the same, and expresses great confidence that he will win the leadership of the ticket. It is a little early in the race to name the victor, because all the entries are not yet made, and we can not help thinking that it would be better that there should be no active putting up of delegates—that the members of the Convention should come together as a deliberative and not a packed body. This manipulation of conventions is the curse of party organization, and just to the extent that we detest Senator Evans or anybody else endeavoring to forestall public opinion, just to that extent we shall cool on him. There are several gentlemen in this State who have a right—a better right than Senator Evans—to be considered in connection with the office of Governor, and they ought not to be compelled to have their claims advocated before a convention packed in the interest of Mr. George Evans.

Subscribers to the ARGONAUT have one cause for thanksgiving which is denied to "them asses" who take the Bulletin: they are spared the reading of thanksgiving sermons.

AFTERMATH.

Is it because we are an isolated people, and outside of the active world's great current of thought, that we are more narrow-minded, more jealous, more illiberal than other communities? Or are we misrepresented by a press, the leading characteristics of which are illustrated in a passionate and vindictive desire to tear down, misrepresent, and destroy everything that in other countries is held sacred? We are now intending to refer to that sensational literature of the daily press that claims the privilege of invading domestic circles and opening up to the world's gaze every incident of the inner home life, and violating every private sanctity that in other and more civilized places are regarded as inviolate. The newspaper proprietor that instigates his hirelings to prowl around private houses to spy out the weaknesses, the follies, or the crimes of persons occupying only the private station, and the wretch of vulgar birth and foul tastes that does this thing for hire—employer and employed—ought to be burned alive. The moral training that permits this thing allows blackmailing, and will, for money, suppress, invent, or publish any vile scandal. The man who will assault and kill the one who maliciously scandalizes his mother, his wife, or his sister in a public journal, and viciously gives currency to some devilish tale, should stand excused and be justified by that higher law that overrides codes and governs humanity.

In nearly all deliberative bodies, where opportunity is offered for the exhibition of the talents of statesmanship, some prominent person is developed as a leader; there arises some Mirabeau, who, by his commanding talents, recognized genius, and oratorical ability, steps to the front as the Warwick of counsel and the Rupert of debate. The members of our Constitutional Convention seem to be all upon the dead level of equality. The traditional Irishman, entering the Convention to strike with his shillalah the head uplified to prominence, would be embarrassed where to deliver his first blow. It is possible that the great intellects are reserving themselves for a final effort, but so far the turbid stream runs tranquil, bearing on its placid bosom sand-lot agitators, lawyers, orators, and statesmen. As James McM. Shafter and Dr. O'Donnell go drifting down the current, the doctor may properly exclaim: "Behold, how we apples swim!" We are impatient to see the instrument this Convention will produce.

There would seem to be a peculiar propriety in these lighter and less formal columns of the ARGONAUT containing an occasional obituary notice, but as no one of the staff of the paper will be influenced by any such literary and business considerations to die and give us a fair chance at his moral character we are sometimes compelled to say complimentary things of dead outsiders—even of those who have thrown their patronage into the hands of rival obituarists. Shuffling and dealing our exchanges for suitable elegiac verse to illumine this column, we find the following, which is the very thing required, and just as good as if written by (or of) ourselves:

"I arrived to see you laying dead
On your low and lonely bed;
Go your soul to heaven's cleft,
Is the prayer of a friend bereft."

We hope next week to be able to lay before our readers the reply of the deceased, and that, so far as we are concerned, must close the quarrel.

Quite by accident and very much to our credit we have made the important literary discovery that Mr. Loring Pickering is not the author of the current obituary poetry. It affords us the greater satisfaction to correct this error because we are, to some extent, responsible for it, inasmuch as we are the only human beings who have ever said he was. The real author is a pale-eyed young salesman or clerk in the undertaking establishment of Nathaniel Gray. Poeta, they say, nascitur, non fit, but this bard was born an undertaker's clerk, and was made a poet by the exigencies of business. Bereaved relatives come to him to order coffins, carriages, and "whatever is necessary." To his lasting honor be it said he does not himself consider rhymes necessary, but many of his customers do, and before leaving the shop mention the matter in a hesitating, dubious way, and if not rudely repelled—and the bard is a man of politeness—they commonly end by asking him, flat-footed, to make some poetry about the dear deceased. He complies, and he is right; but he charges it in the bill and there he is wrong. The effort is worth the money to him, but the result is worth nothing whatever to the widow and orphans.

The proprietors of the newspapers of this town are hiring people to take their journals. The Chronicle offers premiums of pianos, buggies, books, marbles, molasses candy, and chromos. The Call gives a map—the same map, apparently, that the subscribers to the other paper would not take, and sent back when it was forwarded to them—an occasional shotgun, sewing machines, and cooking stoves, and will send a man to put up a lightning rod. The Bulletin pays coin. None of them seem to like the plan of making their papers so good that people will take them for nothing. This desperate expedient, in truth, is not necessary; nor is the plan of bribery, and all the money, furniture, wagons, and similar kickshaws paid out by our contemporaries is a dead waste. From an epitome of "newspaper laws" conspicuously displayed in the columns of many country journals we extract the following: "1. Any person who takes a newspaper regularly, from the post-office, whether directed to his name or another, or whether he has subscribed or not, is responsible for the pay." "3. The courts have decided that refusing to take newspapers and periodicals from the office, or leaving them uncalled for, is prima facie evidence of intentional fraud." Nothing could be plainer or more just; if you want a man to take your newspaper send it to his post-office. If he takes it out he is responsible for its price; if he does not you can have him up for swindling and compel him to prove his innocence—and that is the plan we have adopted ourselves.

Senator Perkins, formerly of Butte, now a merchant of San Francisco and member of the shipping house of Goodall, Perkins & Co., is prominently and most properly named in connection with the Republican nomination for Governor. Senator Perkins' career as a public man has been, so far as we know, a most useful and honorable one; his name in business circles is—so far as we know—above the shadow of reproach. He is intelligent, honorable, capable, and a thorough Republican of the early and better days of the party.

We are edified and enlightened to observe our Eastern exchanges sternly protesting against suicide as "cowardly." We fancy we have heard something of the kind before from pious-minded women, brigadier-generals of Sunday-schools, comfortable gentlemen, and philanthropists. Whether a suicide is a coward depends altogether, in our humble judgment, on his view of the life he leaves behind him. If he takes the religious view of it—considers it a duty to live—he is a coward if he abandons his post because "the fever called living" is making it too warm for him. Believing that his Maker made him for a purpose, he ought to lend himself with docility and fidelity to the accomplishment of that object, whatever it may be. But it happens that many persons do not take that view of the matter. They reason—and very honestly, too; whether correctly is another thing—that not having been consulted as to whether they would accept life—as it was thrust on them, whether they would or no—they are not bound by any contract, express or implied, to endure its evils if they don't wish. From their point of view they are entirely right, and when they elect to "step down and out" the real, old, original, Simon Pure, and only genuine coward is the fat and prosperous peddler of literary milk-and-morality who insults them above ground while the manlier worms are attacking them below.

Senator McCoppin, in answer to an inquiry by us, says he desires no place upon the next Democratic State ticket. We congratulate the Senator for his prudence. We write this in kindness, because we think the Democracy will be beaten at the next general election. We wish Senator McCoppin a better fate than defeat, to whatever place he may aspire. He is one of the few Democrats for whom we have always voted, and whom we regard as entirely honorable and entirely competent to fill any position of trust in this State.

In Mr. Bret Harte's last story, in the December Scribner, he introduces a character whom he calls Josh Silsbee. Perhaps it is not quite accurate to say "introduces" him, for he is, in fact, comfortably hanged for horse-stealing and out of the way before the story opens; but indirectly he is a rather important personage in the story, and absorbs a large part of the reader's interest. Now, the name Josh Silsbee is an unusual one, and not being an invention could hardly have been written without recalling the personality of the man who bore it. Who then is, or was, Josh Silsbee? He was, some fifteen or twenty years ago, a well-known comedian. He died—a natural death, we believe—in San Francisco, and was buried in the old Yerba Buena cemetery. If he was a horse-thief we never heard of it, on the contrary have been accustomed to hear him spoken of in terms of the tenderest respect by all who knew him. We question the taste if not the motive of Mr. Harte in fastening upon this blameless gentleman's memory an immortality of shame. Are there not plenty of John Smiths in the world for Mr. Harte's purpose? If he had not the imagination to invent a name for his graceless hero he might have laid hands on one of more general currency and wider application than that of poor Josh Silsbee.

This man Silsbee, by the way, must have had remarkable physical endowments. Many years—we forget the number—after he was buried, and when the bodies were being taken up from the cemetery mentioned to make room for the new City Hall, his casket was exposed, when it was seen through the glass that the face had undergone no perceptible alteration—Josh appeared as if enjoying a comfortable siesta in the flesh, when in all fairness he ought to have been but a pinch of dust. These instances of the higher law of self-preservation are, however, not uncommon amongst the residents of our cemeteries. The soil of California has other valuable properties besides those concerned in the expansion of cyclopean squashes and the prolongation of the aspiring oat.

A correspondent sends us the following lines, which he elegantly says were "thrown off in a hurry, like a passenger's breakfast from an Oregon steamer:"

"A friend, who's somewhat of a fop,
And has a shallow pate—
Whose head not ev'n of a first crop
Of ideas bears the weight—
Asked, with a laugh:
"What's 'Aftermath?'"
"Gospel truths," answered I, sudden and fierce;
"Uplifting gospel truths floated by Bierce."
"What Gospel?" "Mark. Don't it strike you at once?
The Gospel that comes after Matthew, you dunce!"

Our correspondent must have "thrown off" his answer as glibly as he has done his verses, and with as little reflectinn, for everybody, we hope, knows that the gospel truths of "Aftermath" represent the combined brains of the whole ARGONAUT staff, assisted by an inspired idiot and a practicing maniac. Their wisdom being thus assured they are sent to the City Prison, where their morality is "painted in" by the oldest offender—and that is the only connection the gentleman named by our correspondent has with the matter.

The following are a few of the reasons (in addition to those enumerated by the Governor, the newspapers, and the parsons) why we were all so thankful on Thursday last: The recent famine which destroyed some millions of lives occurred in China. All the destructive earthquakes of the year occurred in South America. Of the many thousands of people killed in battle the larger part were Turks and Russians. It is Afghanistan that is threatened with invasion. There is a greater business depression, and more suffering amongst unemployed workmen, in England than here. Most of the disasters at sea have occurred to foreign ships. It was the Scotch whaling fleet that didn't get any blubber. The yellow fever in our country was fatal in only fifteen thousand instances. The ravages of the phylloxera are confined to France, and it is in India that twenty thousand lives annually are destroyed by tigers and serpents. Truly, Providence has had a fatherly care of His creatures.

Our good friend the Bulletin has done as much as any paper, probably, to show the workmen that nothing is to be gained by violence and bloodshed. Peace being now assured here, it is generously allaying the turbulent elements of England. It has the courage to assure the English "landed aristocracy" that they will have to face a general reduction of rents, but adds that if they "could realize the financial truth that the lesser rent with which they must evidently be contented in the future will have a larger purchasing power than formerly, it is possible that no great resistance would be offered to the march of financial events." That's the talk!—teach the dangerous classes the rudiments of common sense and there will be no insurrection. But will these desperate dukes and brawling baronets, hare-brained gentlemen and reckless dowagers, listen to the voice of reason? It's a gloomy outlook for life and property in England if they do not.

What is the use of a registration, and a register, and a registrar of voters, and all the expensive machinery which these imply? The elector who knows his rights, and knowing dares maintain, can exercise the highest privilege of American, etc., whether his name is on the ward poll list or not, as was abundantly shown, the other day, at Green River, Wyoming. A trapper stepping up to the polls to exercise the highest priv—beg pardon—had his vote challenged by a zealous by-stander concerned for the chastity of the ballot-box. The trapper was grieved, but not disheartened. The occurrence did not make him despair of republican institutions; it did not cloud his faith in the future of popular government on this continent. Undiscouraged by the dominance of that carping, fault-finding spirit that is the precursor of monarchical institutions, he did not sullenly retire from politics. He simply turned about and shot the inquisitive gentleman dead; and a reputation of doing that kind of thing would enable a man to exercise the high—to vote, that is to say, better than the correctest transcript from the Great Register.

Cremation of the dead has been legalized in Gotha. We await with impatience its introduction to San Francisco. We have never been much given to attend the ordinary burials, but we have a large circle of acquaintance whom we should delight to see burned, and if the custom should be adopted here it would give us a new pleasure till it became our turn to go, and then we should furnish pleasure to that large class that does not like us—persons whom we have scorched.

Colonel Bob Ingersoll is evidently intending to secure the nomination for the Presidency if it can be done by conciliating the largest class of our voting population—the prets. He declares Robert Burns "the second poet of the world," and every living rhymor, tranquilly drawing the obvious inference that he is himself the first, prays for a ble—the Ingersoll head which had the sagacity to d—

A COQUETTE IN CAMP.

A Story without a Denouement.

La Honda lies on the road from Redwood City to the coast. Though dismal enough when the gray rainy sky seems to settle down close over the tops of the trees, and the creek becomes swollen and ambitious to be thought a river, it has a cheerful, busy air in summer. A small hotel, a saloon and country store, a blacksmith shop, a modern-built cottage nestled in the hill-distance overlooking the beautiful San Gregorio Cañon—this is all one sees following the road of the settlement.

The school-house stands apart in a round-shouldered field of growing grass, and is closed and deserted these lovely June days, and Mr. Angeun, the school-master, gone no one knows where for his vacation. But he comes back unexpectedly a week before the July opening.

"Bless my heart!" exclaims Mrs. Payson, whom the sound of the incoming stage has brought to her door, "is it you, Mr. Angeun? Why, I've got in a lot of city folks, and have put some into your room. But there's a lounge in the parlor if you wouldn't mind for a night or two."

Mrs. Payson has no fear of any complaint from her old boarder. She is used to saying that he is never so contented as when he is putting himself out for somebody. Indeed, though a school-teacher, Mr. Angeun is proof against trifling disturbances. Still, that first night of coming home, he was glad to escape from the echoing and re-echoing noises of the new, uncarpeted house, out into the dark, welcome quiet under the trees.

This man's life had not been an easy one; but thoughts of his early toiling and struggling, which at thirty-six had made him seem older than his years, were present to him then, chiefly as a vague disqualification for a hope which he had, nevertheless, cherished until now. The past might have been overlooked but that it had prevented present fruition. No less earnest and ambitious than other men, yet here was Angeun a poor country teacher at his time of life, with no immediate opening into anything better.

There was one who had not hesitated to make him feel his humble position. He remembered her light laugh and light words as if he had heard them yesterday, and yet it was a week of yesterdays since she had said: "Good night and good-bye, Mr. Angeun; I suppose you will soon be going back to your alphabet-blocks. At any rate, I am off for a pleasure-trip, and won't be home after this evening." Ah, the indifferent hand-touch, the saucy smile careless of wounding!

A sensible man, Mr. Angeun knew that such reflections should be treated as temptations, and after that night he meant to have done with them. So resolving, he rounded a curve in his path and saw down in the dark, wooded hollow off to the left puffs of glowing smoke and up-flying sparks.

"Somebody camped there," he muttered to himself, and turned back again listlessly the way he had come. Bidding farewell to a pleasant dream is very like getting up from a sick bed: one can not feel an immediate interest in anything beyond one's self. La Honda—that is, man's part of it, the short curve of glaring wooden buildings and hot open road before them—has its own way of enjoying the day which was blessed and hallowed so long ago. All through the sweet, sacred hours beings made a "little lower than the angels" sit on a certain veranda against a suggestive background of bottles visible through a doorway, drinking, smoking, and spitting by turns. The farm laborers trudged away from such meetings with pockets as light as their wits are heavy, and the mill hands go back to their cabins and shingle-blocks with something like band-saws buzzing in their heads. But what then? That's better than sermons and psalms after a week of weary toil, isn't it?

Mr. Angeun, having a contemplative, quiet-loving soul, got himself up and away early from these scenes on the morning following his return. He who loves the redwoods knows, very likely, with what dewy benedictions the Sabbath descends to brood in their cathedral-like shadows. Sensitive to these gentle influences, Angeun began to take heart.

"Day by day thoughts of her will be growing less poignant," he said to himself. "I suppose I needed the trial for some wise end."

He was following a narrow beaten path through the trees, and just then he came suddenly upon two white tents, out of which young people were flocking in a tumultuous way that reminded him of little chickens leaving the spreading wings of their mother. For fear of seeming intrusive he beat a hasty retreat, and, bearing down toward the creek, he passed an open-air kitchen and black cook, only to blunder directly upon as pretty a sylvan picture as one could well wish to see.

Just before him, kneeling on the low bank and dipping their bared, white arms down into the eddying water, were two young ladies intent on their morning toilet. Like wild creatures startled in their native haunts, two pairs of bright eyes flashed up in his direction; and one face, glittering with gemmy drops, brightened instantly in recognition.

"Why, as I'm alive," cried a merry voice, "it is Mr. Angeun!"

And as Mr. Angeun was alive, it was the very girl to whom last night he had bade an eternal farewell.

"What an unexpected encounter!" she said, smiling. "Do wait a moment until—Pauline, where have you put the towel?—I want to shake hands."

Which she presently did, and also introduced her companion, Miss Pauline Bayard.

"And pray what is my old friend Mr. Angeun doing at La Honda?"

"My work, Miss Menleith. Your tents are within sound of my school-bell: you see I have come back to my alphabet-blocks."

He would have been more than mortal had he forborne that thrust. Did she remember? A beautiful color, whose coming and going no art can simulate, flushed the young lady's cheeks. But she tossed up her chin coquettishly.

"Since we have met again so happily, Mr. Angeun, I am going to ask you to breakfast."

Of course the man saw his danger, and courteously declined. He did nothing of the sort; but muttered something about being delighted—to which his looks gave emphasis—offered an arm to each wood-nymph, and walked back with them in the direction of the camp. Barely in the mild morning air, they presently clustered around the picturesquely rude table, Mr. Angeun close by Miss Menleith's side—nobody knew by what happy accident. A stray sunbeam, fallen down through the leaves overhead, struck out a bronze gleam along the waves of her hair; and then, as she glanced up at him in her pretty, mischievous way, how it would dart into her eyes, to sparkle and spin in them as it might in a clear bit of water—those frank, innocent eyes, with nothing but truth in their depths!

"Where did you pick up his acquaintance, Leslie?" asked Grace Barstow, as they talked Mr. Angeun over, girl-fashion, upon the first opportunity.

"You needn't laugh; he's a right good old fellow," answered Miss Menleith in a spirit of championship, "and deserves better luck than he's had. His father was the worst of the worst—a drunken creature, hanging like a millstone around Mr. Angeun's neck. The eldest son, Mr. Angeun, was obliged to work at a trade to support his mother and brothers. Relieved of these cares, he went on struggling ever so long before he could afford a year or two schooling. We were at the University together. Funny, wasn't it, for a bearded man and a girl like me to be class-mates?"

"Rather pathetic, I should say, when one considers what lay back of it," exclaimed Miss Bayard.

"Well, we both gave up about the same time. I, from disinclination to study, and he to earn his own living."

These campers made quite a stir in the neighborhood, dashing hither and thither on horseback or in their gay little wagons, starting quiet folks with their picturesque costumes. Leslie Menleith, in her tall, pointed hat, with its saucy knot of cardinal ribbon, her short velvet skirt and deep-tinted red stockings, was not the least conspicuous and admired.

In picnic-days one's heart should be as open as out-of-door life to all unstudied influence. With a long summer-week of freedom and pleasure before one, how can one think of the to-morrow of conventionalities, of impossibilities? Not Angeun.

Nor Miss Menleith, apparently, for she did not hesitate to invite the insignificant school-teacher to join them in their rambles and excursions.

There was this in Mr. Angeun's favor, that, setting aside old Mr. Pettigrew and a few half-grown brothers whom these saucy girls had dubbed "under-done beaux," the little camp boasted of no other gentlemen. Young ladies of experience in such matters will bear me out in this: that if a masculine escort has any value in town the country will double or treble it. Why, even a stupid fellow, if he has a pleasant knack of helping one over a fence or a brook, and a commendable zeal for the fulfilling of feminine whims, may come to be thought almost a genius at a distance from street cars and sidewalks.

On the Fourth of July evening, La Honda had its open-air dance. The platform was built down under the trees opposite the hotel, and hundreds of people had come miles to jostle each other about to the music of two squeaking fiddles. All day long dust-covered wagons had been bringing in their human loads; country girls, with their fresh, cheerful faces, and bright, simple dresses; and women from mountain cabins far away, so queer, so uncouth, that one might fancy them newly fallen down from some burnt-out star.

The little store did a brisk trade in fire-works, and a brisker in fire-water; and by dusk the merriment was loud and wild.

The campers had turned out in full force to look on at the unusual scene, made weird and unearthly by the lurid light of bonfires glancing against the sombre shadows of the trees, and almost putting out the dull steady glow of the Chinese lanterns with their chrysalis shape and butterfly colors.

Suddenly Mrs. Pettigrew missed Leslie Menleith from their number.

"Where is she, Pauline?" she inquired.

"With Mr. Angeun, I presume," returned Miss Bayard, dryly.

"That girl is carrying this thing too far," growled old Mrs. Pettigrew. "She's hooked that fellow through his gills or I am no judge of signs. Catch me acting major-domo to a pack of unconscionable flirts again!"

"Don't put me in the list, if you please," said Pauline, sweetly.

"Why? Because you have found no susceptible victim. You girls are all alike! But let me tell you that playing with love is very like angling: sport at one end of the line and agony at the other."

Leslie Menleith was in Mr. Angeun's company; more than that she was clinging to his arm with a confiding air. Presently a rough-looking man approached her.

"Do come and hop around with me, Miss," said he.

"The young lady is not dancing," Angeun hastened to reply.

"Thank you!" she exclaimed as her would-be partner turned away. "What an odd person! I do believe that some of these queer men grow from acorns out in the woods. Did you ever see such knotted and gnarled hands?"

"It is hard work does that, Miss Leslie," replied Mr. Angeun, gently.

After their many talks and walks together this young creature had led him to expect her ready sympathy. These were delightful moments, even, when he utterly forgot the rough beard like a tuft of yellow stubble on his chin, and the days of the years that separated them in age were no more to him than to the green flourishing tree the dead leaves it sent down stream in a past season.

"You life is not so hard now," Leslie said, softly.

"Not so hard. Still it is contracted and lonely. When two white tents I know of have taken unto themselves wings—"

"Oh, dear, how tiresomely noisy it is!" interrupted Miss Menleith. "I believe I am getting a headache. I am sure it is far nicer down by the creek yonder."

It was nice. The sound of dance-music, the outbursts of song, were subdued, almost poetic. And Miss Menleith and Angeun walked close together. A thrice happy evening for him! Never had Leslie Menleith been so gentle, so kind.

Seeing her home to the tents, how think you the brook was crossed? Not by the stepping-stones, the fallen tree, nor the bridge; for in the dark they missed all three, nor took pains to find them. Hubert Angeun went back alone, flustered and joyful.

Nobody carried Mrs. Pettigrew over the creek; she tramped across by way of the bridge, in a state of great indignation.

"Look here, Leslie Menleith," she began vigorously, "I wonder what you think of yourself? I am ashamed of you—a girl engaged this three months to be married! I have made up my mind that if you don't stop flirting with that Angeun—you understand; Arthur is expected down on Saturday!"

"Don't threaten," replied Leslie with a light laugh. "I assure you to-night ends that nonsense. It has been terribly stupid!"

On Saturday morning Miss Leslie Menleith and her friends were all perched on the top of the stage when Mr. Angeun came out from his breakfast. She had thrown aside her tall Bohemian felt, and wore a seaside hat, like a circle of sunshine lined with a bit of the sky, and so large that it drooped to her shoulders like the sky to the hills. Mr. Angeun thought she had never looked so modest and lovely. He hastened to speak to her.

"We are off to Pescadero," she said, "where we hope to meet some of our party and bring them back with us to-night."

Angeun could wait—yet his whole soul longed for his next opportunity to see Leslie alone. After that sweet, thrilling moment when, lifting her over the shallow, swift-flowing water, her head had been on his shoulder, how could he doubt. He did not. He dared love her, and link her sweet name in his dreams. She had given him the right.

Dashing through the cañon, thundering over the bridges, swaying as it hastily rounds the curve, rattling up the slope, home comes the stage from Pescadero, crowded outside and inside with its laughing, joyous, pleasure-seeking freight. Golden clouds tinted with the sunset float over the redwoods, and shining down touch the bronze hair and light up the laughing face of Leslie Menleith—for she has taken off her broad hat and lets it swing on her arm.

Mr. Angeun hastily advances to lend her a helping hand. She does not need it. A young gentleman has gallantly sprung from his place beside her to the porch, and turns to put up his arms: "Come, Leslie!" She looks down into a bright, youthful, handsome face; then discovers just beyond, Angeun's, with something of agitation and question in it. And directly she is down, there is the school-teacher putting out his hand and trying to smile.

"You have enjoyed your trip?" he asks with palpable over-interest.

"Oh, delightful!" she replies, with one of her coquettish head-tossings, "for Mr. Arthur Wilton was with us." Here she gives Angeun a cool little nod, takes Mr. Arthur Wilton's arm and marches away.

The tall, slim, growing trees had never seemed so clearly to have their one potent mission of Godward pointing as when Angeun took refuge that night in their darkness. Songs floated up from the merry camp-fire down in the hollow, but the man would neither look nor listen that way. On high there were clear fires, that glowed and sparkled with sublime meaning because of the quenching of a poor earthly flame.

E. M. LUDLUM.

SAN FRANCISCO, November 20, 1878.

Society Women.

There are moralists of a certain sort that delight to speak censoriously of what they call "society women." They are called "worldly," devoted to dress and to social pleasures, and it is not unfrequently hinted that they have worn off the bloom of modesty that is the great charm of womanhood. They are nearly always represented as idle and given up to frivolity and fashion. Now this is often a vast mistake. In the first place a true society woman cannot be indolent. There is a vast deal of hard work involved in keeping a stylish house and making it look attractive. Ladies who aspire to a leading position in society have a truly laborious life. They have an immense amount of mere duty-visiting to do, and a large quantity of duty-receiving. They must be thoughtful of everybody, must have the sort of knowledge and tact that can carry incongruous companies over awkward situations. Not only must a society woman do a great deal of work, but she must have a certain amount of natural kindness. Winning manners are rarely artificial. Those traits which make a woman attractive to all those who are in contact with her are nine times out of ten genuine. This is proven by the fact that the so-called society ladies are usually the leaders in benevolent enterprises of all kinds. The ladies whose natural elements appear to be luxurious drawing-rooms are those who often work hardest in disinterested charities. But this is only a small part of the good that they do. Their kindest deeds are those that the world knows nothing of. It is thus that certain moralists judge them so severely. They do not know their better and gentler natures. These censors fix their attention on the single fact that society ladies are fond of company, of balls and dinner parties, of drives in the park, and stalls at the opera; they do not know, or want to know, that they are also often the most devoted mothers, the most attentive and helpful wives, the most faithful friends, and not unfrequently the most conscientious Christians. So far as our observation has extended, we are satisfied that society ladies do a great deal of very hard and thankless work, and give up a great deal of their time to make others happy; and in effect do more to brighten the pathway through this vale of tears than many of the over-righteous who condemn them.—Every Saturday.

Bill of Fare for Six Persons.—Sunday, December 1st, 1878.

Mock Turtle Soup.
Fried Skates. Mashed Potatoes.
Broiled Beefsteak.
Asparagus. Green Peas.
Roast Mallard Ducks. Currant Jelly.
French Artichokes.
Raspberries. Ice Cream. Fancy Cakes.
Fruit-bowl of Figs, Apples, Grapes, Oranges (in sections), and Pears.

TO MAKE MOCK TURTLE SOUP.—Take four calf's feet; boil in three pints of water until very tender; remove the meat from the bones; strain the liquor; add one pint beef gravy and two glasses madeira or claret wine; season with salt, cayenne pepper, allspice, and thinly sliced lemon. Cut some of the pieces of the feet in small squares and the yolks of six eggs; also, six force-meat balls. Just before serving add half a cup of butter rubbed in a little flour, just enough to thicken.

If too troublesome to prepare at home, you may purchase at Leberbaum's one can of mock turtle soup, to which add one pint of beef stock and the above seasonings, and you will have a delicious soup.

The highest exercise of charity is charity toward the uncharitable.

INTAGLIOS.

Church in a Glade.

This poplar-tree shall be our priest;
An incensed air around is shed;
The fragrance wafts from west to east
Of clover-fields unharvested.

Listen! no music wanteth here;
For song of bird or hum of bee
Carol and murmur through the clear
Nave of the wood's immensity.

And down the laureled aisles, a path
That points to where the garden lies,
Shall be what our cathedral hath
To lead our thoughts to Paradise.

Who catch, as in their sparkling strife
The fountains fall, in crescent rings,
Some symbol of the higher life
That reaches into heavenly things.

Wm. M. HARDINGE.

Wie der Mond sich leuchtend drangt.

As the moon through clouds that darkle
Flashes forth with sudden light,
So through darkling memories rises
On my soul a vision bright.

On the deck we all were seated,
Gayly down the Rhine we go,
And the meadows, green with summer,
In the evening sunshine glow.

At a lady's feet I laid me;
Fair she was and full of grace;
Rosy golden gleams of sunshine
Played upon her sweet, pale face.

Oh, how gay we were, how happy!
Lute and voice made music rare;
Dearer was the sky; the spirit
Seemed as it were winged on air.

Hill and castle, wood and meadow,
Swept along in fairy wise;
And the whole scene, I believed it
Mirrored in that lady's eyes.

HEINE.

"So Wand' Ich Wieder Den Alten Weg."

So again I am pacing the well-known streets,
The road I so oft have taken;
I come to the house where my darling dwelt—
How blank it looks and forsaken!

The streets are too narrow, they shut me in!
The very stones of them scare me!
The houses fall on my head, I fly
As fast as my feet can bear me.

HEINE.

Barberries.

In scarlet clusters o'er the gray stone-wall
The barberries lean in thin Autumnal air;
Just when the fields and garden-plots are bare,
And ere the green leaf takes the tint of Fall,
They come to make the age a festival!
Along the road for miles their torches flare—
Ah, if your deep-sea coral were but rare
(The damask rose might envy it withal),
(What birds had sung your praises long ago,
Called you fine names in honey-wedded books—
The rosy tramps of turnpike and of lane,
September's blushes, Ceres' lips aglow,
Little Red Riding-hoods, for your sweet looks—
But your plebeian beauty is in vain.

T. B. ALDRICH.

Landscape.—Twilight.

Gaunt shadows stretch along the hill;
Cold clouds drift slowly west;
Soft flocks of vagrant snow-lakes fill
The redwing's empty nest.

By sunken reefs the hoarse sea roars;
Above the shelling sands
Like skeletons the scyomeres
Uplift their wasted hands.

The air is full of hints of grief,
Strange voices touched with pain—
The pathos of the falling leaf
And rustling of the rain.

In yonder cottage shines a light,
Far-gleaming like a gem—
Not fairer to the Rabbin's sight
Was star of Bethlehem!

T. B. ALDRICH.

At the Theatre.

On the stage an acted horror,
A king crime-haunted to death;
Around me glitter and glare,
And fans that harry an air

That stifles me breath by breath;
And eyes all one way gazing
On the magical master-player,
Whose face, chameleon-wise,
Reflects all moods that arise—

Craft, crime, and credulous prayer.
I gaze, and listen—but sudden
I dream in midst of the play;
And the king may threaten or whine,
It seems no matter of mine—

I am twenty miles away.

Down in a mossy dingle,
Where sinless, a stranger to pain,
And friend to all winds that blow,
And hearing the fresh herbs grow,
And feeling the dew or the rain,

A slight wind-flower is hiding,
Green-scarfed, white-faced as the snow;
The young year's earliest child,
That I found last morn growing wild
And spoke with, and left it to grow.

—Spectator.

Carcamon.

His steed was old, his armor worn,
And he was old, and worn, and gray;
The light that lit his patient eyes
It shone from far away.

Through gay Provence he journeyed on;
To one high quest his life was true,
And so they called him Carcamon—
The Knight who seeketh the world through.

A pansy blossomed on his shield;
"A token 'tis," the people say,
"That still across the world's wide field
He seeks la dame des pensees."

To scorn the promise of the real;
To seek and seek and never find;
Yet cherish still the fair ideal—
It is thy fate, O restless mind!

HENRY A. BEERS.

Imperfection.

When comes the old, silent charm, whose tender stress
Has many a mother patiently beguiled
To leave her rosier children and caress
The white brow of the frail, misshapen child?

Ah, whence the mightier charm that, age by age,
Has lured so many a man through spells unknown,
To serve for years, in reverent vassalage,
A beauteous bosom with a heart of stone!

EDGAR FAWCETT.

THE FORMAL FATHER.

Mr. Alfred Ethelridge is bashful; he does not deny it. He wishes he wasn't, sometimes. But wishing doesn't seem to help his case much. Every body in Burlington likes him, except the father of a young lady out on Pond street. With an instinctive knowledge of this old gentleman's feelings, Alfred had forborne to aggravate them, and kept out of the father's way as much as possible, atoning for this apparent neglect by seeing the daughter twice as often. The other afternoon Alfred went up the steps and rang the bell. The door opened, and—

Papa stood glaring at him, looking a thousand things and saying nothing.

Alfred Ethelridge had never felt quite so lost for language in his life. Presently he stood on one foot and remarked:

"Good afternoon!"

"Goodnooh," grunted papa, which is, by interpretation, also good afternoon.

"Is—ah—is—er—Miss Lollipop—is your daughter at home?" asked Alfred, standing on the other foot.

"Yes, sir," said papa, rather more shortly than Alfred thought was absolutely necessary. Then nobody said anything for a long time. Presently Alfred Ethelridge stood on both feet and asked:

"Is she in?"

"Yes, sir," said papa, not budging a step from his position in the door, and looking as though he was dealing with a book-agent instead of one of the nicest young men in Burlington. Then Alfred Ethelridge stood on the right foot and said:

"Does she—can she receive company?"

"Yes, sir," papa said, savagely, not at all melted by the pleading intonation of Alfred's voice, which everybody else thought was so irresistibly sweet. Then Alfred Ethelridge stood on his left foot and said:

"Is she at home?"

"Yes, sir," papa said, kind of coldly.

Alfred Ethelridge looked down the street and sighed, then he looked up at papa and shivered. Then he stood on the right foot and said:

"Is she in?"

"Yes, sir," papa said, grimly, and never taking his eyes off the young man's uneasy face.

Alfred Ethelridge sighed and looked up the street; then he stood on his left foot and looked at papa's knees, and said, timidly and in tremulous tones:

"Can she see me?"

"Yes, sir," papa said, but he never moved, and he never looked pleasant. He only stood still and repeated a second time: "Yes, sir."

Alfred Ethelridge began to feel ill. He looked up and down the street, and finally pinned his wandering gaze to the bald spot on the top of papa's head; then he said:

"Will you please tell her that Mr. Alfred Ethelridge called?"

"Yes, sir," said papa, and he didn't say any more. And somehow or other Alfred Ethelridge kind of sort of got down off the porch and went kind of out of the gate like. He discontinued his visits there, and explained to a friend that the old man didn't say anything that wasn't all right and cordial enough, but the manner of him was rather formal.

R. BURDETTE.

The Last Fly.

The last fly is hovering on the verge of the grave. Gone to him are the joys of gladsummer time, the sweets of the noonday meal, the morning ditto, the evening likewise. He is all doubled up with pleurisy. Faded and gone are the friends of his youth, and the sad sounds that echo and reecho through the forsaken galleries of his memory are fraught with dismal melancholy. Some of them have fallen before the fury of the irate housewife; many have found resting places in the butter, the sauce, the cup of tea; while hosts have dropped with the cold, cold frosts. And the last fly ponders reflectively upon the bright and happy days now long since. He sees himself a sportive youngster, careless of the frown of elders, frolicking in the warm sunlight, with no thought of the future. He beholds himself, a little older, a little more sedate, laying sharp plans for his meals; he reflects upon his numerous escapes from the treacherous butter, the deceitful pan of milk, the deadly cup of tea, and, worst of all, the murderous sticky paper and the destructive red-faced woman with a towel. A dreadful pain in his side makes him stop for breath. Oh, what a blessed thing is memory! Oh, the delightful scenes of bygone happy hours it treasures in his mind. Oh, how he dwells upon the gay sunshine of summer time, the warm breezes, the fragrant flowers. Oh, how he—oh, what a dreadful twinge of rheumatism, driving him nearly wild. And it is all past now. The last fly draws his fore leg sadly across his eyes, wiping away the unbidden tear. There is no friend near to receive a dying message, to minister a word of comfort to a soul hovering on the brink of the dark, undefinable. A feeling of faintness comes over him, a dark film gathers before his sight; his legs grow weak—he totters wildly. Whoop! bang! The last fly is a brilliant decoration on the wall.

Here is something about the wines which we do not get as the restaurants and hotels. Lachrymæ Christi is sipped by travelers at Naples, but few flasks find their way far from their native slopes of Vesuvius. The white wine of Jurançon, sacred to the memory of the kings of Navarre, and always loved by Henry the Fourth of France, can not be bought. Every drop is bespoken years before by far-sighted Legation consumers. It is hard, even at Vienna or Presburg, to buy one of those quaint bottles of white glass and bulbous shape that holds an imperial pint of imperial Tokay. It is dearer, bulk for bulk, than any wine in the world. It is almost as strong as French brandy, almost as substantial as syrup, and is, in fact, only a superior raisin wine, luscious and cloying. But it is a Porphyrogenite, born to grandeur. Those who grow the grapes are princes, whose Hungarian territories are administered by prefects and councils, and those who buy the wonderful wines are kings and kaisers, whose august demands leave only a handful of flasks to be scrambled for by the outside public. So, in a less degree, with Prince Metternich's Cabinet Johannisberg, monarch of Rhine wines, the best of which scorns to find purchasers not commemorated in the Almanach de Gotha, but pseudo specimens of which, at about eight dollars a bottle, are to be had at Rhinecland hotels and Paris restaurants, in quantities that would make a thoughtful man marvel at the fertility of the few stony acres of the historical vineyard.

A pretty girl down East is a "mind reader." She said to a bashful beau the other night: "Ha! I believe you are going to kiss me!" She was right.

A CURE FOR SLANDER.

The following very homely but singularly instructive lesson is by St. Philip Neri: A lady presented herself to him one day, accusing herself of being given to slander. "Do you frequently fall into this fault?" inquired the saint. "Yes, father, very often," replied the penitent. "My dear child," said the saint, "your fault is great, but Mercy is still greater. For your penance, do as follows: Go to the nearest market, purchase a chicken just killed and well covered with feathers; you will then walk to a certain distance, plucking the bird as you go along; your walk finished, you will return to me." Great was the astonishment of the lady in receiving so strange a penance; but, silencing all human reasoning, she replied: "I will obey, father; I will obey." Accordingly, she repaired to the market, bought the fowl, and set out on her journey, plucking it as she went along, as she had been ordered. In a short time she returned anxious to tell of her exactness in accomplishing her penance, and desirous to receive some explanation of one so singular. "Ah," said the saint, "you have been very faithful to the first part of my orders; now do the second part, and you will be cured. Retrace your steps, pass through all the places you have already traversed, and gather up, one by one, all the feathers you have scattered." "But, father," exclaimed the poor woman, "that is impossible. I cast the feathers carelessly on every side; the wind carried them in different directions; how can I now recover them?" "Well, my child," replied the saint, "so it is with your words of slander. Like the feathers which the wind has scattered, they have been wafted in many directions; call them back if you can. Go, and sin no more." History does not tell if the lady was converted, but it is probable. It required a saint to give the lesson; one would be a fool not to profit by it.

Adoring the Prince of Peace.

An English gentleman, who has lately traveled in Palestine, recently gave a description of the curious scenes that are enacted in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. He said when you first entered the church you would be surprised to see a party of soldiers with their swords by their sides, and their guns stacked within reach. It seemed a sacrilege in such a holy place, and struck one rather unpleasantly; but he soon found out the necessity for it. According to the laws of the country, every sect is allowed to worship there, and as it is considered equally sacred both by Christians and Mahomedans, all wish a time for their mode of worship.

The law allows them an hour each. They commence at six in the morning. At that hour those who have the first privilege enter, bringing with them whatever is necessary to conduct their particular religious rites. They go through their prayers and chants, and all is very quiet till about a quarter to seven, when those who have the privilege of the next hour begin to arrive.

At first all is decorum, but presently the new comers begin to hiss and mock. As their numbers increase, and they become stronger, they push and crowd, and as the time lessens they get more and more bold. A few minutes before seven they proceed to more forcible demonstrations. They think if they can clear out these blasphemers a few minutes before the time they have done so much good work, while the worshiper, on the other hand, think if they can keep possession a few minutes after the time they have done an equally good work.

As some of the sects use torches, wax candles, staves, or crooks, in their worship, they proceed to use them as weapons of offense or defense, and a free fight ensues. Then come in the soldiers, who separate the combatants by filing in between them, turning out those whose hour is up, and leaving the place in the possession of the last comers. If blood is shed the church is closed for the day. Such scenes are occurring all day long, and the presence of soldiers is absolutely necessary.

A farmer in a village near Frankenburg, Austria, whose cabbage garden suffered greatly from the depredations of hares, hit on a plan of revenging himself, without transgressing the law by either shooting or catching the thieves. He cleared the garden of all cabbages but one, in which he made a hole and filled it with snuff. Round the cabbage he placed a number of stones to facilitate operations. In due time a number of hares appeared on the scene and addressed themselves to the hoicessed cabbage, the contents of which soon had the effect of making them sneeze frightfully, knocking their heads against the stones.

A wag being invited to a little dinner given by a stingy but pious old gentleman, on being asked to say grace, looked meaningfully around the meagre board and muttered: "For what we are about to receive make us correspondingly thankful." The stingy host took the hint, and more than one kind of wine graced the board.

The willow which bends to the tempest often escapes better than the oak, which resists it; and so, in great calamities, it sometimes happens that light and frivolous spirits recover their elasticity and presence of mind sooner than those of a loftier character.—Walter Scott.

"Mother, what is an angel?" "An angel? Well, an angel is a child that flies." "But, mother, why does papa always call my governess an angel?" "Well," explained the mother, after a moment's pause, "she is going to fly immediately."

Jonathan—"There's a sleigh, I guess." John Bull—"You shouldn't say I guess, you know." Jonathan—"But you say, you know, I guess." John Bull—"But if I say you know, you say I guess, you know, but I don't say you know, you know."

"Do you say your prayers regularly every night and morning?" asked a sympathetic lady of a little shoe-black, to whom she had just given a trifle. "I alluz sez 'um at night, mum, but any smart boy can take care of hisself in the daytime."

A timid Bostonian has married a young lady whose weight verges closely upon two hundred pounds. "My dear," says he to her, "shall I help you over the fence?" "No," says she to him, "help the fence."

Brother Beecher now says that the ten commandments belong to a barbaric age. Suppose they do; is that the reason why he should go about picking out the easiest ones to break?

TO-DAY, OUR GREAT CHRISTMAS OPENING.

THE FINEST EXHIBITION OF

HOLIDAY GOODS

Ever shown in the city, comprising everything new in Holiday Books, Stationery, Russia Goods, etc., etc., can now be seen at

BANCROFT'S
721 MARKET ST. S.F.

OPEN EVENINGS.

THOMAS BOYSON, M. D.

(University of Copenhagen, Denmark),

PHYSICIAN AND SURGEON. Office

and Residence, 112 Kearny Street. Office hours, 11 A. M. to 1 P. M., 6 to 8 P. M. Sunday 11 to 1 only. Telephone in the office.

KURRACHEE RUGS!

ASK FOR THEM IN THE LEADing Carpet Stores. Manufactured by

WAKEFIELD RATTAN CO.,
38 Geary Street.

CALIFORNIA ROOT TEA.

My family use California Root Tea, and find it the best and cheapest medicinal preparation they have ever had. It is a natural remedy, not a nostrum.

BUTTERICK'S

PATTERNS--DEC. STYLES.

Send stamp for catalogue. AGENCY, 124 POST ST.,
San Francisco.

HEALD'S BUSINESS COLLEGE,
No. 24 Post Street,
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
Opposite Mechanics' Institute.

IMPARTS A THOROUGH PRACTIcal Education in all Commercial and English Branches French, German, Spanish, Drawing, and Telegraphy. This school having greater facilities, and enjoying a more extensive patronage than any similar institution on the Pacific coast, continues to base its claims for recognition and patronage upon the good sense and enlightened judgment of the public.

LIST OF FACULTY.
E. P. Heald, F. C. Woodbury,
H. M. Stearns, A. B. Capp,
Mrs. C. Woodbury, T. R. Southern,
J. A. Chesnutwood, Mrs. W. J. Hamilton,
A. P. Duffie, F. Sereno,
R. Sorcini, Geo. Jebens,
Lloyd Baldwin, A. Vander Nalven.
For full particulars, call at the College, 24 Post Street,
or address E. P. HEALD,
President Business College, San Francisco.

ARMY AND NAVY GOODS, REGALIA AND LODGE SUPPLIES.

A. J. PLATE & CO.,

No. 510 SACRAMENTO STREET.

J. J. BIRGE, DENTIST, 313 Kearny Street.

R. C. MOWBRAY, M. D., DENTIST
224 STOCKTON ST., corner Post, S. F.

PRINTER
CLAY ST. CORNER S.F.

SAN FRANCISCO, November 28, 1878.

MY DEAREST MIDGE.—Do you remember the time we read the old play of John Shore together? We dispensed our opinions with that autocratic recklessness which distinguishes the female sex, when we called it a poky, disagreeable affair, and closed the book with a snap—that is, if you can snap a mean, little, yellow pamphlet. I do not think now that we were far wrong, for I have a dim recollection of having seen Mrs. Bowers drag through that version one desolate Saturday night—an old night. But the version which they play at the California is quite different, and I fancy I could read it with keen pleasure; for what struck me most in the entire performance was the poetical beauty of the text. I observed, however, that all the thees and thous, the nimes and thines, could not make Miss Cavendish seem to belong to the olden time. She is essentially and thoroughly modern, with that impregnable British modernness which neither text nor costume can ever overcome. And yet she played beautifully. She is one of those actresses over whom you and I always disagree; and I must confess, dear Midge, that nightly the people around me distribute your opinions with a lavish profusion which quite irritates me, until my turn comes, as it surely does when she rouses now and then. I was going to say she has no voice; that is, no strength of voice—she is so addicted to the use of the little, English trill. But she has a full, round, organ tone when she chooses to let it out. Pardon even the report of the slang, Midge, but Jack quite paralyzed me with horror by adverting her in an undertone the other night, for "heaven's sake, to sing it." Propitious fate made his petition unheard, and there was nothing but a subdued growl to tell of the awful profanation in seat 650, or whatever number it was. The opening scene reminds one somewhat of the engraving of Dorcas giving alms. "Jane Shore's" toilet, however, is something different. It was in pink and mauve, I think, and with just enough silver to give point to the speech of the faded spangles. Miss Cavendish never wears a very long train, and always wears a very long sleeve. In fact, I began to think her arms must be tattooed, she covered them so persistently, until I saw her in the penitential sheet. Then I understood. She is right. I mention the costume mainly because when it is worn "Jane Shore" is in the plenitude of her power and prosperity, and you always want to know about the handsome fallals of the toilet. But she is not a dresser. Two costumes which she wore afterward—the one of pale mauve and purple cashmere combined, and the other an invalid's toilet of light blue and white—were more characteristic and more becoming. "Elizabeth, of York," in the person of Miss Marie Prescott, bursts in upon this scene to find "Jane Shore" caressing the young Prince. How the dramatists do love to bring together two women who hate each other. When they get two men together who entertain these amiable feelings it is easy enough to dispose of them. They want to fight; that is all there is about that. But the women want to call each other names, and it must be done dramatically. They never do it dramatically in real life. They employ either a cold and cutting politeness, which is quite useless for any possible stage effect, or a style of language, even in high life, which would be rather electrifying as coming across the footlights. Miss Prescott is not a remarkable actress, but, fortunately, she does not rant, and although one would scarcely cavil at Edward's taste, sympathy goes with her, for all "Jane Shore's" gentleness. The interview closes by the King selecting this singularly apposite time to die, and the Queen is obliged to leave and look after things. Miss Prescott illuminated the stage on this occasion with a vermillion silk, which would have been simply frightful if she had not happened to avert attention by acting rather well. "John Grist," is abandoned at last by all excepting "John Grist," a gentleman who rejoices in a good trade, an euphonic name, and a very big voice. It was very funny to see people get swearing loud at Miss Cavendish because she would not speak loud enough, and close their ears to deiden Mr. Bassett's roar. "John Grist" very considerably takes her to her husband when she has no where else to go, and she is magnanimously willing to take back the home ranch, together with all the "dips, spurs, and angles pertaining thereto." She is very artistic in the interview with her husband—pathetic, womanly, soft. So is Mr. Barton Hill—artistically I mean, not womanly and soft. He seemed pretty well to do for a look-smith, and his home looked very inviting; but the entire play was so handsomely mounted, and the snow scene inspired. I never saw such reckless expenditure in the matter of white paper. Down, down it came, in reams and quires, and quires and reams, till the curtain fell on a blinding snow storm with a very impressive tableau defined through its flakes. Poor "Jane Shore," with her penitential sheet in tatters, wandering about begging for food, had a pretty hard time of it. I have come to the conclusion, upon reflection, that hunger must be the worst trouble in the world. We can see a fellow-being overwhelmed with every misfortune, and we may or may not extend him a passing sympathy. But no one sees one hungry without acutely realizing their distress and without attempting to relieve them. Hunger is not the noblest instinct of our natures but it is the strongest. I do not think that all I have ever read of adventures by Hood and Mill, all the vamps spun about Lick-Donner—nay, not even the "Pine of the Anant Manner"—itself—ever made me real, or how downright hungry one can get in I saw "Jane Shore" gasping at "John Grist's" feet and begging for food. She crawled up the steps like a wild animal, and seizing the loaf tore it apart like one. I shall not soon forget the really awful picture she made of sitting there in her rage in the blinding snow, weakened and exhausted, and being like a wild thing of the plains. The soldiers of Gloster seek to kill her, and "Henry Shore" comes to the rescue. I have done long before. I was quite wrought up till "Jack" requested "John Grist" to pass the butter to her, and sardonically intimated that he did not consider it a square meal anyhow. He thought she ought to have had several dozen of Blue Point oysters. But a good deal had been invested in white paper, and we must draw a line somewhere. Of course, everything ends all right. "Jane" is taken home, put up in the big arm chair, with gmel and all sorts of nice things at her elbow. "Henry Shore" makes up, and the green curtain falls on a happy mother with her child in her arms. Ada Cavendish carries a child so prettily, a little thing which so few actresses do naturally and well. She has a hundred graces of attitude. In fact, this is the sort of thing in which she excels rather than in declamatory force or facial expression, and perhaps that is why she has been better liked in "Jane Shore" than in "Mersey Merrick," for poor "Jane" gets into a heap of trouble, and has an infinity of denouncing, deying, and imploring to do. Mr. Hook took the part of that amiable gentleman the "Duke of Gloster." He looked like Edwin Adams—remembered for a few moments, an illusion which was heightened by the deeper tones of his voice, but the resemblance faded as he remained on the stage. Like Mr. Bassett, he was too deeply conscious of the magnitude of his task to carry it off well, so I suppose they both improved afterward. I went to Baldwin's to see Rose Wood in A Woman of the People, and encountered more snow and more cradles. I can get up a very respectable amount of agitation over a child old enough to toddle and hsp, and make it self seen and heard upon the stage, but I refuse to be worked upon any more by a plaid shawl with a rag doll inside. In the first place they always handle it with a grip which would jam it to the similitude of a wafer if it were real, and, in the second place, it makes the agony a travesty every time that one reflects that it is simply a bundle from the rag bag. I got over my rag doll sorrows centuries ago, and I feel that it is a little late to begin again. I will take sham moans and sham water, sham diamonds, and a few sham actors in the lesser parts, but I do think they might have a sure-enough baby in "A Woman of the People." Rose Wood has got a touch of the Morris lucy. I observe that all the great ones leave their mark upon the stage for some months. I am quite certain that if Rose Wood were new to us—and if the play were in any sense a pleasant one, she would have created a sensation as "Marie." Poor little woman, how conscientiously she works with a part, and how narrowly she escapes being almost great sometimes! I like her best in comedy, however. Lewis Morrison as "Appiani" strikes me as being the original of the little ventriloquist's smoked Italian. He is very dark and very villainous, and, altogether, he plays it remarkably well; but the house was dimly empty, and you know one never enjoys anything under such circumstances. I scarcely even appreciated the scenery, which in the first and third acts was really something worth seeing. But the house will fill up again, for Clara Morris reappears as "Jane Eyre," and the ushers will have a big house on Sunday night. On Monday the California dramatist once more presents his claims to a coldly critical and heartless world, of which more anon. They are having all the fun down on Bush Street. That naughty Marjolaine, the opera, not the girl, for she is rather a clever little party—is very attractive. Mr. Beverly continues to look like a guy in a most abnormally thick wig, and to sing rather well. It would be a perfect treat to me to see that man as bald as an eagle he is so persistent in making himself look his worst. Mrs. Oates looks to be the merest dot of a creature beside him, and I momentarily expected to see him swing her up on his shoulder he was obliged to bend so far to catch the accord. The adieu song is becoming very popular, but is not rehearsed in drawing rooms with all the business, although it is nothing but the convent kiss, one on each cheek. Mrs. Oates looks extremely well in red hair and piquant costumes. She has recovered some of her notes. Miss Lulu Stevens' self-possession is not half so attractive as was her extreme timidity. Dear me! "I can almost read a critique advising Miss Stevens to subdue her style. She does not need much advice yet, but the bashfulness is all gone. It would not matter if she caught the grace of stage experience in its stead. I went up street the other night just as the people were coming out of the Bush Street Theatre, and every blessed one I met was cuckooing at such a rate that I thought cuckoo bedlam was let loose. The cuckoo duet in the opera itself is charming, but as no one catches much beside the cuckoo it becomes a little tame when you hear three or four hundred people sing it. I was quite relieved when some man started an opposition and informed me in a shrill whistle that the "Man in the moon was looking." He had been across the way where Marian Singer gives this pretty ditty in a white dress with diamond buttons, something a la Lady Macbeth. Ella Chapman as one of the naughty babes has an awfully jolly time of it. She dresses it like a little tot of four years, and Willie Edouin dresses and acts like an imp—a small male imp of six. They have sung a lot of pretty melodies together and Miss Searies introduces her best songs—to-night one, to-morrow another, as the spirit moves her. It is a pity they must go in the midst of their success, but needs must. Pretty Belle Chapman has joined the troupe, so that it is quite Californian in its elements, what with Willie Edouin, Lewis Harrison, etc. Josh Hart comes next week with a variety company, which sends the burlesque troupe into the interior. That has a very foreboding sound, but people love to laugh, even, I suppose, in the interior, although they do not look like very jolly dogs when they come to town. They will have something to laugh at, though it be only the donkey. By-bye.

TOLD IN LETTERS.

My DEAR EM:—How the doll matinee at Ackerman's last Saturday, did take me back to childhood's days, when you and I thought ourselves rich in the possession of a broken-nosed specimen of inanimate toyhood apiece! It is really wonderful, the improvement in all manner of toys since then, and it is not so very long ago either. Of course the dolls were the great attraction. They say there were at least three thousand on exhibition, and such dolls! The youngsters won't see another such sight in many a day. Ranging in size from tiny mites no bigger than an agate stone on the forefinger of an alderman, to blue, brown, and black-eyed darlings as large as children of four and five years, there were many of them so lifelike that I wanted to pinch them to make sure they weren't real flesh and blood babies hanging at those perilous heights along the walls, and up and down every available pillar, robed only in the garment of innocence, the forerunner of the now famous

"chemiloon." I felt a positive itching of my thimble finger, too, to go to work making doll clothes once more—those big beauties would dress so splendidly. Would you believe it, the very large ones were some of them only eleven dollars? Doctor Ackerman tells me the heads are made in Austria and Germany, where toy making of all kinds, you know, is one of the great industries, and the bodies in France. You never saw more perfect chevelures done up in the most approved "bangs," crimps, and Montague locks, and surmounted by the cutest a baby caps; eyes, too, that follow one everywhere, shaded by cunning lashes, and real, real, REAL teeth between the smiling lips, as one dear little dot beside me exclaimed with a cumulative inflection only equalled by Cavendish's "enamour, L'EXEMOT" dog, in Hugo's "Miserables." And isn't it a pretty idea of the Doctor's to send photographs of his little customers abroad to have duly made exactly like her mummy? I fancy a good many of our lovely San Francisco children will be duplicated more than once as models. The dressed dolls were naturally sought after first. They were all costumed by experienced dressmakers and milliners in Paris, and after the latest fashions. One demoisele wore a dress of stone-colored gros-grain, very much en train, with bands and ruffles of garnet silk, and fingat hat of Italian straw, wreathed with flowers—her bright face shaded by a canopy parasol, and in one hand is an elegant fan. Another is in full ball dress of corn-colored silk, with an avalanche of mille puffs, etc. One of the richest toilets is of sage-green brocade. The make-up of every one is simply perfect; luxs, fans, opera-glasses, vinigrettes—in fact, every variety of the feminine toilet is there. Many of these dolls were already sold, but lest I let the rat out of the bag before the proper time I will mention no names, but be sure no doll goes out of this store that is not adopted into the first families in town. There were whole wardrobes, including shoes, stockings, muffs, boas, broché shawls, dressing cases, containing combs, brushes, etc., in trousseaux, or by the single article, the whole collection looking for all the world like a first-class dry goods establishment seen through the small end of a telescope. I can't describe one hundredth part of this interesting but numerous family, but there were some very funny ones that seemed to tickle the youngsters immensely; we ones, in long clothes, with bottles grasped in their chubby fists and rubber tubes in their mouths; others, that would cry most naturally, tucked up in their bibs, or enjoying their siestas in goat wagons, or wheeled about by comely nurses. There was one beautiful group of this kind, attended by a bonne with the sweetest of faces and a most maternal air. More favored infants sat beside elegantly dressed mothers in grown-up carriages. Twins were not wanting and there were several sets of these remarkably interesting freaks of nature, though strange to say for San Francisco, there wasn't a triplet (or ought they to be triplets with the "a"? ) to be seen. However, Doctor Ackerman will probably supply the omission next year. The swimming doll attracted crowds all day. Since Edison has not thought it beneath his dignity to make toys, ordinary grown folks, I suppose, need not think it beneath theirs to be amused with them, and many of the mechanical ones are wonderful. A hen, perfect in every feature, cackles and clucks, and drops an occasional egg, to the great delight of juvenile students of natural history. One of our Simian ancestors performs on a harp to the inspiring notes of a music bar, on which he stands, keeping his head agoing and his grinning mouth agape the while. Strange, uncouth figures of unmistakable African descent, sprawl and caper, and every variety of oddity in human and brute form gibber in Punch and Judy voices, and gyrate after a fashion that becomes actually unanny after watching them for a few minutes. There are weeks of solid happiness to a child in the pretty farm yards stocked with cows or horses, stout little carts, corn-crisks, racks, whips, and barns, or milking pails and stools, and an important looking driver in carter's dress, or a ruddy milkmaid, just within the gateway. In the same category are the grocery stores with counters, scales, and measures, and a full stock of goods; kitchens provided with genuine stoves, and furnished with rows of shining tins and china on the shelves, cooking utensils of polished brass, tubs, washboards and wringers—I wondered if these last might not be considered infringements on the patent, they were so exact!—pasteboards, and potato-mashers to encourage the gentle art of cooking among maiden housekeepers. Doll houses, with elegant upholstery "up stairs and down stairs, and in my lady's chamber," china dinner sets, hand-painted, silver services, china toilet sets, even to shaving mugs; pianos that look like the great-grandchildren of Mozart's harpsichord, are among the more expensive toys. The locomotive propensities of young San Francisco find full scope in velocipedes, carts, and wagons, with every conceivable propelling power, from woolly dogs that always remind me of dear old Caleb Plummer, to the most realistic of equines. My small escort nearly went into fits over a strongly-built wagon with cushioned seats, and a prancing steed that was to be worked with the feet of the rider and guided by an ingenious contrivance to which the reins were attached. There are, of course, hobby horses of every kind, Noah's ark, and all the standard favorites, besides any number of new and interesting games, in miniature billiards, croquet, lawn tennis, etc. The exhibition has been a delightful episode to the little ones impatiently waiting the revelations of Christmas, and Ackerman's will be looked upon as a possible fairy land. May this be only one of many more, says Your correspondent, LILLIAS DE BOIS.

Mrs. Charles Schroder, of this city, will make her debut at Baldwin's on Monday evening. Ambitious, and it is said, gifted, Mrs. Schroder will appear as "Hester Grasebrook" in The Unequal Match, and "Gertrude" in The Loan of a Lover, both in one evening. We have no hope for debutantes and suicides, but nous verrons.

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER.
G. R. CHAPMAN.....ACTING MANAGER.
G. R. CHAPMAN.....TREASURER.

MONDAY EVENING, DEC. 2, 1878, DEBUT OF MRS. CHARLES SCHRODER

AN UNEQUAL MATCH

LOAN OF A LOVER.

And will be supported by the full strength of the company.
Box sheet now open.

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LOCKE.....PROPRIETOR.

ALICE OATES COMIC OPERA SEASON.

Last performances of

LA MARJOLAINE,

At the Saturday Matinee, Saturday and Sunday evenings.

Monday, Dec. 2, production of the universally popular and very amusing Opera Bouffe, by Offenbach, the

PRINCESS OF TREBIZONDE.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—The management beg leave to announce that upon Wednesday evening, Dec. 4th, will occur the ONE HUNDREDTH performance of the present very successful Comic Opera Season, upon which occasion ALICE OATES will have the honor to present as a memento of the occasion, to each lady present, an elegant gold and satin programme.

STANDARD THEATRE.

Bush Street, between Montgomery and Kearny.

LESSER AND MANAGER.....M. A. KENNEDY.
BUSINESS MANAGER.....P. H. KIRBY.
TREASURER.....C. S. WALTON.

Fifth and last week and last two nights of

RICE'S SURPRISE PARTY.

Last two nights of

BABES IN THE WOOD.

Saturday, Nov. 30, 1878, at 2 P. M., LAST

BABES IN THE WOOD MATINEE

Monday, Dec. 2, first appearance of

JOSH HART

And his celebrated Novelty Company, the largest and best company ever organized.

Best Seats should be reserved six days in advance.

CALIFORNIA THEATRE.

BARTON & LAWLER.....MANAGERS.
BARTON HILL.....ACTING MANAGER.

Last week of the world famous actress, Miss

ADA CAVENDISH.

Week of legitimate comedy. Miss Cavendish in her great roles.

Monday and Tuesday—

AS YOU LIKE IT.

Wednesday and Thursday—

ROMEO AND JULIET.

Friday, Farewell Benefit of Miss Cavendish—

MUCH ADO ABOUT NOTHING,

—AND—
CHARGE OF THE LIGHT BRIGADE.

Last Cavendish Matinee Saturday—AS YOU LIKE IT.

Saturday Night—

LADY OF LYONS.

Monday evening, Dec. 9th, FRANK CHANFRAU in his great creation, KIT.

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER.
F. LYSTER.....ACTING MANAGER.
G. R. CHAPMAN.....TREASURER.

Reappearance of

CLARA MORRIS

This (Saturday) afternoon, Nov. 30th, at 2 o'clock, Clara Morris, for the last time positively, as Jane Eyre in

THE GOVERNESS.

Sunday, Dec. 1st, Benefit of the Ushers,

PINK DOMINOS,

—AND—
SLASHER AND CRASHER.

Monday, Dec. 2, Debut of Mrs. CHARLES SCHRODER.

UNEQUAL MATCH,

—AND—
LOAN OF A LOVER.

Tuesday, Dec. 3d, first production of a new Comedy, adapted from the Spanish by Jose F. Godoy, Esq.,

HONI SOIT QUI MAL Y PENSE.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

Life of Alexander H. Stephens. By Johnston and Browne. Cloth. $3 50
India and her Neighbors. By W. P. Andrew. Cloth 7 50
Oratory and Orators. By William Matthews. Cloth 2 00
The Leavenworth Case. A novel. By A. K. Green. Cloth. 1 50
Pleasant Spots around Oxford. By Alfred Rimmer. Cloth. 1 50
A Face Illumined. A novel. By Rev. E. P. Roe. Cloth. 1 50
Angelo, the Circus Boy. By Frank Sewall. Cloth. 1 00
Apple Blossoms. Poems. By E. and D. R. Goodale. The Normans in Europe. Epoch Series. By A. H. Johnson. Cloth. 1 00
Lindsay's Lack. By Mrs. Burnett. Paper. 30
Prescription Writing. By M. D. Mann. Cloth. 1 00
Handbook of Nursing for Family and General Use. It is the Fashion. Star Series. Cloth. 1 00
A Masque of Poets. No Name Series. 1 00
On the Right Use of Books. By W. P. Atkinson. Cloth. 50
New Books, Juveniles, Games, and Stationery.

BILLINGS, HARBOURNE &amp; CO.,

BOOKSELLERS AND STATIONERS,

NO. 3 MONTGOMERY STREET.

Millinery.

The styles for ladies' hats and bonnets for the season are varied in shape, so that ladies find no difficulty in selecting that style which is most becoming. Chapeau and Capote styles in bonnets appear in various shades, in velvet, felt, drawn satin, and chenille. Flat bandeaux fill in the fronts of many bonnets, while the trimmings are selected from a variety of rich velvety shades in feathers, with all the different colors mingled together. The feathers of the lophophore are the most frequently selected. Velvet and chenille flowers are the novelties for trimmings, the favorite being velvet tulips in all shades. Among the many styles of hats and bonnets we note a very neat style of Capote in black velvet, with the brim formed of a wreath of feathers, and strings made of satin ribbon; also, another elegant style of Chapeau in felt, in various shades, with a bouillonne of satin appearing in front, and a plume of cock's feathers—the loops and strings are made of satin ribbon. Another very effective style of Chapeau is made of white felt, trimmed with a long, white feather, and bow of white satin ribbon on the crown in front; the strings are also made of white satin ribbon. This same style of Chapeau makes an elegant appearance when trimmed with reversible satin ribbon and pompons in the two shades. Another very rich style of Capote in black velvet, bordered with jet beads, and trimmed with black satin ribbon and plume of the same color, with strings in black satin ribbon, makes a very pretty and withal an elegant style for the completion of the shopping toilet. This style, however, is quite a favorite, and is made in all shades. Our lady readers of the ARGONAUT will find all these styles and many others, of the very latest from Paris, at the fashionable establishment of Miss Lizzie Carter at 605 Market Street. The magnificent display of all the latest styles to be seen here will be sure to please our lady readers, and we therefore have given to the public the foregoing notes as the result of our visit to this establishment.

The World of Books.

We take great pleasure in calling the attention of the readers of the ARGONAUT to the extensive and elegant book establishment of Messrs. A. Roman & Co., No. 11 Montgomery Street, whose show windows present a very attractive appearance, and whose shelves are filled with a rich stock of standard and miscellaneous books in every style of binding. We notice a very fine display of albums and fancy stationery. Also an immense assortment of juveniles. Among the latest we may mention: "The Saint Nicholas," "Chatterbox," and "Mother Goose," elegantly illustrated in colored engravings; "Aunt Soppy's Boys and Girls," "The Story of Liberty," by Charles E. Coffin, "Under the Lilacs," "The Western Boy," "The Young Adventurers," and Optic's "Lake Breezes." For gift volumes for the holidays we may mention just issued: "The Rock of Ages," Shakespeare's works in various editions, "The Great Painters of Christendom," elegantly illustrated with fine steel engravings, "The Yellowstone National Park" in handsome chromos by Prang. All the standard works of the poets, in every style of binding, may here be secured for gift volumes for the holidays; and we would suggest to our readers who desire to purchase to give this firm a call, where will be found books of every description at the very lowest rates.

Mirrors, Cornices, Etc.

Elegant designs in gold and walnut in mirrors are sought after by those who desire the ornamental coupled with the useful. One of the styles of mirrors we noted especially at the fashionable establishment of E. Wolfe & Co., under the Palace Hotel, was of the Eastlake design, in rich and elegant carvings in gold, with crown surmounting. The Eastlake and Queen Anne designs in walnut, elegantly ornamented with french veneering, and inlaid with gold, makes a satisfactory completion to the appointments in furniture for the fashionable home. Panel pictures are now sought after in home decorations, even after the home seems thoroughly furnished in wall ornamentations; still the addition of panel pictures will find a place in every thoroughly-furnished residence. Photographs of statuary, and of oil paintings of the masters, flowers, birds, animals, etc., are the subjects mostly selected in this class of pictures. Finely ornamented and engraved easels for the piano or mantle-piece very elegantly set off cabinet photographs. Wall pockets are now mostly manufactured in ebony inlaid with gold, in very chaste designs. Those of our readers who desire all the latest novelties in this department can not do better than to call at this establishment while selecting for home ornamentation the above-named articles. Messrs. Wolfe & Co. are constantly receiving orders from some of our most fashionable residents of the city, and by their liberal patronage have expressed their entire satisfaction in their purchases at this establishment.

Large Book Sale.

Among the many excellent works now being sold at Bartlett's book sale, No. 3 Dupont Street, may be noted the following: "Livingstone's Life Work in Africa," "Livingstone's Lost Journals," "Kane's Arctic Explorations," "Overland Through Asia," by Knox; "Beyond the Mississippi," by Richardson; "Field, Dungeon, and Escape," "Our Sister Republic," by Colonel A. S. Evans; "Palace and Hovel, or Phases of Life in London," by Kirwan; "The Great Metropolis, a Mirror of New York," by Junius Henri Browne; Edward King's "Great South;" "Afoot and Alone," by Stephen Powers; J. Ross Browne's works, in five volumes, "Wanderings in Four Continents," and "Persons, Places, and Things;" the two latter, just issued, are elegantly bound in green and blue and gold. It is a notorious fact that all the standard and miscellaneous works in history, poetry, and fiction, albums, etc., are being sold at a great sacrifice. Among the many works deserving special mention we noticed "The World of Wit and Humor," in elegant cloth binding, which may be classed among some of the best gift volumes for the holidays.

STERLING SILVERWARE.—A large assortment of elegant designs at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

WE ALWAYS SAY to our lady friends go to Sullivan's, 120 Kearny Street, for handsome SUITS or CLOAKS.

If you want the 'nobbist' suits in town—best material and latest style in cut—why don't you go to Burr & Fink's, corner Montgomery and Post streets, over Hibernia Bank?

Currier, 103 Dupont Street, has a fine assortment of VELVET FRAMES.

DIAMONDS.

The most attractive assortment of

DIAMONDS, WATCHES, JEWELRY, ETC.,

And Novelties, for the selection of wedding and other presents, at

GEO. C. SHREVE &amp; CO.'S,

110 MONTGOMERY STREET.

A Legend of the Fair Melusine.

An illustration of the "Legend of the Fair Melusine" may be seen in a series of fourteen photographs of the original paintings by Morris V. Schwind, the great German painter. The series are in a large portfolio, designed as a holiday gift. The Water Fairy reposes lonely and dreaming profoundly in her spring, which bubbles from the bottom of a dark, rocky cave. Count Raynaud, of the famous house of the Lusignan, wandering about in the dark mountain wilderness, finds the nymph seated close to a half-ruined forest well. Love speaks to the Count, and the fair Melusine finds a response to his wooing; marriage follows on his sacred promise that he will not invade the castle of which she is mistress. Children bless the happy union, but jealousy leads the Count to break his promise. He enters the castle, where he finds his wife surrounded by her nymphs. The castle falls, the wife escapes and vanishes from his sight. The husband wanders in foreign climes; returns and finds his wife at the spring. He rushes to her arms and is smothered to death with kisses. The series close with the nymph again left in her loneliness. This magnificent work may be seen at the establishment of J. B. Golly & Co., 31 Kearny Street.

The community at large reaps one benefit from the failure of the last stock deal. When the new bonanza first disclosed itself in the Sierra Nevada, and gave promise of large dividends, everybody rushed to the Diamond Palace, sold their jewels, and bought shares, intending of course to purchase others in due time. By everybody we mean all the stock gamblers, and they are the people who have the largest and finest stones. Col. Andrews, keen for bargains, and himself believing that we were to have a bouncing stock market about the Christmas holidays, bought all that came. In addition to the diamonds thus obtained he imported heavy lots from Europe. Hard times, wars, and political changes threw lots of diamonds into the market, and thus he became loaded down with such a stock as never before was seen in San Francisco. The stock market turned the wrong way, and in consequence Col. Andrews finds himself with drawers and shelves full of brilliants. With the boldness of the merchant who knows his business, and never allows himself to be cornered, he has determined to sell these goods to those people who have not met with stock losses. The programme is a simple one. He will offer diamonds at twenty per cent. less than they can be imported from Europe. The Colonel authorizes the ARGONAUT to announce his willingness to show his goods to gentlemen and ladies at all times. There need be no delicacy in visiting the Diamond Palace; it is a pleasure to expose his goods to people who have the taste to admire and appreciate them. Colonel Andrews thinks that ordinary human nature and especially female human nature is not strong enough to resist the temptation to buy his jewelry if it is once seen.

The natives of the Marquesas Islands, according to an American who has lived among them for years and studied their character, customs, and creed, picture hell as a region of profound darkness, no ray of light ever entering it except on arrival of a spirit from earth. By this ray the newly-condemned spirit is guided to the special seat appointed for him—or it—and there he remains in impenetrable shadow until the next coming brings a flash of light. There is no other punishment for the doomed. They are, however, singled on entrance, because they are now obliged to pass a huge demon, who flaps his wings and exhales fire continually. Women, it may be interesting to know, are seldom sent to the Marquesan Tophet, owing to the love (witness the customary egotism of the male animal even in Polynesia) and devotion they bear the native chiefs and priests, who (here is gallantry) would be inconsolable without them, even in Paradise. But women are not admitted to the highest circles of the good place, prepared alone for men, who can, however, descend to them when they wish to enjoy feminine society. There are different planes of divine life for women, the loftiest being reserved for those who have loved and been loved most intensely in this world, and whose greatest bliss will come from the visits of the spirits of the chiefs and priests.

BOSTON DRESS REFORM.

California "Worth" Princess Suits, Skirts, and attachable Flounces; Cashmere and Merino Union Suits for ladies and children; ladies' and misses' shoulder-brace Corsets; Abdominal Corsets. No. 130 Sutter Street. A. W. BAKER, the only Dress Reform Agent in the city.

The finest French and purest home-made candies found at Voyley's, 915 Market Street, between Fifth and Sixth.

Artistic novelties, manufactured from California quartz, at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

Currier, 103 Dupont Street, makes the finest PICTURE FRAMES.

DECKER BROS

A party of gentlemen from Switzerland, among whom is a distinguished engineer, in a recent visit to San Francisco have been making a very careful examination of our system of cable roads, with a view to utilizing them upon the mountains of their native land. There is already a railroad up the Riga, which, by a system of cog wheels and complex machinery, takes passengers to the summit of that mountain. There are many other heights to which a railroad could be profitably constructed. The California Street Railroad, in its thorough construction, perfect equipment, and clever management, seemed to these gentlemen to be perfection. They were surprised to find that no wood was used in its structure—being built of wrought iron and stone. The easy working of the cable, and the entire protection afforded by the system of brakes, convinced them of the safety of lifting cars to the highest accessible Alpine peaks by this system. Mechanics from nearly all the Eastern and European cities have examined this work with a view of introducing cable roads to their respective localities.

Owing to their rapidly increasing business, the new and elegant establishment of Messrs. Billings, Harbottle & Co., at No. 3 Montgomery Street, as been permanently enlarged by the connection of the adjoining store with the original stand, and this week a large invoice of new goods in their special lines is offered to the inspection of visitors. A fine assortment of Russia leather goods, comprising pocket and note books, frames, writing desks, lap tablets, etc.; new and unique designs in stationery and visiting cards, and a variety of elegant fancy goods, are among the specialties. All the new publications, holiday books, bibles, and prayer books, in bindings suitable for holiday gifts, as well as standard literature on every subject, are always to be found on their shelves. A further extension is also to be effected by the addition of a fancy goods department, which is to comprise soaps, perfumery, and other toilet articles. Messrs. Billings Harbottle & Co. also make a specialty of engraving visiting cards, wedding and other invitations, and their work in this particular line is not excelled by any other house in this city.

Mr. T. H. Boyd, a well-known photographer of rare ability, formerly of the firm of Taber & Boyd, has opened a fine gallery at No. 25 Montgomery street. Mr. Boyd does the very best work that can be done in this city—where the best work of the world is done. It would be judicious to visit Mr. Boyd's gallery when in want of photographs.

The King of Spain not only decorated Captain Boyton, but he gave Mr. Michael Boyton the order of the Knight's Hospitalers. The Captain, they say, has a keen eye to business. The other day, in an interview with the French Minister of Marine, that dignity, while complimenting Captain Boyton, said: "I am sorry I can not give you an order." "Oh, but you can," replied Boyton. "There is only the Legion of Honor," said the Minister, smilingly. "I don't mean that," replied Boyton, quickly; "I mean an order for the dress." The Minister laughed heartily, and the Captain got his order, and something more. The Minister made him an honorary captain of the French navy.

The finest candies in the city are to be had at the Clarendon, 213 Kearny Street, of Love & Goldstein. Try them.

An elegant assortment of gold watches and chains at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

The last relative of Thomas Hood has just passed away. Mrs. Frances Freeling Broderip, only daughter of the humorist, died on the 3d instant, at Cleveland, in the forty-ninth year of her age. In conjunction with her brother, Tom Hood, the late editor of Fun, she wrote and published the life of her father.

From and after December 2, 1878, the Long (Oakland) Wharf will be closed for teams and stock, etc.

Mrs. Parker, of the Ladies' Depository, has opened a new store at 125 Post Street. Dolls dressed in all styles. New Lace Patterns.

This paper is printed with ink furnished by Chas. Eneu Johnson & Co., 209 South Tenth Street, Philadelphia, and 59 Gold Street, New York.

Try E. H. Hubbard's Parisian Cream for the complexion. 623 Market Street.

THE LAST SENSATION!

"THE SOCIETY IN SEARCH OF Truth; or, Stock Gambling in San Francisco." A Novel, in Forty-four Chapters, by

I. F. CLARK,

A former member of the Pacific Stock Exchange. Now ready. Read it.

PIANOS ARE THE BEST

CALIFORNIA SPOOL SILK

TESTIMONIAL.

Referring to certain advertisements recently published derogatory to the quality of

CALIFORNIA SPOOL SILK

We beg to offer the following testimonial from the largest dealers in the city.

CALIFORNIA SILK MF'G CO.

We, the undersigned, hereby state that we have sold the CALIFORNIA SPOOL SILK for a number of years, and have found it to give entire satisfaction.

We recommend it to the public as equal in quality to any silk in this market, of either Foreign or Eastern manufacture.

[Signed.]

DOANE & HENSHELWOOD, No. 1 Montgomery Street.

FRATERING & NOLL, 10 to 14 Montgomery Street.

F. CHESTER & CO., 34 to 36 Montgomery Street.

KAINDLER & CO., Ville de Paris, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

J. SAMUELS, 28 Kearny Street.

THE WHITE HOUSE, J. W. Davidson & Co., corner Kearny and Post Streets.

THE LACE HOUSE, D. Samuels, 104 to 108 Kearny Street.

BUYER, REICH & CO., 129 Kearny Street.

S. BINE, 130 Kearny Street.

LANDERS & GILMORE, 132 Kearny Street.

SULLIVAN'S CLOAK & SUIT HOUSE, 220 Kearny Street.

B. SCHONWASSER & CO., 222 Kearny Street.

JACOBS & GLASS, 226 Kearny Street.

P. B. KENNEDY, 232 Kearny Street.

O'CONNOR, MOFFATT & CO., 111 to 115 Post Street.

O'NEILL, KENNEDY & STUART, 875 Market Street.

C. CURTIN, 911 Market Street.

J. J. O'BRIEN & CO., 924 to 928 Market Street.

O'DWYER & EINHORN, 36 and 38 Third Street.

PEINOTTO & SILVERMAN, 42 to 46 Third Street.

S. MOSGROVE & CO., 114 and 116 Kearny Street.

THE SILK HOUSE, Samuel Leszynski & Bro., 120 Kearny Street.

And by many others.

BEST KOHLER &amp; CHASE SAN 1880 &amp;

BEAUTIFUL RUINS.

A woman can hardly be said to pass into the category of beautiful ruins much before she is forty, though, of course, she may have ceased to be beautiful altogether before then. How long she remains a beautiful ruin will depend in a large degree on her fortune, but yet it is her fortune, on her own terms. A woman who has charms independently of her physical graces will protect the reign even of these last; so that the ruin of mind and manner may be called the twilight of material beauty, which carry the after-glow of radiant beauty into the night. A beautiful ruin enjoys a marked position, if she happens to be a person of rank or fashion. Our most popular ruins are to be found in the neighborhood of noble houses, in a town that still extant. One quality is perfectly indispensable to a perfectly beautiful ruin, and that is a sense of tranquillity and composure. Fire works and tumult are not more out of place among shattered arches and crumbling columns than in a dress and finery in a woman who, though still beautiful, is no longer young. She should accept the reward of time, instead of resenting and rejecting it, and trust to his kindly growth, not only to beautify her, but to keep her together. Neither must she expect to receive those rapturous hymns of praise which are paid to a new temple; it is enough for her to inspire that silent and more sacred worship which we feel for roofless aisles and abandoned altars, and to be addressed in the chastened but comforting language of a great poet:—

Thy thoughts and feelings shall not die,
Nor leave thee, when gray hairs are high,
A melancholy slave;
But an old age serene and bright,
And lovely as a Lapland night,
Shall lead thee to thy grave.

This, perhaps, is an ideal rather than an accurate description of what usually happens. But that is the fault of the beautiful ruin herself. Too often, doubtless, she refuses to let resignation gently slope the way. She fights with time, and inflicts wounds only on herself. She ceases to be beautiful, and becomes something worse than a ruin; she grows to be an anachronism. She gives herself the airs of youth, and insists upon retaining its follies and its drawbacks when she has lost all its wickerwork and compensations. She might have been revered, and she elects to be ridiculous. Youth might have consoled and manhood deferred to her. As it is both by her as the plague, while old age is ashamed to think that she will shortly belong to it.

In a town near Boston there lives a good lady who suffers acutely from senility. She has consulted physicians far and near, but has been unsuccessful in finding any cure. Not long since she heard that a man living not far away was afflicted with the same disease in an aggravating form, and it occurred to her that she would call upon him and ask whether he had found anything that would avail to lessen its terrors. She did so, and, having introduced herself, stated her errand.

"Do you," she asked, "find anything that affords you relief?"
"Yes, marm," he replied. "Two things."
"Pray what are they?"
"Cursing and swearing," said the invalid.
It is added that on her return home the good lady told her husband that she only regretted that she could not avail herself of this remedy.
"Not that I have any conscientious scruples," she said, "but I don't know how."

There was a famous restaurateur in Paris who, during the Exposition, having exhausted every other device to swell the bills of his patrons by charging for every conceivable thing, hit upon the happy thought of charging each for the number of the table occupied. Thus, table No. 13 figured in the addition as 13 francs. His genius was rewarded by a large fortune; but when, overcome by cupidity, he became actually dishonest, and renounced all his tables, beginning at 20, on the pretext that there were nineteen in another room, his patrons began sadly to drop away from him, and he was ruined.

In the funeral honors paid to the memory of the late M. Thiers, Madame Thiers rather overdid the thing by sending out cards of invitation setting forth that the requiem was "for the repose of the soul of M. Thiers." "How can I respond to such an invitation?" exclaimed a distinguished Deputy; "in the first place, I am a Jew; in the next, 'repose' is precisely the thing that is not wanted by that restless little soul. I could understand a Te Deum in gratitude for his repose, but not a requiem for Monsieur Thiers."

When you see a woman sit down, open her desk, jerk out a pen and writing material, roll up her sleeves, and seize the pen, you will never be prepared to charge on an army, and may rest assured that she are not worse enough in the long run to write to express her thoughts.

An officer in the army launched at a woman because she was alarmed at the noise of a gun when a salute was fired. He thought she was a coward that timid woman, and six months afterwards he took off his boots in the hall when he came in late at night.

The average woman is composed of two hundred and forty-three bones, one hundred and eighty muscles, twenty-two old newspapers, and two hundred and ten harpings.

Greek is the language for poets, French for historians and Italian for wind-organ melody; but a woman with a shirt collar that don't fit is the same as a fellow in a suit.

A Nashville belle has felt that she does not match. I am perfect in shape, but one is a num. grown in the other a number seven. She always puts her feet forward.

A porter on a sleeping-car says that as a rule the woman who loses a fifty-cent breakfast makes more fuss than the one who loses a whole set of good jewelry.

Some persons of weak understanding are so sensible of their weakness as to be able to make a good thing out of it.

CANNEL COAL.

SUPERIOR QUALITY OF GRAITE
LOCAL (No. 1)

MIDDLETON & FARNSWORTH,
112 Post Street, at 7th St., San Francisco.

For the best New Crop Japan
" " English Breakfast
" " Formosa Oolong
" " Mixed

TEA

LORING'S

922 MARKET STREET,

Manufacture of "THE PERFECT COFFEE"—put up in air-tight cans, retaining its purity, freshness and aroma.

MR. FRAZER,

(Late of New York),

DISTINGUISHED PROFESSOR OF
MODERN SOCIETY DANCING.

Private Schooling Exclusively.

ROUND DANCING A SPECIALTY

I WOULD MOST RESPECTFULLY

call the attention of parents and young ladies and gentlemen of San Francisco, Oakland, and vicinity, to my eight-page circular, containing full information upon the treatment of K and dancing, and why so many fail to succeed. Read carefully all the circular contains, and I venture to say the advantages offered will please you. I have no return where I find in my undertakings. I will occupy the large and spacious room over Mr. Gray's Music Store in about ten days. Those wishing hours for instruction must apply early, as my time is fast being engaged. Office hours, 11 A. M. to 1 P. M., at Mr. Gray's.

Circulars at M. Gray's Music Store, 117 Post Street, San Francisco, and W. B. Hardy's, Broadway, Oakland.

MILLER & RICHARD,
SOLE MAKERS OF

EXTRA-HARD METAL
SCOTCH TYPE.

SPECIAL AGENTS FOR
THE CAMPBELL, HOE, AND PEERLESS
PRESSES.

No. 309 COMMERCIAL STREET.
And 205 Leidesdorff Street, San Francisco.

REDINGTON'S
FLAVORING EXTRACTS

ARE THE PERFECTLY PURE
and highly concentrated Extracts of

FRESH FRUITS

Prepared with great care. They are put up in superior style, in a bottle holding twice as much as ordinary fruit Extracts.

Comparing quality and contents, none other are nearly so cheap.

Wherever tested on THEIR MERITS, they have been adopted in preference to all others, and now are the

STANDARD FLAVORING EXTRACTS

Of the Pacific coast. Dealers will find them to give better satisfaction to the consumers than any other kind, and are respectfully requested to give them a trial.

REDINGTON & CO.
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

RUPTURE.
BUY NO TRUSS

Until you see what has been accomplished by DR. PIERCE'S late invention.

Call or send for New Illustrated Book. "PERFECT PLASTIC TRUSS"

CO., 609 Sacramento Street, San Francisco.

PALACE HOTEL RESTAURANT,
FIRST CLASS IN ALL RESPECTS.

QUIET AND DESIRABLE PLACE
for Ladies, Gentlemen, and Families. 20th Entrance, corner of Court.

A. D. SHARON.

THOMAS H. HOLT,
NOTARY PUBLIC, No. 320 1/2 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, 11th Mission Street, San Francisco.

SAFES AND SCALES.

FOR SALE BY
JOHN MOLLOY, 54 CLAY STREET.

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATOR,

WILLIAM DOOLAN.

Office No. 12 Nevada Block.

L. T. ZANDER,

No. 424 MONTGOMERY STREET,
between California and Sacramento, San Francisco.

COLLECTOR.

Rents, Bill, and Accounts collected, and prompt returns made.

ZANDER'S PURCHASING AGENCY.

Orders for the purchase and shipment to the interior of goods of every description executed with promptness and care, at a small commission over cost.

GEO. W. FRESCOTT, IRVING M. SCOTT, H. T. SLOTT.

UNION IRON WORKS

(Founded 1849) Post Office Box 2128.

COR. FIRST AND MISSION STREETS,
SAN FRANCISCO

MANUFACTURERS OF

Compressed Engines,
Air Compressors,
Rock Drills,
Portable Hoisting Engines,
Marine Stationary and Portable Boilers,
Baby Hoist, complete.

CONSTANTLY ON HAND AND FOR SALE.

Direct-acting Pumping and Hoisting Engines,
Upright and Stationary Engines,
Quartz Crushing and Amalgamating Machinery,
Blake's Rock Breakers,
Smelting Furnaces,
Quicklime Pumps,
Chlorinating Furnaces,
Cornish Pumps,
Steam Pumps.

All manufactured by us of the best materials, design, and workmanship, and furnished at lower rates than by Eastern manufacturers.

PRESCOTT, SCOTT & CO.

O. F. WILLEY &amp; CO

IMPORTERS AND MANUFACTURERS OF

FINE CARRIAGES & WAGONS

No. 427 MONTGOMERY ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

Agents for the sale of Wagons manufactured by

BREWSTER & CO., New York,

W. D. ROGERS, Philadelphia,

C. S. CAFFREY, Camden, N. J.,

WOOD BROTHERS, New York,

H. KILLAM & CO., New Haven,

COOLING BROS., Wilmington

ALSO, AGENTS FOR

HARNESS MANUFACTURED BY WOOD GIBSON,
TOMPKINS & MANDEVILLE, AND
A. H. DUNSCOMBE.

Also, a fine assortment of Robes, Blankets, Nets, Whips, etc.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, CITY
and County of San Francisco—In Probate Court.

In the matter of the Estate of JOHN BLISS, deceased.
Notice for publication of time appointed for proving will, etc.

Pursuant to an order of said Court, made on the 13th day of November, A. D. 1878, notice is hereby given that Monday, the 6th day of December, A. D. 1878, at 11 o'clock A. M. of said day, and the courtroom of said Court, at the new City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, have been appointed as the time and place for proving the will of said John Bliss, deceased, and for hearing the application of C. H. PHELPS for the issuance to him of Letters of Administration with the will annexed, when and where any person interested may appear and contest the same.

Tested and signed at the City of San Francisco, California, this 12th day of November 1878.

THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.
[SEAL OF COURT.] By Wm. A. STUART, Deputy Clerk.
CHARLES P. EELLY, Attorney for Petitioner, 65 Nevada Block.

ANNUAL MEETING.—MEXICAN
Gold and Silver Mining Company.—The annual meeting of the stockholders of the Mexican Gold and Silver Mining Company will be held on Tuesday, December 5th, 1878, at one o'clock P. M., at the office of the Company, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, Cal. Transfer books will be closed on Saturday, November 23d, at 12 o'clock M.

C. L. MCCOY, Secretary.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE
Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

LESLIE A. GOODHUE, plaintiff, vs. STEPHEN GOODHUE, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to STEPHEN GOODHUE, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days exclusive of the day of service after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

This said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now and heretofore existing between plaintiff and defendant upon the grounds set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is hereby made, and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded therein.

Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 14th day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

[SEAL.] THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.
By J. H. PICKENS, Deputy Clerk.
WOODS & COFFEY, Attorneys for Plaintiff.

CALIFORNIA FARMERS'

MUTUAL

Fire Insurance Company

[ESTABLISHED IN 1874.]

Paid up Capital .....$200,000
Assets exceed..... 326,000

PRINCIPAL OFFICE 209 SANSOME ST.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

THOS. FLINT, President. J. W. FOARD, Manager.

FRED. K. RULE .....Secretary.

I. G. GARDNER.....General Agent.

COMMERCIAL

INSURANCE COMPANY OF CALA,
FIRE AND MARINE.

Principal office, 405 California Street, San Francisco.

JOHN H. WISE, President.

CHAS. A. LATON, Secretary.

THE STATE INVESTMENT

—AND—

INSURANCE COMPANY, FIRE AND MARINE

CASH ASSETS.....$450,000

Principal Office, 218 and 220 Sansome Street, San Francisco

OFFICERS:

A. J. BRYANT, President,

RICHARD IVERS, Vice-President,

CHAS. H. CUSHING, Secretary,

H. H. WATSON, Marine Surveyor

GOULD &amp; CURRY SILVER MINING

Company.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 18th day of November, 1878, an assessment (No. 34) of one dollar and fifty cents ($1.50) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately, in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 69, Nevada Block, 329 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 23d day of December, 1878, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on Monday, the 30th day of December, 1878, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with cost of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors,
ALFRED K. DUNBROW, Secretary.
Office—Room 69, Nevada Block, 329 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

OPHIR SILVER MINING COMPAny.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 5th day of November, 1878, an assessment (No. 34) of one dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Cosmopolitan Hotel Building, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 10th day of December, 1878, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Monday, the 24th day of December, 1878, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors,
C. L. MCCOY, Secretary.
Office—Cosmopolitan Hotel Building, 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

APPLICATION TO BECOME SOLE

TRADER.—Notice is hereby given that J. EMMA S. HOWE, wife of Charles W. Howe, of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, will apply to the County Court of said city and County and State of said, on Monday, the 24th day of December, A. D. 1878, the same being a day of the November term, A. D. 1878, of said County Court, for the judgment and decree of said Court, authorizing and permitting me to act as a Sole Trader, and as such to carry on and conduct in my own name, in said city and County and State aforesaid, the business of buying and selling merchandise, buying and selling real and personal property and mining stocks, and to keep boarding and lodging-house, and to loan and borrow money on mortgage or otherwise, and to do and perform all acts connected with or incident to said different branches of business.

EMMA S. HOWE.
San Francisco, Cal., November 12th, A. D. 1878.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

FRANCES A. NELSON, plaintiff, vs. DAVID P. NELSON, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to David P. Nelson, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days exclusive of the day of service after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

This said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony heretofore and now existing between the plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is hereby expressly made, and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief thereon demanded.

Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 13th day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

[SEAL.] THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.
By W. STEVENSON, Deputy Clerk.
GEO. L. WOODS and JOHN J. COFFEY, Attorneys for Plaintiff.

CHICKERING

PIANO WAREROOMS,
31 POST ST., Mechanics' Institute Building.
ELEGANT PIANOS.
L. K. HAMMER,
Sole Agent for Pacific Coast.
Owners of Chickering Pianos are specially requested to leave orders for tuning at warerooms, 31 Post Street.

MUSIC

KNABE PIANOS,
IRVING PIANOS, ROGERS' UPRIGHT PIANOS,
Prince Organs, Waters' Organs, Sheet Music.
BANCROFT, KNIGHT & Co.,
733 MARKET STREET.

PIANOS

NO. 12 TYLER STREET, S. F.
These Pianos are all three-stringed, with ivory keys, not imitation.

PIANOS

SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED PIANOS.
Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.
WOODWORTH, SCHELL & Co.
12 Post Street San Francisco.

HOME INDUSTRY
UPRIGHT PIANOS
HEMME & LONG
FIRST CLASS PRICES LOW
1 COR. SUTTER & MONTGOMERY STS. S.F.

INDEPENDENT LINE
—FOR—
ASTORIA AND PORTLAND, OREGON.
The Splendid Low pressure, Side Wheel American Steamship
GREAT REPUBLIC,
4,500 TONS.
JAMES CARROLL ..... Commander
Will sail from Spear Street wharf, for the above ports,
On TUESDAY, Dec. 3, at 10 A. M.
Steerage Passage ..... $2 00
Cabin Passage ..... 7 00
In Bridal Rooms ..... 10 00
Freight ..... at Lowest Rates
FREIGHT RECEIVED DAILY.
For freight or passage apply at the office on Spear Street wharf. Tickets also for sale at No. 3 New Montgomery Street, under Grand Hotel.
P. B. CORNWALL.

NEW CHRISTMAS BOOKS

AT ROMAN'S.

The Table-Book of Art. By B. P. Sandhurst. 4to, cloth, illustrated. ....	$5 00
British Poetry. By Fields. Cloth, 8 <sup>vo</sup> 50; half calf. ....	10 00
Thanatopsis. By Bryant. Cloth, 32 50; morocco. ....	5 00
Thanatopsis and Flood of Years. Cloth, 32 50; morocco. ....	7 00
Ceramic Art. By Jennie Y. .... Cloth, 32 50; morocco. ....	5 00
Iris, or the Romance of an Opal Ring. By Mrs. Dr. Toland. Illustrated; cloth, 32 50; morocco. ....	7 00
The Rag Fair. By L. Clarkson. 4to, cloth. ....	5 00
Mother Goose. Superbly illustrated. 4to, cloth. ....	3 00
French Pictures. Illustrated. .... Cloth, 32 50; morocco. ....	6 00
Our Woodland Trees. By F. S. Heath. Cloth. ....	25
Familiar Wild Flowers. By F. E. Hume. 22mo. cloth. ....	5 00
Switzerland. 4to, cloth, illustrated, 181; morocco. ....	125 00
Beauty and the Beast. Colored illustrations. 4to, cloth. ....	75
Europe Munchausen. Colored illustrations. 4to, cloth. ....	1 00
Aunt Louise's Golden Girl (Juvenile). 4to, cloth. ....	25
Shakespeare in Fifty Different Styles. Standard Works in all bindings, Juveniles, Gold Pens, etc.

OPEN EVENINGS.
A. ROMAN & CO.,
11 Montgomery Street, San Francisco.

DECORATION OF THE LEGION OF HONOR.

AWARD OF THE GOLD MEDAL.

FIVE DIPLOMAS OF MERIT!

THE PARIS EXPOSITION HAS AWARDED THE DECORATION OF THE LEGION OF HONOR TO MR. HENRY BREWSTER, senior member of the firm of

BREWSTER & CO.

(OF BROOME STREET,)
CARRIAGE BUILDERS,

Of the city of New York. Also, the Gold Medal, and five Diplomas of Merit to the several foremen of departments, for an exhibition of Thirteen Carriages, a Park Drag, Pleasure Vehicles, and a Racing Sulky, at the late Exposition, as a recognition of the superior excellence of the work of the firm.

W. J. DONLEY, the representative, is now in San Francisco, and may be found at O. F. Willey & Co.'s, or at the Baldwin.
Messrs. O. F. WILLEY & CO., 427 Montgomery St., are Sole Agents in California.

BREWSTER & CO. (OF BROOME STREET,)
Broadway, 47th and 48th Streets, New York City.

I. W. TABER

The leading Photographer of this city, has just occupied his new and handsome parlors over the HIBERNIA BANK, CORNER MARKET AND MONTGOMERY STREETS.
Entrance on Montgomery Street. Elevator connected with building.

Easy of access. The handsomest Photograph Rooms in the city. Give him a call.

Mr. GEORGE B. RIEMAN, for many years the leading man at Bradley & Rulofson's, is now connected with this establishment, and will personally superintend the business.

THE CAL. FURNITURE M'FG CO.

HAVE FIVE TIMES AS MUCH

FURNITURE

As any other house on this Coast, which has been purchased so low that we CAN and WILL sell at such prices that the poor can gratify their WISHES and the rich their TASTE. At the old stand,

NOS. 224 AND 226 BUSH STREET, S. F.

FOR THE FINEST HATS AT THE LOWEST PRICES

C. HERRMANN

336 KEARNY ST. N. A. PINE

SAN FRANCISCO

BRANCH, SEND FOR ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE. 910 MARKET ST.

CALIFORNIA SPOOL SILK.

The Extra 100 Yards. Quarter Ounce. Ounce Spools. Embroidery Silks.

THE BEST IN USE.

Manufactured in San Francisco, supporting ninety-five white women and girls. Sold by all first-class dealers.

THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE stockholders of the Gould & Curry Silver Mining Company will be held at the office of the Company, Room 52, Nevada Block, No. 300 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California, on Monday, the 25th day of December, 1873. Transfer books will be closed on Friday, December 13th, 1873, at the hour of 5 P. M.

PACIFIC BUSINESS COLLEGE,
320 POST STREET, San Francisco.

BUY YOUR SHIRTS AT

WEBER

PIANOS ARE THE BEST

WAREROOMS, N. W. CORNER KEARNY AND SUTTER STREETS.

SHERMAN, HYDE & CO.

SHEET MUSIC, MUSIC BOOKS, MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

"DOMESTIC"

THE LIGHT RUNNING SEWING MACHINE,

The only really light-running lock-stitch Sewing Machine in the market.

"DOMESTIC" PAPER FASHIONS

Elegant, stylish, and reliable.

J. W. EVANS, 20 Post Street, San Francisco.

STOVES

FOR PARLORS, OFFICES, HALLS
BED-ROOMS, CHURCHES,
STORES, ETC., ETC.

THE LARGEST STOCK AND the greatest variety on the Pacific Coast.

500

DIFFERENT SIZES, STYLES, AND PATTERNS to select from.

W. W. MONTAGUE & CO.

Nos. 110, 112, 114, 118, & 120 BATTERY ST.

PALMER BROS.

726 TO 734 MARKET ST.,

Have a full assortment of

LADIES' AND GENTS' FURNISHING Goods, Toilet Articles, Corsets, Embroideries, French and Valenciennes Laces, a fine assortment of Yellings and Ruchings, and the largest stock of

MILLINERY GOODS,

And the best stock of

BOYS' CLOTHING AND HATS & CAPS

In the city.

JOE POHEIM

The Tailor,

203 Montgomery St. and 103 Third Street, under the Russ House, near Bush Street, has just received a large assortment of the latest style goods.

Suits to order from ..... $20
Pants to order from ..... 5
Overcoats to order from ..... 15

The leading question is where the best goods can be found at the lowest prices. The answer is at

JOE POHEIM,
203 Montgomery St. and 103 Third St.
Samples and Rules for Self-Measurement sent free to any address. Fit guaranteed.

THE VERTICAL FEED.

THE ONLY POSITIVE SUCCESS IN all departments of sewing. Lightest running shuttle machine in the market. The NEW DAVIS VERTICAL FEED SEWING MACHINE, 130 Post Street.

MARK SHELTON.

P. S.—Howe, Florence, Wheeler & Wilson, Grover & Baker, Domestic, Weed, Willcox & Gibbs, for sale at $10 each.

BEAMISH'S

The Argonaut.

VOL. III. NO. 21.

SAN FRANCISCO, DECEMBER 7, 1878.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

OLLA-PODRIDA.

There is an important inquiry now going on why the attendance at what is called divine worship is falling off in America. This question seems to have arisen in Cincinnati, and is the subject of an editorial disquisition in the San Francisco Bulletin. The facts are admitted that attendance is decreasing at the houses of Protestant service, that the female part of the worshippers largely exceeds that of the male, and that this decline is more noticeable in Protestant than in Catholic congregations. Personally we had not observed this condition of things, because of the fact that we do not ourselves very frequently spend the Sabbath day in attending church. But we know why church attendance is on the decline, and we know why there are more female than male attendants, and we know a remedy for it. Knowing so much we do not feel at liberty to withhold our information, but are impelled by the sense of duty to settle these questions at once. We do it reverently, and in no disposition to make light of what other people regard as sacred. The first and prominent cause is that the religious world is not keeping pace with the intelligence of the age; it is not abreast with the progress of the time; it is endeavoring dogmatically to sit down upon reason, and with an almost slavish adherence to tradition, and to the teachings of the fathers and the literal interpretation of the Sacred Writings, to declare themselves at war with the demonstrations of science. Hence it is, that in those communities where learning has made its profoundest researches, where knowledge is most generally diffused, the fact is most noticeable. Because men are more independent in thought, and have less veneration for traditions and early fables, and less respect for the requirements of custom, than women, they are the first to withdraw themselves from religious teachings.

Another and important factor in producing this condition of things is that the Christian teachers of to-day are not comparable with those of the earlier time in point of learning, eloquence, devotion, and enthusiasm in their calling. We had almost added "piety" to this category in which, in our judgment, the preachers of to-day are deficient; and, indeed, it seems to us that between the ordinary parson and the ordinary gentleman one can perceive no marked difference as to purity of life and probity of conduct. In comparing the clergy of earlier days with their contemporaries in the other learned professions we must admit them to have been fully equal in respect to the qualities we have named. At one time they almost monopolized the learning of the age; they were eloquent beyond the gentlemen of the bar, or of legislative and political circles. That they were devoted, enthusiastic, sincere, and unselfish, the labor of their lives attested. If we are not mistaken, the clergymen of our Protestant churches (say half a century ago) were abler and stronger men than those of to-day. Then, the pulpit claimed and secured the brighter minds, and the better thinkers, and the broader intellects; now, the pulpit secures more than its share of the dull and narrow-minded—of men who are content to look behind and not before them. The young men from our colleges and schools who devote themselves to polemic discussions and theological investigations, and consecrate their lives to the church, are not the broad-browed, ambitious men, who, in their intellectual strength and restless desire to arrive at the truth and the accomplishment of grand results, avoid the profession of the ministry as one that fetters their freedom, and does not allow them that scope for scientific and philosophical research which every healthy and honest mind demands. We know that there are still in the pulpit men of great culture, of splendid accomplishments, of resolute, original minds, of independent thought; yet, if we are not mistaken, just to the extent that they follow their reason, and just to the extent that they cut themselves loose from dogmas and traditions, and just to the extent they give utterance to free thought, they are charged with want of orthodoxy. We could, we think, give examples of this by pronouncing many illustrious names, both of clergy and laity, both in the Protestant and Roman churches—names of men who have lived and died at variance with their fellows, because they were in advance of them in the recognition of certain great truths which their respective churches were not prepared to admit.

If then, we are correct—if the preachers of to-day have not kept in advance of their congregations in learning, and in knowledge of science; and if they are not as instructive, as eloquent, and as earnest as formerly—it would naturally follow that the more intellectual and thinking portions of their audience should fall away. The time has gone by in the Protestant church when thinking men will submit to the infliction of a prosy and uninteresting sermon from a dull and ignorant person, through the superstitious belief that it is wicked not to attend Sabbath service. Life is too short, and time too valuable, and one's library too interesting, and God's groves too inviting, to spend a day in listening to prayers from those whose daily lives seem no better than our own, and whose learning and research seem in no respect superior to ours. One may go to church as an example to the young; he may go in obedience to an early habit; he may go because of a promise to a dead and loving Christian mother; he may go because his wife desires it, or because he may think his attendance a good example for his children; but if these motives are lacking, the intelligent, thinking man will not go and listen to the old, worn out, unmeaning platitudes of faith in which he has no belief, to dogmas and traditions that do not commend themselves to his reason. He will certainly avoid the church if he has reason to question the sincerity of the teacher, and finds in him a dull thinker and a drawing talker.

If the Christian religion is anything; if it is what it professes to be; if this brief moment of time is but the opportunity for preparing for an unending and immortal life; if God so loved us that he gave his only begotten Son for our redemption; if belief in him involves an eternity of happiness or of misery; if upon our acts or beliefs in this world hangs our destiny in the world to come; if the Supreme Intelligence and the Supreme Power has given us the sacred writings of the Old and New Testaments as the interpretation of His will and His direction for our guidance; if the men who call themselves priests or preachers are divinely chosen as our teachers, exemplars, and guides—then indeed theirs is a most holy and a most solemn vocation; then we have a right to observe in them a course of conduct above even the suspicion of selfishness or worldly desire. According to their own profession they stand at God's holy altar, between Him and us poor, sinful fellow-men, as the only means by which we may be rescued from an eternal death. If they believe this, and are sincere in their professions, if they are not the vilest of hypocrites, they must feel that, above all other men and all other vocations, they are bearing a great burden of responsibility. And we sinners (as they call us) have a right to demand that they possess a learning equal to the pretensions of their calling, the eloquence of a divine inspiration, and lead a life the purity of which admits of no suspicion. And if they are not such men; if they are, on an average, no more learned, no more eloquent, no better in their daily lives than we are; if they serve Mammon instead of God, as we do; if they indulge themselves as much as we in the enjoyment of this world's goods; if they sometimes run after strange women, and worship idols of gold with feet of clay; if they live and dress fashionably, and buy stocks, and turn politicians, enjoy society, accumulate money, pursue this world's ambitions, and are no more honest than honest men ought to be in their business vocations, then it is not, perhaps, surprising that we should not be over-willing to sit at their feet to learn wisdom, nor imitate their examples as the road to God's favor. It is, perhaps, not altogether surprising that we should question the sincerity of their professions and the authenticity of their commissions.

There is another reason why in a great many of the churches there are so few attendants: the costly structures, the expensive adornments, the salary of a fashionable preacher, and the money to sustain a choir of professional musicians, with an organ, must come out of the congregation and through the sale and hire of pews. This makes religion a luxury beyond the reach of the poor, and if we may be permitted in the discussion of so grave a topic to give our personal experience, we narrate the following incident which occurred to ourselves: In the days before the railroad we went east by ocean—from Aspinwall to New York on the steamer Champion belonging to old Vanderbilt, and may the most orthodox devil consume him in the most orthodox of flames. It was a rotten tub, dangerous and uncomfortable. Such a storm as we passed through has seldom vexed the Atlantic, but we came to port safe and sound and felt like thanking God for our preservation. We arrived on Saturday night, and on the following morning determined to signalize our gratitude to the Supreme Ruler by attending church. From the St. James Hotel we sought five Fifth Avenue churches—ponderous piles of architectural beauty. In every one we were refused a sitting, in three instances slighted, and in two insulted by overfed, and doubtless godly, sextons. These were Episcopalian; and one of them had for its pastor that eminently pious and honored divine whom, in the intimacy of our early California days, we used familiarly to call Ferd. Ewer, now the Reverend Ferdinand Ewer, D.D., LL.D., and who has written a great work. We then thought demonstrated "Protestantism a failure." In San Francisco how is it? We can not speak of all the churches, but take any one of the fashionable ones for an illustration. It would create a sensation to march any poor family of your neighborhood, clothed as they are able to clothe themselves, up the aisle one of these sacred edifices. There would be a nodding of plumes, and a fluttering of fans, and upturning of pious noses such as has not occurred, and is not likely to occur, in a well-regulated house of worship. The cost of a pew in any one of our fashionable congregations, with incidentals of dress, Easter bonnets, and four-button kid gloves, prevents any person of moderate means the luxury of going to heaven through the medium of these first class churches. It would seem almost to savor of levity and want of reverence to speak thus lightly, if it was not true. It is true; everybody knows it, and every really sincere and godly person must deplore the fact.

Now, how shall all this be remedied? How shall the churches be filled? We answer—by more talent, learning, eloquence, earnestness, honesty, unselfishness, godliness, and purity of life among those who set themselves to minister to us in holy things; by less aristocracy, pretension, pride, folly, dress, show of wealth; less arrogance, less display on the part of the members of fashionable congregations; and on the part of all professing religion greater consistency of life, greater purity of conduct, a closer imitation of the life and a closer observance of the teachings of Christ—the founder of the religion they profess.

Dueling in France, says Colonel Forney, has always been more or less customary. That foolish Bonapartist fire-eater, Paul de Cassagnac, fought fifteen duels in three months, and never killed anybody. He challenged Gambetta, but the latter disdained even to answer him. He came naturally by this habit. His grandfather, who served under the first Napoleon, was constantly in hot water. He murdered a private Englishman to avenge Waterloo; then he killed an English naval officer; and next tried to force a fight on a Paris editor, and traveled for two months to challenge him, but the editor fooled him by apologizing. The son of this man, and father of Paul, was fighting editor of the ministerial Epoque under Louis Philippe. Paul is always in a row. He refused to fight Lieutenant Lullier, and had his face slapped; and Paul did the same thing to Vermorel, of the Courier Français, who would not fight him.

This Paul de Cassagnac, according to another writer, has fought in all seventeen duels, not one of which, however, has been fatal. On the occasion of his meeting with Aurélien Scholl, the high road of St. Denis was the spot selected, two o'clock in the afternoon the time. A crowd quickly assembled, and the combatants were about to commence, when a gendarme made his appearance. However, instead of making an arrest, the executive officer drew his sword, and, addressing himself to the spectators, cried: "Hats off, gentlemen. When there is fighting in France, one uncovers." Poor Scholl received a terrible wound, but he is still alive and well, on excellent terms with his old adversary, the editor of the Voltaire. M. Paul de Cassagnac then fought Henri Rochefort, and afterward his own cousin, Lissagaray, who did all he could to kill the Imperialist champion. After having been touched four times in the face, Lissagaray lost his head, and flung himself on the sword of his adversary. He hardly recovered when he again challenged M. Paul de Cassagnac, who refused a second meeting in the following terms: "Since I fought with you and left you riddled like a strainer in the garden at Vesin, I have reflected that it is sufficient to have been your adversary, and that it is useless to become your charcutier (pork butcher)." Victor Noir, who was afterward shot down by Prince Pierre Bonaparte, challenged M. Paul de Cassagnac, who, having the choice of weapons, selected orthography, in which his opponent was deficient. The only case in which he really backed out of a duel was when defied by Dr. Clemenceau, one of the members for Paris. But this gentleman is left-handed, and one of the most expert swordsmen in France; so that M. de Cassagnac affected to treat his cartel as an "attempt at assassination." "If you will fight with your right hand," said he, "I will fight with my left, and we shall meet on equal terms, but I am not going to stand up against a man who has gone into training to kill me."

During the first French Revolution, in 1793, dueling was very common. Mirabeau and Camille Desmoulins both went out and met their foes. The eloquent Barnave had two duels. Danton was challenged by the Duke d'Artois, but declined. Two days after, another royalist asked him if he would rather be kicked than shot like a dog; to which Danton replied, as he was the challenged party, he would choose the guillotine, which retort he made good by causing the royalist to be beheaded in a few days.

Under the first Empire there was a great deal of dueling, Napoleon drily remarking that it helped promotion.

On the return of the Bourbons there were over three hundred political duels. Some of them were amusing and others fatal. The orator, B. Constant, had the gout, and fought with pistols from his chair. Lamartine, Guizot, Thiers, Royer Collard, Couvier, Auber, all had their "affairs." Girardin killed Armand Correl, the editor of the National, which so incensed the liberals of that day that Girardin received a score of challenges, on which he vowed he never would fight again, and he has kept his word.

Under the Second Empire there were many duels. The newspaper men had their full share. One editor was challenged for having stated that the sub-lieutenants in the army devoured too many refreshments at social parties; the whole set challenged him. The editor selected one and "pinked him;" his second flew at the editor and wounded him seriously; and, as the journalist lay on his bed, the whole body of republican editors called on him, and formed a committee of combatants to fight for him. This was as late as 1838; and two years after, in 1860, the Duc d'Aumale challenged the cousin of Louis Napoleon, Prince "Plon Plon." He consulted the Emperor, and Eugene was so incensed that she exclaimed: "The gentleman who wants to fight never asks questions or takes advice," and Louis Napoleon added, with a wit more keen than cousin's, a few days after: "If ever a bullet is found in my cousin's stomach, he will have to swallow it."

During the last war 594,000 Russian soldiers poured down through Roumania into Turkey. Of these 58,000 were sent back by rail wounded, and 62,150 ill, 31,000 sick, and to Odessa by sea, 29,000 are still in the hospital, their bones in Roumania and 99,000 perished.

FOUR OLD MAIDS.

It was one of the oldest houses in one of the oldest courts, yet a most respectable house, and a most respectable court, and most respectable people lived in it. A look of extreme neatness was about the front steps and the window blinds, and no mud or dust seemed to cling to the one nor unwary fly to buzz about the other. An extremely modest door-plate of quiet, unpolished bronze, bore the somewhat aristocratic name of Pemberton; and to this door-plate a tidy serving girl was, early one summer morning, paying her respects in the matter of brushing up its sedate brownness, when a voice floated out through the open passage:

"Hannah! Hannah!"

"Yes'm," she answered, suspending her work and peeping up the stairway.

"Shut the door; the flies are coming in."

The door was drawn to carefully, and the serving girl attacked the door-plate again, then silvered up the knob, and actually applied a rub or two to the key hole, which seemed gazing into the court like a calm eye that disdained to wink.

"I wonder which one of 'em 'tis now!" she said under her breath; and, as if to take her rubbing towel into her confidence: "If 'taint Miss Elspeth, it's Miss Anne; if 'taint neither, it's Miss Hester; if 'taint her, then I'm bound it's Miss Harriet, the 'otter of 'em."

What with her Elspeths, and her Annes, and her Hesters, and her Harriets, it seemed like an extraordinary number of mistresses when one took into account the trouble an ordinary girl has with one. But Hannah did very well considering all things; and, being meek-minded and capable, she suited the place tolerably, and the place suited her so tolerably that she had now occupied it some four years. She had had her follower for the half of this time, and she never had been quite able to get over Miss Elspeth's sniff—actually a sniff—when she communicated to that elder sister the fact of her possessing such an article and asked that he might be allowed to come of a Saturday night for an hour or two of decorous courting. Miss Elspeth to be sure had given the desired permission—oh, yes! she had given it, but of a Sunday morning she always distended her nostril on entering the kitchen, and once she remarked, with a curve of her lip: "Somehow, Hannah, it seems so like a man, it does seem so like a man, in here!"

And yet, during the first year of her service, Hannah remembered a man who had been an inmate of the house for a full six months—a young man and a handsome man, with a reckless lock of hair dangling over his forehead, and a waistcoat that had the peculiarity of always looking shabby, though Miss Anne had been caught time and again guiltily sponging it and putting a needle into it when the gentleman had come home in an unusually reckless state of a night and was sleeping off his recklessness of a morning.

He used to come home of nights and lurch about on the front steps, and make dabs at the unwinking key hole, as though it really had been an eye which he was trying to put out. And Miss Anne, pale and anxious, would flit down the stairs and through the hall, shading her lamp with her this hand, to open the door and silently let him in. It was very trying to the nerves to know that the night latch was off till all hours; and so the other sisters must have felt it to be, for remonstrance was frequently heard at the breakfast table, and Miss Hester said once this trouble was "wearing her to the bone!" whereas Miss Harriet had crooked her own little finger, as she toyed with her fork, and reproved her sister next older for "such language."

That very night things came to a crisis. The gentleman had come home unusually early, but he was also unusually reckless, making great lurches outside, and even muttering as he wildly endeavored to take aim at the key hole. Hannah was just creeping away to her bed, and the four sisters were in the little back parlor, three sewing, while the fourth read a grave, staid article from the orthodox periodical, of which piles in regular order were stacked away in a chest upstairs. When the uncertain footstep was heard, Miss Anne started, and her mild face flushed scarlet; but Miss Elspeth put out her hand and said sharply:

"Not to-night, sister; I, myself, will go to the door."

And she went, while the poor, pale, loving, cowering Anne pushed back her smooth hair from her white ears and wrung her hands, and Hester and Harriet laid by their sewing and arose.

Then there was a scrabbling, spluttering sound in the hall, and Miss Elspeth came rushing back into the parlor with her petticoats drawn around her and a grim light in her eyes. A mocking laugh followed her; some one bumped along the hallway and stumped across the carpet; then, with pursuing clutch, invaded the sanctity of the sisters' presence. Miss Hester gasped; Miss Harriet bridled and scuttled to the farther side of the table, and poor Miss Anne sbrunk away into her chair, uttering a low, shuddering cry of "O William! William!"

"What's a matter, what's a matter s' Annie?" The gentleman tried to steady himself against the door, but failed, and almost fell as he lurched in.

"Cousin William," said Elspeth, striving to keep dignity in her voice, "you vile creature!"

"Beg y' pardon, ladies; didn't—didn't s'pect such a garden a' girls." His face was red, and a certain fullness was about his eyes and mouth; but a gentility lurked under his shabbiness, and he was a handsome man, from the straying curl on his bare forehead to the finger tips he was delicately and gallantly reaching toward Miss Elspeth. He gazed at her for a moment admiringly, as who should say, "Oh! what loveliness is here!" and then he clasped his hands, which wandered about a moment in the air before they found each other: "Rosebud, Rosebud, oh, what a rosebud!" he whispered in a tone of thrilled admiration, and sank upon his tipsy knees.

Miss Elspeth, then, I give you my word, was awful to see. The very ruffle on her head-dress trembled as it shocked, and the gray curls that hung about her ears seemed to twine tighter with indignation. Anger shook her to her very soul; and she drew her skirts about her with her two respectable hands, and with curdled impressiveness in her voice, she said: "William, you wretched, you horrible man!"

"Anne! How her soul, and her heart, and all there in her life of sweet hope, how it shivered and shrank and gut perhaps no one will ever know. Shame reddened her face, and then in its fierceness tore the blushes away; grief grasped at her throat till she scarce dared speak lest her voice should fail her; and then, as day after day that miserable scene grew and ripened again and again in her memory, a deep-laid, shy, and timid sorrow appeared in her eyes, and hung upon her features. She went about the old house softly, as though she had tainted its well-kept respectability, and offered herself a perpetual, unspoken apology to her sisters. And then when night came she caught her ear waiting for the uncertain click of a key. She started and her cheek lit many a time while Harriet read aloud of an evening, when she was sure she heard a foot stumble upon the outer step, and she would have given worlds just to quiet and comfort herself by going to look, but she never dared indulge in the weakness before the dreaded gaze of the other three, and Harriet, in her precise, high-voiced way, read on and on without interruption.

"O, my beloved, my beloved!" she constantly cried aloud in her heart, while she yet never acknowledged to her own thought a name one-half so endearing. It had been her dread, and yet her relief, to hear that staggering step, and its absence was now her agony. The remembrance of what had been was like a wound that never closed, and many a sweeping remark of Miss Elspeth's stung like a touch laid on the raw. That good elder sister hoped it was "all over with Anne;" she said so to herself in private, and aloud to Hester and Harriet—the latter of whom elevated her eyebrows, and made airs with her chin as though she would have addressed a row of docile girls with some such remark as: "Young ladies, another warning to you! Put not your faith in man."

To Harriet and to Elspeth, Annie was indebted for many a remark that was like a whip to her shoulders, and only Hester sometimes stole up to her with kindly though unexpressed sympathy. No unkindness was ever meant, for one might expect gall to fall from the tongue sooner than the Pemberton sisters would turn against each other; but continually they dropped a word here, and a word there, meant to serve as a text for Anne's meditation, and this with the best heart in the world, till the poor creature was wont sometimes to think of it as a persecution.

"How glad I am," Elspeth would say, presiding at the coffee urn on Sunday morning, after she had sighed subduedly over Hannah's regular follower, "how glad I am there's not a man in the house every night!"

"A world of trouble and anxiety they bring with them," or something such, Harriet would say in a firm, elocutionary voice, as though waving an imaginary hand and wafting with it a reminder to groups of youthful and to-be-instructed femininity.

"A poor woman I visited to-day," Elspeth said, as they drew around the lamp one evening, "has made me thankful—as I always am, however—that we have none of us ever married. Her husband loves liquor, and beats her, and she feels herself now obliged to go out by the day's work to find support for three children. I have engaged her to come on Mondays, as Hannah's hands are full of extras on that day."

"Thus it is," said Harriet—and the young ladies seemed to gather from the shadows, and shrink into class for the warning—"thus it is that the unmarried woman comes to pity, and finally assist, her whom the world calls the happier of the two."

"Yes, yes, Hester, and Harriet, and Anne, we may have none of the happiness of marriage, but we have, also, none of its unhappiness. We are blessed as we are day by day, I am more convinced. Anne, my dear, will you read to-night?" And so Anne took up the reading where it had been dropped; but try as she might, and would, to forget, and believe her lot a happy one after all, she would still bend her ear to catch the sound of a key struggling to fit the front lock between sentences, though heaven knows how she strove not to hear it, since she knew it was but imagination leading her a-wandering again.

It is rare to find four spinsters in one family. It may be these had been too respectable for the approach of the average man; it may be no lightness of behavior had ever happened to lead another of the opposite sex to suspect one of them would incline to love and matrimony. Certain it is that Anne herself had never even a suggestion of another love affair, though indeed she and her Cousin William had been half-sweethearting all their lives, so that she had no chance of knowing if another could have pleased her fancy. Somehow, though, he had ever been a sort of ne'er-do-weel—though all the dearer to her for that, probably—and it had set the other sisters in a tremble when, at the earnest solicitation of Aunt Judith, his mother, he was allowed to come to them for a home when his own was broken up.

"It will probably come to something between him and Anne yet," she had said, appealingly and half sadly, "and Elspeth and Harriet, you are so self-reliant, and it's only for six months you know, and I hope for the best for Anne's influence over him while I am away." Anne's influence—alas! alas!

"This isn't the first time, Sister Elspeth, the natural order of things has been reversed, and the womenkind have been proved the stronger." It was Harriet who whispered it, with the tips of her fingers together lecture-fashion; and Elspeth had nodded her gray curls twice or thrice; and then William had come, and they had borne with him till forbearance was a duty no longer, and he had almost broken Anne's heart, and then Elspeth, with a hot spot of indignation on either cheek, had shaken the family skirts clear of him, and he had departed, none knew whither.

And Anne mourned him silently and deeply. She was thirty-five if she was a day, Anne Pemberton was, and it was time the romance and the bright edges had fallen away from her life with her youth, but God knows she never thought of sentiment born of youth, of passion, or of feeling. It was the love that wrung her heart that remained, and this was all. Hester was next younger, and Harriet next, both being over thirty, and Elspeth seemed almost like a mother to the other three, since she was forty-five, and never thought of disowning her years. They had been left singularly alone in the old house, with nothing but it to cling to. It was old indeed, and dark with weather-stains, and quaint-fashioned and high ceiled inside, but it firmly and sturdily held its own, and yet bade fair to outstand the modern-built block pushing it in the rear, and its quieter neighbors crowding it on either hand. Here the sisters had always lived since Anne could remember, and here they had always managed to exist, if frugally yet comfortably.

Harriet, whose teetery step and high voice could never pass unnoticed in a crowd, suggested at a glance the prudish instructress, and it was indeed some such position she filled in a young ladies' seminary somewhere in the suburbs of the city. Elspeth, as was natural, had ever been the house-keeper, but, in addition, a few staid children came to her twice in the week to stiffen their small fingers over the antiquated little piano that upreared itself on four slim legs in the darkened parlor, and rattled its keys loosely at the touch. Not infrequently Elspeth herself would disappear from the common sitting-room at twilight or some such appropriate hour, and then the strings would give out the familiar thrum of an old set of waltzes, or the tunes of her own young days put to variations, and the sisters would feel it a treat, and remark to each other of Elspeth's "gift" for music.

Whatever was earned by either went into the family purse, and the same was drawn to supply the various small wants of the household from day to day. If a new article of dress was needed by any one of the four, economy for the purpose was practiced in a greater degree by that one than by the rest; its making was the combined work and taste of all, and pride in it because of its newness was felt, in a moderate degree, by each of the sisterly hearts. It happened, because it had to be in association with her outside duties, that Harriet was of somewhat smarter appearance than Elspeth, or Anne, or Hester, and had a little oftener than they new gloves, or shoes, or perhaps a dress, but not even hers ever went beyond the extreme of sobriety.

Their means being thus slender, it had always been matter of mortification to Hester and Anne that they brought only dependence to the family; but Hester was the delicate one, the one who had a cough all through the winter and took her nap in the middle of the afternoon, and Anne had racked her brains for something to do whereby she might make the burden of their living lighter. She had pretty ways and tricks with her needle, but that in the city where thousands had a greater talent for the same could avail her nothing. She had tried that and she knew. Here sensitiveness and family feelings alike kept her from the shop, and there was nothing further for her to think of, though the thing in her own mind was canvassed often enough to have brought light upon the subject if light there had been. It was just the longing to be of use and account that so many women have crushed out of them. Occupation we all need.

Nearly a year after William's departure, since which Anne had never dared to make inquiry, and had, consequently, never heard a word of him, Hetty's cough grew worse, her nights more restless, her days more languid, and how could they all but know the end? It was the old story of a gradually failing hold, of a silent and secret, though steady and sure, letting go of the grasp, and so Hester died.

Anne stood at her bedside just where the sunlight fell upon her own fading face, stamped with the impress of that gnawing grief that was always with her.

"Sister Anne," said the dying woman, "it's been a lonesome life, hasn't it?"

Anne was glad that Elspeth and Harriet were absent at that moment, since now they would never know Hester had been so weak.

"Sister Anne," continued the failing voice, faintly, "we've known what it was to be lonesome and longing for we scarce knew what, haven't we?" The listener bent her head, and the bitter tears rained over her cheeks, but Hester smiled, while she feebly stroked the thin hand lying in her own.

"I think Elspeth and Harriet never felt so, but we have, and it was the longing for the love that is beyond and above sisterly affection. I know now. It was a restless life, Anne, but it is a sweet death, and it's all right, dear sister, in the end, it's all right in the end. I leave no husband and no child, and it spares great sorrow. What there is in store I can not see yet, but the Lord will make it satisfy. Good-bye, sister Anne; you'll find it's all right in the end."

The bells from the church on the other street were ringing so sweetly that it seemed to Anne they must bear Hester's spirit as they died away, and friends of the sisters were coming in to the little old parlor for the funeral, nothing young and nothing gay about any of them, but all quiet, and staid, and sober in dress, and feature, and manner—as staid and as sober as the sisters themselves.

"My life has all been old," whispered Anne to herself; "old and quaint, and long, so long, but it's all coming right in the end." And she caught a glimpse of the white, pinched face under the glass of the coffin, and repeated: "All coming right in the end, sister Hetty."

She drew in her breath as she saw a bowed head humbly uncovered, and she knew that William's eyes were riveted upon her. She was thankful for the heavy veil hanging like a pall about her, and felt as though she were in a dream and viewing herself among the people at the funeral, while she moved her blanched lips mechanically, "in the end, all right in the end." Her spirit seemed to walk apart from her, and she knew with no trob of surprise or glow of gladness that, as she went by him, he passed his hand wistfully across the fringe of her shawl.

"Anne, dear Anne!"

She knew he said it and pitied him and herself, but the sound of his voice lay away off from her heart, and she walked on, still in a dead dream.

The bells rang the days in and the days out, and after they were gone they still seemed to linger about in her dark, old, clean room, and to whisper quietly and stilly something about "the end, the end."

She began to put her hand often to her head, and once she said: "Elspeth, I believe I thought once of having some one come to live with us—to bring in money, you know. I know I had made a plan for it, but I don't remember things any more. Do you suppose if I could remember it I could do it yet?"

"Anne, Anne!" answered Elspeth, between a voice and a sob, "don't be thinking of plans and of money now." And something almost like a terror filled her eyes.

That night Hannah put into words for the first time a thought that had been haunting the house. "Heaven help us," she said; "Heaven help us, but it is the truth that Miss Anne's a-going like Miss Hester."

And one day Harriet came in beside the cot on which her sister lay, and her face worked quiveringly, as if she had been brooding in secret over that meek white face of Anne's. The bell-whispers were flying like bats around the room, and their wings were fitting and striking against the ceiling and in the dark corners, and they were saying eagerly, louder and louder, in one woman's ears: "The end, the end."

"Anne, dear!" Harriet said it tremblingly as if she knew of the shadow hovering like a wing over the wandering mind. "Anne, dear!" she repeated.

A tear fell from the stern lash of the instructress, and quite unconsciously to herself she seemed to making lowly apology to the waiting class called from the shadows. "I am going to keep a seminary of my own, Anne, and you and Elspeth shall come away from the old house and the old sorrow. You have lived out the past, haven't you? And you shall have no fret for the future. There shall be a new life for you, and you shall forget the sadness that clings now to your memory. I am afraid I didn't realize your troubles when they were fresh and must have been the hardest to bear. I'm sorry for it now. Come, I'm sorry for it, and wish I'd known when I said many of the things which I now recall with such regret.

"It's all coming right, it's all coming right in the end," murmured Anne, and Harriet took it for a good sign and stole away.

But that night Elspeth heard a stealthy foot creeping along the hall, and silently opening her door, beheld Anne making her way in the dead of night to the front door, carrying in her thin hand a lamp which, shaded by her other hand, cast a sickly glare upon her pinched, care-stricken face. Now and then she paused, and laid her finger upon her lip, or curved her hand around her ear, and when she reached the door she silently shot the fastenings, and noiselessly turned the knob as she must have done so many times in the nights gone by at the click of the never-forgotten key.

"I thought it was he," she said, despairingly, and turned away with a weary disappointment in her step, while Elspeth saw to the bolts again, and went back to her bed and wept till her eyes were dimmed and blurred.

"My poor Anne!" she said next morning, and folded the tall, thin form in her repentant arms.

And a week after Elspeth grimly bade William Pemberton to an interview with his dying cousin Anne.

He came with the old shabbiness upon his waistcoat, the old handsome look worn deep in his face, the reckless look fallen upon his forehead. His hands were so uncertain now, and so restless they passed distressedly and rapidly from one thing to another, now touching his full lips, now smoothing the limp rim of his old hat, now going one over the back of the other till they seemed like evil birds without a spot to perch upon.

"I'd have died for her, yes, willingly," he said, in a voice torn with dissipation and deep with emotion.

"Died for her?" replied Elspeth, unpitifully and scornfully, "why couldn't you have lived for her? There never was a man yet but brought sorrow and trouble upon a woman. Thank God, I never was meant to be mated, and that I have escaped the suffering which even an inclination seems to bring."

She ushered him in where Anne was lying upon her pillow listening to the bells, the bells that were forever floating from far away to her ears now.

He gazed upon her for a moment, and then his bloated form shook with sobs.

"Anne!" he cried aloud, and sank upon his knees and buried his face in her couch.

She stirred uneasily and half rose. "I hear the key," she said, weakly. "He'll never be able to get up the stair alone. Oh, I must, I must go to him!" And she struggled feebly and grasped with her thin fingers at the pillow and at the covering, and then as he crept, or rather crawled and dragged himself like an animal upon the floor, her hand fell upon his head, and he sprang upon his feet, lifting her in his arms, covering her pallid face with kisses at last, straining her hands in his own, pressing her upon his heart, till she turned in his arms and panted for breath.

"Anne," he said, fiercely, "I'm cursed of God. I might have been a good man, and you might have been a happy woman to day. My darling, it was not I, it was the old curse laid upon me in my cradle. I fought it, oh, how I fought it, but it fought back, and it conquered. Don't leave me now, Anne, my darling. I will fight the old battle over again, and live out the curse. How I have hungered and thirsted for you; how I have longed for you; and now—my God, my God—I shall be alone again!"

Her eyes fixed themselves with a happy light, and she listened with a rapt look upon her face. "I hear the bells," said she, "the joyful bells floating from everywhere. I never knew they could ring such sweet music out, and each one is ringing the same song. Yes, Hetty, yes! The old life is gone, and it all seems right in the end. Oh, blessed, blessed end! All the old lonesome love is gone, and I feel the new love in my heart. It is—Elspeth, Harriet, William my beloved, my beloved!—it is all right in the end, and the end is now."

And the soul of Anne Pemberton, spinster, was born away as the bells in the next street struck the first note of their evening chime.

It was months after that the two remaining sisters were sitting, as the twilight deepened, where the shadow of a budding acacia trembled at their feet.

"Sister Elspeth," said Harriet, humbly, but even in her humility there was a certain strength, and an air of sad fact given for the benefit of the uninstructed.

"Yes, Harriet."

"It has been gradually coming to me in these last few months that some women are born with natures that lean toward the married state. I would not for the world cast a breath of blame upon Anne and Hester, but, Elspeth, do you not think—"

"Yes, Harriet," interrupted the other, "Anne and Hester should have been wives of good men and mothers of children. Let us account it no shame to them. But as for me, and I feel that I speak for you also, sister, thank God I never had inclinations that way."

And the two strong-bodied, stout-hearted old maids gave one another the open glance of women when love without romance ennobles their lives. KATE HEATH.

SAN FRANCISCO, December, 1878.

Great power of acquisition is common to millionaires and hogs.

THE FLEA.

A Short Discourse on a Lively Subject.

TEXT.—The wicked flea when no man pursueth; then he biteth as bold as a lion.

I have no doubt that the above is the correct rendering of the Solomonic observation, for in these days every live preacher, from Henry Ward Beecher down to the mere screecher with distorted feature, in fact, every poor creature, sets up his claim to his own private interpretation and alteration of every part of Sacred Writ on the ground of mis-translation, or misunderstanding of the Greek text. So they set up their own dogmas, and I have as good a right as any one, and insist on the above rendering. I have not the slightest doubt that the complaint was forced from him by the attack of one of these pestilent vermin during some of the stately old ceremonies of the temple, when the king was expected to stand majestic, like an essay on the sublime and beautiful, done up in rich robes and with a shiny crown. Fancy the poor soul's agony when he had struck an attitude, and the admiring multitude were all agape at his glory, to feel that electrical little kick in the small of his back, and the insertion of that tiny but sharp, red-hot needle that every flea carries in his pocket. Of course, Solomon's dignity would not allow of his rubbing his back against the corners of his throne; he might not even squirm, so he must grind his teeth and bear the torture while the small assassin took his life.

I have reflected profoundly, and I venture to say painfully, on the flea. I had made his acquaintance in solitary specimens in other countries, but had never met him where he came down in "cohorts, like the wolf on the fold," until I sojourned on the Presidio, in '53. The ground was covered with chaparral, and that swarmed with gray rabbits and wood rats, and they swarmed with fleas, and by the distribution of these fleas they in some measure avenged the slaughter that thinned their ranks. So, becoming disgusted with the Presidio in those ancient days on account of the vigor of its insect population, and having been attracted by the beauty of the country about the Rancho los Pulgas, also slightly pleased with the euphony of its name, of the significance of which I was profoundly unaware, I bought a squatter's claim to some land that lay on the edge of the marsh where is now Redwood City. This land was so hard that the progeny of potatoes dropped in the furrows in the spring grew into the shape of buckwheat pancakes, as we discovered when we turned over the clods in the fall with a crowbar. I felt happy in the thought that soil on which a steel-pointed crowbar would make no impression in the dry season would be impervious to all the flea tribe.

Near to this hard ranch was the ranch and cabin of a good-natured, slow-talking New Englander. Having occasion to see this worthy, I betook myself to his abode. The luxuries of life were not over-abundant, and I noticed a stick ladder, leading to a bunk as near the peak of the roof as could be and allow the passage of man into this queer roosting place. I ruminated somewhat on the significance of such a bed, and was suddenly enlightened by five simultaneous and distinct bites, and looking down, saw the white stockings that I wore with low shoes had the appearance of being sprinkled with pepper in motion. To say that I got out of doors in a hurry mildly expresses the truth; and the rest of my visit was spent perched on the top of the highest fence, while I discoursed with my friend—who, by the way, bore the name of S. Marble Stone, a flea-proof name one would think. On observing to him, between slaps, jerks, and squirms, that his fleas seemed to be hungry and lively, he answered, winking, slowly: "Wal, yaas, I guess they be'v fared pooty slim for a week or two. I rayther come it on 'em in gettin' my bunk up in the peak. I jes' slide out'n every dern rag, 'n then shlin up that ladder, and leave 'em howlin' round my old pants. Yaas!"

By this time I was howling myself. I made a bee-line for a bunch of brush on the bank of the creek, and imitated friend Stone as to the disrobing process. When I was rid of my clothes, I imitated the Celestials of Washerwoman's Bay and turning my clothes inside out, walloped them round a tree trunk with the greatest zeal.

That same afternoon I learned that Rancho los Pulgas signified "The farm of the fleas!"

One of those patient lunatics that occasionally astound the world by making all sorts of things that are infinitesimally small, in the days when old George III. reigned over us, made a gold chain of one hundred links, with a padlock at one end. So small was this chain that it could be, and was, dragged about by a single flea that the artificer had trained with a patience equal to that that forged the links of the chain. This toiler in the minute had also made a tiny wagon of gold, to which he harnessed his flea. The fame of his team had reached the court, and old George, who potttered curiously over all matters to which he could make his profound observation of "What, what, what!" commanded the appearance of this artificer at court with his microscopic team. So to court he went, and royalty was hugely delighted with the elfin wagon and steed. One of the princesses, who united the curiosity she inherited from her sire to that owned of right by her sex, was anxious to know how so small a draught animal was fed. The exhibitor took him gently up and placed him on the back of his hand, and the flea there and then consumed his repast, the princess bending eagerly over to see the operation.

Now, the probability is that education had done with that flea as it does with larger mortals—made him ambitious, and seeing the fair neck and bust of the Princess so near, it was too good a chance to taste the blue blood of royalty to lose. One superb bound and he landed on the white neck, another, and he was safe out of sight lower down, and his owner was in frantic despair, for how could he hope to coax or obtain that vagabond flea from such fair pasture.

But the jolly, good-natured lady retired with one of her attendants for a short time, and soon came laughing back with the daring flea, and it was hard to say who was most interested with the return of the truant, old George himself or the exhibitor.

Bridesmaids are going out of style. Fashion in France now prescribes two tiny pages, who are chosen from the prettiest of the boy relatives of the bride or bridegroom.

ANTONY IN ROME.

Octavia, sister of Octavius, cold

As is thy brother, thou'rt my wife, my own—
Pledge of our friendship. To thee I am sold.
Bound down by law to love thee—thou alone;
And when I view the beauties manifold
Set free at the unclaspings of thy zone,
I almost wonder that I love thee not,
And almost wish the past could be forgot.

I kiss thy pure lips and thy haughty brow,
And think of Cleopatra's rapturous kiss;
I clasp thee in my arms, yet even now
Am dreaming of past ecstasies of bliss
With my grand queen. True love to thee I vow.
I'll be thy slave, thy wedded slave. For this
I left the passionate love, the fierce embrace
Of the last goddess of a godlike race.

O Cleopatra! I am false to thee
Only in seeming. All my pulses beat
In harmony with thine. Thou art to me
More than to Eros Psyche. We must meet Again, my loved one—slave I can not be;
'Tis death. I will arise, and at thy feet,
Free worshiper, drink life from thy full veins—
Love's boundless life, life's most delicious pains.

This pale and starveling Roman beauty's charms
To thine are but as water to rich wine.
Thy Juno form and velvet swarthy arms
Were made for warrior's love—for love like mine;
Love like a tempest rushing through the palms,
Through pylon, court and hall, to inmost shrine,
Followed by dreamy calms of speechless bliss,
Life running out in one impassioned kiss.

Let Cæsar keep his sister. What care I
For him or her, ev'n though she be my wife?
Cleopatra shall have her Antony—
And he his Cleopatra, love, and life.
Unloved let Cæsar and his sister die—
Duty with passion holds but feeble strife.
I fly to thee, Cleopatra, my own,
Thy heart my empire, and thy breast my throne.

SAN FRANCISCO, December, 1878.

W. N. L.

A Lake of the Sierra.

One golden noon, when all the secret ways were free,
I found Sierra's heart; the mountains round were three,
That to their knees and loving arms did gently take
Each quiet ripple of a tender mountain lake.

The long, untrodden grass was full of passing wings,
Of idle birds, and trailing bees, and gauzy things;
While little shining leaves and modest blooms of white
Swung in the gentle wind, and all the world was bright.

Over the lake's blue edge the beaded fern leaves bent,
Willow and aspen boughs their shadow's witchery lent,
While in its changeable breast were gay and glorious shapes
Of all the mountain slopes and gray, reflected capes.

Still, on his steadfast wing, the hawk above was moored,
So near it was as if a cloud the sun obscured;
Faint from his sunny slope there called an idle quail,
By distance mellow grown it seemed to float and fail.

The far off summits of the peaks were white and chill,
They touched the purple clouds, and, satisfied, were still;
And the long slopes, from leaves of fern to heights of pine
And wreaths of snow, had made the quiet lake their shrine.

NILES, December, 1878.

CHARLES H. SHINN.

Phryne.

Three thousand years ago the Spring awoke the Spartan flowers,
And mating birds impassioned sang sweet madrigals of love;
A world of fresh unfolding bloom, expanding with the hours,
From waving censers perfume flung to smiling skies above.

Three thousand years ago, amid the wealth of bloom and song,
Among Dodona's leafy oaks, by Sappho's glowing shrine,
Passed on to Hymen's sacred grove a merry bridal throng,
To weave the web of bridal morn and taste the nuptial wine.

Hymettus, scarred as Tamalpais, looked down upon the sea,
And blue Egean's shining waves fell lightly on the strand
Three thousand silent years ago, and still there seems to be
A trace of that Greek bridal morn in every Christian land.

Praxiteles and Phryne—ah, friends, we know the tale:
Their nuptials, and their lives and love, the master sculptor's fame.
The artist's form is shrouded in the silent ages' veil,
But Phryne, in her youthful guise, remaineth still the same.

And in the Spring, when roses fling their incense to the breeze,
Where rugged Tamalpais looks down upon the shining bay,
Poised like an angel form amid the homestead's leafy trees
A marble Phryne tells of time three thousand years away.

MERCEO, December, 1878.

ANGLE.

"Twenty years ago," said the passenger with the red ribbon in his button hole, "I knew that man whom you saw get off at the last station. He was a young man of rare promise, a college graduate, a man of brilliant intellect and shrewd mercantile ability. Life dawned before him in all the glowing colors of fair promise. He had some money when he left college. He invested it in business, and his business prospered. He married a beautiful young girl who bore him three lovely children—"

The sad-looking passenger, sitting on the wood box: "All at one time?"

The red-ribbon passenger: "No; in biennial installments of one. No one dreamed that the poor house would ever be their home. But in an evil hour, the young man yielded to the tempter. He began to drink beer. He liked it, and drank more. He drank and encouraged others to drink. That was only fourteen years ago, and he was a prosperous, wealthy man. To-day where is he?"

The clergyman in the front seat, solemnly: "A sot and a beggar."

The red-ribbon man, disconsolately: "Oh, no; he is a member of Congress, and owns a brewery worth $50,000. Sometimes it will happen that way."

When told by a Millerite that the world was about to be destroyed, "that," replied Emerson, "is of no consequence; we can get on quite comfortably without it."

Mr. Samuel J. Tilden, to Mr. C. A. Dana
Thee to send me back my love-letters and pres-

OUR SET.

With the exodus of our fashionables for Europe, who rejoiced in unlimited credit in the banks, last spring, we obeyed Miss Grundy's commands; but now these gay butterflies have returned, or will soon return with fresh plumage to dazzle you all. The dear old ARGONAUT welcomed me with open arms, and once again there's "a chiel amang ye takin' notes." Some well known faces and forms we miss from among you, solid men. Death, who loves a shining mark, has made places vacant not easily filled—those whose hospitable doors were never closed. The gamble in stocks has also caused retrenchment in some quarters, but, like the battle-field, others will fill the places of those who go down, so society's ranks are kept full. It is not in our country as on the other side of the Atlantic; it does not take generations of birth and blood to weigh down the social scale, but like the Israelites of Moses' day, we all worship in a greater or a less degree the golden calf. Among the gayeties of the last two weeks there was a charming entertainment by a club of the young sons of our nicest people. They have given them the title of the assemblies, and held their first German at Steinway Hall, on Tuesday evening, November 26th. The German was led by Willis J. Currier and Miss Lutie Cole, second daughter of ex-Senator Cole. Among the ladies present were Mrs. S. W. Sanderson, Mrs. William Freeborn, Mrs. Cornelius Cole, Mrs. Michael Castle, and Mrs. Hall McAlister, and a group of young ladies, many of them débutantes of this and last year. The assembly was excellently managed by the following young gentlemen: W. H. Talbot, Willis J. Currier, Charles T. Crocker, and Seward Cole. This is soon to be followed by several others. On Wednesday of last week I was at the last of the wedding receptions of Mr. and Mrs. William H. Boothe, held at their residence on Filmore Street. I met charming people, and passed a delightful evening. May our young friends, whose future looks so rosy, always find the clouds in their skies silver lined. The German at General McDowell's residence, on Black Point, was a brilliant affair. The German was led by Edward H. Sheldon and Miss McDowell; the favors were unique, and the figures new. An excellent collation was served, and the guests were some of our most prominent society people. Music by the Fourth Artillery band. I did not leave till the wee hours of the morning—our army people know so well how to entertain, and, like many fair ladies, I love the brass buttons. On Sunday evening Mr. and Mrs. Shillaber gave an informal reception at their residence, on Sixteenth Street, in compliment to their guests, General and Mrs. Kautz. The grounds were lighted; the house had a look of old-time comfort about it—the alcoves draped in red, in which were those gems of art, the statues of Delilah and Merope. It was quite different from my usual quiet Sunday evenings, and I enjoyed the innovation; then it occurred to me with what holy horror my Puritan progenitors would have regarded me! the compilers of the blue laws of Connecticut, how they would have hurled me down to an eternal perdition! On last Wednesday evening there was a quiet wedding—Miss Daisy Hunter and Mr. Edward Platt—at the residence of Lloyd Tevis on Taylor Street. The young lady is a niece of Mr. Tevis, and spent some time out here a year or two ago. The ceremony was performed by the father of the groom. Invitations were given only to relatives and intimate friends of the family—recent deaths barring all festivities. On Thursday Miss Donahue, daughter of Mr. Peter Donahue, gave an informal dance to a few of her intimate friends, which was greatly enjoyed. On Saturday Mrs. Gwin, with her charming daughters, expect their friends to a kettle-drum. In your next, I may tell who was there. The afternoon teas have been quite the thing in Washington this winter, and the fair entertainers rival one another in the variety and beauty of their tea cups, the mania for rare china being as rampant among them as among the grandes dames of Europe.

MARY JANE.

It will be remembered by those who keep the run of art and artists that some months ago Tiburcio Parrott ordered of Jules Tavernier a large picture of the ceremonial Indian dance in the sweat-house at Clear Lake, to be presented to Baron Rothschild as a souvenir of his visit to California. The painting was completed and shipped, and has been received in Paris—as the Baron writes Mr. Parrott—"with great favor, attracting a deal of attention and comment at Goupil's, where it is now being framed for my private gallery." This Paris approval of a Californian work is quite a feather in the cap of Tavernier, and a credit to the art status of the coast.

Another of the old land-marks disappears. The well known art gallery of Snow & May will be closed January 1st. For twenty-five years Mr. Snow has been engaged in picture dealing in San Francisco. First Robinson & Snow, then Snow & Kops, and now Snow & May. On Wednesday, December 11th, at the auction house of Newhall, Sansome Street, the entire stock of paintings of the firm will be disposed of—pictures, in oil and water colors—a very choice and desirable collection—many of them chosen by Mr. Snow in Europe. The sale, being peremptory, will undoubtedly afford bargains to those who seek genuine works of art.

French local item: "Two employés of the Hungarian restaurant, being taken with a quarrel yesterday towards six hours of the night at the Champ-de-Mars, thought it their duty to immediately empty this affair in the manner of their country. They put the knife in the hand and commenced a struggle of the most bloody, in the which one of them named J— received a blow of the knife at the bottom of his loins. We then separated them. The wound is happily without seriousness. The murderer, named W—, has been placed in a state of arrestedness."

"Bret Harte," says the London Herald, "is a literary Flying Dutchman. You hear of him as being at a certain place, send there to find him, and lo, he is gone, leaving no trace. Last week he was said to be in London, but anxious inquirers could not hit upon his track." Anxious inquirers may, if they think it worth while, send their accounts to Crefeld, Germany.

Alexander Stephens who recently weighed ninety pounds weighs ninety-two. A Democratic gain.

FABLES AND ANECDOTES.

By Little Johnny.

Missis Doppy which has got the red head like her she was over to our house yesterday, and she brot little Sally Brope, wich is her nees, but not any red hed, brown and cerly. Wen me an Billy, thats my brother, we come home an seen Sally playn in our yard I said: "Billy," and Billy he loked at me a long time, and then he sed: "Johnny," and I sed: "Wot?" Then Billy he sed: "Wot?"

Then I sed: "Billy, do you like gerls?" and Billy he said "Gerls is nasty?"

Then I sed a other time: "Billy, you jest stan by for to se fair play, dont let her hurt me, and Ile giv her the biggest lickin wich you hav ever sav giv!"

But he sed: "No, its bigmy for to lick gerls, cos a gerl aint got any fiter."

But thats jest wy I was a goin to licker, cos lme brafe like sojers.

Bime by my mother she made me go and pla with little Sally, an we plew to gether for a long wile but dident say any thing, cos little Sally she was bashful and I cudent think of nothng for to say. Bout a hour little Sally she spoke up an sed: "Les kis."

I think she is jest the nicest little gerl wich was ever see, yes, in deed, but sossidges aint no slowtches eether, fride, and now look out for a story:

A feller was drivin a waggen settin on the seat, hi up like a steeple, there wasent never sech a hi up seat, and the feller had his dog up there with him, and the road was mity rough. Bime by the waggen it giv a lertch to one side an the dog it was throde out, yes, in deed, it went fline, bout as fur as from here to the cole skulte and lit onto its hed. The man he laft like he wude bust, and he sed: "Wot for did you git down wen there isent any rabbits?"

Then the dog it pult it selfe to gather, and loked up out of its eys, and shuke its hed reel wice, much as to say: "I me too smart a pupp for to ride wen I mite be any minnit throde out."

Jest then the waggen give a other lertch and the man he was sent fline too, and lit on his hed his ownself, and was most kild, but wen he had found his hat, and hollerd wo to the horses, he loked at the dog and sed: "Its curinus how a thundrin cowl makes a brave man cotious. I mite rode up there of my life and never thot of fallu if you badent got scared. And I dont bleef there was any danger, after all."

There was a mockn bird and it was a singin, on and on and on, like it never wude come to a stoppn place, but bime by it was intrupted by a goose, wich said, the goose did: "Xcuse me, but I got a engadgement and I cant say for to hear of you got to say."

Then the mockn bird it said: "You mite jest flew a long to keep your pintment, I gess I woud have come to a end fore you had darted out of hearin."

But Uncle Ned he says me an Billy we can make a goos fly mity fast if its nice roasted.

Mister Jonnice wich has got the wuden leg has ben here, and he rites poetry buttle, so I sed wude he make me sum epitaps, like he did last winter, wen I shode him thasn by Missis Doppy wich has got the red hed on little Jo. Mister Jonnice he sed: "Nothin is easyer, Johnny, you jest furnish the ded corpses and Ile make rimes about em til they cant rest."

But I sed how cude I, and Mister Jonnice he sed: "Well, Ile rite sum any how, and if you ever find any remanes wich wude like for to have em you can dispose of em as you like, or fire em off at any hed stones wich you think thay wil sute."

So he rote thees, but by tween you an me I think they are jest mizzable, not a bit of sense. The bad spelln is hisn.

"Here lie the bones of Colonel Jackson.
The devil got his soul by axin'."

"This monument keepeth from rot
The memory of Gorham,
The Scribe of the Forum,
Who ought to be dead, though he's not."

"Poor Kearney, who lies here asleep,
Was drowned in the briny deep.
He bathed—the unaccustomed damp
Donated him a twisting cramp
That squeezed his bowels through his snout,
Dislodged his soul and fired it out."

"Pause stranger and a frugal tear
For Pickering expel;
Here closed that gracious man's career—
He'd long been dead when, walking here,
He stumped his toe and fell."

"The pedagogue, John Moore, lies here,
Who coached the girls by methods queer,
That wanted to be teachers;
His spirit sings before the Throne,
But not through merit of his own
Nor through the prayers of preachers:
The scamp obtained, by hook or crook,
A copy of the Judgment Book,
And 'crammed' for all its riddles.
So, then, he passed the dreadful bound,
And entered glory to the sound
Of golden harps and fiddles."

"Here rests the orbicular body, a-clout,
Of Johnny McComb, the brigadier stout,
Who went in the ocean and never came out.
Supposed to be sloshing about."

"Here lies the last of Deacon Fitch,
Whose business was to melt the pitch.
Convenient to this sacred spot
Lies Sammy, who applied it, hot.
Tis hard—so much alike they smell—
One's grave from t'other's grave to tell,
But when his tomb the Deacon's burst
(The dead in Christ, you know, rise first),
He'll see by studying the stones
That he's obtained his proper bones.
Then, seeking Sam's vault, he'll unlock it,
And put that person in his pocket."

Now Ide jest like for to know wot all that rot is a bowt, cos I cude make better poiry than that a standin on my hed, and Treesy Collet cude a standin on hern.
SAN RAFAEL, December 4, 1878.

CONCERNING WEATHER-PROPHETS.

One of our Californian growths of which we are not so proud as we might be is the weather-prophet. Unlike most other natural products he is peculiar in this, that the drier the districts in which he abounds the more astounding are his proportions; nay, it might even seem as if the prophetic soul of the summer grasshopper was wont to migrate into the body of the winter prophet, so cheerful and so meaningless is his song, and so similar his habitat. One who is surely a prophet in his own country, if not elsewhere, seriously writes to the papers that the rats and mice in the mountain canons are building their nests up a tree, and higher than usual. They evidently feel the coming flood in their bones, and are gifted with greater prescience than that with which the teachings of science and experience have endowed mankind. Another prophesies a wet winter because we have had no drying winds, while some insist that a plentiful allowance of wind is indispensable. The early rising of the springs in the mountains is regarded as a good sign, but it is not sought to be shown what is the relation between moisture to be blown here from the South Seas in December and January, and the increase of water in the springs in August. It would be impossible to enumerate all the absurd signs and facts which are quoted as the sure forerunners of a wet winter; they have all the charm of variety, and are curiously and conveniently adapted to the most incongruous happenings. Storm and calm, beasts, birds, and fishes in happy family conclave, deliver providential warnings of the new flood, and fall into prophetic line at the word of the inspired clod-hopper. It is a painful subject, and a due regard for public decency would make one pile up all the supposed favorable signs, but, unfortunately, most of them are mutually destructive, and can only be classed as amiable superstitions. "Build your own ark, and don't send the money out of the country," would be the most popular advice that could be given to a high and dry community; but, alas, it is difficult to show anything reliable enough to justify the purchase of an umbrella. The ever-changing and mysterious moon comes out with undiminished vigor on these occasions. If the moon is new, well; if the moon is old, it is also well. Apparently, its strange and irresponsible influence is as likely to be exercised at one moment as another. Our prophets are not proud and will let us take our choice without paying our money. Unhappily, if the observations of meteorologists have demonstrated anything it is that there is not the very smallest connection between the changes of the moon and those of the weather. It is a painful and perhaps humiliating fact that all attempts to generalize from experience on the future course of the weather have hitherto been failures, but the human mind craves for knowledge, and as the cravings of the stomach are stayed by candy and such trash, so, in the absence of more wholesome food, the mind is forced to batten on the babblings of every blockhead who thinks that wisdom is the necessary result of years, or the invariable appanage of an editorial pencil. It is a survival of the old savage instinct which made itself gods out of its ignorance. The sun, the moon, the stars, the stocks and stones of the universe were in turn worshiped, because men knew not their genesis and jumped at a supernatural explanation. Perhaps we have changed all that, but if instinct is placed above reason, and if "rats and mice and such small deer" are endowed with attributes more than human, we can trace our ancestry clearly enough. Already the prophetic clan is gathering, and we may hear them shouting to keep up their courage, but for all their chattering we shall know nothing until the fullness of time. If the reproach be made that it is easy to be wise after the event, the answer is pat that it seems still more easy to be foolish and even childish before it. Is there a kernel of good under all this husk of nonsense? It is not easy to say; but if one were gifted with a symmetrical soul, and were eager to hug even the shadow of a generalization, it might be pointed out that as the alchemist was to the chemist so are our modern prophets to the future meteorologists; but this is a moral, and morals, like good advice, are flowers which do not fruit.

To make a "corner" in anything, particularly in one of the necessities of life, like wheat, is considered, even among the classes of persons by whom it is commonly done, as a dishonorable advantage, not so much because it pinches consumers as because it beats the dealers who are not "in it." Jim Keene appears to be a restless spirit who not only makes corners wherever he may be, but travels all over the country looking up chances to make them. He not only falls when tempted at home, but goes abroad in quest of temptation. If we may believe the press dispatches he is now cornering all the wheat in Chicago, as he cornered mining stocks here and railway stocks in New York. We do not, however, believe the press dispatches: we think Jim Keene honorable enough to plot a corner in wheat, but we doubt if he is wise enough to tell the newspapers.

"The Lord loveth a cheerful giver," but there's no use chucking a copper cent into a contribution box loud enough to make the folks on the back seat think the communion service has tumbled off the altar.

In the bright lexicon of the country press there is no such word as woman. That prude, "lady," has flaunted out the best word in the English language.

Garibaldi says he would willingly give his life for Trent and Trieste. The offer would be more generous if the old man had a longer life to give.

A priest has just been expelled from the Vatican for selling the late supreme pontiff's old slippers and drawers to rich pilgrims.

General Grant continues to work the European free-lunch route in a manner to excite the undying enmity of a Chicago reporter.

Atlanta, Georgia, has five poets and a writer of fiction. The city is perfectly healthy.

Butler and Kearney will apply for a divorce.

PRELUDES—IN DIVERS KEYS.

"Wilt thou have music? Hark! Apollo plays."

I do not know where the responsibility rests, but somebody made an atrociously long programme for the concert given in aid of the Young Men's Christian Association (at the Metropolitan Temple, on Friday night, 26th ultimo), and somebody else blundered sadly in announcing it as a "great musical treat." It was nothing of the sort. Oratorios never are in this city—even under the most favorable auspices—and the fragment from Samson given on this occasion was particularly lame. To begin with, the Handel and Haydn Society cannot sing the choruses. They sing at them, to be sure, in a halting, uncertain sort of way, and in a monotonous, inflexible mezzo-forte; they manage to get through them, but this is not chorus singing, above all for numbers like "O first created beam," or "Fixed in His everlasting seat." (I am aware of the enormous number of corns that are likely to be disagreeably affected through an unwanted [unwanted?] contact with the critical boot, and will say, in advance, that I sympathize. But it remains none the less a fact that for many years past this society has not sung well, and that there does not seem to be the slightest ground for hope that it will ever sing so as to make an Oratorio enjoyable. A chorus that will not learn to sing—i. e., to sustain a tone, make a piano, forte, crescendo, diminuendo, sforzando, etc., together and properly—will never make anything but a mess of Handel's, or any, music. And performed by such a chorus any oratorio becomes a dreadful infliction). The accompaniment to the Samson was simply a disgrace; four fiddles—two of them in the hands of children—a bass, the organ, and a piano forte! Miss Lowell, who played the organ, shows an improvement creditable alike to her master, Mr. J. P. Morgan, and her own perseverance, and played her Toccata, in the second part, right bravely. Miss Dillaye also did some good work in the dreadfully long, dreadfully ugly, and dreadfully difficult Prelude and Fugue of Liszt. The only serious mistake she made was in playing the piece at all; it is too hard for her to do well, and after she has had all the pains of learning and playing it, nobody could possibly enjoy hearing the thing. There was also a Trio from Rossini's Messe Solenne, the "Gratias agimus ti-hi-hi-bi" (I am not sure that "ti-hi-hi-bi" is pure Latin, but this is the manner in which it was sung), a Scena from Il Guarany (an opera that made fiasco a year ago) superbly sung by Mrs. Norton, and three movements from the Serenade by Hiller, very finely played by Miss Schmidt and her brothers, Louis and Ernst. Then the "Hallelujah" chorus by the Society, four fiddles and a bass, the organ, and piano forte!

The managers of this concert missed a good point in making their preliminary announcement. They might have called the attention of the majority of our organ-players—our sloppy sentimentalists, who improvise their "sweet" things because they can not play the good ones—to the programme put forward by two young ladies, who are not afraid to play real organ music of the best class, and who play as though they had a proper respect, not only for the music, but also for the noble instrument. I fancy I can hear the "sweet" organists pipe out their little chorus: "But you can't play Bach in our service, you know; and what's the use of studying these things if one is not to use them, and if the people won't stand them?" Now I do not imagine that either of these young ladies plays much of Bach in service, nor is there much opportunity or occasion for it, though a nobler voluntary than some of the Chorale-preludes would be difficult to find. But I know that the earnest study of the good things leads to an impatience of the bad; that one can not delve far into the spirit of Bach and remain a twaddler, and that there is no better cure for a puny, sickly organ style than the study of the thoroughly healthy music of the old blind organist. It is not so much his compositions as his influence that we need in our church music, and I believe that there is not a congregation in this city but that, if brought for six months under this influence in an intelligent, conscientious way, would reject at once and forever the maudlin stuff that is weekly put before it, and be content with nothing less than a healthy, sound musical diet, no matter how simple it might be.

It is not to be disputed that Mr. Max Strakosch is au fait in the art of advertising, especially in that branch of it that brings much notoriety for very little money. The wrangle with Mr. Mapleson over his right to produce Bizet's Carmen is really nothing more than a clever dodge for advertising this opera in a manner, and to an extent, that it would never do for itself; and I have no doubt that when the music comes to be heard we shall find the entire affair only another case of much ado about nothing. The fact is, that although Mr. Mapleson is undoubtedly the rightful owner of the work—having purchased score, parts, and right of representation from the publishers—Mr. Strakosch might have performed it with the instrumentation arranged from the piano forte score—as is mostly done in this country, and as is probably really the case with his parts for Carmen—saying nothing about the original instrumentation, and the great public would have neither known nor cared anything about the matter. But this would not have answered the purpose; and so we find a great outcry made in musical circles about the "possession of the original parts" of an opera that failed in Paris and survived London only on account of the sprightly acting of Miss Hauck, when we know that neither of the rival managers cares a whit about the originality of the instrumentation, does not possess the original parts to—probably—more than one out of every six operas in his repertoire, and would not be likely to use them if he had them on account of the expense of a complete orchestra. The American public has not been pampered in this matter of original instrumentation, we San Franciscans least of all. I remember to have heard certain operas—Troisvire, Ernani, and others—performed here from parts that seemed to have been cobbled together by some ambitious cornet player who was determined to have the best share of everything to himself, and have seen tenors and sopranos strutting about the stage, open-mouthed, and wildly gesticulating in their futile efforts to make themselves heard through a fortissimo chorus of the brass. And then, perhaps, some gentle classicist in next morning's Call complains of the weakness of Signor Belloini's voice, while his alter ego of the Bulletin finds fault with Verdi for his noisy, or brassy, instrumentation (orchestration, they call it mostly, I believe). The fault is rarely that of either Verdi or the Signor. It is apt to lie much nearer home. So Mr. Strakosch need have but little anxiety in bringing his spurious wares to this market; he has but to open with Troisvire—from the old parts—and the chances are that his instrumentation of Carmen will be hailed as "tender," "delicious," "lovely in color," and what not else of it.

There! he has got an advertisement out of me in spite of myself. Strakosch's one object is to get his opera and his company talked about, and, in one way or another, he generally succeeds. When impudence is trumps, your opera manager usually holds a full hand.

The London operatic success of the moment is Hermann Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew," given at the Drury Lane by Carl Rosa's English company. Like Bizet, the composer—still a young man—died before the success of his work was quite assured, but (and in this his fortune was better than Bizet's) Goetz's opera has been well received in his own country, and is already on the repertoire of a dozen leading theatres. The music—I have but just received the score, which is beautifully printed by Auger & Co., of London, and imported by M. Gray—looks very pleasing, light, and characteristic; I think that, well done, it would prove a success in this country. The adaptation of the text—from Shakespeare's comedy—seems very skillfully made, retaining in many of the scenes all the humor and droll situations of the original.

Mr. Stephen W. Leach announces a concert at Platt's Hall for next Monday evening, 9th inst., and has secured the cooperation of such a host of his fellow artists that a very pleasant entertainment may be anticipated. For my part I hope Mr. Leach may have a full house, for he is an able and careful musician who has done some excellent work, both as a conductor and composer. S. E.

A Case of Pig.

Some one should gather the late Mr. Lincoln's jokes and make them into a book. The following he used to tell on Tom Hamer, of Ohio. Mr. Hamer's client was charged with hog stealing. The case was clearly proven, and when it went to the jury Tom was indisposed to say a word:

"Don't give it up, don't give it up," whispered his client. "But I can say nothing," replied the poor attorney. "But you must. Get up and yowl—holler, holler, man, or I'm lost, and I won't pay you a d—d cent."

Thus instigated, Tom rose gravely and astonished the court by a dissertation on the law of forcible entry and detainer. Then, turning to his jury, he gave them a discourse on the nature and habits of hogs. He called attention to the prohibition of God, through Moses, of hog meat as an article of food. He told how our Saviour put the devil that afflicted the poor man into the swine, and the swine ran down a steep place and were drowned. Tom asserted, however, that all were not drowned, but some escaping, gradually extended the breed of damned hogs—"for," said Tom, "if they are possessed of the devil they must be damned"—until all the hogs of earth had devils in them.

"Let any man owning a corn-field or a garden-patch answer," demanded Hamer. "Is there a fence that will turn a damned hog, gentlemen of the jury? I say not one. It will find a hole if there is one; if not, it will make one. It rattles down bars and lifts gates off their hinges. I have known hogs climb fences; yes, gentlemen, clamber up and fall down, but always fall on the garden side. The devil teaches them anatomy, gentlemen, for who ever heard of a hog falling on his snout? He always comes down on his rump, with a grunt; that is a mingled expression of surprise and satisfaction. When a damned hog—remember, gentlemen, that I quote Scripture; I am not profane—when, I say, a damned hog gets under your buggy he does not run out of the way like a sensible Christian animal; he, on the contrary, goes to backing and getting under every leg of the horse and wheel of the buggy, until the one is broken and the other thrown down. Now, gentlemen, I put it to you: Suppose my client did kill, under the mistaken notion that they were his, six of these creatures denounced by the Almighty and damned by Jesus, is he to be held up as a malefactor and punished by imprisonment? But I deny, gentlemen, that it has been proven. He is innocent. The prosecuting attorney smiles. It is a swinish smile, gentlemen, and makes me ashamed of him."

Hamer sat down with a round of applause from the bucolic bystanders, while his client winked at the jury. In due course of legal forms the jury retired, and soon returned with a verdict of "not guilty."

"Well, I'll be d—d as well as the hogs," exclaimed Hamer, "if I can understand it."

"You can't, eh?" responded the hog thief; "well, I can. Eleven of the jury had some of the bacon."

According to a French paper there was exhibited at the Centennial a patent music-stool containing, concealed in the seat, a steel blade and a strong spring worked by clock-work. When a performer was asked to play in the United States the hostess calculates how many minutes the audience will listen to him, winds up the clock-work and sets it at "10," "15," or "20." If the artist exceeds his time by a second the spring is released. As the Figaro says, this is "cruel but practical."

THE OPPOSING SEX.

Mr. Tennyson's wife is an invalid who spends most of her time lying on a sofa in her drawing-room.

Olive Logan has discovered that man existed 600,000 years ago, and is mad because she wasn't on hand.

Some one says, watch a woman's lower lip if you want to know whether she is offended or her feelings hurt.

Whether a lady claims a rubber shoe which she has dropped in the mud depends on the number of the shoe.

It can not be denied that the number of men found under beds is totally disproportioned to the number of women looking for them.

In Paris fashion discards the poodle, and prescribes a little nigger (negrillon) as an elegant lady's pet, dressed in oriental style.

"Oh, see that my grave is kept green, darling," She did. She bought seven pounds of Paris green and planted it three inches thick.

A colored woman who sat down on a beehive to watch the progress of a fire in Russellville, Kentucky, left her seat before the close of the entertainment.

Some young ladies are opposed to the telephone. They say they do not care to have any young man whispering in their ears with his lips twenty miles away.

Eight female preachers held forth in New York on a recent Sunday, and as St. Paul looked down from his holy perch in high heaven, his teeth gnashed and the thorn in his flesh rankled again.

Sara Bernhardt, the famous French actress, has had herself photographed in the coffin in which she means to be buried. She is so thin, however, that she might be buried in a piece of gas-pipe.

A man committed suicide in St. Clair, Illinois, by drowning himself in four inches of water, but the local newspaper thinks he would not have succeeded if his wife had not obligingly sat on his head.

It was a hard answer, yet deserved. Some one announces the death of a venomous gossip and asserted that she died of poison. When asked what he meant, he replied that by some accident she had bitten her tongue.

Baroness Mary Itulak Artymowska, twenty-five years of age, and moving in the best Russian society, has just been banished to Siberia for forgery, fraud, and bribery, leaving debts to the amount of 2,000,000 roubles.

Miss Florence Davenport, the youngest lady member of that illustrious family, will soon go on the stage. She is very handsome, talented, and is possessed of a superb contralto voice. One, Blanche, is already on the lyric stage.

Dr. Mary Walker has gone at it again. This time she is telling what she knows about "Pure Love and Sacred Marriage." We don't suppose that Dr. Mary knows much about the question, but her lectures last three straight hours all the same.

The Woman's Suffrage Society of England calls for brief statements in a few lines by all female authors. Did anybody ever hear of a female paragraph? The thing is impossible, for all the fair like to have a good say when they begin.

Bertha Von Hillern, who for several years performed remarkable feats in pedestrianism, and thereby accumulated considerable money, has settled down to the study and practice of sculpture in Boston. She says that the walking that she has done has not in any way injured her health.

Miss Lewis, of Liverpool, formally and in set terms—in original poetry it was—renounced her lover, Mr. Molyneux; called him a "deceiver," bade him "go," and declared that hereafter she would be dead to him; then, when he took her at her word and married another woman, sued him for breach of promise.

"We have in our library," says an exchange, "three hundred and two French plays brought out, and more or less successful, in the last twenty years, and many of them have been translated or adapted to the English stage. The plot of every one of this dramatic collection turns on marital infelicity." If it were not for women this would not be so.

A young woman living near Manchester, wishing to be waked early by a young man, tied a string to her foot and let the end hang out of the window, so that if she overslept herself he might pull it. He was up the earlier and pulled the cord, and the clergyman, holding that this was an "act of impropriety," refused him the sacrament.

A letter from a Memphis woman says: "I believe this plague has made a Universalist of me. I have seen men in a moment rise from the depths of degradation and wickedness to Christ-like sublimity in devotion and sacrifice, and the most polluted of my own sex suddenly changed into angels of love and mercy. Thus God teaches us to scorn none of his creatures."

Queen Mercedes has been but a few months dead, but already Alfonso has written to the Pope asking his advice on the subject of contracting a second marriage. He goes on to say that, personally, the thought of another marriage is distasteful to him, but that every influence is being used to convince him that the interests of the Spanish monarchy require him to take another royal partner. This is thin, indeed.

Melissa Underwood, of Vincennes, Ind., was so susceptible to wooing that she promised to marry both Philip H. Donovan and William Ayres. At length she consented to be linked to Ayres if the marriage could be kept secret for a while from Donovan; but Donovan was informed by somebody, and burst into the room just in time to interrupt the ceremony. He grabbed Melissa in his arms and cried: "Hold on; you promised me first." "Go on, person," said Ayres; "we're half married, anyhow, and you've got to finish the job." But the clergyman refused, and Melissa was a wife.

THE LATEST MAGAZINE VERSES.

The Children.

The children! ah, the children!
Your innocent, joyous ones;
Your daughters, with souls of sunshine;
Your buoyant and laughing sons.

Look long in their happy faces,
Drink love from their sparkling eyes,
For the wonderful charm of childhood,
How soon it withers and dies!

A few fast vanishing summers,
A season or two of frost,
And you suddenly ask, bewildered,
"What is it my heart hath lost?"

Perchance you see by the hearth-stone
Some Juno, stately and proud,
Or a Hebe, whose soft ambushed eyes
Flash out from the golden cloud

Of livid and beautiful tresses
That, wantonly floating, stray
O'er the white of a throat and bosom
More fair than blossoms in May.

And perchance you mark their brothers—
Young heroes who spurn the sod
With the fervor of antique knight-hood,
And the air of a Grecian god.

But where, ah, where are the children,
Your household fairies of yore?
Alack! they are dead, and their grace has fled
For ever and evermore. —Harper's.

Sleep.

In a tangled, scented hollow,
On a bed of crimson roses,
Stilly now the wind reposes;
Hardly can the breezes borrow
Breath to stir the night-swept river.
Motionless the water-sedges,
And within the dusky hedges
Sounds no least impatient shiver—
Sleep has come, that rare rest-giver.

Light and song have flown away
With the sun and twilight swallow;
Scarcely will the unknown morrow
Bring so sweet a day.
Song was born of joy and thought;
Light of Love and her Caress.
Nothing's left me but a tress;
Death and Sleep the rest have wrought—
Death and Sleep, who came unsought.
L. FRANK TOOKER, in Scribner.

Love's Young Dream.

TO —

Love, like the evening wind at dusk,
Blow on my heart a dream of you;
As flowers do, that breathe their musk
By windows open to the dew;
An unseen sweetness of the heart,
That can do nothing else but seem,
And yet your very counterpart,
So fair it was, though but a dream.

Our fond lips met to part and meet;
You cannot chide for that, you know;
The mu-k still leaves the rose as sweet,
Nor dims the jasmine's scented snow;
'Twas nothing but a dream of sleep
That came and went, your counterpart;
Yet left me something dear to keep—
Love's unseen sweetness of the heart.

WILL WALLACE HARVEY, in Appleton.

Unanswered.

Strange mists of thought that, welling through the mind,
Drift into shadows vague and undefined;
Fancies that faint before they meet desire,
And, quivering with the breath of life, expire;
Sweet cadences of unvoiced thought that stray
From wandering worlds of music far away—
Wild, wailing melodies that but suggest
With tremulous certainty the unexpressed;

Memories of soul-songs that we do not hear,
Strains from afar that never have been near—
Echoes of answers affluent of bliss,
Vagrants from dream-land floating down to this.

O inner life, that dwell'st apart on earth,
Interrogating Heaven for thy birth,
Whose silence fills the interlude of sound
With a dumb agony of eloquence profound!

Is there no latent fire that can reveal
A rapturous response to what we feel?
No harmony to voice the still-born song,
Whose mighty impotence makes weakness strong?

O question, traversing the realms of space,
I, listening for my answer, faintly trace
Its last vibrations sighing in refrain,
"Always to question is the joy of pain!"
SARA JEWETT, in Appleton.

A Picture.

She sat beneath an ancient spreading oak
At close of day, the while the young May moon
Rose like a queen to grant the promised boon;
He lying at her feet, his purple cloak
Beside him, while delicious silence woke Heart echoes. Fronds of lily ferns made tune
In the soft-sighing wind, and fogcloves soon
Answered the strains, and the sweet silence broke.
Around them bloomed primrose and violet,
The daffodil and dear forget-me-not,
The while the fragrant woodruff made regret
That they so soon should leave the charmed spot;
And the fond lovers looked with lips apart—
Summer in nature, summer in each heart.
—Tinsley's Magazine.

THE CHINESE AND SOCIALISM.

Translated for the Argonaut from the "Revue des Deux Mondes."

In the Berlin Congress, Count Schouvaloff thought it his duty to call the attention of his colleagues to a phase of the Asiatic question which at present occupies the attention of both England and the United States. Making allusion to those hundreds of millions of human beings who inhabit India and the Chinese Empire, he pointed out the danger which not only the British Empire and America but the entire world might run if, some day or other, these hordes, appropriating the arms of a civilization they hate, and taking their stand on the treaties it has imposed upon them, should turn both against itself, and clear the barriers which would then be powerless to restrain them. In incidentally raising this question, Count Schouvaloff was only the authorized echo of fears which, though manifested at a distance from us, and under another form, are not the less real on that account. The American journals, with the vivacity which the feeling of danger gives, have been the first to comment on the opportune warning of the representative of Russia. We need not be surprised at this, for the bonds of sympathy and confidence which exist between the cabinets of St. Petersburg and Washington are not a secret to anyone. The Crimean war fully exhibited them; and quite recently, when a conflict was believed imminent between England and Russia, it was toward the United States that Russia turned her eyes, certain of finding, in the crowd of daring American cruisers, a formidable aid in a maritime struggle.

Whatever the influences Count Schouvaloff may have obeyed, it is quite certain that the peril pointed out by him increases from day to day. Slowly but surely China invades the Pacific States. San Francisco has raised a cry of alarm; Congress has determined to adopt energetic measures; the President is assailed by earnest protests from the representatives of California; and the London Times itself declares, "the Chinese question before long may be more menacing to the American republic than the question of slavery was ten years ago, especially as the immigration of the negroes was involuntary and ceased with the suppression of the slave trade, while the Chinese flow in of their own accord, and it is impossible to say when the movement will stop." Advancing beyond the action of the public powers and of diplomacy, which are always slow and measured, the socialistic radical party has taken possession of the question. It agitates it in its meetings, debates it in the street, incites the fury of impassioned minds, and threatens the local authorities and even the Federal power itself.

In fact, owing to wretchedness and famine, Chinese emigration is becoming a constant factor. The provinces of Northern China suffer from a fearful scarcity, and those human masses, slow to move but difficult to restrain, follow the irresistible current which drives toward these ports, and come to demand of California the means of subsistence which their own government is powerless to assure them of. The movement is encouraged and facilitated by six great companies, represented at San Francisco by Chinese houses of the first rank, and also by the Pacific Steam Packet Company.

When the discovery of gold on the banks of the Sacramento, in 1848, called forth in Europe that great current of emigration, which political events and social commotion rendered still more active, China remained impassive. Novelty and ideas were slowly filtering through her ports, scarcely yet open to foreign commerce, and were painfully climbing the sanitary cordon with which the Chinese Administration still encircled the Celestial Empire. However, the ships that entered Chinese ports took on board not only tea and sugar, but sailors, who were desperate or seduced by the tales of rapid fortunes and inexhaustible placers. These first comers were successful. Some returned, others sent favorable reports; but the difficulty of communication, the high price of the passage, the want of organization, and particularly the fatalism of the race, were all at first opposed to the current of emigration. It was not until 1855 (seven years after the discovery of gold) that the movement assumed any proportions. From 1855 to 1860 the annual number of Chinese landed at San Francisco reached 4,530; from 1860 to 1865 it was 6,600; from 1865 to 1870 it rose to 9,311; and from 1870 to 1875 it exceeded 13,000. At this moment the Chinese population of California is estimated at more than 150,000 souls, and these figures are increasing every year in such proportions that the number of Chinese male residents very nearly equals the number of electors in the State.

Thus in fifteen years the annual number of Chinese emigrants has trebled, while the great current of immigration from the Eastern States and Europe, instead of increasing, has diminished. If we now take into account the fact that China sustains nearly 400,000,000 inhabitants, that their wretchedness is extreme, that large numbers are compelled to eke out a precarious existence on the rivers, that a bad harvest is sufficient (as happens at the present moment) to jeopardize the existence of 70,000,000 of human beings, the fears of American statesmen will not seem exaggerated. If nothing comes to check the movement, before the close of the century China will have taken possession of California, and, driving her waves of emigrants before her, will make her way to the rich and fertile plains of the centre of the American continent. A war of extermination might then wrest from them what they had peacefully conquered by force of numbers, and by labor and slow and patient economy alone.

In San Francisco itself there already exists a Chinatown. In the interior a number of the old placers are occupied and worked by the Chinese. You find them everywhere as market-gardeners, laborers, laundrymen, miners, and domestic servants. They have gradually monopolized all the lowest trades. They are sober, and can live on a quarter of the salary of a workman of the white race. They are hard and steady toilers, and a large number of manufacturers find their account in employing them. They are docile, and have none of the needs of the Irish and Germans, whom they are gradually driving from the humbler occupations. They are industrious and economical, intelligent in their way, and able to get round the difficulties they can not surmount. In the great public works their aid has been gladly availed of. The undertakers of the Pacific railroad have realized immense revenues by substituting gangs of Chinese navies for the Irishmen whom they employed at first. The Chinese, indeed, were satisfied with a reduced salary, worked as fast, did as well, and obeyed without a murmur. In China their salary varied from fifteen to twenty-five francs a month. In California they think themselves well paid at seventy-five or one hundred a month. On this sum they can live and still find the means of economizing. No white laborer could succeed in doing this. It would be utterly impossible.

At starting, the difficulty of communication and the high price of passage created obstacles almost insurmountable to Chinese emigration. To day they no longer, so to speak, exist. The six great companies organized in Chinese ports, and represented at San Francisco by Chinese agents, watch over, encourage, and direct this great current. The price of passage has been successively reduced, first to two hundred francs, then to one hundred and fifty, and finally to sixty. If the emigrant is unable to pay this sum, one of the companies makes an arrangement with him by which he engages to pay them every month a portion of the product of his labor during a certain lapse of time. On its side the company furnishes him with passage and provisions, and on his arrival in San Francisco its agent directs him where he will find work; in case of accident or sickness it assures him relief; in case of death, the transmission of his body back to China. Every year one or more ships take back to China the bodies of such emigrants as have died. This is the only faith that exists among a population indifferent to every form of belief. On the assurance that they will not be buried in a foreign land they leave their own without scruple or regret. To suppose that, in the presence of an organization so powerful and intelligent, Chinese immigration will cease or remain stationary is to suppose the impossible. In spite of the bad reception given to the Asiatics, in spite of the bad treatment to which they are often exposed in places where they are isolated, they push every year farther into the interior. Instructed by experience they are uniting together closely and beginning to show everywhere, if not a threatening front, at least resisting groups, hard to be first attacked, sustaining each other, and imposing by their numbers on their scattered adversaries. On their side they have public right, law, treaties, the principles of individual liberty consecrated by the American Constitution, and the open or tacit complicity of the material interests to which they furnish cheaply intelligent and docile help. This is so true that the committee of Congress, charged to examine the question explicitly, recognized the fact while reporting against them. It admits that in some respects the Chinese emigrant is superior to others; that he is sober, industrious, patient, good-humored, and obedient; that he has rendered vast services to California, he has dug her canals, worked her mines, constructed her railways, and contributed to the development of the country; and that if the question rested solely on the ground of material interest the conflict which exists between the white and Chinese race should be resolved in favor of the former.

Judge Heydenfeldt, when summoned to give evidence before the committee of Congress, also pays the highest compliment to the honor, sincerity, and loyalty of the Chinese merchants.

To get the better of such evidence there must be very powerful reasons.

The report of which we have spoken proceeds to their enumeration. They may all be included in one word: public policy. For the first time in history the two races meet, measure each other's strength, and the defeat of the white race is certain. On the Pacific soil it can not fight with equal arms. Its intellectual superiority is incontestable, but the other has on its side numbers, patience, and the least needs. Without pride as well as without prejudices, it appropriates new processes and recent inventions. Satisfied with little, habituated by misery to privations, economical to excess, it lives and prospers where the white man can not find anything to subsist on. We are now assisting at the curious spectacle of a race whose qualities are arrayed against itself.

A witty writer has said that whenever logic would enter as sovereign into the things of this world it would make more havoc than an elephant in a china shop; therefore, let us willingly leave logic to catch her death of cold outside of the door, and treat those who make use of her name as troublesome and inconvenient. The Chinese invoke it in California as the Incas did in Peru, the Indians in America, and the Celestial Empire itself, when it refused to opium and the Europeans the entry to its harbors which the latter bombarded, imagining that wherever a cannon ball can penetrate, a bale of merchandise and an idea can follow this winged messenger of civilization. They did not foresee that England and America would regret their successful audacity and unite in one common action to protect—the one Australia, the other her Pacific States—against a legal invasion sanctioned by treaties they themselves imposed on China.

[CONTINUED IN NEXT NUMBER.]

Lucy Stone says that, although women have not secured their ballot, they have in her time vastly improved their condition. She remembers when a woman was thought competent to teach only the small children in the summer schools, when her pay for such teaching was a dollar a week, and she was expected to board around. Now women are professors in colleges, with good salaries. In four States they vote on all school matters. Teaching, sewing, and keeping house were regarded as the only occupations that were at all suitable to women. Now the census records seventy-one occupations that are open to women. No woman was a public speaker out of the Quaker church. Now all platforms are free to them. The lyceum offers to the woman lecturer the same open field that it does to a man. The pulpit and the bar are both occupied by women. The woman physician did not exist. Now they have a successful practice in every large city and many of the smaller towns. There was not a college in the world that admitted women. Now there are not only distinctively colleges for women, but a large number that welcome women to all their advantages. It is not many years since a married woman could own nothing that she earned; could not make a will of anything she possessed; could not sue or be sued; could not carry on business, had no lawful right to her children, and could not even be their guardian; nor had she the right to her own person. Now, in most of the States, all this is changed or very much modified.

The present King of Holland was not to be found upon the death of his father, William II. Dispatches were sent to all the Dutch Consuls throughout the world to make inquiries regarding him, when suddenly it was recollected that the Prince had become enamored of an actress in an English traveling company. This was in 1840, and he was then thirty-two years of age. The troupe was found in a small town in Scotland, and the Prince for a month had been acting as prompter. And he wasn't a good prompter.

BOOK REVIEWS.

We have always been in doubt whether we loved poetry or not. We have even questioned whether we were a good judge of the article. Ever since our childhood, along through our school-boy days, when we were in love, and when we used to go out into our father's woods to declaim aloud as practice for the village debating society, in our college days, and later when, in San Francisco, political aspirations made us ambitious to attain to oratorical fame, we have read poetry. We have in our library one hundred and twenty volumes of the English poets, from Tennyson away back to the old ballads. Since writing for the ARGONAUT we have read a wilderness of poetry, and yet we have never quite made up our mind as to whether our taste inclined to the jingle of rhyming verse. There are some poems that have made upon us a strong impression; some we can repeat; some linger in our recollections in broken fragments, like the memory of sweet sounds, pleasant dreams, or good dinners enjoyed and passed. We have been oftentimes mortified to find that we had admired the wrong ones and found beauties which no one else but ourselves could perceive; and we have just as often found ourselves languishing over what we called a stupid piece of verse, to be informed by some one whose superior taste and judgment we never dared to question that it was a "splendid poem." We have been sat down upon time and time again by those who have edited verses into the ARGONAUT, that we thought ought not to have been printed, and we have revenged ourselves, when their backs were turned, by surreptitiously putting poems in the printers' hands that we liked. This accounts for the fact that good and bad verse gets into our columns. The writer of this puts in all the good and the other gentlemen put in all the bad. We would run a column of "old favorites" every week if we had our way; and if our poet-editors ever leave town or get rich enough in stocks to retire from business, we will run an entire page of favorites from the old masters. Porter & Coates, of Philadelphia, have printed, and Billings, Harbourn & Co. have presented us with, a splendidly got up book of splendid poetry, entitled the Fireside Encyclopedia of Poetry, compiled by Henry T. Coates; and it contains nearly all the poetry we ever thought poetry, and it does not contain any of the trash that has been imposed upon us as the genuine article. A beautiful book of 1,000 pages, bound in Russia, containing all the good poetry the English speaking world has ever produced, with numerous steel engravings, is the one before us. The work is a comprehensive collection of the choicest poetry of the English language, an encyclopædia of the best and brightest poems of all the best authors. It is a magnificent Christmas gift.

From the press of Henry Holt & Co., of New York, there comes a work in the same general direction containing a series of selections from American authors no longer living, embracing poetry, fiction, humor, satire, and sketches of life and character. This work demonstrates the poverty of America in polite literature for the first century of its existence. Judging from some of our living authors we may expect to make a better showing in our next centennial exhibit.

From the Punch office, Fleet Street, London, and republished by Estes & Lauriat, Boston, through Billings, Harbourn & Co., we receive a copy of The Beconsfield Cartoons, one hundred and eight in number, funny pictures, containing caricatures of Benjamin Disraeli from the time he was an adventurous boy daring to aspire to political leadership in England till he reaches the summit of his ambition and becomes the Premier of the realm. An eventful and adventurous life, that of this young Jewish gentleman, who dared, in spite of race prejudice, and without the aid of birth or fortune, to attempt the achievement of the highest political honors of the proud nation that stands at the head of Christian civilization. That he succeeded is evidence of the most exalted genius. The first cartoon represents Disraeli as the young Gulliver commencing his attacks upon the ministry of Sir Robert Peel in 1845. Sir Robert Peel was the Brobdingnag Minister. The last cartoon represents the distinguished Premier enjoying his otium cum dignitate—his work done, his honors fairly won.

As in the natural world, so in the world of book-making. The rains that fall from the heavens are usually pure and clean and refreshing, but sometimes the clouds drop frogs and angle-worms, dead meat and putrid fish. We do not discuss the theory, we but state the fact. The Society in Search of Truth, or Stock Gambling in San Francisco; a Novel, by J. F. Clark, formerly a Member of the Pacific Stock Exchange, Published by the Author, is a small green frog of a book, in which the author has fairly wrenched himself in an abortive attempt to be witty. His highest flight of fancy is to call Mr. Flood Mr. Highwater. His characters are a Judge, a Commodore, a General, and a Captain. He marries them all, and their servants, to women imported to San Francisco for the purpose. The book is stupid, without beauty of style or interesting incident. We would not go so far out of our way to write of it were it not a home production. It enjoys the one distinction of being the most indifferent work ever put forth on this coast. So far as we are informed, no book house keeps it for sale.

Mrs. Roberts tells this story in the Washington Capital: "People have said John Sherman had no heart. That shows how people can be slandered. A man with a family to support was dismissed from the Treasury, rather unjustly he thought. He concluded that Government positions are rather uncertain things, and he would go to Kansas, where he had a show for employment. Money being low, he thought he would try to get back for one month, and his salary would pay the expenses of the journey. So he went to John, explained the situation, and that he wanted to get to Kansas, but had not a cent. 'Well,' says the financial head of our country, 'I'll help you on your way,' and gave the other a quarter. That family is packing its trunks in joyous haste, for they have been started on their long journey, having on hand enough to pay the fare in the street cars to the depot."

The New York Observer mentions the case of a Kentucky Presbyterian minister, who, at a Monday meeting of his brethren, prayed, saying: "Lord, Thou has seen by the morning papers how the Sabbath was desecrated yesterday."

JACK AND THE BEANSTALK.

It is a charming work to trace to their origin the various legends and nursery tales, for even in such seemingly foolish and childish stories we find that an ancient religion or paganism is at the root, and that the fable which we thought devised to amuse the children is really the remnant of the old belief of some tribe or people in days long since gone by. It is certain that no religion, however violently overthrown, expires at once. It protracts a lingering life, and, though rejected by the enlightened upholders of the new creed, is cherished by the ignorant, and its traditions are handed down by mothers to their children from age to age.

For some time this oral lore is kept secret, because it is held to be antagonistic to the religion which is publicly professed; but in a few generations, when its religious significance has faded from remembrance, its treasures of story are taught and remembered—no longer as sacred myths, but as popular tales. Some of these are believed even at this day to be historical, and places have been assigned as the birth-places of the hero, as witness the myth of William Tell and others of the same sort. We propose considering the story of Jack and the Beanstalk, which, although a fairy story for children, is really a mythological tale belonging to the pre-Christian Norse invaders of England.

All remember that Jack was the son of a widow; that he sold a cow for a handful of colored beans, which his angry mother threw out of the window. Next morning, the beans had taken root and grown to the sky. Jack ascended and reached a land above the clouds, and at night sought refuge at the house of the giant who ruled over this heavenly land. The giant had three great treasures: One of these was a red hen which laid every morning a golden egg; the second was a harp which played of itself the most delicious music; and the third was bags of gold, silver, and diamonds. All these Jack stole in succession.

Such is the outline of the story, but the main incidents with which we have to do are these: The existence of a superterrestrial land, to which access is gained by a tree; a giant, one-eyed, and the possession by the giant of the gold-egg-laying hen, the magic harp, and the treasure bags. Now all these leading points reappear in ancient mythologies, and connect the story to them so securely that it is impossible not to recognize in it a myth of the remotest antiquity.

"I remember, I remember
The fir trees dark and high,
I used to think their slender tops
Were close against the sky."

"It was a childish ignorance,
But now 'tis little joy
To know I'm further off from heaven
Than when I was a boy."

What Hood learned in a very few years cost uncivilized man ages to discover.

When the descendants of Noah built their tower of Babel their object was to make it so high that its top "might reach unto heaven." The natives of New Zealand believe that the Father of Forests keeps the sky from falling on the earth by the tree tops scattered over the face of the earth. In a South American story a lad stuck a piece of wood into the earth, which became a fir tree, and grew with amazing rapidity until its top reached the sky, and by this he ascended into heaven. In the mediæval legends of the Cross, in like manner Seth journeys to Eden, and sees the tree of life—its roots in hell, its crown in heaven. Around the trunk was wreathed a frightful serpent, which had scorched the bark and devoured the leaves. Seth saw Cain in hell, endeavoring to grasp the roots and climb into heaven; but the roots laced themselves around his body and limbs, and the fibres penetrated his body as though they were gnawing worms. Seth plucked three seeds from this tree. They grew, and uniting formed one tree, whereof in the fullness of time was made the Cross. This idea of a land above the tree-tops is common to various countries, and to the old mythology of Saxons and Norsemen. It does not prove a common origin; it only indicates a common ignorance. In their minds the earth was a flat plain, surrounded by the sea, and the sky formed a roof on which the sun, moon, and stars travel. We next come to the giant dwelling in this upper region. This is Odin or Woden—the "All-father." He was one-eyed, like the giant in the nursery tales, and in the Norse sagas is always recognized by his one eye.

The barbarians from whom we are developed were sadly puzzled by the sun. What was it, a shining stone, a burnished disc, a fiery wheel, or a golden egg? The Norsemen thought it a table of burnished gold on which the gods ate. The old Greeks thought the orbs of heaven were golden apples hanging on the branches of the world-tree in the garden of the Hesperides. Ovid calls the sun a wheel, and in Arab myths it is the luminous egg of the mighty bird Roc that haunts the diamond-sprinkled Vallev (the sky) in the adventures of Sindbad the Sailor. The idea that the sun was an egg of gold laid every morning by the Dawn was the origin of the fable of the man who killed his goose to get the golden eggs. The Druids considered the golden egg of the sun was laid by a heavenly serpent, and the Greeks thought the evening and morning stars were hatched out of eggs, and beautiful "Helene, fair Helene," the moon, issued likewise from an egg. The return of the sun with force in spring was symbolized of old by the present of eggs, a practice sanctioned by the church, whilst giving it a different significance, in the origin of Easter eggs.

The one-eyed giant had also a harp which played of itself the most enchanting music. This is the wind. It must be remembered that the giant is the supreme god of heathen times, and has atmospheric attributes. Sometimes he is said to have a spear or arrow that never misses its mark: that is the lightning. The magic harp of the wind rolling its deep tones through the ancient Norwegian forests had marvelous powers attributed to it. It made everything dance. A lad in a fairy tale wins his bride by playing at a feast where she is to be wedded to another, and keeps the guests dancing until they are too exhausted to move a limb, when he runs away with his own true love. Orpheus and his lyre are brought to our minds by this fable.

The third object was the treasure bags. By their glittering spring, summer, and autumn rains are symbolized. A German fairy tale relates how there were two sisters, the one when she smiled dropped roses from her lips, and her tears were diamonds, while the other when she opened her mouth gave escape to newts and frogs. This story represents two spring months, one flower-producing and sparkling with precious flowers; the other, the elder month, is destructive and prejudicial to growth. It was the universal notion that the clouds were vessels containing water, and it is represented in the story by the bags. Moses speaks of the rain as "water poured out of heavenly buckets," and Job calls the clouds the "bottles of heaven," tracing in them a certain similarity to the skins in which water was transported on camels over the desert. Æolus gave Ulysses a bag containing the winds, and they all got out at once and made it exceedingly lively for the old warrior. This belief is widespread, and throughout the world we find it in some shape or other. The storm bags of the north are however replaced with sacks of diamonds in the south. With such material as these barbarous conceptions of natural phenomena many of our most ancient household tales are made up. The same ideas, not always arranged in the same manner, occur throughout the world wherever men are ignorant and the laws of nature are misunderstood, and it gives a clearer idea of the common origin of man when we see the Norsemen and the Hottentot, the ancient German and the North American Indian, adopting the same rude symbols to express the mysterious working of old Mother Nature.

HAYWARD'S, November, 1878.

Buy a Home for the Wife.

"Every man should own his home, if he can. That philosophy which tells a man to drift on over the ocean of this uncertain life without a home of his own, is wrong. The man who does not own his home is like a ship out on the open sea at the hazards of the storm. The man who owns his home is like a ship that has arrived in port and is moored in a safe harbor. One man should no more be content to live in another man's house, if he can build one of his own, than one bird should annually take the risk of hatching in another bird's nest; and for my own part I would rather be able to own a cottage than hire a palace. I often see men eager to effect an insurance upon their lives, and this is well—it is right. But the man who owns his home has effected an insurance upon his family—which is as much to him, if his mind is right, as his own, and constitutes his own. I have seen the homes of the people in foreign lands; I have heard them talk of their conditions and lot in life, and this is the main theme of thought with mankind everywhere. As I listened to them I discovered why it is that the Switzer in his hut in the Alps, where the limit of vegetation is reached and the winter storm howls and rages around him, is happier than the Italian tenant on the beautiful plains of Lombardy, amidst the bloom and fragrance of perpetual summer. It is the consciousness of the ownership of a home, which, no matter how the storm rages, nobody can take from him, and which he can make happy in spite of the storm. I would say to every man, buy a home if you can and own it. If a windfall has come to you, buy a home with it. If you have laid up money by toil, buy a home. If you have made money in stocks, buy a home. Do not let anybody tempt you to put all your winnings back in the pool. Put the rest back if you will. Gamble on it if you must, but buy the home first. Buy it and sell it not. Then the roses that bloom there are yours. The jessamine and clematis that climb upon the porch belong to you. You have planted them and seen them grow. When you are at work upon them you are working for yourselves and not for others."

The foregoing is an extract from an address delivered at Metropolitan Temple by the Hon. George Barstow, and while it contains an idea that should govern every man, it does not cover the entire ground. Our position is this: Every woman who performs the duty of wife and mother should own a home. It is the first duty of every business man to purchase a home and secure it to his wife by such an instrument of conveyance as shall place it beyond his own reach—beyond his own temptation to risk it, and beyond his own ability to encumber it. No man should ever marry unless either the wife or husband has the means to procure a home. The prosperous business man owes this duty to his wife, his children, himself, and his creditors, to segregate enough of his wealth to secure his family from the possibility of becoming homeless by the vicissitudes of business. The commercial code that declares it dishonorable for a man to thus consider his wife and children before the claims of creditors a false one. A man in debt has no right to steal a homestead after it is once secured to the family. The business man who yields a home honestly acquired to his creditors, through a false sense of commercial honor, is a coward and a thief. In fear of losing the respect of creditors he steals the roof from over his family. Our nation is but the aggregate of the homes of the people, and in the permanency and happiness of our homes our national strength and stability are to be found. In the home lies the strongest and most enduring element of national life. If every family in America had secured to it a home, our republican government would be immortal.

The following interesting narrative is condensed from a full-page article in a New York daily newspaper. It is, in fact, that article's head-lines, thoughtfully so constructed as to permit editors of other journals to give all the particulars that the most exacting reader could demand, and at the same time save their souls by not making distinct assertions: "Dead and yet alive. The extraordinary case of Miss Fancher, of Brooklyn. Facts verified by abundant testimony. A mental sight that is not the clap-trap of clairvoyance. Lying for thirteen years almost motionless, and at times cold with the chill of death and pulseless; blind, yet reading with perfect ease; seeing and describing acts and persons far removed from her bedside; mental phenomena that might seem incredible except for the testimony of physicians, clergymen, teachers, and trustworthy friends; without food for months at a time; seeming never to sleep."

Kaiser William of Germany scorns to spell his name Wilhelmj. It is only a fiddler who would do it.

Despite the hard times there has been no reduction in the wages of sin.

NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Rates of Subscription, $1 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance. Postage prepaid. City subscribers served for 35 cents per 4 weeks. Single copies, 10 cents.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."
 Branch Office, Cooper's Bookstore, 746 Market Street
 Agent at San Jose—F. A. Taylor.
 News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders should be addressed.
 A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PIXLEY, }
 FRED. M. SOMERS, } Editors.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1878.

The winter season is again upon us, and again the labor question is likely to present itself for the consideration of our municipal authorities. The experience of last season should admonish us to be prepared for the exigencies of this. The mob that last year gave us so much of anxiety is now better organized; it is strengthened by a political victory, and, if we may judge by the expressions of its leaders, has in no degree abated the insolence of its pretensions. Kearney is the more dangerous because in a sense he is honest, and in a degree earnest. The movement is the more dangerous, because the working man has grievances of which he may justly complain. If Kearney were mercenary, he might be bought off; if he were ambitious, he would split upon that rock in search of office. Kearney is partly right and partly wrong. His adherents and followers are some of them honest, earnest, good men; some of them are villains; some of them are industrious, willing workers, ambitious only to earn an honest day's wages with an honest day's labor; some of them are idle vagabonds, tramps, and criminals. Some—perhaps most of them—are ignorant, and of foreign birth; some are intelligent foreigners; and some are Americans, native born. Some of the leaders are honest, misguided, shallow thinkers; some are adroit, subtle-minded, selfish rogues and demagogues. To denounce what is known as the Kearney movement with angry and unreasoning vituperation would not only be impolitic and unwise, but unreasonable and unjust. It should be treated calmly, intelligently, and firmly. To the extent that it arrays itself against the law, it should be promptly checked; to the extent that it deals in threats of violence, it should be boldly confronted with the assurance that any uprising for the purpose of disturbing social order will be met by bayonets and bullets, in the hands of stern men, who will consider it the very essence of humanity to make the first encounter a bloody one, in order that it may be the last. There should be no force—except in self-defense—until every argument has been exhausted to convince the honest and intelligent members of the organization that the laws should be observed. Reforms should be inaugurated wherever abuses exist. Foreigners should be educated to the American belief that in a government republican in form there is only one path to the correction of political abuses, and that is through the ballot-box. Intelligent men and good citizens, of foreign or native birth, will recognize and understand such arguments; they will be convinced, and their conduct will be governed by them, and upon the honest and well-meaning, but ignorant, of their associates they will exercise a healthful and restraining influence. The vicious, the idle, the profligate, the tramp, we will leave to the chain-gang, to be driven to daily labor with ball and chain, and water and bread.

But this is not all that society, organized government, and wealth are called upon to do. Good advice and admonitions to observe the law are very well, but brains and property have yet another and a paramount duty to perform. It is the duty of organized society to furnish work to every head of a family who has no means and no other source of livelihood than his labor. The husband and father who is willing to work, and whose daily bread for wife and children depends upon his daily toil, to whom God has given muscle and not brains, has a right to demand of organized society that it furnish him a day's labor and give him for it a day's wages; he has a right to look his fellow-citizens in the face and say to them: "My wife and children are suffering for bread. I am not improvident, I am not drunken, I am not lazy; I am willing to work, and upon my work depend the lives of my loved ones, and unless you give it to me I will take it by force if I can; I will take it by violence if I must." There is no answer to this plea. We care not for the sophistries of any political economists, or the hypocritical subterfuges of any false and selfish reasoning that denies work to a workingman under such circumstances. He must have it, he is entitled to it, and it is right to raise the devil unless he gets it. If the municipal authorities, by reason of defective laws, have not the technical right to furnish this labor, then it becomes the duty of citizens to meet and organize a labor bureau, and advance the means for its support. Citizens should be called upon not to give, but to loan the money. If it is a gift, only the generous will respond; if it comes ultimately from the city treasury, taxation will equalize it to all. If there is no existing law for this purpose—and we believe there is not—the Legislature can pass one at its next session.

The first and best effect of a bureau that furnishes labor is to segregate honest and industrious workers from the vicious and idle. There is no present mode of determining between honest poverty and criminal idleness. There comes to our doors a poorly clad man; he asks for work; we have no work. He asks for food; he asks for money. We have no means of testing his sincerity. He may be a fraud—he usually is—and yet he may be a hungry man who would be glad of work. There is not a householder in San Francisco who has not been called upon either to feed a worthless vagabond or refuse an honest man, a thousand times. He can not tell the worthy from the unworthy; and whether he gives or withholds, his conscience reproaches him for a possible mistake. Now, give us a labor bureau, and to this traveling mendicant we say: "You can obtain work by going to the labor bureau." This distinguishes the honest from the vicious, and draws the line between the laborer and the tramp; enables us to aid the honest, and leaves the vicious to be dealt with by the stern discipline of the criminal courts. We would not pay the highest wages, so that we might not come in competition with the private employer. We would fix the hours of labor at eight hours, and would pay for it one silver dollar at the close of the day's labor. Thus we say to the workingman: "We do not exact full hours; we do not give full wages; we do not encourage you to lean upon us; we are simply aiding you to bridge over a temporary difficulty." This takes from the sand-lot the unanswerable argument that accompanies the declaration that for lack of employment there is a class wanting bread. We say to the demagogues: "You lie." We say to the vicious and idle foreign rogues: "Go back to your native bogs in Ireland, to your huts and hovels in Germany, to your damp meadows and dirty towns in Holland. Go back and eat leeks in France; go and toil, upon garlic and a crust, upon the plains of Lombardy; go and yoke yourselves with dogs and drag carts in Belgium; go plow in harness with horses and cows in Austria; go back to your native lands and do military service for your kings; go home and be shot to uphold your dynasties, or in fights to rectify your borders. You are not intelligent enough or worthy enough to be American citizens. You are too ignorant to appreciate the blessings of a free government. You are not Americans."

All other questions are political ones; we can discuss them through the journals, at the hustings, upon the sand-lot, in the Legislature, or wherever differences of political opinions may be properly considered. Mr. Kearney says the Chinese must go, and Colonel Bee says they must not go; they are here by invitation of international treaties. Kearney has a perfect right as a naturalized citizen to say that the Chinese must go, and—within the law—he has a right to endeavor to compass their removal. Colonel Bee and his friends, though they are most assuredly in a most woeful minority, have the same right to say the Irish must go, and—within the law—they have a right to endeavor to compass their removal. Foreigners armed with political power, after being duly naturalized, have a right to say that native-born American citizens have no claim to office, and ought not longer to be tolerated with political power, and—within the law, if they have the majority—have a right to put none but naturalized citizens on guard to protect Republican Government; and Americans, native-born, have a right to think that naturalization laws are, and have been, a mistake, and that they ought to be repealed, and that it would be better if about half our foreign element was denaturalized and no more admitted to citizenship.

Freud, the German corset maker, Vacquerel, the French cook, Bonnet, the Parisian hair-dresser, O'Donnell, the Irish quack doctor, Beerstecher, the Prussian lawyer, have the authority to aid in making an organic law for the government of this State; to reorganize our judiciary, and consider how our corporations shall be controlled, and how property acquired before they left the palaces, castles, and baronial halls of their ancestors, shall be held. All these are political questions, and we can meet and decide them at the ballot-box. The other, the labor question, is one in which they have us at a disadvantage so long as there is one deserving, honest, unemployed man in their ranks demanding work, and for whom work is unattainable. When we have taken him out and provided for him we can take care of the balance, rank and file and leaders, by accepting any challenge of settlement they may decree it advisable to suggest, and by this we mean, that if they invite—as Kearney seems to hint—an armed conflict, it shall not be declined by the citizens and property-holders who are interested in preserving their property and protecting their laws against this insolent band of agitators.

One word to the ladies: We say to you, keep your hands off; do not meddle in affairs that demand a sterner handling than your sympathetic natures are capable of understanding. With your piety and your sensibilities you complicate things very much. With your very generous free meals you invited all the old "bums" and tramps in the State to come to San Francisco. One good square meal is all they want; it is what they tramp and spar for. Should you do the same thing this season you will fill the town with vicious, idle persons. A little less showy and ostentatious benevolence than is required in washing dishes and waiting upon criminals and vagabonds, and giving a premium to vagrancy and idleness, would enable you to patrol the alleys and by-ways in your immediate neighborhood in search of modest poverty that would rather starve than feed at your public cribs, would enable you to find and relieve poor women and poor children, and minister to their wants, and thus do a world of good.

We regard these remarks as timely, in prospect of the possibility of a recurrence of the scenes of last year. We must prevent the shameful proceedings that last winter discredited our intelligence and disgraced the name of our city. We have had a prosperous season, a bountiful harvest; labor has been abundant and remunerative; the outlook for the winter is a good one. Let us hope there will be no necessity of organizing any aid to our workmen; but if there is, let us promptly do it, so that we can as promptly deal with the vile element that makes labor troubles an excuse for disturbing the public peace and threatening the tranquillity of our city.

There are four men in the Constitutional Convention whose conduct surprises us, and with whose course we are disappointed. Of course we are observing them from a distance and through the imperfect and somewhat misty medium of the daily press. They are persons of large experience in political affairs; two of them are gentlemen as we Americans understand that term, and each has been honored in a position of public trust and confidence. How far poverty, disappointments in life, defeated ambition, and general bad luck may influence their course and legislation we are not prepared to estimate. How far they are bitten by the tarantula of political ambition, and to what extent the virus has extended we do not know. An old politician warmed into life by the new hope of a last opportunity is a sad and pitiful object, and it really seems as if a good working majority of the delegates intended to make this Constitutional Convention a stepping-stone to their personal advancement. Judge Terry of San Joaquin, Volney Howard of Los Angeles, Timms of Trinity, and Larkin of El Dorado—all Democrats, thank God!—are developing themselves into agrarians and communists of a type quite as pronounced, more dangerous, and less respectable than that of the sand-lot leaders whom they are anxiously endeavoring to supplant. When men of respectable intellectual attainments, who have held high legislative and judicial positions violate all known rules of propriety and all recognized obligations of society in their endeavor to pander to the prejudices of the voting mob that they may attain position, we may regard the sign as an ominous one. Whether these gentlemen, three of whom are lawyers, and all of whom are politicians, and who have always been politicians, can wrest the leadership of this new party from the men who created it we do not know. If they do, we shall think the movement has got into the hands of more dangerous, more selfish, and less honest men than those who originated it.

The Chronicle is engaged in house cleaning. It has read the alien Englishman Wellock out of the party, and now the Irish O'Donnell gets one for his nob. Poor Knight and Day, who started in early upon the sand-lot plan of reformation, were passed out by the Chronicle long ago. So there are now left among the leaders only Kearney and his private secretary, Carl Browne, whom—if we understood Kearney correctly in his Sunday speech—he denounces as a liar. In the party there remains then but one leader—that is, one leader beside the Chronicle. The Workingmen's Party, as constituted to-day, is the Chronicle and Kearney. The Chronicle is the organ, and Kearney grinds it, while Beerstecher, Clitus Barbour, Vacquerel the cook, Freud the corset-maker, and Bonnet the hair-dresser, are the monkeys that dance to the music as Kearney jerks the string and turns the crank. This Workingmen's Party is a curious development. Its rank and file composed of lawyers, abortion doctors, played-out politicians, foreign mountebanks, native-born demagogues, French cooks and hair-dressers, and having for its chief an illiterate, profane, and blasphemous Irish drayman, who keeps his private secretary, and tramps the continent in a Pullman palace car at the expense of real workingmen, who toil ten hours at hard labor for two dollars

AFTERMATH.

It is undoubtedly true that when Kearney began his agitation seven-tenths of his followers were Irish Catholic laborers. Bishop Alemany was almost the first of our clergy to observe that this movement was a vicious one, and that its promoters and leaders had no honest motives to serve. He was the first to warn his church people against participating in what was intended to be an insurrection against the law. Kearney felt the blow and unwisely lost his temper; denounced the church, misrepresented an interview with Bishop Purcell, and began to blaspheme God. This has alienated from him every honest-minded member of the Roman Catholic Church. He stands to-day at war with the law, with property, with social order, with republican government, with civilization, with the Christian religion, and with God. Yet there are a few shallow-minded demagogues—some in the Democratic party, some in the Constitutional Convention, some in ward politics, some on the bench, and some in editorial chairs—who think this base born and ignorant adventurer, with his ragged regiment of tramps and bums, is to lay the foundation of a great national party, to work out great national reforms.

Everybody remembers Signor De Vivo, the advance agent and bill poster for singing circuses—"an amoozin little cuss," as Artemus Ward described his performing kangaroo. Perhaps some of our theatre and opera sharps can tell us if it is true that he is now a member of the Italian Chamber of Deputies, and is chairman of the Committee on Finance. We find it so stated in an Eastern journal, and as our ignorance of the movements and capacities of circus people is dense and base, we confess it seems to us as likely that he is that as anything. We are told also that the King frequently consults Signor De Vivo, but this is unlikely. We do not believe that Signor De Vivo can be so easily approached—not our De Vivo.

Standing upon the corner of California and Montgomery Streets on Thursday evening we saw a multitude of school ma'ams filing into a broker's shop, and upon inquiry ascertained that their object was to sell their warrants for a discount. And then we thought of the million of money expended for school purposes, the half of which is squandered; of the street department, and its swindling for street sweeping and sewer draining; of the City Hall, costing $5,000,000; of Lobos Square and Senator Rodgers; of the exorbitant salaries; of the political bums, paid for doing nothing; of the millions it costs to run our municipal government; of the cost of lighting our streets with gas; and of the hundred and one treasury leaks; and we went to our office, and wondered whether the whole male sex was not a mistake, and whether it would not be well to turn over all our affairs to a petticoat government. It would be certainly an improvement in the way of honesty.

As long as human nature, and particularly American political human nature, remains the hogghish thing it seems satisfied to be, there is nothing but the maddest nonsense in the hope of composing our difficulties with the Indians by any such machinery as the Indian Bureau of the Interior Department. A system that requires the disbursement of large sums of money and vast quantities of goods at remote points on the frontier, on no better vouchers than an occasional receipt signed with a cross by some clay-painted barbarian with a name that has to be broken gently by decent blanks to the Acting Twenty-third Assistant Deputy Sub-Auditor at Washington, must be esteemed an invention of the devil, creditable alike to that old public functionary's head and heart. Under this system, with its grotesque alliance of political, commercial, and religious "tramps and casuals," it has cost us a million dollars for every lecherous scalp-holder whom we have dissuaded from the war-path by presents of repeating rifles with telescopic sights, and another million to civilize him up to the point of eschewing the savage vices of gluttony and plunder for the Christian virtues of drunkenness and cheating. The annual additional loss of life which our Indian policy entails is enormous but unimportant; the only lives on the frontier that are worth a tinker's malediction are those of the army officers, and those are never taken.

The ruinous and disheartening sacrifices made for the maintenance of an Indian Bureau by us and the Indians have no adequate result. Being involuntary they have not even the elevating moral effect of a benevolent contribution to an unworthy object. There is a certain satisfaction in heroically maintaining a nuisance, even if it afflict oneself as keenly as one's neighbors, but the pleasure vanishes the moment there is any compulsion in the matter; and for the better part of a century the Government of this country, incited by the immigration agents of the Better Land, has had its long fingers in the pocket of every person who has had the hardihood to acquire a taxable jackknife, to support this insupportable abomination, the Indian Bureau. And now when an earnest and intelligent effort is making to efface the thing, transferring its necessary functions to the men who have the deepest and directest interest in their honorable performance, and who are themselves the only honorable class of men in the public service—the officers of the army—there is a concerted yawn of dissent and apprehension from Maine away down to Connecticut, and back again all the way to Maine, following the chart line of greatest religious depression. Our godly and blue-bellied Puritan contemporary ancestors seem to have somehow convinced themselves that an Indian Bureau is an essential means of grace to that minute and apparently undeserving fraction of humanity which their uncomfortable creed reluctantly excludes from universal and foreordained darnation.

There is not a township in any State in this Union whose soil has not at some time been soaked like a surgeon's sponge with innocent blood shed through the barbarous miscarriage of some theologico-piratical Indian policy, of which that of the present Bureau is the lineal descendant and legitimate heir. But the people of the States east of the Alleghany Mountains have forgotten their part in this unpleasant business; it was only their grandfathers and grandmothers who were flayed, roasted, and brained by the sons of nature justly incensed at being accosted by that frowsy bawd, Civilization. We in the concededly golden, but indubitably ticklish, West have a nearer sense of the brusque hatchetings and frank skin-strippings whereby the virtuous Red Man declines with thanks; and if that useful department of our Government that is responsible for his defects of civility depended for its life and disservices on the popular will out this way, it would be voted out of existence with what it would be mild to call unanimosity.

The second siege of Jerusalem continues. As in the olden time the sacred walls were environed by Roman hosts, with catapultic missile, battering rams and engines throwing javelins and stones, so now the chosen people are driven to cover by the aggressive hosts of Ireland. Sierra Nevada only $45 per share; Johnny Skae captive of war; the environed hosts demoralized; margins growing narrow, and a money famine threatening the besieged on the inside and a Flood on the outside; there is no hope, except in a surrender without terms. No marching out with side arms and the honors of war; but absolute, unconditional surrender.

When Celt and Saxon meet,
Then comes the tug of war;
When Israelite and Greek,
There's thunder in the air.

Fay Hempsted is a poet and Sam Williams is her critic. And Sam says: "Fay is a nice name, and suggests youth, beauty, and a passionate soul palpitating with warm fancies;" but Fay's verses he condemns as dull. Well, the poor girl had to make them so in order to show that she isn't that kind of a girl.

Within the last twenty years some twelve or fifteen Chinamen have been naturalized in the city of New York. Of the three naturalized last year, "all could read and write and said they believed in a Christian God"—whatever that may be. The reading and writing our American institutions are strong enough to dispense with, but the faith in a Christian God, or a God of any kind, is in these days a rare and noble qualification for American citizenship. Even Wellock, the alien Englishman, would be a more interesting aspirant to political power if he had been "suckled" in this "creed outworn" than he is in the attitude of squaring himself and "putting up his hands" against heaven. The trouble with the average Chinaman is that he and his ancestors before him have been so accustomed to violating the sanitary regulations of nature that he recognizes God in his constitution.

California has turned out ("fired out," the coarse of speech prefer to say) another great actor. We throw off ("throw up," the vulgar have it) great actors with the astonishing facility of a Briarean tadpole eschewing a hundred tails. They never come to much somehow after their first fitful fever of the Eastern popularity that consists in complimentary notices in theatrical programmes (which they industriously compile and send back to their journalist friends here as "commendation from high quarters") but while the thing is new and their memory here green they work the oracle with amazing success; seen through the spectacles of their co-conspirators of the local press every puny devil of the lot of them looms up against the background of Atlantic fog as an intellectual giant. Of Tom Keene we are seriously told that "a leading Richmond paper" says "his acting in Baltimore has placed him at the very head and front of the actors of the day;" and that "other" journals "compare him with the elder Booth." This last judgment we are not disposed to quarrel with; as actors Tom Keene and the elder Booth are to-day running pretty nearly neck and neck—though the latter has perhaps a trifling advantage in being stone dead, whereas the former will move if you touch him.

The President, in his message, seems to have avoided all the burning questions, and to have confined himself to a somewhat tame review of all others. We of the Pacific are disappointed, and have a right to be, that he has no opinion upon what we deem a vital question; or, if he has an opinion, lacks the moral courage to utter it. The parallel between negro slavery and Chinese immigration still holds good. The alarm and anxiety of the few is met by the indifference of the many. Slavery was terminated by civil war. Chinese immigration seems destined to produce an equally terrible result. This question will find a peaceful solution at the National capital, or a bloody one upon California soil. President Hayes has determined to make his four years term a pleasure excursion. He is keeping the log of the voyage by omitting to enter any of the unpleasant or threatening incidents, so that history may record that his empire was peace. We hope he may get ashore before the storm comes, as we are convinced he would make but a poor captain in a tempest.

Why is it men will scorn a maid
Of thirty-two or so,
But if in crape and cap arrayed
Pronounce her comme il faut? — The World.

Because however comme il faut,
However, too, arrayed,
The girl of thirty-two or so
They don't believe a maid.

After a severe fit of sickness Heller has gone to see whether there is any positive of which he was the comparative.

The Fire Commissioners, having detected the Secretary of their Board in discounting at usurious rates the pay of firemen before the same was earned, have fired him out. They have acted promptly and well. We advise the Board of Education to make their examination searching, and then to turn out all the male malefactors who have been engaged in the sale of contraband examination papers; and when the Board of Education have cleansed the schools of incompetent and criminal teachers, we advise the people to turn out the Board of Education and put in better men. And then we advise the Legislature to so change the entire system of public schools that it will not be necessary to purchase the conundrums prepared by Mrs. Carr, and to bring the instruction within the capacity of intelligent female teachers. Turn out the males, or make them work for the same price that ladies work for. Turn out all the married women that are supporting idle husbands; bring matters down to some principle of economy and common sense. The present school system is a fraud and a sham. It is worse, it is a crime; still worse, it is a blunder.

The manager of one of our theatres has received from an ambitious gentleman whose name we suppress a letter beginning thus: "Sir I herewith submit to you a true pencil cut of my both feet what do you think of them are they worthy of exhibition I am told by many persons when properly advertised and pictured up they would draw immense." The gifted and fortunate writer adds: "My right hand is also very queerly formed which would all make a fine display on a large poster." The submitted diagram of this aspirant's foot looks somewhat like a picture of a pair of sheep shears nipping a monkey wrench, but rather more like a map of Europe, Asia, and Africa, drawn upon the back of a starfish.

Signor Carlo Pizzola has struck a streak of bad luck in this foreign land. He has been arrested, tried, and fined for cruelty to animals. It appeared in evidence that he has a reprehensible habit of purchasing cats from boys, and immediately cutting off their tails—the cats' tails—and dipping the stump in a barrel of salt. This, a tiny witness explained, "made them run around pretty lively." Signor Pizzola maintained that his object was to increase the health of the cats, but we beg to urge that if privation of tail were a condition of a cat's health God would doubtless have created them without tails. We suspect that the liveliness observed by the small witness is not so much an indication of improved health as a sign of mental confusion and temporary inability to think in an emergency.

The circumstance that Signor Pizzola is rear-admiral of a celebrated sausage factory sufficiently unmasks the animus of his prosecution by the officers of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals; it is not that they love cats, but that they are enamored of sausages, and have committed themselves on the cylindrical comestibles of this man's construction. The ARGONAUT does not eat sausage, and, so far as concerns this prosecution, is an impartial journal; and we say that it is a wicked and unholy thing to arraign this unfortunate gentleman for one crime and punish him for another.

The topic is fascinating and we are loth to leave it. Pizzola testified in his own behalf that his place was overrun with rats, and that he purchased the cats to kill the rats. This relieves him of a grave suspicion. Clearly he did not buy the cats for sausage, but like an honest man employed them to catch the rats which he needed in his business.

Mr. Laine, a member of the Constitutional Convention, has the honor to be peacefully permitted to consider Mr. Charles Francis Adams, Jr., "the biggest fraud in the country." And yet Mr. Laine's ambition is not satisfied; he seems to aspire to Mr. Adams' contempt, which, being rather high, for Mr. Adams can not by any means be aware of Mr. Laine's existence.

IS IT NOT FATE?

If any one had told Cora Penwick that she did anything so ill-bred as "nag," she would have been "deadfully insulted"—would have quivered with Lilliputian indignation from the crown of her sunny head to the sole of her pretty foot. But the rectitude of immortal fiction must be preserved, and I grieve to say that Cora Penwick—the dainty beauty, the charming housewife, the pet of San Mateo's selectest coterie—did this thing; and it is but scant commendation to acknowledge that she did it thoroughly and well. I said Cora Penwick, but that was because I knew her as a girl and may assume privileges. I should have said Mrs. Gemini Penwick, for she was married.

It all came about in this wise: In the summer of 186—, when Gemini Penwick was a gay widower of twenty-nine, with a lucrative practice and no incumbrance, he chanced to be in Shingle Springs during a court recess, and there he met Cora Lennox. "They met by chance, the usual way"—the story is older than the hills. They met, they mated, and they married.

Some one has somewhere said that most novels end where they should begin. So, behind this rampart of borrowed commonplace, I fearlessly intrench myself and begin this underdone tale in the middle.

Cora Lennox became Mrs. Gemini Penwick. Joy bells pealed, old shoes were flung, and tears and kisses tinkled in delighted harmony. He took her home. "Oh, how beautiful it is!" she said; and truly it was rather pretty—a lawn with cherry trees in the angles; a plat of daisies; another of violets; a pansy hedge, and "roses everywhere." Inside, the house was quite a marvel of convenience, comfort, and good taste. It was not large; but there was a boudoir for Cora, and a library for Gemini; could heart ask more?

For a year they were very happy. To be sure Gemini did smoke à excess, but it did not make him fretful, fault-finding, churlish; it merely helped to intensify the soothing charm of his pretty wife—and as for other bad habits, why, he hadn't any. If Cora sighed for social conquest and society bustle she gave no sign. "Home is home," she said, "and love is enough." Nor did her husband sigh for the bachelor pleasures and privileges he had relinquished—clubs and club-men were alike relinquished, or, if remembered, unregretted. Gemini believed in the home life he had chosen, and loyally striving to contribute his share to the home sunshine never once looked back. So for a while they watched the rurn of happiness full to the brim and were content. He read aloud his favorite books, and her beautiful sea-green eyes glowed in excitement or glistened in sympathy. They drove, and rode, and walked, and boated, and sat together. Is it not for this the gods have made the world always young, that Pan has piped, Aurora painted, and Flora decked our mother's mantle?

For fifteen cloudless months Gemini and Cora wooed each other as if they were not husband and wife, and therefore trespassing upon the lawful preserves of unmarried lovers.

"Perhaps I had so much sunshine then that Fate grudged me any more," I heard Cora say one evening—an odd evening long afterward. It was the nag oblique, but I saw poor Gemini wince.

A baby girl had come to them by this time; the pride, the darling, the what-not of their hopes. It was only another bond between them. If Gemini erred in thinking his wife needed but little society other than his own profuse attention, it was an error born of his deep affection; and Cora's failure to attribute this to the proper feeling was inexcusable blindness. Yet this was their first stumbling-block, and unhappily they did not note its huge proportions until the mischief had been done.

"I don't care for strangers. Why should I? I have you. Why should we bring a lot of people to stand between us and our quiet pleasure-duties? My dear, if I agreed to your plan, yours would be the worst punishment; you would end by banishing yourself from society altogether."

These were among Gemini's objections to Cora's apparently innocent scheme to go into San Mateo society during the season succeeding the weaning of baby, merely as an acknowledgment of courtesies shown and favors received. Many and many a good-natured tilt they had, until at last, by sheer persistence, she carried her point.

So Gemini put his "Praise of Folly" into an overcoat pocket, and went out into the world with a flower in his button-hole, and another dower on his arm; but with a smothered sigh in his throat, and a cruel void in his manly heart. If a cherub with a flaming sword had circled about Cora's hapless head, to drive her from the shelter of her husband's arms, he could not have pointed out a surer road to desolation than the labyrinthine paths of social folly.

Gemini was not a darning man, but there was always a card-room and buffet for the wall-weeds, and Penwick's club habits returned with marvelous celerity as the home charm was broken more and more. They went everywhere, and of course Mrs. Penwick received. Very soon, also, the house was found to be too small, and a conservatory, a dancing parlor, and a billiard-room did not make it much larger—though one of the cherry trees was cut down, and the daisy plot bunched to the back yard.

Gemini's library became a deserted garden. The dear Tauchnitz, "Thackeray," the "Burton," the "Autocrat," and the other favorites slumbered voiceless on the shelves. Gemini must not enter the pretty boudoir any more, for the sacred rites of Millinery and her kindred were paramount and perpetual.

And yet Cora Penwick was no Rosemaud Lydgate, no upas tree among women; she was only a "foolish virgin" wandering without her lantern upon a journey that knew no whither; a journey that was all a mistake, but from which she was too proud to turn. Was he to blame that his warnings were misjudged, his badinage misunderstood? Should he learn to dance and risk the gauntlet of ridicule for the cheap bliss of clapping his own wife in a public romp? On the other hand, should not he eat, drink, and be as merry as a wall-weed might, whose wife was adance with other men, and he was the footman to see her home?

Did she love him still? I think so; but from society-lore she had learned a fatal, biting gibbness of speech that skilled her disappointment of society to sting the one thing vulnerable within range—her husband's heart. He was a man strong in purpose as men go, tireless to do when the object seemed worth the having, but his robust vigor could not thrive on the little sips of happiness his present life afforded; so was it strange that he turned to the only solace within his reach?

Strong men have been fatally weak so often that the world has ceased to wonder. From Noah to Gemini Penwick is a long historic stride, but in the type there is but little differentiation. He might have said: "The woman tempted me and I did eat;" but he was too true a knight to breathe complaint: no word of reproach ever passed his lips; he suffered and drowned his sorrow as best he might. It was sorry comfort, perhaps, but it was the best his unreligious nature could find, for the love of this woman was all that kept the fire of his intellect lighted.

To-day men call him a sot, and Cora Penwick is no longer the pet of San Mateo's selectest coterie. The world terms it incompatibility. I merely ask: Is it not fate?
SAN FRANCISCO, November, 1878. R. S. S.

THE OLDEST DRAMA.

The social life of a people, what they feel, do, and say, will always possess a more agreeable interest than their philosophy or poetry. Take away the familiar figures of Socrates, the elder Cato, and Dr. Johnson, from their respective epochs, and most of the attractions which they now possess would disappear. Persons who pass by with indifference; a discussion as to the relative merits of the 10,000 Hindoo divinities, would read with avidity the story of the every-day life of the humblest of the world's dreamers.

The recent labors of oriental scholars have made it possible to offer something like a true picture of Hindoo life from a century before Christ to the present day. We know of no work which would be more acceptable to the English public than an ancient Hindoo story in the style of Becker's Gallus and Charivari, wrought out by a learned and skillful hand. The drama of Sacontala, of all the translations of Sanscrit literature, as it was the first, so it is still, the most interesting literary work that has appeared.

Kalidasa, the author of Sacontala, was one of the "nine gems" of the court of King Vikramaditya, who, about half a century before Christ, began the Hindoo era called Samvat. The drama was first translated into English by Sir William Jones. The original which that great pioneer in Sanscrit literature used was, however, a copy of an inferior class of manuscript, and the translation itself bears marks of that haste and inaccuracy which could scarcely be avoided by the discoverer of a new literary world. The more recent and exact labors of Dr. Boehtlingk and Monier Williams have set forth the beauties of this chosen work of the "Shakspeare of India" in a clever light.

The play begins with a prayer to Siva, embodied in the five elements—fire, earth, water, air, and ether (the vehicle of sound)—and, after a brief prologue, advances with rapid action.

Dushmanta, accompanied by his charioteer, was pursuing a black antelope. The King, as he was fixing his arrow in the bow-string, was terrified by a voice from the forest into which the game had fled, which called him to forbear. Upon the word, two hermits issuing forth, bade him replace his arrow in the quiver.

"The weapons of Kings," they admonished him, "are for the deliverance of the oppressed, not for the infliction of wounds upon the innocent."

"The word of a Brahmin is accepted," answered the King, and he replaced his arrow. Upon which the hermits entreated him to enter their sacred retreat and partake of its hospitality. Their master, Canna, they regretted to inform him, had just left his home to visit a distant place of pilgrimage in hope of averting a threatened evil from his daughter, Sacontala.

The hermits then retired, and the King, dispatching his charioteer to water his horses, advanced alone into the sacred grove.

"It is strange, I feel my right arm throb," he suddenly exclaimed, looking around the tranquil hermitage. "What important event is about to happen? Truly the gates of destiny lie open everywhere." As he thus meditated he heard the sound of female voices, and, himself unseen, witnessed the approach of the priestess Sacontala and two attendant damsels, who employed themselves in watering the plants of the grove.

Sacontala, whose superior charms distinguished her from her fellows, was attired in a coarse mantle of bark, a sight which caused the King to exclaim against the equal folly of cutting a branch of hard acacia wood with a lotus leaf, and making a lovely maiden perform penance.

"Do you know," asked one of the attendants of the other, "do you know why Sacontala is gazing on the plants with such delight? She is looking at that jasmine (the light of the grove that has just elected the fragrant mango tree for a husband. 'So may I,' she is hoping, 'elect a worthy bridegroom.'"

As the two damsels were thus bantering Sacontala, the King looked upon her face, and felt a sudden love for the artless woodland maiden arise in his heart. With his love fire mingled. May she not, he thought, be a Brahmini, and ineligible in marriage to one of the military caste.

Seizing a favorable opportunity, he discovered himself to the maidens with the salutation: "May your devotion prosper. I am a student of the Veda," he continued, "dwelling in the city of our King, and have come hither to behold this sanctuary of virtue. But tell me," he said earnestly, and turned to one of the damsels, "can this young maiden, Sacontala, be the daughter of the sage Canna?"

What was his delight to receive the answer that Sacontala was but the adopted daughter of Canna, and that her real father was a person of no higher caste than his own, a king.

As the maidens were bathing the feet of the stranger his mind was again tortured by the fear lest Sacontala was destined to pass her life as a priestess. This fear was also removed by the reply that the lovely maiden intended to ally herself with a worthy husband. The turn which the conversation had taken caused Sacontala to frown, and, averting her head, she would have retired had she not been restrained by her companions.

At this point the party were interrupted by a cry from the King's officers, who bade them beware of a wild elephant that had just broken into the forest. The King assuaged the fear of the ladies, and as they turned to retire, one of the attendants said to him:

"We are ashamed to offer our inadequate hospitality to a guest as a reason for seeing him again."

"Nay," replied the King, "I have received all the honors of a guest from the mere sight of your ladyships."

Sacontala said nothing, but impeded the flight of her friends by complaining that her foot was hurt by a pointed blade of cufa grass, and that her vest of bark was caught by a branch of a vine; a gentle reluctance which the King's love noticed and cherished.

"My own body," he exclaimed sadly, as he moved away, "my own body goes forward, but my heart runs backward like a banner borne against the wind."

Upon the King's return to camp his buffoon, Madhavya, in vain tried to awaken him from the reverie into which he had fallen. The buffoon's jests upon his lord's indifference to the chase only drew from the King an order that his officers should not molest the grove or irritate the holy men.

"Remember," he warned them, "that the sages conceal under their asceticism a vital fire; like a crystal lens that, however cool, emits a burning heat when touched by the rays of the sun."

"But how foolish," urged the clown, changing his mode of attack, "that you who have so many court jewels in your harem should wish to add to them this rustic prize. Truly the cooling tamarind is pleasant after the luscious date."

The unprosperous jests of the buffoon were interrupted by the presence of two Brahmins. Having saluted the King they begged him to enter the asylum of the grove and defend it from evil demons who in the absence of the sacred Canna had invaded its repose. The King listened eagerly; in vain the clown tried to dissuade him from this new temptation; a sacred duty had ranged itself upon the side of desire, and he told the Brahmins that he would comply with their request. They retired, and he was preparing to follow them when a messenger from the Queen Mother was announced. He informed the King that four days hence the ceremony of cherishing the body of a son would take place, and that his presence was most earnestly demanded. The King, after a moment's hesitation, concluded to send the clown in his place, and hastened after the hermits.

After a few twangs from his bow the demons fled, and the King's thoughts recurred to the banks of the stream where he imaged the lovely Sacontala reposing. His steps rapidly followed his fancy, and again unseen he saw the three lovely maidens. But, alas! Sacontala was no longer the blithe creature that he had before beheld her; her neck was bent with languor, and her wasted wrist could endure no heavier bracelet than the stalk of the lotus flower; her comrades sadly whispered to each other the gentle cause of her ungentle malady. Sacontala, at the urgency of her friends, at length, to the delight of the monarch, confessed her affection for the stranger; and, to relieve her heart, pricked upon a lotus-leaf these verses:

"Thy heart, indeed, I know not, but day and night, cruel one, love inflames the limbs of one whose desires are centred in thee."

The King, enchanted at hearing these words, came forward and replied to Sacontala in verses not less affecting:

"Thee, O slender-limbed one, love inflames, but me he consumes; the sun does not cause the lotus flower to fade as utterly as it does the moon."

Sacontala's damsels soon retired, and she was left alone with the King; in her embarrassment she dropped her bracelet, which the King reclapsed upon her wrist. But the royal hand trembled, and the royal eyes were as two flames of fire.

This is not the end of the play, but we trust we have said enough to persuade our readers to hasten and read the story in full whenever they can find it.

Many of the old masters made amusing and curious blunders in their works. Tintoretto represented the "Israelites Gathering Manna," armed with guns. Gigoli painted the aged Simeon at the circumcision of Christ with a pair of spectacles on his nose, and Rubens committed the same error in his famous picture of "Mary Anointing the Feet of Christ." In a picture of "Christ Healing the Sick," by Verrio, the spectators are represented as wearing periwigs on their heads. Albert Durer painted the expulsion of Adam and Eve from the Garden of Eden by an angel in a flounced dress. The same artist, in a picture of "Peter Denying Christ," introduces a Roman soldier smoking a German pipe. A Flemish picture of the wise men worshipping the infant Christ has one of them depicted in a large white surplice and in boots and spurs. In this incongruous dress he is represented in the act of presenting the child with a model of a Dutch man-of-war. An artist of the same school, in a painting of Abraham offering up his son Isaac, the patriarch, instead of using a knife as described in the Scriptures, is holding a blunderbuss to the head of Isaac. Bellini has pictured the Virgin and Child in the act of listening to a violin; in another picture he has drawn King David playing a harp at the marriage of Christ with St. Catherine. In a French picture of the "Last Supper," the table is ornamented with tumblers filled with cigar lighters. The crowning blunder is shown in a painting of the Garden of Eden, in which Adam and Eve are represented in all their primitive simplicity, while in the immediate background appears a hunter in a modern sporting suit in the act of shooting ducks with a gun.

Bill of Fare for Six Persons.—Suoday, December 8, 1878.

Oxtail Soup.
Boiled Trout, Genoise Sauce.
Breaded Lamb Chops. Mashed Potatoes.
Baked Egg Plant. Stewed Celery.
Roast Canvas-back Ducks, Currant Jelly.
Cucumber Salad.
Italian Cream and Strawberries.
Fruit-bowl of Apples, Figs, Plums, and Grapes.

TO MAKE OXTAIL SOUP.—Cut one oxtail deeply at the joints. Chip a small slice of salt pork very fine; put into a soup kettle, and when partly cooked add a small onion (chopped). When these have browned put in the oxtail, and fry for ten or fifteen minutes, turning often that it may be evenly browned. Set the kettle off until partly cooled, then pour two quarts of cold water over the contents, and boil slowly for three hours. At the end of this time add a small carrot sliced, part of a root of celery, a couple of sprigs of parsley, two cloves, and pepper and salt to taste. Boil one hour longer; strain and set away to cool, first putting in several nicely trimmed joints of the oxtail. The next day remove the fat from the soup, heat it thoroughly and serve with one or two joints in each plate.

TO MAKE ITALIAN CREAM.—See Vol. I, No. 12.

INTAGLIOS.

Some Flowers.

Here are the flowers she wore in her hair
At the charity-ball. You remember
You sent them to her with a tender note
One snowy day in December—
Hellebore's purple and roses bloom,
Geranium leaves in their sweetness;
Words of honey and dew and fire,
Love in its fond completeness.
She asked me to send them back to you,
The night that she lay a-sleeping;
"Too late," she said, "for any return,
Repentance, or replying;
Only he knew that my soul was his,
That his whisper and glance had won it."
You quaffed the sweetness as men will do,
And left the shadow upon it.
Here are the flowers she wore on her breast,
In the stilly coffin lying,
Tuberose with the odor of death,
Love and remembrance sighing.
I took them away from her waken hand—
Months have passed since you kissed it;
Up in the country whither she went,
I wonder if she missed it?
So take them back; when women are young,
Before the world's deceiving,
They are ready to trust for the best of life,
In men and in love believing;
But when one drains to the bitter dregs,
Let the coffin-lid close over;
What matter then the faded flowers
Sent by a faithless lover.

AMANDA M. DOUGLAS.

Song.

Love came to me with a crown,
I took it and laid it down,
Love came to me and said:
"Wear it upon thy head."
"Tis too heavy, I can not wear it;
I have not strength enough to bear it."
Then my soul's beloved spake,
Saying: "Wear it for my sake."
When lo! the crown of love grew light,
And I wore it in all men's sight.

ELLA DIETZ.

Storm.

Here, where my windows open on the sea,
And white waves darkling under hidden stars,
I hear the breakers, dashed against the scars,
Surge in a barren effort to be free.
The storm swoops hitherward from murky skies;
The rain, blown east on westerling window-panes,
Splashes the casement with its blinding stains,
And down the valley's cleft the pent wind sighs.
What hath the day done that the night should hear
Such loud remorse? What hath the wind to tell?
What secret this upheaved from ocean's hell?
What is God's mandate? Where is Nature's fear?
Nay—while creation's travail groans like this
We shall not learn God's message; but to-morrow
Gold skies shall glow the brighter for passed sorrow,
And spent sea-tumults calm to meet their kiss.

October.

A haecnal fair, at the edge of the wood
She stands, where the grapes hang purple and low.
Her crimson bodice is torn aside,
And her soft, pale bosom glows like snow;
Amber buds in her tresses droop;
Her sensuous lips are red and rare,
And carved in a dazzling, treacherous smile;
Her arms and her feet are white and bare;
Her cheeks are stained with the blood of the vine;
A jeweled serpent is on her neck;
Her sleepy eyes are filled with the light
Of baleful heacons in time of wreck.
A Circe of beauty, half-divine,
Yet wholly earthy—a Queen of Wine.

FANNY DRISCOLL.

Two Men.

One was a king, and a wide domain
He ruled as his sire's had done;
A wooden hovel, a bed of pain,
Belonged to the other one.
The king was ill, and the world was sad—
But the monarch languished, the monarch died;
The beggar was sick unto death, but he had
No one to watch at his low bedside.
Then under the minster the king was laid,
While o'er him the marbles were piled;
But a shallow grave in the fields was made,
By careless hands for Poverty's child.
But now there are those who profanely declare,
If you opened the tomb and the grave,
You could not distinguish his whatever your care,
The dust of the king and the slave.

CHARLES NOBLE GREGORY.

Judge Not.

How do you know what hearts have vilest sin?
How do we know?
Many, like sepulchres, are foul within,
Whose outward garb is spotless as the snow,
And many may be pure we think not so.
How near to God the souls of such have been,
What mercy secret penitence may win—
How do we know?
How can we tell who have sinned more than we?
How can we tell?
We think our brother walked full guiltily,
Judging him in self-righteousness. Ah, well!
Perhaps had we been driven through the hell
Of his untold temptations, we might be Less upright in our daily walk than he—
How can we tell?
Dare we condemn the ills that others do?
Dare we condemn?
Their strength is small, their trials not a few,
The ride of wrong is difficult to stem,
And if to us more clearly than to them
Is given knowledge of the good and true,
More do they need our help and pity, too;
Dare we condemn?
God help us all, and lead us day by day,
God help us all!
We can not walk alone the perfect way;
Evil allures us, tempts us, and we fall.
We are but human and our power is small;
Not one of us may boast, and not a day
Rolls o'er our heads but each hath need to say,
God bless us all!

—Attributed to HARRY LARKYNS.

The Gilded Age.

O friend! I know not which way I must look
For comfort, being, as I am, oppressed.
To think that now our life is only drest
For show—mean handiwork of craftsman, cook,
Or groom! We must run glittering like a brook
In the open sunshine, or we are unblest.
The wealthiest man among us is the best.
No grandeur nor in nature or in book
Delights us. Rapine, power, expense—
'Tis his idolatry, and these we adore.
Plain living and high thinking are no more.
The homely beauty of the good old cause
Is gone—our peace, our fearful innocence,
And pure religion breathing household laws.

WORDSWORTH.

HISTORICAL FIBS.

Professor Wheeler recently read a paper before the Yale Alumni Association in which he "exploded" a number of popular historical tales: The famous saying attributed to Louis XIV. of France, "L'état c'est moi," according to Professor Wheeler, was never uttered by Louis at all, but was said by Mazarin twenty years before Louis came to the throne, and said before Mazarin by Queen Elizabeth. Sappho never killed herself by jumping from a rock, but died a natural death. Leonidas fought at Thermopylae, not with only 300 at his back, but with 7,000. The philosopher Diogenes never lived in a tub. The story of the virtues of the Roman matron Lucretia must be rejected, while the story of the Horatii and Curatii is worse than doubtful. The sons of Brutus were not the victims of their father's firmness, but of his brutality. It was utterly impossible for Hannibal to have followed up his victory at Cannae, and the story of his using vinegar to cleave the rocks of the Alps is absurd. So, too, is the story of Cleopatra dissolving a pearl in a goblet of vinegar and drinking up a fortune at one draught. Archimedes never said, "Give me a lever long enough and I will move the world;" nor did he cry out "Eureka!" at any known period of his life or discoveries. Alexandria was never visited by Omar, nor was the Alexandrian library burned. No more did Galileo say: "And yet it moves for all that!" since it is proved from authentic documents that he did not dare to. That Columbus broke the end of an egg and thus confused his mockers is fabulous, as also is the story that he encouraged his followers with brave words when the shores of San Salvador were still out of sight. Richard III., of England, did not kill his brother Clarence, and the story about a butt of Malmsey arose from the fact that the body of Clarence, who died a natural death, was transported from Calais to England in a wine butt. Charles II. never had the body of Cromwell taken from Westminster Abbey and hanged at Tyburn, for the daughter of Cromwell, apprehensive of some such ill-treatment, had her father's corpse secretly removed from the abbey and buried in a quiet churchyard. Milton's daughters could not have consoled their father in his blindness by reading passages from the old authors, for the best of reasons—they did not know how to read. Almost the only story which Professor Wheeler did not succeed in over throwing is that of the cow that is recorded to have jumped over the moon.

A singular spot is Benares, the sacred city of the Hindoos. From all parts of India pious Hindoos come to spend their last days and die, sure of thus obtaining their peculiar form of salvation. All day long, from the earliest dawn till sunset, thousands of people bathe on the steps of the ghats, which run along the river's bank for nearly two miles, in the sure and certain hope that by such ablution their sins are washed clean away. It is an extraordinary sight to sit in a boat and quietly drift with the stream alongside the whole length of this great city, and watch the bathers, who fill up almost the entire line. Men and women are thus piously engaged, and the usual plan is to bring down a plain robe, which they deposit on the stone steps, while they descend into the water in their other robe; and there perform the necessary amount of ablution. While the bathers stand up to their waists in water, devoutly folding their hands in prayer, or shedding offerings of leaves into the running stream from large baskets, the priests are squatting on the shore by scores, each under an enormous umbrella of plaited bamboo some ten or twelve feet in diameter, and each with a continually increasing heap of small coin presented by the bathers—for what purpose we do not know. One of the ghats is called the "burning ghats," where are stacked great piles of wood, and where the boats you see coming down the river with enormous stacks of wood upon them unload their burdens. Here, in the midst of the bathers, the dead are burnt by their sorrowing friends. The body is brought down lashed upon a small hand-bier. If a man, it is wound tightly in white robes, so that every part is covered; if a woman, two robes are used. The body is then plunged over head in the stream, and there left lying in the water, half submerged, while the friends kindle the funeral pyre. When the pile is half built the body is laid on, and then more wood, and then the torch is applied, and the smoke of the burning soon pours forth in thick, murky volumes. When the wood is burned, all the parts of the body that are left unconsumed are thrown into the Ganges, down which they float till the birds and fishes finish what the fire leaves undone. This cremation goes on daily, and during one short visit, before breakfast, we saw six funeral fires lighted, but did not feel called upon to watch the entire destruction of the several pyres.

The ways in which babies are dressed and "tended" in different countries would make quite an interesting study for our young folks if they only stopped to think about it. The Greenland baby is dressed in furs and carried in a sort of pocket in the back of his mother's cloak. When she is very busy and does not want to be bothered with him, she digs a hole in the snow and covers him up all but his face and leaves him there until she is ready to take care of him again. The Hindoo baby hangs in a basket from the roof, and is taught to smoke long before he learns to walk. Among the Western Indians the poor tots are tied fast to a board, and have their heads flattened by means of another board fastened down over their foreheads. In Lima the little fellow lies all day in a hammock swung from a tree top, like the baby in the nursery song. In Persia he is dressed in the most costly silks and jewels, while in Yucatan a pair of sandals and a straw hat are thought to be all the clothing he needs. The contented-looking little one is a German baby. His limbs are carefully wrapped in folds of cloth, because his mamma thinks that is the way to make him grow straight; then he is tightly pinned up in a pillow made expressly for him; the case is drawn over his little feet and fastened in place with bright-colored ribbons. Made up into this curious bundle, his nurse can toss him about without the least danger of hurting him or bumping his head.

The "Columbarium" in the new cemetery at Gotha has been completed. The town authorities have decided that the coffins for cremation are not to measure more than seven feet four inches in length, thirty inches in width, and twenty-nine in height. The urns to be placed in the Columbarium are not to be more than thirty-two inches in height and seventeen in diameter. The expense of cremation of each body will amount to about $5.

A Western lawyer included in his bill against his client: "To waking up in the night and thinking about your case, $5."

SCENERY AND SCENE PAINTING.

Writing from Paris "Spiridon" says: I give you below a curious example of the pains taken by our theatres to secure the success of new pieces. Compare it with the helter-skelter way in which new plays are brought out by your theatres, where it is not uncommon to see—however that is none of my business. Some persons think that scene painting is an independent art; that the manager of a theatre, after reading a manuscript play, sends for his scene-painter and says: "The scene is laid in such a place, at such a time; make me a sketch fulfilling these conditions." Thereupon the scene-painter gives reins to his imagination and makes a palace or a temple as his fancy pleases. Persons who hold these opinions are mistaken. The manager, or, when the author is experienced in dramatic matters, the author arranges the scenery to suit with the requirements of the play. So far from giving the reins to the scene painter, he says to the latter: "My characters enter here, leave there. The interest of the dialogue requires that they should step so many paces from this piece of scenery to that piece of scenery. You must place here a break in the ground against which my characters shall stumble, or behind which they may hide. I do not want you to paint scenery which shall of itself be beautiful; your first, greatest care must be to paint scenery which, while pleasing the eye (if possible), must above all things contribute to bring out the salient points of my play to which I may call attention." You should hear the discussions which take place upon the sketch when the scene-painter brings it to the manager's office. Manager, author, stage-manager, all the actors, examine it in every detail, manuscripts in hand, and insist upon changes here, or changes there. The actor must in the fourth act rush forward furiously on the stage; how can he do so if the door be too far back, if he meet this or that obstacle in the way? The unhappy scene-painter in vain urges that this obstacle placed there delights the eye and adds beauty to the landscape. The author replies that the play was not written for the landscape, but the landscape was painted for the play, that the most beautiful scenery is that which gives most effect to the play. A former manager of the Odéon, and a very skillful manager he was, talked with me one day upon the necessity of subordinating scenery to action. He said: "Scenery must be merely the humble servant of action. All its office is to figure action and make action as sensible to the eyes as dialogue makes it sensible to the mind." He gave me a curious example of the truth of this remark. He determined to bring out Alfred de Musset's Carmosine. "Carmosine" made her appearance in the fifth scene of the first act, while her father was talking with an old friend about her and about the disease which was undermining her constitution rapidly; so that when she appeared in the garden, her father showed tender uneasiness about her. She was to say: "Well, father, are you uneasy? You look at me with surprise. You did not expect to see me up, did you?" "Tis I, nevertheless. Don't you recognize me?" "Were these sentences to be uttered rapidly, all in one breath, in a coaxing tone, and ended by a kiss? This manner was tried. It was thought cold. The actress, who was to play the part, suggested that it would be best to enter slowly, like a convalescent who walked languidly, and to repeat so slowly each sentence that when she uttered the last phrase: "Don't you recognize me?" she had reached her father's side and held out her brow for him to kiss. This manner was tried, and it proved as unsatisfactory as the first. The manager and all the actors were astonished to see a dialogue, which was so charming when read, utterly fail of effect when performed. Thereupon the manager had a very ingenious idea. He supposed that the chamber from which Carmosine came, and which necessarily looked on the garden, had steps by which persons came from the chamber to the garden. When Carmosine entered, she leaned on the balustrade, and addressing her father from this distance, said: "Well, father, are you uneasy? You look at me with surprise?" She then began to go down the steps. She went down one step: "You did not expect to see me up," she went down another step: "Did you?" "Tis I," she went down the last step: "nevertheless," she walked to her father—"don't you?"—and when she stood by his side—"recognize me?"—and held out her brow to be kissed. Why did the manager ask the scene-painter for these steps going from Carmosine's chamber to the garden? Was his intention to delight the eyes by this break in the landscape? Not a bit of it. He translated De Musset's dialogue to the eyes. He made the dialogue's impression deeper. Suppose this detail, which he had voluntarily added, had spoiled the proportion and beauty of the lines which the scene-painter had imagined, the manager would nevertheless have been right; for the object sought was not to place before the public scenery beautiful in itself, but to give reality, embodiment to the poet's idea by means of scenery.

The war has begun in good earnest. The correspondents accompanying the English column that is moving into Afghanistan are already writing back about grapes that are larger than walnuts. This is the correspondent's tactics. He begins to lie about the things he sees, and then it is only two or three days before he is ready to lie about a battle that lasted all day, and resulting in the slaughter of 239,675 3/5 of the enemy and "the death of two of our pickets." And he usually tries to convey the impression that one of these pickets died of old age.

We have heard but one adverse criticism on Wilhelm since he reached this country. A West Hill man heard him play in Cleveland, and says, "he don't put enough rosin on his bow." In the midst of the warm showers of praise that have been rained upon him, this must fall on the heart of the great fiddler like a snow storm in August.

Once there was a Man who sought to Cheat the Merchant to whom he Sold his Grain. He slyly Measured out the Wheat with a half bushel that held only fourteen Quarts. But the Merchant, who was an Observant Man, paid the Farmer with Silver Coins worth eighty cents on the Dollar.

"Get right out of this," shouted an irritated merchant to a mendacious clerk. "This is the third lie I have caught you in since ten o'clock this morning." "Oh, well," said the new man, "don't be too hard on me. Give a fellow time to learn the rules of the house."

He who boasts of his lineage, boasts of that which does not belong to him.

BANCROFT'S
721 MARKET ST. S.F.

THE BEST PLACE TO BUY

HOLIDAY
GIFTS.

Do not fail to see our magnificent stock. For particulars, see Bancroft's "Christmas Messenger." Supplied free.

OPEN EVENINGS.

THOMAS BOYSON, M. D.

(University of Copenhagen, Denmark).

PHYSICIAN AND SURGEON. Office

and Residence, 112 Kearny Street. Office hours, 11 A. M. to 4 P. M., 6 to 8 P. M. Sunday 11 to 1 only. Telephone in the office.

KURRACHEE RUGS!

ASK FOR THEM IN THE LEADING Carpet Stores. Manufactured by WAKEFIELD RATTAN CO., 38 Geary Street.

CANNEL COAL.

A SUPERIOR QUALITY OF GRATE COAL for sale by

MIDDLETON & FARNSWORTH, 14 Post Street, and 715 Sansome Street.

BUTTERICK'S

PATTERNS—DEC. STYLES.

Send stamp for catalogue. AGENCY, 124 POST ST., San Francisco.

HEALD'S BUSINESS
COLLEGE,

No. 24 Post Street,

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

Opposite Mechanics' Institute.

IMPARTS A THOROUGH PRACTICAL Education in all Commercial and English Branches French, German, Spanish, Drawing, and Telegraphy. This school having greater facilities, and enjoying a more extensive patronage than any similar institution on the Pacific coast, continues to base its claims for recognition and patronage upon the good sense and enlightened judgment of public.

LIST OF FACULTY.
E. P. Heald, F. C. Woodbury,
H. M. Stearns, A. B. Capp,
Mrs. C. Woodbury, T. R. Southern,
J. A. Chesnutwood, Mrs. W. J. Hamilton,
A. P. Dubief, F. Seragni,
R. Sorcini, Geo. J. J. J. J.
Lloyd Baldwin, A. Vander Naillen.
For full particulars, call at the College, 24 Post Street, or address E. P. HEALD, President Business College, San Francisco.

ARMY AND NAVY GOODS,
REGALIA AND LODGE SUPPLIES.

A. J. PLATE &amp; CO.,

No. 510 SACRAMENTO STREET.

J. J. CLARKE, M. D.

No. 106 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

J. J. BIRGE, DENTIST, 313 Kearny Street.

R. C. MOWBRAY, M. D., DENTIST
224 STOCKTON ST., corner Post, S. F.

THE VERTICAL FEED.

THE ONLY POSITIVE SUCCESS IN all departments of sewing. Lightest running shuttle machine in the market. The NEW JAVIS VERTICAL FEED SEWING MACHINE, 130 Post Street.

MARK SHELTON.
P. S.—Howe, Florence, Wheeler & Wilson, Singer & Baker, Domestic, Wood, Willcox & Gible, each.

This is the centennial week of the Oates Opera House season at the Bush Street Theatre. Wednesday last the one hundredth performance was given, on which occasion a satin and gold souvenir of the event was presented to each lady in attendance. No great has been the demand for them since that a souvenir matinee will be given to-day, with the Princess of Trebizond as a bill, each lady receiving a programme in satin and gold. Next Monday, for the first time in America, Alfred Celliers' grand and spectacular opera bouffe, Sultan Toorka, will be presented, with new dresses from London, and new and gorgeous scenery by Graham. This opera will be the holiday attraction at the Bush Street.

My DEAR MRS.—Have you been to Mr. Koerner's lately? You will be charmed to see the changes made there recently. The store has been considerably enlarged by the moving of the embroidery parlor closer to the front window, and also improved in appearance by its tasteful arrangement within and without. The space gained is to be filled with a large stock of elegant goods, now on their way from Europe and Japan. Some samples of the former are already displayed, in Bohemian glassware, toilet sets, vases, etc., that promise fine things for the coming holidays. Many of the handsets were sold before they had fairly touched the shelves, which goes to show the taste that selected them. Of all these will be duplicated in a few days. There will be every description of carved wood-work, brackets, and boxes among the incoming pretty things. Christmas is being provided for by all manner of fancy work, for the fashioning of which Mrs. Koerner's fingers are famous: toilet boxes in silk and satin—suitable gifts, by the way, for either male or female friends—sofa and toilet cushions, bags, smoking caps, slippers, mantles and ties; in short, everything that can be made with the needle. Mrs. Koerner is also agent for Madame Demorest's patterns, and you know without telling what her own patterns are for embroidery and monograms—the handsome in town. A new artist has arisen among us, a Miss Emily Rydler, an English lady, and a pupil of the Government Art School at Kensington, from which she brings the highest diplomas for excellence in portrait, landscape, and porcelain painting; crayons, water-colors, and the decoration of tiles; and special qualifications for the teaching of all. Besides a large number of original pictures, and copies of famous masters (her own work), she brings several fine landscape and marine views in water-colors by Mrs. Hume, and some heads—exceedingly strong bits of work—by Miss Kip, both famous English artists. These are for sale at Miss Rydler's new studio, No. 26½ Kearny Street. Such pretty things as there are at Mayer's, 213 Kearny Street, in the way of gold and silver filagree jewelry, bouquet holders, lace pins, and so on, and one set the queerest and quaintest of Chinese carvings—a pin and an earring set from the back of a crane and mounted in gold, the color a rich amber—the design a cluster of flowers—the prettiest oddity I have seen lately. Admirers of California products will find this store the headquarters for California diamonds. Love & Goldstein, at the same number, are doing a rushing business in candies. Their caramels, candied fruits and nuts, are fit for the gods, and there is a genuine candy pull there every night of the week, the results of which are given away in samples the next day. They have put down the price of molasses candy to 25c a pound. My godsons, Billings, Harbourn & Co., evidently mean to win the sweet goods. Success, by a bold coup rather than by slow and timidous advances. Their two stores, now thrown into one and connected by a graceful archway, are filled with new and enticing goods of every description. The Russian leather goods counter is a special favorite, and there are novelties without end there and at the stationary department, where I saw some of the prettiest card-writing and fancy printing imaginable. New books come so thick and fast I can not begin to particularize, but go and see for yourself. By the way, I hear it said that this store is the headquarters of all the pretty girls in town who are seeking for Christmas gifts in their line. It certainly looks like it, and when the new department for perfumes and other toilet accessories is fully established it will be still more so. Since I last wrote I have had many a delightful half hour at Lawton's, where there are hosts of Christmas novelties. I liked the systematic way in which everything is arranged there. Have you noticed it? Down the east side of the store are the elegant tea sets, ice pitchers, Danish terra cotta, Wedgwood, Copeland, Minton, and Royal Worcester ware, the Galvani bronzes and French clocks; on the west, Webb's ornamental and table glass, artistic faïences of images, Doulton and Lambeth, Watcombe, terra cotta, bronze, Parian, and Belgian ware, and those lovely clocks with the cathedral chimes. On the north end are the Bohemian glass goods, jardinières, Venetian mirrors, Choisy le Roy plaques, vases from Dresden, and Weissen, and Corinth wares. There, too, you will find two dishes made for Frederick the Great. They are an excellent match for the new Dresden sets. Mr. Lawton has just received. At the southern extremity of the store are Japanese porcelains, engraved glass in ruby and crystal, the Glen and Longfay glasses, Surrugetine desert ware, Harlequin sets, Closerie, and chandeliers, Lucerne, La Robbia, Nancy ware, and a Vergerian ware of various kinds. There is also something very beautiful as well as entirely new in the glassware ornamented with delicate sprays of flowers in white enamel; it divides my artistic affections with the iridescent glass, the making of which is one of the lost arts revived, and that you can get here in every possible shape, from a soap bubble paper-weight to club-lake vases. Don't you recollect the room in the Danish section at the Centennial, that was filled with the Copenhagen Terra Cotta? Mr. Lawton has some dainty bits of it. It is the finest made, and its manufacture is under Government supervision. "More finally," as Emery Ann says, Mr. Lawton is having prepared a concise little manual of Ceramics, which will contain a deal of information in a small space, and which is to be elegantly gotten up by Bancroft. It will be given away, too, to patrons and friends. Mr. Meyers, of 825 Capp Street, still wears the belt, as the fighting men say, as the champion Kouniss maker of the Pacific Coast, as he was the original introducer of it here, and the only genuine concocter of that delicious beverage. One needs only to look at Mr. Meyers himself to be convinced of its efficacy, as he is his own best proof. Mrs. Meyers is making an equal reputation for herself as a compounder of the most palatable of blackberry brandy, that is so welcome a cordial in sickness. You won't think you have had your just dues if you hear nothing of the Diamond Palace this week. Colonel Andrews is surpassing himself in beautiful novelties for Christmas tide, in which diamonds, in every form of setting and for every possible ornament, as usual take the lead. Moreover, he has never, he tells me himself, sold these gems at so low a figure as this season. A fine pair of solitaires can be bought at the "Palace" for $25 and you can spend $5,000 on a pair if you like that better. The sapphire breastpin, surrounded by a double row of diamonds, gets numbers of admirers. It is said to be the finest stone of its kind on the coast. Turquoises in various combinations, with silver, with diamonds, and in plain gold, and a large lot of your, and the Colgate's, and the diamonds lately gems at a treat. Sixty-five pairs of diamond bracelets. What do you think that is for one item of a collection equally large in every other direction? Jackie. LITTLE DIBBOS.

BILLINGS, HARBOURNE & CO.,
BOOKSELLERS AND STATIONERS,
NO. 3 MONTGOMERY STREET.

FASHION GOSSIP.

Seal-skin Sacques, Satchels, etc.

The seal-skin sacques of same length as the Dohlman is the favorite this season. It is owing to the fact that they may be made to fit closer at the back, which gives the whole costume a more elegant appearance. The Dohlman is however selected by many ladies for the general air of comfort it presents. In this day of neatly-fitting costumes in which the graceful is the one prominent feature, we may predict that the seal paletot will assume complete sway for at least one or two seasons. The Dohlman, however, being a roomy garment places one more at ease within its ample folds. The sleeves are so large that perfect freedom of the arms is the result. No winter costume is more elegant in appearance than a complete suit of furs, embracing hat, paletot, or Dohlman, and the muff, and not forgetting that necessary article with ladies when shopping, viz: the satchel. We noted with the various styles in furs at the establishment of H. Liebes & Co., furriers, No. 113 Montgomery Street, a handsome assortment of seal-skin satchels. These satchels are made entirely of seal-skin, intended to match the sacque or Dohlman, and certainly after having seen this elegant article no one can be said to be completely dressed without one of these satchels, who appears in furs. It is lined with satin, has fur-handles, and is trimmed with nickel. The prices are very low, and withal the article is so elegant that we are not surprised that this firm are selling them very fast to their many patrons. In fact they have become quite a rage, and the purchaser of the seal sacque does not forget the satchel with the other furs. These satchels appear in all sizes, and are manufactured by the above-mentioned firm at prices that are much lower than they can be imported, so that in this item we feel that we have given to our lady readers something that will interest the purchaser of furs.

Switzerland—Its Mountains and Valleys.

The above is the title to a new and superbly illustrated work now on the counters of Messrs. A. Roman & Co. The work is magnificently bound in cloth, gilt, and morocco, and contains over four hundred illustrations. The richly-illustrated volumes of the past seasons, entitled "Italy," "India," and "Spain," are excelled in the present volume, not only by the real interest of the subject, but also in the profusion and variety of its pictorial attractions. The silvery peaks and blue lakes of Switzerland, with her mighty storm winds that sweep across the glaciers, and shake the bald tops of the ancient forests, and send to the valleys her mighty avalanches, have been portrayed by poet's pen and artist's pencil with immortality. Switzerland has long since won the hearts of her own people, and fascinated with her grand scenery thousands of travelers from foreign lands. So beautiful and sublime is the Alpine scenery that authors and artists have combined their labors to transfer them to paper, to render them permanent, and within the reach of all the lovers of the beauties of nature. The result appears in the magnificent gift volume entitled "Switzerland." No pains or expense has been spared in the completion of this magnificent work, and the happy buyer will have secured a treasure in art and literature who adds it to his library. Besides this elegant work we note also as gift volumes, "Italy," "India," and "Spain," uniform with the above; also The Rhine illustrated, Goethe, Herman and Dorothea, Don Quixote illustrated by Doré; also Bryant's Library of Poetry, and the Yellowstone National Park, illustrated by Prang, French pictures with pencil and pen, and the School Boy, by Oliver Wendell Holmes.

Photographs from Original Paintings by Kaubach.

Kaubach, the great German artist, has illustrated the works of Goethe and Schiller. The attempt has been made to portray the idea of the artist in producing the female characters described in the works of Germany's greatest poets. The muse of Goethe appears in angelic form floating in the air before him, while Goethe sinks to his knees in admiration and reverence before her. "Iphigenia" is portrayed as in the act of restraining her fury haunted brother while gently barring his advance upon his supposed enemies, by disclosing that she is his sister whose death he has mourned. "Gretchen" is represented on her way to church, when Faust sees her passing, and seems amazed at the vision of such beauty and innocence. Gretchen Mater Dolorosa is represented bowed down in the agony of remorse before Michael Angelo's pathetic group of the Pieta. The illustration of Helena represents Faust in the act of kissing Heleoa, while Euphorion with the lyre is springing upwards, and Mephistopheles in the background leaning on the picture of happiness. "Herman and Dorothea" are painted while on their way to his father's house. Her foot slips—she falls into his arms, breast to breast, cheek against cheek. They remain one brief moment, while he merely supports her, and not daring to press her fondly and protectively to him. These elegant copies of the originals are to be seen at J. B. Golly's establishment, No. 31 Kearny Street, with many other choice copies from the masters.

Auction Sale of Books.

The immense sale of books at auction at Bartlett's establishment, 3 Dupont Street, still continues unabated, while the prices are a terrible sacrifice compared with former rates. Among the many volumes being sold every night may be mentioned the following: Beecher's Life of Christ, in various styles of binding; Lossing's First Century of the United States; Lossing's History of the Civil War, in three volumes; Woman in Battle, Johnston's narrative; Miracles of Jesus, illustrated; Women in Sacred History, by Harriet Beecher Stowe; Bible History and Sacred Biography, illustrated Bible Lands, good novels, a collection of the best English and French novelists in one large octavo; uniform with the latter, select novels and choice reading; The Uncivilized Races of Man, Personal History of U. S. Grant, Unwritten History, by Joaquin Miller. A full collection of bibles and albums also, and an extensive assortment of Juveniles; of the latter may be mentioned Children of the Abbey, Thaddeus of Warsaw, Robinson Crusoe, Swiss Family Robinson, Gulliver's Travels, Pilgrim's Progress, etc. All the standard poets and works of historians are also being sold.

Yosemite Art Gallery, finest photographs, reduced prices, No. 26 Montgomery Street.

Go to the Terrace Swimming Baths, Alameda.

Yosemite Art Gallery, 26 Montgomery Street.

Try E. H. Hubbard's Parisian Cream for the complexion. 923 Market Street.

DIAMONDS.

The most attractive assortment of

DIAMONDS, WATCHES, JEWELRY, ETC.,

And Novelties, for the selection of wedding and other presents, at

GEO. C. SHREVE &amp; CO.'S,

110 MONTGOMERY STREET.

W. K. VANDERSLICE &amp; CO.

No. 136 SUTTER STREET.

IMMENSE REDUCTION
IN SILVERWARE.

SOLID STERLING SILVER SPOONS AND FORKS,

Of our own manufacture, at $1.40 per oz.,

THIS BEING MUCH LOWER THAN THEY EVER HAVE BEEN SOLD.

DIAMONDS, WATCHES, JEWELRY, AT LOWEST RATES.

SEAL SKIN CLOAKS.

Just received, a large assortment of

SEAL SKIN SACQUES,

Very elegantly finished, and will be sold exceedingly cheap at

SULLIVAN'S,

120 KEARNY STREET.

DIAMONDS OF RARE PERFECTION

In single stones, and carefully matched pairs, set and unset.

EMERALDS, RUBIES, AND SAPPHIRES,

AND OTHER PRECIOUS STONES.

WATCHES, JEWELRY, AND SILVERWARE

AT UNEXCEPTIONABLY LOW RATES.

BRAVERMAN &amp; LEVY,

119 MONTGOMERY STREET.

From London and Paris.

H. B. Slaven, of the Baldwin Pharmacy, having resident agents in Paris and London, is in a position to obtain and retail to his numerous patrons all the English and French toilet articles at very low rates. He has just received a splendid assortment of fine hair brushes, combs, etc., and elegant fancy goods suitable for holiday trade. The very latest novelties in French perfumery and toilet articles for ladies and gents may here be obtained, as Mr. Slaven is constantly being posted in all the French and English novelties in this department. Ladies who desire something new in toilet articles will do well to call upon Mr. Slaven and examine his recent importations in this class of goods.

We stopped a lady friend the other day on Geary Street, and inquired as to the unusual excitement we observed. She replied: "It is an open secret. The people of San Francisco have found a place to buy their Christmas goods cheaper than they have dared to dream of, and it's such a nice place! In fact all the latest novelties in fancy goods, card board mottoes, chromos, paperies, toys, and almost everything in the holiday line. The place is easily found. It is at 27 Geary Street, and is kept by A. S. Spence & Co., and they show you all the goods with the greatest of pleasure.

CONSUMPTION CURED.—An old physician, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure for consumption, bronchitis, catarrh, asthma, and all throat and lung affections, also a positive and radical cure for nervous debility and all nervous complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who desire it this recipe, with full directions for preparing and using, in German, French, or English. Sent by mail by addressing with stamp, naming this paper, W. W. SERRA, 170 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y.

For the finest photograph at reduced prices go to T. H. Boyd's Yosemite Art Gallery, No. 26 Montgomery Street.

The finest assortment of bronze and marble statuettes, with an endless variety of fancy articles suitable for holiday presents, can be found at Anderson & Randolph's, corner of Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

CALIFORNIA
SPOOL SILK

TESTIMONIAL.

Referring to certain advertisements recently published derogatory to the quality of

CALIFORNIA SPOOL SILK,

We beg to offer the following testimonial from the largest dealers in the city.

CALIFORNIA SILK MFG CO.

We, the undersigned, hereby state that we have sold the CALIFORNIA SPOOL SILK for a number of years, and have found it to give entire satisfaction.

We recommend it to the public as equal in quality to any silk in this market, of either Foreign or Eastern manufacture. [Signed.] DOANE & HENSHELWOOD, No. 1 Montgomery Street.

FRATINGER & NOLL, 10 to 14 Montgomery Street.

F. CHESTER & CO., 34 to 36 Montgomery. KAINDLER & CO., Ville de Paris, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

J. SAMUELS, 28 Kearny Street.

THE WHITE HOUSE, J. W. Davidson & Co., corner Kearny and Post Streets.

S. MOSGROVE & CO., 114 and 116 Kearny.

THE LACE HOUSE, D. Samuels, 104 to 108 Kearny Street.

BUYER, REICH & CO., 129 Kearny Street.

S. BINE, 130 Kearny Street.

LANDERS & GILMORE, 132 Kearny St.

SULLIVAN'S CLOAK & SUIT HOUSE, 220 Kearny Street.

THE SILK HOUSE, Samuel Leszynski & Bro., 120 Kearny Street.

B. SCHONWASSER & CO., 222 Kearny St.

JACOBS & GLASS, 226 Kearny Street.

P. B. KENNEDY, 232 Kearny Street.

O'CONNOR, MOFFATT & CO., 111 to 115 Post Street.

O'NEILL, KENNEDY & STUART, 875 Market Street.

C. CURTIN, 911 Market Street.

J. J. O'BRIEN & CO., 924 to 928 Market St.

O'DWYER & EINHORN, 36 and 38 Third Street.

PEINOTTO & SILVERMAN, 42 to 46 Third Street. And hundreds of others.

EUREKA STONE MFG CO.

EUREKA STONE SEWER PIPE A specialty. None but the best brands of English Portland Cement used.

FACTORY, 535 BRANNAN STREET.

PALMER BROS.

726 TO 734 MARKET ST.,

Have a full assortment of

LADIES' AND GENTS' FURNISHING Goods, Toilet Articles, Corsets, Embroideries, French and Valenciennes Laces, a fine assortment of Veilings and Ruchings, and the largest stock of

MILLINERY GOODS,

And the best stock of

BOYS' CLOTHING AND HATS & CAPS

In the city.

GEORGE BARSTOW,

ATTORNEY AT LAW, No. 309 California Street, San Francisco, Cal.

ANNUAL MEETING—OPHIR SILver Mining Company.—The annual meeting of the stockholders of the Silver Mining Company will be held on Wednesday, December 13th, 1878, at one o'clock p. m., at the office of the Company, No. 293 Bush Street, San Francisco, California. Transfer books will close on Saturday, December 7th, at 12 o'clock p. m.

C. L. McCOY, Secretary.

SAGE MINING COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the fourth (4th) day of December, 1878, an assessment (No. 35) of one dollar per share, was levied on the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 15, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the seventh (7th) day of January, 1879, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on Monday, the twenty-seventh day of January, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

Office, Room 15, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

DIVIDEND NOTICE—THE STATE

INVESTMENT AND INSURANCE COMPANY.—Dividend No. 67.—The monthly dividend for November will be paid on December 10, at their office, 700 and 720 Sansome Street.

CHS. H. CUSHIN

San Francisco, December 5, 1878.

SCRIPTURAL QUOTATIONS.

EDITOR ARGONAUT.—There should be a "Professor of Biblical Literature" connected with every important journal, to revise the Scriptural allusions and quotations. An editor may be mighty in politics and great in literature, and yet not very well-versed in the writings of St. Paul. Even the ARGONAUT sometimes trips up. For instance, in the last number, in the opening paragraph, is this sentence: "Solomon foolishly exalted his wisdom above his shekels, and he ended himself down to an immortality of ridicule when he declared that money is the root of all evil." Now, in the first place, no one in Scripture ever said this. The declaration of Holy Writ is: "For the love of money is the root of all evil; which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows." This is a truth which we ink no one will deny. If one will walk down California Street, and listen to the weeping and wailing resulting from "the love of money," he will conclude that the "piercing themselves through with many sorrows" was a prophecy. In the second place, this was not Solomon, but by St. Paul, in his Epistle to St. Timothy (Chap. iv, v, 7). And he adds, also: "But the god that will be rich will fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown down in destruction and perdition." Alas, how true! Solomon's practical view is: "Money answereth all things" (Eccles. x, 19).

We have heard of an Englishman who went abroad with the design of taking an extensive tour on the continent, but who was diverted from his purpose by finding himself so comfortable on board a certain canal boat in Belgium, that he went no further, preferring to be a daily passenger in the boat, which went and returned between certain limits on alternate days. There is more than one version to this story, which we believe to be founded on fact. It seems to be agreed that the gentleman started on his intended tour in 1815, the year of the battle of Waterloo; that he landed at Ostend with the design of pushing on to Brussels, and that the canal boat which arrested his progress was one that plied between Bruges and Ghent; starting one day at Ghent, and the other at Bruges. According to one account which we have heard, the individual in question went abroad not only to see foreign lands, but in the hope of meeting with illustrious personages and distinguished characters, which will account for his making for Brussels in 1815. Finding, however, that on board the boat he not only fell in with many persons worth meeting, but had the opportunity of sitting down with them at the table d'hôte, he thought he could not do better, and went backward and forward, never getting further than Ghent.

A young French sculptor named Vidal, who has attained high distinction in his art, has been totally blind ever since the age of twenty-one. Before this age Vidal had been a pupil in the atelier of David, and had learned the technicalities of sculpture, when, quite suddenly, he was struck with blindness. He persevered in the profession he had adopted, and after months of patient labor found that he could readily make his fingers do the work of eyes. His touch has, in truth, become so sensitive that by means of feeling his model in every part he is able to reproduce it with an exactitude often not gained by those who merely see it. He generally takes animals for his subjects—lions, stags, painters, hares, horses—and his skill in modeling their forms in various attitudes is so great that it gained him a medal at the Salon of 1861. The State has also purchased several of his marbles and bronzes. One of the most remarkable things related about Vidal is that he can judge, not only of his own work, but also of that of others, by the touch, as was proved during a recent visit to the Universal Exhibition, when he showed himself a very good critic of the sculpture there exhibited.

To give an idea of the relative distances, suppose a voyager through the celestial spaces could travel from the sun to the outermost planet of our system in twenty-four hours, so enormous would be his velocity that it would carry him across the Atlantic Ocean, from New York to Liverpool, in less than a tenth of a second by the clock. Starting from the sun with this velocity, he would cross the orbits of the inner planets in rapid succession, and the outer ones more slowly, until, at the end of a single day, he would reach the confines of our system, crossing the orbit of Neptune. But though he passed eight planets the first day, he would pass none the next; for he would have to journey for eighteen or twenty years without diminution of speed, before he could reach the nearest star, and would then have to journey as far again before he could reach another. All the planets in our system would have vanished in the distance in the course of the first three days, and the sun would be but an insignificant star in the firmament.

The Paris correspondent of the Liverpool Courier writes: "A fashion that is springing up in Paris, and that is as yet rather 'fast' is the wearing of ladies of a garment exactly resembling a man's cut-away coat. I saw many of these in shop windows, and one or two on persons who evidently did not mind being observed. A lady on the Boulevard des Italiens wore for instance, a dark green cashmere short skirt, dully plaited, and around her a scarf bordered with green silk; her bodice was a short cut-away coat, fastened by three buttons at the chest, and slanting away at the neck and at the waist, leaving visible a waistcoat of the palest shade of green satin, elaborately worked in the darkest green silk. These cut-away coats, worn over finical waistcoats, to which I have alluded, are destined to invade society.

Baltimore has had its laugh. At one of the theatres they are fitting Miss Geraldine out of a crown. The Every Sunday of that city relates that one day recently the lady was duly fitted out and repaid calmly in the net prepared for her reception, when, lo! being taken the canon. Of course the dignity of the queen had nothing to do with the arrival of Geraldine, and the spring that worked Miss Geraldine and the spring that worked the powder discharge didn't go off together.

The late Archbishop Whately wrote from Dublin in 1840: "It is only by making the rising generation civilized beings, and not mere unfeathered bipeds, that Socialism and all other such poisons can be effectually counteracted. The law—not perhaps in these regions (Ireland), but in despot countries—must guard the people against the arrow that flieth in jeopardy, but not against the greater danger of Socialism that walketh in darkness."

The finest candies in the city are to be had at the Clarendon, 213 Kearny Street, of Love & Goldstein. Try them.

An elegant assortment of gold watches and chains at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

Mr. T. H. Boyd, a well-known photographer of rare ability, formerly of the firm of Taber & Boyd, has opened a fine gallery at No. 26 Montgomery street. Mr. Boyd does the very best work that can be done in this city—where the best work of the world is done. It would be judicious to visit Mr. Boyd's gallery when in want of photographs.

Where can one thoroughly enjoy a swim? At the Terrace Swimming Baths, Alameda.

BOSTON DRESS REFORM.
California "Worth" Princess Suits, Skirts, and detachable Blouses; Cashmere and Merino Union Suits for ladies and children; Ladies' and misses' shoulder-brace Corsets; Almondal Corsets. No. 430 Sutter Street. A. W. BAKER, the only Dress Reform Agent in the city.

The finest French and purest home-made candies found at Voegel's, 915 Market Street, between Fifth and Sixth.

Terrace Swimming Baths, Alameda, now open.

Artistic novelties, manufactured from California quartz, at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

Currier, 103 Dupont Street, makes the finest PICTURE FRAMES.

Currier, 103 Dupont Street, has a fine assortment of VELVET FRAMES.

STERLING SILVERWARE—A large assortment of elegant designs at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

The finest laths are at the Terrace, Alameda.

Mrs. Parker, of the Ladies' Depository, has opened a new store at 126 Post Street. Dolls dressed in all styles. New Lace Patterns.

MUSIC BOXES

OF ALL DESCRIPTIONS AND OF
Standard Reputation, playing from one to over one hundred airs. The largest and best assortment in this city. MUSICAL BOXES WITH CHANGEABLE CYLINDERS always on hand. New and interesting styles constantly received. Call and examine our stock.

REPAIRING OF MUSICAL BOXES thoroughly done in all their particularities.

M. J. PAILLARD & CO.,

MANUFACTURERS AND IMPORTERS,

120 Sutter Street, San Francisco.

Branch of House, 630 Broadway, New York.

THE LAST SENSATION!

"THE SOCIETY IN SEARCH OF

Truth; or, Stock Gambling in San Francisco." A Novel, in Forty-four Chapters, by

I. F. CLARK,

A former member of the Pacific Stock Exchange. Now ready. Read it.

For the best New Crop Japan
" " English Breakfast
" " Formosa Oolong
" " Mixed

LORING'S

922 MARKET STREET,

Manufacture of "THE PRESIDENT COFFEE"—put up in air-tight cans, retaining its purity, freshness and aroma.

PALACE HOTEL RESTAURANT,

FIRST CLASS IN ALL RESPECTS.

QUIET AND DESIRABLE PLACE

For Ladies, Gentlemen, and Families. 227 Entrance south side of Court.

A. D. SHARON.

THOMAS H. HOLT,

NOTARY PUBLIC, No. 326 1/2 Montgomery Street. Residence, 1233 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

SAFES AND SCALES.

FOR SALE BY

JOHN MOLLOY, 54 CLAY STREET.

GEO. W. FRESCOTT. IRVING M. SCOTT. H. T. SCOTT.

UNION IRON WORKS

(Founded 1849.) Post Office Box 2123.

COR. FIRST AND MISSION STREETS,
SAN FRANCISCO

MANUFACTURERS OF
Compressed Engines,
Air Compressors,
Rock Drills,
Portable Hoisting Engines,
Marine Stationary and Portable Boilers,
Baby Hoist, complete.

CONSTANTLY ON HAND AND FOR SALE.

Direct-acting Pumping and Hoisting Engines,
Upright and Stationary Engines,
Quartz Crushing and Amalgamating Machinery,
Blake's Rock Breakers,
Smelting Furnaces,
Quicksilver Pumps,
Chlorinating Furnaces,
Cornish Pumps,
Steam Pumps.

All manufactured by us of the best materials, design, and workmanship, and furnished at lower rates than by Eastern manufacturers.

PRESCOTT, SCOTT & CO.

O. F. WILLEY &amp; CO

IMPORTERS AND MANUFACTURERS OF

FINE CARRIAGES &amp; WAGONS

No. 427 MONTGOMERY ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

Agents for the sale of Wagons manufactured by

BREWSTER & CO., New York.

W. D. ROGERS, Philadelphia.

C. S. CAFFEY, Camden, N. J.,

WOOD BROTHERS, New York.

H. KILLAM & CO., New Haven.

COOLING BROS., Wilmington.

ALSO, AGENTS FOR

HARNESS MANUFACTURED BY WOOD GIBSON,
TOMPKINS & MANDEVILLE, AND
A. H. DUNSCOMBE.

Also, a fine assortment of Robes, Blankets, Nets, Whips, etc.

SURE REMEDY FOR BALDNESS.
A prescription from a physician who will agree to pay $1, when a new growth of hair, whiskers or mustaches is actually produced. Sander-Son & Co., 2 Clinton Place, New York.

THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE

stockholders of the Gould & Curry Silver Mining Company will be held at the office of the Company, Room 69, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California, on Monday, the 16th day of December, 1878. Transfer books will be closed on Friday, December sixth, 1878, at the hour of 3 P. M.

ALFRED K. DURBROW, Secretary.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, CITY

and County of San Francisco.—In Probate Court.

In the matter of the Estate of JOHN BLISS, deceased.

Notice for publication of time appointed for proving will, etc.

Pursuant to an order of said Court, made on the 19th day of November, A. D. 1878, notice is hereby given that Monday, the 18th day of December, A. D. 1878, at 11 o'clock A. M. of said day, and the courtroom of said Court, at the new City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, have been appointed as the time and place for proving the will of said John Bliss, deceased, and for hearing the application of C. H. PHELPS for the issuance to him of Letters of Administration with the will annexed, when and where any person interested may appear and contest the same.

Dated November 19th, 1878.

THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.

[SEAL OF COURT.] By Wm. A. STUART, Deputy Clerk

CHARLES P. LELLS, Attorney for Petitioner, 66 Nevada Block.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

IZETIA GOODHUE, plaintiff, vs. STEPHEN

GOODHUE, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to

STEPHEN GOODHUE, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now and heretofore existing between plaintiff and defendant upon the grounds set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which special reference is hereby made, and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 14th day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

[SEAL.] By THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.

Wm. A. STUART, Deputy Clerk.

WOODS & COFFEY, Attorneys for Plaintiff.

CALIFORNIA FARMERS' MUTUAL

Fire Insurance Company

[ESTABLISHED IN 1874.]

Paid up Capital .....$200,000

Assets exceed..... 326,000

PRINCIPAL OFFICE 209 SANSOME ST.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.,

THOS. FLINT, President. J. W. FOARD, Manager.

FRED. K. RELE.....Secretary.

E. G. GARDNER.....General Agent.

COMMERCIAL

INSURANCE COMPANY OF CALA,

FIRE AND MARINE.

Principal office, 405 California Street, San Francisco.

JOHN H. WISE, President.

CHAS. A. LATON, Secretary.

THE STATE INVESTMENT

—AND—

INSURANCE COMPANY, FIRE AND MARINE

CASH ASSETS.....$450,000

Principal Office, 213 and 220 Sansome Street, San Francisco

OFFICERS:

A. J. BRYANT, President,

RICHARD IVERS, Vice-President,

CLAS. H. CUSHING, Secretary,

H. H. WATSON, Marine Surveyor

GOULD &amp; CURRY SILVER MINING

Company.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 18th day of November, 1878, an assessment (No. 34) of one dollar and fifty cents ($1.50) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately, in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 69, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California. Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 23d day of December, 1878, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on TUESDAY, the fourteenth day of January, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with cost of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors.

ALFRED K. DURBROW, Secretary.

Office—Room 69, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

OPHIK SILVER MINING COMPAny.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 5th day of November, 1878, an assessment (No. 34) of one dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Cosmopolitan Hotel Building, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California. Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 10th day of December, 1878, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on MONDAY, the 30th day of December, 1878, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors.

C. L. MCCOY, Secretary.

Office—Cosmopolitan Hotel Building, 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

APPLICATION TO BECOME SOLE

TRADER.—Notice is hereby given that I, EMMA S. HOWE, wife of Charles W. Howe, of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, will apply to the County Court of said city and county and State aforesaid, on MONDAY, the 23d day of December, A. D. 1878, the same being the day of the November term, A. D. 1878, of said County Court, for the judgment and decree of said Court, authorizing and permitting me to act as a Sole Trader, and as such to carry on and conduct in my own name, in said city and county and State aforesaid, the business of buying and selling merchandise, buying and selling real and personal property, and mining stock, and to keep boarding and lodging-house, and to loan and borrow money on mortgage or otherwise, and to do and perform all acts connected with or incident to said different branches of business.

EMMA S. HOWE.

San Francisco, Cal., November 18th, A. D. 1878.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

FRANCES A. NELSON, plaintiff, vs. DAVID P.

NELSON, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to

DAVID P. NELSON, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now and heretofore existing between the plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is hereby expressly made, and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 13th day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

[SEAL.] By THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.

Wm. A. STUART, Deputy Clerk.

WOODS & COFFEY, Attorneys for Plaintiff.

CHICKERING

PIANO WAREROOMS,
31 POST ST., Mechanics' Institute Building.
ELEGANT PIANOS.

L. K. HAMMER,
Sole Agent for Pacific Coast.

Owners of Chickering Pianos are specially requested to leave orders for tuning at warerooms, 31 Post Street.

MUSIC

KNABE PIANOS.

IRVING PIANOS, ROGERS' UPRIGHT PIANOS,
Prince Organs, Waters' Organs, Sheet Music.
BANCROFT, KNIGHT & Co.,
733 MARKET STREET.

PIANOS

SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED PIANOS.

Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.

WOODWORTH, SCHELL & Co.
12 Post Street San Francisco.

JOE POHEIM

The Tailor,

203 Montgomery St. and 103 Third Street, under the Russ House, near Bush Street, has just received a large assortment of the latest style goods.
Suits to order from ..... $20
Pants to order from ..... 5
Overcoats to order from ..... 15

The leading question is where the best goods can be found at the lowest prices. The answer is at

JOE POHEIM,
203 Montgomery St. and 103 Third St.
Samples and Rules for Self-Measurement sent free to any address. Fit guaranteed.

MARBLEIZED
IRON MANTELS.

IN ELEGANCE OF DESIGN, QUALITY of finish, and durability of polish, they are every way superior to slate or marble. In point of economy, also, they cost very much less, are stronger, and certainly far more durable than either.

ALL SIZES AND STYLES

ENAMELED GRATES.

FRENCH COOKING

RANGES

All sizes, suitable for Hotels, Restaurants, Families, and Boarding-Houses.

W. W. MONTAGUE &amp; CO.

NOS. 110, 112, 114, 118, & 120 BATTERY ST.

CHRISTMAS

CANDIES AND HOLIDAY GOODS
supplied to Church Festivals and Parties at wholesale rates. Imported Cap Bonbons, extra fine, 50 cents a dozen.

ROBERTS, corner Bush and Polk Streets.

DECKER BROS

A REVOLUTION IN SEWING MACHINES!

THE

Automatic

Fast superseding all others. Enthusiasm of purchasers unbounded.
Nothing like it in the world. So easy to run a child ten years old can operate it. Entirely noiseless.
Positively no tension whatever.

WILLCOX &amp; GIBBS SEWING MACHINE CO.

C. L. HOVEY, AGENT.

No. 124 POST STREET, SAN FRANCISCO, AND NO. 361 TWELFTH STREET, OAKLAND.

DECORATION OF THE LEGION OF HONOR.

AWARD OF THE GOLD MEDAL.

FIVE DIPLOMAS OF MERIT!

THE PARIS EXPOSITION HAS AWARDED THE DECORATION OF the LEGION OF HONOR to MR. HENRY BREWSTER, senior member of the firm of

BREWSTER &amp; CO.

(OF BROOME STREET.)

CARRIAGE BUILDERS,

Of the city of New York. Also, the Gold Medal, and five Diplomas of Merit to the several foremen of departments, for an exhibition of Thirteen Carriages, a Park Drag, Pleasure Vehicles, and a Racing Sulky, at the late Exposition, as a recognition of the superior excellence of the work of the firm.

H. F. DONLEY, the representative, is now in San Francisco, and may be found at O. F. Willey & Co's, or at the Baldwin.

Messrs. O. F. WILLEY & CO., 427 Montgomery St., are Sole Agents in California.

BREWSTER &amp; CO. (OF BROOME STREET.)

Broadway, 47th and 48th Streets, New York City.

THE CAL. FURNITURE M'FG CO.

HAVE FIVE TIMES AS MUCH

FURNITURE

As any other house on this Coast, which has been purchased so low that we CAN and WILL sell at such prices that the poor can gratify their WISHES and the rich their TASTE. At the old stand,

NOS. 224 AND 226 BUSH STREET, S. F.

BRANCH, SEND FOR ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE. 910 MARKET ST.

CALIFORNIA SPOOL SILK.

The Extra 100 Yards. Quarter Ounce. Ounce Spools. Embroidery Silks.

THE BEST IN USE.

Manufactured in San Francisco, supporting over 100 white women and girls. Sold by all first-class dealers.

PIANOS ARE THE BEST

KOHLER & CHASE
SAN FRANCISCO
& OAKLAND.

WEBER

WAREROOMS, N. W. CORNER
KEARNY AND SUTTER STREETS.

SHERMAN, HYDE &amp; CO.

SHEET MUSIC,
MUSIC BOOKS,
MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

SEWING MACHINES.

GROVER & BAKER SEWING AND
Embroidering SILKS, Pure Dye, Full Weight. To the trade and at retail.

J. W. EVANS, 29 Post Street.

STEINWAY HALL,

117 POST STREET.

GRAY'S

NEW

MUSIC STORE

The greatest display of

STEINWAY

AND OTHER

PIANOS

EVER

EXHIBITED ON THIS COAST.

ALL ARE INVITED.

PACIFIC BUSINESS COLLEGE,

320 POST STREET,
San Francisco.

The Argonaut.

VOL. III. NO. 23.

SAN FRANCISCO, DECEMBER 14, 1878.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

CHRISTMAS ISSUE OF THE ARGONAUT.

NOTE THESE SPECIAL FEATURES.

A Splendid Double Number (thirty-two pages), containing the following specialties prepared expressly for this issue, with illustrations, and a beautiful title-page designed by Jules Tavernier and engraved at the establishment of Harper & Bros., New York.

HUALAPI, a Californian story, by the author of "Big Jack Small."	-	-	J. W. GALLY.
THE SINGED CAT, a vigorous Character and Dialect Sketch,	-	-	E. H. CLOUGH.
THE COMING STRUGGLE, a scholarly presentation of the Chinese problem,	-	-	W. N. LOCKINGTON.
ELEVEN DAYS IN THE HIGH SIERRA, ILLUSTRATED,	-	-	GEORGE B. BAYLEY.
SAN FRANCISCO THIRTY YEARS AGO, ILLUSTRATED,	-	-	JAMES C. WARD.
BRODERICK'S MORAL COURAGE, How Single-handed he Stayed a Revolution,	-	-	A. J. MOULDER.
AL HARITH, A STORY OF THE ORIENT,	-	-	L. H. FOOTE.
THE CHINESE MUST GO, a Satire on the Sand-lot, in the vernacular, with translation,	-	-	SING LEE.
A CALIFORNIAN SHEEP SHEARING,	-	-	ROBERT DUNCAN MILNE.
DEATH AND DESOLATION,	-	-	BY THE LATE COL. RICHARD REALF.
SANTA CLAUS, a Christmas Play for Children,	-	-	J. F. CLARK.
A DUCK OF A DINNER, discussing Canvas-backs,	-	-	A. S. BENDER.
JOVINA, a Legend of the old San Carlos Mission,	-	-	DANIEL O'CONNELL.
CHRISTMAS BELLS,	-	-	ALBERT F. WARNER.
LUCK, an article discussing the Californian gambling propensities,	-	-	O. P. D.

ORIGINAL MANUSCRIPT OF THE HEATHEN CHINEE, BY BRET HARTE; ANECDOTES AND FABLES, BY LITTLE JOHNNY, EDITORIALS, PRATTLE, BETSY B.'S DRAMATIC LETTER,

And all the regular departments, together with short sketches not mentioned above. A splendid specimen of Californian literature to send East.

All subscribers will receive this number, and there will be no advance in price to newsdealers, who should forward their extra orders at once to the SAN FRANCISCO NEWS COMPANY. Retail price, ten cents; for sale at all news stands. Advertisements for the Christmas number should be sent in at once. Special rates can be made at the PUBLICATION OFFICE, 522 CALIFORNIA STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.

MISS JARVIS' MYSTERY.

"Will ye ride?"

"Gid" Barker drew up his horse to ask the question. The little muddy buggy drawn by a big bay horse, with sharp bones and short tail, was in a sort of road—an uncertain wagon track—winding through a scattering growth of scraggy pines, more or less under-grown with pink-flowered manzanita. At the side of the track a tall, sunbonneted girl was walking with an alert air, swinging a tin lunch-pail. She turned at Barker's call, showing a pair of bright black eyes, and a comely, capable sort of face, assented promptly, and mounted to the seat. Gid Barker drove on in silence for a few minutes, slouching forward till his elbows were almost on his knees, and watching the ears of his horse. Meanwhile the girl's bright black eyes took an inventory of his small, leathery face and "seedy" clothes.

"Ver the new school-mom in this yer district?" he drawled at last, without looking up.

"Yes."

"Miss Jarvis is yer name, aint it?"—after another pause.

"Yes."

Now it was not at all strange that Mr. Barker knew these facts; for at a quarter to nine that morning he had traversed the road in an opposite direction affixing posters to pine trees and houses; posters which set forth his claims and recommendations to a vacant place in the California House of Representatives. He had stuck one to the tiny log school-house, just behind a bend in the road, and had taken the chance to ask of a heavy-faced, half-breed boy who stood by and stared:

"Got a new school-mom? What's her name?"

But Miss Jarvis had likewise improved her opportunities. "You're Mr. Barker, I s'pose? Running for the Legislature, ain't you?"

She had catechised the children about the poster, and the man who put it up. Miss Jarvis was blessed with a very large share of the spirit of inquiry.

"How come you to run in February?" she said.

"Special Election—man dead," said Barker, cheerfully. "Course ye stop at Mis' Sharp's; I kin take ye clear home, then."

They continued to investigate each other's antecedents. Barker learned that Miss Jarvis was "from the mountains," and that this dismal wilderness of low knolls, with its thin growth of pines and occasional sheep-ranches was a populous region to her. Her native taste for her neighbor's affairs was stimulated by thus coming into a new neighborhood, and just then a subject came up that roused her curiosity to the utmost. They came out from among the pine trees and crossed a wide, gravelly creek-bed, where cottonwoods grew, festooned, like the banks, with wild grape-vines. A moment later they came to the ancient bed of the same creek, now become the most fertile spot in the same region. Here was a shanty, shaded by a very old cottonwood that had once marked the edge of the water, and surrounded by a thriving vegetable garden and orchard. That was a rare sight in that part of the country, and Miss Jarvis leaned out to look at it with eager interest.

"Reckon ye've never been by here?" Barker said.

"No, I've only been here three days, and I cut across home through the pine trees. Who lives here? I asked Mrs. Sharp who all lived round, but she never told me of this place."

"Well, Mis' Sharp, she's kinder funny. She don't like to answer questions, an' I reckon she thought it'd make a good deal o' talkin' th' say anythin' about Ol' Tom. He's a queer stick. Lived there by himself this five year. Thar he is, in that corner, by the water-pipes."

Sure enough, in the fence-corner was an ingenious home-made hydrant, connected by rude pipes with the stream farther up, where water was perennial. Stooping over this arrangement and tinkering with it was a tall, gray-haired man, shabbily dressed, and slouching in his carriage.

"Do you know him?" asked Miss Jarvis, eagerly.

"Oh, yes, I know him. Been in his shanty, an' that's whar ther ain't many been."

"Why not stop and speak to him, then?"

"Jest's soon," said Barker, drawing up the bay horse, and whistling a call, fingers in mouth. The gray-haired man turned and came slowly across the field.

"Why hadn't many been in his shanty?" Miss Jarvis demanded, meanwhile.

"Well, he don't ask 'em to—didn't ask me. Fact is, he's queer. He lets ye see sometimes that he's educated, 'thout meantin' to; one thing, he don't seem to know how to talk to a woman any way but stylish, but mostly he talks common. They say he's got a college di-ploma in thar. An' they say he's been a doctor, or jedge, or suthin' sech, in some city, an' jest backed out an' come up yer to raise veg'tables."

Miss Jarvis had no time for more, for "Old Tom" was close to them. As he came nearer she saw that he was younger than his gray hair and shambling gait made him seem. If he had straightened up and stepped out freely he would have been quite stalwart; he had a heavy blonde beard, and listless blue eyes; his features were fine and intelligent, but with a passive, indifferent expression.

"Well, Gid," he said, absently, standing between the wheels, and leaning his arms on the seat. "Lectureerin', hey?"

"Vaas. Goin' to vote for me?"

"Do' know. Like's not I shan't vote."

"Oh, you'd orter vote for me, hadn't he, Miss Jarvis? Le'me interduce ye to Miss Jarvis, Tom; she's yer new school-mom."

Instantly the battered hat came off with a courteous gesture, and Tom straightened up from his slouching position. "I beg your pardon, madam; I did not see that Mr. Barker had a lady with him. I'm glad to meet you, Miss Jarvis, and I hope your school-teaching here will be very pleasant. I'm afraid ladies and teaching these very remote schools rather weary and thankless work."

"This seems to be an easy school; mostly half-breeds, and they're too stupid to be troublesome," Miss Jarvis said, much impressed by the impalpable air of courtesy and refinement in the man's tone and manner. "You don't send any children, do you?"

She meant it for a home question, and watched his face. He only said, indifferently though politely: "No, I have no children at pleasure."

When they had driven on, Miss Jarvis began: "But you must know something about him. Where'd he come from; and what's his true name?"

"We-ell," began Barker leisurely, settling himself for a story, "this 'ere's all ever I knew—an' I ain't no bad hand to find out things, neither. Say eight year ago thar come a tramp 'round whar I was at Shasta. Tramps wasn't everyday diet them days, an' folks'd give 'em money. But this man, says he: 'Whar does a man do yer fer a livin' when he ain't got no capital?' says he. An' says I, bein' by, says I: 'Herds sheep.' 'Kin I herd yours?' says he. An' says I: 'What's yer name?' And he says: 'Tom; and not a word more could I get outen him. Then I says: 'Whar'd ye come from?' An' he says, says he: 'All over; I've ben trampin' it this five year, an' now I'm sick on it, an' wan' to settle down,' says he; an' that's all ever I got outen him. Well, I hired 'im; and he jest stuck to the herder's camp, an' never sent nothin'; an' in two or three years he prospected 'round an' bought that 'ar patch, an' put it into garden. He's ben addin' to it ever sech. There haint no sech garden-stuff in the county as his'n; but he won't try to make money; sells his stuff to Chiny peddlers fer jest enough to save himself. Ve see, he's sort o' cracked; smart enough fer governor, if he was all there. He's kind o' wrapped up in his garden; once a lot o' sheep broke away, an' cum across a piece of new corn, an' used it clean up. Well, they do say, Old Tom, he really cried when he see it, bein' as he's gettin' sorter childish; but he wouldn't take a cent for it. 'Tain't the vally of the corn,' says he; 'but,' says he, 'it makes me feel bad to see that pretty field all spoiled.' Seems like he feels fer his garden, not havin' anythin' else to be fond of," ended Barker, sentimentally.

But Miss Jarvis was not sentimental.

"May be he's hiding from officers," she suggested.

"Wasn't there ever sheriffs here looking for some one?"

"Plenty of 'em," said Barker, chuckling. "Some one or 'nother always sends 'em after Tom. They go up an' rest, him, an' examine him, an' come away an' say he ain't their man. He's got quite used to bein' arrested, Tom has."

"Don't he ever have letters?"

"Not a letter. Once a letter come to the office for an Austin Wedgwood, an' one to the postmaster askin' about sech a man. He went to Ol' Tom, but Tom, says he: 'Tain't none o' mine; I don't know no sech man.'"

"Why, good land!" cried Miss Jarvis in great excitement, with her eyes blacker and her cheeks redder than ever; "there was a letter like that came to our postoffice! Just the same name!"

"Folks are always writin' all over Californy after stray men," said Barker, philosophically. "They think that Californy's 'bout as big as a township, an' that everybody here knows all the men in the State. Well, here we are; glad I come along jest right to bring you home. Suppose you jest take this poster along with ye, an' get one o' them big boys to stick it up on the shed whar it kin be seen from the road."

Miss Jarvis stood on Mrs. Sharp's unplanned door-step a moment, watching the buggy roll away, in the low wintry sunshine that made the manzanita shrubs rosier than ever.

"Great Representative he'll make," she thought. "He ain't educated at all." Then she turned to a more interesting subject. "I'll find out that Old Tom before I set foot out of this district," she said with decision, turning to open the door.

But what picture is this that awaits her? She stopped short in the doorway to stare. A little carpetless room, with unplanned walls; a fireplace of rough stone; a wide red glow in the darkening room, falling full on a strange lady who sat and knitted in an old crippled rocking-chair. But such a lady! Amanda Jarvis had never seen, even in a picture, such a clear, pure contour, where the bent head and rounded cheek showed against the fire-lit wall; such soft dark hair, curling a little at the temples, and knotted back with such simple grace over a shapely head; such wide, sorrowful brown eyes, and such a proud and sweet mouth. And there was such a perfection of taste in every line and shade of her simple dark-brown dress, with her red worsteds trailing across, that it was no wonder Miss Jarvis thought her richly dressed. She rose to meet the girl, with a peculiarly winning smile.

"You must be Miss Jarvis—I thought you would be here soon. And I am Miss Wyman. Mrs. Sharp has gone to the sheep-camp; she told me, and left me to introduce myself. She is going to let me board here for a few weeks, so we shall know each other quite well." She was looking down—for she was a little the taller—with a sort of kindly interest at the girl's handsome face, which made a vivid contrast to her own, clear and pale, and dark as that of an Italian Madonna.

Miss Jarvis made some confused answer, and sat down to cross-question Miss Wyman. She had learned caution by experience, and did not dare push her questions too far. So she only found that Miss Wyman was from the East; that, returning from a trip to Shasta, she had come upon this place by the merest accident, and, liking its loneliness, had decided to stay here and rest awhile. She led the girl always imperceptibly away from the subject of Miss Wyman to that of Miss Jarvis, and entered into all the little interests that made up the teacher's life. Miss Jarvis found herself telling of those Wedgwood letters. She did not know just how the subject came up, but it was something Miss Wyman said about men disappearing in California.

"And was the man found?" the lady asked, with her pleasant, interested way.

"No, there was no such man, either here or in my neighborhood."

Miss Wyman shook the ends of red worsteds from her lap into the fire, and stood looking through the window. She began to talk of the manzanita, and of the wild-flowers "at home," and of some she had picked in Europe. Miss Jarvis learned by persistent questioning that this slight, quiet lady had traveled almost everywhere that white men's feet had gone—in China and Africa, as well as in Russia. The longer she studied Miss Wyman's face the surer she was that some object, not love of adventure, had led her all over the world, and she vowed that she would learn what it was, if she had to go herself and ask questions in China or Russia.

From that afternoon the new school-teacher in the "Sheep District" lived to unravel the two mysteries she had lighted on. Teaching was a "side issue;" her chief business in life was to find out who Old Tom was, and why he left the world; who Miss Wyman was, and whe traveled the world over alone. She used to walk home from school by the long way, along the road, and stop to talk to the hermit. There was something perplexingly gentlemanly always in his way to her on such occasions, but he talked only of his garden or her school, and seemed uncomprehending when she asked about his former life. It was so evident that his mind was to some extent shattered, that Miss Jarvis began to suspect that he had partially lost his memory. Certainly she could "get no more outen him" than Mr. Barker—whom his constituents had by this time sent with pride to Sacramento as a specimen of the honest granger, with no book-learning, who was to circumvent the wiles of literary fellers and of railroad kings, and make the cost of freighting wool and sheep merely nominal, while their price should remain as high as ever.

At last Miss Jarvis admitted that Tom himself either could not or would not tell his history to her, so she decided to search for herself. She watched for a time when he was busied in a distant part of his orchard, and slipped valiantly in his house (by courtesy so called). She found a shabby kitchen with the unmistakable air of a man's housekeeping, but though she looked in every pot and pan, and up the rough stone chimney, she could find no more than a fire-place, two shelves of dishes and kettles, a box made into a cupboard for food, and two chairs. There was a dark closet of a bed-room, too, which she explored, holding her breath and listening for the owner's step. It had a rough bunk, with only pillow and blankets, and a few clothes in a box, nothing more. Not a book in the house; not even a candle. She had just found some seeds and garden tools under the bed when she heard Tom's step in the other room. There was no resource but to scramble ignominiously under the bed, and dispose herself among the bags of beet and turnip seed till, after a half hour of the greatest trepidation, she was liberated by his departure. It was a bitterly disappointed young school-teacher that found her way home in the dusk, and told Mrs. Sharp she had stayed to sweep the school-room, and that was what made her dress so dusty. She had counted on making tremendous revelations—secret correspondence, documents, at least the college di-ploma. She began to think Old Tom was a humbug, in spite of his manners.

But the incident did her service by suggesting a plan for her other campaign. Miss Wyman had not gone far in her acquaintance with Miss Jarvis before she began to be very careful about keeping her door locked. She made Mrs. Sharp's a sort of headquarters whence she made long or short trips to the camps and villages for miles—to the grazing settlements in the hills forty miles away; to the mines sixty miles away—but her key always went with her. These trips excited Miss Jarvis very much, but she could only find that Miss Wyman always came back looking weary and hopeless. One of the trips was to take place on a Saturday, a few weeks after the search of Tom's cabin. Miss Jarvis kept persistently in the sitting-room from which Miss Wyman's door opened. Miss Wyman came and stood by the fire, waiting till Joe Sharp should bring her horse to the door. She was singing softly to herself, in a voice that had been the envy of drawing-rooms:

"Du Heilige, nehme dein kind zurück.
Ich habe genossen das irdische Glück,
Ich habe gelebt und geliebet."

"Is that French?" asked Miss Jarvis.

"No; German."

"What does it mean?"

Miss Wyman turned a little and looked at the girl; she hesitated a moment, then said, in her quiet, pleasant voice:

"Then take, Holy Virgin, thy child back to thee.
I have plucked the one blossom that hangs on Earth's tree,
I have lived and have loved, and I die."

That is a free translation.

"Oh," Miss Jarvis said. Then: "Don't you want me to go along with you? It's a dreadful lonely ride to Dogtown."

"Thank you, but I like to ride alone."

"All right," said Miss Jarvis to Miss Jarvis' own soul;

"I'll do something else then, see if I don't."

Miss Wyman went into the kitchen to speak to Mrs. Sharp. She was gone about sixty seconds, but in that time Miss Jarvis had darted into the room, and put herself under the bed. Miss Wyman came in and moved about, fastening that beautiful hair of hers securely, putting on her hat, and still singing low:

"Ich habe gelebt und geliebet."

Once she stopped, stood still for a moment, and said, clearly:

"I have lived and have loved!"—caught her breath quickly and moved about again. In a moment she went out, locking the door from without; her horse's hoofs sounded outside, and Amanda Jarvis rolled triumphantly out from under the bed. She was in a very small room, walls and roof of unplanned pine, floor of planed; a chair, a little table—spread with a white towel—a clean little white bed, a trunk, a shelf full of books, a fresh white cotton curtain; on the wall, little photographs and engravings in plain frames—but all high art, if Miss Jarvis had known it; wild flowers in a glass on the stand, by a work basket, and a little Bible—all so dainty and lady-like that it half awed Miss Jarvis. But all this she had seen before, for she had often been Miss Wyman's guest in the room; had looked over the books, and read a few of them. There was one picture over which had always fallen a blue silk veil; beneath was a bracket, where a slender vase always held the prettiest clusters of bloom—shell-pink manzanita, dreamy anemones, or perhaps a handful of blue bells from the hills; the blue silk was drawn aside now, making a pretty canopy; and there, so enshrined, was the portrait of a bright-faced young man. Miss Jarvis studied it carefully, but could find no likeness in the smiling eyes, the brave, eager young look, and the keen, sensitive features, to any one she had ever seen. So she hunted up the key to the trunk and opened that; she impressed the order of everything on her mind, so that she might put things back in the same way, and then explored. And first she found a long list of post-offices, all over the world; most were marked "written to," many, "heard from." There were memorandum books, full of records of clues to "A. W."—all of which, when followed up, seemed to have failed, and were marked "no use," all this in what Miss Jarvis had learned was Miss Wyman's round, clear hand. There were receipts for money paid for advertisements in an incredible number of papers; and, finally, a casket whose secret spring was found after half an hour's persistent search. Inside were little mementoes, dried flowers, and a package of letters—all in the same hand. She glanced at the signatures, and started up, with her eyes wide open, and an exclamation only checked by prudence. "Austin Wedgwood!" So this was the seeker after Austin Wedgwood? So it was that search which had carried her over the world? Miss Jarvis' quick shrewdness sprang from one conclusion to another. She ran over the letters; some were from Europe, all friendly, and more and more tender in tone; bright, happy, loving letters they were, with little sketches on the margins, and most confident hopes for the future. "I defy Fate," he wrote; "my darling, what is there that could part you and me?" There was a photograph with them—the same face as on the wall; and beneath them, a deed of gift, dated more than thirteen years back, transferring all property of Austin Wedgwood, Providence, Rhode Island, to Gertrude Wyman, of the same place. To Miss Jarvis' eyes the property seemed immense.

She recovered from her triumphant astonishment in time, escaped through the window, trusting that the removal of the nail which fastened it (the only trace left of her presence) would not be observed; and made a new vow, to find what had become of Austin Wedgwood, and why he had disappeared. She had taken the precaution to tell Mrs. Sharp in the morning that she had to go over to the school-house to make out her monthly report, and might be gone for several hours. Miss Wyman came home late, looking pale and sick-hearted. "She didn't find him at Dogtown," thought Amanda Jarvis. It was at breakfast next day, when she was looking more her own gravely sweet self, that one of the big Sharp boys said:

"Ma, I saw the doctor goin' by this mornin'." Said Old Tom's down sick, an' he thinks it's small pox, fer he's been 'xposed."

"Where'd he get it?" cried Miss Jarvis, losing some of her color, as she went through a rapid calculation of the number of days since she had seen him.

"One o' the Chiny peddlers."

"Not the one that comes here?" Mrs. Sharp said, with lively interest.

"No; the old feller with pock-marks. He couldn't have it, if he tried; but the doctor's jest found out that he'd been workin' fer some folks whar thar's small-pox, an' kep' up his peddlin', too. He's run, or he'd get hurt; folks is mighty mad. But it's rough on Ol' Tom, fer he ain't got nobody to tend to him."

"No one at all?" said Miss Wyman, in her earnest way. "Oh, surely they won't leave him so. The doctor will get him a nurse."

"Well," said Mrs. Sharp, slowly, "if 'twas anythin' but small-pox, or if he was a body's own folks. But, you see, it's nobody's business more'n anybody else's; an' everybody has their own family to think of. I've got as much call to go as anybody, but how could I do it; 'twouldn't be doin' right by them that has first claims on me."

"Doctor's been tryin' to get a nurse," Joe went on. "Couldn't find none."

Miss Wyman had risen, and stood with her slender hand on the back of her chair. The diamond of an engagement ring twinkled there.

"It seems a very plain case," she said, with her quiet smile. "I have no nearer claims to consider."

"You! Are you crazy?" cried Mrs. Sharp, taking in her meaning after a long stare, though the quicker-witted Miss Jarvis had cried out at once: "An old tramp." Mrs. Sharp went on, in strong remonstrance: "No one knows who he is! A lady like you!"

"I am the very best one. I have no reason to object to death—none whatever. There is nothing I should leave behind me. This comes to me like a God-send."

The people at the table looked at her silently. Outside, the April sun broke through a rift, and a little stream of light crossed the dim, rough kitchen, and wrapped her where she stood—the tall, Madonna-like lady, with her clear face all lighted with a great gladness. Even Miss Jarvis felt with awe a glimmering perception of what the love and the longing must have been that had lived in this other woman all these years, and what life must have meant to her, that the chance to leave it honorably could bring such a joy to her face. Joe Sharp sobbed outright. Miss Wyman moved to leave the room.

"And never find him?" cried Miss Jarvis, excited beyond her own control.

Miss Wyman turned at the door, and looked at the girl; but it was no time for resentment.

"I am as likely to find him in the next world as in this," she said, more to herself than to the other, and left them.

Then Miss Jarvis told the excited circle what she had learned, avoiding any mention of how she had learned it.

"Yes, I heard some time ago from Diggerville and Red Crick fellers that it's Wedgwood she asks for when she rides around. I didn't know who he was though," said Joe.

"Why didn't you tell me?" Miss Jarvis cried, chagrined.

"Oh, I do know; it seemed kinder shabby," the young man said, coloring.

While they talked they heard her pathetic voice in the other room singing in snatches:

"Why vex our souls with care?
The grave is cool and low.
Have we found life so fair
That we should fear to go?"

"Then hold us close, sweet Death,
If so it seemeth best."

When they looked for her five minutes later to see if she could be in earnest, they discovered she had already gone. In the sweet morning air, along the road, green with spring-time, under the white clouds, breaking and melting from the dark-blue sky, she was walking, a gracious vision, in that lonely place. A few moments later she entered the door of the shanty under the old cottonwood.

The sick man had been moved out into his kitchen, and the doctor had evidently done all he could for his comfort before leaving him. The disease had not yet declared itself, except as fever. The heavy beard was gone, and his face, still unmarred, had taken on, in the unconsciousness of a feverish sleep, something of the look of younger days. Miss Wyman had never seen him before, as it happened, and now, as she stood gazing at his face in the squalid sick room, she looked like an angel come to carry him to the world.

One minute, five minutes passed, and still the dark, long lashes were studying his unconscious features; she bent her head to listen to his mutterings. At last he woke, looked up with a vague awe.

"So I am delirious already; but this is a beautiful delirium. It is the Angel of Sorrow—but she is blended with my memory of—her."

Gertrude Wyman knelt down by him, and took both his hands in hers.

"Listen to me, Austin," she said, without a quiver in her clear, grave tones; "see if you can understand what I say. I have searched the world for you to say this: If it was to escape me that you left me, thirteen years ago, and for a reparation that you left everything to me, then you are free of all. I shall stay with you while you are sick; and when you are well I shall go away somewhere, and you may go home without fear of me; you will find your property untouched. But because it may be that there is some mistake, I have spent my life and my fortune in finding you. And if there has been a mistake that can be set right, we will begin all over again, for you are as dear to me as ever; and if not, I shall leave you to go your ways, and my love will go with you always."

At first he listened confusedly; then the fog that had lain on his brain for years seemed to break away, as the voice from his youth went on. He tried to snatch away his hands.

"Gertrude, Gertrude, are you mad? If this is not a dream, nor a miracle, you must not be here. Do you know it is small-pox that I have?"

She held his hands—for he was too weak to free them—and smiled, looking into his eyes. He had known of old that he might as well resist the ocean as Gertrude Wyman when she smiled so. After a moment she said:

"Your mind will not be clear long; what is it that you have to say to me?"

"I can not understand," he broke out, in a voice of terrible excitement, though repressed. "Gertrude, I never took up a hasty suspicion; I had your own hand and signature."

"To what?" she said quietly, but trembling with eagerness.

"To your falsehood," he cried, breaking into fierce and rapid speech. "To your intention to keep your word to me, and your faith to that man—Stuart; to give me your hand and him your heart. Could I mistake your writing? There is none like it in the world; and there were other things to confirm it. If you had changed your mind like other women I might have said, 'Go, and God bless you.' But what could I do but 'creep away, poor, hurt fowl, to hide myself in sedges'? I loathed our civilization that was only a lying crust over brutality—a whitened sepulchre, and within are dead men's bones and all uncleanness; and I deeded everything to you, and walked out of my house in the rain, with not a thread but the clothes I wore; and I was a tramp for years. Then I felt that a man ought to be at some simple, honest work, that had nothing to do with that fiend society; and I took up this work. I never read; I never thought nor felt; I tried, as my highest attainment, to achieve 'The dull mechanic pacing to and fro, the set gray life and apathetic end,' and I did it. My life meant nothing to me but hoeing and weeding, and eating and sleeping. I had blotted out the memory of you; the pain of it would have maddened me—killed me. A blankness had settled on me for years, till there came dim dreams in my feverishness, and then everything came back at your voice."

There were tears in her dark eyes, and her hands—clasped now—trembled.

"And all the time," she said, "I have done just the opposite. I have kept my mind awake; I have thought, and studied, and felt—O my God, how I have felt! There has never been an hour that I have not thought of you; never a moment that you have not been vaguely in my mind. And the pain of it was killing me."

The two faces said the same thing. The dark-eyed, straight-browed woman's was so sensitive and responsive, so keenly, vividly alive; the fair-faced man, with his prematurely gray hair, seemed, in spite of his present look of tremendous agitation, to have been paralyzed by some great blow long since.

"Austin," she said again, "tell me all the details of what you had against me."

He told her all she asked, answering her careful questions about dates and places. When he had ended, she was silent a little; then she said:

"I do not wonder at your mistake. There was deceit and treachery. My handwriting is peculiar; but in our school days my cousin Dorris learned to imitate it perfectly, out of sheer affection for me. My side of the story that you tell, and other things that I have learned since, convince me that she has forfeited all right to my silence. She loved you, Austin; and, though I never dreamed of it before, it was she who deceived you."

The man had sprung up in his bed with a curse, spite of weakness.

"My darling, don't," she said—and at last all the long-repressed passion of tenderness was in her voice. "Poor girl! she lost you and her honor both. I might have hated her if she had won; but, Austin, she died of remorse—died begging to see me, and tell me something; but I was across the ocean. Let it go—what does it matter now? 'Wir haben gelebt und geliebt'—we have lived and have loved. Let us die: I have you now, O my darling, my darling!"

Her voice broke at last into a pathetic cry. In his last lucid minutes he held her in his tremulous arms, calling her caressing names, and murmuring his passionate penitence.

But Amanda Jarvis never knew. For the doctor never saw the sick man again except in delirium. And when they buried them side by side under the pines, and put Gertrude Wynan's name on one wooden slab, they wrote only "Tom" on the other. Miss Jarvis still watches, wherever she goes, for Austin Wedgwood.

The next school-teacher among the pines was an Oakland girl. As she stood by the graves and heard soft-hearted Joe Sharp tell of the beautiful lady who sought the world over for her lover, and died at last for an old hermit, she took out a pencil and wrote on the slab—all unconscious that they were the words Gertrude Wyman used to sing, and almost the last that she had spoken to her lover's conscious ear—

"Ich habe gelebt und geliebt."

Then she turned away, and there were tears in her eyes. NILES, December 2, 1878. MILICENT W. SHINN.

UNDER THE STARS.

The day is not for thought, but deeds,
And one who dreams at midday needs—
He needs the throbbing pulse which acts,
The will which changes dreams to facts;
He needs to know both right and wrong;
He needs to know men weak and strong;
To learn to think with healthful mind,
With creed as broad as human kind;
He needs to feel that toil is great,
The architect of every fate.

But day is only half our lives,
And he half lives who always strives,
Who takes no survey of the field,
Who plants, but never plans the yield.

Go forth at night by peaceful seas,
And catch their wondrous melodies;
Go forth and hear the tide of fate
Which pulses through the Golden Gate,
While far to seaward breaks the moan
Of billows on sad Farallon.
There yield thyself unto the spell,
And let thy soul uplift and dwell
Beneath the searching silent stars
That pierce like silver scimitars.
Then in the unimpassioned night
Thy soul shall feel diviner light,
Shall sit entranced, as one who hears
The surging anthem of the spheres,
There dream of things of high estate,
Of deathless deeds which make men great,
Of burning words which flame like fire,
And rouse a nation's deep desire,
Of noble thoughts which glorify,
Of fame and immortality.

Oh, it is grand to dream—to play
With inspiration—disarray
The mind so it may cleave the sea
Of thought, with god-like poise, soul free!
Like him who saw new worlds in space,
Thy finer vision now shall trace
A hint of higher mysteries,
A glimpse of possibilities
Which lie like undiscovered spheres
Within diviner atmospheres.
Thy mind shall hold a broader plan,
Thy heart confess a truer man;
And day, no more a weary round
Of toiling hours, of jarring sound,
Shall come to thee with new intent,
Thy time of grand accomplishment.

SAN FRANCISCO, December, 1878.

CHAS. H. PHELPS.

A Sat-Upon Litterateur.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—What I am about to relate is so surprising—so out of the course of nature—that I hesitate to set it down. It is a fact of my experience, but so incredible that I doubt it myself. I have read Gulliver and Munchausen, and I believe them. I have studied the daily papers, and agree with the views expressed in the leaders. Mr. Stanley's account of his explorations presents some difficulties which I hope my growing faith will in time remove or surmount. Jim Anderson's testimony before the Potter Committee, and Colonel Cremony's tales of travel and adventure are indubitably true. But what I have to relate does, I confess, resemble a lie of the first magnitude. The reader must judge for himself.

Some five years ago there was a rage in this country for posthumous literature; the periodicals would publish almost anything one might write, if one would only die when it was written. Every number of every magazine contained from one to a half dozen posthumous papers. The living had no chance. I remember being told by a regular contributor to a leading magazine that having indiscreetly handed in several papers he went in bodily fear lest the editor should kill him. Here was clearly my opportunity. I was weary of life; I coveted the distinction of print, my name was now so well known that my "last words" would be eagerly snatched at, and printed with such captivating headings as these: "A Voice from the Beyond;" "Hark! from the Tomb;" "Talking Back," etc.

I took retired lodgings on Clay street, stored my rooms with stationery, and for two months labored night and day—worked the oil out of my joints, the fire out of my soul, the hair off my head, and the flesh off my bones, preparing articles on all manner of subjects, but principally life, death, and immortality. I prepared three for each magazine in America. These articles would, I think, have delighted you. When all were finished I sealed and stamped them, addressing each packet to its proper periodical, and left them on my table. I made my will, wrote a lying entry in my diary explaining the motive of my terrible deed, and walked away in the night to the cemetery at Lone Mountain, and entered by climbing the fence. I drew the deadly steel from my pocket, and placed the edge against my throat. "Now," said I, "come Death, come Fame!" Just then the moon came out and flooded the cemetery with light.

Believe me now, if ever. In three minutes every corpse in that field had got up in its night clothes, taken a look at the weather, and sat down beside its tombstone to write a posthumous article for some magazine! The scratching of their pens could have been heard a mile! One yellow and fleshless old rascal near me nodded familiarly while arranging his paper, and remarked that the dead had never enjoyed such opportunities of literary distinction in all their lives, and for his part he looked for nothing less than a world-wide fame if he were spared.

It is needless to say that in the face of such competition I relinquished my design, and still drag out a miserable existence as yours very truly,

C. P. Q.

The Paris Figaro says: Ornaments made of the blood of bullocks are the latest mania among fashionable dames; women admiring the peculiar black tint which pervades the ornaments, and which is absent from those of similar appearance derived from the mineral instead of the animal kingdom. The blood is first dried in a sieve and reduced to powder, and then again sifted to insure the utmost fineness in the material. The powder is next fired in moulds, and is ultimately pressed for five or ten minutes, and is ultimately polished to the necessary shape.

SAN FRANCISCO, December 12, 1878.

DEAR MADGE:—You are so exceedingly dabbles about the American drama that I almost hesitate to tell you that I have really seen one. It is thoroughly American, too, for it is the tale of a jack-knife, which is not a common implement of war outside our big Republic. I must say I was ineffably bored during the first act, everybody dawdled and drawled so. There seemed to be nothing doing and very little saying. A vague suggestion was thrown out that a croquet game was going on somewhere in the vicinity, but there was only one girl to play. But the jack-knife was finally introduced, and began to play its part in a very spirited way, and thenceforth all was action. "Constance Harewood" is a banker's daughter. You will observe that it is the thing to make an American heroine always a banker's daughter. It puts her upon a sound financial basis to start with, and bankers, I suppose, are our patricians. Miss Harewood is afflicted with three several lovers of three several kinds. The first, in Miss Harewood's consideration, is her cousin "Cyril," a young man with a lot of money and a very hot temper. Mr. Cyril's temper and the jack-knife are placed in close juxtaposition and forced upon the attention so pertinaciously that one is not permitted a particle of mystery as to what is going to take place. Mr. Sam. Piercy played the impetuous lover, and played it excellently even, although he has not what Stuart Robson calls metropolitan finish. In fact, the cast was unexceptionable, for the other two lovers' parts were taken by O'Neill, and Morrison; and with Clara Morris as heroine and Jennings and Mrs. Farren to fill out with, what better need we ask? Mr. O'Neill's name happened to be left out of the bills, much to the anguish of a couple of pretty country girls, who wore their programmes to tatters trying to find the name tucked into some obscure corner, at the last moment. They held a grave dissertation as to the appearance of age or youth which he presented, for you must know he took the part of first old man, and whitened himself to the eyebrows. The finally concluded that "Clara Morris was real mean not to take him," and let the subject drop. He is a judge, a Knickerbocker, I presume, by his name, "Van Cort," and he is as cool and collected as "Cyril" is rash and impetuous. The third lover is the confidential clerk of the banker. He takes to speculating, gets into trouble, gets up a motif for the crime, and is altogether quite a villainous young villain. Of course it follows that this part goes to Mr. Morrison. Fancy an ingenious young maiden basking in the smiles of good fortune, having three articles of this kind on hand at one time. No reasonable girl objects to one lover, but if she must have three she prefers them in rotation. They all declare themselves in one day, and one of them closes the eventful twenty-four hours by stabbing the young lady's papa with the jack-knife. "Cyril," who owns the knife, is clapped into prison, and put on trial with a promptitude which affords an excellent example to our courts. "Judge Van Cort" next gets into a very unpleasant dilemma. Of course, being a little older, he loves a little harder than the others do. Consequently when the delight of his heart comes to him in her trouble, and lets him know in rather a roundabout way that if he will only ask once more she will say yes, he can not unreasonably forbear to ask. Unfortunately, the acquittal of "Cyril," against whom circumstantial evidence is strong, is her condition. As the case is on trial in his own court it is a hard one. Dear girl, has my lucid explanation given you an idea of the plot? If so, you can easily understand that this interview is the best bit in the play. Clara Morris as an ingenue is nothing. It is only when she begins to suffer that she is strong, and by this time she was having pretty hard times. She gave the "Judge" a close struggle between love and duty. As for Mr. O'Neill and Miss Morris, they never either of them played a scene better than they did this. Fortunately, and strangely enough, for audiences are uniformly cold, the scene was appreciated. Meanwhile, as the summaries say, "Eustace Lawton," the real murderer, is having a bad attack of good old-fashioned remorse. He enters gloomily from various unexpected quarters, his face touched up with three coats of lily white and an inch and a quarter of lampblack under each eye. He is a nervous, distrust, apprehensive, and unutterably miserable. Mr. Morrison fell into line with every one else and played well, more especially, perhaps, in the last scene, a sort of modernized transcription of "Lady Macbeth's" sleep walking gymnastics. Of course he betrays himself, and equally of course, it was necessary that "Cyril" should be present. But the American dramatist is not to be floored by a little thing like this. "Cyril" was made to break jail, and entered very opportunely with one lock displaced on his brow, and his necktie loosened to give evidence of the tremendous experience through which he had passed. "Judge Van Cort" made a timely midnight call, and the curtain fell on every one but the banker. Now, Madge, do not you think that is rather an ingenious plot for an American drama? The fastidious New Yorkers called it thin, and so do the fastidious here, but there is so little of the really picturesque in the every-day American life that I consider it quite remarkable when they can carry an every household through five acts of dramatic interest. Introducing the Washington politician, the boor of the frontier, or the eternal negro with his minstrel witticisms. In Conscience the authors are obliged to introduce a convent for the sake of the picturesque, and convents, though they have become thick in America, are essentially foreign articles. This one is situated on the banks of the Hudson, and they have midnight vespers. This is a dramatic license which the nuns never take. They are asleep and snoring long before twelve—good, honest, hearty, healthy souls—and they only know midnight by tradition, except at Christmas time. But the convent on the Hudson made a fine background—and I am inclined to think there is considerable competition among the theatres in the matter of scenic effect; for at the California, where the galleries are as black as plum pudding every night, the moving panorama of the Mississippi River with "Kit" himself, one feels one's self to be gliding up the river as the beautiful pictures go by, gilded certainly with a "light that never was on sea or land," and too suggestive perhaps of transformation scenes, but charming to look upon withal. Besides, the noon-day blaze gives way to shadow as the pictures move on, and settles at last into a gentle gray twilight. Down at the Bush Street Theatre Graham also has been responding to calls before the curtain for a couple of striking Oriental scenes. It is not so easy to produce strong effect in this little theatre, but he has used his brush boldly and to good purpose. It is true there is a Turkish gentleman in the foreground who looks as if he were made of a piece of the bark of the big trees, and there are some very rakish-looking camels further off, but the tout ensemble is good. Then the harem is a very luxurious apartment, having a very Turkish looking carpet, which, in the proper texture, would be a miracle of light and color. The walls are fretted, the ceiling arabesqued to an extraordinary degree, and all this effect is heightened by the music, which is of a very Oriental character. I find it always safe to call anything Oriental which is so much mixed that you can make neither head nor tail of it, whether it be in colors, patterns, sounds, or morals. As the first part of the Sultan of Mocha is nautical, the music is rollicking. The last part is mainly chanting, and there are some very sweet accords. In these Mrs. Oates did not join. According to her usual custom, she informed the audience, the conductor, and every one else, that she could not sing. This revelation was entirely superfluous on her part. We have all known that these three months past. But, if she can not sing, why will she not allow Miss Lulu Stevens to sing, who has both voice and method. We are all willing to watch Mrs. Oates frisk about in her energetic way, to look at her pretty costumes, her faultless chaussures (of which she has made a specialty), her bright face (when for a moment she forgets the stage grin), even to laugh at her impertinences once in a while. But, after all, people go to the bouffe opera to hear music. Miss Stevens, in a pretty Turkish costume of mauve and pink, had but a brief time, and was allowed to open her lips only in chorus. Why should it be so? Since Mrs. Oates can not sing, and Miss Stevens does not, the choruses carry off the honors. They will bring out H. M. S. Pinafore for the holidays. It has been an immensely successful opera in England, where John Howson, once the bulwark of the Oates troupe, so to speak, has made a big hit. I presume that extraordinary comedian, Mr. Taylor, will take Howson's part here. What a queer rambling sort of an actor he is. He always appears to be in the play, but not to be a part of it, and wanders around saying and doing just what he likes, amusing himself always, apparently, and sometimes those in front. He executes a horn-pipe in the Sultan in not bad style, and sings a song most atrociously, but carries it off rather well with his eccentricities. Talking of singing, did you ever see a performance in which the Mississippi River, or any of the dwellers on its banks, was introduced when "Dearest Mae" did not pop in at some stage of the game. If Christy had ever anticipated the shadowy thinness to which the girl would be worn I am quite sure he would have forborne to introduce her. I think she is in her last stages now, for, as they sang it in Kit the other night, it was a very feeble wail. Kit has more gunpowder and old jokes than ever before. It is a remarkable construction, and holds its own well. Mr. Chanfrau has come back with an increased rapidity of speech. There was a time when one could distinguish half he said; he has now reduced it so that you can understand just about one-fourth, and that you are not sure of. I begin to think I see a clever trick in this. It holds attention. Every one is on the alert to catch a word. The house is as silent as if a tragedy were going on. There is a species of fascination in watching to see how many words you can catch out of a dozen. The chances are about like those in a game of solitaire. And yet he plays with wonderful naturalness and looks it exactly. You can not imagine how strange it seemed to see any one else than Harry Edwards as "Judge Suggs"—a part sacred to him through all the successive seasons of Kit. What a hit he made that first time, with that wonderful gait and his incomparable copy of the genuine old Southern political bumper, while little Leach, tagging after, made an appropriate companion picture. John Wilson and Mr. Beck replaced the pair as well as such things ever are replaced. Little Miss Long put on a long dress and played "Mrs. Washington Stubbs," and little Felix Morris put on burnt cork and played "Julius Caesar," and if he had been playing in La Scala he couldn't have roared louder. The conscientious Willie Simms got a round from the gallery, at last. It was only for maintaining a statuesque stillness for an unconscionably long time in his capacity of English gentleman's gentleman; but he got it, and my soul was rejoiced. There never was an actor who took more pains in making himself up, nor tried harder to please, but he never quite hits. As for the English gentleman himself, notwithstanding the Glangarry cap, the field-glass, the traveling gear, etc., he was in no wise like the English tourist. Mr. Wells will be a tragedian some day, but he will never be a character-actor. The author of Kit evidently made it a point to introduce every sort of character which a most elastic opportunity would admit. Strange that he overlooked the Irishman. However, the Irish comedian seems to have had his day; although we hear great news of Harrigan's new Irish play in New York. But then he is a genius, and I will engage his Irishman is not even cut upon the Boucicaulian pattern. Perhaps Florence will attempt an Irish part once more when he comes to the California for the Christmas holidays; but for the present the Irish comedian, as an institution, has passed away for the nonce, Allah be praised. Miss Clara Morris will appear next week in Article 47 as "Cora," a part in which she first kindled the green fires of jealousy in Fanny Daveport's massive breast and made a New York reputation. Heaven knows how long we will be obliged to wait between the acts in this play. We had at least a half an hour between each act of Conscience, although Conscience is to Article 47 as a rippling brook to a strong cataract. I asked Jack how he liked Conscience, and he said he wanted more girls. It is true, there is no girl but Clara Morris, and Mrs. Farren, if you will, but I did not miss them till Jack spoke, and then I realized that, although it was an American play, I had seen very few dry goods. Article 47 will remedy all that sort of thing. I begin to see that Christmas is coming in the theatres, where they have already begun to put out advertisements for the leg brigade. How do those poor creatures live the remainder of the year when there is no Christmas spectacle? In truth, unemployed talent is a problem to me. I meet them on the street once in a while—dancers, singers, actors—with that strange, only half-familiar look, which strikes you in the people whom you are accustomed to seeing in artificial light and amid all the bewildering accessories. The men generally wear an ulster, the women a seal-skin sacque—two marks of prosperity. They look comfortable and merry, as if they were well housed and well fed. The unemployed workman never looks this way, and the victim of stock speculations gets shabby and peaked in three months. How is it? I can not say, but it is well that it is so. However, it is a fortnight too soon to commence to talk about Christmas spectacles; so, good bye. Yours, ever, BETSY B.

The Revels is to be the Christmas attraction at the Grand Opera House under the new management of Messrs. Torrence & Rodgers. The Revels is a spectacular burlesque version of the story of St. George and the Dragon. It affords ample scope for the display of the varied talents of the Rice Combination, and will be put upon the stage in a magnificent manner.

There is to be a revival of Le Petit Duc at the Bush Street Theatre, commencing Monday. The Grand Duchess is all ready for production, but there was such a general demand for the little Duke that it was concluded to set aside the Duchess. Friday next Mrs. Oates takes a benefit, when everybody, including the occupants of the gallery even, will be presented with a photograph of Mrs. Oates as Le Petit Duc. On the 23d instant Her Majesty's Ship Pinafore will be put on the boards as the holiday attraction. It will be mounted and cast in superb style.

What Our Best Society is About.

Last week I promised to tell you about the kettle-drum on Saturday at Mrs. William M. Gwin's. The ladies came in visiting costumes, wearing their hats; the gentlemen, in morning suits. At the kettle-drums in Washington and New York dancing is not the custom, but Mrs. Gwin, deviating from the usual routine, gave us fine music and dancing, and did not limit us to the hours the cards specified, many of us remaining till after eight o'clock. A light supper was served at five o'clock, consisting of tea, coffee, chocolate, and light viands. Among the guests were Mrs. Delos Lake with her daughters Miss Helen and Anna, Mrs. Hall McAllister, with her daughters Miss Marion and Miss Edith, Mr. and Mrs. William McLung, Mrs. John McMullen, with her daughters; Miss Eva Maynard, Miss Lena Maynard, daughters of our Auditor; Miss Mamie Maynard, Mrs. William F. Wallace, Miss Addie Wallace, Mrs. James C. Flood, Miss Jennie Flood, Mrs. Solomon, Miss Mattie Solomon, Mrs. Stuart M. Taylor, Mrs. General McDowell, Miss Lizzie Spotts, Lieutenant and Mrs. Wilson, Miss Loyal, Mr. and Mrs. W. Coleman, Mrs. George Wallace, Miss Swearingen, Miss Lizzie Bruner, Miss Nina Thomson, Miss Bertie Thomson, Mrs. Stewart, Miss Wilkins, Mr. Masten, Miss Maggie Masten, Mr. and Mrs. J. Henly Smith. Among the gentlemen, Mr. John T. Washington, Mr. James, Mr. Sheldon, Mr. Ben Teal, Mr. Taylor, Mr. Edward McAfee, Mr. Chambers, Mr. Twiggs, Mr. Wilford Page, Mr. Stone, Mr. James A. Miller, Jr., Mr. D. Beck, and many others. On Saturday evening, Mr. James Ben Ali Haggin, son of J. B. Haggin, was married to Miss Lizzie Wood, at the residence of her sister, Mrs. William Sillem. The young lady has just returned from a trip to Europe, and is a resident of Lima, Peru. The groom is a member of the firm of Haggin & Lounsbury, of Wall Street, New York. The ceremony was performed by the Right Reverend Bishop Kip, in the presence of only a few intimate friends and relatives. Among those present were Mr. and Mrs. William Sillem, Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Haggin, Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd Tevis, Mr. and Mrs. Carrol McAfee, Mr. Charles Mayne, Mr. and Mrs. William Babcock. They gave a reception at Mrs. Sillem's on Thursday, soon after leaving for their new home in New York. There seems to be quite an epidemic in the families of Haggin and Tevis, for before the reverberations of one marriage bell have ceased, another peals forth. It is considered the thing to patronize the theatres on Monday night among our set; so we found ourselves at the Baldwin on the opening night of Clara Morris' return. Among our people we saw Mr. Flood, wife, and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Breckinridge, the Maynards, Mr. Ned Parker, the Gwins, with Mr. and Mrs. Coleman, ex-Senator Cole, wife and daughter, Judge Clark, Mrs. Ben. Holliday, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Fred. Castle, Mrs. Judge Wheeler and son, H. B. Williams and wife, Mrs. Poett, Mr. and Mrs. Hopkins, Judge Hager and wife. Then there were the usual number of our beaux lining the walls and doorways. One enjoys the theatre so much when about us are familiar faces. Across the bay, in Oakland, on Thursday morning of last week, at the residence of the bride's mother, Mr. John H. Hughes and Miss Ella H. Bugbee were married, at eleven o'clock in the morning, ceremony by J. D. Parks; only relatives and friends present. The bridal party entered the parlors, preceded by Misses Alice and Bessie Bugbee, Misses Ethel and Helen Smith, young nieces of the bride, the bridegroom and Mrs. S. C. Bugbee, the bride with her eldest brother, Mr. Charles L. Bugbee. On their return from their trip they will receive their friends, at Tenth Street, after the twenty-fifth of this month. Mrs. Theodore Shillaber, whose receptions at the Occidental we have all enjoyed so much, is now building a large ball room at her residence on Sixteenth Street. She leaves for the East soon, and on her return intends to entertain in her usual charming manner. Mrs. Hall McAllister has charming Sunday evening teas, made pleasant by chatting and music. MARY JANE.

PRELUDES--IN DIVERS KEYS.

"Wilt thou have music? Hark! Apollo plays."

A more thoroughly delightful concert than the fourth one of the Schmidt Quintet Club—on Friday, 6th instant—has probably never been heard in this city, and—which may as well be noted right here—is rarely heard in any city. For once the programme was entirely harmonious; the vocal and solo numbers were in perfect keeping with the concerted pieces, which were admirably selected, and could not fail to delight the dilettanti, while they interested the professional musicians who form so large a proportion of the audience at these recitals. The keynote to the entire evening was struck in the string quartet of Haydn, with which the concert opened—Mr. Clifford Schmidt leading—of which the Menuetto was given with the most charming grace and humor. Mr. Clifford also placed a new feather in his cap—and a still larger one, I think, in that of his teacher, his elder brother, Louis, Jr.—by his really admirable playing of the Andante and Finale from Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto; the Andante, although beautifully played, suffered somewhat from the rather rapid tempo in which it has become the fashion of late years to play it (entirely uncalled for and mistaken, I think), but the Finale was a delightful performance in many respects. So was also that of the Variations Serieuses, by Miss Schmidt, who certainly showed great courage in attempting this most difficult and profound of Mendelssohn's piano-forte compositions, but who proved herself to be as nearly equal to the task of playing it as it is possible to be at her age. The enthusiasm of youth is rarely tempered with artistic reticence; young blood must be permitted its moments of gush. But I prefer it in mild doses, especially in Mendelssohn's music. The String Quartet of Schubert—the posthumous Allegro molto in C minor—a work of indescribable beauty, and one that made a truly profound impression on the audience, was one of the most perfect quartet performances I ever heard anywhere. Aware, as I was, of the great difficulty of this movement, both for each individual player and in the ensemble, I had prepared myself to be satisfied with a moderately good performance of it, and, indeed, should have considered this quite an achievement. But I was delightfully disappointed. Mrs. Tippet—who did not seem to be in her best voice—sang with the true musical intelligence and sympathetic style that characterizes every thing she does. The first song, by Raff, was not well chosen—for her—since it should be given with a dramatic force for which her voice is entirely inadequate; the songs of Reinecke—with violin—she sings beautifully.

An interesting feature in connection with these lovely songs, which may be said to have become an established favorite with our music public—since for the past four or five years they have been sung at least once every winter—is the fact that they were the first music of Reinecke to find place on a programme in this city, and formed, so to speak, the beginning of our acquaintance with one of the most delightful of modern composers. Since their introduction here—it was by Miss Dineon, at one of the concerts of the Musical Institute, about eight years ago—Reinecke's name has become almost as familiar to our music lovers as it is at Leipzig, where he is conductor of the famous Gewandhaus concerts; his orchestral compositions—notably the exquisite Entr'acte from Manfred—and songs are frequently given, his chamber music diligently studied, a chorus club has been named after him, and his piano-forte music holds a very high place in the estimation of players and teachers. I recognize in this cultivation of the music of a composer like Reinecke a sign that we are developing—to a certain extent at least—in a good direction, since an appreciation of his work implies the recognition of much that is best in art, namely, purity of original thought, great refinement and noblesse of expression, as well as the most consummate skill in the treatment of his subject, be it what it may. The same masterly hand that in the Freudensfeier overture depicts the glory of a great nation with all the breadth and grandeur of a great epic lingers with loving care and lightest touch over the elaboration of a Sonatine or group of charming little pieces for the children; the composer of an opera like Manfred is also he of the Nutcracker, and in none of his greater choruses will there be found more patient or conscientious attention to detail than is apparent in every line of the Trios, for female voices, or the two songs with violin. Reinecke's work—especially his admirable instructive material—is invaluable to us in our musical progress, and one of the most satisfactory evidences that we are attempting in serious earnest to make this progress is to be found in the fact that San Francisco is a pretty good customer of Breitkopf and Härtel of Leipzig, who publish most of his compositions.

The unusually attractive programme put forward for the next Quintet Concert—fairly bristles with good things—will be accepted in many quarters as after all but poor recompense for the accompanying announcement that this is to be the last of these delightful performances. But the end of all good things must come sooner or later; that of a concert season arrives when, on making up the accounts, the balance is found on the wrong side of the page, and, this being the case, I for one am not disposed to find fault with Mr. Schmidt for preferring to devote the time and energies of his quintet to study and preparation for their Eastern tour rather than getting up concerts in this city when they do not pay. We have as yet too small a public for good music, while its presentation is attended with comparatively too great expense. When we have learned to look for good concerts ourselves, instead of compelling the concert-giver to lose three or four weeks in hunting up a sufficient subscription to cover his expenses—besides laying out about one-fourth of the receipts for printing and advertising—and when we are prepared to accept a well carried out programme of chamber music, without insisting on the costly luxury of a singer (vocalists are very rarely included in such programmes abroad), we can possibly find a quartet party that can afford to remain in this city and give us some more music. Until then it is out of the question. Meantime Mr. Schmidt and his talented family go East, where, I have no doubt, their excellent playing will win them no end of success. The programme for next Friday is, as I stated before, very strong, and includes the piano-forte Quintet of Schumann, clarinette Quintet of Mozart, Gavotte of Bazzini for strings, Aria for violin by Bach, a Ciaccone for violin, by Vitali, Romanza for 'cello, by Bargiel, and the brilliant Capriccio in B minor of Mendelssohn (with quintet accompaniment) for piano-forte. Mrs. Narriner-Campbell will sing an Aria from Pré aux clers with obligato violin, and a Slumber Song by Oscar Weil.

If Mr. Gee, of Trinity Church choir, had undertaken to make a special effort to assist me in the illustration of what I consider to be the true direction in which church music should be cultivated, he could hardly have succeeded more effectively than in the service which I heard sung at this church on last Sunday morning. Not that everything was well sung, by any means. This, with a volunteer choir that is still in an almost experimental state, and with an organ loft so badly constructed that the singers are obliged to string themselves out in a long row—some of them almost out of hearing of the organist—would be too much to expect. But the effort to perform the music of the service with a choir instead of a solo quartet—which is, after all, only the make-shift of indolence or incapacity—is of itself of great importance, and Mr. Gee's chorus already begins to show results of careful, intelligent training, singing pretty well in tune and nicely together, etc. That only good music is sung understands itself; I can not imagine Mrs. Mills singing, or an organist of Mr. Gee's training playing, anything else. The portion of the service that I heard included a Benedictus by Barnby, a composition of pure style and much beauty, Spohr's As pants the heart (as an offertory, Mrs. Mills singing the soprano solo with all her accustomed charm of voice), and several hymns. These were given with the greatest simplicity and breadth—as they always should be—the choir forming a support, as it were, for such of the congregation as chose to join in the singing. A noble Toccata of Bach, played as a closing voluntary, formed a fitting conclusion to a service in which everything was orderly and in keeping, and in which the aim of organist and choir alike seemed to be only to make good music, and avoid everything like parade or a display of their own abilities. I think Trinity Church is to be congratulated on the success that has attended Mr. Gee's efforts, and hope that gentleman will persevere in the excellent work that he has undertaken.

It would be interesting to ascertain to whose artistic judgment this church owes the utterly atrocious arrangement of color on its walls. The prevailing tint is a chalky, lightish blue; this is intersected by a sort of string course of white, which is streaked and spotted with a deep, positive blue; below—near the base—are a series of panels of chalky, bluish lilac, that give a cold purple tone to everything that comes within their reach, and altogether the effect is something like a chill accompanied by a touch of toothache. I don't remember when I have seen anything uglier, unless perhaps in two or three of our swell houses that had been turned over to the tender mercy of the fresco painter for decoration. There is much about the interior of Trinity Church that is very good—some pleasant wood-work and nice stained glass—and it seems a pity that the effect of this should be killed, as it is, by the overwhelming ugliness of the walls.

I suppose I shall be told that church walls are outside the jurisdiction of a musical critic, and that it might be as well that I should attend to my own shop, etc. But the walls of a room in which music is performed are a part of my shop, for I maintain that the effect of music is largely influenced by the external surroundings that attend its performance, and am not alone in this opinion. I believe that some of my readers will recollect the story about an extra occasion—it is many years since—on which the directors of the Gewandhaus, at Leipzig, determined to brighten up their little salle, and replace its modest coat of creamy yellow (slightly relieved with gilt) with one that should make a little more pretension—a Fifth Symphony dress, let us say. So the fresco painters were called in, and the room was made splendid. But the music would not sound! It got a fair trial; they tried it with voices, quartet, and orchestra; they tried it by daylight and candle-light (they had no gas there in those days), and without any light; they tried it in every possible way, but they could not make it sound like the old thing. Then they held a solemn consultation, and determined to go back to the old cream color and gilt. The painters came, the old tints were restored, and with them the old charm of the music; it sounded. I was not there at the time, but heard the story in Leipzig, and believe it. A friend, who has seen a great deal of Richard Wagner, has told me how the Maestro has the greatest aversion to hearing music in rooms whose walls are white—that he can not write in such a room, and that he complains that the white color freezes up the tone. I understand this perfectly, and it is precisely the effect produced by the purplish, chalky tint of the walls at Trinity. They chill the music, and are ugly besides.

Mr. Stephen W. Leach gave his concert at Platt's Hall on last Monday evening, and in doing so only succeeded in proving what has been abundantly demonstrated in former attempts of the same kind, viz: that the public of San Francisco does not care for concerts in which the music is the only attraction, and will not go to them excepting under pressure. The only way to get houses in this city is to either coax or bully people into buying tickets; Mr. Leach only offered a very interesting and attractive programme carried out by some of our best artists, and has probably the bulk of the expenses to pay for his pains and misplaced confidence. The music was excellent, especially the old English part-songs; Mr. Leach's Chorus-Waltz—a well written and effective number—was also very enjoyable. S. E.

BOOK-COVER REVIEWS.

Houghton, Osgood & Co., of the Riverside press, are printing all the books, and Billings, Harbourn & Co. are giving them away. We have received from this house this week the Biography of Leonardo da Vinci, the wonderful painter, who flourished in the second half of the sixteenth century—the golden era of the middle ages, during which Shakspeare, Ariosto, and Cervantes wrote their immortal pages; when Raphael, Michael Angelo, Titian, and Giorgione were learning how to prepare their celestial colors (quoted). Leonardo was an illegitimate son of his father; this accounts for his genius; the other eleven children born in wedlock never amounted to anything. His famous work of the Last Supper is now seen in the refectory of a ruined old Dominican monastery at Florence—the first and best painting the world has ever produced. We say the painting is seen; not so—only the wall where it once was. It has been so often repaired, repainted, and retouched, that nothing of the original is visible. An interesting book is this life of Leonardo da Vinci. While we read it, it occurs to us to ask what the age and the art of painting will ever be revived, and how does it happen that while in almost every other department of art, of literature, and science, the present is an advance of the sixteenth century, we have no painters comparable with those who flourished then? We can ask no angel Williams for an answer, and we pause for a reply.

It will be interesting for our children to be informed that The Melodies of Mother Goose were written by a veritable goose—a real, live goose. This is a fact. On the 5th of July, 1692, at Boston, Elizabeth Foster, aged twenty-seven years, married a man by the name of Ver Goose, or Green Goose, an old widower fifty-four years of age, who had ten children. The new Mrs. Goose had six children, making sixteen in all. It was for this flock of goslings that Mrs. G. wrote The Melodies of Mother Goose. Children have better times nowadays than when we were boys. Mother Goose's Melodies were crooned to us by old nurses; now they are printed in splendid type on beautiful paper, illustrated in colors, and in green and gold, but they are to the little ones the same attractive melodies as when nearly two hundred years ago they were sung to the family of Boston by the good Mother Goose.

"Who had so many children she didn't know what to do."

Oliver Wendell Holmes' poem of "The School Boy" comes to us beautifully illustrated, suitable for a holiday present. A Book of Stories for children, by Sarah O. Jewett; and what most interests us, another cook book, entitled Just How, by Mrs. A. D. T. Whitney. Having arrived at that period of life when we live to eat, nothing can be more acceptable than a book that embraces the life-long experience of a good cook, telling us just how every dish should be prepared. Memorandum—We had written thus far when we were admonished that it was time for lunch. We had written this puff of Mrs. Whitney's cook book, having only examined the covers as is the custom among book reviewers. After our return from the Bohemian Club, filled with its incomparable hash, we chanced to look again at Mrs. Whitney's cook book, page 194, and to our utter astonishment read the following receipt for cooking cauliflower. Now cauliflower is our favorite vegetable; it is the most delicate and delicious of all esculents if properly cooked. In California the cauliflower grows to greater perfection than elsewhere in the world, and it is evident that Mrs. Whitney knows nothing about cauliflower, or how to cook it: "An hour before dinner put the cauliflower in a large porcelain kettle with a great deal of boiling water, salted. Let it boil steadily, but not in a furious manner to toss and bruise it, for an hour; prepare for it a cream sauce, etc." This produces a nasty mess of soft vegetable mush, unsightly to look upon and unfit to eat. The true and only way to treat this vegetable is to drop it into a kettle of boiling water like an egg; if small in size like a Boston cauliflower, leave it four minutes; if like a California specimen, as large as your head, leave it seven minutes. Serve hot with butter sauce. Mrs. Whitney may know how to cook Boston brown bread, codfish, mackerel, salt herring, Indian pudding, fry pork with molasses, and make coffee out of beans; she might wrestle with an apple dumpling or a mince pie made out of dried apples and boiled cider, or she might accomplish a pot of baked beans; but cauliflower is to her a hidden mystery. We do not wish to be harsh or over-critical, but we do not justify Houghton, Osgood & Co. in printing such matter, and we notify the new book house of Billings, Harbourn & Co. that they can exchange this cook book for a full set of the Encyclopedia Britannica or any other useful works of reference required in the editorial library.

From Peterson & Co., of Philadelphia, we have the romantic story of Carmen, written by Prosper Mérimée, of the French Academy. It is from this romance that the opera of Carmen, as presented by Miss Minnie Hauck and Miss Kellogg, was dramatized. It is a most interesting tale and most excellently printed. It is issued in paper as a companion to Fanchon, noticed by us last week.

Roman & Co., impressed with our thorough manner of criticising book covers, our exhaustive review of the tables of contents, and the fidelity with which we announce the publisher, the author, and—what is altogether more important—the retailer, have sent us several most interesting—as we conjecture—books, of beautiful print and binding, which we shall notice next week, they being too late for this issue.

A Radical, heated by copious libations, was merrily singing the "Marseillaise."

"What makes you say 'opprobrium'?" asks a friend.

"You ought to say 'opprobrium!'"

"I know it's opprobrium in the book, but I prefer opprobrium."

"But what does opprobrium mean?"

"Damfino, but it expresses my thought more clearly."

"You see," said the host genially at dinner, "there is nothing mean about me. All through the house everything is regardless of expense. My servants drink the same wine that I do."

"You mean," says a guest gently, "that the same wine the servants do."

OUR LIBRARY OF OLD FAVORITES.

The Two Angels.

God called the nearest angels who dwell with Him above :
The tenderest one was Pity, the dearest one was Love.

"Arise," He said, "my angels, a wail of woe and sin
Steals through the gates of heaven, and saddens all within.
"My harps take up the mournful strain that from a lost world swells,
The smoke of torment clouds the light and blights the asphodels.
"Fly downward to that under world, and on its souls of pain
Let Love drop smiles like sunshine, and Pity tears like rain!"

Two faces bowed before the Throne veiled in their golden hair;
Four white wings lessened swiftly down the dark abyss of air.

The way was strange, the flight was long; at last the angels came
Where swung the lost and netter world, red-wrapped in rayless flame.

'There Pity, shuddering, wept; but Love, with faith too strong for fear,
Took heart from God's almightiness, and smiled a smile of cheer.

And lo! that tear of Pity quenched the flame whereon it fell,
And, with the sunshine of that smile, hope entered into hell!

Two unveiled faces full of joy looked upward to the Throne,
Four white wings folded at the feet of Him who sat thereon!

And deeper than the sound of seas, more soft than falling flake,
Amidst the hush of wing and song, the Voice Eternal spoke:

"Welcome, my angels! ye have brought a holier joy to heaven;
Henceforth its sweetest song shall be the song of sin forgiven!"

WHITTIER.

The Lotos-Eaters.

I.

"Courage," he said, and pointed toward the land;
"This mounting wave will roll us shoreward soon."
In the afternoon they came unto a land,
In which it seemed always afternoon.
All round the coast the languid air did swoon,
Breathing like one that hath a weary dream.
Full-faced above the valley stood the moon;
And like a downward smoke, the slender stream
Along the cliff to fall and pause and fall did seem.

II.

A land of streams! some, like a downward smoke,
Slow-dropping veils of thinnest lawn, did go;
And some through wavering lights and shadows broke,
Rolling a slumbrous sheet of foam below.
They saw the gleaming river seaward flow
From the inner land; far off, three mountain-tops.
Three silent pinnacles of aged snow,
Stood sunset-flushed; and, dewed with showery drops,
Up-clomb the shadowy pine above the woven copse.

III.

The charmed sunset lingered low adown
In the red West; through mountain clefts the dale
Was seen far inland, and the yellow down
Bordered with palm, and many a winding vale
And meadow, set with slender galingale;
A land where all things always seemed the same!
And round about the keel with faces pale,
Dark faces pale against that rosy flame,
The mild-eyed melancholy Lotos-eaters came.

IV.

Branches they bore of that enchanted stem,
Laden with flower and fruit, whereof they gave
To each, but whoso did receive of them,
And taste, to him the gushing of the wave
Far, far away did seem to mourn and rave
On alien shores; and if his fellow spake,
His voice was thin, as voices from the grave;
And deep-asleep he seemed, yet all awake,
And music in his ears his beating heart did make.

V.

They sat them down upon the yellow sand,
Between the sun and noon upon the shore;
And sweet it was to dream of Fatherland,
Of child, and wife, and slave; but evermore
Most weary seemed the sea, weary the oar,
Weary the wandering fields of barren foam.
Then some one said: "We will return no more;"
And all at once they sang: "Our island home
Is far beyond the wave; we will no longer roam."

TENNYSON.

Some misguided genius has established at the corner of the Faubourg Saint Denis, Paris, at the most crowded part of that most crowded of thoroughfares, two dials, the one white with black figures, the other black with white figures, and an inscription stating that the dials change color every five minutes. The consequence is, from dawn to dusk a crowd gathers on the opposite pavement, and at times numbers two hundred to three hundred. There they stand until the minute-hand points to a figure, and some go away contented at having seen the change. Many, however, remain; for a passing omnibus or van has probably eclipsed the dials at the momentous time, or possibly the observer's attention has been withdrawn for a second of time. It is only five minutes, and so they remain, recruiting their numbers by new accessions.

A community of Trappists has purchased a lot of land in western Pennsylvania with a view to establish a monastery there. The society will consist of two hundred monks from France, Ireland, and Turkey. The Trappists, the most austere of all the religious orders of the Roman Catholic Church, were founded in the seventeenth century by Armand Jean de Rance. They rise at two o'clock in the morning; devote twelve hours of the day to devotion, and the remainder to hard work, mainly in the field. No secular conversation is permitted. On meeting, they salute one another with "Remember death," and speak no more. They subsist on water and vegetables. Meat, beer, and wine are strictly prohibited. They sleep on a board with a pillow of straw. They never undress, even in illness. There are only 2,500 of them in the whole world, and that is enough.

There is more active fun in an ounce of kitten than in a ton of elephant.

A wicked New Jersey man says Talmage talks too much with his legs.

The perfectly contented man is also perfectly useless.

THE CHINESE AND SOCIALISM.

Translated for the Argonaut from "Revue des Deux Mondes."

[CONCLUDED FROM LAST NUMBER.]

Force alone has opened the vast empire of China, unto whose centre hardly any Europeans have as yet penetrated, but from which issues every year an ever-increasing wave of emigrants. "China," wrote two years ago an author who was thoroughly acquainted with the country, "will send forty millions of men to America without those who remain taking any notice of it. The race is so prolific that the country will obtain no perceptible relief from this exodus." The rigorous exactness of the assertion will strike any one who has had an opportunity of observing those compact masses, the innumerable multitudes in search of their daily subsistence.

In Australia the white race, menaced in its means of subsistence, demands energetic measures, and, under popular pressure, the Legislative Assembly is taking steps to keep out the Asiatic race. The complaints alleged against it are the same in Queenstown and San Francisco, with this difference, that in California the question has assumed a far more keen and threatening character. The socialist party, in fact, has taken possession of it in order to excite the masses, and it has succeeded in provoking manifestations of such a character that during some days the inhabitants believe they were on the eve of very serious events. Though the crisis passed without danger, the causes that produced it still exist. The conflict is only adjourned, and will certainly be renewed if satisfaction is not given to popular passions. Is this satisfaction possible? This is the question we must try to meet in an examination of the accusations brought against the Chinese, and the measures suggested to conjure away the peril.

The first charge alleged against them is as follows: They live on little, they have no family to support, they are content with the poorest wages. Their clothing is the simplest, they wear sandals; consume nothing but rice, salt fish, and tea; everything they want they bring from their own country. A hundred Chinamen will lodge in a space that will hardly suffice for ten white men; and not only do they add nothing to the public wealth, but, as statistics prove, they impoverish the country. The study of local statistics throws a curious light on the question. The Americans are a practical people, able to reduce everything to figures. From certain calculations of their economists it follows that the value of an emigrant of the white race is about $1,500. In other words, the mean excess of his production over his consumption is estimated at this figure. It is his contribution to the overplus of social activity. According to them the Chinese not only do not contribute anything to this overplus, but they infringe considerably on the common capital. Bank accounts show that in the space of twenty-five years (from 1853 to 1878) they have sent to China the enormous sum of 900,000,000 francs. Now, during the same lapse of time the amount that emigrants of the white race have been able to economize out of their wages is estimated at only 300,000,000 francs. From the statistics of the custom house of San Francisco for 1877, it is known that the amount of silver exported to China reaches 90,000,000 francs, and this is not reckoning the sums the Chinese carry on their persons on the voyage. It is a third of the total exportation from California. The power of absorbing silver, whether in ingots or in specie, by China and the East Indies is a fact which has been often verified. Even before the discovery of California and Australia, Asia had almost exhausted the metallic stock of Spanish and Mexican dollars. In 1877 its importation of silver from all sources exceeded 525,000,000 francs. Southampton, San Francisco, Marseilles, and Venice are the principle ports through which this argentiferous movement is effected. The importation of gold to China is almost null, and for 1878 represented about 200,000 francs.

What strikes us in the figures given above is the prodigious economy of the Chinese emigrants, and their producing power. If these two qualities are a crime in the eyes of their adversaries, it is, they say, because the Chinaman does not establish himself definitively in the country; he obeys his fixed idea of returning to his native land, which alone benefits by the results of his labor. This argument wants logic, for it is evident that on the day when the Chinese become permanent residents, the invasion will march with giant steps, and the American population will disappear among those compact masses of Asiatics. Only for this double current, California would long since have become a Chinese colony. It is easy to understand the hatred of the white emigrants: they see in the new-comers successful rivals with whom a peaceful struggle is impossible. The Americans on their side feel themselves inundated by this rushing tide which they dread will not only ruin their country, but render it uninhabitable. After the economists, speaking in the name of material interests, come the moralists, who tell us that the life and habits of the Chinese are so different from theirs that their presence is a permanent danger in every respect. Their filthiness is extreme, and their dwellings are hot-beds of epidemics. They despise women; they have no respect for an oath; they are perjurers, profligates, without honor, without religion, and without faith.

However severe a judgment evidently dictated by passion may be, we cannot declare it entirely false. It is certain that Chinese emigration recruits itself from the very lowest classes of the population, and that among these classes there, as everywhere else, vice and ignorance hold sway. Is missionary teaching powerless among them? Can they not be brought under the influence of religious ideas? To this the missionaries can only reply by avowing their utter want of success, and their entire inability to make proselytes among the Chinese.

After the economists and moralists, men of politics in their turn declare that the Chinese, bending for centuries under the yoke of a crushing despotism, are incapable of becoming free citizens of a free country. "For a long time," they say, "we have been cradled in the idea that in every conflicting race the superior race must necessarily absorb the inferior, and impose on it its ideas, customs, and laws. History offers many examples of this; but theory is one thing, and fact is another. There are exceptions to general laws of humanity, and if we examine the matter the Chinese will prove it. So far are they from considering themselves our inferiors, that they look on us as barbarians, and manifest a profound disdain for our civilization. They form a compact mass, inaccessible to every influence. They differ from us in everything—color, features, dress, language, morals, and religion. Can two races so distinct, separated by insurmountable barriers, live side by side, on the same soil, and under the same government? If union between them is impossible, one of them must yield and the other bend. Which? Number is strength, and strength makes right. They come in waves, driven on by an irresistible current, and to our complaints and protests they answer: 'We have on our side right and treaties.' Moderate men stop at this, but the masses, menaced in their interests, in their existence, have their own logic—brutal and violent, like themselves. Before we view them at work, let us examine briefly the measures by the aid of which they propose to remedy the danger.

However great the contempt professed for the Chinese, they are not the less masters of a vast empire with which the United States have a considerable commerce. There exists in China American residents, American interests, which were not established without trouble or created without difficulty, and which will not easily permit themselves to be sacrificed. It is not probable that China will seek revenge for a violation of treaties by declaring war against the United States. Her junks would certainly not come to bombard San Francisco; but who could prevent her from replying to these unjust proceedings by an order expelling American residents and by a refusal to admit the ships of the United States into her harbors? The massacres of Tien-tsin are not yet forgotten. Blood can still flow, and a frantic populace can include in one common hatred and revenge all foreign residents.

It is proposed to organize a general crusade of capital against Chinese labor, to come to an agreement not to employ any Chinaman, to give always and everywhere, at all costs, the preference to the white workman over the Asiatic, and thus place the latter in the alternative of dying of hunger or of quitting the country. In theory, very well, but how about the practice? What will you do with the refractory? There are ten to-day, there will be a thousand to-morrow. Here is a farmer—American, German, Irish, it does not matter—who employs twenty Chinese; he dismisses them and replaces them by twenty Irishmen who cost him daily three times as much. Will he sell his produce at a dearer rate and in the same proportion? And if he has a neighbor who, more careful of his own than of the general interests, persists in employing cheap labor, what will he do? Rivalry becomes impossible. The one is ruined, the other is enriched. Shall they employ force to insure the strength of this new league? But the law is opposed to it on one side, and on the other the time is past for sailing back against economic currents. Revolutionary measures can do nothing.

Finally, the revision of the treaties with China is suggested. The committee of Congress to which the examination of the question had been referred, after having developed at length in its report all the arguments that militate against Chinese immigration, concluded by recommending to Congress the adoption of the following resolution: "The President of the United States is invited to open negotiations with the governments of China and England, and to take, in concert with them, the measures necessary to arrest Chinese immigration to the United States." But, admitting that the Imperial Government would consent to this revision, it also would insist on regaining its liberty of action, and the first use it would make of it would be to reestablish the ancient barriers. This revision, then, would not be a solution; it would be necessary to modify and reconstruct the laws relative to immigration to the United States. Civilization does not retreat, and the artificial barriers raised against interests and principles are powerless dikes, promptly swept away by a more impetuous torrent.

These considerations strike the eyes of the more clear-sighted, but the popular current hurries them on; powerless to master it, they try to direct it. On the 16th of December Mr. Page, a representative from California in the Congress of the United States, addressed a letter to the President, in which he called his attention to the restlessness manifested through the entire State. He assured him that an insurrectionary movement was in preparation the consequences of which would be terrible, and concluded by begging him to take the measures necessary to dispel the dangers threatening California. This warning, in truth, only came in time. The discussion no longer turned on the more or less legality or efficiency of the plans suggested; the mob were prepared to act, and the socialist leaders placed themselves at the head of the movement; they aimed high and far.

If by socialist we understand every one who busies himself with social questions, every one is a socialist more or less. When we speak of the socialist party of the United States, we understand by the term those who undertake the solution of social problems by revolutionary means, and this is what those who direct the socialist movement in San Francisco claim to do. The Irish and the Germans are at the head of it, and this is easily understood. Labor is scarce; Chinese competition ruins them. From the start the movement has been purely social. The Workingmen's party, as it is termed, has, through the medium of its principal orator, Kearney, repudiated openly all alliance with the Republican or Democratic party. It confounds them in a common hatred, declares them corrupt and rotten, incapable of solving any of the questions raised, and claims to substitute itself in place of them. The theories of the International are dominant among its partisans. Political questions do not exist, they say; there are only social questions—people who possess and others who have nothing. Politics has created different nationalities; it has kept nations divided in order to force them to hate each other that it might the more easily rule them. The logical conclusion resulting from this, apparently, is to pursue with fire and sword the Asiatic race in the name of the great principle of the fraternity of mankind.

Kearney has not feared to affirm that he had 60,000 men of action behind him, ready for everything. "It is enough," he said, "to make the rich tremble and force them to disgorge." A few sentences will give an idea of the violence of his language: "To-morrow, probably, the press of San Francisco will treat you as cut-throats and vagabonds. The California press is in the pay of railroad thieves like Stanford & Co., and land-grabbers like Billy Carr. The municipal authorities are the most infamous scoundrels the world has ever seen. What are our representatives doing at Sacramento? They would sell Jesus Christ for a glass of beer.

No more Chinese; buy powder and ball. As for your representatives, buy a rope and hang them high and quick. All who are in favor of it hold up their hands." (All hands are raised.) We see that the Chinese serve as a pretext for demands the most absurd, but also the most threatening. It is not with them alone that Kearney is concerned, but in the most seditious language he demands a radical revolution. The authorities were abused. A warrant was issued for the arrest of Kearney and the principal leaders. No sooner were they informed of this than they went insolently to the City Hall, gave in their names, and demanded, in accordance with law, to have the amount of their bail fixed. It was fixed at $42,000, which was immediately subscribed. Encouraged by this first success, the boldness of Kearney and his partisans increased tenfold. In San Francisco they reckoned numerous adherents. The press was generally hostile to them; but the influence of the press in California is limited enough. Most of the journals are the property of a party or of a man. They are read rather for their commercial intelligence than for their political opinions. On the other hand, there was great wretchedness, and the exasperation against the Chinese was kept up in San Francisco still more than elsewhere by the numbers of them who were constantly arriving. Most of the local and federal authorities resided there. The leaders resolved to convoke a mass meeting, and, at its head, address a petition to the Mayor and Board of Supervisors, which they knew well how to convert into an imperious summons. The third of January last was fixed for the threatening demonstration, and on every side the necessary precautions were taken. The law could not prevent the meeting. Mr. Bryant, the Mayor, put the police in motion, enrolled special constables, while on their side the householders and capitalists organized themselves as a militia, ready to repel force by force.

At the appointed hour the crowd filled O'Farrell Street. A platform erected in an open lot served as a tribune for the orators. Wellock, the right arm of Kearney, opened the meeting by some significant words. "The law," said he, "gives food to the thief, it refuses labor and bread to the workman who is dying of hunger. We must have labor and bread." Kearney afterward spoke. "If," said he, "there is not a great change soon you will see the most terrible revolution that ever was." The procession fell into marching order, and went to the City Hall, when Kearney declared that a delegation of which he was one should be received by the Mayor. The latter consenting, Kearney explained the demands of the workmen. "If," said he, "you refuse to do what is necessary, I declare that I will do nothing to restrain my followers, and that you expose the city to pillage. The peril is urgent. Speak to those men and give them work. If the law does not allow it tell them to rob a store get them arrested afterward if you can, and you will then be forced by law to give them bread." The Mayor, after much hesitation, consented to address the crowd. He declared that while sympathizing with the misery of the workmen he could not create work for them. "Then," cried a voice, "rid us of the Chinese." "I desire it as much as you," he returned, "and if we had not a single Chinese on our soil I would be the first to rejoice." He concluded by promising to ask the capitalists to hire as large a number of workmen as possible, and request the benevolent societies to come to the aid of the more wretched. His discourse, warmly criticised the next day by the party of resistance, only half satisfied his auditors, who, nevertheless, took note of his promises, and particularly of his declaration relative to the Chinese. Kearney and the principal leaders thought they had gained much already in bringing the Mayor to make common cause with them against Chinese immigration. "You have heard the answer of the Mayor. The common enemy is the Asiatic. His fortress is Chinatown." "Burn it; carry it by assault!" shouted the crowd. "Be it so," said Kearney; "but first let us organize. Listen, in a short time I will have 40,000 men, and then we will see what the police and Federal troops can do."

The next day a San Francisco journal replied that 75,000 resolute citizens would bar the way to Kearney's 40,000 men, and now that anarchy, violence, and conflagration were openly preached in the streets, and that the authorities were incapable or intimidated, they, and 70,000 others had determined to put an end to scenes so odious. The display of the 3d of January resulted in increasing considerably the influence of Kearney. On the next day he proceeded to the military and political organization of his partisans. It is beyond doubt that for a long time he kept up relations with the heads of the socialist party of New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, St. Louis, and New Orleans. In all these cities the socialists have formed military companies, and under the protection of the law, they exercise themselves publicly in the use of arms; they know their leaders, and, though not exactly, the number of men they can dispose of. In the State of Pennsylvania, for instance, the estimates vary between 60,000 and 90,000 volunteers armed and equipped. In New York they are considered to number 50,000. Their party is chiefly recruited among the German and Irish emigrants. The first are the most numerous, and that they are the most influential can be judged from the titles of the principal journals of the socialist party: the Volks-Zeitung, Arbeiter-Zeitung, Tagsblatt, Arbeiter-Stimme, and Sozialistische, which are published at New York, Philadelphia, and Chicago. Germany is largely represented in the supreme council. Louis Huck directs the section of Bohemia. F. Leib, Paul Grotkan, condemned at Berlin, Gustav Lyser, Henry Ende, both escaped from the prisons of Frankfurt, and the latter of whom figured in the events of the Commune of Paris, are among the members. The French section, which is not numerous, has for leader B. F. Millot. One of the influential members in the supreme council wrote in May last: "We are at work not only in the large cities, but also in many others, and we are gaining ground with a rapidity that astonishes even ourselves. During the last ten months, since July, our number has quadrupled, and we have every reason to believe that our progress in this respect will be continued. In Cincinnati the companies drill every week, and from week to week the number of men present under arms increases from five to eight per cent."

At San Francisco Kearney adopted the same plan. In a few days companies of volunteers were organized, under the command of Knight, Wellock, and others. Recruits began to flock in. Was Kearney preparing an immediate movement, or was he waiting until things would be more advanced, and the signal for action given by the supreme council? However it be, an incident precipitated events. The steamer Tokio was expected on the 17th of January; it brought on board a considerable number of Chinese. The most violent of the party resolved to oppose their landing, and Kearney accepted the direction of the movement. On the evening of the 15th the agitation assumed such proportions that the municipal and Federal authorities met secretly to consider the matter. Emissaries were dispatched to Sacramento, the National Guard was ordered to be put under arms, and the commander of the Federal troops prepared them to march. On the evening of the 16th, Kearney, Wellock and Knight were arrested and imprisoned. These measures—skillfully concerted and quickly executed—rendered the attempted riot abortive. A few days after Kearney was set at liberty under bail of 55,000 francs; Knight, Wellock, and the others, under bail of 25,000 francs each. At bottom, public opinion sympathized with Kearney in his crusade against the Chinese; but it stopped at this, being opposed to the violent means he used, and alarmed by the popular passions and socialist ideas which were let loose. Kearney not only demanded the expulsion of the Asiatic race; he insisted on an income tax, on the rate of interest being fixed at seven per cent., on limits to the rights of property, and other extravagances. Many did not care to follow him so far, and reproached him bitterly with compromising the credit of the State, shaking confidence, and injuring the very cause he pretended to serve.

What the heads of the socialist party could not wrest by force, they prepared to obtain by legal methods. Renouncing for the moment an armed conflict, the issue of which was doubtful, Kearney adopted as the rallying cry of his party the revision of the Constitution. The legislative assembly had voted it, fixing the elections for the 19th of June, 1878. Sustained and counseled by some of the members of the Assembly, who, in their eagerness for popularity, had rallied to his party, Kearney commenced a campaign of peaceful agitation. In all the electoral districts committees were formed, the lists of candidates discussed, and the principal orators of the party harangued numerous meetings. This time they wished to arm the State with sovereign rights, in order to solve the Chinese question. He claimed to free it from the international obligations contracted by the Federal Government, and to give it the power of legislation without taking into account the limits imposed by the Federal compact. This was to raise anew the great question of State rights, decided by the war of secession and the defeat of the South. The consequences resulting from such principles could not escape the two great political parties which in California, as in all the States of the Union, contend for the ascendancy. The Democrats and the Republicans—particularly the latter—saw with terror the new party, which confounded them in a common contempt, repelled all their advances, recruited itself from among their adherents, and threatened one day to raise itself on their ruins. In a conference held between the principal representatives of the Democrats and Republicans a fusion of the two parties was agreed upon with the object of defending threatened social interests. The candidates, selected in almost equal numbers from the two parties, presented themselves for the suffrages of the people as "non-partisans."

On both sides preparations were made for a struggle the issue of which did not seem doubtful. Kearney could not, it was said, make headway against such a coalition. Observers of public events were, however, wrong in their calculations this time. San Francisco gave a large majority to Kearney, whilst outside of the city thirteen counties elected Workingmen. The official result, proclaimed on the 12th of July last, shows that the Non-partisans elected 83; Kearney and his followers, 51; the Republicans, 11; and the Democrats, 7. Most of the Non-partisan representatives engaged themselves beforehand to vote with the Workingmen on the Chinese question. The day after the voting the socialist journals announced that Kearney proposed, as soon as the result of the election should be officially proclaimed, to go to New York, where, they said, fifty thousand adherents were waiting to hail the head of the party in California. Thence he would go to Chicago. We know the important rôle that the latter city played in the railway riots—M. Cuheval-Clarigny has described in this review, with rare impartiality, the bloody changes of the drama, the first explosion of socialism in the United States. We know the causes and aim of the riot, its point of departure, its excesses, and its repression. No doubt Chicago would have given to the ci-devant drayman, promoted to the rank of statesman, enthusiastic honors. But Kearney—like the promoters of the socialist movement in New York and in the other great cities of the Union—does not possess the notoriety and influence necessary to rally in one mass those scattered and destructive forces. Like them, he has succeeded in carrying the populace with him, in gaining an unhealthy and blustering popularity; but his violent and impassioned harangues have alarmed interests and frightened the moderate. A chief was wanting to the party. He has just appeared among a class where one would hardly expect to find him. He is a man whose career is well known in the United States, whose name has crossed the Atlantic, who has occupied high military and civil positions, and who aspires openly to the presidency of the Republic. On the last Fourth of July General Butler pronounced a discourse that resounded throughout the Union, in which he declared himself the head of the Workingmen's party, and solicited its votes for the presidential election. Parties are seldom scrupulous in the choice of men and means; therefore, while viewing General Butler with legitimate distrust, the Workingmen's party has received this new recruit with transport, whose ability is well known, and whose ambition aims at the supreme magistracy. In opposition to him the Republican party is putting forward already the candidature of General Grant. His authoritative manner, his aristocratic tendencies, the great services he has rendered, mark him out as head of the party which wishes to maintain, at all hazards, with the Union, the Federal bond, already becoming somewhat strained.

Every one feels that the problem to be solved is complex, and that, if in some States social principles form the difficulty, in all and for all the question of autonomy is again being raised; on its solution the maintenance or rupture of the Union will depend. Between the Northern manufacturer, the Western farmer, and the Southern planter there exist profound divergencies of views and interests. The States of the North have succeeded in establishing a protectionist régime, under the shadow of which their industries are growing, perfecting themselves, and preparing at no very distant day to enter into dangerous competition with those of England. The States of the West, entirely devoted to the cultivation of cereals and stock raising, complain that they have to pay an excessive price for objects of the first necessity which they formerly procured at a cheap rate on account of European exportations. Articles of furniture, clothing, tools, everything has grown dear since an exorbitant tariff has been laid on foreign productions. "We owe taxes to the State," they say, "but not premiums to our fellow-citizens." They consider it unjust to have to pay Eastern manufacturers very dearly for what they can get cheaply from Manchester, Leeds, or Glasgow. Hence a discontent which is making itself felt more and more every day in the discussions of Congress, and a significant understanding between them and the South.

The latter, conquered and disarmed, have preserved their hatred and their hopes. They, too, suffer cruelly from the economic régime imposed by the victorious North. To the bitterness of their interests is joined that of their pride. It was they who founded the great republic. It is the work of their generals, their statesmen, their diplomatists, their admirals, and seamen. They governed it until the democratic element, constantly increased and strengthened by European immigration, finally got the better of its aristocratic traditions, destroying at one blow slavery, which served them as a basis, and the autonomy of the States whose sovereign rights they alone defended. For a time their servants became their masters. In South Carolina, of the one hundred and twenty-five members of the lower chamber ninety were negroes. Baron Hubner, in his remarkable work, A Journey Round the World, describes with rare faithfulness the fury, the despair, the hatred accumulated in the hearts of the whites, not against their former slaves, but against the North—in their opinion, the author of all their evils. That which was true in 1871 is still more so to-day. Then, the late President of the Confederation, Jeff Davis, made a triumphal progress through the country, electrifying his hearers with the words: "Silence and hope!" Their hopes have grown big; the hour approaches; and, with ear strained to hear the threatening rumors that come from the West, from Chicago and San Francisco, the planters of the South, the women especially—more impassioned than their husbands and brothers—dream of revenge and a successful insurrection. In the vehement complaints of the West they find the feeble echo of their own griefs; and if socialist theories are repugnant to their instincts as well as their traditions, they see in their rapid progress a threatening weapon directed against the North, an appeal to that right of secession for which they have struggled and suffered, to which they have sacrificed everything, and which they do not despair of seeing yet triumph.

If that day comes, the great American republic will be separated into three distinct groups, perhaps four, if California, Oregon, and the Pacific territories are strong enough to assert their independence. Will a federation with limited powers be substituted for the actual federal bond which is strained to excess? Will the rupture be complete, or will the partisans of the Union succeed in maintaining the status quo by means of a dictatorship? What is certain is that great events are in preparation, and that, without consciousness or volition in the matter, the Asiatic immigration is called to play an important part in the history of that American continent of whose name and existence China, fifty years ago, was utterly ignorant.

"To-morrow I will utterly confute all that I have proved to-day, by stronger arguments," said Simon of Tournay, at the close of a lecture in which he vaunted that he had proved all the great mysteries of religion; on the morrow he was laid low by apoplexy. George Valla was hurrying from his lodgings to deliver a lecture on the probability of the immortality of the soul, but before he had reached his classroom he had solved the problem, for himself at least, by dropping dead on the way. The impious and profligate Pietro Aretino, who boasted that he had libeled everybody dead or alive, with the exception of the Almighty, whom he had spared because he knew nothing about him, terminated his existence characteristically. He was drinking and enjoying himself with certain other ecclesiastics, and one of them telling a story of Aretino's sisters, little enough to their credit, the wit leaned back in his chair to laugh with full freedom, slipped, and dashed his brains out on the marble floor. Edgar Allen Poe gasped out a life the world could ill spare in the agonies of a drunken debauch. Who has not cursed the fatal brawl which robbed us of Christopher Marlowe? "Death," says Sir Walter Scott, "creeps upon our most frivolous as well as upon our most serious enjoyments," but of all the scenes on which he ever obtruded his unwelcome presence, none surely was more alien than that foul haunt at Deptford. There, amid the refuse and offal of humanity, with their licentious songs ringing in his ears, the dagger of a bully plunged into the brain of him, who at twenty-nine was the rival—the superior—of Shakespeare. They were born in the same year, and the work which Shakespeare had produced at that age was far inferior to that of his ill-fated fellow-dramatist. It is curious to observe how many tragic writers have terminated their existence in a tragic manner—in a manner, we may add, which corresponded only too closely with the character of their lives. Robert Greene, worn out with debauchery, and completely shattered with diseases which were the consequence of his ill-guided indulgences, was carried off, it is said, by a surfeit of red herrings. There is no sadder book in literature than his dying homily, "A Groat's Worth of Wit bought with a Million of Repentance." That Otway died miserable it is clear, though it is not easy to learn the precise manner of his death, but it is lamentably probable that the immortal author of "Venice Preserved" and "The Orphan" perished of actual want. His remains are mouldering away in St. Clement Dances churchyard, with no stone to mark the spot. In the same place, too, sleeps his friend Lee, who also "died like a dog." Poor Lee! his "Rival Queens" is certainly one of the gems of the later drama, and his other plays with all their bombast are full of beauties. He had been, it is said, carousing with a party of his friends, none of whom had the grace to see him home. In the morning he was found dead in the streets, which were covered with snow. A drayman used over his body whether before or after death.

NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
Rates of Subscription, $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance. Postage prepaid. City subscribers served for 25 cents per week. Single copies, 10 cents.
Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."
Branch Office, Cooper's Bookstore, 746 Market Street
Agent at San Jose—F. A. Taylor.
News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders should be addressed.
A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PINLEY, }
FRED. M. SOMERS, } Editors.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1878.

M. D. Boruck, of the Spirit of the Times, did faithful service to the Republican party as the Secretary of its State Central Committee. He worked faithfully, intelligently, and gratuitously. The duties of the position were arduous, and occupied his time for half a year. To him more than to any one man in the State is due the victory that gave Hayes its electoral vote. This vote made him the President. When it came to the distribution of the honors and offices resulting from this hard-won political victory, Mr. H. L. Dodge was appointed Superintendent of the Mint. Mr. Dodge is a respectable merchant, who, so far as we know, had not spent an hour of time nor a dollar of money in the campaign. After his appointment Mr. Boruck asked him to appoint a laborer in the Mint. Mr. Dodge replied: "I am not here to reward politicians." This was a damper to our friend Marcus. Mr. Boruck, who publishes a weekly journal, very naturally sours over this kind of treatment, and scolds, and in our opinion he has a right to scold. He says—and it is true—that the cast-off relative of some Senator, Congressman, or other official—not even excepting the President of the United States—is sent out here to fill a place which by right, by every sentiment of justice, by party honesty and honor, by the recognition which meritorious services are entitled to, should be held by a Republican, native and to the manor born. Now, another and a very important election is coming; upon the vote of California may depend the next Congress, or the next President. All the Federal officers, contractors, administration pets, Treasury favorites, people at Mare Island, all the hangers-on upon Federal places, will expect a campaign to be carried on in California with enthusiasm. The politicians at Washington will send Mr. Gorham out to manage our affairs, and they will suggest for us a programme; and we who write for journals will be expected to "enthuse" the masses; and those of us who have the gift oratorical will be called upon to stump the State—and this, among the mountains and long distances of California, means a summer of arduous labor. And those of us who have money will be called upon to contribute for the expenses of the campaign. And the rank and file will be expected to rally, parade, and bear torches, and finally on election day to vote early and often. And when the contest is ended, and the victory won, the house of Seligman & Co.—who compose with others a syndicate to manage the national finances, place bonds upon the market, and handle the bullion of the nation—will designate a superintendent for our Mint, and this superintendent will tell us, who write, and speak, and pay, and vote, that he is "not here to reward politicians."

There is a patriotic side and a money side to politics. We are not discussing the patriotic side of this question just at present. We know that coin comes from syndicates, from the Alaska fur contract, from railroad subsidists, from the naval construction bureau, from army supplies, from Indian management, from the distribution of official patronage, from the public lands; and we know that the money motive is more powerful than patriotism, and that it, and it alone, is the strong incentive to active party exertion. There is at Washington and all over the country a mob of officials, some few of them content with honors and moderate pay, but in addition to these a great army of greedy money-makers. Abroad in foreign lands are commercial agents, consuls, and ministers plenipotentiary, very ornamental and very useless. We know that the average Congressman and Senator get rich on $5,000 a year after only a few years of official opportunity. We know that in California and Nevada more money is expended for a Senatorial election than the salary of the two terms would pay. We hear it asserted, and we hear it contradicted, that our Secretary of the Treasury entered the Senate a poor man, and that now he is worth his millions. We know that many millions of public money from the National Treasury are annually expended to secure party rule. Hence, we are not surprised when a man like Mr. Boruck has served the party faithfully, and gratuitously, and successfully, that he should be angry at being told by an official, who has come into the vineyard to get his penny after the heat and burden of the day is past, that he is "not in office to reward politicians," and that he should scold and resolve in his own mind that the man who got the loot should make the fight.

We know that this is not the high-toned, patriotic view to take of politics. We know that when we write editorials and make political speeches we ought to ignore all these base considerations and rise above all thought of self, or place, or money. We know we ought to enlist under the party banner, keep step to the party music, fight the party fight, and all for the most patriotic of purposes. We know that party orators and party editors ought to proclaim danger to the Republic unless their side wins, and ought to find arguments to make it perfectly clear that the nation will come to grief in the event of the success of any party other than their own. This is the orthodox way of making a campaign. We know it would not be honorable for an independent journalist like Mr. Boruck to ask any money to print and publish partisan arguments for a partisan triumph. We know that honorable and high-minded men are above being paid for any campaigning, and that the oratorical part of the business is done gratuitously, and yet we also know that money is paid out like water to a band of mercenary politicians, Bohemians, and rabble masses; that promises are made to those who will sell themselves, and the only class of workers who are defrauded of their just claims are the honest, zealous, respectable class, who are in the party from principle and too decent to exact money for party work. When a man of this kind asks place for himself, or in his necessities seeks a party favor, he is met at the threshold of the Mint with the declaration that it is a place to coin money and not to reward politicians.

The politicians of the Eastern States, and the Federal officials of this, tell us that our California congressional election is an important one; that upon its result it is possible the Presidential election and the majority in Congress may hang; that it is of the gravest consequence that this State should go Republican. Now, we are not so overwhelmingly impressed with the consequences of a Republican defeat as some of our office-holding and party-aspiring friends would wish us to be. We are Republican, as everybody knows, and all things else being equal, would prefer the success of that party. But—indeed there are many buts and ifs in the way of our desiring its continuing to remain in power. We know that the long continued exercise of political power is likely to lead to abuse. The Republican party has committed gross abuses; it has intrenched itself with rogues in office, till we are calmly considering in our own mind whether it would not be well to allow it to go into a minority and give the opposition an opportunity to drive the national coach for a term. This State is now under Democratic party government, and this city under the same party control. Candor compels us to say that the affairs of the State are well managed, and that it would not be a calamity if its administration should continue another four years in the same direction. Mayor Bryant is making an excellent mayor; and if the Board of Supervisors, only part of whom are Democrats, and the Superintendent of Streets, who is a Republican, and some other of the subordinate officers, were more honest than we think them to be, our city would be doing very well. So, unless the Republican party make respectable nominations, and in a respectable way, there will be great indifference as to the result in California. If our State Convention is packed, and a pre-arranged programme put upon the party by the Washington and Federal clique, or by the secret manipulations of any local interest, the Republican rank and file will revolt. If we may be permitted to borrow a somewhat vulgar but forcible expression, it will jump stiff-legged like a wild California broncho. Hence, we take the liberty of saying to George Gorham and George Evans, and to the men who would make governors and members of Congress, go slow. We would say to the Federal officials, be modest, and do not undertake to convince anybody that your shrieks for bread and butter are the disinterested howls of patriotism.

It is only necessary to recall some of the prominent events of our history in California to illustrate how easy it is to destroy the supremacy of either party in this State. The Gwin-Broderick quarrel demonstrated to the Democracy, after several defeats, the necessity of party union. The same necessity compels the North and South, Ireland and Chivalry, to coalesce. It is fire and water commingling. When Gorham became a power in the Republican ranks, and when the little band of Douglas mercenaries came into the Republican party, it was divided, rent asunder, and torn to pieces. It has been compelled ever since to scratch gravel for a political existence. Whenever the Gorham faction has come to the top the party has gone to defeat; whenever this element has consented to keep out of sight the Republican party has been triumphant. When Gorham was nominated for Governor he went to grass on the first round, and the party was knocked out of wind for four years. Booth was not elected Governor till he had first achieved a victory over the camp-followers and mercenaries in his own party. Horace Davis was sent to Congress from San Francisco because he was unknown to the Republican party, and the trick of his nomination was not discovered till after his election—a ruse that never succeeded with the same person twice. When that most excellent and otherwise honest man, Guy Phelps, allowed himself to become the tool of this Federal faction as its nominee for Governor, the Chronicle, disposed to be the organ of the Republican party, and desiring to do service for it, gave one swing of its editorial blade, cut the party into two parts, and gave the State to the Democracy; the same sword of Damocles hangs by a hair over the Republican party in California to-day, and no continuance of politicians, and no combination of mercenary interests can be brought about that can insure party success. An honest Republican Convention, with honest leadership, and honest, capable, honorable candidates, can carry this State for the Republican party; any of these elements wanting the State will go Democratic.

It will not be wise to assume that the Republican party has an easy walk-over in the coming contest. Parties are very nearly equally divided, all things working together harmoniously. The disturbing element to the Democracy is likely to be this new Workingmen's organization, the operations of which can not be calculated, for the reason that it is an unknown quantity, the force of which can not be ascertained except after a political contest that measures its strength. There are several possibilities connected with this departure in politics. It is conceded that the Kearney movement is one within the Democratic organization. Take from the Democracy all the foreign and criminal and demagogue element that goes to make up the new party, and its rank and file is very largely absorbed. We see a tendency among Democratic leaders to go off with this mob. When such men as Judge Terry, Volney E. Howard, Larkin of El Dorado, Senator Gwin, and others show this disposition, there occurs to us the Dundreary conundrum, whether the tail may not wag the dog, and whether the conflict may not come to an issue between the Republican party and the Workingmen's. When we remember the fact that in this State the Democracy has become a happy family of strange reconciliations, embracing the political criminals of all sections, nationalities, and creeds, we must not calculate too largely upon the fact that it may not present itself in solid front at the polls. It may absorb Kearneyism into its capacious maw, and in its platform embrace all the ultraisms of this modern tendency to communistic and agrarian results. So far there has not developed in the Constitutional Convention or elsewhere one Democratic party leader who has had the boldness, or the moral courage, or the honesty, to express his convictions in opposition to the new faith. There will be a contest between what seems to us to be but two wings of the same party for control, and the Republican party will be called upon to meet a single enemy fighting with its forces massed in solid column. It is not improbable that the Republican party may be placed on the defensive with reference to all questions of public importance. Subsidies to railroads, encouragement to corporations, creation of monopolies, financial burdens, extravagances of expenditures, profligacy of rings, will be laid to the door of the party that for twenty years has governed the country. The popular mind does not reason logically, and it may be somewhat difficult for the Republican party to relieve itself from the position of defensive explanation.

There is another question which, in this State, will absorb and override all others. It is the question of Chinese immigration. The party that bids highest for the anti-Chinese vote will get it. The platform of both parties will be unequivocal opposition to Chinese immigration. It is possible the Democracy may commit itself to the ultraism of Kearney, that "the Chinese must go." The platform that pronounces the extremest doctrine upon this point will be the one that will most commend itself to a very large voting population. If the resolutions of the two parties balance each other, then the question will come up for discussion. Which party gives the best promise of aid in the anti-Chinese direction? Governor Irwin will answer for himself and his administration: "We could do nothing, as we are hampered by the Federal laws." The Democratic orator, in apology for the inaction of a Democratic House of Representatives will say: "This Chinese question is one belonging to the treaty-making power and the Executive. The Senate has been and still is Republican; the President is Republican, and the Democracy have been powerless in this direction." There is force in these arguments, because they are true.

Madame Modjeska is having a special palace car built for her and her troupe, and it is asserted that this coach is having painted on each side, in glaring capitals as long as a link of sausage, the words: "Modjeska, Countess Bozenta." Republican simplicity is working its sweet will upon even this daughter of the Old World aristocracy. At home she would have been too stuck up to ride in an advertising van.

AFTERMATH.

In the Senate of the United States, Blaine of Maine has sounded the war note of the next Presidential campaign. He does not flaunt the old banner of the bloody shirt with its offensive stains of negro blood, nor echo the dying shrieks of martyrs, who have died that the Republican party might live, but ingenuously gives utterance to the wail of the defrauded and oppressed North. The solid South sends a solid Democratic representation to Congress, and thus the Southern white men obtain an undue proportion of representation and political power over the white men of the North. Senator Blaine presents some startling figures in support of this anomalous condition. It was clearly the intention of the Republican Senators to sound their slogan before the holidays, so that it might have time to reverberate through the Northern hills and across the Western prairies, unanswered by a Democratic echo. But Senator Thurman of Ohio, evidently prepared for this political and strategic sortie, answered the Senator by charging upon him and the other men of his party, that the present political condition at the South is the legitimate and natural outgrowth of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution; that it was the Republican party that drew the color line, and that the supremacy of the white race over the black race is a natural consequence; that property and intelligence will necessarily control the propertyless and ignorant, and of a right ought so to do.

Senator Lamar followed Mr. Thurman with some very pertinent comparisons, showing how disproportionate was the representation of Maine and New York in the National councils, and how vastly disproportionate is the representation of New England in the Senate compared with the growing and populous Middle and Western States.

From the brief epitome we have of this debate it does not occur to us that Messrs. Blaine and Edmonds (who also participated) gained any advantage over Messrs. Thurman and Lamar. Having always opposed negro enfranchisement, and having always protested against giving to black ignorance the elective privilege, we are not surprised at the political condition of the South. When the Republican party endeavored to make the negroes of the South the instruments to punish white disloyalty, it was a blunder. It was an attempt to build up the party by securing the black vote as a permanent antagonism to the white vote, and no party ought to succeed in its endeavor to antagonize local interests for such a purpose. So long as a solid Republican North and a nearly solid Republican South could be secured for the Republican party the danger was not apparent to Senator Blaine. Had the Southern States no black voters, and no Congressional representation by reason thereof, this unfortunate condition of things had not existed.

A New York actuary has compiled statistics of bank robbery in that city during the last dozen years, and finds that the burglars have got away with fifteen millions of dollars. This is a pretty fair showing for "the honest poor" who, Mr. Wendell Phillips says, do not "rob depositors." So far as our observation goes it is the poor who do most of the robbing and stealing in this world. It is a poor man who explores your pocket in a crowd; a poor man who garrotes you in a lonely street at midnight; who chloroforms you in your bed, fills your body with buckshot when you won't hand down Wells-Fargo's treasure box from the top of the stage, takes your overcoat from the rack in the hall, and makes off with a brace of your yellow-legged pullets in the sweet silver light of the moon. Ninety-nine one-hundredths of the forthright, naked, and unashamed crime of the world are committed by the poor. The rich plunder otherwise.

Canada and Nova Scotia, and all the British possessions of the Dominion, and all the officials, and all the people, are in a state of most enthusiastic gush over the arrival of a Gaelic Marquis and a royal Princess to rule over them. It is almost as good as to have a king and a royal court. It is the next best thing to the genuine article, this double-gilded, pinchbeck imitation of a real crown, this vice-regal substitute for royalty itself. We wish Canada joy of her new acquisition, and may the change of climate bring an heir to the ducal house of Argyll and add one more pensioner to the throne of the British and Indian Empire.

The President of the United States has appointed Henry S. Foote, of Mississippi, of California, of Washington, of Tennessee, and now carpet-bagger of Louisiana, to be Superintendent of the Mint at New Orleans. We do not cry out at the appointment of Wade Hampton, or Mosby, or Longstreet, or any other gallant Southerner who was loyal to the rebel cause and took up arms in defense of what we thought the wrong. But we shriek at the appointment of this venerable carpet-bagger, whose whole political life has been an effort to so straddle the fence that he might hold office. Henry S. Foote betrayed the State of Tennessee. When it had determined to stand by the Union, and had, by a decisive majority, repudiated the ordinance of secession, he arrayed himself against Parson Brownlow, Horace Maynard, and John Bell, and, by the arts of the demagogue, made Tennessee the frontier and battle-ground of the slaveholders' rebellion. We are sorry to see such men rewarded by the Republican party, and think the President and his advisers indicate only great moral cowardice in thus attempting to conciliate the South. In our judgment there are and were but two honest classes developed by the civil war—those who were openly and unqualifiedly for the rebellion, and those who were unreservedly opposed to it. Henry S. Foote belonged to neither, and should have office from neither.

Mr. Sam. Davis writes us from Virginia City: "I notice in your last issue a poem entitled 'Judge Not,' which you say is 'attributed to Harry Larkyns.' A few days after Larkyns' death a lady called at the Stock Report office, and, placing the manuscript poem in my hands, asked me to publish it. I did so, and also, at her request, returned the manuscript. She said that Larkyns wrote it shortly before his death and left it with her for perusal. The poem was in Larkyns' handwriting." Mr. Davis provokingly withholds the name of the lady.

Dr. C. C. O'Donnell brings suit against the Chronicle for calling him hard names, and the Doctor, taking advantage of his position in the Convention, denounces the Chronicle therefor. The Chronicle reiterates the charges, and dares the Doctor to the contest of characters. The Doctor responds in another action with the venue laid at Sacramento. We have abstained from giving our opinion in reference to the law of libel, but we make the suggestion whether it would not be well to give an equity court jurisdiction in all libel and slander cases. Let the case be tried upon the issues found by a master in chancery, and let him, in a sort of judicial scales, weigh the characters of both parties and strike a balance. If a careful analysis of Doctor O'Donnell's life should disclose the fact that he had no character to lose, why then, of course, no damages would lie. We hear a great deal about the license of the press; and assuredly it is a cowardly and indecent thing for a journalist to assail character for any other reason than to promote the public good. Errors may occur; false information may be given in any well-regulated newspaper. Such incidents, properly explained, should absolve the proprietor from damages.

It is a manifest wrong to subject a journalist to a multiplicity of suits for the same offense. It is a manifest wrong also to allow a many-thousand-tongued newspaper to defame an individual, assault private reputations, and scatter defamations broadcast over the land. We are not quite certain that the best way to settle such controversies is not, after all, by the wager of battle. The code of the duello has its unpleasant features, is a relic, doubtless, of a barbarous but chivalric age; but if we are correct, the conduct of journals was more reputable in those countries where, and in those times when, the editor was held responsible for his printed utterances. If a newspaper given to the exposition of official and political abuses, and to the exposure of those crimes that affect the public good, can be intimidated and broken down by legal proceedings, it will prove a calamity to the community. Women of pure lives and modest demeanor are seldom subjected to scandalous detraction. Officials and public men who are honest, and private citizens who keep within the circumference of their own affairs, are seldom assaulted by the press, and where they are the assault falls harmless.

"What is my crime? That I sold to the competitors the Examination Questions which came into my possession without any contract to conceal them. Can you call it fraud? No, for in return for the money received I gave a position in which the purchaser could make a far larger amount. You can not call it obtaining money under false pretenses, for I rendered a full equivalent; in fact, a livelihood. For what can you punish me? I have violated no oath. I have broken no statute." No. The statute books do not call it theft to steal from the parents the competent instruction for which they pay. It is not, legally, infanticide to starve the children who hunger for education. It is not known as murder to kill the expected good-citizenship of society. It is not technically treason to receive a bribe for admitting the hideous shape of Ignorance within the fortification of the State. You might justly complain of unheard-of hardship were we to bid you to go down to infamy as the inventor of a new crime.

Your front needs redden with no blush of shame;
You have but done—a Deed without a Name.

The wisdom of the Constitutional Convention, in providing for the appointment of a Board of Sausage Commissioners, is now evident. Recent disclosures have called the attention of the public to the fact that there is money in the sausage business, and it should therefore be under legislative control. Not many years ago a few scattered links of sausage represented this branch of industry in California; today we find that two great corporations, rich and powerful monopolies—the Segregated Bunker and the Consolidated Bologna—have gathered to themselves the whole production and entire control of the staple food of a million people.

Fattening for years upon the public, they have insidiously been forging the links of a mighty chain with which to bind hard and fast the people of California. Already the Segregated Bunker has stretched its ties from Mount Diablo to Davidson, and linked Nevada to the sea, while the great interior valleys of California groan under the oppression of the Consolidated Bologna. It is even whispered that these rapacious corporations are about to be joined into one monster combination, one great greedy-gut monopoly, a design fraught with untold danger to the State, a fell plot which legislation should promptly defeat.

It was argued before the Convention, by the paid hirelings of these corporations, that, as the Seg. Bunker and Con. Bologna companies had in the beginning risked their all in the enterprise, that as their success had reduced the rates of sausage here in California, and had attracted to the State the lovers of sausage from every part of the civilized world, they should be allowed to mind their own business and to vend their products at the prices fixed by their own selfish interests. These sophistries were met by the advocates of the people with the final and convincing reply that the State had an undoubted right to control a large and profitable business which concerned the very digestion of its people, and to check the unbounded greed of monopolies whose emissaries had, by secretly purloining untold numbers of harmless, necessary animals, made many a hearth-stone desolate; and that these corporations, uncontrolled, would soon, by their consumption and probable extermination of cats, drain the country of ninety-five per cent. of its vitality.

A cable dispatch from London informs us that the bill of indictment against Lady Gooch, "for conspiracy to palm off a spurious child on her husband as his son and heir," has been thrown out.

That e'er the law molested her
Seems surely very curious,
For nurses, wet and dry, aver
That children all are spew-rious.

Economical lot, our Eastern brethren: they wear reversible ulsters with a business surface and an opera surface. Trousers similarly constructed have not yet made their appearance—which would be a fine one.

The number of Americans who go to Europe is thirty thousand annually. They stay two years and spend one hundred million dollars in each year—a little more than thirty-three hundred per American. It is in nearly every case the most profitable use to which the money could be put. European travel is a school where the tuition fees are comparatively light, and the instruction is thoroughly sound. It improves everybody. It makes the refined woman completely refined, and the vulgar lady completely vulgar; the gentleman a more perfect gentleman, the jackass a more perfect jackass. It is a better business proposition than a wild-cat mine, a safer preparation for the next world than a full deck of rent receipts for a pew in Grace Church. We are not alarmed at the expenditure of a hundred million dollars annually "out of the country" if it takes the national conceit out of, say, one hundred American men and women, and intensifies that of twenty-nine thousand American ladies and gents. It all tends to broaden and blacken the line of social distinction of which we mean to be always on the right side, if money will keep us there.

The President was so unfortunate, so indifferent, or so cowardly in his message, as to ignore the Chinese question, and treated it as of secondary importance to that of cruelty to animals. These two questions are now prominently before the California public. One Pizzola, a sausage-maker, is arrayed before a judicial tribunal for cutting off the tails of cats, preparatory to making them into sausages; the California population, differing with his Excellency, the President of the United States, think this conflict of races, this invasion of heathenism, this incursion of barbaric hordes, of more importance to the future welfare of the nation and the future safety of the Republic than the cutting off of cats' tails; and if the next Presidential contest should turn upon this issue, we are quite sure the electoral vote of California would be cast for the friend of Christian civilization, and not for cat-tail Republicanism.

It is about time the following current slander on our city ceased its run in the Eastern press: "Boots are made in San Francisco with a pocket in the leg, for a pistol." The story refutes itself; if a man have a boot on what use has he for a pistol? With the boot he can kick; a pistol commonly does no more.

The Esquimaux tramp goes to business clad in a seal-skin suit, and demands a quart of train oil to keep him from work. But he has the decency not to say that he was once the commodore of a gold mine, with an income of ten thousand dollars a year, secured by a mortgage on his liabilities, and that he is expecting the death of a rich father up at Melville Bay.

The most intolerable of traveled folks are those who have come back from everywhere without having

COMPENSATION IN CHARACTER.

"Nature hates monopolies."—EMERSON.

Every noble human attribute is dogged by its Shylock exacting with fiendish reiteration his bond:

"An equal pound
Of your fair flesh to be cut off and taken
In what part of your body pleaseth me."

As of objective burdens so of subjective—did we know the bitterness of our neighbor's heart we would not change with him. Each soul is aware of a rottenness in Denmark, and strives to hide it from both friend and foe, and in silence, and "the solitude of life more pathetic than death," fights with his hideous fate. Right through the symphony of life runs this minor strain, telling the tale of nature's barter and the pity of it. You pay the price of pain for your pleasures, the price of hate for your love, the price of peace for your intellect. Some natures seem exempt from this usury, but look deeper and you will find the parchment of a bond, attested by an ancient seal, hidden away amidst the beautiful insignia of a godlike nature.

A trite compensation, and one superficial in its nature, is the balance between mind and body, or intellect and beauty. This is often a matter of direction of energy, rather than any inherent difference. A keen realization of necessity often drives a plain woman to study. Every animal has its means of defense or least vulnerable point, and in the absence of one expedient we find another. "A woman without beauty is a curse," I once heard a man say. Realizing that this "singular defect requires a singular substitute," she is driven to the castle of her intellect, and in a less progressive age was looked upon as an uncomfortable anomaly. Even conservative Paley must look upon a plain woman's skilled use of her tongue or pen as analogous to the "compensating contrivance" exhibited in the much-needed quills of the porcupine. On the other hand, a woman endowed with beauty naturally, if not stimulated by some external inducements, fights with the weapon put into her hand, nor endeavors to forge one possibly stronger and of truer steel. Again, often a difference of time and attention given to the matters of the toilet makes the world's difference between beauty and plainness, and a student has not time for both, or, having it, very wrongly scorns it. The question does not touch men, as they are happily exempt from the exacted toll of beauty.

A keen appreciative sympathy, capable of the highest æsthetic pleasure, is haunted by a perception and sensitiveness that sees and feels all human ills. The optimist turns the back of his perception on all that is monstrous, and calls his sight the only healthy one; the pessimist faces the monster, and calls his eyes the only true ones; but "the lot of humanity is on these children," and each, in his soul, acknowledges the great law of equity that broods us all. Contentment is often but a negative virtue, dependent on a lack of keen human sympathy, self-analysis, and a dearth of that progressive longing that impels our thoughts and hopes ever onward and upward, like silver spirals that wind up through the depths of blue ether and that pass the stars midway. There is a higher human contentment, and of truer tone, that comes from a harp that learns to-day a harder symphony than yesterday's reverie, and that gives out its purest notes at every touch, and responds to no hand but that of the master—Truth; but it is a peace that almost "passeth human understanding." With an even, narrow, contented nature comes an unconscious cruelty, that sees no needs and recognizes no feelings not bounded by its own small horizon. And nothing is so unconsciously devilish as the touch of one of these coarse-natured, phlegmatic hands across a "Soul by Nature pitched too high."

It is the intellectual and moral purgatory. With a high-strung, poetic nature comes the fiend Unrest—a word that covers the ground of a never-satisfied intellectual thirst, a wearying sense of the world's friction, and the subtle imp, self-analysis—that tears at our unprotected vitals forever, and to bear which and smile requires a stoicism that puts the Spartan boy to shame.

The spiritual demands of a narrow nature—"feeding, toiling, sleeping, an insensate, weary round"—are easily satisfied; nor does it often wake to a sense of its own great blindness and loss. But in a broad nature, the usury demanded of its greatness is an ideal seldom realized. In love, the greater capability of the sovereign gift, the higher looks the heart for its idol, above and beyond the "ear-kissing arguments" of flattery, that would drag it down and chain it to a damning mediocrity. And such a soul is called cold and cautious! Cautious? Yes! As we step aside from the mire of the highways and choose our steps lest we fall from our nature's high estate, and fly to fragrant, sunny lanes, where, without fear of falling, we can walk with uplifted eyes and read the truths of eternity.

Elizabeth Browning offers this highest compensation to such a heart:

"God keeps a niche
In Heaven to hold our idols—
Albeit he denied
That our close kisses should impair their white."

Physical courage is often a lack of sensibility—it has nerve but not nerves.

As Wellington stood with his aides watching a charge of his cavalry, his omnipresent eyes noted a man who reined in his horse and fell behind his unheeding comrades, and turning, fled; stopped, hesitated, turned again, and putting spurs to his horse in an instant had rejoined the ranks. Wellington said, turning to those present: "That is the bravest man on the field to-day." He had gained a greater victory than over the French that day—he had conquered his own greatest weakness. A moral courage that is dominant over a physical cowardice is the highest stamp of courage. Self-control argues the living presence of turbulence, held in abeyance and collecting its interest hourly. Experience lessens the rate of interest, often not until the heart is faint and sore from the struggle.

Some virtues are at first sight positive, mathematically exact in their limitations, admitting of no infringement; yet an innately truthful mind is often marked by an absence of imagination—that will-of-the-wisp that acknowledges no laws of consistency, and jilts the memory at every turn. Virtue, as it is accepted meaning, oftener bespeaks an absence than a presence, and in many souls is purely negative, backed by a duenna-sense of noblesse oblige.

"Yet Chloe sure was form'd without a spot, Nature in her then er'd not, but forgot."

And yet there is ever another type that leads to a higher development, that has a worse-self and holds it by the throat.

Life, with its many lessons of disappointment, sorrow, and endurance, plows up these barren spots in our natures, and sows them with seeds that will surely give us ripe fruit and fragrant flowers; if not in the present sentient dispensation, in a development of it beyond. A true charity should be the offspring of a wisdom that has learned the existence of this universal spiritual scrofula, and should teach us to take every human being ("pied with black and white" like we ourselves) by the hand, to look with a clear, level glance into his eyes and say: "I recognize your power over mine in this, and mine over yours in that; let us bear with each other for the sweet sake of our common humanity." X.

SAN FRANCISCO, December 7, 1878.

One of the "Perils."

The Chronicle of Sunday last contains the two following editorials, which are reproduced without comment. They are entitled

DEWEY VS. FLOOD.

The point in this connection most apt to attract general attention is that Flood should so complacently admit that while Treasurer and Trustee of the company he had willfully made a false statement as to the financial condition of the corporation—a matter about which every stockholder had as good a right as Mr. Flood to be accurately informed. The falsehood could not even have the poor excuse of a desire to "sustain the stock in the market," for it had directly the opposite tendency. Indeed, it was designed to aid him in "freezing out" small stockholders preparatory to a deal. It is only a sample of the disgraceful expedients to which professional stock manipulators resort in order to carry out their dishonest schemes.

The whole history of this bonanza deal is a history of duplicity, fraud, and cunning venality, without precedent or excuse of any kind. There were mines of great richness, containing enough gold and silver to make each of the principal owners fabulously rich, richer than any man ought to be. They had but to let the miners take out the money. They could afford to pay well for all the work or supplies furnished them. They were in a position to be entirely independent of the stock market, and they could have redeemed the management of the mines from previous bad repute. In this way they might have been of inestimable service to the country, injuring no one and benefiting all. Their reward would have been an abundant fortune obtained by honest mining, and the lasting and universal respect of their fellow-men.

High-minded, public-spirited citizens would have eagerly improved such a golden opportunity. Flood and his associates did no such thing. From the very first they worked the stock market quite as diligently as the mines, seeking to get two dollars from the savings banks for every dollar in dividends paid to an outsider. They have won the unenviable distinction of having preferred to be millionaires by tricky stock jobbing, when they might have been millionaires by honest mining. So they must expect the natural reward—the hatred and contempt of mankind.

The Madrid newspapers do not like Grant, unfortunately, as sufficiently appears from the following extracts—the first from the Constitucional Español, and the second from the Mundo Politivo:

"We have oftentimes asked ourselves the question: Why is this foreigner (Grant) lionized wherever he appears in Europe? That he may have distinguished himself in his own country, and achieved great deeds, we are willing to admit; but what claims to recognition he can have on this side of the Atlantic we fail to perceive, if we are to judge him according to his behavior here. He was preeminently honored by our august monarch and his ministers beyond any precedent in history; and yet he has been very negligent, not to say guilty of a gross breach of good breeding and etiquette, in having failed to pay his respects and congratulations to the King immediately after his lucky escape from the hands of an assassin, because, forsooth, the railroad tickets had been bought for Lisbon, and the loss of the sum could not, in his mercenary mind, be for the moment entertained. Had he been descended from royal blood he would not have hesitated. Our statesman, ex-Minister Silvela, in accompanying him to the station, and charging himself with messages of congratulations for the King, evinced a sad lack of taste; he should have left him to depart unattended.

"It seems that General Grant was guilty of excess in the banquet given him by Premier Canovas del Castillo at his residence; so much so, that he presented a much to be lamented spectacle a few hours later, in the interior of the Minister's box at the Royal Theatre. Such an exhibition was the only thing wanting to stamp him as unworthy of all the civilities showered upon him."

"Yes," observed a friend, "she certainly is very highly cultivated. She is very stylish, plays well, talks well, dances well, and rides well, and succeeds admirably in private theatricals. In fact," he added, "she's just the kind of a girl you'd like one of your friends to marry."

THE LATEST MAGAZINE VERSES.

Tantalus.—Texas.

[The Llano Estacado, or Staked Plain (so-called from the means taken by the Mexicans to mark a track for travelers), is a large table-land in the west of the State of Texas, U. S., and is without a stream in its extent.]

"If I may trust your love," she cried,
"And you would have me for a bride,
Ride over yonder plain and bring
Your flask, full from the Mustang spring.
Fly, fast as western eagle's wing,
O'er the Llano Estacado."

He heard, and bowed without a word,
His gallant steed he lightly spurred;
He turned his face, and rode away
Toward the grave of dying day,
And vanished with its parting ray
On the Llano Estacado.

Night came, and found him riding on;
Day came, and still he rode alone.
He spared not spur, he drew not rein,
Across that broad, unchanging plain,
Till he the Mustang spring might gain,
On the Llano Estacado.

A little rest, a little draught,
Hot from his hand, and quickly quaffed,
His flask was filled, and then he turned,
Once more his steed the maques spurred,
Once more the sky above him burned
On the Llano Estacado.

How hot the quivering landscape glowed!
His brain seemed boiling as he rode.
Was it a dream, a drunken one,
Or was he really riding on?
Was that a skull that gleamed and shone
On the Llano Estacado?

"Brave steed of mine, brave steed!" he cried,
"So often true, so often tried,
Bear up a little longer yet!"
His mouth was black with blood and sweat—
Heaven, how he longed his lips to wet!
On the Llano Estacado.

And still, within his breast he held
The precious flask so lately filled.
Oh, for a drink! But well he knew
If empty it should meet her view
Her scorn—but still his longing grew
On the Llano Estacado.

His horse went down, he wandered on.
Giddy, blind, beaten, and alone,
While upon cushioned couch you lie,
Oh, think how hard it is to die
Beneath the cruel, unclouded sky
On the Llano Estacado.

At last he staggered, stumbled, fell.
His day was done he knew full well,
And raising to his lips the flask,
The end, the object of his task,
Draught to her—more she could not ask,
Ah, the Llano Estacado!

That night in the Presidio,
Beneath the torchlights' wavy glow,
She danced—and never thought of him,
The victim of a woman's whim,
Lying with face upturned and grim
On the Llano Estacado. —Temple Bar.

Twenty-One.

Grown to man's stature! O my little child!
My bird that sought the skies so long ago!
My fair, sweet blossom, pure and undefiled,
How have the years flown since we laid thee low!

What have they been to thee? If thou wert bere
Standing beside thy brothers, tall and fair,
With bearded lip, and dark eyes shining clear,
And glints of summer sunshine in thy hair,

I should look up into thy face and say,
Wavering perhaps between a tear and smile,
"O my sweet son, thou art a man to-day!"—
And thou would'st stoop to kiss my lips the while.

But—up in heaven—how is it with thee, dear?
Art thou a man—to man's full stature grown?
Dost thou count time as we do, year by year?
And what of all earth's changes hast thou known?

Thou hadst not learned to love me. Didst thou take Any small germ of love to heaven with thee,
That thou hast watched and nurtured for my sake,
Waiting till I its perfect flower may see?

What is it to have lived in heaven always?
To have no memory of pain or sin?
Ne'er to have known in all the calm, bright days,
The jar and fret of earth's discordant din?

Thy brothers—they are mortal—they must tread
On times in rough, hard ways, with bleeding feet;
Must fight with dragons, must bewail their dead,
And fierce Apollon face to face must meet.

I, who would give my very life for theirs,
I can not save them from earth's pain, or loss;
I can not shield them from its griefs or cares;
Each human heart must bear alone its cross!

Was God, then, kinder unto thee than them,
O thou whose little life was but a span?
Ah, think it not! In all His diadem
No star shines brighter than the kingly man,

Who nobly earns whatever crown he wears,
Who grandly conquers, or as grandly dies;
And the white banner of his manhood bears
Through all the years uplifted to the skies!

What lofty peans shall the victor greet!
What crown resplendent for his brow be fit!
O child, if earthly life be bitter-sweet,
Hast thou not something missed in missing it?

JULIA C. R. DORR, in Sunday Afternoon.

Bill of Fare for Six Persons.—Sunday, December 15, 1878.

Tomato Soup.
Boiled Salmon, Anchovy Sauce, Mashed Potato.
Broiled Snipe on Toast.
Asparagus, Lima Beans.
Roast Beef, Yorkshire Pudding.
Lettuce, French Dressing.
Mince Pie.
Fruit-bowl of Plums, Figs, Apples, Pears, and Grapes.

To MAKE ANCHOVY SAUCE.—Prepare a rich butter sauce, and rub one teaspoonful of anchovy paste thoroughly through it; then add a tablespoonful of mushroom catsup. Do not salt the sauce, as the paste will make the whole salt enough.

BLOOD-AND-IRON.

As Dr. Johnson had his Boswell, so Bismarck has his Dr. Moritz Busch, an attaché of the Prussian Foreign Office who accompanied the Prince of "Blood and Iron" during the campaigns of the Franco-German war, and has now published the great man's conversations, from which we extract the following interesting "bits." Speaking of Napoleon at Sedan, the Prince said:

When delivering Napoleon's letter, General Reille behaved most courteously and like a gentleman. In a conversation I had with him while the King wrote his reply, the General hoped that no harsh conditions would be imposed upon so large and valorous an army. I shrugged my shoulders, upon which the General said that, rather than accept severe terms, they would blow themselves up with the fortress. I replied "Faites sauter, that is your affair." I asked him whether the Emperor Napoleon could still rely upon the army and officers, and whether his commands were still obeyed at Metz. The General answered in the affirmative, and, as we subsequently learnt, spoke the truth. I really believe, if the Emperor had concluded peace there and then, he would be a respected reigning sovereign to this day. But he is a —. I said so sixteen years ago, when nobody would believe me. Stupid and sentimental.

The Duc de Gramont, whose indiscretion precipitated events, finds little favor in his eyes:

If I had been in his place I should have entered a regiment and taken my chances on the battle-field, after muddling affairs in the Cabinet. I myself was quite prepared to do this in 1866. If things had gone wrong how could I have shown myself again in Berlin?

Nor did M. Jules Favre succeed in gaining the Chancellor's respect during the negotiations preceding the conclusion of peace:

M. Favre says in his report to the French Government that he could not help shedding tears in one of his conversations with me. I must confess he looked as if he were about to weep, and I consoled him; but of this I am certain, that he did not shed a single tear. He tried hard, but he could not. He no doubt thought to impress me with his fine acting, as Paris lawyers are in the habit of imposing upon their audience. I am perfectly convinced that, to add to the pathos of the situation, he was painted white on his several visits to Ferrières; particularly the second time, when he had laid on an extra coating of pallid color, the better to impersonate the suffering and deeply moved patriot. I do not, however, deny that he felt his situation. But he is not a politician. He ought to know that sentiment and politics do not go together. When I dropped a hint about Strasbourg and Metz he looked as if he thought it was a joke. I might have told him what happened to me in a furrier's shop in Berlin. I wanted a fur cloak, and a high price being asked, I said to the shopkeeper, "I suppose, sir, you are joking." "Never in business," was the reply.

M. Thiers, who replaced M. Favre in the German camp, was likewise not a diplomatist after the Chancellor's heart:

He is a clever, attractive gentleman, witty, spirited, intellectual, but without talent for diplomacy. He is far too sentimental for the profession. Though more manly and dignified than M. Favre, he is altogether unfit for the trade. He came to me as a negotiator, when he had not gumption enough for a horse-dealer. He is easily staggered, and shows it. You can worm out of him whatever you like. I actually made him betray that Paris had full provisions only for three or four weeks more.

Of French statesmen, Thiers and Morny are the subjects of pointed anecdote. Morny's story has a bitter taste:

Of all the Napoleonic statesmen Morny best knew how to make money. When going to St. Petersburg as Ambassador, he arrived with a large number of elegant carriages, all fitted with silks, point lace, and ladies' ornaments. Each servant had one of these carriages allotted to him; each attaché and secretary at least two; while as the Ambassador, he claimed six as his share. Being an Ambassador he had to pay no duty. A few days after his arrival the whole lot, carriages and all, were sold by auction and a trifle of 800,000 roubles realized. But though Morny had no conscience, he was certainly an amiable man.

Count Bernstorff, the late Prussian envoy in London—a deliberate, easy-going, but high-principled statesman—was never high in the Prince's favor:

Count Bernstorff certainly beats me in one thing. I never succeeded in covering reams of paper with dignified verbiage about nothing. He has just sent me another cart-load of dispatches, full of emptiness, and copiously referring to previous communications of the like intrinsic worth. The King always wishes to be informed about references to documents he does not remember. Goltz was nearly as bad—reams of dispatches accompanied by basketfuls of matter docketed "Private and confidential." Heavens, how much leisure he must have had at his command! Were he alive, and heard of Napoleon a prisoner and Eugénie in London, what would he say! Probably he would not feel much for the Emperor, but the Empress! However, in spite of his infatuation, he could not have been led astray as were some others.

An Austrian diplomatist may be next introduced:

I always listened to old Metternich's stories, and he loved me for it. I remember that, after spending a few days with him at Johannesburg, the old Chancellor said to Count Thun, the presiding member of the Diet: "Bismarck is an excellent man, and if you can't get on with him you can get on with nobody." Well, said I, frankly, to Thun, I will tell you how I manage him. I listen to all his long yarns, touching him up every now and then when he seems flagging. Nothing more delightful to garrulous old men.

"I wonder, uncle," said a little girl, "if men will ever yet live to be five hundred or a thousand years old?" "No, my child," responded the old man; "that was tried once, and the race grew so bad that the world had to be drowned."

Bailey, of the Danbury News, never forgets what he reads. In his youth he diligently perused the Scriptures, and to-day, 'tis said, he carries the whole Bible in his head—gifted, nestled cozily in that ear which is the wonder and admiration of the country.

RUSSIA

LEATHER GOODS,

PORTMONNAIES, PURSES,
POCKET BOOKS, CARD CASES,
CIGAR CASES, INKSTANDS,
CARD RACKS, STAMP CASES,
TICKET HOLDERS, PORTFOLIOS,
CARD BOXES,

And a multitude of Nic-nacs too numerous to mention. Be sure and look over the most elegant stock in the city.

LOOK OUT FOR BANCROFT'S

CHRISTMAS MESSENGER

Supplied Free at

BANCROFT'S
721 MARKET ST. S.F.

BUSINESS
COLLEGE,

No. 24 Post Street,
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

Opposite Mechanics' Institute.

IMPARTS A THOROUGH PRACTICAL Education in all Commercial and English Branches French, German, Spanish, Drawing, and Telegraphy. This school having greater facilities, and enjoying a more extensive patronage than any similar institution on the Pacific coast, continues to base its claims for recognition and patronage upon the good sense and enlightened judgment of public.

LIST OF FACULTY.

E. P. Heald, F. C. Woodbury,
H. M. Stearns, A. B. Capp,
Mrs. C. Woodbury, T. R. Southern,
J. A. Chesnutwood, Mrs. W. J. Hamilton,
A. P. DuBlief, F. Seregni,
R. Sorcini, Geo. Jebens,
Lloyd Baldwin, A. Vander Nailen.
For full particulars, call at the College, 24 Post Street, or address E. P. HEALD,
President Business College, San Francisco.

ARMY AND NAVY GOODS,

REGALIA AND LODGE SUPPLIES.

A. J. PLATE & CO.,

No. 510 SACRAMENTO STREET.

CANNEL COAL.

A SUPERIOR QUALITY OF GRATE
COAL for sale by

MIDDLETON & FARNSWORTH,
14 Post Street, and 718 Sansome Street.

BUTTERICK'S

PATTERNS--DEC. STYLES.

Send stamp for catalogue. AGENCY, 124 POST ST.,
San Francisco.

CHRISTMAS

CANDIES AND HOLIDAY GOODS
supplied to Church Festivals and Parties at wholesale rates. Imported Cap Bonbons, extra fine, 50 cents a dozen.

ROBERTS, corner Bush and Polk Streets.

THOMAS BOYSON, M. D.

(University of Copenhagen, Denmark),

PHYSICIAN AND SURGEON. Office
and Residence, 112 Kearny Street. Office hours, 11
A. M. to 1 P. M., 6 to 8 P. M. Sunday 12 to 1 only. Telephone in the office.

J. J. CLARKE, M. D.

No. 106 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

J. J. BIRGE, DENTIST, 313 Kearny Street.

R. C. MOWBRAY, M. D., DENTIST
224 STOCKTON ST., corner Post, S. F.

THE VERTICAL FEED.

THE ONLY POSITIVE SUCCESS IN
all departments of sewing. Lightest running shuttle
machine in the market. The NEW DAVIS VERTICAL FEED
SEWING MACHINE, 130 Post Street.

MARK SHELTON.
P. S.—Howe, Florence, Wheeler & Wilson, Grover &
Baker, Domestic, Weed, Willcox & Gibbs, for sale at $10
each.

HEADQUARTERS

.....FOR.....

SEWING MACHINES!

FLORENCE.

WHITE.

NEW HOME.

WEED, IMPROVED.

FLORENCE.

Agency for the celebrated

Howard Needles

For all Sewing Machines.

FLORENCE

—AND—

California Oil Stoves.

The expensive system of sending out Machines on trial, supplying many with Machines who have no intention of buying them and who misuse and deface them, having been discontinued, Machines can now be sold to real purchasers at much lower prices.

All in want of Machines are invited to examine the splendid new style large-arm Machines at

NO. 19 NEW MONTGOMERY ST., SAMUEL HILL, AGENT.

HERRMANN'S

HOLIDAY STYLES

HATS!

NOW

HATS!

OUT.

A Very Suitable Present for Gent, Boy, or Child. An immense stock to choose from at

336 KEARNY STREET, BETWEEN BUSH AND PINE,
& 910 MARKET STREET, ABOVE STOCKTON.

JOHN E. QUINN,

1400 POLK STREET, CORNER OF PINE,

THE LADIES' FANCY STORE OF WESTERN ADDITION. A FULL line of Berlin and Fairy Zephyr: Java, Honey Comb and Panama Canvas, all colors;
Floss and Embroidery Silks, and everything to be found in a first-class fancy goods store.

OPEN EVENINGS.

HOLIDAY GIFTS FOR OLD AND YOUNG.

A MAGNIFICENT ASSORTMENT

CHAIRS, WORK STANDS,

KURRACHEE RUGS,

AND FANCY ARTICLES.

WAKEFIELD RATTAN CO., 38 GEARY STREET.

THE CAL. FURNITURE M'FG CO.

HAVE FIVE TIMES AS MUCH

FURNITURE

As any other house on this Coast, which has been purchased so low that we CAN and WILL sell at such prices that the poor can gratify their WISHES and the rich their TASTE. At the old stand,

NOS. 224 AND 226 BUSH STREET, S. F.

CALIFORNIA SPOOL SILK.

The Extra 100 Yards. Quarter Ounce. Ounce Spools. Embroidery Silks.

THE BEST IN USE.

Manufactured in San Francisco, supporting over 100 white women and girl. Sold by all first-class dealers.

Currier, 103 Dupont Street, has a fine assortment of VELVET FRAMES.

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER.
F. LYSTER.....ACTING MANAGER.
G. R. CHIFFMAN.....TREASURER

This Saturday matinee, at two o'clock, last appearance of
CLARA MORRIS
AS CONSTANCE HARLWOOD IN CONSCIENCE.

Saturday evening, December 14th, benefit of Mr. C. B. Bishop. "Happiest day of my life." "Seeing Bishop." "Miscellaneous Entertainment," and RICHARD III.
Sunday evening, same bill.
Monday, December 16th, and every evening, and Saturday matinee, Clara Morris in her original version of AR-TICLE 47.
Sunday evening, December 22d, first appearance as Macbeth of Master Louis Levy, the boy tragedian, supported by the great Baldwin's Theatre Company. Also first appearance on any stage of Miss Olive West as Lady Macbeth.
Monday evening, December 23d, first production of the grand Christmas piece, NOT GUILTY. First appearance of the Cameron Cadets in full Highland costume.
All the musical gems from the opera of Carmen. The scenery by Dayton. Music by Widmer.

REVELS.

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LOCKE.....PROPRIETOR.

Saturday Matinee. Saturday and Sunday evenings, another decided success, Grand Spectacular Opera Bouffe, by Alfred Cellier, its first rendition in America,

SULTAN OF MOCHA.

ALICE OATES in her new role, "DOLLY,"
"The Lass that Loves a Sailor,"

Supported by
THE OATES ENGLISH COMIC OPERA COMPANY.

Next week, grand revival of
LE PETIT DUC.

Friday, December 20th,
BENEFIT TO ALICE OATES,
When a photograph of Alice Oates as The Little Duc will be presented each person attending any part of the theatre.

Holiday Announcement—Beginning December 23d, H. M. S. PINAFORE.

REVELS.

STANDARD THEATRE.

Bush Street, between Montgomery and Kearny.

LESSEE AND MANAGER.....M. A. KENNEDY.
BUSINESS MANAGER.....P. H. KIRBY.
TREASURER.....C. S. WALTON.

MR. JOSH HART

And his

GREAT NOVELTY COMPANY

Will appear next week in an entirely new olio.

The new burlesque,

WAS SHE LED OR DID SHE GO ASTRAY,

—AND—

THE TERRY JOINED THE GANG EXCURSION.

Seats six days in advance.

REVELS.

CALIFORNIA THEATRE.

BARTON & LAWLOR.....MANAGERS.
BARTON HILL.....ACTING MANAGER.

Monday, Dec. 16th, second week and immense success of

MR. F. S. CHANFRAU,

AS

KIT,

THE ARKANSAS TRAVELER.

VOEGTLIN'S PANORAMA

OF THE

MISSISSIPPI

Nightly received with tremendous applause.

Monday, Dec. 23d—Christmas week—magnificent production of the OCTOBER. MR. CHANFRAU in his great character, "Salem Scudder."

Seats at the box office.

REVELS.

For the finest photographs, all styles, at reduced prices, go to T. H. Boyd's Yosemite Art Gallery, No. 26 Montgomery Street.

The finest candies in the city are to be had at the Clarendon, 213 Kearny Street, of Love & Goldstein. Try them.

Where can one thoroughly enjoy a swim? At the Terrace Swimming Baths, Alameda.

BOSTON DRESS REFORM.

California "Worth" Princess Suits, Skirts, and attachable Flounces; Cashmere and Merino Union Suits for ladies and children; ladies' and misses' shoulder-brace Corsets; Abdominal Corsets. No. 430 Sutter Street. A. W. BAKER, the only Dress Reform Agent in the city.

The finest French and purest home-made candies found at Voegelé's, 915 Market Street, between Fifth and Sixth.

DIAMONDS.

The most attractive assortment of

DIAMONDS, WATCHES, JEWELRY, ETC.,

And Novelties, for the selection of wedding and other presents, at

GEO. C. SHREVE & CO.'S,

110 MONTGOMERY STREET.

W. K. VANDERSLICE & CO.

NO. 136 SUTTER STREET.

IMMENSE REDUCTION
IN SILVERWARE.

SOLID STERLING SILVER SPOONS AND FORKS,

Of our own manufacture, at $1.40 per oz.,

THIS BEING MUCH LOWER THAN THEY EVER HAVE BEEN SOLD.

DIAMONDS, WATCHES, JEWELRY, AT LOWEST RATES.

THE ONLY PLACE

In this city where a lady can find a Suit ready made, stylish, and cheap, is at

SULLIVAN'S,
120 KEARNY STREET.

DIAMONDS OF RARE PERFECTION

In single stones, and carefully matched pairs, set and unset.

EMERALDS, RUBIES, AND SAPPHIRES,

AND OTHER PRECIOUS STONES.

WATCHES, JEWELRY, AND SILVERWARE

AT UNEXCEPTIONABLY LOW RATES.

BRAVERMAN & LEVY,

119 MONTGOMERY STREET.

Yosemite Art Gallery, No. 26 Montgomery Street.

REVELS.

The improvements lately made in musical boxes are surprising; instead of the old tinkling, metallic notes made by the crazy instrument of our fathers, we have the richest and mellowest, with none of the prim mechanical character that used always to suggest the machinery. Paillard & Co.'s musical boxes—they have them of all kinds at every price—are delightful, exquisite, ravishing! "Age can not wither nor custom stale their infinite variety." For Christmas presents they are without a peer. 120 Sutter Street.

REVELS.

FILIPPE'S ACADEMY OF LANGUAGES, 120 Sutter Street. French, Spanish, English, German, Italian, Latin, Greek, Portuguese, Russian, and Scandinavian languages taught, at moderate terms, by thorough teachers, with the shortest and best methods. Classes of private lessons day and evening. Take the elevator. Free school library for the students.

PALMER BROS.

726 TO 734 MARKET ST.,

Have a full assortment of

LADIES' AND GENTS' FURNISHing Goods, Toilet Articles, Corsets, Embroideries, French and Valenciennes Laces, a fine assortment of Veil-
ings and Ruchings, and the largest stock of

MILLINERY GOODS,

And the best stock of
BOYS' CLOTHING AND HATS & CAPS
In the city.

AT THE

WHITE HOUSE

Next Week and during the

HOLIDAYS

Genuine Bargains in our

DRESS GOODS DEPARTMENT

.....AND.....

FANCY ARTICLES

Suitable for CHRISTMAS PRESENTS.

LADIES' INITIAL HANDKERCH'FS

Reduced to $3 per dozen.

POINT LACE HANDKERCHIEFS

Reduced to $12—worth $30.

We have just received the very newest styles in FANS,
DOWS, TIES, SCARFS, ALGERIAN
FICHUS, etc., etc., at

VERY LOW PRICES.

During the holidays the store will remain open until late in the evening.

J. W. DAVIDSON & CO

NORTHWEST CORNER

KEARNY AND POST STREETS.

PRICES REDUCED!

..... AT.....

SIERING'S.

HOLIDAY NOVELTIES!

Just opened, consisting of

Card Trays, Baskets, Necessaries
In Canvas and Leather.

Perfume Stands,

Card Receivers,

Match Boxes,

Smoking Sets,

Historical Statuettes,

Clocks, etc.,

IN FIRE GILT, NICKEL, AND SIL-VER BRONZE.

FANCY GOODS AND WORSTEDS.

A large assortment of Ivory Brushes and Carvings.

H. SIERING & CO.,

LICK HOUSE BLOCK.

STORE OPEN EVENINGS.

Some medical students who had dissected a "subject" took one of the feet into a New York street car and slipped it into the pocket of a tailor's ulster. Soon a terrible yell rent the air. The tailor had put his hand in his ulster pocket and grasped the dissected human foot. He threw away the accursed garment, and sprang through a second story window throwing an old gentleman into hysterics. They stepped into "The Hamlet" and took a drink and the tailor's ulster was formally presented to the butler. An hour afterward the human foot was placed on the plate among the ham on the luncheon table. One of the doctors, and a butcher who had been called in to begin to gnaw it went of bellowing like a cattle-pen.

<sup>a</sup>  $\nu_{\text{max}} = 3$  AND 4 SIEKMAN 3 BRIDGING,

THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk
By J. H. BROWN, Deputy Clerk

I. G. GARDNER..... General Agent.

H. H. WATSON, Marine Surveyor

COULD & CURRY SILVER MINING

San Francisco, California.

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California

[SEAL.] THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk,
By W. STEVENSON, Deputy Clerk.

WAKELEE'S AUREOLINE

PRODUCES THE BEAUTIFUL Golden Hair so much admired. Superior to the imported article by reason of its freshness and the care used in its production.

PRICE, LARGE BOTTLES, $2.
Manufactured by
H. P. WAKELEE & CO.,
DRUGGISTS,
Corner Montgomery and Bush Streets, San Francisco.

ALASKA COMMERCIAL CO.

No. 310 SANSOME STREET,
WHOLESALE DEALER IN FURS.
J. C. MERRILL & CO.
SHIPPING

—AND—
COMMISSION MERCHANTS,
Agents for the
SANDWICH ISLANDS AND OREGON PACKET LINES.

204 AND 206 CALIFORNIA ST. - - San Francisco.

NEWTON BOOTH, C. T. WHEELER, Sacramento,
J. T. GLOVER, W. W. DODGE, San Francisco

W. W. DODGE & CO.,
WHOLESALE GROCERS,
Northwest corner Clay and Front Streets, San Francisco.

RARE ENGRAVINGS AND ETCHINGS, CHRISTMAS, 1878.

JUST RECEIVED, A LARGE COLLECTION of fine Engravings specially purchased in Italy for the Christmas trade. Nothing can be more appropriate for a holiday or wedding present than a fine Engraving, which is suitable for home decoration and at the same time rare. W. K. VICKERY would respectfully invite an inspection of his Engravings and their prices. Please note address—22 Montgomery Street, opposite the Lick House.

OPEN IN THE EVENING.

REDINGTON'S FLAVORING EXTRACTS ARE THE PERFECTLY PURE

and highly concentrated Extracts of

FRESH FRUITS
Prepared with great care. They are put up in superior style, in a bottle holding twice as much as ordinary brands of Extracts.

Comparing quality and contents, none other are nearly so cheap.

Wherever tested on THEIR MERITS, they have been adopted in preference to all others, and now are the

STANDARD FLAVORING EXTRACTS

Of the Pacific coast. Dealers will find them to give better satisfaction to the consumers than any other kind and are respectfully requested to give them a trial.

REDINGTON & CO.
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

RUPTURE. BUY NO TRUSS

Until you see what has been accomplished by DR. PIERCE'S late invention.
Call, or send for New Illustrated Book. Prices reduced.
MAGNETIC ELASTIC TRUSS
CO., 609 Sacramento Street, San Francisco.

MILLER & RICHARD, SOLE MAKERS OF EXTRA-HARD METAL SCOTCH TYPE.

SPECIAL AGENTS FOR
THE CAMPBELL, HOE, AND PEERLESS PRESSES.
No. 529 COMMERCIAL STREET.
And 205 Leidesdorff Street, San Francisco.

WINTER ARRANGEMENT, COMMENCING MONDAY, NOV. 18, 1878.

Passenger trains will leave San Francisco, from Passenger Depot on Townsend Street, between Third and Fourth, as follows:

8.30 A. M. DAILY for San Jose, Gilroy, Hollister, Tres Pinos, Pajaro, Salinas, Soledad, and all Way Stations. At Pajaro, the Santa Cruz R. R. connects with this train for Aptos and Santa Cruz. At Salinas the M. & S. V. R. R. connects with the train for Monterey. At STAGE connections made with this train.

10.40 A. M. DAILY for San Jose and Way Stations.

3.30 P. M. DAILY (Sundays excepted) for Gilroy, and Way Stations.

4.40 P. M. DAILY for San Jose and Way Stations.

6.30 P. M. DAILY for Menlo Park and Way Stations.

The extra Sunday train to San Jose and Way Stations is discontinued for the Winter season.

EXCURSION TICKETS to San Jose and intermediate points and return sold on Saturdays and Sunday mornings. Good for return until following MONDAY, inclusive.

A. C. BASSETT, H. R. JUDAH,
Superintendent. Asst. Pass. & Tkt. Agt.

SOUTHERN DIVISIONS.

Passengers for points on the Southern Divisions of the road will take the cars of the Central Pacific Railroad via OAKLAND, leaving SAN FRANCISCO via Ferry Landing, Market Street, at 4.00 P. M. daily, and making close connection at GOSHEN for Summer, Mohave, LOS ANGELES, Wilmington, Anaheim, Colton, Colorado River, and YUMA.

SAN FRANCISCO AND NORTH PACIFIC R. R.

Commencing Monday, November 11, 1878, and until further notice, Boats and Trains will leave San Francisco: (Ticket Office, Washington Street Wharf.)

3.00 P. M. DAILY, Sundays included. Steamer "James M. Donahue" (Washington Street Wharf), connecting with Mail and Express Train at Donahue for Petaluma, Santa Rosa, Healdsburg, Cloverdale, and way stations. Making stage connection at Lakeville for Sonoma; at Geyserville for Skaggs' Springs, at Cloverdale for Ukiah, Lakeport, Mendocino City, and the GEYSERS.

Connections made at Fulton on the following morning for Korbels, Guerneville, and the Redwoods (Sundays excepted). (Arrive at San Francisco 10.30 A. M.)

Freight received from 7 A. M. to 2.30 P. M. daily (except Sunday).

TICKET OFFICE, WASHINGTON STREET WHARF.

ARTHUR HUGHES, Gen. Manager. A. A. BEAN, Sup't.
P. E. DOUGHERTY, Gen. Pass. and Tkt. Agent.

OCCIDENTAL AND ORIENTAL STEAMSHIP COMPANY

—FOR—
JAPAN AND CHINA,

Leave Wharf, Cor. First and Brannan Streets, at noon, for

YOKOHAMA AND HONGKONG.

Connecting at Yokohama with steamers for Shanghai,

GAELIC, OCEANIC, BELGIC.

February ..... 18 December ..... 17 January ..... 16
May ..... 16 March ..... 15 April ..... 16

Cabin plans on exhibition and Passenger Tickets for sale at No. 2 Montgomery Street.

For freight apply to GEO. H. RICE, Freight Agent, at the Pacific Mail Steamship Company's Wharf, or No. 218 California Street.

T. H. GOODMAN, Gen'l Passenger Agent.
LELAND STANFORD, President.

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP CO.

First-class steamers with unequalled accommodations for passengers will leave San Francisco:

FOR YOKOHAMA AND HONGKONG, on the 1st of every month.

FOR SYDNEY AND AUCKLAND, via HONOLULU, November 25, and every fourth week thereafter.

FOR NEW YORK, via PANAMA, CENTRAL AMERICAN, MEXICAN, and SOUTH AMERICAN PORTS, HAVANA, and all WEST INDIA PORTS, on the 5th and 20th of each month.

FOR VICTORIA, B. C., PUGET SOUND PORTS, and PORTLAND, Oregon, on the 10th, 20th, and 30th of each month.

WILLIAMS, BLANCHARD & CO., Agents,
Corner First and Brannan Streets.

PACIFIC COAST STEAMSHIP CO.

Steamers of this Company will sail from Broadway wharf for PORTLAND (Oregon), every five days, direct, and for LOS ANGELES, SANTA BARBARA, SANTA CRUZ, SAN DIEGO, SAN LUIS OBISPO, and other Northern and Southern Coast ports, leaving San Francisco about every third day.

For day and hour of sailing, see the Company's advertisement in the San Francisco daily papers.

TICKET OFFICE, No. 214 MONTGOMERY ST., NEAR PINE.

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO., Agents,
No. 10 Market Street, San Francisco.

CHAS. N. FOX. M. B. KELLOGG.

FOX & KELLOGG, ATTORNEYS AND COUNSELORS

AT LAW, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

Office, No. 530 California Street, Rooms 1, 2, and 3.

FRANK KENNEDY, ATTORNEY AT LAW, 604 MERCHANT STREET, ROOM 16.

Probate divorce, bankruptcy, and all other cases attended to.

C. P. R. R.

COMMENCING TUESDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1878, and until further notice.

TRAINS AND BOATS
WILL LEAVE SAN FRANCISCO:

OVERLAND TICKET OFFICE AT FERRY LANDING, MARKET STREET.

7.00 A. M. DAILY, VALLEJO Steamer (from Market Street Landing), connecting with the trains for Napa (Stages for Sonoma), Calistoga (The Geysers), and Sacramento. Connecting at Davis (Sundays excepted) for Woodland and Knight's Landing, and at Woodland for Williams and Willows.

(Arrive San Francisco 8.10 P. M.)

7.00 A. M. DAILY, LOCAL PASSENGER Train (via Oakland Ferry and via Livermore), arriving at Tracy at 11.30 A. M., and connecting with Atlantic Express. Connects at Niles with train arriving at San Jose at 10.15 A. M. (Returning, train from Tracy arrives at 6.05 P. M.)

8.00 A. M. DAILY, ATLANTIC Express Train (via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R.) for Sacramento, Marysville, Redding (Portland, Or.) Colfax, Reno (Virginia City), Paisdale (Eureka), and Ogden, and Omaha. Connects at Galt with train arriving at June at 3.40 P. M.

(Arrive San Francisco 5.15 P. M.)

SUNDAY EXCURSION TICKETS TO SAN PABLO AND MARTINEZ AT REDUCED RATES.

10.00 A. M. DAILY, (VIA OAKLAND FERRY), LOCAL PASSENGER Train to Haywards and Niles. (Arrive San Francisco 4.05 P. M.)

3.00 P. M. DAILY, SAN JOSE Passenger Train (via Oakland Ferry and Niles), stopping at all way stations. Arrive at San Jose at 5.40 P. M. (Arrive San Francisco at 9.35 A. M.)

3.00 P. M. DAILY, NORTHERN Railway Passenger Train (via Oakland Ferry) to San Pablo, Martinez, and Antioch. (Arrive San Francisco 9.35 A. M.)

4.00 P. M. DAILY, SOUTHERN Express Train (via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R.), for Lathrop (and Stockton), Merced, Madera, Visalia, Sumner, Mojave, Newhall (San Buenaventura and Santa Barbara), LOS ANGELES, "Santa Monica," Wilmington, Santa Ana (San Diego), Colton, and Yuma (Arizona Stages and Colorado River Steamers). Sleeping cars between Oakland, Los Angeles, and Yuma. (Arrive San Francisco at 12.35 P. M.)

4.00 P. M., SUNDAYS EXCEPTED, Vallejo Steamer (from Market Street Landing), connecting with trains for Calistoga (The Geysers), Woodland, Knight's Landing, and Sacramento, and at Sacramento to with passenger train, leaving at 9.35 P. M., for Truckee, Reno, Carson, and Virginia. Sleeping cars between Vallejo and Carson. (Arrive San Francisco 11.10 A. M.)

4.00 P. M., SUNDAYS EXCEPTED, Sacramento Steamer (from Washington Street Wharf) for Benicia and Landings on the Sacramento River. (Arrive San Francisco 8.00 P. M.)

4.00 P. M. DAILY, THROUGH Third Class and Accommodation Train, via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R., connecting at Lathrop with train arriving at Los Angeles on second day at 11.55 A. M. (Arrive San Francisco 9.05 A. M.)

4.30 P. M. DAILY, LOCAL PASSENGER Train (via Oakland Ferry) to Haywards, Niles, and Livermore. (Arrive San Francisco 8.35 P. M.)

5.00 P. M. DAILY, OVERLAND Emigrant Train (via Oakland Ferry and Northern Railway), to Ogden, Omaha, and East. Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

FERRIES AND LOCAL TRAINS.

FROM SAN FRANCISCO, DAILY.

To Oakland.

To Alameda.

To Peninsula.

To East Oakland.

To Niles.

To Berkeley.

To Stockton.

To Sacramento.

To San Jose.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

THE NEVADA BANK OF SAN FRANCISCO

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

Paid up Capital.....$10,000,000 Gold

Reserve (U. S. Bonds).....3,500,000 "

DIRECTORS:

LOUIS Mc LANE, President. J. C. FLOOD, Vice-President.

JOHN W. MACKAY, J. L. FLOOD, JAMES G. FAIR.

Cashier.....H. W. GLENNY.

Agent at Virginia, Nev.....GEO. A. KING

Agents at New York.....(C. T. CHRISTENSEN, (22 Wall Street.) GEO. L. BRANDER.

Issues Commercial and Travelers' Credits, available in any part of the world. Makes Transfers by Telegraph and Cable, and draws Exchange at customary usances. This Bank has special facilities for dealing in bullion.

EXCHANGE

On the principal Cities throughout the United States, Europe, Japan, China, and the East Indies, the Australian Colonies, and New Zealand, and on Honolulu, Hawaii.

NEW YORK BANKERS.....The Bank of New York, N. B. A.

LONDON BANKERS.....Messrs. Smith, Payne & Smiths.

The Union Bank of London.

THE ANGLO-CALIFORNIAN BANK (Limited.)

No. 422 CALIFORNIA STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.

London Office.....3 Angel Court

New York Agents.....J. & W. Seligman & Co

Authorized Capital Stock.....$6,000,000

Surplus Earnings.....150,000

Will receive Deposits, open Accounts, make Collections, buy and sell Exchange and Bullion, loan Money, and issue Letters of Credit available throughout the world.

FREDK. F. LOW, } Managers.
IGN. STEINHART, }

P. N. LILIENTHAL, Cashier.

THE BANK OF CALIFORNIA,

SAN FRANCISCO

Capital.....$5,000,000

D. O. MILLS.....President.

WILLIAM ALVORO.....Vice-President.

THOMAS BROWN.....Cashier.

AGENTS—New York Agency of the Bank of California; Boston, Tremont National Bank; Chicago, Union National Bank; St. Louis, Boatmen's Savings Bank; New Zealand, the Bank of New Zealand; London, China, Japan India, and Australia, the Oriental Bank Corporation.

The Bank has Agencies at Virginia City and Gold Hill, and Correspondents in all the principal mining districts and interior towns of the Pacific Coast.

Letters of Credit issued available in all parts of the world. Draw direct on London, Dublin, Paris, Berlin, Bremen, Hamburg, Frankfurt-on-Main, Antwerp, Amsterdam, St. Petersburg, Copenhagen, Stockholm, Christiania, Locarno, Melbourne, Sydney, Auckland, Hongkong, Shanghai, Yokohama.

HIBERNIA SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY.

President.....M. D. SWEENEY.

Vice-President.....C. D. O'SULLIVAN.

TRUSTEES:

M. D. Sweeney, M. J. O'Connor,

C. D. O'Sullivan, P. McAnan,

John Sullivan, Gust. Touchard,

R. J. Tobin, Peter Donahue,

Joseph A. Donahue.

Treasurer.....EDWARD MARTIN

Attorney.....RICHARD TOWNE.

Office, Northeast corner of Market and Montgomery Streets

REMITTANCES FROM THE INTERIOR.

Remittances from the country may be sent through Wells, Fargo & Co.'s Express Office or any reliable banking house, but the Society will not be responsible for their safe delivery.

The signature of the depositor should accompany his first deposit.

A proper pass-book will be delivered to the agent by whom the deposit is made.

Deposits received from $2.50 upward. Office hours from 9 A. M. to 3 P. M.

ODD FELLOWS' SAVINGS BANK

Incorporated.....October 13, 1866.

Reorganized.....August 7, 1875.

OFFICE, No. 238 MONTGOMERY ST.

Authorized capital and reserve fund, $292,000

MARTIN HELLER, President.

JAMES BENSON, Secretary and Cashier.

FRENCH SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY.

411 BUSH STREET, ABOVE KRAEYER, SAN FRANCISCO.

G. MAHE, Director.

LEE D. CRAIG,

Notary Public and Commissioner

of Deeds.

TAKING OF DEPOSITIONS, Search-

ing of Records, Conveyancing, and the incorporating of Mining Companies, specialties.

No. 609 MONTGOMERY STREET, N. E. COR. CLAY.

SAN FRANCISCO.

Successor to F. V. Scudder.

CHICKERING

PIANO WAREROOMS,

31 POST ST., Mechanics' Institute Building.

ELEGANT PIANOS.

L. K. HAMMER,

Sole Agent for Pacific Coast.

Owners of Chickering Pianos are specially requested to leave orders for tuning at warerooms, 31 Post Street.

MUSIC

KNABE PIANOS,

IRVING PIANOS, ROGERS' UPRIGHT PIANOS,
Prince Organs, Waters' Organs, Sheet Music.BANCROFT, KNIGHT & Co.,
733 MARKET STREET.

PIANOS

NO. 12 TYLER STREET, S. F.

These Pianos are all three-stringed, with ivory keys, not imitation.

PIANOS

SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED PIANOS.

Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.

WOODWORTH, SCHELL & Co.
12 Post Street San Francisco.

STOVES

FOR PARLORS, OFFICES, HALLS
BED-ROOMS, CHURCHES,
STORES, ETC., ETC.THE LARGEST STOCK AND
the greatest variety on the Pacific Coast.

500

DIFFERENT SIZES, STYLES, AND PATTERNS to select from.

W. W. MONTAGUE &amp; CO.

NOS. 110, 112, 114, 118, &amp; 120 BATTERY ST.

EUREKA STONE MFG CO.

EUREKA STONE SEWER PIPE A
specialty. None but the best brands of English
Portland Cement used.

FACTORY 412 BRANNAN STREET.

GEORGE BARSTOW,

ATTORNEY AT LAW, No. 309 California Street, San Francisco, Cal.

DECKER BROS

DECORATION OF THE LEGION OF HONOR.

AWARD OF THE GOLD MEDAL.

FIVE DIPLOMAS OF MERIT

THE PARIS EXPOSITION HAS AWARDED THE DECORATION OF the LEGION OF HONOR to MR. HENRY BREWSTER, senior member of the firm of

BREWSTER &amp; CO.

(OF BROOME STREET.)

CARRIAGE BUILDERS,

Of the city of New York. Also, the Gold Medal, and five Diplomas of Merit to the several foremen of departments, for an exhibition of Thirteen Carriages, a Park Drag, Pleasure Vehicles, and a Racing Sulky, at the late Exposition, as a recognition of the superior excellence of the work of the firm.W. J. DONLEY, the representative, is now in San Francisco, and may be found at
O. F. Willey & Co.'s, or at the Baldwin.

Messrs. O. F. WILLEY &amp; CO., 427 Montgomery St., are Sole Agents in California.

BREWSTER &amp; CO. (OF BROOME STREET.)

Broadway, 47th and 48th Streets, New York City.

MADAME SKIDMORE

FINE MILLINERY.

THE LATEST PARISIAN STYLES CONSTANTLY RECEIVED.

1114 Market St., between Mason and Taylor, under Graham House.

CALIFORNIA
SPOOL SILK

TESTIMONIAL.

Referring to certain advertisements recently published derogatory to the quality of

CALIFORNIA SPOOL SILK,

We beg to offer the following testimonial from the largest dealers in the city.

CALIFORNIA SILK MFG CO.

We, the undersigned, hereby state that we have sold the CALIFORNIA SPOOL SILK for a number of years, and have found it to give entire satisfaction.

We recommend it to the public as equal in quality to any silk in this market, of either Foreign or Eastern manufacture. [Signed.]

DOANE &amp; HENSHAWOOD, No. 1 Montgomery Street.

FRATINGER &amp; NOLL, 10 to 14 Montgomery Street.

F. CHESTER &amp; CO., 34 to 36 Montgomery.

KAINDLER &amp; CO., Ville de Paris, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

J. SAMUELS, 28 Kearny Street.

THE WHITE HOUSE, J. W. Davidson &amp; Co., corner Kearny and Post Streets.

S. MOSGROVE &amp; CO., 114 and 116 Kearny.

THE LACE HOUSE, D. Samuels, 104 to 108 Kearny Street.

BUYER, REICH &amp; CO., 129 Kearny Street.

S. BINE, 130 Kearny Street.

LANDERS &amp; GILMORE, 132 Kearny St.

SULLIVAN'S CLOAK &amp; SUIT HOUSE, 220 Kearny Street.

THE SILK HOUSE, Samuel Leszynski &amp; Bro., 120 Kearny Street.

B. SCHONWASSER &amp; CO., 222 Kearny St.

JACOBS &amp; GLASS, 226 Kearny Street.

P. B. KENNEDY, 232 Kearny Street.

O'CONNOR, MOFFATT &amp; CO., 111 to 115 Post Street.

O'NEILL, KENNEDY &amp; STUART, 875 Market Street.

C. CURTIN, 911 Market Street.

J. J. O'BRIEN &amp; CO., 924 to 928 Market St.

O'DWYER &amp; EINHORN, 36 and 38 Third Street.

PEINOTTO &amp; SILVERMAN, 42 to 46 Third Street. And hundreds of others.

WAREHOUSES, N. W. CORNER
KEARNEY AND SUTTER STREETS.

SHERMAN, HYDE &amp; CO.

SHEET MUSIC,

MUSIC BOOKS,

MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

PIANOS ARE THE

FINE BOOKS AT ROMAN'S
FOR CHRISTMAS GIFTS.

Dore Gallery. 4to mor.	$85 00
Paradise Lost. 4to mor. Illustrated by Dore.	40 00
Dante's Divina Commedia. 4to mor. Illustrated by Dore.	40 00
Dante's Inferno. 4to mor. Illustrated by Dore.	40 00
Italy. By Trollope. 4to, Levant mor., $45; antique, $55; cloth.	22 50
Switzerland. 4to, mor., $25; cloth.	18 00
Meyer von Bremen Gallery. folio, mor.	50 00
Faust. Bayard Taylor's translation. folio, mor., $50; cloth.	35 00
The Rhine. 425 illustrations. 4to, mor., $25; cloth.	18 00
Spain. Illustrated by Dore. 4to, mor., $25; cloth.	18 00
Don Quixote. Illustrated by Dore. 4to, mor., $25; cloth.	18 00
La Fontaine's Fables. Illustrated by Dore. 4to, mor., $25; cloth.	18 00
Great Painters of Christendom. 4to, mor., $45; cloth.	25 00
Schiller's Song of the Bell. 4to, mor., $20; cloth.	15 00
Goethe's Herman and Dorothea. 4to, mor., $20; cloth.	15 00
India. 375 illustrations. 4to, cloth.	30 00
Schiller's Gallery. folio, cloth.	35 00
Ancient Mariner. Illustrated by Dore. folio, cloth.	10 00
Black's Atlas of the World.	25 00
Colton's Atlas of the World.	20 00
Table Book of Art. 4to, cloth.	6 00

Just received by express—

Rock of Ages. Illustrated. 1 50 |Uncle Tom's Cabin. Illustrated. 3 50 |

Art in the House. By Von Falke. 16 00 |

American Painters. 6 00 |

American Literature. By Tyler 2 vols. Cloth, $5; half calf. 10 00 |

Goethe's Gallery. Illustrated. 10 00 |

OPEN EVENINGS.

A. ROMAN & CO.,

11 Montgomery Street,

use Block, San Francisco.

PACIFIC BUSINESS COLLEGE,
320 POST STREET,
San Francisco.

CROWN POINT GOLD AND SILVER

Mining Company.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Gold Hill, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 12th day of December, 1878, an assessment (No. 36) of one dollar ($1) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of Company, Room 10, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the sixteenth (16th) day of January, 1879, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on THURSDAY, the sixth day of February, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

JAMES NEWLANDS, Secretary.
Office—203 Bush Street, Room 10, Cosmopolitan Hotel, San Francisco, California.

HALE & NORCROSS SILVER MINING COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Directors, held on the tenth (10th) day of December, 1878, an assessment (No. 60) of fifty (50) cents per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 53, Nevada Block, northwest corner Pine and Montgomery Streets, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the fifteenth (15th) day of January, 1879, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on FRIDAY, the seventh day of February, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

JOEL F. LIGHTNER, Secretary.
Office—Room 53, Nevada Block, northwest corner Pine and Montgomery Streets, San Francisco, California.

BEST KOHLER & CHASE
SAN FRANCISCO
& OAKLAND.

"DOMESTIC"
THE LIGHT RUNNING
SEWING MACHINE,

SEWING MACHINE,

The only really light-running lock-stitch Sewing Machine in the market.

"DOMESTIC" PAPER FASHIONS

Elegant, stylish, and reliable.

J. W. EVANS, 20 Post Street, San Francisco.

STEINWAY
& SON'S
PIANOS

Two Highest Awards for the best Pianos and Piano Forte Material,

U. S. CENTENNIAL EXHIBITION,
Philadelphia, 1876.

The Steinway Pianos alone were accorded the "highest degree of excellence in all styles."

The First Grand Gold Medal of Honor, Exposition Universelle, Paris, 1867.

Grand Honorary Testimonial Medal, Society of Fine Arts, Paris, 1867.

Grand National Gold Medal, from H. M. King Charles XV. of Sweden and Norway, 1868.

Academical Honors of the Royal Academies, Berlin and Stockholm.

First Prize Medal, International Exhibition, London, 1862.

Twenty-five First Medals at American Exhibitions.

Testimonials and Certificates, From the Most Eminent Musicians, Composers, and Artists in the World, who all unite in the Unanimous Verdict of the Superiority of the Steinway Pianos over all others.

Every Steinway Piano is Fully Warranted for Five Years.

Illustrated Catalogues, with Price List, Mailed Free on Application.

STEINWAY HALL.
GRAY'S
MUSIC STORE

117 POST STREET.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

MAGGIE WHEELER, plaintiff, vs. GIRAD B. H. WHEELER, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to GIRAD B. H. WHEELER, defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service), after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise, within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony existing between the plaintiff and defendant, on the grounds of failure to provide the plaintiff with the common necessities of life, and extreme cruelty to said plaintiff, by the defendant, and that the said plaintiff be allowed to resume her maiden name, to wit: Maggie Saunders, as will more fully appear in the plaintiff's complaint herein, to which reference is hereunto expressly made.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this twenty-fifth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.

By W. STEVENSON, Deputy Clerk.

REVELS.

THE IRONWAVE

CHRISTMAS

SEWERAGE IN SAN FRANCISCO.

The ARGONAUT does not charge itself with the guardianship of our municipal government, nor, as a rule, does it undertake to correct the errors of its Board of Supervisors, nor interest itself in the details of city affairs. There is, however, one matter so important, and to such an extent involving the health and welfare of the community, that we shall claim indulgence in calling the attention of the authorities and the people to it. The mode of sewerage of our city and the material to be used in the construction of our sewers and drain-pipes is one involving the health of the people, and addresses itself to the pocket of every property-owner and tax-payer. There are three kinds of sewers now being built: For our level land, where there are long reaches of sewers to be constructed for carrying the discharge of large areas, the brick, five-foot, granite-bottomed sewer, laid in brick and Portland cement, is indispensable. But there is a very large area of the city of San Francisco rolling and hilly land, where less expensive work and less capacious drains will answer all useful purposes. For this we have two kinds of pipe now in use, one known as "iron stone," and the other as "cement." It is asserted by those who claim to know that the iron stone, so called, is not iron stone, and that it will, by reason of its inferior material and inferior construction, prove entirely useless; that it will soften and disintegrate under the chemical action of our sewer discharges; that it will crumble and break under ordinary pressure, and that it is not at all calculated to answer the purpose for which it is used. The cement pipe, manufactured of gravel and Portland (English) cement by the Eureka Stone Manufacturing Co., is represented as a most enduring and imperishable article, growing harder and more indestructible for years; that when once properly laid it will last for hundreds of years, continually improving. It is charged against the so-called iron stone, that it is made of ordinary California pottery clay, and that the only part of it that is genuine and of vitrified stone is imported from Pennsylvania, and only enough of it used to make a thin outer coating; that in case of fracture it softens under action of water and becomes worthless. It is known, by those who know anything, that the Portland cement is the best in the world, and that cement is more indestructible than stone or brick. Hence the value to be assigned to the work of the Eureka Stone Manufacturing Co. is simply a question whether the pipe is made of the genuine imported material, or not. Its makers have offered to submit it to any test of pressure, or any scientific or practical test that may be asked of them to determine the quality of their wares. And now comes the strange part of this business, and this is the feature that justifies us in calling attention to what under ordinary circumstances might be called ordinary rivalry in business. It is asserted, and we believe it is true, that the Board of Supervisors have refused, and do refuse, to allow the use of any cement pipe, but that the whole work of the city is assigned to the company who make iron-stone pipe; that miles and miles of this very questionable material is being used, and that the Eureka Company find it utterly impossible to make enough impression upon the Board of Supervisors to induce them to give the cement pipe even a trial. We believe we are within the truth when we assert that no European city ever attempted to solve the problem of drainage by the use of either pipe, and that all the best sewer works of Europe are constructed of cement. The city of Paris uses cement, and Portland cement, imported from England to France. San Francisco seems, so far as we know, to be the only city in the world that is using pipes of pottery, and discarding cement concrete pipes. The ARGONAUT is not quick to assume that all public officers are corrupt, nor that the Board of Supervisors is in its majority composed of persons who will form rings with manufacturers and contractors for the purpose of individual profit, or that its Street Committee is other than honorable and just, and impartial in its dealings with contractors and material men. If we are in error in this matter—we mean in reference to partiality and favoritism by the Board—we shall be glad to have ourselves set right. As to the question of the superiority of cement pipe over pottery pipe or iron-stone pipe, it is not an open one. Having personally examined both, we do not hesitate to pronounce the unquestioned superiority of the pipe made of cement, sand, and gravel, over that made of pottery, clay, slicked over with iron-stone. If this question was one interesting only rival manufacturers we should not discuss it. But bad drainage—producing sewer gases, typhoid fevers, zymotic diseases—involves considerations other than political, and questions of greater importance than how much money can be made by manufacturers, and divided between Supervisors. If there is any one question that is more important than another to the people of this city it is drainage. Sewerage is a subtle, deadly poison, stealing silently into chambers where we sleep, noiselessly moving through the mansions of the rich and the houses of the poor. The Prince of Wales was struck down with typhoid fever in his gorgeous house at Sandringham. The Princess Alice died in her royal palace with diphtheria. These diseases stalk abroad in San Francisco and Oakland; they are especially fatal to children. Hence it is that such material should be used in the construction of sewers as will best prevent the absorption, retention, and escape of these poisonous gases. This material is cement, and it is English (Portland) cement, and none other. Penic cement is a failure. The hilly part of San Francisco should all be sewered with this pipe so that when once done it is done for all time. If our Supervisors tamper with this business for some paltry profit let them reflect that the price of their dishonest gains is human life. San Francisco with her rolling hills, her diurnal winds, her cool, bracing airs, her salt sea fogs, ought to be one of the healthy cities of the world, and will be if honestly and scientifically drained.

Clara Morris writes to the Dramatic News that her husband only loves her when she plays to "big houses" and "paying business." We don't know that Clara could make Mr. Harriot love her any more, but she could make a much better man of him if she would hire Christine Nilsson to kick him once or twice a week higher than ever she raised a piano stool. When a man assumes the position of an only husband, dependent upon his wife for support, the gods begin to look around for something to smash him with.

A young lady on being asked where her native place was, replied: "I have none; I am the daughter of a Methodist minister."

The finest candies in the city are to be had at the London, 213 Kearny Street, of Love & Goldstein, & Co.

TOLD IN LETTERS.

RUE DE MONTGOMERY, Numéros 3 et 5.

Oh, I see that quizzical smile that is curling your lip at the date of my letter. You think, my dear Em, I have been there ever since I last wrote, but I give you my word I have not, though I faith it is a pleasant enough place to keep one even longer, there is such a charming variety of useful and ornamental things to be seen, such comfortable nooks where one may sit by the hour, dipping, heedless, in the honey of the newest books, and moreover, the most perfectly matched trio of partners in town. Every one knows them, Billings with his face like that of a St. John on a church window; Harbourn, always business-like, but gay and debonnaire; and Robertson, the one matrimonially inappropriate member of the firm—what shall I say of him? (They do tell me, Em, that he is sworn to some horrid secret society and has taken a dark and fearful vow of lifelong celibacy. Sad, isn't it? So young, so promising! En passant, he is permitting his tansure to grow again, so I have hopes of him yet.) I saw there this morning a new book, Art in the House, by Dr. Von Falke, one of the finest things of the season. It is illustrated by Prang, the great chromo maker, with etchings and colored pictures in the best style. House Beautiful by Clarence Cook, is another in the same line that every collector of artistic works should have; in fact, every housewife could greatly profit by it. Miss Alcott's new book, Under the Lilacs, is a great success. Some day I must tell you what a jolly evening we once spent together. Mrs. Whitney's Cook Book ought to be another. Don't you remember one of the stories that begins with a strawberry shortcake scene, and about the corner biscuits in another one of them? I didn't give you half an idea, in my last letter, of how much is being done for the children this year. A superb book for older ones is The Arctic World, and another, The Mediterranean, both profusely illustrated, and full of graphic information. Aunt Louisa's Golden Gift is a charming story, and every one knows what "H. H." is at her best, as she is in Nelly's Silver Mine. All the standard juvenile literature is represented, and an Annuaire—Strahan's—new to me, but I find, very excellent, and myriads of smaller books, linen and others, adapted to the destructive age. I fancy that a year's subscription to a popular magazine is a very nice gift, for besides its own merit, it is a most pleasant monthly reminder of the giver, and our friends receive subscriptions for a large number. They have added quite a toy department, too, for the holidays, where there are several novelties, among them paper soldiers and dolls' playhouses made to take apart after the manner of the Crandall toys. Artistically, there is a very handsome show, the painted tiles especially being a very attractive feature. There is one capital dog's head there, and different designs in figures and flowers. Some beautiful painting is seen on the silk covered toilet bottles, and on leather pen holders that are finished off at the end with a metal holder to receive the pen. A most complete and compact writing desk, which is full of drawers, pockets, and handy places, and even has slabs of porcelain inserted on one of the inside covers for memoranda. The prettiest of picture frames, the handiest of handkerchief, glove, and work boxes, baskets, all sorts of quaint notions in iridescent glass, dressing cases filled with ivory dressing articles, graphoscopes, are some of the things I failed to mention last week. I came home by way of Nathan's where I found loads of lovely things in the way of crockery, glass, and bric-a-brac generally. The majolica from Buda-Pesth, in Hungary, is the queerest stuff you ever saw; and, as it is comparatively rare here, it is correspondingly prized. Quite as quaint, and almost as seldom found, are the tall, straight pitchers in the old Flemish style, from the Doulton factory, the figures—hounds and hunters—being etched in fine black lines on a creamy white ground. St. Clement's faience is another novelty, the designs being of the oddest possible order; vases in the forms of card and paper boats, and some of the prettiest little ice cream plates with long handles, like a sauce-pan. In Amsterdam ware, there are pretty plaques for wall decorations; one particularly pretty, is oblong with the raised figure of a mackerel in the centre; the author is Regout. Fan-ciers of the grotesque will seek the Barben ware, that imitates Palissy's queer notions so perfectly—satyrlike heads, grinning baboons, humpbacked monstrosities, all in the rich deep colors he so delighted in. Still further on, in ornamental articles, is the Gien faience, Choisy le Roi, and many lovely things in the Longwy crackle. For the dining table there are, of course, the usual displays of Royal Worcester, Dresden, Seares, Iodia, the red and yellow Bombay ware, and some beautiful bits of English porcelain from Westfield & Brown's, that Mr. Dohrman tells me is becoming more popular every day. I have seen nowhere else the peculiar Irish china—Bellock ware, it is called—that they have here. It has a wonderfully fine glaze, equalled only by the famous Italian enamel of the sixteenth century; is lightness and durability itself, and looks exactly like a silvery sea-shell. It comes in fancy articles, statuettes, and in table ware. One more thing and I leave this, to me, fascinating theme: the vases of sulphureous glass, that are reproductions, by Webb, of England, of the articles found by Dr. Schliemann during his researches in ancient Troy. In form they are severely simple, with straight throats, and are entirely unornamented, only the base of the vase being of a globe shape; has indentations on all sides, as if a huge thumb had pinched it together when hot and left its impression. In substance they are quite opaque, the coloring being changeable like iridescent glass; only in the deepest shades of purple, green, and a glint of gold when the light strikes it in the right way. Altogether, these are an entirely new "sensation" in the pottery world. Come to think of it, Chester has some very handsome table linens and other napery, so Clara tells me, and is making a great run on some very pretty embroidered sets he has, for the holidays. I have seldom found prettier "Pekinades" than those displayed there, with velvets in the corresponding shades; and Mr. Chester says he has some black silks now that are calculated, figuratively speaking, to "remove the dilapidated linen from the shrubbery" of every competitor! (that slang isn't mine, I assure you, but a conscientious quotation); and embossed velvets, that are the handsomest ever brought to San Francisco. These last run, I believe, to $6.75 a yard. Good-bye, till next year.

Yours, LILIAS DUBOIS.

Mrs. Parker, of the Ladies' Depository, has opened a new store at 125 Post Street. Dolls dressed in all styles. New Lace Patterns.

Yosemite Art Gallery; finest photographs, reduced prices; No. 25 Montgomery Street.

FASHION GOSSIP.

Seal Skins.

The elegant Seal Skin Sacques and Dohlmanns that are to be seen at the fashionable establishment of H. Liches & Co., 113 Montgomery Street, are made of the finest furs that are obtainable, and their trimmings are of the latest as well as neatest patterns. There are a large number of worthless seal skins now being made up by irresponsible dealers, and are being palmed off on the public at low prices in order to insure their sale. These worthless skins are captured on the Copper Islands, off the Siberian coast, and are called "Russian." They are recognized to be inferior by the trade, and are consequently placed upon the market at lower prices. The best, and consequently the most valuable, of the seal skins that are taken come from Alaska and South Shetland. These last-named skins are the only kind that are sold by the above-named firm, and the public may rely upon their statements as to the quality of the goods sold by them. Of course our fashionable readers desire to obtain the genuine article, and the very best quality of the above-named goods, and we therefore deemed it a matter worthy of the attention of our readers that it will be well for them to be on their guard in purchasing furs from irresponsible houses. Those who have purchased of the above-named firm have never found reason to regret their visit to that establishment.

Nero.

This greatest monster Emperor of Rome has been painted by the great German painter Kaulback. The Emperor is portrayed in the back ground, surrounded by his mistresses, drinking wine, while he orders the massacre of Christians who are brought before him. The scene is a wonderful representation of one of the blackest pages of Roman history. This great work has been photographed, and may be seen at J. B. Golly's, 31 Kearny Street. Romeo and Juliet are also to be seen in a photographic copy of the original painting. The Roman Triumph, painted by Pictory; The Roman Chariot Race, by Kaulback; and a Hungarian Race, by Wagner, are wonderful triumphs in art. The intense enthusiasm of the two latter people is indeed wonderful. Their possession by art lovers will be an endless source of delightful study. Besides these Mr. Golly has a large number of magnificent copies of paintings from the hands of the masters that would be excellent additions to art collections by our readers.

California Pictures, American Painters, Etc.

Those who love nature for her own sake, and for her relations to the best art, will read with delight the new volume to be seen at A. Roman & Co.'s, entitled California Pictures. The unrivaled sublimity of our wild mountain scenery, and the beauty of our lakes and their surroundings, has left an indelible impression upon the minds of travelers of every land. The work above mentioned treats with masterly effect the picturesque beauties of our State. The American school in Art, following the original genius of our artists and art critics have been compelled to award a work embodying a history of American Art and Artists has appeared, that will be welcomed by every lover and student of art. This work contains engravings copied from original paintings by American artists, and is one of its principal features. It is elegantly bound and illustrated, and may be seen at the above-named art establishment. The choicest collection that could be obtained in the Eastern market and from abroad of holiday gift volumes and standard works may be seen here.

More Laurels for California.

We have just seen one of the finest sets of carvers without any exception that Mr. Price, the well-known cutter of our city, has ever made. They were made for Mr. Seligman, one of the well-known bankers of New York. We have seen other sets made by Mr. Price for various parties, notably among which may be mentioned Baring Brothers, Brown Brothers, and Mr. Wicker, one of the prominent distillers of London, but we think the set made for Seligman, above-mentioned, surpass all the others; not in temper, for all the goods manufactured here are made of the best material; not in finish, but in style. The styles are constantly improving in design and beauty of outline. It may be mentioned, as a matter of national pride, that Mr. Price turns out all of his elegant goods from raw material that is entirely American. Some elegant holiday goods of the above-named description we also noted here that are a credit to the manufacturer and our city. Mr. Price has made California famous for the elegance in design and beauty of finish of its cutlery.

Messrs. Gibbie & Barrie, 615 Sanson Street, Philadelphia, are republishing in this country, from the French, a work entitled Chefs-d'Œuvre of Art of the Paris International Exhibition 1878. This is designed to be a literary and artistic souvenir of the exhibition, containing engravings of the very best and most famous canvases there. The engraving is done in Paris by masters, and the text of this American edition is translated from the French by competent hands. The work is issued in parts, each containing two fine mezzo-tint engravings, a whole-page woodcut, and six folio pages of descriptive and critical text, together with many fac simile drawings of the paintings by the artists themselves. The work is full of charmingly designed initial letters, head and tail pieces, etc. When completed it will contain more than one hundred illustrations of medal pictures, and will be a portable gallery of the masterpieces of Europe's famous living painters. The Pacific Coast agency for Messrs. Gibbie & Barrie is at 120 Sutter Street, San Francisco.

Those undecided as yet as to what description of a Christmas present they will make, we commend and recommend a handsome music box. It is a neat, a pretty, a valuable present, and its tinkling music a constant reminder of the giver. To get boxes of standard reputation and worth the purchaser should deal with M. J. Paillard & Co., manufacturers and importers, 120 Sutter Street. They have the largest and best assortment in the city; boxes large and small, boxes with chargeable cylinders, and boxes with the music hidden in the most ingenious and curious forms and shapes. Take a look at this stock before deciding your Christmas gift and you will soon make up your mind.

For the finest photographs, all styles, at reduced prices, go to T. H. Boyd's Yosemite Art Gallery, No. 26 Montgomery Street.

Auction Sale of Holiday Books.

Those who desire to make purchases of holiday books cheap will do well to attend the auction sale of books by A. Bartlett & Co., 3 Dupont Street. There will be found the following-named volumes, that are being sold at extremely low rates: The College Library, Ballantyne's novels, Smiles' works, Asop's Fables, The Poets, complete in sixteen volumes, Our Little Folks' Picture Albums, German Popular Tales, Wonders of the Deep, Life of Patrick Henry by Wirt, Animals and Birds, Stories about Birds, Stories about Animals, Little Wide Awake Pictures, Pussy Tip Toes' Family, etc.

A Crystal Palace.

A long-needed want of the elite has been filled by a New York gentleman, who has opened a magnificent store at 31 Kearny Street, the Gem Candy Emporium. Delicious candies, exceeding anything heretofore in this city, are offered at very reasonable prices. Marshmallows from the celebrated Whittman of Philadelphia. Opera and chocolate caramels, in quality which heretofore could only be found at Maillard's, New York. Elegant bonbon boxes, etc. This is the only candy store in the city which is closed every Sunday.

We stopped a lady friend the other day on Geary Street, and inquired as to the unusual excitement we observed. She replied: "It is an open secret. The people of San Francisco have found a place to buy their Christmas goods cheaper than they have dared to dream of, and it's such a nice place! In fact all the latest novelties in fancy goods, card board mottoes, chromos, papeteries, toys, and almost everything in the holiday line. The place is easily found. It is at 24 Geary Street, and is kept by A. S. Spence & Co., and they show you all the goods with the greatest of pleasure."

CONSUMPTION CURED.—An old physician, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure for consumption, bronchitis, catarrh, asthma, and all throat and lung affections, also a positive and radical cure for nervous debility and all nervous complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who desire it this recipe, with full directions for preparing and using, in German, French, or English. Sent by mail by addressing with stamp, naming this paper, W. W. SHERAR, 119 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y.

A Dangerous Story.

There is a great deal to be said against long engagements, particularly by the lady interested, as it is she who must bear all the small annoyances caused by gossiping friends. "Why doesn't John marry Sarah?" asks Mrs. Grundy. "They've been engaged these five years. Evidently he's in no hurry to give up his freedom." These and other remarks come to Sarah's ears, and she finds her position a trying one. Indeed, many of the difficulties and quarrels of lovers are the results of a protracted betrothal. The state of the engaged can never be thoroughly satisfactory to them. They are kept in an exacting mood, which often breeds unfounded jealousies. They enjoy the bliss of loving and being loved, yet they are not quite sure it is going to last. Somebody else may come along and capture the heart they so highly prize. Therefore engaged people are apt to exchange their vows frequently, both for the pleasure of listening to what they know already and to gain new assurances that they are first in each other's affections and immovably fixed there. This period of joy and trial may be extended for a reasonable time—for months, and even a year or two—but after that there is the danger of a break in the engagement which may be beyond healing. It is best for all parties concerned that marriage should follow an engagement as soon as possible. But, if for any good reason an early marriage is not practicable, engaged people must be very patient with each other. If they are too exacting, and so much pre-occupied with their sentiments that they neglect their ordinary duties, they are apt to get into a morbid state, which will result in their estrangement. A long engagement, to reach a happy ending, must flow on in a peaceful course. Numerous quarrels will finally separate the most tender of lovers.

Go to the Yosemite Art Gallery, T. H. Boyd, No. 26 Montgomery Street.

Try E. H. Hubbard's Parisian Cream for the complexion. 923 Market Street.

The Graphic calls [Sitting Bull the Akhoond of Squat.

BOSTON DRESS REFORM.

California "Worth" Princess Suits, Skirts, and detachable Flounces; Cashmere and Merino Union Suits for ladies and children; ladies' and misses' shoulder-brace Corsets; Abdominal Corsets. No. 430 Sutter Street. A. W. BAKER, the only Dress Reform Agent in the city.

New York's unwritten law provides that cooking clubs shall consist of four or six ladies, and that the meetings shall take place either weekly or fortnightly, and that the hostess shall invite as many gentlemen as there are ladies in the club. The suppers at these meetings may be either hot or cold, but must be very simple. The bill of fare is selected by lot from several prepared by the guest, and the greatest liberty of criticism is allowed.

The finest French and purest home-made candies found at Vogeley's, 915 Market Street, between Fifth and Sixth.

Yosemite Art Gallery, No. 26 Montgomery Street.

The improvements lately made in musical boxes are surprising; instead of the old tinkling, metallic notes made by the crazy instrument of our fathers, we have the richest and mellowest, with none of the prim mechanical character that used always to suggest the machinery. Paillard & Co.'s musical boxes—they have them of all kinds at every price—are delightful, exquisite, ravishing! "Age can not wither nor custom stale their infinite variety." For Christmas presents they are without a peer. 120 Sutter Street.

DRESS SHIRTS TO ORDER!

MEN'S FINE FURNISHINGS,

CHOICE NECK DRESSINGS, GLOVES, ETC.

CARMANY &amp; CROSETT,

25 KEARNY STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.

C. HERRMANN,

Importer and Manufacturer of

FINE HATS AND CAPS,

LADIES' RIDING HATS AND CAPS.

College and Band Caps Made to Order.Fine Children's Hats and Turbans a Specialty.

THE LARGEST STOCK ON THIS COAST.

*The Finest Goods at the Lowest Prices!*336 KEARNY STREET, BETWEEN BUSH AND PINE, & 910 MARKET STREET, ABOVE STOCKTON.

SEND FOR ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE.

GREAT REDUCTION IN PHOTOGRAPHS!

THE FINEST WORK AT LOWEST PRICES.

FULL LENGTH CABINETS, INTERIOR OR RUSTIC, $5 Per Doz.

THE POPULAR GRAY TINT VIGNETTE CABINETS, $6 Per Doz.

The Elegant Cameo Glace Cabinets, Usually Costing Elsewhere $10 and $12 Per Dozen, Only $8 Per Dozen.

Card Size Photos., Cameo Glace Finish, $4 Per Dozen. Card Size Photos., Gray Vignettes, $3 Per Dozen.

Every improvement of the present day has been added to the Gallery, so that now all Photographs are taken so quickly that only Superior Pictures are obtained.

CHILDREN'S PICTURES A SPECIALTY!

T. H. BOYD,
YOSEMITE ART GALLERY,

NO. 26 MONTGOMERY ST., NEAR SUTTER.

SCHOMACKER'S,

HENRY F. MILLER'S,

GROVESTEEEN &amp; FULLER'S

PIANOS.

PIANOS
TUNED
AND REPAIRED.PIANOS
TO RENT.

PIANOS SOLD ON EASY INSTALLMENTS.

Warerooms,

No. 12 Post Street, San Francisco.

WOODWORTH, SCHELL &amp; CO.

SOLE AGENTS.

Christmas at Bancroft's!

'Books we know are a substantial world, both pure and good. Round these, with tendrils strong as flesh and blood, our pastime and our happiness will grow.'

BUY YOUR HOLIDAY BOOKS

And Christmas Presents, from the finest assortment of the following articles:

BOOKS.

Standard Works in Plain and Fine Bindings,
Elegant Editions of the Poets,
Oxford Bibles and Prayers,
Juvenile and Toy Books,
New Children's Books,
Holiday Gift Books,
Doré Books,
Fine Art Galleries,
Dictionaries.

RUSSIA GOODS.

Portmonnaies with Poignee,
Purses with Silk Cord Handles,
Pocket Books and Card Cases,
Handkerchief Boxes,
Card Boxes and Card Racks,
Cigar and Cigarette Cases,
Mirrors and Toilets,
Portfolios,
Glove Boxes.

STATIONERY.

Card Plate Engraving and Printing,
Heraldic Engraving and Stamping,
Wedding and Invitation Stationery,
Fine Paper and Envelopes,
Billets de Correspondence,
Fine Visiting Cards,
Elegant Menu Cards,
Dance Programmes,
Papeteries.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Photograph Albums,
Easel Albums,
Scrap Albums,
Writing Albums,
Gold Pens and Pencils,
Painted Cologne Bottles,
Painted Pearl Shells,
Painted Oak Panels,
Christmas Cards.

Our stock of the above goods is large, new, fresh, and cheap, and we can assure the public the most elegant assortment in the city to choose from. Everybody interested in the difficult problem of what to give for a Christmas present should procure and read
BANCROFT'S CHRISTMAS MESSENGER, supplied free on application at

BANCROFT'S, 721 MARKET STREET.

NOTE!---OPEN EVENINGS.

HOLIDAY TIMES

AT THE

THE WHITE HOUSE

During the Holiday Season we will offer some DECIDED BARGAINS in our

DRESS GOODS DEPARTMENT

—IN OUR—

FANCY GOODS DEPARTMENT, —AND IN OUR—

HANDKERCHIEF AND LACE DEPARTMENT.

Dress Goods reduced to 37 1-2 cents, worth 75 cents; Initial Handkerchiefs reduced to $3 per box, worth $6; Point Lace Handkerchiefs reduced to $12, worth $20. Also, a large and

COMPLETE STOCK OF BRONZE STATUARY AND OTHER PARISIAN FANCY ARTICLES,

ALL AT REDUCED PRICES.

J. W. DAVIDSON & CO.,

NORTHWEST CORNER KEARNY AND POST STREETS, SAN FRANCISCO.

VOL. III. NO. 24.

SAN FRANCISCO, DECEMBER 21, 1878.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

OLLA-PODRIDA.

California is the land of gamblers, and its community is devoted to games of chance. We were born gamblers; we are gamblers by choice or from necessity. It was a gamble to come to the country in the early days. It was a toss-up with Indians for one's scalp in crossing the plains. It was a set-to with fever, malaria, and death to cross the Isthmus of Nicaragua or Panama. It was a chance-game with storms and tempests in rounding the Horn and braving the dangers of two oceans. It was throwing dice with the devil to endeavor to live in the country during the first decade of its settlement. Gathering gold was a gamble against "the ivories," loaded with fevers, diarrhoea, and curvy. Placer, deep river, cañon, and quartz "diggins" were only other names for faro, monte, roulette, and chuck-a-luck. There was no game ever played upon the green cloth that carried with it so many hazards, in which the percentage against the players was so great as in mining. There is no gambling game extant that begets greater demoralization than to search in the earth for the precious metals. The grim and bearded gambler and desperado who sits behind his heaps of glittering coin, with bowie-knife in his boot and pistol in his belt, dealing waxed cards, does not guard his treasure with half so many tricks of dishonest practice as the mysterious god of chance, who hides his gold-dust in the rocks and ravines and mountain gulches, and then tempts the miner by its occasional display to spend his youth, his manhood, his age, in searching for it, and to waste his life and peril his soul in the pursuit. It looks as though the whole scheme of life and the entire business of the age was one of chance; as though the earth and its creation were an accident, formed in caprice and thrown together at haphazard. We know there is a philosophy that teaches order in creation, and a divine and intelligent purpose running through the entire scheme from the beginning of time, and a preëxisting arrangement of events, even to the minutest detail of man's existence. We know plenty of people who know all about this divine purpose, and carrying themselves beyond the region of speculation can tell all about the creation of matter, the beginning of time; just how the creator was created, when chaos took the form of order, what occurred, and how it happened that the universe existed. They have the same fixed and definite opinions concerning the future as the past; they will roll the heavens together as a scroll, fix the ultimate day, and pack away humanity with entire confidence. The human soul, its origin, existence, destiny, are all as clear to their perceptions and as easily to be understood as the page of a printed book. Ask them who created the creator?—what existed before the beginning of time?—when eternity will end?—whether the pullet laid the first egg or from the egg was hatched the first pullet?—and the answers are prompt and conclusive. Speculations regarding the heavenly bodies are not speculations with them. Theories concerning the origin of matter, the formation of the earth, its interior structure, are with them not theories, but fixed and certain conclusions evolved from that inner consciousness that stands them in lieu of knowledge.

It appears to us as though the whole thing might be a simple game of chance, without any rule or system, and that this earth was a great roulette table whirling in space, with its red and black spots, and its eagle-bird-by-chance set in motion by celestial gamblers, who sit and watch its revolutions, now and then dropping an aerolite, and betting their ambrosia or their golden harps whether it drops on sea or land; now sending down upon us an epidemic, to speculate upon the numbers of its human victims; now a desolating war, that they may hazard a calculation of the numbers immolated upon its bloody altar; now a famine, to see it sweep away a race. It requires no great stretch of the imagination to suppose that in the economy of the great original purpose among so many planets, this little and most insignificant one was flung to the fiends as a gambling tool for them to sport with. We know there are fiends in the upper realms, devils who fought for supremacy on the golden ramparts, and is it not quite possible that this earth-spectacle was assigned to them and their imps for a plaything? If this theory can be maintained, it accounts for thousands of things that upon any other hypothesis seem utterly unaccountable. It would answer a million of questions that wise men, philosophers, theologians, and scientists are now speculating about. If this earth is governed by fixed laws, how about storms at sea and earthquakes that shake it to its centre? How about epidemics that carry death in their mysterious marches? How are the metalliferous formations so variable, the mountains so lacking in uniformity, the lands and waters so wanting in systematic order; the seasons so changing, and all the supposed results of natural laws so entirely uncertain? If our suggestion is admissible, that this earth was formed to allow bad angels to gamble over it, we can then understand all the eccentricities of its organization. When it began to form, and was in atoms, swinging in nebulous chaos, we can fancy the airy old sports of the "upper deep" watching its development, and risking red checks upon the shape it would assume, the functions it would perform, or the kind of animal life it would maintain. Every step in its progress from nothing to its present rounded symmetry of form would have been a betting point among the dark intelligences that had nothing better to do.

This theory would account in a measure for the mental character and moral make-up of the earth's inhabitants. It would account for the fact that all of the earth's races have been gamblers; that among the lowest orders of human intelligence and among the highest gambling has been a natural pursuit. It would account for the seeming fact that almost every incident of life is mere chance, mere luck, mere accident. It is by chance that we are born at all; it is by luck that we survive the incidents of childhood, and it is by luck that we go stumbling through the world. The whole scheme of our lives, therefore, is a mere gambling venture. If, when one's father had diffidently popped the important question, one's blushing mother had declined with thanks, and married some other fellow, one might have been still an unborn soul drifting in spiritual cloud realms. If Bloody Mary had borne a son to Philip of Spain, England would to-day have been a Catholic country. If Elizabeth had married the Earl of Leicester, Victoria had not become the Queen of England. If Hortense, the royal bride of Holland, had been faithful to her king, there would have been no Napoleon III. If Karl Otto von Bismarck Schonhausen had not married Johanna von Puttkammer, he had not become a Junker, an ultra Royalist, and the Prussian throne had not been exalted and Germany unified at the cost of France and her provinces of Alsace and Lorraine. Had it not been for a chance encounter between Juan Perez Marchena and a poor sailor at a road-side convent in Andalusia, America would not have been discovered, and General Jackson, General Grant, and General McComb would never have been distinguished in the military annals of this continent. If the father of Washington had not married a second wife, the country would have had no Father, and we should have remained a dependency of the British crown. If Rutherford Hayes had not married, we should have no President of the United States. If the breeding had broken on a down grade, and the horses had run away and the coach had tumbled over a precipice, and the driver had been killed, the Second District of California might have been represented in Congress by some inferior statesman in place of the Hon. Frank Page. If it had not been for a series of political accidents, our State might never have developed that bright galaxy of distinguished political leaders that now adorn the ranks of the Republican party, and the eminent law-makers who now cluster around the Hon. Jo Hoge, Chairman of the Constitutional Convention. Goham might have still been fiddling in mountain bar-rooms; Sargent at the printer's case, Carr bunking in an engine-house, Kearney gathering clams upon the Irish beach, Freud making corsets, Vacquerel with paper cap and cotton apron cooking for a restaurant, and Paul Bonnet frizzing hair on Sutter Street. If the bonanzas were not placed by the merest chance in the great fissure of the Comstock vein, and if it were not the merest luck to find one, the crowns of the bonanza kings might have been placed upon other heads; and if Squire P. Dewey had not shorted dividends, he might not now be enacting the rôle of the sow that the devil sheared.

"Luck" is the word. Everything turns upon luck; and because no human intelligence can see one moment into the future, or foretell any event, or draw aside the curtain of death to see beyond the portals of the tomb, every event to happen is a gambling point—nothing certain but death and taxes, and there are exceptions to these rules, still leaving betting points at odds. Elijah went up to heaven in a chariot of fire; and so long as the present Supreme Court exists, there is no telling whether taxes can be collected for the opening of Montgomery Avenue or not. Medicine is an experimental science, and it is not even yet quite determined how many doctors nor how much medicine it takes to make death certain. The law is a speculative science; the verdict of a jury is like a square deal at faro, if you give the dealer the benefit in case of a "hung" verdict. Theology is a conundrum harder to guess than the string game, chuck-a-luck, or three-card monte. Every church plays its thimbles and arranges its loops in ways that make it impossible to guess where the little joker lies or to put your finger in the untangled skein of dogmatic mysteries. Commerce is a gamble, pure and simple; it requires some skill, some experience, some judgment, some knowledge of human nature, some knowledge of the resources, credit, and character of the parties with whom the trader deals, and the more the better. It is the same with the game of draw. It requires genius and judgment to play poker with any degree of success. A cool hand, a steady nerve, an unflinching cheek, an eye that never blinks, facial muscles that never twitch, resolution that never falters, courage that never fails, are all essential to the game of draw. The farm, with its fields of grain, orchard, vineyard, meadows, and pasture, may be likened to the green cloth over which the cards are spread. If the season is dry, the farmer must copper his grain crop; the curculio destroys his vines, worms eat his fruit, and if he stands to win under a plentiful harvest of grain, Liverpool and Mark Lane go back on him with a glutted market, and the middleman takes all the percentage of the game. Manufacturing, finance, politics, war, diplomacy, marriage—all are games of chance. It is all luck.

The old Californian Argonaut remembers the early mining camp; its great saloon or its spacious round tent; its music, bar, and glittering heaps of coin and dust; its wild scenes of revelry and riot, and its tragic incidents of sudden encounter, passionate struggle, and frequent deaths. The old San Franciscan recalls the time when Portsmouth Square (the Plaza) was the centre of a gambling hell; when the evening was a carnival and the night a saturnalia of wild revels; when grave judges, professional men, and merchants whirled in the mazy dance at the California Exchange in company with the fair ones who flourished in the pre-nuptial era of our fast lives. This seed bore fruit, and the business man who gamed at night gambled the next day in merchandise; cornered goods in the market, studied invoices to arrive as cards in the pack, took advantage of long voyages and lack of information as he would from aces or a flush. The telegraph and railroad drove these hogging games out of existence, and the silver discoveries gave us a new game of hazard—one that beat all the old ones, and the result of which has been to drive legitimate gambling almost out of existence. It found us a community of gamblers, tired of the old tricks of the old games, and eager for a new one. Stock-gambling was a new one. It was respectable. We dedicated a temple to it on Pine Street. We appointed high priests to minister at its altars. We carried our treasures and our earnings to it as gifts to its gods. It eats us up, and still we are devoted to its worship. It consumes our substance, destroys our children, debauches our women; for it we swindle and steal and overreach our neighbors, sweat and struggle and toil, plot and scheme and intrigue. In the olden time a few tens of thousands limited the game. We have since taken off the limit, and our last exploit in "bucking against the tiger" of Pine Street was to lose thirty-two millions in thirty-two hours! If California ever raises an altar to the god of her idolatry, it will be a colossal statue, with smiling countenance: The God of Chance, with gamblers worshipping at his shrine.

We do not intend to correct this tendency. We are not quite sure that we wish to bring about any reform in this direction. We propose to accept the situation and make the most of it. In the early and golden days of our State, gambling was a recognized pursuit, and its professionals were men of highest honor and strictest integrity. Start not, dear reader! We know what we say, and we speak by the card. We could name a score of splendid fellows—knights of the green cloth—who would scorn to do an ungentlemanly act, and who into all the relations of business life carried souls of honor. They would lose an arm sooner than to draw a dishonest card. They were generous, just, and charitable; they were intelligent, brave, and genial. They would not allow a young boy, or a clerk, or one holding a fiduciary trust, to play at one of their games. Billy Chapman sent General Joe Hooker to the battle-field, paid his passage and his outfit. Whipple gave largely to the sanitary fund during the war, and when the law frowned upon the "tiger," became a successful—and was an honorable—merchant. Charles Burrows could quote you Shakspeare, and was a gentleman by birth and education. We have a kindly memory of those olden times when the games of faro, monte, rouge-et-noir, roulette, were played openly and honestly in the glare of light to the sound of music. Less harm in gambling then than now, when driven to secret dens. California will always have a community of gamblers. Its climate, its mines, its everything tends to the temptation of hazard; and so long as it will be so, had we not better recognize the fact and make our efforts tend rather to elevate it than to endeavor to abolish it. The German Government has driven gaming from the Kursaals at Hombourg and Baden-Baden. The French refuse to license it at their watering places. Monaco is now the only other place than San Francisco for openly playing the gambling game. We are not now justifying the vulgar gambling with cards; the day of the "tiger" has passed; this is the reign of the "wild cat." Let us keep down gambling with dice and card-board, but let us keep alive our stock exchange. Let us invite to our Kursaal of Pine Street the gamblers of the old world, and beg them to risk upon our mining stocks the ventures they have been wont to stake upon the green cloth of their fashionable health resorts. It strikes us that a community of gamblers ought to be a very jolly and a very prosperous one, and if we can gather here all the sports of Europe and the East, to risk their money upon our stock certificates, it will make money plenty and times good. It will help business. Our streets will be thronged with fashionable people, real estate will advance, elegant houses be constructed, and we of the small and virtuous minority, who can lay our hands upon our waists, beneath which our honest hearts beat, and truthfully assert that in life, in marriage, in society, in business, in religion, and in death, we never took a risk, or run a venture, or hazarded an even chance, we, perhaps, had better emigrate to some better

THE FAMOUS SAUSAGE PIZZOLA BUILT.

This is the sausage Pizzola built.
This is the stuffing
That lay in the sausage Pizzola built.
This is the bowel so nice and thin,
That held so closely wrapped within
The fragrant stuffing
That lay in the sausage Pizzola built.

This is the medal, preserved with care,
The Italian took at Mechanics' Fair,
All for the bowel so nice and thin,
That held, so closely wrapped within
The mysterious stuffing
That lay in the sausage Pizzola built.

This is the shop on Dupont Street
Where people rushed to get the meat
That took the medal, preserved with care,
The Italian got at Mechanics' Fair—

This is the boy with the brimless hat
Who came to the place with a Thomas cat,
Came to the shop on Dupont Street
Where people flocked to get the meat—

This is the woman, short and fat,
Who frightened the youth by hollering "scat,"
Frightened the boy with the brimless hat
Who came to the place with a Thomas cat—

This is the cleaver, covered with blood,
That lopped off the tail with an awful thud,
Sickening the woman, short and fat,
Who frightened the youth, by hollering "scat"—

This is the salt, that was kept in a pail,
To put on the stump of the Maltese tail
Made by the cleaver covered with blood
That lopped off the tail with an awful thud—

This is the yell that rent the sky
When the guillotine dropped, and the fur did fly
Into the salt, that was kept in a pail,
To put on the stump of the Maltese tail—

These the boys who followed the trail
Of the bob-tailed Tommy o'er hill and dale,
Led on by the yell that rent the sky
When the guillotine dropped, and the fur did fly—

This the policeman, tall and thin,
Who found the neighbors all in a grin,
Watching the boys who followed the trail
Of the bob-tailed Thomas o'er hill and dale—

This is the warrant describing the sin
By which "Old Sausage" was "taken in"
By the policeman, tall and thin,
Who found the neighbors all in a grin—

This is the evidence given in court
By the hoodlum boys, who sold it short,
Endorsing the warrant describing the sin,
By which "Old Sausage" was "taken in"—

This the statement, not overwrought,
How twenty cats for a dollar were bought,
Given in evidence told in court
By hoodlum boys who sold it short—

This is the plea that was made so well,
But received with sneers and a blunt oh—
Well, this is the record, not overwrought,
Given in evidence, told in court—

This is the break in the breakfast bill
When the papers got hold of the sausage mill,
Discussing the plea that was made so well,
Asserting that somebody lied like—

This is the man who was found stone dead
With a lump in his stomach heavy as lead,
Who had read of the break in the breakfast bill,
When the papers got hold of the sausage mill—

These are the butchers all forlorn,
Who in 1850 came round the Horn,
Cursing the man who was found stone dead
With a lump in his stomach heavy as lead—

This is the fraud, so promptly spiked,
For which Pizzola got disliked,
And the miserable butchers, all forlorn,
Who in 1850 came round the Horn,

Cursing the man who was found stone dead
With a lump in his stomach heavy as lead,
Bewailing the break in the breakfast bill,
When the papers got into the sausage mill,

Discussing the plea that was made so well,
But received with howls and a fierce oh!—
Well this is the statement, not overwrought,
How twenty cats for a dollar were bought,

Given in evidence, told in court
By hoodlum boys who sold it short,
Endorsing the warrant, describing the sin,
By which "Old Sausage" was "taken in"

By the policeman tall and thin,
Who found the neighbors all in a grin,
Watching the boys who followed the trail
Of the bob-tailed Thomas o'er hill and dale,

Led on by the yell that rent the sky
When the guillotine dropped and the fur did fly
Into the salt that was kept in a pail
To put on the stump of the Maltese tail,

Made by the cleaver covered with blood,
That whacked off the tail with an awful thud—
Sickening the woman short and fat,
Who frightened the boy by hollering "scat,"

Worried the boy with the brimless hat,
Who came to the place with a Thomas cat,
Came to the shop on Dupont Street,
Where people rushed to get the meat

That took the medal, preserved with care,
The Italian got at Mechanics' Fair,
For the festive bowel, nice and thin,
That held so safely wrapped within
The cat-meat stuffing
That lay in the sausage Pizzola built.

"Not too much of it."

A. K. B. CLUB CONVERSATION.

Discussing the Succulent and Toothsome Canvas-Back.

BY A. S. BENDER.

"Is all our company here?"

"All but T—, who will be on time, so you need not

'Call them generally, man by man, according to the scrip.'

It lacks fifteen minutes of seven. Please go on, M—, with your lecture; it will interest B— as much as any one, and he will have something to say also when you have done."

"I was saying that there is no difference between the canvas-back of the Atlantic waters and our own bird. The fact is established that this duck does not nest anywhere in the Eastern States, though it does so in the West. It breeds in the Rocky Mountains, from latitude 40 deg. northward. Its young have been seen while still unable to fly in the Cascade Mountains, and Captain Dall saw them in summer in abundance on the Yukon River. I have heard, too, that when the annual flight southward commences, the great multitude divides and streams away to the East and West—the old birds presumably leading their families back to their own feeding grounds of the last season. Certain it is that they make their nests here and in Chesapeake Bay at the same time.

"Everything which has been published regarding the habit of this duck has come from Eastern pens, and is founded upon experience had in Eastern waters; and we learn about as follows: His scientific name is Aythya vallisneria or Fuligula vallisneria. He arrives at his feeding grounds about the first of November, and selects such as furnish abundantly the zostera vallisneria, upon the roots of which he prefers to feed and from which he takes his specific name. The plant grows on shoals where the water is eight or nine feet in depth, and which are never entirely bare; its root or stem lies horizontally in the mud and somewhat resembles small celery; its leaves are narrow, grass-like blades, two or three feet long, which are left by the duck spread in long rows upon the water. He dives for the root, and having torn it up rises to the surface, being of course unable to swallow it while under water. Often before he has shaken the water from his eyes he is robbed by the widgeon and redhead, which cannot dive, and being equally fond of this root obtain it by robbing the industrious canvas-back.

"It seems to be admitted on all hands that the peculiar and delicious flavor of the duck is derived from this root. 'Fraok Forester' (H. W. Herbert) says that 'what renders the canvas-back of the waters of the Chesapeake the very best bird that flies is the wild celery which he eats there, and cannot get in Long Island Sound or on the Jersey shore, where he is at best a fourth-rate duck.'

"A writer in a late number of a sportman's paper says, regarding shooting canvas-backs on the Susquehanna Flats on the first of November, that 'although it is sport of the most exciting character, fit to make a hearty sportsman's blood thrill, yet it seems like useless slaughter. The game is hardly worth carrying home. At this season it is rank, though exceedingly fat, from the unlimited supply of food. Later in the season, when the ribbon grass is washed out and nothing but celery can be had, the birds are prime for the table.' Another writer in the same journal speaks of this duck (as well as others) as often 'suffering from the pangs of hunger on first reaching the feeding grounds;' but adds that after cleaning themselves with long and vigorous splashing in the water and with great flapping of wings, and carefully arranging their feathers, they begin their search for food, and in a week or two become fat and juicy. There seems to be a little conflict of evidence here as to the condition in which the duck reaches the feeding grounds, but all the writers agree that he owes his fine flavor to a plant which they call 'wild celery;' though it is not celery at all, and does not resemble it in the least except slightly, as has been already said, in the shape of the root, but is simply the aquatic plant Vallisneria spiralis. No mention is anywhere made of his eating any other food than the grasses, and it is presumed that he is considered a vegetable feeder only.

"I have referred to these published statements in order to compare them with our own experience of the same bird on these shores. The canvas-back comes to us in the last days of October, and is then in as good condition and as ready for the table as at any time in the season. Whether he comes from the far north, where the Russian Telegraph Company's explorers found him nesting, we do not know. There may be breeding places nearer to us, though to birds of such power of flight distance is of small consequence; or there may be mountain lakes, as yet undiscovered, where the flavor-giving plant is to be found. It does once in a while happen that the birds are in bad case when they come. It was so last year, and, although owing to the widely spread waters of that season comparatively few were brought to market, all those which I saw throughout the whole time were very poor; but the general rule is as I have said.

"In the bays of San Pablo and Suisun and their wide sloughs, and in the Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers, the canvas-back of this part of California spends the long gentle season which we call winter. If at the other side of the continent he haunts by choice, as has been said, the edge of the thin ice and the waters just upon the point of congealing, he is obliged to forego that enjoyment here; but here he remains in seeming content often until April. In flocks and clumps of goodly size, though not in such multitudes as in and about the Chesapeake, he feeds and keeps fat and delicious until the later part of the time, and then begins generally to get rank and to acquire a coarse, fishy odor and taste. Once in a while one is killed at the end of the season that has not done so, but the case is rare.

"I have said that he feeds, and keeps fat and delicious. But what does he eat? It is agreed that the Eastern bird owes its excellence to the root of the Vallisneria spiralis, and we may not gainsay it. It is agreed among us, who are acquainted with and have eaten both, that our bird has the same condition of flesh and the same marked and excellent flavor as his relatives of the other coast. Our duck dives, to be sure, but he leaves no long rows of grass-blades floating on the water; robbed he may be by the widgeon and the redhead, but not of the root of the Vallisneria spiralis, for I can get no evidence that the plant grows in our waters.

What shall we say? Have all the Eastern sportsmen and epicures been all this time in error in ascribing the flavor of the canvas-back to this particular plant? Have we another which gives that same flavor? In this distinguishing quality inherent in the bird, only needing food of a certain delicacy to be developed, and can it be that it is only absent in exceptional cases, as in the last season, when a wide spread of water with its great deposit of sediment may have destroyed or covered up every kind of food but the coarsest?

"And one question more. Is it certain that the canvas-back is a pure grass-eater only? Is it certain that he does not seek the sea-slug, and the little delicate pearly-shelled clam, and the minute crab, so plentiful along the shores in some parts of the upper bays? Is that strong bill given him to pull up by the roots a plant which two, certainly, of our botanists have never seen in this State? And what is he plunging and dipping for so merrily, and busily, and persistently alone the line of the retiring tide on the bay side of Mare Island, on a flat where there is not a semblance of vegetable growth? Perhaps he does eat these, perhaps many hunters know the fact, but it has never been declared; and if it is true, how is it that the bird keeps his delicate flavor so long? But I have said enough. I hope some one will some time answer my questions. I have told all I know about the bird, and something more. What have you to say, B—, about hunting and killing him?"

"I will begin, as you did, by a reference to the Eastern bird. It used to be set down as established that he would not fly to decoys, and must be killed from a floating battery or sink, from a blind on a point over which he must fly from one reach of the bay to another, or by tolling—that is, enticing a flock by the gambols of a trained dog to swim toward the shore, which a fatal curiosity always impels it to do, and, when it comes within range, pouring in the contents of all the guns hidden among the rushes on the bank. This is, I believe, still practiced; but gentlemen shooting for sport are gradually coming to prefer the method so commonly followed by us, of setting out decoys in front of a shore blind, and shooting the birds as they wheel to and sweep above the wooden counterfeits. The pot-hunters have a murderous way of rowing down to the feeding grounds at night in boats, carrying in the bow a light and reflector, and shooting right and left among the bewildered birds who have been attracted almost within arm's length; but this is regarded with disfavor, and I am not sure but it is illegal. Our way of dealing with the canvas-back is pleasant and easy; as the climate is moderate, we seldom suffer from cold while sitting in the booth or while setting out and taking in the decoy. With a stool of fifteen or twenty well made imitations, in a spot judiciously chosen, off a point projecting beyond the general line of the shore, just enough to make the bunch a little conspicuous from either direction, and a breeze sufficient to shake up the water a little and make the ducks disposed to move about, you will hardly fail to get as many shots as you desire, and to have as many ducks as you will wish to walk under if you are far from home. M—, there, who is, however, rather a crack duck-hunter, and another man, bagged forty-five, besides losing by their diving some eight or ten wounded ones; and, though the men were a longer time in the blind, I believe the birds were all killed inside of two hours—all single shots, too, and no slaying half a dozen at once as they swam in a body up to the decoys. M— killed and bagged more than thirty of the number, and they were all killed clean and dead. He used a gun of fourteen calibre and No. 7 shot—which may be an item worth marking by some of you who believe in gauges of nine or ten and No. 4. But nearly all of you have had practice in this sport, and require no teaching from me. I will not ask you why the canvas-backs flock into ponds about Suisun Bay, and why this bay duck abounds in Tulare Lake, for you could not answer; but as this is the first time of our meeting for a regular canvas-back dinner, I will ask P— how he has ordered them to be cooked, and what we are to eat with them?"

"Before answering your question, I will, in imitation of you, my two fellow-lecturers, say a word about his treatment in the Eastern States. It is so long since I shot or tasted a canvas-back on the other side, that all ways of doing either may have changed completely since; but I remember me of a bird roasted for fifteen minutes and sent to the table, where he was carved like a chicken, the pieces laid in a chafing-dish over an alcohol lamp, and stewed in his own gravy, mixed with wine, currant jelly, red pepper, and doubtless other things. It was good undeniably, but it might have been any other duck as well. A late article in an Eastern paper says a quick oven will roast a canvas-back sufficiently in twenty-two minutes, and that it should never remain in over twenty-five. The article generally shows good knowledge of the subject, but we consider the time named far too long. The writer says truly that no gravy need be prepared, that much depends on the carving (and tells how to carve also), and adds that dry champagne or burgundy is a fit companion. I differ with him a little, and so, without quoting him further, will say that your ducks as soon as drawn were wiped dry; that before cooking a tablespoonful of very salt water will be poured in, and the duck turned round and over to distribute it—that is all the seasoning that is used by the cook; next, the bird will repose in a hot oven for seventeen minutes; it will then be removed, placed on a hot, dry dish, and brought to table. The fork will be placed across the breast-bone with one tine touching it on each side; the knife shall deftly follow the bone closely along, pass skillfully through the joints of the wing and leg, and one-half of the bird in a single slice shall slip gently into the gravy that will be rapidly pouring into the dish; the other side shall be similarly treated, and only the carcass shall remain upon the fork. One of these slices shall be placed on the hot plate which will be given you, a share of the rich natural gravy shall be added; you shall have a slice of lime and some aji, or if you prefer it some cayenne pepper shall be at your command. A portion of that celery salad which the Doctor is so carefully preparing shall be given you, and the bottle shall be within easy reach. Thenceforth you are under your own guidance; you shall season, you shall divide, you shall eat as you will. Thus dine those who love the canvas-back for himself alone. But here is T—. Let us take our glass of vermouth, our few spoonfuls of preparatory bouillon, and then—our canvas-back duck."

Industry need not wish.—Franklin.

LITERATURE.

From his new volume, The Fireside Encyclopedia of Poetry, "comprising," he says, "the best poems of the most famous writers, English and American." Mr. Henry T. Coates explains that it has been his aim to exclude that class of work which "would tend to undermine any one's faith, or destroy a single virtuous impulse." This is perhaps not a very high standard of exclusion, if we may use the term, but it may be necessary in a "fireside" encyclopedia. Most of the people who know anything of, or care anything about, poetry are not afraid to encounter a passage of questionable morality here and there. Their "faith" and "virtuous impulses" are not at the mercy of even the most "powerful rhyme." And then some of them are destitute of faith and virtuous impulses already.

Captain Chaworth Musters, who published some years ago, a remarkable work on Patagonia, and is now British Consul for the Portuguese possessions in Eastern Africa, is a grandson of the Mary Chaworth, Lord Byron's romantic youthful passion for whom, he produced one of the finest poems in any language. "Jack Musters," whom the gentle Mary had the prudence to prefer to the fledgling rhymster, was a stolid, dram-drinking country squire—something like the fellow whom Tennyson's "Cousin Amy" preferred to her poet—but notwithstanding these advantages he did not turn out very well. But it was an error on the right side, to marry a granger instead of a poet.

A New York journal of rather radical character has "acted on the advice of the American Philological Association" by dropping the final "c" in the words "give," "have," and "live." This is a modest enough beginning in spelling reform to satisfy the most conservative. We hope our contemporary will in time make the bold venture of dropping the useless "o" in the word "stough."

Houghton, Osgood & Co. have issued a second edition of Haug's Essays on the Sacred Language, Writings, and Religion of the Parsis. The Parsis are the fire-worshipping descendants of the old Persians, who emigrated to escape massacre and persecution at the hands of the Mussulmans. They live in India, and constitute a prosperous, highly intelligent, and deserving people. They are Aryans, of the same race as ourselves, though of purer blood; but they worship a god that we use to cook the heretics who deny ours.

M. Thiers left in manuscript a philosophical work, of which he wrote to Mlle. Dosne: "If God does not suffer me to enjoy my glory—for this work surpasses all my historical works—you, Elise and Félicité, will enjoy it." Mme. Thiers has just put it into the hands of M. Mignet to edit. It is curious to learn that a part of it had to be rewritten because M. Thiers, as late in life as 1873, had taken up the study of botany and astronomy, of which he was previously ignorant. Observe the inconvenience entailed by acquiring new knowledge.

Mr. Edgar Fawcett continues to pour out his poesy like water—or milk-and-water—in the magazines. Some of his sonnets (the sonnet is his favorite method of uttering himself) are pleasing, none of them great, all of them—too many. Shakespeare wrote one hundred and fifty-four sonnets, more than any other famous English poet, and Shakespeare is immortal. It appears to be Mr. Fawcett's ambition to write one hundred and fifty-five, and be more immortal than Shakespeare.

It was our intention to notice in this column the Christmas numbers of the various magazines, but we have disqualified ourselves for the critical function by losing our mental equipoise in admiration of our own.

Some maniac has published at Padua a microscopic edition of Dante's "Divina Comedia." It makes a volume of five hundred pages, two inches long by a little less than an inch-and-a-half in width. The text is said to be in the smallest type ever used. As if the "Divina Comedia," in addition to being unintelligible, must for the sake of consistency be illegible also, and worry the eyes as well as the brain!

Literature has been enriched and the cause of human progress advanced an inch by the publication of two volumes on art—A Practical Treatise on China Painting in America, and The Art of Flower Painting—the one by a Frenchman, the other by a woman. We hardly know which subject is the more important to the temporal well-being and spiritual salvation of the race, but as to authors, we think we could spare the Frenchman better than the woman if the Foolkiller should unhappily compel us to make a choice. One likes painted China well enough, and one can endure painted flowers, but one does not want to know how the thing is done in either case, unless it is one's trade. Shall any impudent person presume to tell us how our boots are polished, or our doors grained?

AL HARITH.

Al Hamadani, wonder of his time,
Relates how Harith, blessed with goodly store,
The owner of an hundred steeds and more,
Grown overwise and restless, in his prime
Set sail upon the desert seas of yore.
From Irak to Damascus, bold of wing,
He braves the tongue of flame, the Simoon's blast;
Backward the iron hoofs of his courser fling
The dust of travel, till he stands at last Beside the blessed gate of Illah, where
The shining city sits beneath the palms.
His face toward Mecca, first he bows in prayer,
As all good Moslems should, bestows his alms,
And then betakes him to the bath, then pays
His service to the Kadi, to express
With due decorum all the grave excess
Of oriental greeting: length of days,
Increase of store, for thus, in Eastern lands,
With gracious speech, the Moslem greets his guest.
And so the son of Irak folds his hands,
And sits him down by Syrian streams to rest.
To oriental ears no sound so sweet
As sound of running waters; while he makes
The pilgrimage of life in dust and heat,
He fondly hopes, when'er his soul awakes
In Paradise, to realize his dreams
Of singing bulbuls and of babbling streams.

Damascus, gold within and grime without;
With here and there a narrow tortuous street
Through which the living tides flow in and out.
We catch a glimpse of palms above the walls,
And in the transient hush of hurrying feet,
We hear the tinkling tones of waterfalls.
Within the portals, sheltered from the heat,
When sultry days succeed to lustrous dawns,
Are cool arcades where shining waters run,
And tessellated courts, and terraced lawns,
And marble fountains flashing in the sun.
'Twas much the same a thousand years ago.
The dreamy Moslem life pulsed to and fro
In the same sensual round, when Harith found
Its mosques and market places crescent-crowned.
A mart of splendor by a sea of sand,
Her khans were filled with wares from every land:
Spices and gums, frankincense, musk, and myrrh,
Amber and coral from the Indian seas;
Brocades and arabesques from Nishampur,
Inwrought with gold and silver filigrees;
Embroidered silks and satins, rare perfumes,
Rubies from Ava, pearls from Hindoostan;
Cambrics and tapestries from Persian looms,
Caftans from Fez, and shawls from Khorasan.
Rivers of wine and oil ran down her streets,
While, tossed and travel-stained, the desert fleets,
With freights from Egypt, Khiva, and Cathay,
Beside her sacred gates at anchor lay.

Hot is the heart of youth; what wonder then,
As in his veins the streams of molten lava leap,
That he of Irak should, like other men,
Forget the words of wisdom, and despite
The warnings of the Prophet fall asleep
In some forbidden palace of delight.
Meanwhile the moons of Syria waxed and waned;
And he, enchanted first, and then enchained,
A willing slave in silken meshes lay,
Where broad-browed nymphs with soubrous waves of hair,
And lustrous eyes that shunned the light of day,
Like Venus veiled in phantom robes of spray,
Were idly swaying in the perfumed air.
Change follows change in all material things,
The dawn gives place to day, the day to night;
Our treasures, as the Prophet says, have wings,
And like the mists of morning take their flight.
Love tires of its delicious pain, and power
Is but the fleeting phantom of an hour.
Perhaps the still small voice, by night, was heard,
Which comes to us unbidden and unsought;
Perhaps the ghost of loves forsaken stirred
Once more the turbid current of his thought.
If vows were made, or expiation done,
The text does not disclose, nor can we tell.
But this we know, he broke the Circene spell,
And swore by Allah that the morrow's sun
Should see him on his way; and when the dawn
With rosy fingers had in part withdrawn
The mantle of the night, he stole away,
Leaving the dancers at their revels still,
And with his camel drivers waited, till
The earth unveiled before the full-orbed day.
Beyond the gates, beside the sacred well,
In abject squalor on his leathern mat,
Abu Ben Zayd, the prince of beggars, sat,
And told his wondrous tales, and sought to sell
His amulets: "This, from the holy shrine,
Will guard thee, son of Islam, from thy foes;
And this, peace be with thee and thine,
Will comfort thy distress and soothe thy woes;
And this, if thou should'st chance to go astray,
Will lead thee safely back." "Upon my word,"
Al Harith said, "I do believe
Thou liest; and as the spider weaves his web for prey,
So thou dost weave these pretenses to deceive."
The Prophet in the seventh heaven heard
The impious scoff, the dervish bowed his head:
"Illah il' Allah!" God is great, he said.

A steel-blue sky above, and on either hand,
As far as the eye can reach, a sea of sand.
In all of the great white space no sound nor sight;
Only the glare of day, only the hush of night.

Curses have followed like wolves, as they march
Day after day, under the arch
Of the pitiless sky; no joy and no rest,
For omens are thick in the thin white air;
And the camel-drivers forget to jest
When Fear looks into the face of Care.
In the door of his tent Al Harith sits,
And his face wears a troubled look, for lo!
On the rim of the desert a shadow flits,
And it seems like the cloud of the coming foe.

He hears their hoof-beats nearer and more near;
No hope in flight; and, paralyzed with fear,
He calls on Allah, but he calls in vain;
Across the wide expanse of arid plain
Full half a hundred horsemen dash;
And, foremost where the circling sabres flash,
Behold! the face of him who sought to sell
The amulets beside the sacred well.

The wise man says: "Give ear, O sons of men!
Obey the precepts of the faith, and then
Accept the preordained decrees of fate,
Illah il' Allah!" Only God is great.

SAN FRANCISCO, December, 1878.

L. H. FOOTE.

Smiles are the language of love.

FABLES AND ANECDOTES.

By Little Johnny.

Uncle Ned, he sed: "Johnny,
you know ol a bowt Santy Cloz, and Crissmiss trees, and hangin up yure stockns, and pertickler you know a bowt terkys and pudns, and sech nollidge is mity vallyble, but, Johnny, tween you an me, can you tel me wot is Crissmiss?"

Then I spoke up real quick an sed: "Bet your life I can!"

Then Uncle Ned he looked at me long time out of his eyes, like precher's eyes, and sed: "Johnny, the xpression wich you have preferd for to use in this connectns is a strongn for a litttle feller, but I spose you can justify it by yure anser.
Now wot is Crissmiss?"

Then I sed: "Its the day wen Crissifer Clumbus got lick like smoke by Genl Washtnton, ten millon hundred thousen Brittishers a wollern in their gore, and ole King George a bustin thru the brush like zebries for to safe hisself, and John Maccoom a slottern fokes offle, hooray!"

And wen I had sed it I was so xcited I fel over Mose, wich is the cat, and Bildad, that's the new dog, snook under the stoffe and burnt the hair ol off the spine of his back, and yeld like Injins!

Then Uncle Ned he loked a stonish a wile, and then he blode his nose, and then he sed a other time: "Johnny, yure Uncle Edard has ben in Injy and evry were, and he has worship the deeties of ol nations, from the sacrid cracky dile of Egipt to the silver doller of the hethen Madgigaskers.
He is a pious man in ten langwages, and can keep the stopper in his temper wen the mometer stans at a hundrd in the shade of a ice hous, but, Johnny, I'm golly be gum dasted to slipery ellum if you aint the dum bustedest mulligaloot on this side of ole Gaffier Peterses new barn!"

Wen I ast Uncle Ned wot was a mulligaloot, he jest smiled sweet like he was sick to his stumick ake, and said, Uncle Ned did: "Johnny, I was only tryne to say in broken Pattigonian that if you was bein' xamined for to teech error to the ignorant, and if you had been giv the questions and ansers forehand, you wude get a first grade stiffiket, sick like a wistle!"

But wen it comes to wissles I can make em out of willer, and Billy, thats my brother Billy, he can do it in his 2 fingers, loud like a engine. My mother she has tole me wot Crissmiss is but I cant tel you, cos its got swearin in it.

Las time it was Crissmiss I had a litttle picter card giv me,
and it sed on it in poetry:

"Crissmiss comes but once a year,
But wen it comes it brings good cheer."

And Missis Doppy, wich has got the red hed, like a house a fire, she was to our house, and she makes poetry, too, so she said: "Johnny, ile finish this verse for you an make it jest nice." So Missis Doppy she rote be lo the other poetry:

"And when the cheer is brought and set in
It teeches us Crissmiss aint a day for to fret in."

Wude peckers has red beds, too, and tungs, pinted like a fish huke, and one time a wude pecker had made a hole in a log and seen a worm in the bottom of the hole, like down a wel. So the wude pecker he put his tung in a little way, and the worm it loked up and sed: "If yure a goin a fishn wy dont you thro in yure line were there is sum woter?"

Then the wude pecker it sed: "Thats wot I was jest a thinkn my own sellef, but I gess I better put some bate on."

Some times it rains worms, and then the fishes is jest dlited, same as me and Billy wude be if it wude rain fishes, and I gess the liens and tigers wude be tickeled if it wude rain me and Billy.

Once there was a fish, and it sed to a other fish: "It looks mity black this mornin, like it was goin for to be a shour, we better go under the bank or we will git wet."

Then the other fish he sed: "Les wait a wile and see wether its agoin to be drink or wittles."

Jest then there was a red worm cum down, and the fish wich had spoke last he hollered: "Hooray! I tole you so, here gese for the first drop!"

So he snacht the worm, but it was unto a hook, and he was cot, the fish was. Then the other feller he shuke his head and swim away, a sayn to hisself: "I notice that dinners wich is sent from Hevven ol ways begins with soop."

But my father he says: "Yes, and the soop is follerd by fish." But a nice Crissmiss terky is hi upper than a hock.
One time Mary, thats the house maid, she seen a hock slain roun and roun, up, up, up hire than steeples, and she sed:
"Wot keeps it up?"

Then my father he sed: "Mary, the scientiffical expina-tion is that hocks is supported by the air."

But Uncle Ned he spoke up and said: "Mebby so, but the popler bleef is that thay are suported by spring chickins and hop todes."

Hop todes is mity good for worts if you let em alone, and ole Gaffier Peters he has got a big one on his nose.

Ole Gaffier has got a boy wich was a saler, like Jack Brily, and the boy grode up and stoped in Spain, and got marrid.
One time he rote to ole Gaffier, and sent the letter to my father for to be giv him, but my father he opened it his own-self, cos he thot it was hisn. The letter it had a photy grap in it, and the photy grap was ole Gaffiers gran son, wich his father, thats ole Gaffiers boy, rote was a fine feller and loked mity like ole Gaffier. But my sisters young man he snook out the photy grap, and put a other in, wich was a man wich had a hed like a jackous. My father he didnt kanow, and he giv the letter to old Gaffier, wich loked at the picter and then red the letter carefule, and then thot a wile, reel sollum, and then he sed: "Wen a yung feller makes a rule of hisself, and gits marrid to a wild Spannerd, his boys dont look like fokes one bit."

But my father he sed: "Wy, Gaffier, I never seen sech a likenis to you as that picter."

Then Gaffier he put his speticles on, and loked at it a other time, reel long, and then he shuke his hed agin and sed: "Wel, wel, wel, ole age is onnable, but it is a feller luke like a dam rabbit!"

OUR ART CULTURE.

No one who has watched the progress of art matters in this city for the past ten years will be likely to refuse us credit for a certain appearance, at least, of advancement in the direction of art culture. We have spent our money freely upon it, at times; have talked and written a deal about it—such talking and writing as it has been; have taken it up, in fact, and made it a fashion. This, it seems to me, as I look around for the appreciable results of our ten years' culture, is about all there is of it: another favor to pin upon our sleeves, one more liveried servant who ministers only to our vanity and gratifies our love of display. I have said that we are entitled to credit for the showing of some progress, but I fear I must also add that with this display the matter is nearly at an end. In saying this I hope I do not undervalue the work done by our School of Design; I certainly do not mean to. I believe that in the main it has wrought all the good that was possible under the circumstances, and that had these been more favorable, or less attended by unfortunate limitations, it would have accomplished much more. I believe that even now, if this School could be put upon a firm financial basis—one that would place it above the necessity for accepting any pupil simply because he pays, whether talented or not, whether in earnest or only trifling with art, and one which should permit its excellent masters to fully carry out their ideas with regard to its management—it would fulfill its mission and be helpful to the entire community in a matter in which I fear the community is ill prepared to help itself. We have bought pictures, to be sure, and statues; have followed the newest fashions in house furniture ("household art" is the modish term for it) and bric-a-brac, gone into pottery and Japanese fans, and whatever else there may be of it, to a very considerable extent; and in so far we make our showing. But behind all this there lies what to me is the important question in such matters, viz: To what degree have we done these things intelligently or wisely, and in how far has this seeming æsthetic culture been the result of an inward want, of a genuine craving after what of beauty there may be in these latest acquisitions? Are they a real element in our lives, a part of our everyday existence, so to say; or are they after all mere new toys with which we replace the old ones that have been cast aside? Dare we be candid with ourselves and ask ourselves this question? Are we ready, any business man of us, to say that we are willing to lose the chance of a profitable speculation for the opportunity of studying a drawing of Durer? How many of my lady readers—even my Eastlake-furniture or Cloisonné-enamel-mad lady readers—could be induced to go to a swell party in an old gown for the sake of possessing a drawing by Holbein? If we ask ourselves seriously whether our art feeling is more than skin deep, whether it is even skin deep—I am speaking of "ourselves" now en bloc—I fear we shall not get much comfort out of the answer. And this is why I fear it: When I see the art tendency first breaking out on the inner walls of a house I have my doubt about it. When I find the outer walls of that house the architectural banalité that one is forced to call ninety-nine out of every hundred of our best San Francisco structures, I am past all doubt. When I see a hideous carpet giving way before one of artistic design or harmonious arrangement of color because the artistic one is in the fashion, I know just how deep to look for the art feeling that prompted the change. When people talk bric-a-brac, and buy the kind of stuff that is mostly put before them by the dealers, it is enough for me. I do not care to look deeper than the skin. The fact is, and in our heart of hearts we know it—or shall if we are quite honest with ourselves—we are cultivating, not art, but the outward semblance of it; not the true spirit of beauty in our homes, but rather the mode of decorating them that has received the sanction of the leaders of fashion; not a true thing at all, but a sham and a pretense. A true art culture should come from within; with us it comes mostly from the shops. The genuine love for the beautiful is modest withal; with us it flaunts itself in the glitter and glare of the drawing-room, and wears its price labeled upon it. Our artists have long since ceased to give us their best work; there would be no buyers if they did, and they must sell pictures to live. Our dealers bring—what will pay; occasionally a good picture among the many bad ones, but generally (if they are wise) those that are loud and can assert themselves. Our School is doing but a small part of what it could and should. Of the better Eastern work but very little comes to us; Inness, William Hunt, La Farge, Colman—the best of them—are almost unknown and unrepresented. For this market an artist must have notoriety; the good artists have only reputation. A picture of La Farge or Colman must be ordered and waited for; they are rarely in the hands of dealers. And we Californians cannot wait; if it is the proper thing to have pictures, we must have them at once, in time to furnish the new house that is to be built and ready for occupancy in ninety days at the furthest, and if the dealers don't bring us the "art" and tell us what it is, how are we to know anything about it? Study? Oh, we have no time for that! Besides, we don't care anything about it; if it's necessary to have the pictures, we are willing to have and pay for them, but bother the studying! Now, I am not finding fault with those who do not care to study art, although I believe—yes, I know—that they are daily losing out of their lives much of what is best worth living for; it is rather of those others who assume to care for it without making the effort to know, who talk and buy themselves into somewhat of influence, and through their ignorance and arrogance exert this influence only to the injury of the true art cause, that I am thinking. Mere ignorance, a conscious, honest ignorance, would be a blessing to us. It seems to me, indeed, to be the only condition from which there is any chance that we shall ever progress in a sound, healthy direction, though how we are to attain this desirable status—and, above all, the right consciousness of it—is more than I can imagine: or rather, let me say, more than I dare to hope for, since the manner of its attainment does not lie so far from us after all, had we but the moral courage to be quite true to ourselves. This we must have before we may hope to know anything of what is best worth knowing in art. Modesty and reverence are born of that conscious ignorance that is almost one with the highest knowledge, and out of these qualities only can spring that love for, and appreciation of, the beautiful that is of itself the beginning and ending of a true art culture.

OSCAR WEIL.

良安勞鋤

OH, THE CHINESE MUST GO!

In Frisco, California, from China far away,
There lives a little Irishman, who used to drive a dray;
But he tired of the business, and gathered once a week
A lot of idlers like himself, who came to hear him speak.

A newspaper reporter, who was dying for a joke,
Wrote this Dennis Kearney speeches, which the little drayman spoke,
And, speaking, got so very bold that recklessly he swore
That if we didn't leave this coast, he'd drench the place in gore.

So every Sunday he poured forth abuse of the Chinese,
On the sand-lots of the city, where are many, many fleas,
And the people of his own kind—some ignorant and low—
Yelled wildly when he shouted, "The Chinaman must go."

But, strange to say, he always calls the tramps who tread the sand
The Sons of Labor, and declares he has a horny hand.
But this can not be, he only talks, and then—
Asks money from his followers, who are not workingmen.

The men who write on newspapers, he says, are "lying slaves,"
The lawyers are all "slimy imps," the judges "thieving knaves,"
And that he'd lead a band of men to set this country free,
To drive out all the Chinamen and drown them in the sea.

And yet this man, my countrymen, the leader in this cause,
Came here, like us, to earn his bread and keep this country's laws;
Although to hear him talk, and see him thump his freckled hand,
You might suppose the Kearney tribe for years had owned this land.

Yes, he lifts his voice and hollers, calling many people fools
Of bloated bondholders, and all his followers fools,
Because perchance they don't make haste to crush the rich man's pride,
And all the golden goose's eggs with "hoodlums" divide.

Some time ago this Kearney departed for the East,
To slaughter English grammar, and swear "the lecherous beast,"
And a little "beast" named Butler, gave him counsel if he would Tell the gentle sons of honest toil that he was great and good.

But the laborers wouldn't have it, they didn't care a pin
For Butler, or for Dennis, so the "squeint-eye" didn't win;
Then Kearney branded Butler as a traitor, though he'd paid
So dearly for the music this "flannel-mouth" had made.

One day a message came to say the little cuss was bust,
That he could no longer get his board and lodgings East on trust,
That if they wanted him back again, the coin must come along,
And then he'd drive the Chinese back to Shanghai and Hong Kong.

Well, Kearney he came back again, and on the sand-lot told
The people that he'd never touched a cent of Butler's gold,
That the story was a fable that was started by his foes,
But the people who stood round him "put the finger to the nose."

For two years now he's clamored "The Chinaman must go,"
But we don't skip worth a copper, for we "moon-eyed lepers" know
That they can't get on without us, "so near and yet so far,"
Are the gentle hoodlums' "short bit" and Sam Kee's cheap cigar.

It's very strange, in spite of all these threats against our lives,
We every day call at their doors, receiving from their wives
Sheets, and shirts, and other things, to wash, for which they pay (P)
And give us work that keeps us here, though wishing us away.

The overalls that Wellock wears, and Carl Browne's broad-gauge shoes,
The slippers that the followers of Dennis Kearney use,
Are made by us in Chinatown, and now I'd like to know
How they will purchase what we make, yet cry that we must go.

Sing To does Irish washing; Ah Sam, of Jackson Street,
Sells them parsnips, carrots, cabbages, potatoes and salt meat;
They buy from us because it's cheap, yet on the lots of sand
They swear that Sing To and Ah Sam are curses in this land.

We work in people's kitchens, we cook and serve their food;
Why do they keep us if they find the Irish just as good?
They say their girls are saucy, and wasteful, and displeased,
And after all, there's nobody that suits them like Chinese.

There is a very splendid man, whose name is Colonel Bee,
Who went East, and who told the truth about "these vile Chinese,"
Then the Irish got together, to vent their wicked spite—
To hang the smiling colonel—but they broke up in a fight.

And now, my sweet Celestials, the time is drawing nigh,
When Kearney and his howling crowd themselves will have to fly,
Or else keep very quiet, for Americans, I know,
Say if they don't behave themselves—"The Irishman must go!"

[NOTE.—The piece of Oriental literature herewith presented is the work of one Sing Lee, a writer or corresponding secretary with one of the large Chinese wholesale establishments on Sacramento Street. Lee is a very intelligent Chinaman, and about the time of the publication of the celebrated Kwang Chang Ling letters became an enthusiastic admirer of the ARGONAUT, coming to the business office regularly every Saturday with his ten cents to buy the paper. Becoming thus acquainted with Sing Lee, and finding that he was not only an intelligent and well-informed Celestial, but a scholar—of the seven button, or classical degree—we suggested that he write an article on "the Chinese must go" problem, treating it in his own way, and in his own language. He promised to do so, and the first of last week walked smilingly into the editorial rooms with eleven large pages of handsome gold-bespangled paper, on which was beautifully painted the promised contribution. Of course we were much obliged—very much pleased—but would Mr. Lee remember that space was valuable, and would he kindly reduce the essay from its formidable proportions to the modest limits of a single column? Lee would, and Lee finally did, his efforts resulting—after being furnished with the exact size of the column—in filling up the entire space and putting the head on afterward, obliging us finally to saw it off, and put it in another column, in order to get the poem inside the chases. Having secured the original, the next thing was to get an intelligent and comprehensive translation. Lee furnished enough of an idea to show that the production was a metrical satire on Kearney and the sand lot. Other translators were called in, and finally, after three or four days' hard labor, and the total wrecking of the combined intellectual force of the establishment, the very free translation above given was decided upon as best representing the sentiment and spirit of the poem, if such it can be called. Those who read it in the original will be kind enough to begin at the top of the right hand column, reading down; thence to top of next column and down, and so to the interesting and thrilling end. It looks hard to read, and it is, being brim full of "wise saws and modern instances."]

埃李市党目名哩尔者野子狼心妄自尊大前为御事之夫今乃貪圖安逸每礼拜日在呀结街新衙门前沙坦地方談論華人賤其工值吩咐党羽肆其兇殘以為藏身之固並作登財之路滑語酣言以作工人魚肉舞智弄術逞祿自己真心而此等番報不分清白甘為党奴每將其驅逐華人之言猶加增于日报以佈遐邇尤可惡者又一逆賊名呼殊罽如同火炭頭伙作堅尔之後嗣常捧堅尔之陰囊又有一狀師与審事官堅尔殊罽四人旅羣狗党串同棍騙各自肥已何有盖于尔等工人也此等會党常道華人賊其工值何以尔等所穿之鞋向華人鞋店採買堅尔一家所省之衣服皆交与吳慎街華人亞祖衣崇館洗浴而所食之菜又向華人亞三採買尔等會党尚且喜其價平則各等番人何猶不然幸得末士啤狀師光明正大曾在祖家奏明党惡自當誅戮茲各皆親愛華人萬望天主教父憐憫華人各將惡虎驅逐則我花旗大華共樂昇平豈不休哉

BRODERICK'S MORAL COURAGE.

How Single-banded he Stayed a Revolution.

BY A. J. MOULDER.

Jenkins had been hung the night before—June 10, 1851—hung from the projecting eaves of the old Adobe Building, then standing on the northwest corner of the Plaza, and the whole city was in a state of suppressed excitement. The people were thoroughly roused. It was known that a Committee of Safety, comparatively few in numbers, but strong in influence, had been in session late into the night, while the masses slept—had condemned the culprit and executed him at two o'clock in the morning, and all were looking for the next move. A mass meeting was called, and held on the Plaza, June 11, 1851, but adjourned to meet the next afternoon. At the time appointed, 5 P. M., a great concourse of people had assembled in front of the portico of the Old Adobe. This ancient building, one of the relics of native California rule, was a long, one story structure, facing the east, built of adobe and roofed with tiles. It was raised upon a foundation some four or five feet high. At this altitude a wide porch, or portico, guarded by railings, about three feet high, stretched around three sides of the building. The eaves projected as far as the outer edge of the portico, forming a complete covering from the weather. The approach was by a flight of five steps, leading from the ground up to the portico, on the east. It was on the platform, at the head of these steps, that the meeting was organized, by the election of Mr. Hiram Webb, as Chairman.

Never before had so vast a throng assembled in the city—at that time containing not a sixth of its present population. Ten thousand excited men, prepared for anything, packed the space in front of the stand, and clustered upon every elevation in the neighborhood. The fence around the Plaza was black with eager spectators. After the chairman had stated the object of the meeting, Mr. Hoag appeared, and presented a series of resolutions for adoption. The preamble declared that the people had a right to change their laws whenever they became nugatory and insufficient—that under existing laws, crime had flourished, and criminals stalked unpunished through our midst; therefore, the people should resolve themselves into their original elements, return to a state of nature and commence again. To make that commencement, a series of resolutions followed, declaring that the people, in primary assembly, enacted that the crimes of grand larceny, burglary, street robbery, drugging, and arson, as well as murder, should be punished with death. An election by the people was provided for, and a committee named to fix the time and place, and appoint the officers of election in each ward, to adopt or reject the above resolution. It was also provided, that there should be at the same time an election of a people's judge and sheriff, unless the judge and sheriff under the existing system should acknowledge the supremacy of the people's new laws. The new court should have jurisdiction over all criminal cases, and every man solemnly pledged "his life, his property, and his sacred honor," to support the new laws and the new court, in opposition to the judgments under the existing system of jurisprudence. The new code and court were to be sustained by voluntary contributions. This, of course, was revolution, pure and simple. In their excited mood, the great heaving mass were prepared for anything. They were ready to vote for any measure, however extreme, that the wildest demagogue might present. The resolutions were received with a hoarse roar of approval, and were about to be put to the vote, when a disturbance occurred on the outskirts of the crowd. A compact body of about fifty men were seen forcing their way, in no gentle fashion, to the front, and at the head of them strode David C. Broderick.

After a violent struggle, he mounted the steps and stood upon the portico, facing the expectant crowd with a fixed and determined expression—every one knew him. A deep silence fell upon the multitude, for they expected that he was about to speak in support of the resolutions. He quickly disabused them, for his first words were in strong condemnation. He denounced the resolutions in most emphatic terms. A moment of silence followed, until the crowd could take in the full measure of his audacity, and then such a roar of rage and fury went up as only a wild mob can utter, followed by cries of "hang him" from every quarter.

Broderick, even at that early day, was the idol of the so-called "shoulder strikers," a class of men who had become notorious for their deeds of violence, and who, for a long time, exercised a terrorism over peaceful citizens by their reckless audacity. Broderick was with them, but not of them. He could wield their brute forces with absolute sway, and it was a compact body of these devoted adherents that had surrounded and accompanied him in his forced march to the front. There they ranged themselves around the steps, acting as a body-guard. When the cries of the mob against their chief went up, they bristled and showed their teeth like bull-dogs, turning to the right and to the left, shaking their clenched fists at the crowd, and swearing vengeance against the first man that committed an overt act of violence. So resolute a front, from so formidable a body, in a little while commanded a murmurous peace. Mr. Broderick then proceeded with his address, urging the people not to bring disgrace and civil war on the city by the passage of such revolutionary measures. He was no orator, and at that time had had no experience in public speaking. He was a man of nervous temperament, and had not yet learned the art of the skillful stumper, who ignores unpleasant interruptions, unless he can twist them to his own purposes. He was incessantly interrupted by insulting cries from the crowd. "Hang him!" burst out repeatedly from some excited auditor, and Broderick would turn furiously on the offender, and answer him back. His bull-dogs would bristle and show their teeth. He spoke for about twenty minutes, the only effect being to exasperate the crowd, who knew and hated the shoulder strikers, and to make them more fixed in their resolves. The chairman then put the resolutions to a vote:

"Those in favor of the resolutions say 'Aye!'"
"Aye," went up in a roar from ten thousand hoarse throats.

"Those opposed say 'No!'"

"No," cried the little body-guard, with a prolonged howl. It was as the squeak of a puny whistle to the roar of a steam pipe. The chair declared the "Ayes" had it; but with refreshing coolness, Mr. Broderick swore the "Noes" had it. The chair, who was a mild mannered gentleman, overcome by the vehemence of Broderick, at last consented to put the question again.

"Its of no use," said Mr. Broderick; "we'll vote it down again."

Here a scene of wild confusion ensued; a hundred furious men rushed upon Broderick, and attempted to drag him down the steps into the crowd, but he was a powerful man, and struggled fiercely. With a yell that could be heard far above the deep growl of the mob, his faithful body-guard fairly leaped over the heads of the assailants, to the rescue of their chief. They were just in time, for Broderick, borne down by weight of numbers had been bent backward over the railings, and in a moment more would have been flung to the wild beasts in the arena. His followers, now lashed to fury, dashed his assailants to the right and left. Intimidated by the savage assault, some leaped over the railings, some were pitched headlong to the ground. In a moment the portico was clear of the enemy and the little band of fifty held possession—with flashing eyes and savage mien confronting and defying ten thousand. Something like order was restored, and Broderick again took the stand, and sought to move the crowd from their purpose. He asked them in earnest tones "if they were prepared to overthrow by violence the laws and the constitution?" Cries of "Yes, yes! We're the people! We are supreme! Down with the shoulder strikers!" At length, as night approached, Mr. Broderick, tired of the profligate wrangle, intimated that it was time for all good citizens to go home.

"All in favor of adjourning say 'Aye.'" The body-guard fairly split their throats in their long cry of "Aye."

Without putting the negative, Broderick announced that the "Ayes" had it, and declared the meeting adjourned.

"Come, boys," he cried, "this meeting's adjourned."

With wild shouts and the waving of hats, the little band made a rush down the steps, striking the compact throng in front with such violence that they reeled for a moment from the shock—then opened and allowed the assailants free passage to the rear. The adjournment was a failure. In a moment the crowd closed their ranks, the chairman once more took his stand, resolutions in hand, and business recommenced.

"Come, boys," says Broderick, "we must try it again!"

Another wild rush—a moment the crowd swayed to and fro—then yielded, and once more Broderick and his followers carried the steps, and portico by assault. He seized the resolutions from the hand of the chairman, and with an audacity that was amazing, tore the paper into shreds in the very faces of the infuriated mob. The roar that followed was frightful. Hundreds nearest the stand made a rush for the audacious offender—they swarmed up the steps—seized him, and hauled him now here, now there, despite his powerful struggles. His guard, however, acting with concert of purpose, swooped down upon the disorganized assailants—"Crack—thud—thud," rained down their blows. In a moment the attack was repulsed, and the little band held the pass. Mr. Broderick, panting, and pale from the rough usage he had encountered, but with a will inflexible, again attempted to address the crowd. It was useless, however. The cries and uproar were incessant, and not a word could be heard. By this time the vast throng had been standing on their feet for nearly three hours, and night was fast closing in. Once more Broderick, under cover of the dusk, put the question to adjourn, and declared it carried.

"Now, boys, adjourn them this time, sure! Spread yourselves!"

A wild hurrah—a frantic waving of hats high overhead—a fierce rush—and the crowd gave way. The little, but compact, band wheeled and charged, now to the right, now to the left, carrying everything before them, until the masses slowly gave way, and retired from the ground, fairly worn out—beaten by the indomitable pluck of one man!

For that night's work, Mr. Broderick was to me ever after a hero. Single handed, he had averted a revolution!

I could admire the nerve, because I felt so few could imitate the moral courage that, in defense of the right, could singly face and defy a great multitude, wrought up by excitement to such a pitch of unreasoning fury that, could they have laid hands upon him, would have torn him limb from limb!

Evidently the Princess Victoria is following in the footsteps of her mother as regards the domestic training of her children. One day the imperial party started for a drive up the Salzburg, and, when quite near the summit, their carriage broke down. What was to be done? The distance was too great to allow of walking, and to send one of the carriage-horses down to Homburg for another carriage would insure a long, and, for the children, a perhaps injurious delay. However, the Prince was on the point of dispatching his messenger, when a peasant passed, driving an immense hay wagon. Instantly realizing the situation, and recognizing the imperial party, he sprang from his seat and implored them to make him the proudest and happiest farmer in all Germany by getting into his wagon and permitting him to drive them home. The royal party laughed and consented. The whole party were accommodated with seats amid the fragrant hay, and in this guise the future Emperor and Empress of Germany, with their "august offspring," as the papers call the little princes and princesses, came riding back to the swellest watering place in all Germany.

The Old Gentleman of Neglected Education asked his son, who had just brought home a prize for geography from the Apollo Academy:

"What does g-u-l-p-h mean, Jimmy?"

"Tisn't g-u-l-p-h, papa; it's g-u-l-l."

"Well, then, what does g-u-l-f mean, Jimmy?"

"I don't know."

A French writer has described a young lady as a creature that ceases to kiss gentlemen at twelve and begins again at twenty.

"Is that a funeral?" "Yes, sir." "Who was it that died?" "The man in the coffin, sir."

JOVINA.

A Legend of the San Carlos Mission.

Many legends of the Missions, in the pleasant days of old, Round the hearth in Spanish households, when evening falls, are told. Many tales of love and daring, and woman's faith, that last In the archives of those people who reverence the past.

In the cold, material present it is well to catch a glance Of those dim and mouldering pages of a country's brief romance.

One evening in December, half a century ago,
On the Mission of San Carlos fell the sunset's wintry glow.

From the belfry the Angelus was musically rung;
In the aisles the hymns were chanted in the soft Castilian tongue.

Padre Juan, with hands uplifted, the kneeling faithful blest.

Then dismissed them—and the Mission was wrapped in sleep and rest,

Up rose the moon, its soft light in tender shimmer lay

On the bosom, cypress shadowed, of Carmel's tranquil bay.

Round Point Pinos' rugged headland, by ocean breakers swept,

By the west wind gently wafted, a tall-sparred schooner crept.

And ere had ceased the rattle of her noisy anchor-chain,

At her peak streamed out her ensign, the flag of haughty Spain.

Next morning, in the Mission, her commander and the priest

Sat down in friendly converse to a hospitable feast.

Count Alfredo told his story—how his idol and his pride,

His faithful wife Jovina, but a week ago had died,

And now the hopes that filled him of name and fame were gone,

He'd lift anchor on the morrow and return to Spain alone.

He had longed to bring back tidings of this unknown northern shore,

But ambition had departed; he was stricken and heart-sore.

He would leave his little daughter with the padre till again

A larger, safer vessel should arrive from distant Spain.

Then he called the little maiden, who among the rose trees played,

And her hand within the padre's with graceful reverence laid.

The good priest kissed with tenderness the sweet upturned face,

"May the Virgin help me," said he, "I will try to fill your place."

A dozen years passed over, and the padre, old and gray,

Looks seaward from the Mission; for never since that day

The Count Alfredo left him Jovina for his ward,

Had aught that might concern the captain's fate been heard.

And she, the fairest daughter of the Mission, like the rest

Of maidens, felt love knocking for admittance at her breast.

Her tender heart was given—nay, her pure and earnest soul—

For what Spanish maid who loves well surrenders not the whole

Of her being to her lover? But the youth Jovina loved

By the good folk at the Mission was very ill approved:

Carlos Sanchez, brave and handsome, whom careful mothers said

Wandered round, guitar on shoulder, when 'twas time to be abed.

The old priest, sighing, murmured: "I am full of years and rust;

Yet a few mouths and this chancel will open for my dust.

"And Jovina—who can fathom a youthful maiden's mind

Whose fancies are as various and fickle as the wind!

"I have told her of her father; I have taught her all I could

Of the fortitude and bearing that belong to noble blood.

"And this Sanchez—but she loves him." "Padre mio!" at his side

Kneels Jovina. "Ah, my daughter, so soon to be a bride,

"Blessings on you, mi chiquita, may your future be as bright

As yon mellow sun now bathing this dark hair in his light."

Christmas eve—the bells are ringing, and the mission maids are gay

In mantles and mantillas for Jovina's wedding day.

It lacked an hour of sunset when on the ocean's rim

The white sails of a vessel loomed indistinct and dim.

Another hour, a great ship her anchor drops, and flies

The Spanish ensign, greeted from the shore by many wondering eyes.

Padre Juan stoops on the wet sands; the first that leaps to land

Rushes fast toward him, and grasps his outstretched hand.

"My daughter?" "She is yonder," said the padre, with troubled face.

And the Count strides toward the Mission in fierce, impatient haste.

The news has traveled quickly, and the Mission maidens grieve:

Jovina and her lover will not wed this Christmas eve.

For the bride has kissed the bridegroom she will never see again,

And sleeps aboard the vessel that will carry her to Spain.

The night is dark and stormy, and the anchor watchmen creep

'Neath the fore-castle for shelter, where all their comrades sleep.

The plash of oars they bear not, so loud the storm's wild wail,

Nor see the muffled form now bending o'er the rail.

They only hear from Pinos the breakers on the strand,

Nor see the tossed and spray-lashed skiff that struggles toward the land.

Christmas day—the sun dispelling the early morning haze

Gleams through the fringing pine trees; its broad and golden rays

Rest on the old church belfry, then mercifully fall

On the long black tresses—veiling the body like a pall—

Of a woman, drowned, disfigured, and cast up by the tide,

And clad in wedding garments, for death had claimed a bride.

Nor was the bridegroom wanting, for farther down the shore

Lay Sanchez in his death-clasp grasping still a broken oar.

And the Mission mourned for them, and still old gossips say

The roses bloom the whole year round above their graves to-day.

OAKLAND, December 19, 1878. DANIEL O'CONNELL.

At Parting.

Some day—some day of days, when you have passed

Quite from the circle of my life, to lands

Where palpitant waters throb on silver sands,

Where you have vanished as a shadow cast

Waveward from flying pennons on some mast—

I may reach forward to the time which stands

Rock-like, immutable before my hands

Outstretched in vain to clasp yours at the last.

No presage have I—to relieve your pain—

That I shall ever need you at my side;

No hope I offer that would not be vain,

No solace that I would not have denied.

O friend, I know we shall not meet again

When we are parted by this fluctuant tide.

NORTH COLUMBIA, December, 1878. MAY N. HAWLEY.

Oh, how rapidly develop,
From mere fugitive sensations,
Passions that are fierce and bound!
Tendrest associations!

HUALAPI.

By J. W. Gally, author of "Big Jack Small."

In a primitive quartz-mining town situated to the eastward of the main range of the Sierra Nevada, in North America, there is great neighborliness by reason of the scarcity of water and the narrowness of the glen, or cañon, in which the houses are situated. Water is a great democrat, and willing to enter into anybody that is dry and absorbent without distinction of person; but fresh water in the Great Salt Lake Basin is mostly found in the arid, rough, stony gorges of the mountains, and there oftenest in a single spring to each gorge; and thus by reason of the innocent fluid the inhabitants are persuaded, while by the positive commanding topography they are forced, to come together.

The nearly naked rock-surface of the more or less perpendicular mountains, rising on two and sometimes three sides, makes a sort of natural Coliseum in which the various noises and voices of mining industry are echoed about, until, wasted by the weakness of repetition, they languish into silence.

Going from the neighborhood of the spring by a sort of irregular radiation are certain roads and trails, which climb the stony soilless surface of the hills, zigging here and zagging there into and out of the time-worn gutters which wrinkle the solid faces into holding places, where the route may cling and climb toward the "dump," or pile of waste earth, that newly shines among its weather-beaten surroundings, as a landmark to lead the inquiring eye in its search after the cause of this invasion of Nature's most exclusive solitudes.

In this sort of a mining town you may expect to find silver more than gold, but need not expect to find either silver or gold in such form or colors as your uneducated eyes are accustomed to, from contemplation of your spoons, watches, and metal ornaments. The silver and any other accompanying metal is in a state of ore, which may be green, black, blue, yellow, or a "pinco" combination of all these.

When you get "a job"—why should a permit to labor be called "a job"?—up at and down in one of the openings in the hill where you see the dump of new earth I have pointed out, you take a tin-pail of lunch in your hand and climb one of those trails I have told you of till you get to the shaft or mouth of the mine, at which last place you step into a bucket, if the shaft is perpendicular, or into a car if it is an incline, and, going down into the darkness, you work eight hours, be it in the day-time or in the night-time. At the end of this eight hours, you are relieved by another gang of men who take your place for eight other hours, and so the work goes on without pause, day or night, Sunday, holiday, or any other day. As you go up the trail, lunch-pail in hand, if your "shift" comes on in daylight, you can look down upon the town and the town can look up at you, until, like a prairie-dog, contemplating a railway train, you turn tail and pop into the hole in the hill; or, if you go along the trail at night-time the town looks up at you and winks its hundred red eyes as much as to say, "Hurry down again, old boy, and we'll have another drink." So, as you will see, everything in this kind of mining town, animate or inanimate, is on a sociable or neighborly basis.

If there is a good joke or a bad accident at one end of this town of ours we know it immediately at the other end, and thus have instant opportunity to laugh or look sad as the case may require. Our sociability is increased and made potential by the fact that the mines do not change gangs—or shifts—at precisely the same hour day or night, but are always changing at their appointed times respectively; so that at all hours many men are liable to be in the streets, saloons, etc. Far into the night the restaurant man, with his table spread and his red broiling coals sleeping under their ashen coats, nods in his chair, with napkin over his arm, and, like an anxious housewife, waits and waits for the crunching footfalls of the heavy boots to thud into supper—while the saloon man over the way worries with the late "bum," who essays to sing him the mystified remnant of a song ancient the "Beautiful Maids of Ostraly," as he keeps watch for the men who deem it necessary to take stimulating spirits internally, previous to eating or falling asleep.

So that altogether, one way or another, in our town there is something not strictly private going forward, or perhaps is going backward, but, at all events, there is something going.

In the day-time once, about noon, I was in the office with my lawyer, adjusting some legal papers, when a pervasive shout, mingled with explosive laughter, attracted my attention.

"What's that?" I inquired of the legal man, having reference to the noise outside.

"The boys have got something up. We'll go out and see in a minute, as soon as I file this paper." By the term

"boys" my legal light referred to such of the able-bodied miners and other stalwart persons as were above ground and abroad "all on a summer's day."

There was but one street in the town, and it occupied the evenest part of the sole of the cañon with a very perceptible up-grade. In this street was a crowd of various men, of various weights and sizes, costumed more or less elaborately, with coats, and without coats. No women or children, but here and there an Indian, male or female. The saloon man, with elaborately done hair and immaculately white shirt sleeves tucked up under elastic bands or garters; the miner, with slouch hat, woolen shirt, and pants not stuffed into his boots; the blacksmith, with apron and hat on; the shoemaker, with apron on and hat off; the butcher, blooming in white all over except as to his head, his feet, and the middle of his back; the bare-headed merchant, with a Faber pencil behind his ear, and the baker with a high, puffy, white cap on his head; to say nothing of the cold-looking, well-clad gambler, and other characters—watching Sam Crain's dog.

Sam Crain's dog was a black dog, mostly shepherd, though he may have combined a variety of choice breeds, but he was not a very big dog, and he had a sharp nose, long hair, and a drooping bushy tail—a sort of heavily fringed tail—that saved itself from dragging on the ground in relaxed or careless moments by curving gently upward just before it came to a point. I wish that my reader would regard this dog's tail, because a tail is to a dog what a nose is to a man's face—a very prominent and indicative feature—and the particular kind of tail that went about with Sam Crain's dog was what you might call Roman tail, the same as you say Roman nose, and indicates great powers of mind and executive ability. I hope I may not forget to say that this dog, which as I have before said belonged to Sam Crain, had a yellow or tan spot, about as big as $2.50 in silver (remonetized) in the centre of his breast—a sort of yellow shirt-bosom peeping out from under a black coat and silk cravat; and also an exceedingly delicate tipping of white in the end of his tail, just enough white to make him out a dog of three colors (when you want a good dog, or cat, always get one of three colors), and his Christian name was CARLO.

When we arrived in the street there was, in addition to the crowd of citizens on foot, a man on horseback riding about in an aimless sort of manner—a limber, half-drunk kind of a ride—jingling the great Spanish spurs at his heels and swinging the end of a riata around and above his head while he shouted out, "I can beat anything that wears hair, from a single jump-up to a half mile—honest measure. For coin I can, and money talks!" swaying about on his horse and striking his pocket till the gold pieces chinked audibly under the blow.

"For how much money can ye beat my dog a hundred and fifty yards, up this street?"

"Yer dog?"

"Yes, my dog."

"Where is yer dog?"

"He's right yur. Yur, Carlo, come yur."

"What, beat that collie? That dern sharp-nosed, yaller-eyed, trundle-tail purp—I can beat him for his weight in coin!"

"Wot with?"

"With this identical broncho that's now between my legs!"

"I've got a twenty that says ye can't beat Carlo for a hundred'n fifty yards, with no hoss ye ever owned, er ar' goin' to own; and money talks!"

"Put up, or shet up!" said the man on the horse, drawing a twenty-dollar gold piece from his pataloons pocket.

"Up she goes!" said Sam Crain, drawing a similar piece from the same style of pocket.

Now there was instantly a taking of sides—some for horse, others for dog—and clamor about who were to hold stakes, also about who were to judge of the starting and who other of the outcome. It was finally agreed that the chilly-looking gambler should take his hands out of his trowsers pockets long enough to take in the money and hold it for stakes.

"As for judgin' the start, ye don't need nary judge," said Sam; "for I'll guarantee that Carlo don't start till the hoss does; but I'm 'greeable for a judge, ef ye want him."

After a season of vehemently profane gesticulatory discussion, it was ordered that the blacksmith and the shoemaker should wear both hats and aprons, and, so attired, should measure off the ground, set the scores and judge the outcome; while the "butch," with his white apron on, should umpire the start.

"Now," said Sam, "I want to walk my dog once over the course and have some confidential remarks with him. Yur, Carlo, come yur."

Carlo, who had sat around among the crowd changing his seat as often as his master, in the heat of the discussion, faced about from one point to the other—Carlo arose at his master's bidding, bearing with him the serious air and smileless countenance of the true humorist, and, walking sedately with drooping tail by the side of his master, passed out of the crowd down the street some paces in the rear of the blacksmith, the shoemaker, and the butcher; which trio of honest sons of toil were going down to set the starting-score and measure off the ground.

"Now, Carlo," said Mr. Crain, in his most solemn and paternal manner, "don't ye go back on me. This is business, old boy, and means money. D'ye und'stan' me, Carlo, hey?" Carlo slowly and quietly wagged his tail, looked up the street after the men measured off the distance, and lay down, as imperturbably as a Chinaman, with his fore paws across the newly made starting-score; while Mr. Crain proceeded with the measuring party back toward the outcome, and the butcher looked about for something to sit down on until business should begin.

"Who is that feller on the hoss?" asked the baker of the saloon man.

"Dambino," answered the saloonist.

"Dig & Wiggles's vaquero, 'n a gay boy. Up for anything he is," remarked the clerk to the crowd in general.

"All ready!" shouted the shoemaker. "Make yer bets, boys; the game is made. Put up yer money and stop chinin'!"

"Yur, Sam, wer's that dog?" asked the blacksmith.

"He's all right. Ef ye don't find him on time I'll put up twenty more for forfeit."

"You bet he's all right," said the saloonist, pointing down the street. "Look at him yender at the start, waiting for business. Don't you see him? Looks like a peck 'n half o' charcoal spilled off 'n a wagon."

"Go ahead, Hualapi, with yer hoss; the little dorg's a waitin' for ye!" cried another horseman, who by this time had arrived on the ground.

"Is his name Hualapi?" queried the saloon man, with emphasis on the "his."

"No, don't reckon 'tis his name, but the boys call him Hualapi;" and he pronounced the word as though it were spelled Wollop-eye.

Swinging the coils of his riata about the flanks of his mustang, Hualapi tore away down the street, flinging the gravel from under his horse's feet. As he passed by the butcher and across the starting-score, Carlo lay perfectly still and flattened his nose between his fore legs, merely looking askance out of the corner of his brown eye toward the butcher, as much as to say, "Butch, there is no nonsense about me!"

Hualapi wheeled about, and as he came back to the score on a full run his horse's head this time pointed toward the outcome, the dog raised himself slowly to his feet, and the butcher yelled at the top of his voice, "Go!"

And they went, not standing on the order of their going, as one William Shakespeare saith it, but each getting up and dusting to the end of his ability. It was a brief race, and a close one, amid much shouting, some heavy swearing, and a great deal of laughter.

"All quiet there, you fellows! Silence in Court!" shouted the Deputy-Sheriff—"tell me yhear who wins."

"Five dollars on the dog," shouted somebody.

"Give ye two per cent.—double the bet—and take it!" ejaculated another.

"Two per hell! Talk English!" retorted the five-dollar man.

"We decide," roared the blacksmith, as chairman of the judicial committee, "that the dog wins by a length."

"What sort o' length—hoss or dog?" asked somebody.

"Dog length," responded the smith; "that 'er is, the dog was one dog's length ahead of the hoss, at the outcome."

"Bullee for the dog!" squeaked a wizen-faced boy.

The coin was duly paid over to Mr. Samuel Crain, whereupon that hombre invited the horseman yclept Hualapi, and everybody else, to come in and drink.

During all the proceedings, while at the starting-score, Carlo had kept close to his master, watching his face as keenly as a Californian watches a barometer through a dry winter; but now, when Sam went hailing away to the saloon in the midst of a crowd, the sagacious animal knew by experience the probable result, and with head and tail drooping started quietly but resolutely down the road to his master's wagon and camp. For be it known, though I have not herein before so stated, Mr. Crain was what they, over in the Great American Desert, call a "bull-puncher"—the dictionary slang for which is, ox-driver.

There was much loud talking and praise of Sam's dog while the drinking was in progress.

"Whe'd ye git sich a d—dog?" asked Hualapi.

"I didn't git him—he got me. I was a drivin' along one day on the desert from Stockton station to Ragtown, and by the tracks on the road and all about there I should say there must a' been as many as five thousand sheep ahead o' me; I didn't see no sheep, but as I was walking slow along with the team something cold come up behind me and touched me on the hand. I jumped round to see what it was, and there was a little black dog, about half-growned, flattenin' hisself down in the dust, waggin' his tail, and lookin' up at me with tears in his eyes."

"Pore little purp," sez I, and picked him up as if he were a little black lamb, and walked along with him in my arms. He began a lickin' his paws and then I see he was foot-sore with traveling and cactus thorns, so I put him in the wagon on my blankets and drove along. Two days after that I met the sheep man at Acc Cañon's, and I asked him if he'd lost any pup, and, sez he, 'Yes, but ye may hev him if you've got him.' Well, I had him ye know, or he had me. That's how I come by Carlo."

"Where is the d—dog?" inquired a sympathetic listener, looking about the saloon floor to find him.

"Oh, you needn't look for Carlo in no saloon! He's too high-toned for that!" said Sam.

"He is, hey! Yes, you have been lickin' him when you was drinkin'," said the sympathetic man.

"No, I swear I never laid a cross finger on that dog in my life. He's slep with me, on the road and off the road, for goin' on four years, an' I never even talked cross to him half a dozen times. In this country, ye know a man kin make much of a good dog, because there is no fleas yer."

"Well, where is he now?"

"Gone down to camp," rasped the wizen-faced youth. "I wissced to him, and butch offered him meat, but he just waltzed off down the road."

"Well, you see, he's a bettin' with himself that I'll get drunk afore this is over," said Sam.

"Yes, 'n he's got a good thing. I'll go him halves on it," said the gambler.

"Oh, well now! I don't get drunk so derned often, Mart, do I?"

"The dog says you do."

"No, he don't," answered Sam. "Taint my drunks he's down on—it's the whiskey. He despises whiskey."

"Sensible dog," growled the gambler.

"You bet he is! You see, I'll tell you how it is. Once when Carlo was about a year old Big Burroughs an' me was teaming together, and a' course camping out. Well, one night Big, he come to camp half-light, with one o' these yer blue gallon-kegs full of whiskey, and we both got tight; and, Big, he wanted to make Carlo drink, and then kicked him because he bit at him when Big tried to drench him."

As soon as Big kicked my dog I kicked Big; and at it we went, down into the camp-fire and every way; and Big Burroughs would a put a head on me—'cause you see I'm a light weight—if Carlo hadn't bit a purty fair supper of 'round steak' out of him. Ever since that Carlo don't go a cent on saloons, nor drinks. He won't come nigh me when I'm drunk, night nor day, unless somebody jumps me; and when I ain't drunk he won't go away from me a minnit, 'less I send him."

"Sam, will me that dog when you die, won't you?" said Hualapi.

"Don't know," answered Mr. Crain. "Can't say what I'll do when I'm dead; but we'll have something more to drink at present. Set 'em up, you handsome cuss with the purty back hair! Boys what'll it be?"

Thus the drinking bout went forward, until, from satiety on the part of some, and business engagements on the part of others, the crowd was reduced to Mr. Crain, Mr. Hualapi, and a few shameless, hardened hangers-on—the latter doing faithful and efficient duty every time either of the former put up the money for more stimulants.

Hour by hour the after part of the day wore away, and as the long evening shadow began to paint one hill against the canvas of another, our two racing worthies came weaving out of the saloon, arm in arm, with hats cocked over noses, each protesting that the other was the "best feller, and the d—dest whitest man in the mountains."

Unhitching the Hualapi horse from the post in front of the saloon, where he had stood during the greater part of the afternoon dreaming of far-off fields and pastures green, they wended or wobbled their way down the middle of the road, with the disconsolate horse leading in the rear, it being the muddled intention of Mr. Crain to offer to Mr. Hualapi the hospitality of Mr. Crain's camp and a share of his bed, blankets, board, and a feed of hay to his horse, at the rear of the wagons.

It has long been presumed that they reached the wagons in a meandering way about sunset, and, scorning so unimportant a matter as supper, tied the horse, unrolled the bed, and lay down to a drunken sleep.

That night about midnight, Hualapi was found by two travelers, far down the road, beyond the camp, lying with his head in a pool of blood and a great wound in his skull—dead.

The travelers proceeding up to town reported their finding, which report caused a party toward daylight to arrive at the place in the road as designated by the travelers. This party found the stain of the blood, the marks of men's feet as if struggling, and the tracks of a medium-sized dog in the dust.

Instantly the mind of each member of the searching party worked backward over the events of the preceding day, and each by his own process arrived at—Sam Crain. The horse of Hualapi tied to Sam's wagon increased the suspicion; while finding himself sound asleep with his now watchful, growling dog at his feet, only intensified the suspicion as to his crime and heartlessness.

"Sam! Hi, Sam! Wake up and tell us where Hualapi is. We want him," said one of the party, as they all stood about the out-door bed of the sleeping teamster.

"Humph?" grunted Sam, boring his knuckles into his boozey eyes against the shock of the now open daylight.

"Yes! Never mind humphin' and boring your eyes. Where's Hualapi?"

"Hualapi? Yur he is in bed with me," answered Sam, looking over his shoulder as he rested on his elbow in the bed. "Yes, we—why, hell! where is he? Carlo, you wasn't drunk, where's Hualapi?" The dog sat up on his haunches and looked seriously down the road.

"Get up, Sam, and come up to town. Hualapi's dead. We want you to tell the magistrate who killed him."

"Killed him!" exclaimed Sam, jumping up. "Killed him! Boys, yer joshin' a feller. Why, there's his boss tied to my wagon. He must be somewhere 'round."

"Well, you get your hat and come along with us—may be you can find him for the Court."

CHAPTER II.

Not every one in this world knows that there are regions of country, on the planet they have the honor to inhabit, where a bed out under the open sky is the usual refreshing and pleasant night-lodging of many human inhabitants. The pilgrim to Palestine thinks he is quite an adventurer when he sleeps in a guarded tent and wakes in the night to listen to the laughing howl of the same family of jackals which served the sportive Samson in his pyrotechnic assault upon the cereals of his neighbors; but if this pilgrim is a pious Anglo-American, it is pretty safe to say, unless he is an "innocent abroad," that he does not realize the amount of out-door sleeping there is to be enjoyed in his own United States. Safe to say that he does not know where the Holy Land is in the United States; the land where all the world seems either to be descending into or rising out of an alkali flat, or else to be crossing a mountain; where the whole earth is so thirsty it swallows all the rivers, and the soil is so dry that neither fog nor dew softens the sun at morn nor the moon at night; where no sweet song-bird carols to the dawn, and only the wide wing of the raven casts its black shadow in silent motion gliding o'er the plain at noon. A land of drought, of sinking Jordans and Dead Seas. A land without a history, or else so old that Nature has forgotten and wiped out whatever marks historic creatures left. A land so gray and dry, so wrinkled and so deaf, that silence sits enthroned among the hills with her sad finger on her pallid lips, listening—listening—listening for the unreturning feet that carried here and there the giants of the darkness that has been. A land of wandering pasturage for the herds—where wells are wealth, and springs are few and far—without a record.

At present it is the land of a peculiar people—they are tramps, but industrious tramps.

They tramp not by twos and by threes only, but by towns, counties, cities and states. They advance upon the silence of the wilderness and the echo of industry jingles aloft upon the ancient air. They tear open the bosom of the rock-ribbed hill to find the medals of commerce—and finding them, they stamp them with a winsome woman on one side and a cruel old rooster on the other. They sleep out under the sky, while the coyote on noiseless feet keeps watch, with his wild eyes peering from the outer darkness; they snore in the ear of the rattle-snake till the frightened reptile glides away into the chilly night, forgetting to ring the bell in his back-action; they lie down with the deadly tarantula and sleep with the stinging scorpion. And they are not afraid.

To come upon a camp in the morning—the camp of a solitary man who drives a team—in the silverland, is to find two or three or more heavy wagons strung together by strong iron chains, and from the largest and most forward wagon a line of yokes and chains, like a gigantic rosary, lying among the sage-brush in the dust, just as though the cattle had dropped out of line into some magical trap and left their gearing in place. Beside some wheel of one of the wagons is the bed of the camper; and not far from his bed his fire or the remains of it, surrounded by his kitchen utensils. Why does he not sleep in the wagon secure from reptiles and "varmints?" Because the dry ground is warmer in the after part of the always chilly night, and he knows it. Why does he not sleep under the wagon, so that if the oxen come they will not tramp on him? Because he knows that no work-ox is going to be caught near his own working place so long as food can be found elsewhere, and because he belongs to a peculiar people who are always ready for battle, and the under side of a wagon is a poor place to get out of bed in a hurry, and battles generally begin in a hurry.

Under about such circumstances as these they found Sam Crain asleep in the early morning, with his black dog lying at his feet, and they awoke him to charge him with murder.

Sam Crain a murderer! Nobody who ever looked square into the laughing twinkle of his honest eyes would believe, without heavy testimony, that Sam Crain would feloniously take the life of a fellow-man.

But then the circumstances! Yes, the circumstances were against him; he was the last man seen with the deceased; he knew the deceased had money; they were both intoxicated when they left town together; the horse of the deceased in Sam's possession, etc., etc.

"Well, boys!" said Sam, "this is mighty rough on a feller. I've been waiting here now for five days for the mule teams to come in with my load, and I've take me to jail for a murderer, I'll lose my load an' that'll break me."

"Tis rough, Sam, but the way things looks we've got to take you."

"All right! I'm a comin' soon's I roll up my bed an' put my traps together. An' that hoss," added Sam, as he fussed about, throwing his loose property upon the wagons; "somethin'll hev to be done with him—nothin' more yur for him to eat, an' no water."

"We'll take him to Court, too," said one of the men moving over and untying the broncho.

"No! Let him be there!" said another. "Let the Court send for him—taint far to town. He's better evidence tied where he is than anything we can say."

"Ain't you rather anxious about evidence?" asked Sam, turning upon the last speaker abruptly.

"Guess not!" coolly answered the man addressed. "I want facts, that's all I want—and facts at first hands is always best for all hands."

"All right; I'm ready. Go ahead with yer old murder case! We may be happy yet!" rejoined Sam, cheerfully.

The little party passed by a few strides out of the brush into the road and away deliberately toward town, talking, chewing tobacco, and gesticulating, Carlo seriously, if not sadly, following close in the rear.

The town was awake; in fact, part of it was met on the road down to the scene of the murder.

"Come in, boys!" said Sam, as they neared the saloon of yesterday's drunk. "Come in! 'Taint every man that kin get accused an' rested for murder. I'm gettin' to be a distinguish' cuss, 'n I want to treat on it; if" added he, as they stepped up to the bar, "if Dan'll trust a murderin' midnight 'sassin'."

"Have you been killing some people, Sam?" asked the saloon man, in a yawning, sleepy way, as he placed the required tumblers on the board.

"That's what they tell me," answered Sam.

"About how many did you get away with?"

"Well, only one's fer as heered from, but the returns haint all in yet. 'F I killed anybody, I didn't stop at one man—such a desput cuss 's I am," and Sam smiled, as he made the ferocious remark, adding after drinking the cocktail: "Dan, put him on the slate to remember me by. I panned you out all I had about me yesterday. Now, boys, take a feller to breakfast and then—to Court, me noble lords, to Court!" and he strode out into the street like the gloomy king in a high tragedy.

Sam Crain was a small man with no waste material about him, not even in the matter of hair, for this tasteful natural covering was so thin at the top of his forehead as to amount almost to baldness, giving to his face, when his hat was off, an unusually high up and wide open countenance. A phrenologist would say that his two controlling bumps were conscientiousness and humor, for his head bulged out between the eye and ear on either side, and this, with a good heavy back head, gave base to a dome composed mainly of suavity, firmness, and conscientiousness; in other words, he had a good hard head for homely fun or honest business. He had rather small, twinkling, blue eyes, fair hair, and no beard save a meagre moustache; a nose something the shape of the best class of Indian nose, but a flexible, lively sort of nose—a nose that seemed to enjoy itself in its own way in the play of human emotions which gave great expression to Sam's eyes and mouth. In short he was what the Missourians call a "pearl little cuss."

The information of the prosecuting witness had been filed, charging Samuel Crain with the "commission thereof," etc., etc.

"What have you to say to this charge, Mr. Crain?" queried the J. P.

"It's a charge of murder—aint it, Judge?" asked Sam.

"Yes, a very serious charge, perhaps the most serious that man can bring against man. You will understand," added the Judge, "that you are not compelled to make any statement, nor are you required to take oath as a witness; but you may do both, or either, or neither, as you may elect."

"Well, the meanin' of it all is did I, or did I not, kill a feller called Hualapi, what was a spreein' with me yesterday?"

"Yes."

"Well, that's where you've got me! I won't swear I didn't kill him, nor I won't swear 'at I did. I'd like to see his dead body before I'll believe that anybody killed him."

The testimony here taken this morning is strongly to the effect that his lifeless body was found, after midnight last night, in the public road, near this town, with the skull crushed. Its removal since then, by parties unknown to this Court, does not lessen the suspicion that surrounds you. Any explanation which you can make tending to remove such suspicion I need not say will be promptly taken into consideration by the Court."

"Well, I'm a thousand times obliged to you, Judge, but I swear I dunno what to say. I don't recollect killin' anybody, or wantin' to kill anyone. 'Pears to me I was in a durned good humor last night. Wasn't I, boys?" and Sam looked around the room on the crowd which nodded silent assent to his query. "An' if I'd wanted to kill any man it wouldn't 'a been Hualapi, for I was just dead struck after that young feller; an' the last thing I remember thinkin' last night, after we was both safe in bed, was that we'd had a jolly old time, lots o' fun, an' no row nor nobody hurt. Then I went to sleep an' don't remember knowin', hearin', or seein' anythin' till the boys hustled me out early this morning. That's all, so help me God, Judge, that I know about it."

"Were you intoxicated and quarreling during the day yesterday?" asked his Honor.

"Yes, Judge, I was intoxicated, but not quarreling, as far as I recollect."

"Can you remember what you do and say during a spree, after you become sober?"

"Sometimes—well, generally I can; but there has been once or twice that I could not. That's a fact, Judge."

Then there was silence for a few minutes while the J. P. wrote out some notes for his own information.

"Is that all you have to say about the matter?"

"Yes, Judge," said Sam.

"You cannot think of anything else tending to throw light upon the case?"

"No, sir!" and Sam turned his hat rim about in his hands and smiled upon the boys.

Then there was a long silence while the J. P. wrote diligently, off and on looking into his law books.

"I'll read the substance of your statement to you that you may correct or amend it if you desire."

Sam listened attentively to the reading, remarking at the conclusion:

"Kerrect!"

"Do you wish to add anything?"

"Nothing."

"Please sign it."

Sam signed it with a slow scraping pen.

Then there was a longer silence, in which the Judge wrinkled his brow, scratched his head, and consulted divers pages in his books.

"Mr. Crain," said the Judge.

"Sir," responded Sam.

"If what our law calls the corpus delicti—ahem!—was within the purview of our Court, I should feel bound to commit you without recourse, and I am not perfectly certain that it is not my duty to so commit you as it is; but, as there is room for doubt that a murder has been committed, though a strong probability points that way, I take it upon myself as a matter of common sense and average justice, considering that our public jail is not a wholesome place, and that the county is poor, to bind you over to the District Court in the sum of one thousand dollars gold coin of the United States. Are you able and willing to give such bond?"

"I'm willin', Judge, an' if you'll let me out o' here till I can rustle round I think I'm able."

"I'll go on his bond!"

"I, too."

"Dot's me, too!" said "butch."

Sam had arisen to his feet to make his request about rustling round; stood looking from one to the other, as they volunteered to go upon his bond, then the tears coming into his blue eyes, he said:

"Boys, by—"—but he sat down with his face buried in his soft hat in his hands, and left his profane sentence unfinished; while the dog Carlo came forward and laid his black head on his master's knees.

The parties thereto being all present the legal formula of fixing the bond was soon gone through with; that is to say, comparatively soon, for the reason that J. P.s, though often of sound judgment, great patience, and good intentions, are seldom "lightning strikers" with the pen.

Previous to adjournment, it occurred to Sam Crain to ask the Justice:

"About what time will this Gran' Jury be around, Judge?"

"At the Fall term of the Court; that is, in the latter part of September, and it is now the earlier part of August," answered the J. P.

Then the Court adjourned, and Sam was numerously congratulated upon not having to go to jail.

"Yes," he responded, "I'm glad the old man didn't lock me up; 'cause now I can make my trip down with the load, get my freight money, ye know, leave the bulls down there, and come back on a hoss in time to do what the Gran' Jury says. But I say," he added, "does any of you fellers know how it is? Does a feller in my fix have to go in before them Gran' Juries, or do they come an' set on him like a Karren-er's Jury on a dead man?"

"Where's Rattler?" queried a bystander. "Rattler ort to know, he's been there."

"Hi, Rattler!" Sam called out.

"What is it?" responded the person addressed. The question was put to him, and he continued: "I dunno how it is when ye're on to bail. I never got no bail in mine; but when ye're in jail, if the Grand Jury send fer yer, just send for yer lawyer an' ast him. Ef he posts ye up and sez go, you go—ef he sez fer ye not to go, yer don't."

"That's the pint! Why didn't I think of it afore? A lawyer's what I want now. Come on, Carlo, let us go up-town an' see old man Damas. So long, boys! If I don't see some of ye afore hangin' time, come and give me a good send-off. I'll go like a little man, you bet yer life!" And with his faithful, silent follower he wended his way to the lawyer's office.

Sam's case was discussed throughout the camp all the remainder of that day, and more or less for many days; most of folks holding him innocent on his generally known character for kindheartedness and frontier amiability; but there was still a quasi-logical, stubborn minority, as there ever is in any case, who pointed to the circumstances, assumed the guilt, and wisely censured the Justice of the Peace for admitting him to bail; one of the minority going so far as to declare, with a knowing and defiant sneer:

"Yes, that's mighty smooth, lettin' him go on a thousand dollars! He'll just make his trip, get his freight money, sell that bull-team, make his sureties safe, an' get out! An' he's a damned fool if he don't."

[CONTINUED IN NEXT NUMBER.]

A CHRISTMAS PLAY FOR CHILDREN.

By J. F. Clark.

CAST OF CHARACTERS.

MRS. ANITA PEERLESS, a young widow.
MR. ALONZO BACON, a young bachelor in love with the young widow.
GEORGE PEERLESS, five years old, 1 child of Mrs. PEERLESS.
MAMIE PEERLESS, three years old, 1 child of Mrs. PEERLESS.
MRS. WINSTANLEY, mother of Mrs. PEERLESS.
VIOLET WINSTANLEY, her sister.
STANLEY WINSTANLEY, her brother.

Enter MAMIE, who speaks the prologue:

We're going to have a little play,
Just to amuse our friends.
We hope you will not go away
Until the acting ends.

ACT I.—SCENE I.—Enter MRS. WINSTANLEY, disguised as a gypsy.

MRS. W. I've waited for this chance for many a day;
It's come at last—I'll carry her away.
[Exit Mrs. W., carrying MAMIE.
MAMIE [screaming]. Mamma, mamma.

[Enter ANITA PEERLESS.]

ANITA. I thought I heard my Mamie scream;
Perhaps I only had a dream.
Upon my couch where I was napping,
I fancied there was some one slapping
Poor little Mamie; so I came
To comfort her. It is a shame.

[Enter ALONZO.]

ALONZO. Madam, you seem in great distress.
ANITA. I thought I heard my Mamie crying.
ALONZO. Madam, there is no use denying That just as I was passing by
I thought I heard your Mamie cry,
And said there's something wrong, I fear.
That is the reason why I'm here.
ANITA. 'Tis sad to be a widow. Every trouble
Comes on me now; it seems to double
All my cares. I shall go wild.
ALONZO. No, don't, for I will find the child,
Or lose my fortune and my life—
[Aside] A hundred times to win her for my wife.
ANITA. Where can my Mamie be?
ALONZO. Madam, wait here—I'll go and see.
[Exit ALONZO.]

ANITA. Some gypsies passed along the way.
I saw them early in the day.
And one tall hag with visage wild
Cast longing eyes upon my child.
She's gone and left no trace behind her.
Oh, how I hope that he will find her.

SCENE II.—Enter MRS. W., VIOLET W., and STANLEY W., all disguised as gypsies, leading MAMIE.

MRS. W. I've got her now, the little queen.
A pretty time I guess there's been
Up at the Hall. What fuss and bother!
The servants each will blame the other;
I'm really sorry for her mother.

VIOLET. If that is so, then tell us, pray,
Why did you bring the child away?
STANLEY. If you feel sorry for Anita,
This is a funny way to treat her.

MRS. W. It may be so, but she will find
That we have not been so unkind
As may to her at first appear.

STANLEY. Mamie's tired. Poor little dear!
VIOLET. They say Anita's got a beau,
And this is what I wish to know:
Who is the man who wants to win her?
Most likely some old hoary sinner.

STANLEY. I'll bet it is some learned scholar.
VIOLET. Or a smart knave without a dollar.
MRS. W. My children, pray you, cease your gabble;
It is at most but idle babble.

But, hush! we must no longer stay—
I hear some footsteps. Up! away!

[Exit all.]

SCENE III.—Enter ANITA, leading GEORGE.

ANITA. Where did you see your sister last?
GEORGE. Out in the garden, running fast
After her ball, which on the ground
She kept on rolling round and round.

ANITA. When was it?
GEORGE. Half an hour ago.

ANITA. Where is she now?
GEORGE. I do not know.

ANITA. O dear! O dear! what shall I do?
O Mamie, Mamie, if I knew
Where I could find you, I would fly.

GEORGE. O mamma, dear, now don't you cry.
ANITA. Why don't Alonzo come to me?
He told me he would go and see

If he could not my Mamie find.
He does not come—it is unkind.
I've vowed I would not have him off;
But now, in this my great distress,
I wish that he were here.

[Enter ALONZO.] Madam, I am here.
ANITA. I did not know, sir, you were near.
Pray tell me, have you Mamie found?

ALONZO. Nay, madam; I have searched around
And offered all rewards I'd handy—
Two bits, a knife, a pound of candy.

I've looked in every nook and corner,
Thinking she might, like young Jack Horner,
Be sucking at a sugar-plum.

ANITA. Is it to jest with me you come
At such an hour? I'm broken-hearted.

Mamie's vanished—lost—departed,
O cruel, cruel, cruel man.

ALONZO. Indeed I'll find her if I can.

ANITA. Why don't you find her—bring her here?
Oh, that I could once more behold her,
And to my broken heart enfold her,
I'd give the world—I'll give my heart
To any man—

ALONZO. Oh, here's a start—

ANITA. Who brings my Mamie back to me.
ALONZO. Then I shall have it—you will see.
I've loved you well for several years,
And now your eyes are wet with tears.

My heart is—

ANITA. I am going wild!

Don't talk to me; go, find my child.

ALONZO. She means it now. I think I'll go.

[Exit ALONZO.]

ANITA. Men are so fast, or else so slow,
I hope he is not quite offended;
For if he is our love is ended;
And I shall have to dwell alone, forsaken,
And every morning think I've cooked my Bacon.

But where, oh, where, can Mamie be?
Why don't they bring her back to me?
And oh—I've made a solemn vow.

Suppose some man should bring her now,
Some ancient, tawny, grizzly fellow,
All gray and shriveled, lank and yellow,
And say, "I've brought your child, you see,
And now you've got to marry me."

Alonzo, O Alonzo, dear,
Find Mamie, quick, and bring her here.

What shall I do?

GEORGE. Mamma, don't cry;
We're sure to find her by and by.

ANITA. Bless you, my boy. We'll wait and see.

GEORGE. I'll go outside and shout. She'll come to me.

[Exit GEORGE.]

Enter MRS. W., VIOLET, and STANLEY, who stand in the background.

ANITA. This trouble weighs upon my mind.
Who will my darling Mamie find?
My heart is breaking with despair;
I think I'll go and—fix my hair.

ACT II.—SCENE I.—Enter MRS. W., VIOLET, and STANLEY.

MRS. W. My children, we have raised commotion;
To try Anita was my notion.

We heard that she had got a beau—
Who is the man? We want to know.

VIOLET. Why should she wish to keep it from us?
STANLEY. Perhaps he is some stupid Thomas,
Or Jim, or Jack, or Bill, or Mike,
And she may think that we would strike.

MRS. W. To find the truth we came upon this journey.
VIOLET.—I fear he is a working man like Kearney.

MRS. W. I trust that such is not the case
(True, honest labor's no disgrace),
But we are of another race.

Anita will not stain her blood patrician
By marrying beneath her own condition.

VIOLET. Theo why this secrecy? I cannot tell.
STANLEY. May be she loves not wisely, but too well.

MRS. W.—Violet, fetch our Mamie here;
I want to see the little dear.

[Enter VIOLET, leading MAMIE.]

VIOLET. See, here she is.
MAMIE. I want Mamma.

[Enter ALONZO.]

ALONZO. I've found you! You're my lucky star.
[To Mrs. W.] Woman, what does this outrage mean?
It is the worst that I have seen.

Flood, Mackay, Fair, or Johnny Skae,
Ne'er acted in a viler way.
Their movements set the people wild,
You have done worse: you stole a child.

Now, go with me. March, straight before.
All make your exit through that door.

STANLEY. Mother, it is my chum by whom we're taken,
The son of your old friend, Judge Bacon.

[Exit all.]

SCENE II.—Enter ANITA, leading GEORGE.

ANITA. Where is Alonzo? Where is Mamie?
He's left me. Oh, it is a shame he Don't return. I am a widow lonely;
I have no other friend. If only
He would now come here—

GEORGE. There's some one coming, mamma dear.

[Enter ALONZO, driving MRS. W., VIOLET, and STANLEY before him.]

ALONZO. Madam, I bring you great relief—
I've found your child, and caught the thief.

MAMIE. Mamma, mamma!

ANITA. Dear little pet.

[To ALONZO.] Your kindness, sir, I won't forget.
Where did you find her?

ALONZO. On the road.

She had been captured by this load.

[To Mrs. W.] Woman, you've merited a choking;
Six feet of hemp would stop your croaking.

I'd like to douse you all in tubs,

Yourselves and both your gypsy cubs.

MRS. W. I am no gypsy.

ALONZO. Why?

MRS. W. [dropping her gypsy cloak and hood.] Because You see that I am Santa Claus.

[To ANITA.] This meddler has upset my plan;
I shall get even, and I can.

[To MAMIE.] I've candy for you and a toy.

[To GEORGE.] And here is some for you, my boy.

ALONZO [kneeling]. Before you blame me, Santa Claus,
I beg—I pray—one moment pause.

MRS. W. I am not Santa Claus.

ANITA. O dear,
What mystery is hidden here?

Not Santa Claus! Theo tell us who you are.

MRS. W. You see that I am Mamie's grandmamma.

[VIOLET and STANLEY drop cloak and hood.
Her uncle Stanley, too, is here,
And this is sister Violet dear.

ALONZO. O madam, may I hope to be forgiven.
Mrs. W. Mercy is the prerogative of heaven.
No longer kneel, sir; rise and stand.

Fate and Anita placed you in my hand.
I know you well, and think you worthy of—
You have my blessing—take her—love her.

[Places ANITA'S hand in ALONZO'S.]

EPILOGUE.

GEORGE. Our play is ended here to-night.
We hope you think it came out right.
The praise the actor understands
Is when the audience clap their hands.

THE COMING STRUGGLE.

A Scholarly Presentation of the Chinese Problem.

BY W. N. LOCKINGTON.

From Asia, the earth's largest and central continent, all that we call European—so far as it relates to humanity—has sprung. From Asia came Paleolithic and Neolithic man, and after them the Celt and the Teuton. From Asia came, brought by the invading races, all our domestic animals—the horse, the ass, the ox, the sheep. In Asia arose that dualistic philosophy which acknowledges two principles, one of good and one of evil, by whose interaction the existing state of things was brought about. This philosophy still maintains its hold in our modern creeds, although we have reduced the evil principle to the rank of a vanquished foe. In Asia arose monotheism, and Brahmanism, the oldest monotheistic religion, is to-day the creed of a hundred and fifty millions of human beings; its sacred books antedate the Bible, and contain within them the essence of that lofty morality afterward taught by Christ. In Asia arose Christianity, the creed so proudly held by all European races, but so fearfully perverted from the intention of its founder, who said, "Do unto all men as ye would they should do unto you" and "Love one another." Had these doctrines been acted upon by Christians, their religion would indeed have regenerated the world; but the history of Christianity is a history of blood!

Thus from Asia, as we learn from history, archaeology and geology, came our creed, our morality, our rule over the animal world, and even ourselves. How, then, can we afford to despise Asia, which even now contains at least six hundred millions of men, whose civilization, if less advanced than our own, is far in advance of what ours was five centuries ago, and contains within it elements which must inevitably come into contact with ours, and as inevitably modify ours. Proud of our recent advances in freedom, in riches, in power, of our achievements in science and art, we are apt to forget how much we owe to Asia; and even when we grudgingly acknowledge that we acquired, in comparatively modern times, the mariner's compass, gunpowder, and perhaps the germ of the printing-press, from China, and that still more important discovery, the system of notation, from India, we are apt to forget that our creed, morality, animals, and our own ancestors came thence also. After all this has come from Asia, why do we inquire, like Nathaniel, "Can any good thing come out of Asia?" Split up into a number of little monarchies, each subdivided into dukedoms and earldoms whose ruling families were kings within their narrow bounds, and able to defy the king by combination among themselves, Europe, for several centuries after the fall of the Roman Empire, could scarcely call itself civilized. Occupied in perpetual petty wars, without manufactures and without commerce, the nations of Europe, Teutonic and Celtic, were not for several centuries influenced by Asia, and most assuredly they did not influence Asia.

Then came the Crusades, undertaken in the name of religion, resulting in the death of millions of Christians and Mussulmans, but resulting also in the acquisition from our enemies of several Asiatic inventions, and in the increase of commerce with the East. Then arose manufactures; gradually towns sprung up, free from the oppression of the nobles; and little by little the germ of freedom grew, till the whole of Western Europe burst its bonds, and feudalism was dead. Answering to its more favorable environment, the human mind awoke from its lethargy, weapons of war and implements of peace were alike improved, and adventurous men pushed forward over the ocean east and west, in quest of those rich countries from whence came the silk and the cotton, the spices, the tea, the coffee, the shawls, the precious stones, and the thousand and one other articles necessary for the increasing luxury of the West.

They found America and possessed it, destroyed its weaker but not lower civilizations, and colonized it, killed its natives by forced labor in mines and on plantations, and introduced negro labor in its stead, till the colonies rebelled against the exactions of the mother countries, and exacted commerce on equal terms; till the negro question culminated in a bloody civil war in the most powerful of the new States; and till the despised native, by sheer increase of numbers and greater adaptability to the environment, again took a share in the government of the southern republics of the continent. Meanwhile the irrepressible energy of the Europeanized Aryan race had regained, by an oceanic route, the country of their ancestors, and had advanced still further east upon Cathay. First the Portuguese and Spaniards, then the Dutch, the French, and the English, carried on with the Orientals a mixture of trade and stealing—trade when the natives were willing or when it seemed more profitable, stealing when trade was less easy or the booty too tempting for Aryan cupidity to withstand. But these nations, united in their treatment of the Orientals, were inimical to each other, and finally the English remained masters of India—a conquest obtained by force and fraud, but almost justifiable by the subsequent use made of it, since the Hindoo of the present age, freed from feudal oppression, enjoys an almost European liberty, and is advancing in knowledge and in social ideas.

Since all that a people can gain from its government is freedom and protection, India will remain under English rule as long as she receives both; but the Hindoo and the Englishman must be on perfectly equal terms, or else, with the growth of new ideas, India may, some day, choose to govern herself. But it is not so much of India, important as that rich country, the home of two hundred and forty millions of people, now is, and more important though it may be in the future, that we wish now to speak; but of China, the dense population of which has overflowed on to these shores, and has given us a problem to work out.

Let us, then, very briefly, before considering the present or probable future of our relations with China, review the past intercourse between the Aryan and Mongolian civilizations. Oldest of all existing civilizations, the Chinese should neither be compared with the extinct civilization of Egypt, Persia, Greece under the successors of Alexander, and Rome under the emperors, than with that of any modern European nation. It existed when Nineveh and Egypt flour-shed; it flourished when Rome was young, continued flourishing after Rome fell, and still exists, though fallen into feudalism and stereotyped formalism. Ever a quiet, commercial people, the Chinese feared their more warlike Mongolian neighbors, people of the same great division of the human race, but differing from them as the Goth differed from the Roman, or as the modern Gaul from the modern German. They built the Great Wall of China, a work more wonderful than any of the seven wonders of the ancient western world, to keep out the barbarians; but stone walls could not supply the place of iron muscles, and the Tartars passed the wall and conquered China. But it happened to the conquering Tartars as to the Normans who conquered England and the Franks who conquered France. Fewer by far in numbers than the people they had vanquished, they became, to all intents and purposes, Chinese, while the Chinese retained their ancient customs and modes of life. With a vast horde of Asiatics, composed of the various nations he had overcome, the successor of Genghis Khan, the first of the great Mogul dynasty, burst over Western Asia and Eastern Europe like a destroying angel, overwhelming the dawning civilization of Russia, born from the relations of that country with the court of Constantinople, utterly defeated the Poles and Hungarians, and made the west of Europe tremble. In Dalmatia the conqueror stayed his advance, perhaps from magnanimity, more probably from other motives more likely to influence conquerors.

It is useless to speculate on what would have been the result had Genghis marched against Western Europe. Divided and thinly populated as those regions then were, he might have conquered, but assuredly could not have retained his conquests. That the weapons of Europe, even at that age, were not inferior to those of Asia is proved by the Crusades, which commenced prior to the invasion of Genghis and continued after his death, in which the mail-clad hosts of Western Europe, united temporarily in a common cause, repeatedly vanquished the Saracens and Seljukian Turks, nations far more warlike than the Chinaman or the Mongol. But they could not long retain their hold on the vanquished but not subdued countries they overran, neither could the successors of Genghis retain their hold on his vast conquests, which rapidly dwindled into the present empire of China. It is useless to argue that Genghis was not a Chinaman. Alexander was not a Greek, yet he led the Greeks to victory and founded a Grecian empire. William the Norman was not English, yet his successors became so; as English they fought the French, and English history, with most Englishmen, commences with the alien conqueror. Genghis founded that dynasty and that empire of China which still exists, and doubtless is to an educated Chinaman just what William the Norman is to an Englishman.

From the time of Genghis to the sixteenth century, China and Europe were connected only by the indirect chain of a traffic which passed through the hands of the Arabians and the Venetians. Then came the age of maritime discovery and of the bold half traders, half pirates, whose devastations are so eloquently deplored by Kwang Chang Ling. Then China attempted to close her ports, fearful of the aggressive strangers, and Japan, after a hazardous experience, did the same. The policy of exclusiveness, which California is imitating, was commenced by China, and resulted in failure, as such policy, in the very nature of things, is bound to do. When one nation supplies what another nation needs, the avenues of trade cannot long be closed. "With apostolic blows and knocks" England forced her opium on China, and the Chinaman, on his side, was glad to trade, for he wanted money for his teas, and had no great objection to opium. By the impetus given to the Eastern trade the United States profited, and the better to protect Americans resident in China she entered into a special treaty, in which she guaranteed protection to Chinamen here. But the Chinaman was not conspicuous on our western shores at that date, and his peculiar traits were not known so thoroughly, or the treaty would scarcely have been made. Had it never been made, the fall of wages in California might, perhaps, have been delayed a year or two, and some of the industries now taken up by the Chinaman would probably have been pre-occupied by the white laborer from Europe or the Eastern States. None the less, wages would have fallen, as they have fallen, and as they must fall until they are on a level, or nearly so, with the Eastern States, or with Europe. None the less, though perhaps a few years later, the white man would have had to compete with the Chinaman, who, if not as yet quick to invent, is quick to comprehend everything that he can turn to account, and who, brought into contact with the white man in China itself, is learning whatever in our civilization is useful to him.

It is as impossible, at this stage of the world's history, to isolate ourselves from the Chinese as it is for us to turn backward the stream of time, and grow younger as the years fly by. Europe is crowded; the race for wealth, the rivalry between the nations, is a struggle for life also. The nations that have the greatest Oriental trade are richest, and their people, as a whole, most prosperous. If any nation ceases voluntarily to trade, another nation will step in and reap the benefit. Steam and the telegraph have brought mankind together, and China, powerful still in its decay, both from the value of its products and the vastness of its population, cannot long be left outside. We must compete with the Chinaman whether we will or no; if we endure him here, he can live where a white man will starve; if we turn him out, he can make cheap goods, and send them here to undersell our own labor; if we put high duties on Chinese goods, we must live without Chinese produce and without the Chinese trade.

There are two methods, and there are no more, of dealing with the Chinese question. The one is to so regulate our relations with China as to lessen the shock of the collision of races, meanwhile learning from them some of that watchful, unceasing industry and economy of time, materials, and food which now give the Chinaman the advantage over our improvident working classes; the other is to totally exterminate the Chinese race. If we cannot do the latter—and the other nations of European stock would not permit us to do it if we wished—we must take the former alternative or succumb in the struggle. The trouble is that we stand first; that the white workman of California, the most highly paid and certainly not the most hardworking of Aryan laborers, suddenly finds himself confronted by the most underpaid of men, by men whose whole lives have been a keen struggle for bare subsistence. The two opposite ends of a chain of civilization stand facing each other on the shores of the Pacific, and their contact naturally generates some heat.

Kwang Chang Ling, in his recent communications to the ARGONAUT, endeavors to prove that Chinese civilization is at least as high as ours; but, in the course of his argument, he admits the feudal condition and squalid poverty of the mass of the Chinese people, and in admitting this he admits the inferiority of his civilization. A recent writer in the ARGONAUT draws two conclusions:—

(1) That the Mongolian and Caucasian races do not assimilate.

(2) That the mixing of inferior with superior civilizations subverts and destroys the superior.

The first of these conclusions is as yet unproven, and it will need centuries of close contact between the races to prove or disprove it. The second, fortunately for us, who really have, on the whole, the superior civilization, finds no warrant either in human history or in that far larger and nobler history, which grasps all Nature from nebulous chaotic matter up to man himself—the history of Evolution. Evolution teaches us that all life must be in harmony with its environment. If the environment changes, the organism must adapt itself to the changed conditions or perish. To a certain extent, however, the organism reacts upon the environment, and modifies it so as to ameliorate its condition.

The life of an individual, of a nation, or of a widespread civilization depends, first on its power of adapting itself to its environment, and second, to its power of modifying the environment to suit its needs. The earth was not made for man—man has nothing he has not fought for, nothing that he has not wrested from opposing forces by conquering them or by adapting himself to them.

The white man has become what he is through a series of civilizations, each, except the present one, affecting only a small portion of the Aryan races, each overthrown in turn by a more vigorous though ruder branch of the same race, but each leaving to its successor a legacy of art, literature, and science, which has aided it to take a higher flight, until at length the whole mass, civilized in various degrees, and divided into several nations, has developed the most astonishing enterprise and the most wonderful fertility of invention under the pressure of competition.

The Chinaman has become what he is through a single long civilization. Throughout all revolutions and wars, China has been the central mass of the Mongolian world to which all others have gravitated, and her civilization, if it has changed, as doubtless it has, has changed mainly from inherent and internal causes, not from the effects of outside influences. Industrial and agricultural for so many ages that war-like propensities have almost died out, and inhabiting a comparatively narrow region, hemmed in by mountain and desert, the continually increasing population of China has been forced to continually increasing frugality and economy in every transaction of life.

The Aryan brings to the contest a power of invention, a spirit of freedom, a love of enterprise, an amount of physical strength, a tendency to change, which the Chinaman can only hope to rival after long association with him; but at the same time he is improvident, he despises the day of small things, he rushes over the world and through his own life too fast to make out of them the most possible.

The Chinaman brings to the contest a slow and plodding industry, an unceasing watchfulness for the slightest opportunities, a power of making a little go a great way, which the Aryan can only learn by passing through a period of comparative hardship.

What, then, must be the result of the intercourse of the races?

Clearly the resulting civilization of both Europe and China must be different from that of either now. The Chinaman must develop some enterprise and inventive power, or the whole nation may become the slave of some European nation—to the certain ruin of that nation, certainly, but not to that of European civilization as a whole. The Aryan on his side must learn frugality and economy, or a peaceful invasion of Chinese may eat him out, as the ground squirrels eat out the farmer.

There is no denying there is a great danger ahead, that we are nearing a period of transition for the human race, a period in which there will surely be much suffering to a large portion of its population, but which will usher in a time when one civilization similar in kind, but varying in detail, shall spread over all the earth. To soften the shock, to prepare the masses for the competition that must come, to get ready to fight the Chinaman with his own weapons, those of peace and industry, and at the same time to retain our superiority in the weapons of war, and in invention, and enterprise, should be the aim of all thoughtful men of our race. We have crowded in cities, and there, producing nothing, have lived by manufacturing the produce of other countries, or, more artificially still, by being middle-men between consumer and producer. To find employment for our masses, too large now for the needs of our factories, we must teach them to return to the soil, to learn of Nature Nature's ways, to leave no stone unturned, no foot of ground untilld, to take with them labor-saving machines and use them themselves, to join hands in peaceful coöperations to accomplish works they cannot do alone; in a word, to think and act intelligently as the higher, by which I mean the more educated, classes of our society are compelled to do.

Our civilization is in more danger of being overthrown by the illiterate masses of society than by the Chinese; but if the higher strata advance without pulling up the lower after them, what else can be expected? The educated of our race need never fear the Chinaman; let them endeavor to educate the masses, and then those masses will cease to fear the Chinaman also, and at the same time cease to be a menace to our civilization. Do not misapprehend me when I use the word "educate." By education I do not mean reading, writing, and arithmetic, useful though these are; still less do I mean classics and mathematics. I mean the knowledge of all that constitutes a man's duty in this world: first to himself; to keep himself in health; second to his family, to support them; third to society, to keep himself and his family from becoming a burden to it; to do his duty as a citizen; whenever called upon to be ready, with whatever surplus of time or wealth may remain to him, to aid or instruct his less fortunate fellow-men, and to "do unto all men as he would they should do unto him."

SEVEN FAMOUS SONNETS.

[Of all English metrical compositions the sonnet is the most difficult. In its narrow plot the poet is bound about with iron rules, and beset with pitfalls fatal to any but capital genius and consummate art. Of the poems given below (in our judgment the noblest seven sonnets, by seven hands, that our literature contains) not one is faultless in matter, and only one in form. Their splendor is in mercy not unclouded; it dazzles but it does not blind. It is significant that of these incomparable examples of the kind of verse in which Petrarch poured out his love to Laura, not one is inspired by that passion; and we have the lack of patriotism to confess that it is probably something more than accident, also, that none are American. As there is just now in this country an outbreak of sonnet-making—for which Mr. Edgar Fawcett, if not responsible, is at least liable—we have thought it might encourage the ambitious bards to present the master works by way of enabling them to more clearly apprehend the altitude of the shining summits to which they so resolutely aspire.]

Full many a glorious morning have I seen
Flatter the mountain tops with sovereign eye,
Kissing with golden face the meadows green,
Gilding pale streams with heavenly alchemy;
Anon permit the basest clouds to ride
With ugly rack on his celestial face,
And from the forlorn world his visage hide,
Stealing unseen to west with this disgrace.
Even so my sun one early morn did shine,
With all triumphant splendor on my brow;
But, out, alack! he was but one hour mine;
The region cloud hath masked him from me now.
Yet him for this my love no whit disdaineth;
Suns of the world may stain, when heaven's sun staineth.

SHAKESPEARE.

When I consider how my light is spent
Ere half my days in this dark world and wide,
And that one talent which is death to hide,
Lodged with me useless, though my soul more bent
To serve there with my Maker, and present
My true account, lest he returning chide;
"Doth God exact day-labor, light denied?"
I fondly ask: But Patience, to prevent
That murmur, soon replies: "God doth not need
Either man's work, or his own gifts: who best
Bear His mild yoke, they serve Him best: His state
Is kingly: thousands at his bidding speed,
And post o'er land and ocean without rest;
They also serve who only stand and wait."

MILTON.

The world is too much with us; late and soon,
Getting and spending, we lay waste our powers;
Little we see in nature that is ours;
We have given our heart away, a sordid boon!
This sea that bares her bosom to the moon;
The winds that will be howling at all hours,
And are up-gathered now like sleeping flowers:
For this, for everything, we are out of tune;
It moves us not. Great God! I'd rather be
A Pagan suckled in a creed outworn;
So might I, standing on this pleasant lea,
Have glimpses that would make me less forlorn;
Have sight of Proteus rising from the sea,
Or bear old Triton blow his wreathed horn.

WORDSWORTH.

Eternal spirit of the changeless mind!
Brightest in dungeons, Liberty! thou art,
For there thy habitation is the heart—
The heart which love of thee alone can bind;
And when thy sons to fetters are consigned—
To fetters, and the damp vault's cell—
Their country conquers with their martyrdom,
And Freedom's fame finds wings on every wind.
Chillon! thy prison is a holy place,
And thy sad floor an altar for 'twas trod,
Until his very steps have left a trace
Worn, as if thy cold pavement were a sod,
By Bonivard! may none those marks efface,
For they appeal from tyranny to God.

BYRON.

Mysterious Night! when our first parent knew
Thee from report divine, and heard thy name,
Did he not tremble for this lovely frame,
This glorious canopy of light and blue?
Yet 'neath a curtain of translucent dew,
Bathed in the rays of the great setting flame,
Hesperus with the host of heaven came,
And lo! creation widened in man's view.
Who could have thought such darkness long concealed
Within thy beams, O sun! or who could find,
Whilst fly, and leaf, and insect stood revealed,
That to such countless orbs thou mad'st us blind.
Why do we, then, shun death with anxious strife?
If light can thus deceive, wherefore not life?

JOSEPH BLANCO WHITE.

Much have I traveled in the realms of gold,
And many goodly states and kingdoms seen;
Round many western islands have I been,
Which bards in fealty to Apollo hold.
Oft of one wide expanse had I been told
That deep-browed Homer ruled as his demesne
Yet never did I breathe his pure serene
Till I heard Chapman speak out loud and bold;
Then felt I like some watcher of the skies
When a new planet swims into his ken;
Or like stout Cortez when with eagle eyes
He stared at the Pacific—and all his men
Looked at each other with a wild surmise—
Silent, upon a peak in Darien.

KEATS.

I met a traveler from an antique land
Who said: Two vast and trunkless legs of stone
Stand in the desert. Near them, on the sand,
Half sunk, a shattered visage lies, whose frown,
And wrinkled lip, and sneer of cold command,
Tell that its sculptor well those passions read
Which yet survive (stamped on these lifeless things)
The hand that mocked them and the heart that fed.
And on the pedestal these words appear:
"My name is Ozymandias, king of kings;
Look on my works ye mighty, and despair!"
Nothing beside remains. Round the decay
Of that colossal wreck, boundless and bare,
The lone and level sands stretch far.

L. E. Y.

ELEVEN DAYS IN THE HIGH SIERRA.

By George B. Bayley.

Grand and beautiful as are the scenes of that incomparable spot of earth, Yosemite Valley, the tourist who contents himself with a sight of its majestic walls and peerless cataacts little realizes how much of the picturesque in nature he might have enjoyed within a short ride of its perimeter. The beaten paths of tourist travel are trodden by thousands, but to the adventurous few who depart therefrom is reserved the enjoyment of new undescribed wonders. I believe there are very few who know anything about the region lying to the eastward of the Valley, or deem it worthy of a visit. For the benefit of the traveling public I purpose narrating some of the incidents of a ten days' horseback ride through the elevated, rugged region that forms the backbone of the State, expanding the notes of a hastily kept diary. The party was five, three ladies and two gentlemen, all of San Francisco, with Manuel Flores for guide—the best and about the only intelligent guide for the region about and beyond Yosemite—and Chas. E. Perego of Mariposa, formerly proprietor of the Mountain View House between Yosemite and Clark's, presiding over the indispensable culinary department. I mention their names for they have few equals in their specialties, and I can recommend them most heartily to any inclined to follow in our footsteps. We started from Yosemite June 24th, at 10 A. M., climbing the southern wall by the tortuous trail to Glacier Point, our outfit consisting of blankets (three pairs for each person), a light tent for shelter, and the necessary "grub," cooking utensils, etc., condensed into two packs of about one hundred and eighty pounds each. From the Glacier Point House we struck off to the southward, passing between Mount Starr King and Sentinel Dome, crossing the Bridal Veil Creek, and leaving the Valley of the Illouette to the left. Our first camp was at Dead Horse Meadows—an unattractive name, but a beautiful spot, and what was of more importance having plenty of feed for the mules.

Tuesday, June 25.—Broke camp at 7:30 o'clock traveling a little east of south and skirting the flanks of Buena Vista Peak. The route lay through the virgin forest, untouched by the axe of man. Enormous sugar pines and firs towered rank on rank along the mountain sides, an unbroken phalanx of giants for miles. By noon we had reached the shores of Crescent Lake, twenty miles from Yosemite, and near the boundary line between Mariposa and Fresno counties. The lake is in the exact form of a crescent, with both horns pointing westward. Its shores are densely wooded on three sides and on the fourth towers a vertical cliff of rock, from which one may look down a long gateway in the hills and see the San Joaquin plains in the dim perspective. The water of the lake is clear as crystal, and very deep. On its border is a log cabin inhabited in summer by a mighty Nimrod, Jim Duncan, who has killed forty or fifty bears within the past six years of his occupancy of the cabin. The country abounds in game—deer, cinnamon bear, an occasional grizzly, and smaller game ad infinitum. It is due east from Clark's, from which it can be reached in a distance of twenty miles—an easy half day's ride. Leaving this delightful spot we continued our route, visiting Lost Lake, an emerald gem set in the hills with such care that it requires an expert to find it. At half past two we crossed the south fork of the Merced, descending into and climbing out of a deep narrow cañon, and by five o'clock had reached our second camping place at Chiquito Meadows at the head of the Chiquito Joaquin, a large tributary of the San Joaquin. In this day's ride we had crossed the divide between the headwaters of the Merced and San Joaquin, and completely turned the western flanks of the obelisk group of peaks, of which Mount Clark, Red, Gray, and Black Mountains are the most prominent. The entrance to the Chiquito Meadows is very rugged. Riding was impossible. We could only pick our way, leading our straggling animals over the debris of ancient glaciers. Rugged though it be, it is the only possible way to pass from Crescent Lake to the Chiquito Meadows. Once at this lofty resting place, our animals enjoyed an abundance of grass and were rested from their painful journey.

Wednesday, June 26.—Continuing on a southeasterly course, we traveled over an easy rolling country, reaching the Jackass Meadows at noon. These remarkable meadow lands lie at the foot of Black Mountain, forty miles from Yosemite, or about twenty-two due southeast as the crow flies. They are four or five miles long and intersected by long tongues of tamarack and pine timber that divide the meadows into a succession of grass-grown parks fringed with trees. Here we found hundreds of horses and the first band of sheep encountered on the trip. We traveled through these droves of animals for several miles and then struck off due east, reaching Granite Creek, a tributary of the San Joaquin, at three o'clock. This stream is very wide, deep, and swift, and the horses were obliged to swim. The passage was made in safety, however, although our packs were slightly wet. We made camp at four o'clock in some beautiful meadows on a mountain side overlooking the north fork of the San Joaquin, where feed was plenty. We began to be sensible that we had reached a great altitude, as the nights were extremely cold, and ice formed on the borders of the streams.

Thursday, June 27.—We were on our way early, and after riding a few hours met three of the most villainous looking fellows that ever assumed human shape. We surprised them eating breakfast and imagined we had fallen into a bandits' encampment. One of them who was minus an eye, and flourished a huge knife in his hand, looked as though he would cut a throat with as much sang froid as the hunch of venison he was slicing. It was questionable, however, which party was the most surprised. They told us they had been sent out by sheep men to put the trail in order, and as we afterwards found indications of their work we could not disbelieve them, but the ladies experienced a sense of relief when they were no longer visible. About one hour after leaving them we crossed the north fork of the San Joaquin, a stream which is here 120 feet wide and 15 to 20 feet deep, swift and clear, fresh from the snow banks encircling Mount Elmer some fifteen miles away. A huge tree that must have been two hundred feet high when growing on the bank had been felled across the stream, its upper surface smoothed off with the axe and rough railings placed on the sides, forming a very secure bridge, barely wide enough for a horse to pass over. We had been steadily ascending until we were getting into the region of almost perpetual snow, and at twelve o'clock halted for lunch on a vast snow bank where our last bottle of cocktails was drunk, cooled deliciously by the crisp crystals of congealed vapor. The whole country was covered with snow. The solitude was unbroken by the sound of bird or beast, no footprints were visible. We were alone with nature amid the deep hush that pervades her in her grander forms. At two o'clock we reached the summit of the San Joaquin pass, 9,500 feet above sea level, the lowest depression in the range in this section of the country, although not precisely on the dividing ridge between the waters of Owens view and the San Joaquin. It was rather a sag in a spur of the Minarets. In ascending to the pass we rode over miles of snow, sometimes crossing a summer rivulet on a bridge of snow and anon tramping through the slush and ice that filled all the hollows and meadows of the heights. Drifts of snow from fifteen to thirty feet deep lay on both sides of the pass, a most fortunate circumstance for us, as the way was so rugged that even with the snow to aid us it was well nigh impassable. You will ask what was the view from the summit? My pen is incapable of picturing its grandeur. Mount Ritter and the Minarets lay directly before us, rising up from their surroundings in sheer, precipitous pinnacles and towers, so steep that even the snow could not cling to them, but lay piled in masses at their feet. Nearer than these was a lesser peak over whose summit a combing snow drift seemed to hang like a frozen wave suspended in mid air, and reflecting tints that would have inspired the pencil of Bradford as no arctic iceberg could have done. Behind us, away beyond, over the snow fields, the broken country we had passed, mellowed by its mantle of forest and leveled by the smoothing-iron of distant perspective, stretched away as far as we could see in a billowy landscape. In an hour and a half we had picked our way through the pass and descended to a stream called by our guide Warren Creek (probably erroneously, as I think Warren Creek proper is further north), a tributary of the San Joaquin that rises in the Minarets and goes brawling down a narrow valley over a rocky channel, like "Iser, rolling rapidly." We found the water ten or twelve feet deep, sixty feet wide, very swift and icy cold. Another rustic bridge of two parallel logs had been made by sheepmen here, but it was too insecure to bear our animals and we were obliged to unpack, "tote" our "plunder" across on foot, while Manuel and I swam the horses over. We camped on this creek, about three miles below the bridge, and half a mile above its junction with the middle fork of the San Joaquin. The camp was in the loveliest spot that human fancy can conceive. I cannot describe it, but will ask you to imagine a rich grassy meadow interspersed with fine evergreen trees, a foaming cascade tumbling over rounded and polished granite boulders in "the way the water comes down at Lodore," a tall, sombre volcanic cliff, somewhat resembling the Palisades of the Hudson, rising in perpendicular height 2,000 feet above the meadow at its feet; mix up a good deal of moonlight and starlight with it all, and you have the principal ingredients of a scene which kept us at the camp fire till after midnight absorbed in its beauty.

NEW FALL DISCOVERED ON THE UPPER SAN JOAQUIN.

Friday, June 28.—The incidents of this day were to be the climax of all we had yet passed in point of interest and enjoyment. Manuel Flores, our sagacious guide, who had brought us thus far safely over a trackless wilderness without the shadow of a trail, had told us that two years before, near this spot as he thought, while traveling from Long Valley to Clark's he had lost his way and found a number of blazes that led him to the brink of a cliff, from which he had caught a glimpse through the trees of a beautiful waterfall, rivaling those of Yosemite. The blazes had doubtless been made by hunters who were lost like himself. At the intimation of scenery of this kind in the vicinity we at once resolved to search for it. We left our camp on foot and descended to the mouth of the creek, half a mile. Here it joins the middle fork of the San Joaquin river, which is at this point a stream as large as the Merced in Yosemite, although so short a distance from its source. Ascending this stream a quarter of a mile we found we were obliged to leave its bed and climb up the wall on the northern side about two hundred feet to a terrace overlooking the river. We had not gone far before some one shouted, "See the spray." A dense cloud of mist appeared, a roar of descending water was borne on the wind, and a sudden turn confronted us with the falls. The view that we had of them from our standpoint was entrancing; on the north side a bold dyke of bare volcanic rock, on a shelf of which we were standing, seemingly thrust up through the crust of the earth, half a mile high, scarred and seamed with narrow crevices down which we could rattle thin stones that must have descended hundreds of feet before reaching bottom; on the south a sloping mountain covered with trees; before us the whole river made a vertical leap from over a ledge as square cut as a stone mason could make it, descending into a deep pool that was perfectly inaccessible, and having as a back ground to complete the picture the snow capped peak whose wondrous tints had captivated our senses all the day previous. We estimated the falls to be three hundred feet high, an estimate which is rather under than over the mark. The stream is from eighty to one hundred feet in width at the brink. It impresses one with a sense of beauty, grandeur, and power quite as deeply as the Vernal Falls of Yosemite. Manuel and myself succeeded in clambering down to the very brink of the falls, where we could look into the chasm below. Above the falls the river glides over a smooth bed of flaky slate, and seemed totally devoid of all sources of attrition—sand, gravel, or mud. These remarkable falls are almost unknown to the world. Much as I have climbed through the Sierra for many years past, I never before heard of them. They have never been described to my knowledge, and as they are off the natural lines of travel which those whose pursuits take them through this section would be apt to take, it is possible that we were the first to visit and appreciate them. After enjoying this wild scene to our satisfaction we returned to camp, and at nine o'clock were again on our way. Passing over a low divide we descended to the middle fork of the San Joaquin, a few miles above the falls, and crossed on a log that had been felled and prepared as a sheep bridge. A few miles further and we were at the summit of the Sierra Nevada. So easy was the ascent, however, that we scarcely realized it, and were at a loss to know just where the waters parted. But when the view of Long Valley, stretching away into dimness like an emerald ocean, burst upon us, we comprehended that we were descending into Owens River basin on the east side of the range. Distance lent such enchantment to the sage-brush plain that we almost thought we were getting into Paradise. Beyond the valley we had a view of the Inyo range for one hundred and fifty miles, overtopped by the White Mountain peak, which is said, by the Inyo people, to be the highest mountain in North America. At twelve o'clock, after a very abrupt descent we came upon Mammoth Lake, a handsome sheet of water two miles long and a mile or more in width, set down deeply in the hills and surrounded with peaks ten thousand feet high, their summits covered with snow and their sloping sides clothed in forests of yellow pine, cedar, and silver fir. This is the real source of Owens River, which is, however, fed by a chain of silvery lakes half a dozen or more in number in the immediate vicinity. Three years ago I had spent a summer vacation in traveling over this section on a visit to Mt. Whitney, to the southward, but saw no sign of habitation. Now, we suddenly found ourselves in the midst of a busy mining district, with some six hundred or seven hundred miners busily engaged in sinking shafts, running tunnels, putting up log huts and tents, etc. Some prospector discovered silver ore here a year ago, and the croppings proving rich, others were attracted to the spot, and the developments made give promise of the most flattering character. General Geo. S. Dodge, of Oakland, is owner of the Mammoth mine, the largest of the district. The settlement is called Mammoth City and there is not a woman in it. The houses are of logs and canvas and make quite a showing for a town. A saw mill has recently been put in operation near by, furnishing lumber for the embryo city. The town is seventy miles from Independence, with which it is connected by a good wagon road, and over which all supplies are hauled from Mojave, on the Southern Pacific Railroad, over two hundred miles across the desert. It is also connected by road with Aurora and Carson City. Mammoth City, whose high sounding title gives it a positive advantage in the struggle for existence, is at an elevation of about seven thousand feet, sixty miles in air line from Aurora and thirty miles south of Mono Lake. As we rode into it the people turned out in a body to receive us, and they seemed fairly bewildered with the distinction of a visit from real live ladies. In answer to the question as to whether they had any good mines about there, one of them quaintly remarked, "Mines? The richest damndest mines in the country, stranger, don't you forget it." Four miles below the town in the alkali plain are some interesting geysers and mud springs, where the water perpetually boils and hot mud sputters and fumes like so many pots of hot mush. The water is strongly mineral, sulphur and iron predominating. From the spring the water runs over the ground four hundred feet before it is sufficiently cooled for bathing. Here at four P. M., we halted for the night at the base of a rock forty feet high, which was so perfect a representation of a skull that we named our camp Golgotha. A mile below is another geyser, where three years ago I saw a column of water spouting up to the height of thirty or forty feet.

Saturday, June 29.—At nine o'clock resumed our line of march in a northward direction, riding for sixteen miles or more over a country upon which the curse of Jehovah seems to rest. It is a long alkali plain, interspersed with low, desolate hills and ancient lake beds long since drained by the sun. It has evidently been the scene of violent volcanic action and disturbance of the earth's crust. There is a place near here where, in the middle of a forest, the trees have all been killed by subterranean heat for a space half a mile in diameter. Eleven years ago this place was so hot it was impossible to camp or travel over. In another place the land has sunken 100 feet for an area of a couple of hundred acres, the cleavage lines being abruptly vertical and the trees still growing at the bottom of the pit. Where the alkali plain surges up to the line of pine forest we came upon Grant's Lake, a superb sheet of water, two miles long and a mile wide, connecting by a short link of water with Silver Lake, in which the water was so warm that it was not possible to drink it with any degree of comfort. Here we concluded to camp, having an abundance of fresh water from tributary streams. Silver Lake is filled with myriads of a species of shellfish resembling shrimps or small lobsters, and which are considered by the Mono Indians as quite a luxury.

Sunday, June 30.—Rush Creek is the largest stream of water that takes its source in Sierra snows, and flows eastwardly. It drains numerous lakes that nestle among the bolder spurs of the summit range, and goes tearing down the steep declivities with noisy murmur, that is only hushed as it calms down into an occasional lakelet, spreading for itself a mirror with which to reflect its surroundings, and finding its way at last into that alkaline sea—Mono Lake. We discovered that we were near one of the most remarkable cascades in this stream, and started out to spend the Sabbath in an exploration of our surroundings. We rode to the foot of the cascades, three and one-half miles distant, and, leaving our horses, scrambled up to the top. The mountain face stood at an angle of more than forty-five degrees—indeed it was nearer sixty degrees—so that for about four hundred feet in the centre the cascade is nearly vertical, gliding down a polished surface into a clear pool fringed with ferns and pines. The entire height of the cascades exceeds 1,000 feet. Reaching the top, Manuel and I started to climb a high peak between our standpoint and Mount Ritter. It proved an exceedingly hazardous and difficult undertaking on account of the steepness of the slope and the treacherous uncertainty of the friable surface rocks that made up this dead volcano. Its altitude was about eleven thousand feet; and, once upon its summit, a more comprehensive view of the contour of the country was afforded than we had yet had. To the west, the one grand feature of the picture was the unapproachable Mount Ritter, "goring the sky with ragged horn"—the matchless monarch of the Sierra. We had, in our past week's journey, seen it from the west and the south; we now saw it from base to pinnacled crest only ten miles away. South of it, in the chain of summits, was the Minarets; while directly north stood Mount Lyell, proud of the living glacier that poured down its sides. Mono Lake lay far below us to the north. We counted no less than thirty-one small lakes from the summit of this peak, each from a quarter of a mile to two miles in diameter, the greater number being simply enlargements of Rush Creek.

Monday, July 1.—Broke camp at seven o'clock, following the course of Rush Creek from the Cascades several miles to a place where we could swim the creek, when we continued down its western bank for three miles until it opened out into a large lake. A short ride across country brought us to Joe Bohler's ranch, the Mecca of all sagebrush travelers. Bohler is a character worthy of study. A tall, athletic German, he leads a lonely, frugal bachelor life in the hills, subsisting on an anchorite diet of bread and water, with a hobby for "hygiene" (as though anybody could be ailing in that climate!), raising hay on his scattered meadows for sale to the mining settlements in the valley. He is the very soul of hospitality, and indulged us in fresh milk to our hearts' content. Four miles from Bohler's is Mono Lake, one of the most remarkable bodies of water on the continent. I was vividly reminded of an eventful experience endured on a visit to this lake three years ago. As an account of the adventure may be a warning to other venturesome tourists, I may be pardoned the digression to narrate briefly one of the most thrilling episodes of a somewhat checkered life. Our party at that time consisted of four gentlemen, one of whom was a geologist well known in California, whose tender love for nature has earned for him the appellation of "the Thoreau of the Pacific." In the course of our wanderings we found ourselves one July day at the ranch of Louis Sammon, on the western shore of Mono Lake. Having expressed a desire to visit the islands in the lake, Louis Sammon volunteered us the use of an old flat-bottomed boat and his company as guide. When we started out in the morning the lake was calm, and we had a pleasant row of six miles to one of the islands that seemed to rest upon the water the perfect semblance of a turreted monitor. Its surface was covered with lava, sand, ashes, and pumice-stone, and seemed fairly alive with gulls, whose eggs were scattered over the ground by thousands, some new laid, some hatching, while the fluttering young birds but just out of the shell were under our feet wherever we walked. The island was, perhaps, half a mile in diameter, and after satisfying our curiosity by a thorough inspection of it we again embarked to visit a much larger island two miles distant. This one was about two and a half miles long and two miles wide, and showed unmistakable evidence of having been the crater of some long extinct volcano. It was a mass of rugged irregular lava, with occasional coves and flats of alkali dust. A more desolate spot can not be conceived. In coasting about the island we discovered off the western shore some boiling sub-aqueous springs, making the lake water so hot as to scald the hand thrust into it. About two in the afternoon we started to return to Sammon's. We had got but a mile or two when a sudden squall broke over the lake from the west, quickly churning its surface into formidable waves that placed us in constant jeopardy. The boat was a leaky tub, and one man was kept busy bailing out the water that came through the seams as well as over the sides of the wretched craft. It was decided after a hasty consultation that it would be folly to attempt to reach shore in such a gale, and that our only safety lay in returning to the island. We did so, but came within a hair's breadth of going to the bottom several times before reaching terra firma. The gale continued to increase from hour to hour all the afternoon, and not till nine P. M. did the wind die down. Meantime we wandered about the desolate island like shipwrecked mariners, sinking to our knees at every step in the fine, flour-like alkali. Not a drop of fresh water was to be found and we were perishing with thirst. To think of passing the night in such a place was too horrible, and at ten o'clock a majority of the company gained the reluctant consent of the rest to reembark for a second attempt to reach the shore. It was desperate folly as we soon found, for although the wind had subsided the waves were still high, and tossed our frail boat mercilessly about. M. sat in the bow to break off the waves with his broad back, and keep them from swamping the boat. B. plied the bailer with unremitting zeal. O. and myself pulled faithfully at the oars, while Sammon managed the rudder. It was bright moonlight, so we could see to steer for the nearest shore. We had got about half way when a sudden gust careened the boat so that she half filled with water. We all thought our last hour had come. I slipped off my boots and observed that M. had silently done the same, expecting that in case the boat sunk we might possibly swim to shore. It was a vain hope for in that intensely alkaline water it would have been an impossibility to survive. We should have been eaten up and boiled alive even had we managed to float. Luckily, providentially, we were not forced to this emergency. Quick work with the bailer kept the staggering craft afloat until suddenly we glided into smooth water, where the waves had subsided and all was still. "Is this a miracle?" I asked. "Providence," said M., quietly. We found on investigating the matter next day that we must have encountered the narrow current of Rush Creek where it sets strongly into the lake, producing a counter-influence to the surface agitation. At all events we had no further trouble in reaching shore, and at half-past two o'clock in the morning, with thankful hearts, again set foot on dry land. We were several miles from our starting point, but we were safe, and felt that we had been delivered from the very jaws of hell. Our joy knew no bounds. We cared not where we were to sleep, but, encountering a little filthy cabin, threw ourselves on the floor and slept soundly till morning, awaking with the startling discovery that we were in a den of hissing rattlesnakes that were gliding about the room. Fortunately none of the party were bitten and we escaped all dangers to reach home alive and well. But to return to my diary.

Tuesday, July 2.—Left camp early, passing through Bloody Cañon on our westward course, reaching the summit of Mono Pass at 10:30 A. M. Bloody Cañon is very properly named. It is studded with sharp, flinty rocks, that cut the mules' feet and legs, so that no animal passes through it without leaving a bloody track. At the summit of Mono Pass we could readily imagine that we had passed through the transition from summer to winter, as the wind blew a heavy gale from the west, sweeping through the snow-clad pass with marrow-chilling force. Snow lay in enormous drifts everywhere about us, fixed in masses unmoved by the wind by the compacting influence of the summer sun. The top of Mono Pass, which is 10,500 feet high, is marked by a strange and unexpected natural curiosity. It is a little lake of that peculiar, rock-bound, fathomless type which the tourist through the higher Sierra so frequently encounters. Its waters are clear as crystal, and on a calm day must reflect on its bosom the image of Mount Dana, lying directly north, as well as Mount Gibbs, over a shoulder of which the trail passes. The lake is considered almost bottomless; no one pretends to know how deep it is, possibly because no one has come to it prepared for deep-sea soundings. It bears the name of Sardine Lake, from the fact that in 1863 or '4 a pack mule loaded with sardines made a fatal misstep from the trail and slipped into the lake, never more to appear. Into this ice-cold and snow-bound lake Muir and I had, three years before, taken an elegant "header" from a rock some fifteen feet high, scrambling out upon the snow of its margin, after a few strokes, fairly glowing with the delicious shock. Such a plunge is worth a hundred dusty miles of travel. At half-past one o'clock we reined up our steeds at the famous Soda Springs, in the Tuolumne Meadows. As an agreeable beverage, the water of these springs is preferable to any springs in the State. It is highly charged with carbonic acid gas, which keeps it perpetually bubbling and boiling, as it pours up from nature's laboratory. We found a cabin at the springs, owned by a man named Lambert, who bottles the water and takes it to Yosemite Valley, where it is the only soda water in use. The Tuolumne Meadows, in which the soda springs are located, are seven or eight miles long, stretching in an unbroken, gently descending slope of grassy meadow from the base of Mount Dana westward to Court-house Rock, the main Tuolumne River flowing through the centre. Pursuing our course down these charming meadows, we were confronted by two of the most beautiful crags in all the Sierra—Cathedral Peak and Unicorn Peak—both rising up out of dense forests of silver fir interspersed with the graceful Williamson spruce. Unicorn Peak rears up a slender horn of rock, gradually diminishing to a little point, on which there is barely room for two persons to stand, as I have demonstrated by a somewhat arduous climb. The peak overhangs at its summit, and altogether has a most striking and picturesque appearance. Cathedral Peak is no less remarkable in outline, its summit being divided into vertical shafts, pinnacles, and sculptured spires supported by massive buttresses. It is forbidding in appearance to the boldest mountaineer, but its stupendous massiveness, combined with its airy, cathedral-like architecture, convey to the observer a deep sense of sublimity and awe. Between these two peaks, deeply hidden in the forest that surrounds it, lies Echo Lake, the wild scenery of whose shores demands a more skillful pen than mine to depict. We found a charming camping place that night on the shores of Glacial Lake, some miles further on, but our animals suffered from the lack of feed, and although it was in the middle of summer, a roaring fire and warm blankets were most acceptable and essential to comfort. Glacial Lake—of which the artist Munger has painted a picture that does it justice—would delight the scientific heart of the geologist looking for a support to the glacial theory. On one shore the bare granite has been polished and striated by the erosive force of resistless rivers of ice firmly holding their granite chisels. The glacier has even left its tools still stranded on the shore—huge boulders borne from some distant mountain. The forest bounds the lake on one side, reaching a tongue of hardy pines down to the very edge of the narrow outlet of the lake, that conveys its waters by an almost vertical plunge of two thousand feet into Lake Tenaya.

Wednesday, July 3.—We were so near Yosemite again that we might have returned in a half day's ride, but resolved to spend another day in further exploration. Accordingly we started out early in the morning, and skirting the head of Tenaya Cañon, and making directly for Mount Hoffman, in whose wild ravines heads Yosemite Creek, that rushes thence in rapid course to the terrible leap into the Yosemite, known to all the world as Yosemite Falls. On the way we passed Court House Rock, a wondrous shaft of granite, whose sheer precipitous walls rising twenty-five hundred feet perpendicularly above its base impress one even more deeply with awe and majesty than the far-famed South Dome of the Yosemite. At one o'clock we reached a point of interest for which we were searching—Lake Hoffman, a very deep, intensely blue sheet of ice-water set on the bosom of Mt. Hoffman, just at timber line, jealously guarded by surrounding crags. Here we did justice to Peregrine's luncheon, feasting our eyes as well with the distant views of all the outlying domes, crags, peaks, and forest slopes that surround Yosemite: Sentinel Dome, South Dome, Cloud's Rest, Mts. Lyell and Dana, Cathedral and Unicorn Peaks, Mt. Starr King, Mt. Clark, and all the most striking landmarks about the valley were spread out as a panorama before us.

Thursday, July 4.—Saddling up at a moderately early hour, we rode leisurely to the ruin of the northern wall of Yosemite, at the head of Indian Cañon, followed the brink to the top of Yosemite Falls, lunched on the edge of the precipice where the stream takes its vertical plunge of 1,600 feet, then resumed our course down the zigzag trail by the side of the fall, reaching the hotel from which we had started ten days before at 3:30 P. M. We had swept around a circle whose centre I will place at Mount Lyell for convenience (the common corner of Mariposa, Fresno, and Inyo counties), and whose periphery by the winding and erratic course we traveled measured some two hundred odd miles. We got back without accident, the ladies having endured the hardships and fatigue of the trip with remarkable strength and courage. Such a trip is rarely taken by ladies, and it may be well to remark that those of whom I speak were not novices at mountain climbing, having ascended the heights and ridden the animals of Yosemite for years past. The geographical position of our route may be traced on any map by the foregoing description, or it may be roughly imagined when I say that within the boundaries of the circle we had encompassed lie Mount Lyell, Mount Dana, Mount Ritter, the Minarets, Mount Clark, Gray Mountain, Red Mountain, Mount Starr King, Cloud's Rest, Cathedral Peaks, Unicorn Peak, and other lesser elevations. Of all these mountain heights, Mount Ritter is the most difficult and most dangerous to ascend, and it has been ascended by but four persons to my knowledge. Its crumbling rocks and vertical pinnacles do not invite the cautious mountaineer to a trial of his prowess. Mount Dana, at whose feet we rode in crossing Mono Pass, is very easy of ascent, and may be reached in two days' ride from Yosemite. From its summit you look down upon Mono Lake nestling far below and resembling a wash basin. It is a laundryman's paradise, if Mark Twain's story be true, and a wash-basin that would be a fortune if some philanthropic Titan would set it down in the heart of San Francisco. The elevation of Mount Dana is 13,227 feet. Mount Ritter is estimated at a little in excess of 13,250 feet. Mount Lyell is 13,200 feet, while Mono Lake is 6,500 feet. The Soda Springs lie at an elevation of 8,500 feet.

I do not know that this narrative, for which my diary has given me the material, will incite any adventurous tourists to follow in our footsteps, but to all travelers in this region I offer this gratuitous advice concerning their equipment: Nothing save what is absolutely needful should be taken, two or three changes of underclothing, plenty of blankets, and the necessary provisions and cooking utensils being all that is required, no tent even being wanted unless there are ladies in the party. Stout shoes or boots, with the soles well studded with nails, are absolutely necessary for climbing, and a flannel shirt and the common blue overalls make the lightest and the most serviceable mountain costume. I may here mention that the ladies of our party all rode astride, and in no other way would it have been possible for them to have traveled over the rough country we encountered. It is the common-sense way to ride in the mountains, and is infinitely safer and less fatiguing, both for horse and rider. One other important point, be sure of the "doctor," i. e., your cook, for upon him mainly depends the comfort and pleasure of the cruise, and it is astonishing what a variety of well-cooked and appetizing dishes are at the command of a good mountain cook. From Lake Tahoe, on the north, to Mount Whitney, on the south, the whole range of the Sierra is one grand camping ground, and the whole extent of country between these two points, some three hundred miles, can be compassed in a summer's vacation. I have always preferred making my early start from the Yosemite Valley, partly from a desire to get a yearly view of it, but mainly because a good outfit can always be obtained there at a reasonable expense, but any mountain town near the Sierra will do as well, and in the next year when the new road to the Yosemite, via Fresno Flat, shall have been built, the tourist will be able to reach the Falls I have described in a day's easy riding from Fresno Flat over a fair trail, and can thence push on to Mammoth Lake, the Hot Springs and Geysers in five to six hours. From the middle of June to October, any of these trips can be made with safety and pleasure, the earlier month being best, as feed for the animals becomes very scant in the wake of the sheep, the summer pest of the mountains. Our eleven days in the Sierra were all too short.

NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Rates of Subscription, $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance. Postage prepaid. City subscribers served for 35 cents per week. Single copies, 10 cents.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."
 Branch Office, Cooper's Bookstore, 746 Market Street
 Agent at San Jose—F. A. Taylor.
 News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders should be addressed.
 A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PIXLEY, }
 FRED. M. SOMERS, } . . . . . Editors.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1878.

THE ARGONAUT.

It will not be two years till the 24th of next March since we first attempted the enterprise of giving to the people of this coast a weekly journal. Following no model, attempting to rival no contemporary, and seeking to invade the province of no occupied field, we sought to find in our own way a place for ourselves. We determined that we would make a paper of original features, independent in the utterance of its opinions, and in order that we might be in a most marked and emphatic manner distinct from our contemporaries of the daily press, we resolved to be respectable. We do not aspire to be the most "brilliant and fearless," nor the most "enterprising," nor to have the "largest sheet," nor the "largest circulation." We do not claim that we are read by "the masses," nor that we are the "organ" of any class, or sect, or occupation, or party; but we claim that we are clean. The ARGONAUT has never made money enough to tempt us to consult blotter, day-book, or ledger, as to what opinions we should entertain or advance, and it never will. We are not watch-dogs at the door of State or municipal treasures. We do not contemplate ourselves as standing upon the public rampart, to warn of impending dangers. We are not spies to ferret out other people's weaknesses, nor detectives to sneak into the privacies of domestic life to expose human follies. We never hope to become severely literary or to make our paper so exceedingly nice and super-excellent that it will not interest ordinary people. We are ambitious to get circulation enough, and advertising enough, and thus earn money enough, to command the best thoughts and the best writings of the Pacific Coast; to make a paper that shall more than fill the field left vacant by the Overland Monthly; to encourage and develop the literary taste of the Pacific; to pay for the best writings, and become a vehicle for the best thoughts. Our readers, in measuring our journal, must consider the conditions under which it is printed. We have a jurisdiction on this side of the Rocky Mountains of less than one million of English-reading people, hence we must freight our vessel with a miscellaneous cargo, some politics, some story, some poetry, some society and theatrical gossip, some wit and humor, in order that by addressing ourselves to all tastes we may secure a circulation. If the ARGONAUT were printed in New York, it would have for its market 40,000,000 of readers. It would, by an arrangement with an enterprising news association, be promptly and cheaply distributed throughout the nation. We labor under difficulties incident to our isolation; difficulties that we shall endeavor to overcome, by making an arrangement to place our journal upon the news-stands of six thousand Eastern agents of the American News Company during the coming summer. So far, we have made no efforts to have the ARGONAUT distributed in our State, leaving it to make its own way by its own merits. We have not, as yet, overmuch bored people to take our paper. It has obtained a large circulation, and in the coming season we shall push it by an earnest and systematic canvass of the entire coast. We present to-day a thirty-two page number. It is a specimen of what we can do, and what we intend to do. We are ambitious to have a weekly journal of brilliant original matter, breezy of the Pacific, independent in its opinions upon all questions, earnest, honest, respectable, clean, and decent. We mean it to be entertaining and acceptable to families and readers of the better class. In its paper, type, presswork and general material, we shall make it as good as the mechanical facilities of the coast will permit. As this enterprise is not a purely mercenary one, we think we have a right to ask those of our readers who are persons of property, business position, who are interested in preserving a healthy public opinion, and in upholding social order, property, and good government, to encourage and aid us. Our increase of circulation is steady and healthful, our enterprise is upon a solid financial basis. It is intended to be permanent, and to grow as the population of the State increases. The Overland Monthly obtained a large circulation at the East, and was a welcome guest in all Eastern literary circles. After its first two years, it had not so many Eastern subscribers nor near so large a sale as we now enjoy, hence we feel encouraged to push ourselves to a broad and national recognition. There are many brilliant writers upon this coast, to whom we are even now paying large amounts for original matter, and we promise that our encouragement to this talent shall keep pace with our own prosperity, and that we shall deal as generously with literary people as the public deals with us. On our initial page will be found a design drawn by Mr. Jules Tavernier, and engraved by E. Largarde, of the establishment of Harper Bros., emblematic of our name and venture, representing primitive California, in the shape of an Indian maiden, who from across the bay at Berkeley is shading her eyes to watch the first vessel as it glides at sunset through the Golden Gate, the forerunner of our nervous life and civilization. It is our trademark, henceforth a permanent heading and title-page; for the ARGONAUT will never be changed to a daily, as many of our friends suggest. It will never become a monthly, as others desire; but so long as its present proprietors control it, it will remain in its present shape, and will be content to hold that safe middle ground between the hastily gotten-up and sensational daily journal, and the more carefully arranged and stately, but unprofitable magazine.

It is believed by the Christian world that nineteen centuries ago, in the village of Bethlehem, in the land of Judea, Jesus the Christ was born miraculously of a virgin mother by the power of the Holy Ghost, a birth heralded by signs and foretold by prophecies. To the shepherds watching on Judean hills, the angel of God appeared in glory, announcing the birth of a Saviour of the world, of the royal line of David. From Persia came wise men, magians of the East, to the infant at Bethlehem, with adoration and bearing royal gifts. They saw his star in the heavens, and followed it. It rested over the manger in the stable where between ox and ass the royal infant lay, and there they worshiped him. To-day, hundreds of millions, embracing the most cultured men of the most advanced civilizations, greet each other with joy, exchanging gifts and salutations, and rejoice at the birth of Jesus the Messiah, the Son of God. His flight from Herod, his marvelous teachings, the purity of his life, his sublime moral code, his miracles, his betrayal, his death, his resurrection and ascension, are the stories of our Sacred Writings. He found a world in idolatry, and changed it. His teachings and example confounded the wisdom of ages. He laid broad and deep the foundations of a system that now dominates the world. He overturned and mastered the superstitions of centuries, and gave to the nations a religion that, marching apace with the highest culture, keeps abreast with the intellectual progress of the age, and enrolls among its votaries the brightest of human minds. Science arrays itself against none of the teachings of Jesus. The subtlest intellects find no flaw in the perfect moral code of this inspired teacher. His was a wisdom deeper than all human learning; his a code more consummate than re-scrip-t of emperors or edicts of kings; his a philosophy surpassing that taught in academic groves; his an example of loving self-denial transcending all human example. To-day, in the imperial palace of the Czar, and away northward on the frozen sledge-paths, wherever the Greek Church holds dominion, the salutation is given, "Christ is born!" and the kiss exchanged. From the Tiber, and wherever in distant lands the Church of Rome has borne the religion of Jesus the Christ, this is hallowed as the natal day of God's Only Beloved Son. Wherever in all the world the Protestant faith is taught, there joyous bells proclaim anew the glad tidings that the angel of the Lord announced to the expectant shepherds on the lone Judean hills. This is the Christian world's best holiday. In our mother land it is a day of holly and ivy, of yule log and Christmas carols, of feasting and religious service; in ours it is a day for exchanging gifts, a day of social reunions, of toothsome dinners, of mince-pies and plum-puddings, of morning thanksgiving and of evening jollity and dance and song. In Roman, Protestant, Greek and Lutheran circles, by the authority of church and by the sanction of custom, it is to be regarded by old and young as a merry day. To all our readers, then, we wish a Merry, Merry Christmas!

At the Church of the Holy Trinity in the city of New York, a few weeks since, there assembled a convention of intelligent believers in the Second Coming of Christ. The venerable Dr. Tyng, of the Episcopal Church, presided; bishops, pastors, professors and laymen, of all the evangelical churches were in attendance, all of whom are believers in the personal and pre-millennial coming of the Lord Jesus to rule the world, not in a spiritual sense, but coming with actual personal presence—not as before the Man of Sorrows and acquainted with grief, without place where to lay his head, but glorious as the heir of God, possessor of the kingdom to rule the earth, and as a civil potentate to give laws to mankind. He is to herald the dawn of the millennium. His royal presence is to illumine the world, and drive sin, ignorance, and folly out from it. It is claimed that this doctrine is proved by the natural and faithful rendering of the New Testament, and does not depend upon the fanciful interpretations of prophecy. Under this interpretation, believers in the Second Advent look perpetually for His coming. The time and hour they have not dared to fix. Unlike the Millerites, who recently flourished their fanciful arithmetical calculations of years and days and periods, exhibiting curious pictures of beasts with horns, of altars and vials, with sensuous images of a royal incarnation, with absurd antics in preparation for an ascension, with insane ravings, and with sacrilegious nonsense, these more intelligent adventists await with patient and receptive hearts for the new and resplendent incarnation of the Divine Presence. They calculate not the day of His coming, but believe that it is near at hand, and that when it does come it will be instant and glorious. He will burst upon the world in all the irresistible Majesty of His God-like power, the King of Kings to rule the earth. This doctrine is taught, not by an ignorant and vulgar mob of fanatics, but by trained and scholarly minds, who profess to have given attentive consideration and careful, earnest study to the interpretation of the language of revelation and the teachings of the New Testament in reference to the Second Coming of Christ. It is our province to note this new direction to the current of theological thought, not to discuss it, not to express an opinion concerning it. This is the Christian's holiday; this is the fitting time for all who believe the Christian doctrine of the First Coming of Christ, or who hold opinions regarding the Second Advent of the Redeemer, to rejoice and be exceeding glad.

We have never doubted the authority of the General Government to deny to any class of foreign people the right to come to the United States of America. It is a proposition the denial of which would be to declare that the United States of America was not a sovereign power. We have never doubted that a State had authority to deny access to her shores of any class of foreign people, whom her political authority may declare to be dangerous to the welfare, health, morals, or repose of the community; to deny this is to declare that States are not sovereign. We have regarded every law made in the endeavor to vex and annoy the Chinese by State and municipal authority, in California, as a cowardly attempt to gain, by indirection, an end not attainable by honest and open legislation. We have always looked upon those who assault the Chinese, and who are guilty of acts of cruelty and violence against them, as barbarians unworthy the name of American citizens. The proposition introduced to the Constitutional Convention by Colonel Barnes to remove the Chinese from the State by legislative and judicial action, and to enforce penalties against all who employ them, has at least the merit of directness. It is taking the Mongolian ass by the ears and brings the consideration of the question to the legislative and judicial departments of the State Government, and at the same time presents to the General Government a direct issue; an issue that ought to be decided by the courts, and, when determined, ought to be acquiesced in by the people of this coast, unless they shall decide that the grievance is one that justifies rebellion against Federal authority. The proposition referred to is at variance with all our ideas of honor and generosity. The Chinese, who are among us, are here by virtue of an international law, entered into at the earnest solicitation of the Government of the United States with the Imperial Government of China, and we are bound by every consideration of law, honor, and humanity to recognize the law, abide by its consequences, and treat all Mongolians in our midst in the spirit of its provisions. We are in favor of an immediate revision of the Burlingame treaty, and of the passage by Congress of such laws as shall moderate the volume of Chinese immigration now pouring in upon us. This is, we believe, the feeling of all the better and more intelligent people of this coast. While we are impatient at the noisy and cowardly vapors of our own ignorant masses, and still more indignant at the shameful moral cowardice exhibited by all the Democratic leaders, and by many of the Republicans upon this Chinese question, we are equally angry at the shameful indifference manifested by intelligent people at the East, and their studied determination to decide this question in ignorance of the true condition of things, and to subordinate all facts to their sentimental ideas. We are equally indignant at the political authorities at Washington—the President and his Cabinet—because they will not give to this question the consideration its importance demands. In view of bringing the authorities of the Pacific States to an early and decisive collision with the authorities of the Federal Government, we favor the adoption by the Constitutional Convention of the unconstitutional, illegal, and otherwise impolitic clause suggested by Colonel Barnes. It will bring about one of three results—a modification of the Burlingame treaty, or an armed uprising that shall terminate in a subjugated people, or an independent empire on the Pacific Coast.

PRATTLE.

My son, when thy life shall have reached its highest point, and thou findest thyself sinking, throw thou overboard a vice, and thereafter, from time to time, another and another, relinquishing thy last foible with thy last breath. So shalt thou retard thy descent, and by well-timed renunciation of gluttony, drunkenness, tobacco, the ladies, late hours, and such-like ballast, come to earth with an amiable collision that shall not disturb thee. And for the better ordering of thy descent, after this fashion, fail not, my son, to start with as much ballast as thy health can lift.

"Kisses," observes a poet, "are sips of the wine of love." It is royally good wine, too, but when a fellow crushes a flask of it with Susan B. Anthony he observes that the vintage of 1740 is a shade too dry.

A life insurance company in Memphis refuses to pay one of its risks, because, although the policy-holder is as dead as Abel, the doctor, who should have certified to that fact, is himself as dead as Cain. The clergyman, whose certificate would serve in a pinch, is deadlier than either. The widow is an interested party, the undertaker has six feet of solid earth above him, and there are no living neighbors, unless some have revived since burial. On the whole, the financial future of that luckless policy is so discouraging that no fewer than five hundred speculators have already sold it short, and there is a powerful syndicate trying to make a corner in it to "bust" out the bears.

Elder Orson Pratt, of the Latter-Day Saints, is going to London to procure the publication of a new and revised edition of the book of Mormon. This book is an audacious plagiarism of the Bible; so an injunction will probably issue for protection of copyright, for the author of the earlier work is considered in London a British subject and a dignitary of the Church of England.

The Post entreates the theatres to put their orchestras out of sight under the stage. I favor this reform in the case of every theatre except Baldwin's. If I should advocate depriving the audiences there of the pleasure of looking at Mr. Widmer's back hair, some sand-lot orator would denounce me as a selfish monopolist.

Tavernier, leaving Monterey,
To seek the City by the Bay,
Said, as he shook the dust from off
His feet, "I dare no longer stay."

My truthful genius would not stoop
To draw a ragged, greasy group
Of villagers as saints, nor make
A palace of each chicken coop.

But though I fly this pleasant spot,
I pardon those who made it hot;
Indeed, I'll send friend Marple down
To paint the beggars as they're not."

I wish Mr. Charles Warren Stoddard would, in his next letter in the Sunday Chronicle, tell us something about the man he never "chummed" with, if such a man there is? When he gets to the end of his literary career, through having "chummed" the present generation to death, I suppose he'll do business with posterity, and display a sign something like this:

Chumming Done Here.
Orders executed with Neatness and Dispatch, and Parties served at their Residences. No Connection
With any other Establishment.

The Christian Intelligencer holds that the Welsh, because they are all Protestants, are all moral. Yet Sam Williams, of the Bulletin, is a Welshman, and Evans is a Welshman, and Taffy was a Welshman! I pause for a reply.

"My child, have you heard of the difference between Mr. James C. Flood and Mr. Squire P. Dewey?" "Oh, yes, my teacher, I know all about it. It is a difference of depth expressed in their names; the one is an inundation, the other a dew." "Well answered, lad. Now tell me—considering these gentlemen's watery names—can their quarrel be justly termed a naval engagement?" "I have already well considered that point, may it please you, and I think not." "Why?" "Because if it were an engagement of any kind Mr. Dewey would have broken it long ago." "Is there no other reason why it cannot properly be so called?" "Yes; those words are already in use to describe the nature of Mr. Dewey's former connection with the bonanza—before Mr. Flood severed the umbilicus." "What!" "Twas but a sudden pun—'tis gone. Pray give me your arm, and let us leave this place."

The holidays are fairly laid on, the prosperous merchant commits his unusual excess in advertising and the local poet garners a harvest of dollars. For his palm has been crossed with silver and he puts into rhyme the merits of his patron's wares. Pegasus is become a peddler's pack-horse, soaring to the "highest heaven of invention" and "dropping down with costly bales." All other things being equal, the man who can write the worst verses gets the most money, but he who can sing them when written has a distinct advantage over him who can only declaim them. Dave Nesfield, caroling the worth of the Automatic Sewing Machine grows fat and prosperous; Dan O'Connell, reciting the splendors of the I. X. L. Store, achieves a less considerable competence, while I, who have neither song nor eloquence, can but thrust my metrical eulogium of Muller's Brazilian Pebble Spectacles into unwilling hands for a pittance, for which Judas Iscariot would have scorned to fill an order. Dan and Con Mahoney, I hear, are doing pretty well writing odes to a patent stereoscope and embossing them for the blind.

When Eve and Adam first were made,
Ere fairly they'd been shaped and laid
Upon a sunny slope to dry,
A Chinaman was passing by,
Who woke our father from his sleep,
Grinned, and said, "Washing done d— cheap."
(This scamp's success still displays
A sign inscribed so to the gaze
Of Adam's children—"It's a pity—
On C street, in Virginia City")
Now Ad. took in, when out of trance,
The situation at a glance;
Then said—the while his eyes were turned
On Eve, whose tender skin they burned,
Raising a little curl of smoke
Where'er they fell—"I think you spoke
Of washing; I am destitute;
In truth, I've but a single suit,
And that—well, John, you may expect it
If this fair lady should reject it."

The foregoing verse, or rather the shining pun which illumines them with the radiant effect of a bright red pumpkin in a field of sombre buckwheat, was suggested by a conversation of which I recently heard this much: "My dear fellow, you are blue since your return; did you make no conquests while gone?" "H'm! well, I asked a devilish fine girl to marry me." "And did she reject your suit?" "No; she accepted it—not the whole suit; only the breeches."

A respectable contemporary gets afoul of Colonel Bob Ingersoll and drubs him stoutly because, he as what we may call a practicing infidel, "would leave us without a light or guide, to grope in entire darkness. He should not attempt," says this mindless parrot, "to tear down unless he can build up for us something better—but he has nothing better to offer." I fatigue and fall ill of this hoary, decrepit, and doddering protest of brainless imbecility; it is the first, last, intermediate and only argument of mental vacuity. In the mouth of a Christian it is an unconscious, but unconditional surrender, for it distinctly implies that there may be something better than Christianity—that Christianity is a make-shift. On the lips of one who is himself a sceptic, though a theoretical one, it is an indecent assault upon common sense, for it means that any kind of error is better than truth. It is this kind of creatures by whom it is commonly and most shamelessly paraded. I thank heaven I have no prejudice either for or against religion, but I should like to write a history of religious controversy on the prepared ears of some of its assailants and defenders, and I would engage that if supplied with a sufficient quantity of the ears the work should extend to not less than ten thousand volumes.

No man of sane intelligence will plead for religion on the ground that it is better than nothing. It is not better than nothing if it is not true. Truth is better than anything or all things; the next best thing to truth is absence of error. When you are in the dark, stand still; when you do not know what to do, do nothing. To say "don't take away my faith unless you can give me another" is to beg the question—to assume the very point in dispute for the taker-away denies that you need a faith. If you think you do that is your affair. He is right to rap the skull of what he thinks error whenever and wherever it is thrust up; as to that it is not permitted to men to differ, but only on the question is it error. We do not ask a snake if snakes are useful, or if it is itself better than another snake; we only ascertain if it is a snake. Sometimes it is a harmless, necessary hangman's rope.

Speaking of religion, hangman's ropes, and such like moral agencies, I am reminded of an execution I once witnessed, at which a brace of miscreants assisted on the scaffold, and some thousands of not very sympathetic soldiers below it and about. It was at Murfreesboro, Tennessee, in war-time, and the fellows were hanged by the military for a murder of revolting atrocity, committed without orders. At the critical moment one of them began a self-righteous assertion that he was "going home to Jesus." As the words left his mouth a railway engine standing near by uttered a loud and unmistakably derisive Hoot—hoot! It may have been accident, it may have been design; at any rate it expressed the "sense of the meeting" better than a leg's length of resolutions; and when the drop fell from beneath the feet of that pious assassin and his mate the ropes about their necks were actually kept slack for some seconds by the gusts of laughter ascending from below. They are the only persons I know in the other world who enjoyed the ghastly distinction of leaving this to the sound of inextinguishable merriment.

I once saw a cavalry soldier shot for desertion. He was seated astride his coffin, a black bandage about his eyes, his arms bound behind his back. The officer of the firing squad gave the commands "Ready—aim!" and a dozen loaded carbines were leveled at his breast. We heard him call out, up went the guns and the officer was seen to step forward and bend his ear to the man's lips. Then the officer stepped back, repeated the commands, and a second later the poor fellow was a thing of shreds and patches. "What did he say to you?" I afterward asked the officer. "Wanted to know if he couldn't have a saddle."

If the poem that accompanied the Beaconsfield testimonial has been published, I had not the good luck to see it, but the initial couplet appears in one of the morning papers as follows:

"The nations cease from war—safe, happy, free;
Thanks, noble Beaconsfield, to God and thee!"

It is to be hoped the whole poem was a gem worthy of the casket which Mr. Stott's genius created, but the conclusion of these two seems to be censurable in the highest degree, as not duly recognizing the relative rank of an English nobleman and the Deity; "thee and God" would have been a better sequence. I fear Lord Beaconsfield will consider the verses irreverent.

For example, now, what could be nicer than to take up the Morning Call at breakfast and see staring at you the head lines of Dr. Quackhunters' nine hundred and tenth letter on catarrh, with a description of the symptoms, which makes you chuck your soft-boiled egg into the middle of next week, and get up and blow your nose with the folding doors?

The forerunner of a new religious dispensation has appeared in England, where he has already a large following. This ecclesiastical tramp goes clad in sheepskins, trimmed with red flannel, has straws in his hair and bears aloft a blackboard inscribed: "I am the Prophet Elias"—which isn't likely. No, he can't be Elias—nor Elisha, nor Elijah. These were all prophets, but they're dead. Has anybody seen Eli Perkins lately?

"Who's got old Stewart," Mr. Hilton cries,
"His rotten body," Seligman replies,
Was taken by some robber from its hole;
"But you, my friend, have got his rotten soul."

A foolish contemporary is afflicted with the opinion that "the time is nearly gone by when the doctors can humbug plain people with their Latin names of diseases and drugs." Let us prepare to welcome the better era when every disease and every drug will have as many names as there are languages and dialects, when the medical knowledge of one country will be a sealed book to the medical students of every other, when a prescription cannot be filled ten miles from where it was written, and when the uninstructed instructors of the people shall perform grave bygone gambolling of joy at the second advent of the sainted old woman with her "mixtures rank of midnight weeds collected." But O, thou just and beneficent heaven, take not from us in these few remaining dark days the amusement of curiously considering how fools distrust the wise, and how ignorance is impatient of knowledge.

For how long must one have been dead in order to be body-snatched without blame to the snatcher? We curiously dig in the old Indian rancharias and pack off the bone of the departed brave without compunction and without reproof. The "mound-builders'" melancholy remains are held sacred by nobody, and may be ogled and pawed in every museum. A skull, a femur, or a few vertebrae from the field of Shiloh or Gettysburg is an acceptable souvenir of "the late unpleasantness." Schliemann makes no bones of not only uncovering those of Agamemnon (Schliemann's Agamemnon) but robbing them of their ornaments, which respectable Christian gentlemen purchase. Considering these pleasant customs, and the honors accorded to those resurrectionists who make a notable and interesting "find" in some freshly-opened grave or broken vault, is it not a little finical and carping to howl about "desecration," "sacrilege," "ghouls," and the like, when a dead relation of a dead President is haled out of his hole into a dissecting room, or the rubbish of a departed millionaire lugged off in a sack? If a man freshly dead has rights which we are bound to respect, at what stage of the unpleasant business in which he is engaged does he forfeit them, and why?

A correspondent would like to know how to sound the final j in the name of Wilhenj. It is not intended to be pronounced; it is merely a rude hieroglyphic, or symbol, representing a bit of cat-gut, and indicating that the fellow is a fiddler.

EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS OF AN EARLY CALIFORNIAN.

Contrasting the Present Metropolis of the Pacific Coast with the Hamlet of only Thirty Years Ago.

YERBA BUENA, OR SAN FRANCISCO—1847. VIEW OF COVE AND GOAT ISLAND BEYOND.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 30, 1847.—We cast anchor before this town, called by the Spaniards Yerba Buena, on the 26th March, at 5 P. M. The Independence, Cyane, and Lexington vessels of war, were near us, besides several merchantmen. I slept that night at the Portsmouth House, on the Plaza kept by a man named Brown, where I met the Alcalde, Leidesdorff, late American Vice-Consul, Dr. Robert Semple, a six-footer in buckskin, one of the bear-flag party and editor of the Californian, other residents, and several navy officers—our old friend, Frank Conover, among them. As six months had passed since we left New York, I sat up listening to the news. From all accounts, Stockton and Fremont have disturbed, rather than quieted, the people of the country, who were favorably disposed toward us at the time Commodore Sloat raised our flag at Monterey. Everything seeming peaceful, he went home soon after, leaving Stockton in command of the squadron. About the same time, a lieutenant of the marines, named Gillespie, arrived here, and proceeded north with dispatches for Fremont—probably letters from Senator Benton, informing him of the intentions of our government. Fremont was on his road to Oregon when Gillespie overtook him. He turned back, and, reinforcing his band with a party of emigrants who had raised the bear-flag, seized horses from the rancheros to mount them, and cattle to feed them, and marched toward Monterey. At Sonoma, some of our best friends—General Vallejo, his brother, his brother-in-law, Mr. Leese, an American, and a Colonel Prudhon—were made prisoners. At this place, where Stockton was received with honors—procession, dinner, etc.—numerous Californians assisting, he informed them that he and his army would wade ankle-deep in blood, if necessary, to conquer the country. The officers of the army, and of the navy outside of Stockton's own ship, believe the late troubles have been caused mainly by those who were ambitious to make history for themselves. The Independence and Cyane left here the early part of the month. We do not know their destination, but suppose they are to blockade Acapulco or Mazatlan. Last Sunday I rode to the Mission of Dolores, three miles from here, in company with Leidesdorff, Captain and Mrs. —, etc., etc.—eight in all. The priest, Padre Santillan, is an Indian. He was assisted in the service by several boys clothed in priestly garments. A numerous congregation of Californians were kneeling as we entered the church door. The interior was decorated with pearl shells, and many gilt and tinsel ornaments, and illuminated with candles. The women were dressed in rich colored silks and satins, with colored mantillas, or rebozos, drooping from their heads, and the men in blue jackets, and calzoneros, with silver buttons, and red and blue serapes on their shoulders—the effect was beautiful. We did not remain through the service, but walked about to examine the Mission buildings. They formed three sides of a hollow square, and were all built of adobe; some of the garden walls are composed of bullocks skulls, and horns piled up and stuck together with adobe—all in ruins, with the exception of those near the church. A corral shows where the bull fights are commenced. I hear the animal is not confined to it, but often rushes through the anything of the kind I have ever seen. He is very entertaining and hospitable, and his house is a great resort; a hearty welcome and a cup of delicious coffee await his visitors at any hour. There is only one garden in the place—Leidesdorff's—which has been made by scraping the decayed leaves from under the scrub oaks and forming flower-beds of the loam. His Scotch gardener has succeeded wonderfully in this enterprise. You must know that the land hereabout is covered with sand, excepting in the heart of the town. At the Presidio, and about the Mission, where the winds have full sweep—a northwest gale blowing daily during the summer, from 11 A. M. till sundown—the sand hills are thickly covered with scrub-oak woods, which lean away from the winds as though they would avoid them.

May 31, 1847.—This letter will be brought to you by General Kearney's party. Every one regrets his leaving. He has the esteem of all who inhabit this country, Californians as well as foreigners. Fremont is with him under arrest. Colonel Mason is, of course, left in command. News of the taking of Vera Cruz by General Scott, and of General Taylor's great victory over Santa Ana, sent by the British Minister at Mexico, has come to us from Mazatlan. We celebrated here with the greatest enthusiasm by illuminating the town, firing salutes, burning tar-barrels, etc. If military successes, such as any army might be proud of, fill your soul with joy, think of the effort they produced upon us, children of the republic, in an unfriendly territory, and so far separated from it. But for all this glory, how much we shall rejoice in peace—a peace that adds California to the Union. If it is restored to Mexico, you may depend upon it that we shall fight for it upon our own hook, for wherever an emigrant has obtained a piece of land he will defend it till death. Farms of the Spaniards, lands that have never been cultivated before, are worked on joint account, and will eventually be in their possession. The Californians work but little, and, receiving large incomes from their growing farms, are enabled to lead easy lives. Bob gave a fandango at the Mission of Dolores last week. There were some thirty señoritas present, besides the Mormonitas; three of them were quite pretty, and one married to a man named Andrews, of Salem, Massachusetts. Two of her brothers were shot by Fremont's party. Notwithstanding their gracious manners I could not help thinking they hated us for our American blood. The dancing commenced at nine o'clock, and we left them still at it at five in the morning. We ride on horseback almost every day, each resident having a cavallada of from two to a dozen horses, cared for by a vaquero. On the few days when the fog will allow us to catch sight of them, the views from the road to the Presidio are very fine, and varied. At one moment you are picking your way through the thickest scrub-oak shrubbery, and the next galloping over a beautiful plain; your path through the woods in the early morning before the northwester has set in, and while the sun is unveiled by fog, is overrun with rabbits and quail, and if you choose you may give chase to the coyote, who jogs along unconcernedly not very far ahead of you. Wild flowers are scattered far and wide over the plain, brilliant in color, and beautiful enough for the choicest garden; and madules (strawberries), just ripe, are waiting to be picked here and there, and all along the road. Of a clear day the beauty of the Bay of San Francisco, and of the hills and mountains which encompass it, are beyond my powers of description. Our rides extend to an old fort near the entrance to the Bay, but on our return, we always call upon the officers at the Presidio, to tell the news, or to listen to one of Captain Lippitt's stories.

June 29, 1847.—Last evening I was introduced to Commodore Stockton, at General Vallejo's. He has just purchased a large and valuable estate near Santa Clara, and is on his way home over the mountains. We have heard of the capitulation of San Juan d'Ulloa, and of our army being within one day's march of the City of Mexico. Where will you find laurels sufficient to cover the victors? We have had glory enough; send us peace. Business is dull. Land speculations occupy every one's attention at present. Think of fifty vara lots (one hundred and thirty and a half feet square,) in San Francisco being sold for seven hundred and fifty dollars! It seems like 1837 on a small scale.

October 15, 1847.—Governor Mason paid us a visit about three weeks ago, which he said he enjoyed much. We did our best to entertain him. Dinner parties were given him every day of his sojourn, and a ball, which surpassed any before given, enabled him to see collected together "our best society." We sent all around the Bay for Spanish ladies, and had quite a fine collection of them, including Doña Dolores, the belle of the Contra Costa.

December 6, 1847.—An overland express (Kit Carson) has arrived at Monterey, and we have just received a very probable rumor that Santa Ana is killed, and the City of Mexico is in possession of our forces. If such is the case, peace must soon follow. We all pray for it here. Mr. Davis, of the Sandwich Islands, has lately married a daughter of Señor Estudillo, of Contra Costa. The wedding has brought all the neighborhood into town. We have given up our sleeping rooms to the señoras and señoritas, and have slept in our stores for two weeks past. Dinners, and suppers, and balls have followed, one upon another, so that we scarcely know how we stand. Think of dancing three nights in succession, and two of them until eight o'clock in the morning!

March 20, 1848.—Our town is increasing fast; it is three times larger than when I arrived. Politics rage to an extent known in all American cities. We have just heard a rumor of peace from Mazatlan, that Santa Ana is shot, and that we are to hold New Leon, New Mexico, Upper and Lower California, Tehuantepec, and Mazatlan. Hope we shall soon have this confirmed. Owing to the failure of the government to pay its just debts, the withdrawal of the squadron to Mazatlan, where its money is at present spent, the economy of the military government of California, the large amount of cash received for duties and locked up by the United States Quartermasters, the failure of the rancheros to pay what they owe us in consequence of the government having taken their horses and cattle for military uses without remuneration, and the recent custom of our merchants in paying cash instead of hides and tallow for goods, business is seriously affected. From all accounts we are to have a large immigration from the States this year, and from Oregon, where the Indians have begun a war of extermination. But the great inducement to immigration hereafter will be the news soon to reach the United States of the discovery of the richest gold placers ever known. Although in former years it has been found by the Indians in small quantities and brought to the notice of the priests, they had discouraged them from meddling with it, foreseeing how much it would interfere with their plans for proselytizing, and for a long and peaceful occupation of the country, and no one in those days supposed it so abundant as to render its search very remunerative. Unsought and unexpected, it may be said to have discovered itself; in consequence, however (and let us not forget it), of the enterprise of Captain John A. Sutter, who feeling the necessity of a good supply of timber for himself and for the immigrants arriving and settling about him, determined to build a saw mill on a branch of the American River, where woods were plenty. The mill was constructed and running the early part of this year. Last month a man named Marshall, who had charge of it, while looking into the race one morning (second of February), observed something sparkle, and scooped it out. On examining the little scales, he thought they might be gold, and without saying anything about the matter to his workmen, told them that he was going to the Fort. You may be sure the forty-mile ride was a hurried one, and that the eyes of the Captain and himself were never larger than when they secretly tested and proved that the particles before them were of the pure stuff. Just before dinner one day, as I sat writing at my desk, our neighbor Davis came into the store with two strangers. He held in his hand a small buckskin bag, and asked me if I could tell virgin gold when I saw it. I answered that I did not think I could, but would see; whereupon he poured from the bag some delicate little yellow scales, much lighter in color, however, than what we call guinea gold. Davis said that the men wanted to buy goods for half cash and half gold dust, at the rate of $14 per ounce, and that if it was gold, there would be a large profit on it at that price; but how were we to test it? "That is easily done by going to Bu.ka'ew's" (a jeweler who has opened a shop at Clark's Point), said I. So away we started, all four, and to the wonder of Buckalew laid the treasure before him. A touch of his nitric acid (I think it was) soon settled the matter to our satisfaction, and home we went to trade. Day after day, others came down the river to see if they really could buy anything they wanted with the dust so easily scraped together. As the stores were soon gleaned of what was most desirable, other articles long resting forgotten on the shelves were taken; in fact, anything that came to hand, as gold seemed too plenty to be worth much in the long run. Silver is hoarded, and has become so scarce that it is difficult to get enough to pay our launch hands, and bakers, and washerwomen. They "don't want gold dust any way." Larkin was here on his way to Sacramento the other day. He thought the discovery would ruin San Francisco, as a place of business, that Benicia would become of more importance, and that some place at the headwaters of the Sacramento, and near the mines, would become the future great city.

May, 1848.—Gold is sold for $9 the ounce, for silver dollars, and very few of these in circulation. It is found so easily and in such quantities that the miners seem anxious to exchange it for all kinds of commodities, and many are fearful of its depreciation. I heard of a man in camp who, being out of tobacco, and seeing a Californian prepare a cigarrito, asked him what he would take for it. "Una onza?" He deliberately paid out the gold, and soon turned into smoke what would have brought him $16 in Mexico.

LEIDESDORFF'S COTTAGE, PRESENT SITE OF ODD FELLOWS' BUILDING.

Talk of the luxury of Rome! Does not this equal the drinking of dissolved pearls? At Benicia is a country store, much patronized by launch hands to and from Sacramento, principally for drinks. The gold scales are rounded playing cards, attached with cotton cords to a wooden beam. The wooden beam is held up by another cotton cord somewhere near the centre. And the weights are little junks of lead cut to suit—no one objects. The dust is scattered carelessly, and the earth under the shanty will become a small mine at no distant day. I have seen sailors take pinches of gold dust from their waistcoat pockets, and when in stress turn them inside out, and shake them upon the counter. There plaza. As there are but few of us residents here, we are very intimate, meeting at each other's houses unceremoniously, often inviting ourselves to breakfast, dine, or sup, as we happen to fall. Besides Americans—principally New Englanders—there are a Dane, two Russians, a Swiss, and a Sandwich Islander in our little circle. Next door to the hotel lives Don Juan Vioget, a native of Switzerland, at one time a lieutenant in the Brazilian navy. He speaks four or five languages, draws skillfully, and has surveyed and made the plans of this Pueblo of Yerba Buena. The ceilings of his parlors have been painted by him in tasteful designs; and a panoramic view of the Bay, in pen and ink, exceeds is no end to the stories that are told as to the acquisition and profuse expenditure of gold. At present we seem cut off from the rest of the world, having a superabundance of the precious metal, but being unable with it to pay wages or buy food, or even to pay duties to the custom house authorities (military). However, they receive it at $12 per ounce, to be sold at auction a few months hence. There are very few scales in the country, and you would be amused to see what kind of crockery is used for gold jars. I don't know how better to describe the state of feeling among the workmen about us, than to say that I remonstrated with one of them for squandering his store. "Why, sir," he answered, "what difference does it make? I know a spot where I can go and get just as much as I want." They seem to think it inexhaustible, the quantity indeed so enormous that it must fall in price, and that they should enjoy it while they may.

NORTH BEACH—1847. J. ANA BRIONE'S HOUSE.

June 1, 1848.—The gold discovery has been serious in its effects. Farmers have left their ranches, mechanics their benches, seamen their vessels, and even traders their stores, to dig gold. The average amount collected per man is said to be from $15 to $20; some have collected $60 and $100 a day. Men are offered from $8 to $25 a day to work, cook, etc., for the miners. The old towns will hereafter be occupied only by wholesale merchants, and new ones will rise in the Sacramento country. Over fifty volunteers have deserted from their command, and our town from being the noisiest and busiest of places has become the quietest and laziest.

July 22, 1848.—The town is almost deserted; so is every town in California as far south as the news has reached. Coin is very scarce; it is much needed for duties at the Custom House. Although so many have left, we managed to assemble a sufficient number for a ball on the night of the Fourth by sending for the señoritas in all the country round. The last news from Mazatlan was not at all peaceful, and the squadron will remain there until September or October. When will the government open a way of communicating with us? Your last letters were dated January; this is too long to wait. The storekeepers are actively employed from early morn till eleven at night. Their customers are a strange-looking set, made up of Californians, trappers, Oregon emigrants, and a very few late from the States—all from the mines, ragged and dirty, having perhaps landed from launches which came in during the night. Each man has his little bag of gold, and buys blankets, boots, shirts, fine tooth combs, and soap, paying the prices asked without question, and promising to return, after cleaning and feeding, to trade. They have from $500 to $5,000 apiece. Vessels are beginning to arrive from the Sandwich Islands, Peru, Chile, Canton, Manila, and the States, and many of them must remain for a while, as the crews all leave for the mines whenever they have a chance to desert. The United States soldiers—rank and file—are also leaving.

August 10, 1848.—Most of the inhabitants have either removed to the mines, or are on the wing to and from stores or posts near "the diggings." A few merchants remain, receiving cargoes from below, and selling and distributing them with their launches to different points above. Notwithstanding the income from ports along the Pacific Coast, from the Sandwich Islands, and from home, the place looks bare. Many prophesy its decline and the uprising of a great commercial city somewhere above us, either at Benicia, or the embarcadero of Sutter's fort, or at other points equidistant from all the mines. Larkin has been shaking his wise head and lamenting over the departing glories of San Francisco; and Dr. Semple is all smiles, and, in his enthusiasm over the promised success of her rival (Benicia), almost dislocates the fingers of every hand he shakes. He was the inventor of Francesca, and of the sale of its lots as advertised, and when Yerba Buena became San Francisco, he changed its name to Benicia, "to prevent San Francisco receiving any advantage which might come to it from the confounding of names." To-day I paid $100 for hundred-vara lot No. 113 (the present corner of Townsend and Third Streets). As no survey has been made, and no stakes are driven in that part of the town, I don't know exactly the position of the lot, but will find out in due time. The water lots are receiving more consideration and will become valuable in time. At the late sale some of them brought $400. The lots are one-third as large as a fifty-vara lot. The most desirable property lies between Sacramento Street and North Beach. Leidesdorff's cottage, its adobe walls and the lot on which it was situated having been purchased from Bob Ridley, is the last house on Montgomery Street toward the Mission—no, not the last, for an old watchmaker named Russ, who came out in Stevenson's regiment (bringing his family with him) took out a fifty-vara lot some distance beyond him on the other side of the sand-hill, which hides it from the rest of the town. On it he has placed an old ship's caboose, to which he made additions sufficient to accommodate his wife and children, who have moved in from the Presidio.

November 20, 1848.—After many efforts and long waiting our public school is opened. Dr. Fourgeaud is one of the trustees, and Mr. Thomas Douglas has been elected teacher, with a salary of $1,000. The building is of fair size, standing near the old adobe custom-house on the plaza, and has already been in use for church purposes. Captain L. H. Thomas, a most estimable Welsh gentleman, reads prayers there every Sunday, and Mrs. Charles V. Gillespie has organized a Sunday-school, the first on the Pacific Coast. But the need of a minister who can preach, visit the sick and dying, and give consolation to those in trouble, being seriously felt, Mr. Gillespie has succeeded in raising $2,400 by subscription, and the Rev. Mr. Hunt, now at the Sandwich Islands, has been invited to settle here as chaplain. A census has been lately taken, showing the population to be about six hundred.

December 13, 1848.—Mr. — and family have just arrived. They have brought with them three Chinese servants, perfectly trained—two men, and one young woman named (I suppose by themselves) Marie. They are curiosities, being the first natives of the Celestial Empire who have taken up a residence in California. They are much attached to Marie, and she is very faithful to them. The Chinese, they say, make excellent servants, and it may be, although lovers of their own country, that more may come to us. Kanakas, who were good-natured, served pretty well before the mines were discovered, but it is hard to keep any one at present.

JAMES C. WARD.

DEATH AND DESOLATION.

Poems by the late Colonel Richard Realf.*

EAD—DEAD!

I shall never die, I fear.
O heart so sore bestead,
O hunger never fed,
O life uncomforted,
It is drear, very drear!

I am cold.
The sunshine glorifying all the bills;
The children dancing 'mong the daffodils;
The thrush-like melodies of maid-
ens' lips;
Brooding thanksgiving o'er dear fellowships;
The calm compassions and benignities
Of souls fast anchored in trans-
lucent seas;

The visible radiance of the Invisible,
Far glimpses of the Perfect Beautiful,
Haunting the Earth with Heaven—they warm not me;
The low voiced winds breathe very soothingly.
Yet I am cold.

Years—years.

So long the dread companionship of pain,
So long the slow compression of the brain,
So long the bitter famine and the drouth,
So long the ache for kisses on the mouth,
So long the straining of hot tearless eyes
In backward looking upon Paradise:
So long tired feet dragged falteringly and slow,
So long the solemn sanctity of woe,

Years—years.

Perhaps

There was a void in Heaven, which only she
Of all God's saintliest could fill perfectly;
Perhaps for too close clinging—too much sense
Of loving and of Love's Omnipotence,
I was stripped bare of gladness like a tree
By the black thunder blasted. It may be
I was not worthy—that some inner flaw,
Which but the eye of the Omniscient saw,
Ran darkling through me, making me unclean.
I know not; but I know that what hath been—
The thrill, the rapture, the intense repose
Which but the passion-sceptered spirit knows;
The heart's great halo lighting up the days,
The breath all incense and the lips all praise,
Can be no more forever: that what is—
Drear suffocation in a drear abyss;
Lean hands outstretched toward the dark profound,
Starved ears vain listening for a tender sound;
The set lips choking back the desolate cry
Wrung from the soul's forlornest agony,
Will last until the props of Being fall,
And the green grave's deep quiet covers all.
Perhaps the violets will blossom then
O'er me as sweetly as o'er other men:

Perhaps.

It is most sad:

This crumbling into chaos and decay.
My heart aches; and I think I shall go mad
Some day—some day.

[WRITTEN THE NIGHT BEFORE HIS SUICIDE.]

"De mortuis nil nisi bonum." When

For me this end has come and I am dead,
And the little voluble, chattering daws of men
Peek at me curiously, let it then be said
By some one brave enough to speak the truth:
Here lies a great soul killed by cruel wrong.
Down all the balmy days of his fresh youth
To his bleak, desolate noon, with sword and song,
And speech that rushed up hotly from the heart,
He wrought for liberty, till his own wound
(He had been stabbed), concealed with painful art
Through wasting years, mastered him and he swooned,
And sank there where you see him lying now
With the word "Failure" written on his brow.

But say that he succeeded. If he missed
World's honors, and world's plaudits, and the wage
Of the world's deft lacqueys, still his lips were kissed
Daily by those high angels who assuage
The thirstings of the poets—for he was
Born unto singing—and a burthen lay
Mightily on him, and he moaned because
He could not rightly utter to the day
What God taught in the night. Sometimes, nathless,
Power fell upon him, and bright tongues of flame,
And blessings reached him from poor souls in stress;
And benedictions from the black pits of shame,
And little children's love, and old men's prayers,
And a Great Hand that led him unawares.

So he died rich. And if his eyes were blurred
With thick films—silence! he is in his grave.
Greatly he suffered; greatly, too, he erred;
Yet broke his heart in trying to be brave.
Nor did he wait till Freedom had become
The popular shibboleth of courtier's lips;
He smote for her when God Himself seemed dumb
And all His arching skies were in eclipse.
He was a weary, but he fought his fight,
And stood for simple manhood; and was joyed
To see the angust broadening of the light
And new earths heaving heavenward from the void.
He loved his fellows, and their love was sweet—
Plant daisies at his head and at his feet.

Sonnet.

Love makes the solid grossness musical;
All melted in the marvel of its breaths,
Life's level facts attain a lyric swell,
And liquid births leap up from rocky deaths,
Witching the world with wonder. Thus, to-day,
Watching the crowding people in the street—
I thought the ebbing and the flowing feet
Moved to a delicate sense of rhythm away,
And that I heard the yearning faces say
"Soul, sing me this new song!" The autumn leaves
Throbbled subtly to me an immortal tune;
And when a warm shower wet the roofs at noon,
Soft melodies slid down on me from the eaves,
Dying delicious in a mystic swoon.

* The verses which head this column, and the sonnet, were found among the effects of the late Colonel Realf, and purchased by the ARGONAUT from his widow. The memorable verses written the night before his suicide have before been published, but are reproduced to fill out in a measure the solemn and morbid sequence.

REMINISCENCES.

"Black Sand Jack."—A Joke of Early Days.

In the booming days of Placerville—then more commonly known as "Hangtown"—during the years '50 and '51 there was an immense canvas building, devoted to all the wickedness and cussedness that could be originated or imported from any land. Twenty or thirty gambling tables were kept constantly running—music, rum, and the necessary glitter.

Near the centre of the large room was a long sheet-iron box stove—for in those early days there was no cast-iron about—around which were common benches for the habitués to sit on, and warm themselves during the damp and cold winter evenings.

One dark and rainy night, when the room was packed full, a man dressed entirely in buckskin came in; he was well known—known too, as a brave, fearless backwoodsman; he always carried his rifle and powder horn, and moved and looked like a revolving arsenal. But this evening, an unusual thing for him, he appeared to be drunk; his clear, strong voice would occasionally rise above the murmured din and clink of coin, so that even the sitters round the stove seemed inclined to give him all the room he wanted.

At length, in a loud voice, he called for a drink, which was given him; and then he as loudly said:

"Boys, I have lived long enough."

From his powder horn he poured a lot of powder into his hand saying, "that is all right," and touched it off—the dull puff and whirl of smoke filled the air, and it seemed as if every eye was turned toward him. Then, apparently becoming furious over some imagined trouble, he tore the large powder horn from his side, advanced to the box stove, filled with blazing wood, and threw it in, crying in a loud and stentorian voice:

"Now, let every man wait!"

But there was no waiting—through the windows, out of the doors, even through the side of the house, over the tables, players, gamblers, lookers-on, all stampeded! There never was such a hurried wreck of a house before!

But as no explosion took place, those who had left large sums of money gradually crept back; for everywhere gold was scattered, and, of course, much was found that never went on the tables again.

The backwoodsman meantime had quietly stepped out the backway, mounted his horse, and rode away in the gloom. And it was well he did so, for the gamblers hunted him for a week afterward. But eventually everybody laughed at the joke, and he became known as "Black Sand Jack," for of course his powder horn was filled with sand, except the little he turned into his own hand as an experiment—but that little experiment owedered the boys. SAXON.

The Nevada Schoolmaster.

Harry Floty was a university man, who had been some time in Nevada, and having bad luck, couldn't do better than to leave digging and take to school teaching. He was pale, slender, and scholarly looking, and the President of the Board of Trustees said to him, sorrowfully, as he brushed a tear:

"Mister, you may be book learned, but it takes more than that for a teacher in the Cranberry Gulch school, as you will find. The last teacher sleeps in yonder grave-yard; the one before him left an eye and one arm to show his incapacity; the one before was very much eaten by the eels when we found his body, and the three before him ran away with only about four eyes and six legs between them. Our boys are rough and don't stand no nonsense."

"Let me try," replied Harry mildly. "I'm weak, but I have a will. I'll open next Monday at 9 A. M."

At eight Harry went down to the school-house, with the key in one hand and a valise in the other.

Sixty scholars were loafing around in a good, big crowd to see what would turn up, while the undertaker stood near waiting for a job.

"Ready to slope if he finds we are too much for him," whispered the big, bow-legged, cross-eyed bully of the school, a devilish looking chap, nineteen years old.

The new teacher gazed pensively at the adjacent grave-yard, opened the valise, took out three navy sixes, and a long bowie knife, whetted the latter on the leg of his boot, cocked one of the former, and then said sweetly:

"Ring the bell and we'll have prayers."

The big bully whom he addressed mildly obeyed. "We will arrange the classes," he said mildly, as he cocked a revolver and walked down the room.

One after another the boys were examined and classed. He called the first class to recite in geography; a whisper was heard behind him. Quick as lightning the teacher wheeled and covered the offender with a deadly aim, as he spoke sternly for the first time:

"Don't do that again, for I never give a second warning."

Recess time came, and the boys, very much cowed, went out on the play-ground.

One of them threw his ball in the air, and before it started to descend toward the catcher, the new teacher struck it with a bullet, and from that time Harry Floty has kept school undisturbed.

W. C.

It was the Police Court trial of an alleged abortionist in the early days. The prisoner was in his place, the lawyers were having it à l'outrance, and the damning proof of the doctor's misdeeds lay piled on the table in shape of some innocent-looking lozenges, which confection, it was claimed, had caused deceased to climb the golden pole.

When the trial was at its height, and everybody deeply interested, a reporter from the daily Evening—slipped quietly to his place at the table, and while drinking in the cloquence of counsel for the prisoner, he innocently nibbled away at the abortion lozenges with a relish. Just as the last one disappeared between his sticky lips the prosecuting attorney exclaimed, with a blanched face:

"My God, your Honor, this newspaper fellow has swallowed the evidence."

Sensation—not only in court, but in the belly of the reporter.

A SINGED CAT.

By E. H. Clough.

I. THE CAT SEEKS A NEW GARRET.

"Whoa haw! H'low, Buck!"

The obedient oxen stood in their tracks, and the tall, gaunt driver, throwing the point of his "gad" forward upon the "butt," intently watched an approaching cloud of dust.

"What's the matter now?" shrieked a shrill voice from the interior of the "prairie schooner."

The tall man did not reply, but continued to gaze at the yellow cloud as it rose above the hilllock just ahead.

"What're ye stoppin' in the middle of the road fur?" and the speaker opened the rear flap of the wagon covering, displaying a bronzed face, half owlish in its expression—it resembled the front of a hawk in every other respect.

"Haint fell in a fit standin' up, hev' ye?" she asked with an asperity almost amounting to sarcasm.

Still no reply from the immovable statue looming beside the nigh ox.

"Silas, chuck suthin' at yer dad, he's gone deaf, dumb, an' blind agin. What're we stoppin' fur?"

These last remarks were addressed to another tall man—a young fellow seated upon a raw-boned gray horse.

"He's waitin' fur somethin' to rise the next hill," he replied, without taking his own gaze from the flying dust.

"I reckon the ol' boob's afraid it'll skeer an' wont rise ef he speaks to a body. Durn this pesky rag of a dress, I wish—and the woman tore the skirt from a nail upon which it had caught when she attempted to leave the wagon."

As she stood in the dusty road, her figure would have served admirably as a study for a caricaturist. She was nearly as tall as her husband, and quite as gaunt, her angularities displaying themselves through a dingy calico gown. Her fiery red hair was coiled at the back of her head, and it only required the wings to complete the resemblance already spoken of, her beak-like nose and large blue eyes according well with the other characteristics. She was followed from the wagon by her counterpart, a young female, also unnaturally tall for a woman, also hawklike and owlish in features, also red-haired, and wearing a dress which was probably made from the same dingy piece of calico that adorned her mother's scraggy frame.

The group was a picture. A tall, roughly attired, tawny haired man, leaning upon his ox-goad beside two yoke of heavy limbed steers attached to a canvas-covered wagon; a fac simile of the driver seated upon a horse on the other side of the team; and the two women leaning against the wagon bows—all gazing patiently, but not very curiously, at a cloud of dust in front of them. Around them swept pine-fringed hills and blue mountain peaks; on the left a deep, gloomy ravine; a long, dusty road behind, a gentle slope before them, and steep bluffs on the right.

"Thar he comes," said the young man, as a horseman appeared at the summit of the hill.

"Dust enough for a twenty-mule team," remarked the father.

"Was thet what ye stopped fur? Did ye think ye couldn't pass it?" sneered the elder woman.

"Mostly—mebbe," replied her husband, shifting his goad into the hollow of his arm, so that the point covered that portion of the road not occupied by his team and family, thereby blocking the further progress of the rapidly approaching traveler. The movement had the desired effect, for when the horseman reached the off ox of the team, he reined in and looked inquiringly at the tall man. His gaze was returned, but with such an idiotic expression and immobile cast of feature that the stranger could not refrain from laughter. The grotesque looking individual who barred his passage did not even smile, neither did he by word or action show signs of anger at the other's boisterous mirth. His family seemed to respect his silence, for none of them uttered a word or changed their positions.

"Well, old pine sapling, have ye got a mortgage on this highway? I see your ladies have a lean on the caravan."

The traveler laughed again, a loud, aggressive laugh, but not hearty or contagious.

"Mammoth City?" sentimentally inquired the ox-driver, pointing ahead with the long goad.

"Mammoth City," answered the horseman, imitating the other's tone, and caricaturing the goad movement with a little riding whip which he carried.

"How fur?" asked the driver.

"Five miles," replied the man.

The driver raised his left hand above his eyebrows, and looked at the declining sun. Then he drove the point of his goad into the flank of his nigh ox, muttering as he did so the single word:

"Gee!"

The patient animals made an effort, and the wagon creaked with the strain.

"Haw!" The lumbering vehicle began to move.

"Whoa-o-o-haw!" and the driver tapped the off leader on the goad.

"Say, old man, you've cross-examined me and passed the witness, s'pose you allow the re-direct."

"Gee Buck, gee Grub, whoa-o-o-haw Buck," was all the reply vouchsafed by the driver.

"I object," shouted the man on horseback; "this case isn't decided yet. Look here, you old giraffe, stop your team, I want to talk to you."

But the oxen were tugging up the "rise," and the man seemed absorbed in his efforts to urge them forward. Not so his wife.

"Ye might ez well shout to that nigh ox, stranger; he won't answer ye."

"Who is he?"

"He's my ol' man, ef thet'll do ye any good."

"I don't doubt it—it's a case of long-standing affinity apparently. What do you call him?"

"Hiram Inch—is it good 'nough?"

"Oh, yes, but scarcely appropriate. If I had had the honor of naming him, I would have chosen some such patronymic as 'Tower' or 'Reed'—'Long' might do on a pinch—but then what's in a name, anyhow? Where do you hail from?"

"From the lakes, down Tulare ways."

"Are you going to locate in this vicinity?"

"I reckon ef it suits; ef it don't we can travel. But I say, stranger, mebbe ye wouldn't mind interdoocin' yerself, seein' ye've bin so clipper pumpin' me."

"There's my card, madam, and if —"

"Mister, don't you madam me, I aint no sich—I'm plain Samantha Inch an' nothin' else."

"All right, Mistress Inch, don't get angry at me. I meant no offense, I assure you. I suppose you observe by my card that I am an attorney-at-law, and if you should ever need my services, you will know where to find me."

"The ol' man will—ef he ever wants ye, but let me tell ye, stranger, it aint lawyers he hunts, it's lawyers hunts him wen there's lawin' to be done. He beats all creation witnessin' for the Courts—he's a singed cat, sure's yer born."

"A what?"

"Jest what I said, a singed cat."

"And pray tell me, Mrs. Inch, why is he a singed cat?"

"Cause he's a derned sight smarter'n he looks. Mind what I tell ye—you'll be humpin' arter him afore he shouts fur you. Come, sis, let's ketch up—dad's waitin' on the hill an' Silas hez got clean out o' sight. Good day, stranger, an' mind what I'm sayin'—Hiram Inch aint no sardine."

The woman and her daughter struck into the long swinging stride so common to border citizens, whether male or female, and left the lawyer musing by the roadside. He did not move from his position until the singular nomad and his family had disappeared over the brow of the hill. Then he jerked the bridle of his horse, and summarily cut short that animal's scanty meal of autumn withered grass.

"From the southern counties," he muttered. "Patent witness—singed cat—smarter than he looks—just the man I want; the old woman's right, I shall need this fellow. I think I begin to see my way clear out of that d—d Brower case. A singed cat—ha, ha, ha! All right, we shall see about that. Get up, Blackstone," and the mountain road once more offered free passage for the cotton tail rabbit and the ground squirrel, who had, with the chattering bluejay and the chipping quail, lain perdu in the underbrush while the scene described was in progress.

II.—THE CAT CATCHES A MOUSE.

Mammoth City is one of those half decayed mining camps in the Sierra, which has long since passed through its boasted "palmy days." Being the county seat, and the centre of a fruit-raising and agricultural district, it has retained more of its pristine vigor and importance than the surrounding towns—a healthy ghost of what it had once been. In perfect keeping with this dead-alive condition were the gleaming limestone boulders in the adjacent gulches and flats, looming bleak and bare, like tombstones erected in memory of the departed prosperity of the locality. Why the citizens remained, or what attraction there was for immigration, must ever remain a profound mystery. And yet, at the period of Inch's arrival, the place contained a comparatively large population—a congregation of isolated egotists, whose sole occupation seemed to be gossiping and fighting flies on the shady side of the main street in summer, and throwing snow balls, or drinking hot whisky in the bar rooms, during the winter. It was near this town that Hiram Inch concluded to locate for the time being. He camped in what was designated the "Tigre"—the Mexican quarter—and the next day he mounted his horse and scoured the country in search of a suitable place of residence. He astonished all with whom he attempted negotiation by his sententious questions and laconic answers or persistent silence, and excited their mirth by his simple, grotesque appearance and awkward manners. None of the places which he surveyed seemed to suit him—the prices were too high, the location unsuitable, or the appurtenances not exactly what he wanted. As he was returning home in the evening he observed a long, low, barn-like structure, tottering to its fall on a dreary flat about three miles from the town. He rode up to the door and ascertained that the place was vacant and that a tattered, weather-beaten sign gave notice that the building, and surrounding desert containing two hundred acres, were for sale—"apply to Henry Fogle."

A grunt announced Hiram Inch's satisfaction at the information which the announcement gave him, and he galloped back to his camp as fast as the weary horse could carry him. Arrived in the bosom of his interesting family, he sat down to a frugal meal of fried pork and potatoes, without volunteering a word, even to his wife. As soon as he had filled his month with pork and potatoes, Mrs. Inch handed him a note, which, she remarked, had been brought to the camp "by that galoot we met down the road yesterday." It was addressed to "Hiram Inch, Esq., Present—personal." and was as follows:

"MAMMOTH CITY, July 28, 18—
"Meet me at my office to-night at eight o'clock, on important business.
HENRY FOGLE."

Inch betrayed no sign of pleasure or annoyance at this summons, but passing the note to his wife, finished his meal and strode to the wagon. After a moment's search, he drew forth a little box which he carried to the camp fire and opened. He examined several packages of papers which the box contained, and finally, selecting one, placed it in his pocket. Locking the box, he returned it to the wagon, and left the camp in the direction of the town, without having spoken a single word.

He had no difficulty in finding the office of Henry Fogle, and entering without knocking, seated himself in a chair in front of the lawyer as unceremoniously as if he owned the entire concern. The attorney elevated his shaggy eyebrows a trifle at this abrupt entrance of his visitors, and remarked: "I perceive that you are on time."

Inch made no reply.

"Do you drink? Here's some good whisky." Saying which, Fogle shoved a black bottle and a glass across the table.

The other simply nodded a refusal of the proffered hospitality, and looked at Fogle out of his sleepy eyes.

"You are a queer one, and no mistake. I suppose you are anxious to come to business. Well, so am I."

"My bizness," answered Inch.

"Your business!"

"Mine fust."

"What is your business?"

"Thet shanty out thar;" he pointed in the direction of the two hundred-acre desert.

"Sure enough. You want to buy old Staghart's place, I see; you can't lay around in the open air like a gypsy all the time. I guess we can make a trade. We ask five hundred dollars for the place, and it's dirt cheap at that, too."

"Too much! Why, man, it's three hundred dollars less than we were offered a year ago."

"Two hundred and fifty dollars."

"Can't do it, Inch. If it was my own I would do it willingly, but old Staghart drives a close bargain."

"Three hundred dollars, cash."

"I can't think of it."

"He'll take it."

"Who? Staghart?"

"Yes."

"I'll bet you five dollars he don't."

"Shake."

"What for?"

"It's a go."

"Oh! the bet—all right; how'll we decide it?"

"Fetch him."

"I'll see if I can find him," and Fogle left the office.

Inch sat twirling his hat and blinking until he heard foot-steps approaching, when he closed his eyes as if asleep. A loud, double laugh sounded on the outside, and Fogle entered, followed by a short, thick set, fat faced, red whiskered man, whose nose seemed to curl with a chronic contempt for everything that was not in accord with his own opinion.

"Ha, ha! good joke—three hundred dollars! Blast me, Fogle, if I'd a come with you, if I didn't know that you've got a bottle of prime old bourbon here. What does the d—d fool take me for—a Chinaman? Never mind, he'll amuse me, anyhow." And the nose appeared to climb higher than ever.

"Mr. Inch, Mr. Staghart," said Fogle.

"Happy to know you, sir; delighted, I assure you," said Staghart, with mock politeness, grasping the limp, but gigantic hand of Inch.

The latter only grunted.

"So you think of buying a place, eh?" continued the fat faced man. "Well, I don't know as you can find a better or a cheaper place than mine—five hundred dollars isn't a bagatelle to its real worth."

"Tain't worth mor'a three hundred," growled Inch.

"You couldn't have it for that if I never sold it."

"How much to boot, 'an throw in the shanty," said Inch, handing a package of papers to Staghart.

"What are these? 'William Staghart, debtor to Fillup & Stirrit, drinks, ten dollars.' H— 'Whisky, seven dollars and a half.' What's this! 'My darling!— Where'd you get these? Who are you? By the living eternal, you shan't hold these over my head, anyhow," and Staghart tore the papers into minute fragments and threw them into the blazing fire place, his fat cheeks glowing with an unnatural crimson, and his eyes betraying the full trepidation of his soul.

Fogle did not attempt to conceal his astonishment at this scene, and Inch only grunted as Staghart threw the fragments into the fire. As soon as the blaze had fairly enveloped the troublesome documents, the imperturbable man coolly produced another packet, with the remark:

"Originals."

"Originals!" yelled Staghart. "Then, what in the name of Satan and his imps are those?" he asked, pointing at the fire.

"Copies," replied Inch.

"How much will you take for those 'originals?' asked Staghart, now thoroughly overcome as the evil which these papers might accomplish dawned upon him.

"The shanty, the ranch, and a hundred cash," answered Inch.

"I'll do it. Here, give me the papers. I havn't got the money with me, but I'll pay you in the morning."

"Now!" The tone was decisive, and Staghart put his hand in his pocket, groaning as he did so. After placing a quantity of gold and silver on the table, he counted it.

"There, take that; it's all I've got," he said, waving his hand at the money.

"How much?"

"Seventy-eight dollars."

"One hundred."

"It's all I've got, I tell you."

"The ranch," replied Inch.

"Now, look here, Mr. Inch, I'm paying you too much for those papers, six hundred —"

"All right," interrupted, Inch sharply, at the same time returning the papers to his pocket.

"Well, take the ranch, too. How'll you have it? Do you suppose I carry that around in my pocket, too?"

"The deeds."

Staghart groaned again, as he looked at Fogle, who in answer to the glance opened a safe and produced the necessary blanks, while Inch was transferring the money to his pockets. A few strokes of the pen and the barn with its contingent desert had become the property of Hiram Inch.

"Now, hand over those papers," said Staghart, as soon as everything had been arranged.

Inch looked inquiringly, and said:
 "Your note."
 "My note—what for?"
 "Twenty-two dollars."
 "Oh, that's all right, Mr. Staghart's good for anything he owes," said Fogle.

Inch passed the package to Staghart, who snatched it convulsively, and broke the string with which it was tied.

An oath escaped him, and genuine anger overspread his countenance, after a hasty glance at the papers. He dashed them upon the table, and striding to the chair where Inch sat, shook his fist in his face.

"You've deceived me—those are not the papers—where are the originals?"

Inch pointed to the fire place.

"You lie, you thief, you lie. You've got them in your possession."

Throwing his hands up, Inch motioned to Fogle to search him, preserving his cool demeanor in spite of the oaths and epithets which Staghart heaped upon him during the process.

"I guess he's right, Bill," said Fogle, after a thorough examination. "Here's a scrap you've dropped on the floor, perhaps you can recognize the handwriting."

Staghart took the fragment, and after a moment's scrutiny pronounced it genuine—it was certainly his own writing.

"Give me another drink, Harry, and I'll leave you," said Staghart, in a calmer tone; "but don't you trust that—that—"

"Singed cat," said Fogle, laughing.

"I don't care what you call him, but don't trust him, I say."

With these words, Staghart swallowed his whisky and left the office, slamming the door behind him.

"Served him right—the old ground hog. He'd squeeze a dollar till the eagle squealed, and it will do him good to meet his match, once in a while," said Fogle. "Inch, you deserved the name your wife gave you, you are a singed cat, sure enough."

"Ready?" said Inch, stretching out his hand.

"Ready for what?"

"To pay."

"I don't owe you anything, do I?"

"The bet."

"Oh, I didn't think of that; five dollars, I believe. But, by the way, seeing that you are so sharp yourself, I think I'll split hairs in this transaction, and enter a demurrer. You bet that Staghart would take three hundred dollars. He didn't get anything but a lot of old papers, and he undoubtedly considered them worthless, for he threw them into the fire."

"Profit and loss?" inquired Inch, blinking so idiotically as he asked the question, that Fogle could not help laughing.

"Yes," he answered, "I guess that's the account you will have to enter it on—profit for you, and loss for Staghart. But, now for my business."

The consultation between Fogle and Inch lasted several hours, and it was almost dawn when the latter returned to his camp in the "Tigre."

III.—A DISSIPATED KITTEN.

It did not require many hours for Hiram Inch to transfer his family and his property to his own residence. With ready ingenuity and mechanical tact he soon had the old rookery in comparative repair, rendering it as comfortable as his hardy family desired. These necessary duties attended to, the chronic itching for money-making returned with two-fold force. He rambled around the various claims in the vicinity, and, without asking any questions, closely observed the methods pursued by the miners. For a time he seemed undecided whether to devote his energies to quartz-mining or seek for the gold of the gravel beds. After considerable prospecting and calculating, he decided in favor of the latter, and selecting a spot about two miles west of his home, proceeded to lay his pipe, arrange for water, and drive hard bargains for the necessary material and tools with which to prosecute his work.

While all these preparations were in progress, Silas Inch totally ignored his father, except when he wanted a meal or sleeping accommodation, preferring to associate with the wild young sports of the town. He joined the fire company, and speedily became a prominent member. He frequented the lowest saloons and doggeries, and spent his time and money at cards and for liquor. Night after night his shrill tenor voice would be heard issuing from the low dens of the Tigre, pitched in drunken notes to the words of some such bacchanalian song as—

"My name it is Joe Bowers,
 I hev a brother Ike,
 I'm jist from 'Massouri,
 I'm all the way from Pike."

Thus singing, drinking, gambling, and occasionally fighting, this young reprobate passed his time, and his father apparently took no notice of the wild courses of his son, but pursued his own occupation without remonstrating with or counseling the youth. Strangely enough, for a long time, he supplied the prodigal with some small sums of money whenever the young man asked for it, making no remark and asking no questions in regard to the purpose for which it was used. The mother and sister acted differently. They scolded, pleaded, and threatened, but all to no purpose. The young man heeded them as little as he did the moaning of the autumn wind across the paternal Sahara. Among the men with whom Silas associated were two who afterward played prominent parts in the history of his family. One of them was a little Polish Jew, named Levi Marks, one of those cunning, grasping men whose every thought centres upon dimes and dollars. He kept a cigar store, in the rear of which a poker game was in progress nightly. This, at last, became a favorite place of resort for Silas, and as he played an average game, and was acquainted with most of the common short-card trickeries, he managed to "keep even" against his opponents, and sometimes "made a killing," as he expressed it. The other acquaintance he termed "his running pard," and if accompanying young Inch to every disreputable place he wished to visit, and assisting him in his nightly dissipations, constituting "a running pard," Bob Ikes could certainly claim the distinguished honor. Ikes was a "shoulder striker," a blustering bully, who loved to domineer over all with whom he came in contact, and at the first fire which occurred after Silas joined the Cataract Engine Company, attempted to take the pipe away from the new member, who had fairly earned it, by being first at the house after the alarm was given. A fight ensued, in which Ikes was not victorious, although not whipped, and, observing that Inch would not be imposed upon, made overtures by which a compact was entered into between the two, both offensive and defensive as regards the balance of the community. They "played into each other's hands" at cards, and by remaining together continually, kept their victims at bay whenever the latter imagined that their losses required redress. The crowd, of which these two young men were the leaders, was known as the "Hounds," a name applied to them on account of the peculiar barking sound with which they rent the midnight air when on a spree. They were not only an annoyance, but a positive injury, to the town, and at the session of every Grand Jury there was serious talk of indicting the entire gang, as a nuisance.

Time rolled on, and Silas, meeting with losses at cards, called more frequently upon his father for money, and finally met with a positive refusal. The boy was compelled to appeal to his companion, Ikes, for advice, and that staunch friend informed him that Marks often loaned small sums to the boys for a consideration. Young Inch interviewed the Jew, and succeeded in negotiating a loan upon a shot-gun, and in due course of time lost it or spent it, and had to pawn other property to replenish his empty exchequer. In a short time he had no collateral to offer, and, as a forlorn hope, asked Marks to accommodate him for a few days without the usual pledge. A singular smile illuminated the sallow face of the old man when he heard the request, and much to Inch's surprise, he granted it, only stipulating that Silas should "gifer node baber." This was readily agreed to by Inch, and twenty dollars was transferred from the till of Marks to the pocket of the spendthrift. These transactions were frequent, and Marks soon had a considerable quantity of Inch's "node baber," the wily old Hebrew always insisting that some witness should be present at each transaction. This witness was invariably Inch's "running pard," Bob Ikes, and it was highly amusing to hear the young scapegrace revile the old man for being so particular, and cursing him for a grasping, copper-squeezing bloodsucker.

"You blasted old vampire," he would exclaim, with honest indignation, "I believe you'd make your mother pay eighteen per cent. You're too mean to live, Marksey. Can't you take an honest man's word?"

"Vy, Iksey, of poy," Marks would reply, "who ish der loosher? Our frient gits der moonish, and Marksey gits der baber. Vash baber so goot oosh der coin, hey? Who'sh der vambire now, eh? Dwendy-von, dwendy-doo, dwendy-dree, dwendy-vour, dwendy-vive—dere's der moonish, mypoy. Now, you vash, lishen ter me, Inchey, don't you go bokerin' mit dot Iksey. He vash too shmari like hail. Don't ye do it."

In the meantime, Hiram Inch was rapidly acquiring wealth. His gravel mine was the source of a fair income—sufficient, with the economy of his domestic arrangements, to afford him a large profit in coin. In addition to this he was an inveterate trader, and somehow or other always succeeded in getting the best of those with whom he negotiated. His interviews and consultations with Fogle were frequent and prolonged. The object of these counsels became apparent during the following summer, when the political conventions met for the purpose of nominating county officers. Under the shrewd management of Inch and the ingenious trickery of Fogle, the latter obtained both the Republican and Democratic nominations for District Attorney, thus assuring his election. By the same manipulation of the primaries were sent to the Democratic Convention men who considered Inch himself the best man for Sheriff. The Republicans through the same influences were induced to nominate against him the most unpopular man in the county—William Staghart.

IV.—THE CAT INCURS THE HATRED OF A BULL-DOG.

One day while Hiram was assisting Fogle to further his political ambition, and at the same time feathering his own nest, a little dapper man, dressed in gray, strolled through the front gate of the Inch estate, and was met at the door by Mrs. Inch fresh from her domestic duties, her fiery tresses concealed beneath a soiled towel, and bearing in her talon-like fingers a well-worn broom.

"Hiram Inch lives here, I believe," said the man, placing his hand against the door-post.

"W'en he's at home he does," answered the lady of the house, speaking in her usual supercilious tones, and bringing the broom to a "rest arms."

"Is he at home?" asked the stranger.

"No, he aint," replied the woman. "Anythin' more partic'ler than common?"

"Personal business. He was thinking of having his life insured, and I am the agent. You don't know where I could find him, do you?"

"No, I don't, unless he is down to Fogle's office; he's mostly round thar w'en he aint out 'lectioneerin'."

"I inquired for him there, and they thought he had returned home. I'm going away in the morning, and I thought I would call on him here. He must be examined by a physician, you know, and there isn't much time to spare. When he returns, I wish you would tell him that I will be at the City Hotel during the afternoon and evening."

With these words the agent bowed and leisurely strolled through the gate again, Mrs. Inch gracefully bringing her broom from a "rest" to a "shoulder" by a single turn of her supple wrist, and closing the door.

When Hiram returned late in the afternoon, his wife informed him of the agent's visit, and Inch scarcely waited to hear the full particulars before he had mounted his horse and was galloping toward town.

Immediately adjoining the hotel, in a low brick building, was Marks' cigar store, and as Hiram rode by he heard loud voices issuing from the rear, and among them distinctly recognized the strident tones of his own son. He reined in, intending to investigate the cause of the quarrel, but the noise ceased just then, and as Marks, who was sitting on a tobacco case in front of the store waiting for customers, seemed wholly unconcerned, he walked his horse to a hitching post in front of the hotel and dismounted. His business with the agent required considerable time, and it was dark before all the arrangements had been completed. Passing out of the hotel, he was about to mount, when Marks ran out of his store, shouting:

"Mishter Inch! Mishter Inch! dot Silas ish kickin' oop hail mit mine broberdy!"

"Where?" asked Inch.

"Vere? vy, in mine shop. He keeks der dable ofer and vants der gill dot Iksey, und Iksey don't vash mottle mit 'im at all. Poot 'im out, Mishter Inch, or he damages mine goots, und who bays me der pill?"

By this time the riot in the rear of the store had attained such proportions that it was attracting the attention of the passers-by on the street. A dozen rapid strides brought Inch to the door separating the store from the rear room. Dashing it open, he caught sight of two men, in the darkness, locked in each other's arms, struggling against the opposite wall. Hiram did not wait to ascertain whether either of them was Silas, but sprang forward and grasping each by the collar, with one powerful wrench flung them apart and held them.

"Stop it!" Inch's voice was sharp and decisive.

"Who are you?" shouted Ikes, endeavoring to release the hold upon his collar.

"Let me go, d—n you, let me go. I'll cut his heart out. Let me go," yelled Silas, blinded by passion, and failing to recognize his father in the darkness.

"Stop it!" repeated the elder Inch.

At this moment Marks entered with a light, and Hiram released his hold upon the belligerents.

"The Singed Cat!" exclaimed Ikes.

"Dad!" ejaculated Silas.

And each of the young men hastily concealed a glittering weapon.

"What's that?" asked Inch.

"Nothin'," replied Silas.

"Hand it over," ordered the father.

"He's got one, too," growled the son, passing a long Mexican stiletto to his father.

"It don't matter; what's the row?" asked Hiram, placing the knife in his coat pocket.

"He was cheating at cards," said Silas, pointing at Ikes.

"You lie, you thief, you lie."

At this rejoinder of Ikes, both young men dashed forward, but were prevented from coming in contact by Hiram, who flung them against opposite sides of the room as if they were children.

"What game?" he calmly inquired, as soon as the curses which this last display of physical power evoked, had subsided somewhat.

"Poker," muttered Silas.

"Poker!" sneered Hiram. "How much did they steal?"

"About forty dollars."

"Whar's the keards?" asked the old man of Marks.

"I gits 'em pooty kvick, Mister Inch. Mine Got, look at der damages," and Marks gazed ruefully upon the battle field.

It was indeed a scene of wreck and ruin. The table was lying on the floor, cracked through the centre, and minus two legs; the chairs were scattered about the room, some of them broken and others piled together, in apparently inextricable confusion. A large mirror hanging on one of the walls was shattered, and the broken glass glittered on the carpet amidst the fragments of a shattered lamp and hundreds of playing cards that had been discarded in the course of the games played there that day. No wonder the parsimonious Jew looked upon the scene with a woe-begone expression.

"Who hays me der damages?" he wailed.

"Oh, shut up, Marksy, and get the cards," commanded one of the crowd of young men who had been one of the previous game, and who had remained during the fracas an interested spectator.

"Yes, get the cards," said another; "Ikes an' Inch 'il make up before morning."

Both young men, after glaring at each other a moment, sat down on chairs at opposite sides of the table, which Marks had raised, and hastily repaired preparatory to the game about to begin. The others assisted him in clearing away the debris, and in a few moments Ikes was dealing the cards to three players, two of whom were his friends, and the other, Hiram Inch.

It was "fifty cents ante," and from the start Inch played in remarkable luck, winning every large bet that he ventured, and "bluffing" with so much coolness and circumspection that the others could not overreach him. In three hours Hiram had not only recovered the forty dollars which his son had lost, but was twenty dollars ahead.

Suddenly, and without any apparent cause, Inch rose to his feet, and with his left hand lifted the light table above the heads of the players, at the same time pointing with his right hand index finger at a pile of cards lying on the laps of Ikes and his right hand companion.

"Thief!" he growled, as he replaced the table and turned to leave the room. For a moment Ikes sat like a statue. The whole action had been as rapid as strong muscles and supple sinews could make it, and the shock of discovery for a moment overcame the cheaters. It was not until Hiram had reached the door that Ikes spoke. He tried to be calm, but his voice trembled, and it was plain that he only lacked courage to make an assault upon the tall giant, who had twice during the evening handled him so roughly.

"I'll make you suffer for your treatment of me to-night. Both of you; you needn't laugh, I'll settle your hash the next time I see you, d—n you. I'm an Injin when I'm riled, and I'll make both of you pay for what you've done here to-night."

With these words he threw his chair back and followed his enemies out of the door.

"Go home," said Hiram to his son, as soon as they reached the street.

The young man obeyed, and when Inch saw that the boy was not followed, he mounted and rode after him, disappearing in the darkness, accompanied by the curses and oaths of the disgruntled Ikes.

[CONTINUED IN NEXT NUMBER.]

In some people mountains develop legs, in

A CALIFORNIAN SHEEP-SHEARING.

By Robert Duocan Milne.

Custom has thought fit to cast a halo of romance round the scenes and dreams of a pastoral existence. Arcadian idylls have been chanted by Theocritus and Virgil, and attempts made to realize them in the pleasure-parks and palace-lawns of the Bourbons. The bluest blood of France took pleasure at one time, under the probable pressure of ennui, in masquerading in the guise of shepherds and shepherdesses. Shakspeare, who handles all subjects with equal knowledge and ease, has introduced us in the Winter's Tale to a little of the prosaic as well as the poetic side of pastoral life, and again touches upon it in the drama of As You Like It. But neither the sheep-shearing of "Perdita," nor the dialogue between "Corin" and "Touchstone," though sufficient to prove the intimate acquaintance of the writer with his subject, and ample for all purposes of the drama, treat the matter with that exhaustiveness of detail which the inquisitive faculty of the present age, so appreciative of facts, demands. The writer will, therefore, endeavor to supply this want by describing the general characteristics and menage of a "sheep-shearing" on one of the great primitive ranches of Southern California; and though the theme may be deficient in romance, it will at all events have the advantage of presenting a picture of actual facts in connection with one of the principal industries of our State, which may prove in some measure an atonement for details which, though not uninteresting, sink far below the poetic ideality with which custom or ignorance has invested them. Let the reader picture an eminence rising from the banks of a narrow streamlet, the further shore of which is lined for miles by a dense and almost impassable willow copse; on this eminence a range of buildings in the form of a square or quadrangle, the dwelling-house occupying the further side, flanked by two rows of one-story apartments; one forming the dining and sleeping rooms of the employes, and the other the offices; while opposite to the dwelling-house, which is a commodious two-story structure, stands a wall, and in this wall an immense gateway or portal—all said buildings being composed of adobe clay, painted white, and constituting the Mexican equivalent of the baronial hall of the feudal ages of Europe—and he will form some idea of the Cerritos rancho, in Los Angeles county, one of the largest and most typical of its class in California. Stretching for miles beyond the house in a northerly, easterly, and southerly direction lie level pasture lands—level with the exception of two low round hills to the east which have given name and distinction to the ranch (Cerritos meaning "little hills"), and affording ample grazing ground for as many as thirty thousand sheep. Let him imagine, also, that it is the month of May, approaching the heats of midsummer, and that he is standing at the back of the said quadrangle of buildings, as the day is cooling off toward sundown, and that the shearing will commence on the morrow. If he looks round him he will see a large area of dry, brown ground partitioned off into numerous corrales, or folds, by strong fences composed of movable hurdles, in a seemingly arbitrary manner, but the position and collocation of which is really a matter of careful and deep design. Presently he will hear a low, far-off murmur of bleating, which increases and grows louder every minute as evening falls, till a flock of sheep approaches with its attendant shepherd and dog, and is soon secretly ensconced in one of the largest of the corrales. If he investigates a little further he will come upon a shed, long, open at both ends, and floored with planking, the side next the corrales being supplied with a long table, about half the height of a man. On this table are placed a dozen boxes about a foot square, without any bottoms, and with four small nicks on their upper edges equidistant from the corners. These are the boxes used for tying the wool into bundles. He will also probably see one or two men engaged in unrolling and cutting up into three-foot lengths balls of twine, and hanging the product up on nails within easy reach of the boxes, so as to be ready for the morning. This is the string used in connection with the boxes for tying the bundles. Turning round he will notice a tall rectangular framework of scantlings about ten feet high, narrower at its top than its bottom, from an iron ring supported on the top of which already depends a woollack, its mouth firmly sewed to and kept open by the ring. This is the frame which holds the woollack in position, while it is in process of being filled with fleeces. In another corner of the shed he will see piles of sacks lying ready for use.

But hark! what is this clattering of hoofs and jingling of spurs over the court, and approaching the woollack? All doubt is removed by the appearance of a troop of mounted Mexicans—it is almost superfluous to say mounted, for no Mexican ever walks—who rein up, dismount, tie their horses to any available post or fence, unroll their blankets, and proceed to appropriate the loose woollacks from the afore-mentioned pile, and having lighted the inevitable cigarrito, choose their sleeping-places by fancy or judgment on the floor of the shed, and spread their beds of blankets supplemented by sacks. These are the shearers; and as the Mexican clement almost monopolizes this branch of industry, some description of their manners and morale is necessary. Sheep-shearing all over the State occurs during the months of May, June, and July; the spring lambs are usually shorn in August; and not unfrequently, though it is not a rule on all ranches, the old sheep are clipped a second time in the fall of the year. It may be roughly stated that a shearer finds employment for four months during the year. The wages of shearers are good. One who is master of his business, or can shear from fifty to sixty sheep a day, at five or six cents a head, which is the normal pay, can clear from three to four dollars a day. In rare instances, and with clean sheep, men have been known to shear as many as eighty or even a hundred a day, but such work is quite exceptional. A shearer usually depends upon the money he thus makes for his support during the rest of the year, and will not work at any other kind of business. They go round the country in bands, with a captain at their head, who is nominally supposed to be accountable for their behavior, and with whom the business of the gang is transacted. The gang may number anywhere from ten to forty, and when they have finished with one ranch, they go on to another, engagements being formed in advance, and each gang going on its merits. On a large ranch like the Cerritos, only the best qualified men are employed, the shearing lasting more than two months, and giving work to forty or fifty men.

But now, dusk has fallen upon us, and presently the welcome sound of a bell assails our ears, and being enveloped in the cloak of Fortunatus, we will accompany the Mexicans under the low mediæval archway or postern and across the court, into the comfortable adobe dining-room, where, if we were not invisible, we might be sure of a hospitable welcome, for no man leaves these doors unsatisfied, much less in shearing-time. Many are the men who have lived since the time of Horace, whose luxurious and enervating habits have caused them to bewail their disabilities of appetite, and to envy in less terse and graphic language than his the ilia dura messorum—"the hardy stomachs of the reapers." Yet we venture to say that that even the most blasé product of the city would not be untouched by the steaming savor of loins and legs of muttons, which with their accompaniments of certified milk and butter, or with the more modern details of tea and coffee, and other "tiny little kickshaws," as Jack Falstaff hath it, disappear like chaff before the wind into the aforesaid receptacles of our Mexican cousins who mean work. One by one they rise from the table with evident satisfaction and encouragement, for the way to the Mexican heart is not different from that of the common son of men, and as they appreciate good living—when they can get it—it is of the first importance to keep them in good humor and spirits at such an eventful epoch as this; and now, as they are somewhat tired by their long ride, and wish to commence operations early on the morrow, we will follow them to the corral, smoke a friendly cigarrito with them, and say "Good night."

Before daybreak next morning all is astir. Breakfast being finished, the shearers assemble in a long narrow pen just on the other side of the shed containing the table. The sheep which we saw driven into the large corral last night happen to be a band of ewes, with well-grown lambs from two to three months old, the old sheep numbering about sixteen hundred. Half a dozen men jump into this corral, and crowd the band with whooping and waving of old cloths or sticks toward a gate opening into the smaller pen where the shearers are congregated, whetting their shears upon fine stones, for much care is taken to keep the shears as sharp as possible, the time lost in grinding being amply recompensed by what is gained in shearing. When about three hundred have been driven into the smaller pen the gate is closed. Then each shearer makes a rush for the huddled animals, catches one by the hind leg, and drags it over to that portion of the corral next the table, and there rests it upon its buttock between his knees, in which position it is absolutely helpless and unresisting. With his left hand he holds and supports the body of the animal, leaning it over on its left side.

Holding the shears in his right hand (though some shearers are ambidexter, they are rare), he inserts the points into the wool at the side of the neck and begins his clip, running clear down the whole length of the sheep. When this is done, he returns to the neck and cuts another swath in the same manner, making some seven or eight longitudinal swaths according to the size of his shears, or the dexterity of his manipulation, until he reaches the backbone. Half the fleece now hangs loosely from the sheep, and he then swings the animal over on its other side, and proceeds in the same fashion till he again reaches the backbone, when, if the shearing has been skillfully done, the fleece falls off in an unbroken sheet of wool. In the evening, when work is over, each shearer hands in his checks, which are counted, and credit given him for the number in a book, entitling him to receive an equivalent in money at the close of the shearing. Meantime the forty shearers have all been vigorously at work, fleece upon fleece has been handed over on to the table, and six or seven men are busily engaged tying them into bundles. A good average fleece of wool will weigh six or seven pounds, and a well-packed sack from three to four hundred pounds. But now all the sheep in the pen have been sheared, and as the foreman comes round to inspect them, some of them are found to be "scabby." Accordingly, it is decided that the band, as it comes from the hands of the shearers shall be "dipped," for "scab" on sheep is infectious, and requires crucial treatment. The shorn sheep are therefore driven into a side pen, and while our shearers are engaged upon a fresh batch, we shall follow the fortunes of the first. This side pen gradually narrows down till it ends abruptly on a long, narrow, deep tank full of a dark brown liquid, which is evidently hot, judging from the steam which rises from the surface. This liquid is in reality a strong solution of tobacco, and is kept at a certain depth and temperature by drawing upon a large boiler and furnace close by. Three men attired in the oldest and dirtiest overalls and shirts in their possession (for this is dirty work) now advance upon the sheep, and seizing them one by one cast them head foremost into the tank. The sheep immediately comes to the surface, swims to the other end, a distance of some twenty feet or more, and emerges therefrom upon another sloping pen, where it is allowed to stand till the liquid has drained off its skin. The whole penful is sent through with the utmost expedition, and then the shorn and doctored animals are let out to graze in peace, not to be harassed any more till next shearing season. And so the day wears on, and the shearers get tired, and rest by twos and threes at a time to smoke and chat, for the Mexican is very independent and free-an-easy, and will not be hurried; rest is taken for dinner; the afternoon passes like the forenoon, full of life and bustle and motion, and at sundown the band is shorn, and all are glad of rest. There is, however, one thing as dear or even dearer to the Mexican heart than even repose, and that is—gambling. If we were to go round to the corral at twelve o'clock at night, we would be sure to find a little knot of half-a-dozen or so seated round a blanket, eagerly intent upon a greasy pack of cards by the light of a solitary candle, and deeply enthralled by the fascinations of monte. The counters they have earned laboriously during the day are "bucked off" religiously during the night; and it not unfrequently happens that a shearer may work through a whole season without having anything to show for it at the end, and be just as happy as if he had, so lightly do the cares of life sit upon the sons of Mexico, and so easily do they accommodate themselves to every turn of circumstance. And now, though it may spoil his ideal, the reader has the reality of a California sheep-shearing.

ESOTERIC.

Kisses that one steals in darkness,
And in darkness then returns—
How such kisses fire the spirit,
If with honest love it burns!

Pensive, and with fond remembrance,
Then the spirit loves to dwell
Much on days that long have vanish'd,
Much on future days as well.

Yet methinks that too much thinking
Dang'rous is if kiss we will—
Weep, then, rather, darling spirit,
For to weep is easier still.

HEINE.

Transformation.

Beloved, when a week ago,
In my full spirit's overflow,
I asked you if you could forego

All higher dreams of happiness,
To front all sorrow and distress
For my sake, and you answered "Yes"—

When, standing on your parlor floor
In kingly mood than e'er before,
I drew you to me more and more,

And talked about our newer hopes,
The belts of light across the slopes
Of both our mystic horoscopes,

And told you of the glorious hymn
Sung by the unseen Seraphim,
Filling my soul up to the brim

With floods on floods of sov'reign tones,
Like those that swell along the zones
Far-reaching to the sapphire thrones;

And spoke of blessed fellowships,
Till all my life burst through my lips
As sunlight breaks from an eclipse;

And all the solemn majesties
Which sweep across the Poet's skies,
Stood flaming white before my eyes,

Until—so great the glory was—
I trembled as I saw it pass,
Reflected in the mirrored glass,

And felt my eyes grow dim with tears,
And wondered if the after-years
Could bring that holy day's compeers—

You did not then, beloved, know
That through long months of ebb and flow,
My life had watched your own life grow,

Shaping, in love and reverence,
To most divine and perfect ends,
The moments which the Father lends

For silent deeds of sacrifice,
And lofty hopes that crown and kiss
The brows of calm endurance.

You did not know you had so passed
Into my being, that at last
The willful-eyed Iconoclast

Slid sudden from his sullen pride,
And crept so to the other side
That all things seemed half-deified.

O my beloved! if it be
My blind soul's blind idolatry,
Which raises all things else through thee,

And gives the faces which I meet
About the market and the street,
A kinder meaning, soft and sweet;

A tenderer clasp to clasping hands,
And purer purple to the lands,
And warmer amber to the sands

That circle the encircling seas:
Oh, if they be idolatry,
Which cast me upon praying knees,

And to my soul clap wings of fire—
Not yet, not yet do I aspire,
My beautiful, my heart's desire,

To rise up panoplied and strong,
In the grave virtues which belong
To dusty manhood without song.

OAKLAND.

INTAGLIOS.

Fragmentary Translations from Heine.

If thou hast good eyes and look'st
In my songs when thou hast tried them,
Thou wilt see a fair young maiden
Wandering up and down inside them.

Care not if my love I'm telling
Unto all the world around,
When my mouth, thy beauty praising,
Full of metaphor is found.

Swear not at all, but only kiss!
All woman's oaths I hold amiss;
Thy word is sweet, but sweeter far
The kisses that my guerdon are.
These keep I, while thy words but seem
A passing cloud, a fragrant dream.

I'll not credit, youthful beauty,
What thy bashful lips may say;
Eyes so black and large and rolling
Are not much in virtue's way.

Strip away this brown striped falsehood—
Well and truly love I thee;
Let thy white heart kiss me dearest—
White heart, understand'st thou nie?

The slender water-lily
Peeps dreamily out of the lake;
The moon, oppressed with love's sorrow,
Looks tenderly down for her sake.

With blushes she bends to the water
Once more her head so sweet—
Then sees she the poor pale fellow
Lying before her feet.

[SHE SPEAKS.]

In the garden fair a tree stands,
And an apple hangeth there,
And around the trunk a serpent
Coils himself, and I can ne'er
From the serpent's eyes enchanting
Turn away my troubled sight,
And he whispers words alluring,
And enthralls me with delight.

[ANOTHER SPEAKS.]

'Tis the fruit of life thou spyest—
Its delicious flavor taste—
That thy life until thou diest
May not be forever waste!
Darling dove, sweet child, no sighing!
Quickly taste, and never fear;
Follow my advice, relying
On thy aunt's sage counsel, dear.

The lotus flower is troubled
At the sun's resplendent light;
With sunken head and sadly
She dreamily waits for the night.

The moon appears as her wooer,
She wakes at his fond embrace;
For him she kindly uncovers
Her sweetly flowering face.

She blooms, and glows, and glistens,
And mutely gazes above;
She weeps, and exhales, and trembles
With love and the sorrow of love.

Stars with golden feet are wandering
Yonder, and they gently weep
That they can not Earth awaken,
Who in Night's arms are asleep.

Listening stands the silent forest,
Every leaf an ear doth seem!
How its shadowy arm the mountain
Stretcheth out, as though in dream!

What called yonder? In my bosom
Kings the echo of a tone.
Was it my beloved one speaking,
Or the nightingale alone?

The midnight was cold; in plaintive mood
I wandered mournfully through the wood;
I shook the trees from out their sleep,
They shook their heads with pity deep.

With tears through the forest I wander;
The throstle's sitting on high;
She, springing, sings softly yonder:
Oh, wherefore dost thou sigh?

"Sweet bird, thy sister the swallow
Can tell thee the cause of my gloom;
She dwells in a nest all hollow
Beside my sweetheart's room."

AN ESSAY ON BELLS.

By Albert Warner.

If another Locke were to write on the association of ideas, modern science would furnish him with a stock of new illustrations. Sound, like sleep, "has its own world," ranging in each individual consciousness from the dull mechanical routine hinted at by the morning drum or workshop whistle to that mysterious sphere on which the spiritually-minded enter with the key-note of a grand symphony. Some of the purely suggestive of master compositions have been caught from the voices of Nature, whose scale of harmony, extending from the roar of winds and waves to the rustle of grain and the hum of insects, breathes to attentive ears the whole external process of the universe. But of sounds derived from human invention and economy, there is none which, in the variety and permanence of the associations it awakens, compares with that of bells. The individual quality of their tone, the scenes amidst which we first hear them, the sacred or local memories intertwined with their vibrations, appeal to the memory with a distinctness seldom otherwise realized. Hence, the most aspiring of German poets availed himself of this fact to compose the immortal song of "The Bell." The most reckless and weird of our native bards, Poe, found in the graduated intonation and emphatic occasion of bells ample scope for the remarkable verbal and rhythmic ingenuity which marks his work. On the same principle, Gray touched at once the pensive strain of his "Elegy" by allusion to the curfew. There is something remarkably endearing in the sound of bells. Whoever has caught their distant peal when coasting along the Mediterranean shores, or has felt the summer stillness of an Alpine valley broken by the chimes from some venerable campanile, can imagine, as the mellowed intonations blend with the scenery and make the soft air melodious, how precious to native associations must be the familiar echoes. The bells of one's native place have been the theme for many a poet to ring the various changes of melody suggested to his fantastic mind.

"On this I ponder,
Where'er I wander,
And thus grow fonder,
Sweet Cork, of thee;
With thy bells of Shandon,
That sound so grand on,
The pleasant waters
Of the river Lee."

wrote Father Prout, in praise of a celebrated chime in Ireland. The old bells that hung in the tower of the Limerick cathedral were made by a young Italian, after many years of patient toil. He was proud of his work, and when they were purchased by the prior of a neighboring convent near the Lake of Como, the artist invested the proceeds of the sale in a pretty villa on the margin of the lake, where he could hear the Angelus music wafted from the convent cliff across the waters at morning, noon, and night. Here he intended to pass his life, but this happiness was denied him. In one of those feudal broils he suffered the loss of his all; and, when the storm passed, he found himself without home, family, friends, or fortune. The convent had been razed to the ground, and his chefs-d'œuvre, the tuneful chime, whose music had charmed his listening ear for so many happy days of his past life, had been carried away to a foreign land. He became a wanderer. His hair grew white, and his heart withered before he again found a resting-place. In all these years of bitter desolation, the memory of the music of his bells never left him; he heard it in the forest and in the crowded city, on the sea, and by the banks of the quiet stream in the basin of the hills; he heard it by day, and when night came and troubled sleep, it whispered to him soothingly of peace and happiness. One day he met a mariner from over the sea, who told him of a wondrous chime of bells he heard in Ireland. An intuition told the artist that they were his bells. He journeyed and voyaged thither sick and weary, and sailed up the Shannon. The ship came to anchor in the port near Limerick, and he took passage in a small-boat for the purpose of reaching the city. Before him the tall steeple of St. Mary's lifted its turreted head above the mist and smoke of the old town. He leaned back wearily, yet with a happy light beaming in his eyes. The angels were whispering to him that his bells were there. He prayed, "Oh, let them sound me a loving welcome. Just one note of greeting, oh bells! and my pilgrimage is done." It was a beautiful evening. The air was like that of his own Italy, in the sweetest time of the year, the death of the spring. The bosom of the river was like a broad mirror, reflecting the patines of bright gold that flecked the blue sky, the tower, and the streets of the old town in its clear depths. The lights of the city danced upon the wavelets that rippled from the boat as she glided along. Suddenly the stillness was broken. From St. Mary's tower there came a shower of silver sound, filling the air with music. The boatmen rested on their oars to listen. The old Italian crossed his arms, and fixed his streaming eyes upon the tower. The sound of his bells bore to his heart all the sweet memories of his buried past; home, friends, kindred, all. At last he was happy—too happy to speak, too happy to breathe. When the rowers sought to arouse him, his face was upturned to the tower, but his eyes were closed. The poor stranger had breathed his last. His own chef-d'œuvre had rung his "passing bell." The language of bells is cosmopolitan. It needs no polyglot to understand the meaning of those sounds, which, for fourteen hundred years, have announced from church towers worship, festivity, and death. We may be wandering thousands of miles from home, amidst a crowd whose garb and tongue are alien, or in a lonely distant region, where the very herbage beneath our feet and the branches above proclaim a foreign soil, yet the instant a bell's chime strikes our ear, we take up the broken link of our electric human chain, and are at home at once. "Bells," said the pious Latimer, "inform Heaven of the necessities of earth," and so also do they announce the identity of human wants, instincts, and destiny, and thereby indissolubly blend their cadences with the sentiment of life. The modern novelists have well availed themselves of this fact, as in Victor Hugo's Notre Dame, and Dickens' Little Dorrit. "The bell invites me" soliloquizes Macbeth on the eve of crime, and Hamlet can find no more delicate usage to betoken Ophelia's madness than "sweet bells jangled out of tune." Moore sang of the "Evening Bells" in lines that will never be forgotten. A fire and a feast, a gratulation and a requiem, welcome to peace and call to arms, all find voices in bells. It was a beautiful reverence for their office that led the architects of old to lavish their highest skill on the towers wherein those vocal ministers of humanity were to vibrate. The Florence Campanile is a memorable instance. Its variegated marbles, its harmonized proportions, and its lofty grace, so effective beside the vast dome and the massive spread of the cathedral, associate the bells which call out the "Misericordia," and sound matins and vespers over the beautiful valley of the Arno, with one of the fairest trophies of the builder's skill. No wonder that primitive faith consecrated bells with song and prayer, or that science combines, moulds, and tempers the metals with vigilant care in order to develop the rarest charms of sound. One of the most affecting legends of which so many charming ballads have been written by the Germans is the "Blind Steed" of Langbein.

"What bell-house yonder towers in sight
Above the market square?
The wind sweeps through it day and night,
Nor door nor gate is there;
Speaks joy or terror in the tone,
When neighbors hear the bell?
And that tall steed in sculptured stone,
What doth the statue tell?"

The answer to this inquiry is, that the Fathers of the town created what they called the "Doom Bell of Ingratitude," that whoever felt that serpent's sting might therewith summon the ministers of the land, and have instant punishment awarded the offender. A prosperous citizen of the place owned a horse not less remarkable for beauty and fleetness than sagacity. His services were long and memorable, but in his old age his master turned him adrift to starve. He roamed about knowing at every chance twig, and at last—

"Once, thus urged on by hunger's power,
All skin and bone—O shame!
The skeleton at midnight hour,
Up to the bell-house came.
He stumbled in and chanced to grope,
Near where the hemp rope hangs,
His gnawing hunger jerks the rope,
And lo! the Doom Bell clangs."

The judges meet, and are astonished to find such a plaintiff there, but consider 'twas God that spoke, and compel the ungrateful master to take home and provide for his steed. Nature's daintiest products are the models of bells. How many flowers wear their shape! We have all read of "the floral bell that swingeth," and the delicate song in The Tempest says, "In the cowslip's bell I lie." Bells signalize to consciousness the most precious associations of travel. We seem to hear a voice from the past in the reverberations of cathedral bells in Europe. Near one of the wonderful old churches on the Danube, in Germany, or Italy, or in English cathedral towns, what a panorama of history and pensive retrospection does the sound of ancient bells awaken in the imagination, stranger! At Oxford and at Rome, at Rouen and at Nuremberg, what martyrs, reformers, saints, bards, kings, and artists, whose names blend with the local memories of the place, reappear to the fancy, as the bells which announced their advent or rang their knell fill the air with echoes from "the long, dim corridor of time." All over the continent are famous bells—that of Erfurth, for instance; some celebrated for antiquity, others for size, this because of its exquisite tone, that on account of some saintly tradition; and others are intimately connected with the fortunes of the church or town, wherein they have so long rung out their chimes. What a bloody history is unfolded before our eyes, when the Sicilian Vespers are sounded by the bells of Palermo. And then the different kinds of bells: the one that summons to the noonday repast; the one whose clang awakens the early toiler; the bell at the stern which sounds the monotonous flight of hours at sea; those whose merry click on arm and ancle times the Egyptian dancing girl's gyration; the loud, impatient clang of the departing steamer; the warning notes of the iron horse, and the solemn funeral knell; the tinkling bells upon the necks of browsing kine; the gay jingle of sleigh-bells; the mule bells tinkling down the mountain paths of Spain; the chime of happy wedding bells; the joyous peal of Christmas bells, and the hoarse note of the startling fire-alarm. The falcon had his little bell; "bell, book, and candle" were the old instruments of exorcism, and a cap and bells the court fool's badge. "Silence that dreadful bell," exclaims Othello, when the isle "was roused from its propriety," and how often on sensitive brain and quivering nerves does the ill-timed jar of the intrusive messengers awaken the same impatient protest from invalid and mourner. On this side the water the church bells lack the tone so mellow across the sea; their accents are business-like even in their calls to prayer. Yet there are notable exceptions. Whoever has found himself in Wall street, New York, on a Sabbath morning, and heard those deserted precincts of financial excitement resound with Old Trinity's harmonious chime, must have felt the solemn poetry of bells. In Independence Hall, Philadelphia, is a bell, which, even mute, appeals to every American heart by this inscription: "The ringing of this bell first announced to the citizens anxiously waiting the result of the deliberations of Congress (which were at that time held with closed doors) that the Declaration of Independence had been decided upon, and then it was that the bell proclaimed liberty throughout the land to all the inhabitants thereof!" One in Boston, long endeared, once drew crowds to the North End to listen. "Within the sound of Bow Bells" is the cockney way of claiming nativity in the city of London. The note of a bell is of all sounds that which comes nearest home to the local spell of a habitation. In cities where rural sights and sounds are wanting, imagination insensibly clings to the aerial and familiar tones; perchance they breathe over the ashes of the loved or have mingled with the labor and the pastime of years. Above the hum of trade and the voices of the thoroughfare, their clear, deep, prolonged refrain is, perchance, the only sound that whispers to the brooding heart of higher interests than the work and the pleasure of the hour. There is to the forlorn a greeting, to the reminiscent a charm, and to the meditative an inspiration in their music.

"What a world of solemn thought their monody compels."

INTERCEPTED LETTERS.

SAN FRANCISCO, December 19, 1878.

MY DEAREST MADGE:—A merrie Christmas to you, and "God bless us every one," as "Tiny Tim" says with a broad philanthropy which becomes contagious when the last December days are closing in. What are you doing with yourself away off there among the pines, with no tooting of tin horns, no shop windows, no theatre posters, no anything but a promise of snow and a shelf full of tales and legends to suggest that Christmas is here. I know you are wishing yourself in town to go to the spectacle, which you always consider as integral a part of the holiday as Kriss Kringle or the pudding itself. By the way, do you remember our first spectacle, The Sheep's Foot? Nothing of it comes back to me now but a tower in the coils of a winding stairway, with a pair of distracted and exceedingly well shaped lovers at the top, and a comedian whom I then suspected to be the possessor of a very high order of wit, who entreated us at intervals of five minutes, after making most extraordinary statements, "If we didn't believe him to ask Lazarillo." The Sheep's Foot was a very wonderful affair in its day and generation, but I do not think we ever quite understood what an English Christmas in the theatre might be until the Martinetti descended upon us with a genuine pantomime. What a mysterious fellow "Harlequin" seemed with a black visor; how graceful was "Columbine" with her mazy twinkling step as she skipped across the stage for no earthly reason that anybody could see; what an infinity of trouble had "Clown" and "Pantaloon," and what ineffable trash and nonsense it all does seem now. Picture the condition of that old Englishman's mind who for forty years has done nothing but study up new tricks and traps for the Christmas pantomimes. Think of the conservative English sitting down to this sort of thing year after year and decade after decade. We manage those things much better in America, do we not? For who would replace the bewildering extravaganzas of today for the four Italians of pantomime, with the hoar of tradition thick upon them? The extravaganza presents a delightfully wide field for various talents, and no one—from Donati, the one-legged dancer, to Leona Dare, the beautiful—need rest in mute inglorious ease. Has it ever occurred to you, Madge, that just when the weather is getting cold, and the mercury dropping far down, the stage managers begin to disrobe their coryphæes? I am quite certain that at about this time last year I saw one young woman dressed in a spangle and a yard of tulle, and yet every one exclaimed "What a beautiful costume!" She used to absent herself from the stage now and then, and upon such occasions it was always given out that she had a bad cold. Jack said the poor thing must have dropped the spangle. I think it was during this same season, at all events while the Kralfys were in town, that we had the snow ballet. Did you see Palladino? She was a charming creature with a bright, speaking, sparkling face, and she danced with an abandon and an expression which the spindle-legged De Rosa with all her art never managed to acquire. I recall Palladino especially in the snow ballet with her ample expanded skirts weighted with snow drifts—cotton batting of course, but what matter—and her pretty upturned eyes inviting the flakes to fall. You see I am quite masculine in my admiration for a pretty danseuse. Strange that a snow scene is so rare in a Christmas spectacle that this charmed by its novelty. Everything rather is tropical with that strange bizarre luxuriance of the stage, tropics which is like nothing in nature or art either, unless the Arabian Nights comes under one head or the other. What a moving mass of this glittering splendor was the scenery of Ahmed, the Christmas spectacle on Mission Street a year or two ago. How it sated the eye with the gold and silver tinsel, its pink and red trees, its blue and gold bushes, its amber and vermilion vines. What a glint and dazzle and glare it all was! What an odd thing it is really that they seldom play a Christmas story at Christmas time. The juvenile papers are always full of good little boys and girls who hang up their stockings and get them full of all sorts of delightful Christmas contrivances, and the newspapers and magazines are full of big boys and girls who hang up figurative stockings and figuratively get them full. But, although we conscientiously go to the Christmas spectacle, as a part of the holiday programme, we hear never a word of Christmas itself inside the theatres. Yet I could wish that the holiday play might be "chock" full of Christmas, as the youngsters say, for some day when Pictou declares a dividend Jack intends to buy for me, for my Christmas present, the matinée gallery; and I intend to fill it with boys, not out of any philanthropical intention, but simply for my own solid enjoyment. You may come and sit with me, if you will, in an upper box where we can watch the faces. I am not going into the highways and by-ways for ragamuffins alone. Any boy with a big capacity for enjoyment may come. I shall only stipulate that his mother let him come without any preliminary attentions. A thoroughly clean boy never thoroughly enjoys himself. The utter absence of all original dirt as depressing an effect upon him as a last year's bonnet on a fashion leader. Think of it, Madge; two galleries full of boys, rising tier upon tier above each other, eager, noisy, dirty, happy, half believing in the wonders behind the curtain with childish faith, half doubting with masculine superiority. They begin to sneer early, these bipeds, and a cynic of ten is not less amusing than a cynic of twenty. Still, they have their weaknesses, for never boy lived yet with a soul above a Christmas dinner or a new drum. Barring the drum, how little they out-grow themselves. I want a Christmas play for my gallery; a rousing, stirring, mystical, magical Christmas play. A boy's faith in "Kriss Kringle" is shattered too early. Long after they have ceased to believe, little girls of a similar age will stand before the shop windows and discuss the intentions of Santa Claus in the chimney act with most womanly, confiding, and a poetic recklessness of imagination. "Which would you'd rather in your stocking," asked one little maid of another the other day, "a gold diamond house, or a silver ruby piano?" Such are the lessons of the transformation scene, where these extraordinary combinations, to childhood so wondrous and so beautiful, are not impossible. Therefore, while one views with perfect equanimity the decadence of the pantomime, would it not be too bad to see the spectacle as a specialty of the Christmas time pass away? Two years ago at the California we had the Mighty Dollar for the holiday piece, and we are to have it again. Strictly speaking it can not be barred out as a spectacle, for Mrs. Florence's succession of toilets may be called transformation business. You never saw them, did you, Madge? It is a mystery, even to the ladies, how she gets into and out of them, for they look as if they had been neatly pasted on. If she continues to make her dresses a specialty it would almost be worth your while to come to town to see how a dress can fit. People wonder how, being so decidedly embonpoint, she can appear so slender. Entre nous, Madge, her corset strings are said to be as strong as steel wires, and she is unincumbered with drapery excepting the balayuse. Jack has gloomily intimated that all of the Mighty Dollar that will be around this Christmas will be on the posters; but, dear me, despite the hard times, Christmas is always jolly whoever croaks. At Baldwin's they are furnishing up a little, too. We are to have a drama, an ordinary drama, but they have sacrificed themselves to the spectacular so far as to include a body of Highlandmen in full dress—if I may use a figure of speech—as one of the attractions. It is quite a reversal of the usual order of things to see the short skirts on the men at this season, but it is all the more a novelty. Picturesque as it is, how rarely we see the Highland kilt upon the stage. And I think nothing is queerer than the tiny bit of plaid which the prima donnas introduce in Lucia or La Dame Blanche, as a mild concession. Not Guilty, I take it, is in some sort a military drama. We are to have the boom of fire arms and the clash of steel—and noise is one of the ingredients of enjoyment. Where are the two hundred young ladies coming in who were advertised for? Are they to be Highlandmen, or plain soldiers? The bill sayeth not. All I know is that Jack, who does know, is perfectly satisfied. But the spectacle par excellence will be Revels, at the Grand Opera House. There should be an injunction against opening this house except at Christmas time. I do not know of a more profoundly gloomy undertaking than a visit to the Grand Opera House under ordinary circumstances. As it happens, there are but few of sufficiently morbid temperament to make the experiment frequently. I have seen the house full three times—once for Aida, once for Wachtel, and once for Ahmed. There is also a tradition that Snowflake drew a good house the first night. A propos, I see that Annie Pixley has quite won the Bostonians as "M'liss," and a gushing admirer writes that "she has made a hit in the drinking song from Giroflé-Girofla." What a blessing was Catharine Lewis to the California songstresses, who have, one and all, attempted to copy her in this her chef-d'œuvre, and have one and all failed to catch the French piquancy of her style. There is, however, at least one advantage in Annie Pixley's singing it. She can not be singing "Pretty as a Picture" at the same time. Truly there is balm in Gilead. Now if some severe course of discipline could be brought to bear upon Miss McHenry, "Pretty as a Picture" might yet be effaced from the earth. This much at least can be laid to Alice Oates' credit, that however discreditable she may have made the entertainment for the public by a capricious bronchial tube, she has never yet inflicted "Pretty as a Picture" upon them. Honor to whom honor is due. Talking of Mrs. Oates, I understand that H. M. S. Pinafore will be a sparkling and strong Christmas attraction. I have it from good authority that all that lozenges, soothing syrup, and newspapers may do to allay that cough will be done. And yet with a cold three months old she has made Sullivan's Sweethearts all the rage. She sings it well, too, the little midget. As for little women, what will Ella Chapman look like frolicking around the big stage in the Revels? Like a Brazilian bug, most likely. I intend to be complimentary, for what is prettier? And I make no doubt she will be tricked out like a rainbow, so that all we shall see will be the flash of color, for she is nothing but a little suggestion after all. How will burlesque do in that great place—the grave of Evangeline? But the "Surprise" people bring good luck in their wake. I remember the ill-fated Winetta Montague, in one of those disastrous seasons, as "Venus," or "Luna," or one of those girls who wear very little toggery, but a very nice article of dry goods, so far as it goes. What a magnificent Junoesque creature she was in her white spangled diaphanous robe, and in all the glory of a beauty which might have been Hygeia's own. Those Beauclerc girls, in the same line, were very attractive, too, were they not? The tall one especially—I do not recall their names—who wore in one play a singular costume, which from one point of view was the ordinary burlesque dress, and from another the dainty toilet of a woman of fashion. But, dear me, you will not care for a thrice-told tale.

"Here's the end of my paper,
Good-night, if the longitude please."

I have rambled along about Christmas without really telling that anything is going on, for the simple reason that nothing is doing. We are all agog, waiting for the wonders of the coming week. Till then, with once more a merry Christmas, I am, dearest, your own

BETSY B.

For full announcements of the Christmas attractions at the various theatres see programmes published on the twenty-eighth page. The specialties are: H. M. S. Pinafore, at the Bush Street Theatre; Revels, at the Grand Opera House; Not Guilty, at Baldwin's; and The Mighty Dollar, at the California.

SOLILOQUY ON THE ANCESTRY OF MAN.

Durain!—Thou reasonest well; else, whence this love,
Among the race of man, of savage things?
Why does the cruel hunter love to kill:
E'en though his greedy maw be gorged with flesh
Of slaughtered beast and bird?

Why does the angler,
With bated hook, beguile the harmless fish,
And snatch it from its crystal home for sport,
When not impelled by hunger?

Old habits tell! Man can't forget the time,
In the dim long ago, when with savage elaw
He seized his prey, and tore with fanged tooth
His victim, limb from limb, and drank its blood
Ere yet its quivering heart had ceased to beat.

The stately dame and dainty damsel still,
Though clothed in glossy silks and snowy lawns,
In dress and gait give unequivocal signs
Of memories of the lost ancestral tail;
And jewel'd hand, and neck, and ear, but tell
Of savage times ere the historic fig leaf
Became the simple cloak of modesty.

The dreamy poet still delights to sing
Of running brooks, of wood, and meadow green;
Of wintry storms, and whispering breezes soft;
Because his native instincts lead him back
To the time when his naked ancestors
Dwelt in caves, and dens, and through the forest roamed
In search of food; climbing the lofty tree,
And, a ded by the useful caudal member,
Swung from branch to branch to pluck the ripest fruit;
Or stretched their hairy limbs upon the earth,
Without the faintest dream that Plato e'er,
In academic groves, would teach his high
Philosophy, or Virgil sing beneath
The spreading beech his pastoral melodies.

Therefore, friend Moses! I am forced to think
That, in the quaint old story told by thee
Of a fair Eden, and the fall of man
From some high state of angel innocence,
There must be some mistake—'tis very pretty,
And well wove, but of too thin a texture
To stand the test of rigid criticism.
For, if man e'er lived that pure and simple life
Described by thee amid the bowers of Eden,
Some remnant of his early innocence
Would surely yet remain.

Q. E. D.

SAN FRANCISCO, December 16.

A Day's Shooting.

The brown hills bask in the morning sun.
The chaparral leaves with dew-drops gleam,
As up the cañon, with dog and gun,
I follow the birds by the half-dry stream.

Hither and yon in her eager quest,
Whipping her sides with her busy tail,
Ranging the cover with tireless zest,
Topsy is seeking the nut-brown quail.

See! By that sage-brush near the rock
Her nose has caught the delicate scent:
"Steady, my beauty, we'll find the flock
Hard by that scrub-oak gnarled and bent."

The swift feet pause in their fleet career—
Instantly motionless now each joint—
Like a carved statue sharp and clear,
Topsy has come to a "dead-sure point."

The whirring covey have taken wing;
Two of their number have flown their last.
"Dead bird! Good Topsy; there—toboo—bring it!"
On, where we've marked down those that passed.

Beneath the madroño's cooling shade
I lie at length for the noonday rest,
And watch the bright play of colors made
By changing lights on the bay's broad breast.

The evening shadow begins to fall;
The fog rolls in through the Golden Gate—
"Yes, my good Topsy, I hear them call,
But we must be off; it's getting late."

SAN FRANCISCO, December, 1878.

G. CHISHORE.

The Unborn Soul.

Life! I have heard strange tales of you,
Of your weird winds, and starlit dew,
And temples wonderfully cold;
Your cities, full of loneliness;
Your twin souls, glad in one caress;
Your face's passion, worn and old.

I have known souls that came from you
With sad brows bound with weary rue,
And after them a weeping came;
But some without a sound go by
Crowned with unchallenged purity,
And eyes intense with sudden flame.

Blind cravings urge me in my dreams;
I am not yet, but still it seems
I shall be soon. The hidden source
Of being seems to slowly fill;
I wait with passive yearning still
For the great flood of human force.

The souls, as yet ungarmented,
Press round me without noise or head;
And there is one dear soul who saith
That she will clothe herself ere long,
And if I guide her through the throng
We shall have love through life and death.

NILES, December, 1878.

CHARLES H. SHINN.

Bill of Fare for Six Persons.—Christmas, 1878.

Vermicelli Soup.
Stewed Terrapin, Potatoes Roasted in their Skins.
Boiled Turkey, Oyster Dressing and Sauce.
Green Peas, Broiled Tomatoes.
Roman Punch.
Roast Pig and Apple Sauce.
French Artichoke Salad.
English Plum Pudding. Mince Pie.
Fruit-bowl of Apples, Pears, Plums, Bananas, Oranges, and Grapes.
Walnuts, Almonds, Figs, Prunes, and Raisins.

TO MAKE ENGLISH PLUM PUDDING.—Take half a pound seeded raisins, half pound currants, half pound sugar, half pound bread crumbs, and a very little flour; two ounces lemon and orange peel, one ounce almonds blanched, all finely chopped, four eggs (no milk). Mix with brandy. Boil in a basin or mould five hours. Serve with a rich pudding sauce. It is not necessary to make this pudding the day it is to be eaten; it may be prepared a day or two in advance and steamed when needed, or the batter can be kept. This receipt may be relied upon, as it was obtained from a celebrated English housekeeper.

MERRY CHRISTMAS AT B. H. & CO'S

Standard Works of Fiction, History, Travel, Biography, Poetry, and General Literature, in Fine Library Binding.

ILLUSTRATED GALLERIES

Full and full on

JUVENILES

In sets and separate volumes.

Bibles, Prayer-Books, and Hymnals, Games, Toy Books, etc., etc.

RUSSIAN LEATHER

Writing Desks, Portfolios, Jewellery Cases, Work Boxes, Lunch Boxes, Music Rolls, etc.

Photograph Albums, Stamp and Autograph Albums, and ELEGANT STATIONERY,

Embracing the newest styles of Wedding, Corresponding, Visiting, and Menu Cards.

Copper Plate Engraving and Printing a Specialty.

BILLINGS, HARBOURNE & CO.,
BOOKSELLERS AND STATIONERS,
NO. 3 MONTGOMERY STREET.

CALIFORNIA SPOOL SILK

TESTIMONIAL.

Referring to certain advertisements recently published derogatory to the quality of

CALIFORNIA SPOOL SILK,

We beg to offer the following testimonial from the largest dealers in the city.

CALIFORNIA SILK MFG CO.

We, the undersigned, hereby state that we have sold the CALIFORNIA SPOOL SILK for a number of years, and have found it to give entire satisfaction.

We recommend it to the public as equal in quality to any silk in this market, of either Foreign or Eastern manufacture. [Signed.]
DOANE & HENSHAW, No. 1 Montgomery Street.

FRATINER & NOLL, 10 to 14 Montgomery Street.

F. CHESTER & CO., 34 to 36 Montgomery Street.

KAINDLER & CO., Ville de Paris, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

J. SAMUELS, 38 Kearny Street.

THE WHITE HOUSE, J. W. Davidson & Co., corner Kearny and Post Streets.

S. MOSGROVE & CO., 114 and 116 Kearny Street.

THE LACE HOUSE, D. Samuels, 104 to 108 Kearny Street.

BUYER, REICH & CO., 129 Kearny Street.

S. BINE, 130 Kearny Street.

LANDERS & GILMORE, 132 Kearny St.

SULLIVAN'S CLOAK & SUIT HOUSE, 229 Kearny Street.

THE SILK HOUSE, Samuel Leszynski & Bro., 120 Kearny Street.

B. SCHONWASSER & CO., 222 Kearny St.

JACOB & GLASS, 226 Kearny Street.

P. B. KENNEDY, 232 Kearny Street.

CONNOR, MOFFATT & CO., 111 to 115 Post Street.

O'NEILL, KENNEDY & STUART, 875 Market Street.

C. CURTIN, 611 Market Street.

J. J. O'BRIEN & CO., 922 to 928 Market St.

ODWYER & EINHORN, 39 and 35 Third Street.

IN ATTO & SILVERMAN, 42 to 46 Third Street.

And hundreds of others.

MUSIC BOXES

OF ALL DESCRIPTIONS AND OF Standard Reputation, playing from one to over one hundred airs. The largest and best assortment in this city. MUSICAL BOXES WITH CHANGEABLE CYLINDERS always on hand. New and interesting styles constantly received. Call and examine our stock. REPAIRING OF MUSICAL BOXES thoroughly done in all their particulars.

M. J. PAILLARD & CO.,
MANUFACTURERS AND IMPORTERS,

120 Sutter Street, San Francisco.

Branch of House, 630 Broadway, New York.

O. F. WILLEY & CO.

IMPORTERS AND MANUFACTURERS OF

FINE CARRIAGES & WAGONS

No. 427 MONTGOMERY ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

Agents for the sale of Wagons manufactured by

BREWSTER & CO., New York,

W. D. ROGERS, Philadelphia,

C. S. CAFFEY, Camden, N. J.,

WOOD BROTHERS, New York,

H. KILLAM & CO., New Haven,

COOLING BROS., Wilmington

ALSO, AGENTS FOR

HARNESS MANUFACTURED BY WOOD GIBSON, TOMPKINS & MANDEVILLE, AND A. H. DUNSCOMB.

Also, a fine assortment of Robes, Blankets, Nets, Whips, etc.

USEFUL

HOLIDAY PRESENTS

— AT —

MULLER'S

OPTICAL DEPOT,

135 Montgomery Street,

Near Bush.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

S. MAGGIE WHEELER, plaintiff, vs. GIRARD E. H. WHEELER, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to GIRARD E. H. WHEELER, defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise, within forty days—of judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony existing between the plaintiff and defendant, on the grounds of failure to provide the plaintiff with the common necessities of life, and extreme cruelty to said plaintiff, by the defendant, and that the said plaintiff be allowed to resume her maiden name, to wit, S. Maggie Saunders, as will more fully appear in the plaintiff's complaint herein, to which reference is hereunto expressly made.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded. Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this twenty-first day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.

By W. STEVENSON, Deputy Clerk.

THOMAS & WILSON, Attorneys for Plaintiff.

HALE & NORCROSS SILVER MINING COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Directors, held on the tenth (10th) day of December, 1878, an assessment (No. 50) of fifty (50) cents per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 15, Nevada Block, northwest corner Fifth and Montgomery Streets, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the fifteenth (15th) day of January, 1879, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on THURSDAY, the seventh day of February, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

JOEL F. LIGHTNER, Secretary.

Office—Room 15, Nevada Block, northwest corner Fifth and Montgomery Streets, San Francisco, California.

GEO. W. PRESCOTT. IRVING M. SCOTT. H. T. SCOTT.

UNION IRON WORKS

(Founded 1843.) Post Office Box 2128.

COR. FIRST AND MISSION STREETS,
SAN FRANCISCO

MANUFACTURERS OF

Compressed Engines,
Air Compressors,
Rock Drills,
Portable Hoisting Engines,
Marine Stationary and Portable Boilers
Baby Hoist, complete.

CONSTANTLY ON HAND AND FOR SALE.

Direct-acting Pumping and Hoisting Engines,
Upright and Stationary Engines,
Quartz Crushing and Amalgamating Machinery
Blake's Rock Breakers,
Smelting Furnaces,
Quicksilver Pumps,
Chlorozinc Furnaces,
Cornish Pumps,
Steam Pumps.

All manufactured by us of the best materials, design, and workmanship, and furnished at lower rates than by Eastern manufacturers.

PRESCOTT, SCOTT & CO.

THE LAST SENSATION!

"THE SOCIETY IN SEARCH OF Truth: or, Stock Gambling in San Francisco." A Novel, in Forty-four Chapters, by

I. F. CLARK,

A former member of the Pacific Stock Exchange. Now ready. Read it.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF

the Standard Gold Mining Company, San Francisco, Cal., Dec. 7, 1878.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company, held this day, Dividend No. 16 of one dollar per share was declared, payable on Thursday, the 12th day of December, 1878. Transfer books closed on Monday, December 3, 1878, at 3 o'clock P. M.

Office, Room 29 Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, third floor, San Francisco, Cal.

SURE REMEDY FOR BALDNESS.

Prescription Free to any person who writes to pay $1. when a new growth of Hair, Whiskers or Mustaches is actually produced. Sanderson & Co., 2 Clinton Place, New York.

ARIZONA SILVER MINING COMPANY.

Location of works, Unionville, Humboldt County, State of Nevada. Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 12th day of December, 1878, an assessment (No. 4) of one dollar ($1) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room No. 29, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on Monday, the thirteenth (13th) day of January, 1879, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on MONDAY, the third (3d) day of February, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

Office—Room No. 29, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

CROWN POINT GOLD AND SILVER

Mining Company.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Gold Hill, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 12th day of December, 1878, an assessment (No. 36) of one dollar ($1) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 10, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the sixteenth (16th) day of January, 1879, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on THURSDAY, the sixth day of February, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

Office—203 Bush Street, Room 10, Cosmopolitan Hotel, San Francisco, California.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

IZETIA GOODHUE, plaintiff vs. STEPHEN GOODHUE, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to STEPHEN GOODHUE, defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise, within forty days—of judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now and heretofore existing between the plaintiff and defendant upon the grounds set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which special reference is hereby made, and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded. Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 14th day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.

By J. H. PICHENS, Deputy Clerk.

WOODS & COFFEY, Attorneys for Plaintiff.

CALIFORNIA FARMERS' MUTUAL

Fire Insurance Company

[ESTABLISHED IN 1874.]

Paid up Capital .....$200,000
Assets exceed..... 326,000

PRINCIPAL OFFICE 209 SANSOME ST.
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.,

THOS. FLINT, President.

FRED. K. RULE .....Secretary.
I. G. GARDNER.....General Agent.

COMMERCIAL

INSURANCE COMPANY OF CALA,

FIRE AND MARINE.

Principal office, 405 California Street, San Francisco.

JOHN H. WISE, President.

CHAS. A. LATON, Secretary.

THE STATE INVESTMENT

— AND —

INSURANCE COMPANY, FIRE AND MARINE

CASH ASSETS.....$450,000

Principal Office, 213 and 220 Sansome Street, San Francisco

OFFICERS:

A. J. BRYANT, President,
RICHARD IVERS, Vice-President,
CHAS. H. CUSHING, Secretary,
H. H. WATSON, Marine Surveyor

SAVAGE MINING COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the fourth (4th) day of December, 1878, an assessment (No. 36) of one dollar per share, was levied on the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 15, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the seventh (7th) day of January, 1879, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on MONDAY, the seventh day of January, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

Office, Room 15, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

GOULD & CURRY SILVER MINING

Company.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 12th day of November, 1878, an assessment (No. 34) of one dollar and fifty cents ($1.50) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately, in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 6, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 23d day of December, 1878, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on TUESDAY, the fourteenth day of January, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with cost of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors.

ALFRED K. DUBROW, Secretary.

Office—Room 6, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

APPLICATION TO BECOME SOLE

TRADER.—Notice is hereby given that I, EMMA S. HOWE, wife of Charles W. Howe, of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, will apply to the County Court of said city and county and State aforesaid, on MONDAY, the 23d day of December, A. D. 1878, the same being a day of the November term, A. D. 1878, of said County Court, for the judgment and decree of said Court, authorizing and permitting me to act as a Sole Trader, and as such to carry on and conduct, in my own name, in said city and county and State aforesaid, the business of buying and selling merchandise, buying and selling real and personal property and mining stocks, and to keep boarding and lodging-house, and to loan and borrow money on mortgage or otherwise, and to do and perform all acts connected with or incident to said different branches of business.

EMMA S. HOWE.

San Francisco, Cal., November 12th, A. D. 1878.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

FRANCES A. NELSON, plaintiff, vs. DAVID P. NELSON, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to David P. Nelson, defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise, within forty days—of judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony heretofore and now existing between the plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is hereby expressly made, and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded. Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 14th day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.

By W. STEVENSON, Deputy Clerk.

Geo. L. Woods and John J. Coffey, Attorneys for Plaintiff.

CANNEL COAL.

A SUPERIOR QUALITY OF GRATE
COAL for sale by
MIDDLETON & FARNSWORTH,
14 Post Street, and 713 Sansome Street.

BUTTERICK'S

PATTERNS-DEC. STYLES.

Send stamp for catalogue. AGENCY, 124 POST ST.,
San Francisco.

CHRISTMAS

CANDIES AND HOLIDAY GOODS
supplied to Church Festivals and Parties at wholesale rates. Imported Cap Bonbons, extra fine, 50 cents a dozen.
ROBERTS, corner Bush and Polk Streets.

HEALD'S BUSINESS
COLLEGE,
No. 24 Post Street,
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
Opposite Mechanics' Institute.

IMPARTS A THOROUGH PRACTIcal Education in all Commercial and English Branches French, German, Spanish, Drawing, and Telegraphy. This school having greater facilities, and enjoying a more extensive patronage than any similar institution on the Pacific coast, continues to base its claims for recognition and patronage upon the good sense and enlightened judgment of public.

LIST OF FACULTY.
E. P. Heald, F. C. Woodhury,
H. M. Stearns, A. B. Capp,
Mrs. C. Woodbury, T. R. Southern,
J. A. Chesnutwood, Mrs. W. J. Hamilton,
A. P. DuBief, F. Sereni,
R. Sorcini, Geo. Jebens,
Lloyd Baldwin, A. Vander Naillen.
For full particulars, call at the College, 24 Post Street,
or address E. P. HEALD,
President Business College, San Francisco.

ARMY AND NAVY GOODS,
REGALIA AND LODGE SUPPLIES.

A. J. PLATE & CO.,

No. 510 SACRAMENTO STREET.

THOMAS BOYSON, M. D.

(University of Copenhagen, Denmark),

PHYSICIAN AND SURGEON. Office
and Residence, 112 Kearny Street. Office hours, 11
A. M. to 1 P. M., 6 to 8 P. M. Sunday 11 to 2 only. Telephone in the office.

J. J. CLARKE, M. D.

No. 105 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

J. J. BIRGE, DENTIST, 313 Kearny Street.

R. C. MOWBRAY, M. D., DENTIST
224 STOCKTON ST., corner Post, S. F.

THE VERTICAL FEED.

THE ONLY POSITIVE SUCCESS IN
all departments of sewing. Lightest running shuttle
machine in the market. The NEW DAVIS VERTICAL FEED
SEWING MACHINE, 130 Post Street.

MARK SHELTON.
P. S.—Howe, Florence, Wheeler & Wilson, Grover &
Baker, Domestic, Weed, Willcox & Gibbs, for sale at $10
each.

PALACE HOTEL RESTAURANT,

FIRST CLASS IN ALL RESPECTS.

QUIET AND DESIRABLE PLACE
for Ladies, Gentlemen, and Families. 23rd Entrance south side of Court. A. D. SHARON.

THOMAS H. HOLT,
NOTARY PUBLIC, No. 326½ Montgomery Street. Residence, 1203 Stockton Street,
San Francisco.

EUREKA STONE MFG CO.

EUREKA STONE SEWER PIPE A
specialty. None but the best brands of English
Portland Cement used.
FACTORY, 535 BRANNAN STREET.

GEORGE BARSTOW,
ATTORNEY AT LAW, No. 309 California Street, San Francisco, Cal.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF THE CALIFORNIA MINING CO., San Francisco, Dec. 7th, 1878. At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named Company, held this day, a Dividend (No. 25) of One ($1) Dollar per share was declared, payable on Monday, December 16, 1878.
C. P. GORDON, Secretary.

ELITE DIRECTORY

For San Francisco, Oakland, and Vicinity.

A Private Address, Carriage and Club Directory and Visiting Guide, containing the Names and Residence Address of nearly Six Thousand Society People.

THE BLUE BOOK OF THE PACIFIC COAST.*TABLE OF CONTENTS:

San Francisco Society—An article descriptive and historical, going back to early days and mentioning the prominent beaux and belles, and the fashionable residence quarters of the city at different dates, etc.

Reception Days—General information regarding the same.

Special Address and Calling List—A carefully compiled list of society people, their residence, address, and reception days, made up from various select invitation lists and special sources of information, and comprising over two thousand families. Something of value to every member of polite society.

Army Calling and Address List.

Navy Calling and Address List.

Permanent Guests at Principal Hotels.

Bar Association—History and membership.

Art Association—History and membership.

Loring Club—History and membership.

Chit-Chat Club—History and membership.

Article on Social Club Life in San Francisco.

Pacific Club—History and Membership.

Union Club—History and membership.

Bohemian Club—History and membership.

Occidental Club, Oakland—History and membership.

San Francisco Verein, German Club—History and membership.

Concordia Club, Jewish—History and membership.

Spanish American Club—History and membership.

Theatre Diagrams—Giving official box office plans of all the principal theatres, with numbers of boxes and chairs, so that a ready reference can be had at home to the exact location of seats secured by tickets by comparing numbers. This feature is alone worth the price of the volume.

Shopping Guide—Giving location of place of business and general information concerning a few of our high class retail establishments.

The ELITE DIRECTORY will be a book of 288 pages, elegantly bound in blue and gold, gilt edged, and handsome in typography, paper, and general appearance.

READY ON OR ABOUT THE FIRST OF JANUARY, 1878.

A. L. BANCROFT & CO., Publishers.

F. M. SOMERS, Editor and Compiler.

CHICKERING

PIANO WAREROOMS,

31 POST ST., Mechanics' Institute Building.

ELEGANT PIANOS.

L. K. HAMMER,

Sole Agent for Pacific Coast.

23rd Owners of Chickering Pianos are specially requested to leave orders for tuning at warerooms, 31 Post Street.

WEBER
PIANOS ARE THE BEST

WAREROOMS, N. W. CORNER
KEARNY AND SUITER STREETS.

SHERMAN, HYDE & CO.

SHEET MUSIC,
MUSIC BOOKS,
MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

SEWING MACHINES.

GROVER & BAKER SEWING AND
Embroidering SILKS, Pure Dye, Full Weight. To the trade and at retail.

J. W. EVANS, 29 Post Street.

PALMER BROS.

726 TO 734 MARKET ST.,

Have a full assortment of

LADIES' AND GENTS' FURNISH-
ing Goods, Toilet Articles, Corsets, Embroideries,
French and Valenciennes Laces, a fine assortment of Veil-
ings and Ruchings, and the largest stock of

MILLINERY GOODS,

And the best stock of

BOYS' CLOTHING AND HATS & CAPS
In the city.

FILIPPE'S ACADEMY OF LAN- guages, 120 Sutter Street. French, Spanish, English, German, Italian, Latin, Greek, Portuguese, Russian, and Scandinavian languages taught, at moderate terms, by thorough teachers, with the shortest and best methods.
Classes or private lessons day and evening. Take the elevator. Free school library for the students.

JOE POHEIM

The Tailor,

203 Montgomery St. and 103
Third Street, under the Russ House, near Bush Street, has just received a large assortment of the latest style goods.

Suits to order from ..... $20
Plants to order from ..... 5
Overcoats to order from ..... 15

23rd The leading question is where the best goods can be found at the lowest prices. The answer is at

JOE POHEIM,

203 Montgomery St. and 103
Third St.

Samples and Rules for Self-Measurement sent free to any address. Fit guaranteed.

★ 12 New Articles Almost Given Away
TO ADVERTISE GOODS.
Make Invisible Ink, secret correspondence, Atomic Telegraph, Big & Marvellous, Incredible, The Fastest Pen and Holder, Most valuable Cigar, Sure Cure and Wart Cure, Scintillating Sea Shell, Scotch Bag pipe, French Spy glass, Five Exquisite French Chromes, The Fire Eater with the anyone can meet from their month thousands of copies. The first of the New Lives the size of a pea when lit and expand into a blaze a yard long. All the above Twelve articles are put up in one envelope for 50 cents. will be ready for you in ten days. (Postage Stamps taken) Catalogue of 2,000 new articles sent. Address
WIZARD MANUFACTURING COMPANY,
No. 2 CENTRAL PLACE, NEW YORK. ★

REVELS GRAND OPERA HOUSE.
 REVELS JOHN TORRENCE & Co.....Managers.
 REVELS BRILLIANT
 REVELS HOLIDAY ATTRACTION!
 REVELS Commencing
 REVELS Tuesday Evening.....Dec. 24.
 REVELS LIMITED ENGAGEMENT
 REVELS —OF—
 REVELS RICE'S SURPRISE PARTY,
 REVELS Who will appear for the first time in the new
 REVELS GRAND COMIC EXTRAVAGANZA,
 REVELS With Spectacular Effects, entitled
 REVELS REVELS!
 REVELS REVELS!
 REVELS Which will be produced with
 REVELS BEAUTIFUL SCENERY.
 REVELS MAGNIFICENT COSTUMES,
 REVELS NOVEL MECHANICAL EFFECTS,
 REVELS —AND—
 REVELS GREAT STAR CAST!
 REVELS In addition to which
 REVELS 200 AUXILIARIES
 REVELS Will appear, clad in costumes of rare beauty.
 REVELS Admission, $1, 50 and 25 cents. Reserved
 REVELS seats, 50 cents extra. Sale of seats will REVELS commence at the box office Thursday, Dec. 19th.
 REVELS SOUVENIR TICKETS FOR THE OPEN-
 REVELS ING NIGHT.
 REVELS Grand Christmas Matinee
 REVELS AT TWO O'CLOCK P. M.
 REVELS To all parts of the house, 50 cents. Reserved
 REVELS seats, 25 cents extra.

FRAUDS IN THE PIANO TRADE.
 Unscrupulous dealers in the piano trade have in many instances, in order to sell worthless instruments, copied the name as well as reputation of some leading manufacturer, and by that means flooded the market with disgraceful instruments, that are frauds in construction, material, and name. Among the many leading firms who have thus unjustly had their names used in order to sell this class of instruments are the Decker Bros. The great merit of their pianos was the direct cause of their being pirated. In order to protect themselves and the public the above-named firm commenced suit in New York against one of these fraudulent houses, and the result was a triumph in behalf of justice. The action thus taken reflects great credit on the above-named firm, and the public may feel perfectly safe in purchasing the Decker pianos, by dealing only with the authorized agents, Messrs. Kohler & Chase, of this city, who have one of the largest and finest establishments on this coast, on Post Street. The unrivaled beauty of finish and power and delicacy of tone of the Decker pianos has given them justly a national reputation.

For fine fitting custom clothing, go to J. M. Litchfield & Co., No. 415 Montgomery Street.

Those imported canes at J. M. Litchfield & Co.'s, No. 415 Montgomery Street, are very fine, and really worth one's inspection. What can be better for a holiday present?

For fine gilt Vienna bronzes, the most elegant ever imported to San Francisco; for marble and bronze statuary, of choice and artistic design; for Russia leather goods, genuine in material, unique in style, and of most exquisite patterns; for clocks, beautiful as ornaments and perfect as time-keepers; for exquisite vases, articles of virtu, and all sorts of beautiful Christmas gifts, go to the house of H. SIERING & CO., IMPORTERS, MONTGOMERY STREET, FRONT OF LICK HOUSE BLOCK.

HOLIDAY
ATTRACTIONS
 .....AT.....
ROMAN'S
 11 MONTGOMERY STREET.

BUSH STREET THEATRE
 CHAS. E. LOCKE.....PROPRIETOR.
 Monday Evening, Dec. 23d, Every Evening, and Matinees on Christmas and Saturday.

THE LONDON SUCCESS! THE MUSICAL ABSURDITY!
 Words by W. J. Gilbert, music by Arthur Sullivan, now in its eighth month at the Opera Comique, London,
H. M. S. PINAFORE
 Positively the final production of the
OATES ENGLISH COMIC OPERA CO.
 In San Francisco, and next to their last week.

PERSONAGES IN H. M. S. PINAFORE:
 RALPH RACKSTRAW, A Common Sailor.....ALICE OATES.
 Sir Joseph Porter, K. C. B.....J. G. Taylor.
 Captain Corcoran.....Edward Connell.
 Dick Truck.....Richard Beverley.
 Dick Deadeye.....James A. Meade.
 Bill Bobstay, Boatswain.....R. E. Graham.
 Bob Bucket.....C. N. Decker.
 Jack Jib.....Ed. Horan.
 Tom Gasket.....J. McLaughlin.
 Billy Scrapper.....Geo. Bugby.
 Harry Backstay.....Mills Hall.
 Jim Junk.....Geo. Clare.
 Tom Buntline.....A. Goodwell.
 Tom Tucker.....C. Watkins.

MIDSHIPMEN.
 Mr. Easy.....Miss Bessie Temple.
 Charley Masher.....Hattie Richardson.
 Hon. Heartbreaker.....Pauline Hall.
 Chas. Brassbound.....Jennie Tanner.
 Josephine Corcoran.....Miss Lulu Stevens.
 Buttercup.....Miss Agnes Halleck.
 Hebe, Sir Joseph's First Cousin.....Miss Alice Townsend.
 Florence, Sir Joseph's Second Cousin.....Miss A. Hall.
 Clementina, Sir Joseph's Aunt.....Miss Sexton.

H. M. S. PINAFORE---HIS MAJESTY'S SHIP PINAFORE.
 Secured from the Opera Comique, London, especially for this Holiday production, introducing as it does many novelties strikingly original and unique, and scenic effects of a most realistic character by Graham. It is confidently expected that H. M. S. Pinafore, which will likewise by the last production by the Oates Organization in San Francisco, will prove to be their most enjoyable effort. H. M. S. Pinafore will positively conclude this most extraordinary engagement, the largest and most successful of its character ever played in this city, and it might almost be said, in America.
SEATS FOR EACH PERFORMANCE NOW AT THE BOX OFFICE.

PACIFIC HALL
 Beginning Monday Evening, December 23.
 SEE THE
ELEGANT SILK DRESS PATTERNS
 ON EXHIBITION IN THE
Show Windows of the White House
 To be given away Nightly and at the
CHRISTMAS AND SATURDAY MATINEES
 Together with

100
OTHER COSTLY PRESENTS
WAUGH'S
PANORAMA OF THE WORLD.

CALIFORNIA THEATRE.
 BARTON & LAWLOR.....MANAGERS.
 BARTON HILL.....ACTING MANAGER.
 Monday, Dec. 23, last nights of
MR. F. S. CHANFRAU,
 —AND—
 MAGNIFICENT PRODUCTION
 —OF THE—
OCTOROON,
 Mr. Chanfrau as "Salem Scudder."
 FRIDAY EVENING, December 27th—
 FAREWELL BENEFIT OF MR. CHANFRAU.
 EXTRA CHRISTMAS MATINEE WEDNESDAY.
 USUAL MATINEE SATURDAY.
 MONDAY, December 30th—
 MR. AND MRS. W. J. FLORENCE
 —IN—
 THE MIGHTY DOLLAR.

STANDARD THEATRE.
 Bush Street, between Montgomery and Kearny.
 LESSEE AND MANAGER.....M. A. KENNEDY.
 BUSINESS MANAGER.....P. H. KIRBY.
 TREASURER.....C. S. WALTON.
 This (Saturday) evening, Dec. 21st, third week and continued success of
MR. JOSH HART
 And his
NOVELTY COMPANY.
 The laughable burlesque,
 WAS SHE LED OR DID SHE GO ASTRAY,
 The new local sketch entitled
 THE TERRY JOINED THE GANG EXCURSION.
 Introducing the old-fashioned Nine Pin Dance. The company in a new olio.
 MATINEE TO-DAY AT TWO O'CLOCK.
 Next week entire change of bill.
GRAND CHRISTMAS MATINEE.

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.
 THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER.
 F. LYSTER.....ACTING MANAGER.
 G. R. CHIPMAN.....TREASURER.
 Positively last appearance of
CLARA MORRIS
 This Saturday (matinee), Dec. 21st,
ARTICLE 47,
 CLARA MORRIS AS CORA.
NOTICE.
 The theatre will be closed on Saturday evening for a dress rehearsal of the grand musical, military, dramatic, and spectacular Christmas piece,

NOT GUILTY.
 Sunday evening, Dec. 22d, the novelty of the season,
MASTER RICHARD LOUIS LEVY,
 The boy tragedian, as MACBETH.
MISS OLIVE WEST,
 Her first appearance on any stage, as LADY MACBETH.
 Monday, Dec. 23d, and every evening during the week, the production of
NOT GUILTY.
 Grand Matinee Christmas Day, New Year's Day, and every Saturday at two o'clock.

A. D. REMINGTON,
 411 AND 413 SANSOME STREET,
 All sizes and weights
NEWS AND MANILA PAPER
 Constantly on hand.
SOLE AGENTS FOR

Remington Paper Company, Watertown, N. Y.; Hudson River Pulp and Paper Company, Palmer's Falls, N. Y.; Watertown Paper Company, Watertown, N. Y.; Lick Mills, Santa Clara, Cal.
 The paper on which the ARGONAUT is printed is furnished by this house.

HOLIDAY GIFTS FOR OLD AND YOUNG.

A MAGNIFICENT ASSORTMENT

CHAIRS, WORK STANDS,
KURRACHEE RUGS,
AND FANCY ARTICLES.

WAKEFIELD RATTAN CO., 38 GEARY STREET.

CALIFORNIA SPOOL SILK.

The Extra 100 Yards. Quarter Ounce. Ounce Spools. Embroidery Silks.

THE BEST IN USE.

Manufactured in San Francisco, supporting over 100 white women and girls. Sold by all first-class dealers.

GRAND HOTEL,

Hinkley's Passenger

And Baggage Elevator.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA.

JOHNSON & CO.

Proprietors.

AMERICAN DISTRICT TELEGRAPH.

UNIFORMED MESSENGERS.

Special Detail to Deliver Christmas and New Year's Presents.

OFFICES:

222 SANSOME ST.,
211 KEARNY ST.,
833 SUTTER ST.,
965 MISSION ST.,
POWELL AND UNION,

CALIFORNIA AND FILLMORE,
MISSION AND TWENTIETH,
FOURTH AND BLUXOME,
HAYES AND LAGUNA,
BUTCHERTOWN.

PATTERNS.

Messrs. E. Butterick & Co.'s Celebrated Patterns—Their Merits—Why They are Universally Preferred to All Others.

THEIR PATTERNS ARE NOT ONLY prepared with the utmost precision, but have the advantage of being graded in all sizes by a method which fifteen years of constant trial have failed to prove incorrect, and which remains a secret with themselves.

The great object of their method of grading has been to secure the proper fit for every desired size, and at the same time to retain the style unchanged. This they have effected so thoroughly that any one can obtain a pattern requiring but little variation.

The ladies will find garments made from their patterns the best exponents of the fashionable world exhibits of elegance, style, utility, and economy.

We say, without hesitation, their patterns are the latest and most fashionable, and the most reliable in use. Every one using these patterns will save at least twenty-five per cent. which would be incurred by any other method. The label on each pattern shows the size, kind, and the amount of cloth and trimming needed, as well as a picture of the garment when finished. It also gives explicit directions, which, if carefully followed, preclude any possibility of mistakes in cutting and making.

Agencies for the sale of their patterns are located in every city and town on the continent.

Their branch house for this coast is 124 Post Street, DEMING & BARRETT.—From Morse & Wood's Fashion Journal.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—INDIAN
Queen Mining and Milling Company, Room 69 Nevada Block, San Francisco, December 16, 1878.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company held this day, dividend No. 4 of Twenty-five (25) cents per share was declared, payable on Friday, December 17, 1878. ALFRED K. DUREBROW, Secretary.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF
the Eureka Consolidated Mining Company, Nevada Block, Room 37, San Francisco, December 16, 1878.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company, held this day, a dividend (No. 38) of three dollars per share was declared, payable on Friday, December 20, 1878. Transfer books closed until December 21st. W. W. TRAYLOR, Secretary.

THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE
stockholders of the Consolidated Virginia Mining Company will be held at the office of the Company, No. 26 Nevada Block, 300 Montgomery Street, in this city, on THURSDAY, the ninth day of January, 1879, at one o'clock P. M., for the election of a Board of Trustees to serve for the ensuing year, and for the transaction of such other business as may properly come before the meeting. Transfer books will close Saturday, December 28, 1878, at twelve o'clock noon. A. W. HAVENS, Secretary.
SAN FRANCISCO, December 15, 1878.

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATOR,

WILLIAM DOOLAN,

Office No. 12 Nevada Block.

R. P. & H. N. CLEMENT,

ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW,

Nos. 2, 3, and 4 SHERMAN'S BUILDING,

Montgomery Street, N. E. corner of Clay, San Francisco (P. O. Box 707.)

DIAMONDS.

The most attractive assortment of

DIAMONDS, WATCHES, JEWELRY, ETC.,

And Novelties, for the selection of wedding and other presents, at

GEO. C. SHREVE & CO.'S,

110 MONTGOMERY STREET.

W. K. VANDERSLICE & CO.

NO. 136 SUTTER STREET.

IMMENSE REDUCTION
IN SILVERWARE.

SOLID STERLING SILVER SPOONS AND FORKS,

Of our own manufacture, at $1.40 per oz.,

THIS BEING MUCH LOWER THAN THEY EVER HAVE BEEN SOLD.

DIAMONDS, WATCHES, JEWELRY, AT LOWEST RATES.

DIAMONDS OF RARE PERFECTION

In single stones, and carefully matched pairs, set and unset.

EMERALDS, RUBIES, AND SAPPHIRES,

AND OTHER PRECIOUS STONES.

WATCHES, JEWELRY, AND SILVERWARE

AT UNEXCEPTIONABLY LOW RATES.

BRAVERMAN & LEVY,

119 MONTGOMERY STREET.

MADAME SKIDMORE

FINE MILLINERY.

THE LATEST PARISIAN STYLES CONSTANTLY RECEIVED.

1114 Market St., between Mason and Taylor, under Graham House.

THE CAL. FURNITURE M'FG CO.

HAVE FIVE TIMES AS MUCH

FURNITURE

As any other house on this Coast, which has been purchased so low that we CAN and WILL sell at such prices that the poor can gratify their WISHES and the rich their TASTE. At the old stand,

NOS. 224 AND 226 BUSH STREET, S. F.

JOHN E. QUINN,

1400 POLK STREET, CORNER OF PINE,

THE LEADING, ONE PRICE FANCY GOODS STORE OF WESTERN Addition. A full line of

First Class Fancy Goods, Dress Trimmings, Kid Gloves, Holiday Gifts, Notions, etc., etc.

I do not advertise to give my goods away as many do, but will, and do, sell them at the lowest market prices.

Open Evenings.

WAKELEE'S AUREOLINE

PRODUCES THE BEAUTIFUL
Glen Hair so much admired. Superior to the imported article by reason of its freshness and the care used in its production.
PRICE, LARGE BOTTLES, $2.

H. P. WAKELEE & CO.,
DRUGGISTS.

Corner Montgomery and Bush Streets, San Francisco.

ALASKA COMMERCIAL CO.

No. 310 SANSOME STREET,

WHOLESALE DEALER IN FURS.

J. C. MERRILL & CO.

SHIPPING

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Agents for the

SANDWICH ISLANDS AND OREGON PACKET
LINES.

204 and 206 CALIFORNIA ST. San Francisco.

NEWTON BOOTH, C. T. WHITFIELD, Sacramento,
J. T. GLOVER, W. W. DODGE, San Francisco

W. W. DODGE & CO.,

WHOLESALE GROCERS,

Northwest corner Clay and Front Streets, San Francisco.

RARE ENGRAVINGS AND ETCHINGS,

CHRISTMAS, 1878.

JUST RECEIVED, A LARGE COLlection of fine Engravings specially purchased in Italy for the Christmas trade. Nothing can be more appropriate for a holiday or wedding present than a fine Engravement, which is suitable for home decoration and at the same time rare. W. K. VICKERY would respectfully invite an inspection of his Engravings and their prices.
Please note address—22 Montgomery Street, opposite the Lick House.
OPEN IN THE EVENING.

REDINGTON'S FLAVORING EXTRACTS

ARE THE PERFECTLY PURE
and highly concentrated Extracts of

FRESH FRUITS

Prepared with great care. They are put up in superior style, in a bottle holding twice as much as ordinary
brands of Extracts.
Comparing quality and contents, none other are nearly so
cheap.

Wherever tested on THEIR MERITS, they have been adopted in preference to all others, and now are the

STANDARD FLAVORING EXTRACTS

Of the Pacific coast. Dealers will find them to give better satisfaction to the consumers than any other kind and are respectfully requested to give them a trial.

REDINGTON & CO.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

RUPTURE.

BUY NO TRUSS

Until you see what has been accomplished by DR. MERCE's late invention.
Call, or send for New Illustrated
Book. Prices reduced.
MAGNETIC ELASTIC TRUSS
CO., 609 Sacramento Street, San Francisco.

MILLER & RICHARD,

SOLE MAKERS OF

EXTRA-HARD METAL SCOTCH TYPE.

SPECIAL AGENTS FOR

THE CAMPBELL, HOE, AND PEEBLES
PRESSES.

No. 723 COMMERCIAL STREET.

Leidesdorff Street, San Francisco.

SOUTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD

WINTER ARRANGEMENT,
COMMENCING MONDAY, NOV. 18, 1878.

Passenger trains will leave San Francisco, from Passenger Depot on Townsend Street, between Third and Fourth, as follows:

8.30 A. M. DAILY for San Jose, Gilroy, Hollister,
Tres Pinos, Pajaro, Salinas, Soledad, and All Way
Stations. 4.40 P. M. for Pajaro, Santa Cruz R.R. connects with this train for Aptos and Santa Cruz. At Salinas the
M. & S. V. R. R. connects with this train for Monterey.
2.50 P. M. connections made with this train.

10.40 A. M. DAILY for San Jose and Way Stations.
3.30 P. M. DAILY (Sundays excepted) for Gilroy, and Way Stations.

4.40 P. M. DAILY for San Jose and Way Stations.

6.30 P. M. DAILY for Menlo Park and Way Stations.

2.50 P. M. The extra Sunday train to San Jose and Way Stations will take the cars of the Central Pacific Railroad
via OAKLAND, leaving SAN FRANCISCO via Ferry
Landing, Market Street, at 4.00 P. M. daily, and making close connection at GOSHEN for Sumner, Mohave, LOS ANGELES, Wilmington, Anaheim, Colton, Colorado
River, and Yuma.

EXCURSION TICKETS to San Jose and intermediate points, and return sold on Saturdays and Sunday mornings.
Good for return until following Monday, inclusive.

A. C. BASSETT, H. R. JUDAH,
Superintendent, Asst. Pass. & Tkt. Agt.

SOUTHERN DIVISIONS.

2.50 Passengers for points on the Southern Divisions of the road will take the cars of the Central Pacific Railroad
via OAKLAND, leaving SAN FRANCISCO via Ferry
Landing, Market Street, at 4.00 P. M. daily, and making close connection at GOSHEN for Sumner, Mohave, LOS ANGELES, Wilmington, Anaheim, Colton, Colorado
River, and Yuma.

SAN FRANCISCO AND NORTH PACIFIC R. R.

Commencing Monday, November 11, 1878, and until further notice, Boats and Trains will leave SAN FRANCISCO:
(Ticket Office, Washington Street Wharf.)

3.00 P. M. DAILY, Sundays included,
Steamer "James M. Donahue" (Washington Street Wharf), connecting with Mail and Express Train at Donahue for Petaluma, Santa Rosa, Healdsburg, Clover-
dale, and way stations. Making stage connection at Lakeville for Sonoma; at Geyserville for Skaggs Springs, at Cloverdale for Ukiah, Lakeport, Mendocino City, and the GEYSERS.

2.50 Connections made at Fulton on the following morning for Korb's, Guerneville, and the Redwoods (Sundays excepted).
(Arrive at San Francisco 10.30 A. M.)

Freight received from 7 A. M. to 2.30 P. M. daily (except Sunday).

TICKET OFFICE, WASHINGTON STREET WHARF.

ARTHUR HUGHES, Gen. Manager. A. A. BEAN, Sup't.
P. E. DOUGHERTY, Gen. Pass. and Tkt. Agent.

OCCIDENTAL AND ORIENTAL STEAMSHIP COMPANY

—FOR—

JAPAN AND CHINA,

Leave Wharf, Cor. First and Brannan Streets, at noon, for
YOKOHAMA AND HONGKONG.

Connecting at Yokohama with steamers for Shanghai,

GAELIC, OCEANIC, BELGIC.
February.....13 December.....17 January.....16
May.....16 March.....15 April.....16

Cabin plans on exhibition and Passenger Tickets for sale
at No. 2 Montgomery Street.
For freight apply to GEO. H. RICE, Freight Agent, at the Pacific Mail Steamship Company's Wharf, or No. 218
California Street.

T. H. GOODMAN, Gen'l Passenger Agent.
LELAND STANFORD, President.

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP CO.

First-class steamers with unequalled accommodations for passengers will leave San Francisco:

FOR YOKOHAMA AND HONGKONG,
On the 1st of every month.

FOR SYDNEY AND AUCKLAND, via HONOLULU,
November 25, and every fourth week thereafter.

FOR NEW YORK, via PANAMA, CENTRAL AMER-
ICAN, MEXICAN, and SOUTH AMERICAN
PORTS, HAVANA, and all WEST IN-DIA PORTS, on the 5th and 20th of each month.

FOR VICTORIA, B. C., PUGET SOUND PORTS,
and PORTLAND, Oregon, on the 10th,
20th, and 30th of each month.

WILLIAMS, BLANCHARD & CO., Agents,
Corner First and Brannan Streets.

PACIFIC COAST STEAMSHIP CO.

Steamers of this Company will sail from Broadway wharf
for PORTLAND (Oregon), every five days, direct, and for
LOS ANGELES, SANTA BARBARA, SANTA CRUZ,
SAN DIEGO, SAN LUIS OBISPO, and other Northern and Southern Coast Ports, leaving San Francisco about
every third day.

For day and hour of sailing, see the Company's advertisement in the San Francisco daily papers.

TICKET OFFICE, No. 214 MONTGOMERY ST., NEAR PINE.

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO., Agents,
No. 10 Market Street, San Francisco.

CHAS. N. FOX.

M. B. KELLOGG.

FOX & KELLOGG,

ATTORNEYS AND COUNSELORS
AT LAW, San Francisco, Cal.

Office, No. 520 California Street, Rooms 1, 2, and 3.

FRANK KENNEDY,

ATTORNEY AT LAW, 604 MERchant Street, Room 15. Probate divorce, bankruptcy, and all other cases attended to.

C. P. R. R.

COMMENCING TUESDAY, DECEMber 5, 1878, and until further notice,

TRAINS AND BOATS
WILL LEAVE SAN FRANCISCO:
OVERLAND TICKET OFFICE AT FERRY LANDING, MAR-KET STREET.

7.00 A. M. DAILY, VALLEJO
Steamer (from Market Street Landing), connecting with the trains for Napa (Stages for Sonoma), Calis-toga (The Geysers), and Sacramento. Connecting at Davis
(Sundays excepted) for Woodland and Knight's Landing,
and at Woodland for Williams and Willows.
(Arrive San Francisco 8.10 P. M.)

7.00 A. M. DAILY, LOCAL PASsenger Train (via Oakland Ferry and via Livermore), arriving at Tracy at 11.30 A. M., and connecting with Atlantic Express. Connects at Niles with train arriving at San Jose at 10.15 A. M. (Returning, train from Tracy arrives at 6.05 P. M.)

8.00 A. M. DAILY, ATLANTIC
Express Train (via Oakland Ferry, Northern
Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R.) for Sacramento, Marysville,
Redding (Portland, Or.) Colfax, Reno (Virginia City), Palsade (Eureka), Ogden, and Omaha. Connects at Galt with train arriving at Lone at 3.40 P. M.
(Arrive San Francisco 5.15 P. M.)

SUNDAY EXCURSION TICKETS TO SAN PABLO AND MAR-
TINEZ AT REDUCED RATES.

10.00 A. M. DAILY, (via OAKland Ferry), Local Passenger Train to Haywards and Niles.
(Arrive San Francisco 4.05 P. M.)

3.00 P. M. DAILY, SAN JOSE
Passenger Train (via Oakland Ferry and Niles), stopping at all way stations. Arrive at San Jose at
5.20 P. M.
(Arrive San Francisco at 9.35 A. M.)

3.00 P. M. DAILY, NORTHERN
Railway Passenger Train (via Oakland Ferry)
to San Pablo, Martinez, and Antioch.
(Arrive San Francisco 9.35 A. M.)

4.00 P. M. DAILY, SOUTHERN
Express Train (via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R.), for Lathrop (and Stockton),
Merced, Madera, Visalia, Sumner, Mojave, Newhall
(San Buenaventura and Santa Barbara), LOS ANGELES,
"Santa Monica," Wilmington, Santa Ana (San Diego), Col-
ton, and Yuma (Arizona Stages and Colorado River Steamers). Sleeping cars between Oakland, Los Angeles, and Yuma.
(Arrive San Francisco at 12.35 P. M.)

4.00 P. M. SUNDAYS EXCEPTED,
Vallejo Steamer (from Market Street Landing),
connecting with trains for Calistoga (The Geysers), Wood-
land, Knight's Landing, and Sacramento, and at Sacramento with passenger train, leaving at 9.35 P. M., for Truckee, Reno, Carson, and Virginia. Sleeping cars between Vallejo and Carson.
(Arrive San Francisco 11.10 A. M.)

4.00 P. M. SUNDAYS EXCEPTED,
Sacramento Steamer (from Washington Street
Wharf) for Benicia and Landings on the Sacramento River.
(Arrive San Francisco 2.00 P. M.)

4.00 P. M. DAILY, THROUGH
Third Class and Accommodation Train, via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R.), connecting at Lathrop with train arriving at Los Angeles on second day at 11.55 A. M. (Arrive San Francisco 9.05 A. M.)

4.30 P. M. DAILY, LOCAL PASsenger train (via Oakland Ferry) to Haywards,
Niles, and Livermore.
(Arrive San Francisco 2.35 P. M.)

5.00 P. M. DAILY, OVERLAND
Emigrant Train (via Oakland Ferry and Northern Railway), to Ogden, Omaha, and East.
Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all
trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

FERRIES AND LOCAL TRAINS.

FROM SAN FRANCISCO, DAILY.

To Oakland.		To Alameda.		To Fremont.		To East Oakland.		To Niles.		To Berkeley.		To Del Norte Shasta.
A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.
B 6.10	12.30	7.00	B 7.00	B 6.10	7.00	7.00	10.00	7.30	10.00	7.30	8.10	8.10	8.10
7.00	1.00	8.00	B 9.00	7.30	9.00	8.00	10.30	8.30	10.30	8.30	9.00	9.00	9.00
7.30	1.30	9.00	9.00	8.30	10.00	9.00	11.00	9.30	11.00	9.30	10.00	10.00	10.00
8.00	2.00	10.00	P. M.	9.30	10.00	10.30	11.30	10.30	11.30	10.30	11.00	11.00	11.00
8.30	2.30	11.00	B 5.00	10.30	11.00	11.30	12.00	11.30	12.00	11.30	12.00	12.00	12.00
9.00	3.00	12.00	.....	11.30	.....	.....	.....	12.00	.....	12.00	.....	.....	.....
9.30	4.00	P. M.	.....	P. M.	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....
10.00	4.30	1.30	.....	12.30	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	1.00	3.30	.....	.....
10.30	5.00	2.00	.....	1.00	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	3.00	4.00	4.30	4.30
11.00	5.30	3.00	.....	3.00	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	4.00	5.00	5.30	5.30
11.30	6.00	4.00	.....	4.30	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	5.00	6.00	6.30	6.30
12.00	6.30	5.00	.....	5.30	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	6.00	7.00	7.30	7.30
.....	.....	6.00	.....	6.30	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	7.00	8.00	8.30	8.30
.....	.....	7.00	.....	7.00	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	8.00	9.00	9.30	9.30
.....	.....	B 7.00	.....	7.30	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	9.00	10.00	10.30	10.30
.....	.....	B 8.10	.....	8.10	.....	A. M.	.....	.....	.....	10.00	11.00	11.30	11.30
.....	.....	B 10.30	.....	9.20	.....	7.00	.....	.....	.....	11.00	12.00	12.30	12.30
.....	.....	B 11.45	.....	10.30	.....	P. M.	.....	.....	.....	12.00	.....	.....	.....
Change cars at West Oakland.

CHRISTMAS, 1878.

E. WOLF & CO.

DEALERS IN

FINE STEEL ENGRAVINGS.

Photogravures and Photographic Copies of Original Paintings of the most celebrated masters in Europe and America.

MIRRORS AND FINE PICTURE FRAMES

Of all sizes and designs.

625 Market St., under the Palace Hotel.

PHOTOGRAPHIC STUDIO,

838 MARKET STREET,

OPPOSITE FOURTH STREET.....SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

Sittings can be secured by Telegraph or Telephone from the Branch Offices of the American District Telegraph Co. and Hotels.

THOS. H. JONES &amp; CO., PROPRIETORS.

GRAND HOTEL

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

JOHNSON &amp; CO., PROPRIETORS.

FIRST CLASS ACCOMMODATIONS

FOR FAMILIES.

Hinkle's Passenger and Baggage Elevator.

P. J. WHITE, President. JOHN FAY, Vice-President.
GEO. O. SMITH, JR., Secretary.

WESTERN

FIRE &amp; MARINE INSURANCE CO. OF CAL.

409 CALIFORNIA STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS:

GEO. H. SANDERSON,
W. W. DODGE,
WM. M. LENT,
HENRY CASANOVA,
P. J. WHITE,

WM. WILLIS,
MICHAEL KANE,
J. MACDONOUGH,
JOHN F. BOYD,
JOHN FAY,

P. ALFERITZ.

NEW DESIGNS IN

TOILET ARTICLES

We have just received from Paris a complete assortment of elegant

IVORY TOILET SETS,

Of new and beautiful designs; PERFUME CASES, and RARE PERFUMES, to which we invite attention.

H. P. WAKELEE & CO.

Druggists and Perfumers.

NEW BOOKS!

Fashionable Stationery,

COPPERPLATE PRINTING &amp; ENGRAVING

Of all descriptions are specialties with

BILLINGS, HARBOURNE & CO.,

BOOKSELLERS AND STATIONERS

Nos. 3 and 5 Montgomery Street,

SAN FRANCISCO.

P. H. BURNETT, President. R. H. McDONALD, Vice-Pres.
S. G. MURPHY, Cashier.

PACIFIC BANK.

Capital.....$1,000,000

Surplus.....509,908

GENERAL BANKING BUSINESS.

FRED. H. LORING,

922 Market St., near the Baldwin, San Francisco,

DEALER IN FINE

TEAS, COFFEE, CHOCOLATE, SPICES,

ALSO, A SELECT LINE OF

GROCERIES.

MANUFACTORY OF THE "PRESIDENT COFFEE."

Our line of teas embraces the largest and best variety to be found in one collection in San Francisco. The products of the entire tea producing countries are here represented, and can be tested in a moment. Being one of the oldest established Tea and Coffee houses, our goods have a well known and first class reputation, as our list of customers proves.

WEBER PIANOS ARE THE BEST.

HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

SHERMAN, HYDE & CO.,

Corner Kearny and Sutter Sts.

Pianos on the easiest installments at cash prices. All instruments sold by us on the installment plan are at our regular cash prices. Our Pianos and Organs are from the best makers, our prices and terms are the easiest of any reliable house on the Pacific Coast. We fully guarantee every instrument we sell, and each Piano and Organ is also accompanied with a guarantee from the manufacturer. Old pianos taken in exchange and credited in installments.

THE SINGER

MANUFACTURING COMPANY'S

NEW FAMILY SEWING MACHINES,

Now selling at a GREAT REDUCTION from former prices.

282,812 OF OUR MACHINES SOLD IN 1877.

The Best always wins

In the Long Run.

Buy only the Genuine. Beware of Counterfeits.

CAUTION.

No SINGER Machine genuine with our TRADE MARK (given above) stamped on the side, and our corporate name, "The Singer Manufacturing Company" in gold letters on the top of the arm of the machine.

Buy of our authorized agents only. Beware of BOGUS AGENTS and COUNTERFEIT MACHINES.

THE SINGER MANUFACTURING COMPANY,

118 Sutter Street, between Montgomery and Kearny, San Francisco.

THOMAS DAY,

122 and 124 Sutter Street,

GAS FIXTURES, CLOCKS, BRONZES, AND HOLIDAY SPECIALTIES,

Including Fan Fire Screens, Brass Andirons and Candlesticks, and a choice selection of BISC WARE.

SHIRTS, NECKWEAR, & UNDERWEAR

In choicest selections at

SILVERSTEIN'S

950 and 952 Market St., Baldwin's.

MISS LIZZIE CARTER,

....THE....

LEADING MILLINERY STORE

906 Market St. and 5 Ellis St., near Stockton.

KNABE PIANOS

Grand, Square, and Upright.

BEST STOCK OF SHEET MUSIC.
BANCROFT, KNIGHT & Co.,
733 MARKET STREET.

PIANOS

NO. 12 TYLER STREET, S. F.

These Pianos are all three-stringed, with ivory keys, not imitation.

PIANOS

SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED PIANOS.

Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.

WOODWORTH, SCHELL & Co.
12 Post Street San Francisco.

MARBLEIZED IRON MANTELS.

AN ELEGANCE OF DESIGN, QUALITY of finish, and durability of polish, they are every way superior to slate or marble. In point of economy, also, they cost very much less, are stronger, and certainly far more durable than either.

ALL SIZES AND STYLES

ENAMELED GRATES.
FRENCH COOKING

RANGES

All sizes, suitable for Hotels, Restaurants, Families, and Boarding-Houses.

W. W. MONTAGUE & CO.

NOS. 110, 112, 114, 118, & 120 BATTERY ST.

INDEPENDENT LINE

—FOR—

ASTORIA AND PORTLAND, OREGON.
The Splendid Low-pressure, Side Wheel American Steamship

GREAT REPUBLIC,
3522 TONS.

JAMES CARROLL, Commander
Will sail from Spear Street wharf, for the above ports,
On TUESDAY, Dec. 24, at 10 A. M.

Steerage Passage ..... $2 00
Cabin Passage ..... 7 00
In Bridal Rooms ..... 10 00
Freight ..... at Lowest Rates

FREIGHT RECEIVED DAILY.

For freight or passage apply at the office on Spear Street wharf. Tickets also for sale at No. 3 New Montgomery Street, under Grand Hotel.

P. R. CORNWALL.

DR. JAS. M. HUTCHINS,
DENTIST, REMOVED TO 737 MARKET STREET, opposite Dupont.

DECKER BROS

DECORATION OF THE LEGION OF HONOR.

AWARD OF THE GOLD MEDAL.

FIVE DIPLOMAS OF MERIT!

THE PARIS EXPOSITION HAS AWARDED THE DECORATION OF THE LEGION OF HONOR to Mr. HENRY BREWSTER, senior member of the firm of

BREWSTER & CO.

(OF BROOME STREET.)

CARRIAGE BUILDERS,

Of the city of New York. Also, the Gold Medal, and five Diplomas of Merit to the several foremen of departments, for an exhibition of Thirteen Carriages, a Park Drag, Pleasure Vehicles, and a Racing Sulky, at the late Exposition, as a recognition of the superior excellence of the work of the firm.

W. J. DONLEY, the representative, is now in San Francisco, and may be found at O. F. Willey & Co.'s, or at the Baldwin.

Messrs. O. F. WILLEY & CO., 427 Montgomery St., are Sole Agents in California.

BREWSTER & CO. (OF BROOME STREET.)

Broadway, 47th and 48th Streets, New York City.

SIERING'S.

NOVELTIES FOR THE HOLIDAYS

Embracing the newest designs from

PARIS, VIENNA, AND BERLIN.

Among them will be found IVORY BRUSHES, both singly and in sets; FANS, with Feathers, Lace, and of Brocade Silk; CARD CASES, PURSES, CIGAR CASES, PORTFOLIOS, etc., in French Calé, with raised figures in Silk, and in Russia Leather; IVORY, SHELL, and NICKEL JEWELRY.

FANCY GOODS.

SACHETS AND GLOVE BOXES, of Silk, with Flowers, etc., painted upon them; Fire Gilt, Nickel, and Bronze ORNAMENTS, STATUETTES, and CLOCKS; VASES, BISQUE AND MAJOLICA WARE, etc., etc.

H. SIERING & CO.

LICK HOUSE BLOCK.

STORE OPEN IN THE EVENING.

NICOLL, THE TAILOR

WOOLEN BROKER,

(BRANCH OF NEW YORK.)

127 Market, 505 Montgomery, 18 Kearny Streets, San Francisco,
And 853 Broadway, Oakland.

The quickest, best, and cheapest Tailor in the world. Pants to order in six hours, and Suits in one day, if required.

By Appointment to the Emperor

TO ORDER:

Pants ..... from $ 4 00
Suits ..... from 15 00
Overcoats .... from 15 00
Dress Coats .. from 20 00

TO ORDER:

Black Doeskin Pants
from ..... $7 00
White Vests .... from 3 00
Fancy Vests .... from 6 00

Finest stock of woollens in the world. The only house in the city that receives fresh patterns and New York and Paris fashions weekly. Samples, with instructions for self-measurement, sent free. A small stock on hand, of our own make, to select from. Tailors and the public supplied with cloth and trimmings, at wholesale prices, by the yard; any length cut.

PIANOS ARE THE BEST KOHLER & CHASE
SAN FRANCISCO & OAKLAND.

HOLIDAY

ATTRACTIONS

.....AT.....

ROMAN'S

11 MONTGOMERY STREET.

SEWING MACHINE,

The only really light-running lock-stitch Sewing Machine in the market.

"DOMESTIC" PAPER FASHIONS

Elegant, stylish, and reliable.

J. W. EVANS, 22 Post Street, San Francisco.

STEINWAY

& SON'S

PIANOS

Two Highest Awards for the best Pianos and Piano Forte Material,

U. S. CENTENNIAL EXHIBITION,
Philadelphia, 1876.

The Steinway Pianos alone were accorded the "highest degree of excellence in all styles."

The First Grand Gold Medal of Honor, Exposition Universelle, Paris, 1867.

Grand Honorary Testimonial Medal, Society of Fine Arts, Paris, 1867.

Grand National Gold Medal, from H. M. King Charles XV. of Sweden and Norway, 1868.

Academical Honors of the Royal Academies, Berlin and Stockholm.

First Prize Medal, International Exhibition, London, 1862.

Twenty-five First Medals at American Exhibitions.

Testimonials and Certificates, From the Most Eminent Musicians, Composers, and Artists in the World, who all unite in the Unanimous Verdict of the Superiority of the Steinway Pianos over all others.

Every Steinway Piano is Fully Warranted for Five Years.

Illustrated Catalogues, with Price List, Mailed Free on Application.

STEINWAY HALL.

GRAY'S

MUSIC STORE

117 POST STREET.

PACIFIC BUSINESS COLLEGE,
320 POST STREET,
San Francisco.

THE ARGONAUT

SAN FRANCISCO, DECEMBER 28, 1878.

VOL. III. NO. 25. PRICE, TEN CENTS.

HUALAPI.

By J. W. Gally, author of "Big Jack Small."

[CONCLUDED FROM LAST NUMBER.]

CHAPTER III.

Time rolled on, and Sam Crain rolled away with his loaded team slowly, surely, and dustily, across valleys, over mountains and around hills; and the day drew nigh for the Grand Jury. Would he return, or would he not? became the absorbing question in the saloons, restaurants, and on the street.

In the autumn time the one street of a mining town is the promenade, because as silver mines are seldom, if ever, situated at a less altitude than 5,000 feet, more often at 6,500 to 7,000, the air is void of moisture most of the year, and the evenings and nights of early autumn are just splendid. The middle of the street is the ground for friendly discussion or confidential confab. Here, when the moon in a cloudless sky swings roundly out from the endless depth of stars, all important affairs are discussed by men who promenade to and fro, or stand at ease with one hand either inserted in the behind pocket of their pantaloons or pushed to the thumb inside the waistband, and the other hand used to manipulate the pipe or cigar and for purposes of gesticulation, the imitative shadows falling away from each group in grotesque caricature.

"To-morrow the Grand Jury sits," remarked one promenader to the other.

"Yes, that's what I'm here for. I'm one of 'em."

"Sam Crain hasn't put in an appearance yet."

"No, not yet."

"Do you think he will?"

"Well, I hope so. I rather like Sam. He has freighted for us a good deal, one time or other, and we have always found him straight as a string."

"Speakin' o' strings, it 'pears to me if they could find that dead body agin, he'd have to straighten a string."

"Mebbe so—mebbe not—I'd rather not discuss the matter without the testimony."

"Hello! What's that?" There was a clatter of horses' feet, galloping rapidly up the street, then a halt at the door of the saloon, then a hurrah, and a general handshaking.

"Well, boys, I'm glad to see you all once more; let us go in and throw ourselves around some poison! If there's any man here that said Sam Crain wouldn't come to time on his word, I want him to come in and drink with me and get better acquainted, so he won't never say that about me agin."

"Here's Sam, sure enough," said the promenading Grand Juror to his companion, as they passed Sam's crowd.

"Well, I supposed he had more sense than to come back," and the promenaders wheeled about for another turn up the street.

"I say, Sam, who's them two fellers came in with you?" asked the saloon man, as he put up the glasses on the board.

"Oh, them! They're a couple of fellers I picked up on the trip. They didn't want anything to drink, one of 'em's sort o' sick; so I got 'em to take my horse along with them up to the feed stable. Boys, stand in!"

"Where's yer dog?"

"Gone to the stable along with the hoss."

"I say, Sam, is it a fact that that there dog o' yours'll go out an' bring in somethin' if you tell him to?"

"Yes," answered Sam. "You bet that's a fact. He'll do it any time, an' no one ever learnt it to him. There was a feller had a yeller dog trained to that trick, and a lot of us was in a store in Austin, an' this feller says to his yeller dog: 'Booze, you're in the way, go out and find somethin', and his dog did go out an' bring an old boot an' laid it down at that feller's feet. Everybody in the store thought that was mighty smart, an' some one hollers across the stove to me: 'Sam, that lays over anything ever your dog done.' My dog was laying down behind my chair, an' I says to him, 'Carlo, you aint nowhere for smart! Carlo, he just rapped on the floor with his tail. 'Why don't you go out and find somethin',' says I to him. Well, damn if he didn't git right up an' go to the door, and wait till some one opened it an' went out, an' purty soon he came back with a lady's satchel, a bran' new one, full of women's truck. Yes, he did!" and Sam looked about in the eyes of his listeners. "You bet he did, an' I never in my life told him to do anything of the kind afore?"

"What did the yeller dog man say to that?"

"Oh! He jist wilted in silence."

"Where did Carlo get that satchel? Did you ever find out?"

"Certainly I did; it belonged to a lady in that town an' she'd give it to her little gal to carry, an' the little gal dropped it."

Late into that night, and the next day, Sam was about town talking with the boys and at times with his lawyer; but after the next day he was either conveyed by the perhaps too indulgent Sheriff, or else he was locked up in the jail, because the Grand Jury had found against him a true bill, charging him with the highest crime known to the code; to which in open Court he pleaded not guilty.

Some dreary days elapsed, during which Sam waited for the Sheriff's deputies, to ride the rough country around, with one venire after another, hunting for that class of men who do not read and seldom pay attention to anything—men who have no opinions among their very few ideas, and are therefore first-class trial jurors.

Old man Damus was on the alert day after day examining and challenging persons as to their fitness to sit as jurors in this case, and although he had repeatedly said that no Grand Jury had a right to find such a bill in the case, and that he would clear Sam Crain before any jury, or never show his face in Court again—still he took every precaution and fought every move of the prosecution as though he were leading the forlornest hope, for Damus was a lawyer by birth as well as education.

The court-house, like all things else in a new country except nature and the people, was a very incomplete arrangement, being the one room of a store house built over a half cellar, set into the bank after the manner of a Pennsylvania bill barn. The cellar, partly quarried out of the hill, and partly walled in, was used for a jail, with a door opening into the court-room—to the left hand in front of the Judge's stand. To the right hand of his Honor rose two platforms, one above the other like steps, on which were two benches calculated to hold six men per bench. Directly in front of the Judge sat the lawyers, the clerk of the court, sheriff, prisoner, witnesses, and a few invited guests, all upon the common level of the floor, accommodated with chairs however. Then there was a railing across the room fencing in all the parties herein named, but fencing out the nameless public.

Each day the judge took his seat, the sheriff bawled out into the street: "Hear ye! Hear ye! The honorable court of the —th district, etc., is now open."

Sam came up through the trap like a jack in the box, and the case went forward slowly, till at length a jury more or less satisfactory to all parties was corrailed or sworn in. Mr. Crain, under the, to him, new title of "prisoner at the bar," was told to stand up. He stood up. They read to him and to the jury the opinion, entertained and fully expressed, of the Grand Jury in his case.

"What do you plead, prisoner? Guilty or not guilty?"

"We plead not guilty, your Honor," replied Damus.

"Prisoner, you may be seated," added the Court.

Sam sat down, and Carlo, slipping quietly among the legs of the crowd, came and sat by his master's side, and looked earnestly up into the face of the Court.

The Prosecuting Attorney stated to the jury what the State proposed to prove.

"Call the witnesses," ordered the Court.

Then there was the usual coming forward and swearing to tell "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth," followed by the ordinary blundering, lying, cross-questioning, and self-contradiction in such cases made and provided.

At length the prosecution ordered the Sheriff to call:

"William Killwillin!"

Mr. Killwillin came forward and was sworn in perfect silence on the part of all save a low, continued growl from the dog. This growl diverted the gaze of the witness, so that he seemed to be receiving the form of his oath from the dog and not from the Clerk of the Court. As he bowed his head with a quick bob to kiss the book, the dog barked outright.

"Put out that dog," was the order from the Court, which the sheriff was about to execute, when the end man of the jury on the lower bench arose and said:

"I beg the mercy of the Court. Your Honor, faithful friends are few in this world; I pray that the dog may remain." The juror sat down while the Court rather testily said:

"Go on with the witness."

The dog walked softly over and sat down beside the juror, keeping his brown eyes steadily gazing into the face of the witness.

This witness was the king-pin of the prosecution. He knew more than anybody.

Did not distinctly see the fight between Sam Crain and Hualapi, because he was in bed at a short distance away in the sage-brush camping out, but could hear Crain's voice. Knew it was Crain's voice by a sort of hoarseness which he had often noticed on other occasions. Also heard a dog bark, but would not positively swear to the bark as that of Crain's dog—fully believed, however, that it was.

"Can you repeat any of the words," asked the Prosecuting Attorney?

"Well, yes, some of them."

"What were the words you heard? Go on, and tell it in your own way."

"Well, you see, I don't suppose I woke up at the beginning of the fuss, but when I did wake up I heard the other man's voice calling somebody nearly all the bad names there is out. Then I heard Sam Crain's voice say, 'Dry up, you —, or I'll smash your — head.' Then I heard the other man go on again in the same way; and then it seemed as if there was a tussle, and blows struck; then I could distinctly hear Sam say: 'Carlo, git out!'"

Here the dog Carlo silently left the side of the juror and went out of the court-house, and, as was afterward related, down the street on a full run.

"And, as I sat up in my bed, I could dimly see one man stooping down over something, as it appeared to me, in the road."

"Well, after you saw this man stooping over the other, what then?"

"Everything became quiet then, and I could still see one man moving away in the direction of where I knew Crain's camp to be. Then I laid down and went to sleep, and thought no more about it till I heard next day about this murder."

"Tell the jury why you did not pay further attention to this matter—get up and see about it, or go call somebody else."

"Oh, well! I reckoned it was a drunken tussle, and that they wouldn't hurt each other bad."

"But you swear that you distinctly heard Sam Crain's voice?"

"Yes, sir, I do."

"Do you swear you saw Sam Crain struggling in the road with another man, and then saw him walk away toward his own camp?"

"No, sir; I don't swear to that, except on knowledge and belief."

"You're a d— particular, conscientious duck, you are!" snorted Sam, in an undertoned burst of indignation.

The Judge immediately spread his arms, with his elbows turned up like a pair of grasshopper legs, and looked savagely over his desk at Sam.

Whereupon Damus promptly sprang to his feet and meekly begged the Judge's pardon on the prisoner's behalf, adding naively:

"My client has no right, your Honor, to compliment the witness on his conscientiousness. He is entirely wrong in this matter."

The end man of the jury smiled, threw back his head, looked up at the ceiling, and rubbed his chin.

The Prosecuting Attorney looked over his notes, and then said:

"Take the witness."

Old man Damus is usually an eager, aggressive, rather vehement lawyer before a jury, but on this occasion he took a chair slowly and carelessly over in front of the witness, sat down in it, leaned far back on the two hinder legs of the chair, crossed one of his own legs over the other, laid his head on one shoulder, sharpened a Faber pencil in the most complete and highly mechanical manner, and began to cross-question the witness:

"Mr. Killwillin—that's your name, I presume?"

"Yes, sir."

"Is that all the name you claim?"

"Yes, sir. William Killwillin."

"Well, now, William, is it true, or not true, that you have what we sometimes call an alias? You know what an alias is, don't you, William?"

"An alias is a name otherwise than the true name. I haven't any."

"Very well, William. Otherwise is good—otherwise is unusually good. But you have no alias?"

"No!"

"Sure about that? Think the thing over; perhaps, William, you have forgotten something."

"May it please your Honor, we object to this; there is nothing in the record here touching an alias," said the prosecutor.

"If your Honor please, this witness swore in his examination in chief that he would tell the whole truth, and then he said his name was what he says it is; we propose to show, if need be, before we get through, that his very first answer was a lie—that's object enough to bring us within the record."

"Go on with the witness," snapped the Judge, who had been rudely awakened from a pleasant exploit in mental arithmetic in which the proposition was like this: "If one hundred of my herd of cows have ninety-two calves, how many ought my branding-iron to have?"

"Were you ever called Corkey Magoozleum, William?"

"I don't know what I've been called."

"Ya-as! Were you called Corkey Magoozleum that you know of?"

"Not as I know of."

"Now Corkey—ah! excuse me; I mean William—don't you distinctly know that when you were in Cheyenne, and before you ran away from there between two beautiful days, that you were called by the name I speak of?"

The clean-shaven upper lip or the witness began to sweat, but he swallowed his saliva and replied:

"I was never in Shiann, and I've told you before I have no alias."

"William, can you cork a drunken man?"

"Cork a drunken man?"

"Yes, sir," with great emphasis, "can you cork a drunken man?"

"I don't understand the question."

"You don't? Well, sir," putting the now beautifully-sharpened pencil in his breast pocket, and his closed knife into another pocket, "can you hang around a gambling saloon, such as we have here in the mountains, skulling checks till late in the night, and then finding a respectable laborer who has the misfortune to be drunk and fall asleep in his chair at the stove, and being furnished with some burnt cork, can you decorate that unfortunate man's face in a highly humorous and grotesque manner?"

"Oh! if that's what you mean, I've seen it done."

"Did you ever do it?"

"I may have."

"You may have. Now, don't you know," asked Damus, in his softest tones; "don't you know that once in White Pine, Nevada, when you were trying to get up courage enough to be a check guerrilla, that you started in to cork an unfortunate gentleman known as 'Alleomagoozle,' and that he suddenly awoke, and smote you over the head with his heavy revolver-pistol, making that scar," pointing to it, "which now lends additional beauty to your otherwise handsome forehead?"

"I don't know anything of the kind—at least, I don't remember anything like that."

"Were you ever in White Pine?"

"Yes, sir."

"Ah, you have been in White Pine! Were you ever on the gamble in White Pine?"

"I've played a little; yes, of course I have."

"Played with cards?"

"Yes, played with cards."

"Then you can remember being at White Pine, also remember gambling there; but you can not remember trying to cork 'Alleomagoozle'?"

"No, sir, I can't."

"Is your right name Theodore L. Dixon?" asked Damus quickly, but gently.

"Uh?"

"Is your right name Theodore L. Dixon?" repeated in a quick, snapping manner.

"No, it aint."

"That's all," said Damus, looking toward the prosecutor, and then added quickly: "No, no! one moment! I want to ask the witness one more question."

"You say," addressing the witness, "that you distinctly heard Sam Crain's voice at the time of the row to which you testified. Now, did you as distinctly hear the man's voice?"

"I did."

"Do you know whose voice the other was?"

"Do not."

"Would you know it again if you heard it?"

"Think I would."

"Pretty sure you would?"

"Yes, I'm pretty sure."

"Were you in town the day before the night of the murder?—I mean during the day."

"No, sir—was not."

"You were not at the saloon drinking with Sam Crain and Hualapi?"

"No."

"Where were you that day?"

"Down the Cañon, chopping cord wood."

"If your Honor please," said Damus, arising to his feet, "I wish to test the accuracy of this witness as an expert in voices. I therefore propose the trap door there to the left-hand of your Honor's front, leading down into the larger room of the jail, shall be left open, and that the sheriff shall cause several—say four or six—persons to enter the jail from the door below, which persons shall talk seriatim in a loud voice, while the witness sits at a little distance from the open trap, to detect, if he can, the different voices. I mean, of course, that they shall be persons whose voices are as familiar to him as is the voice of Sam Crain."

There was a great deal of discussion, pro and con, over this proposition; but the Court admitted the experiment. The Sheriff was ordered to go out and find the necessary persons. He went out; but as he went the dog Carlo came in with something in his mouth, which he carefully conveyed inside the bar, and gave into the hands of his master, and then went over to his place beside the jurymen. Sam looked at the article, and handed it over to old man Damus.

The eyes of Damus twinkled with new light as he carefully examined the things. The upper lip of the witness began to sweat again; not only his lip, but his whole face and neck, and the backs of his hands.

"Your Honor," said Damus very dryly, and without the slightest emotion, as he passed the things over to the Court, "we will place this package in evidence."

"What's that?" said the prosecutor, jumping to his feet.

Damus repeated.

Prosecution objected.

Question argued.

Objection noted.

"Go on with the witness. If these things, which appear to be a pair of heavy buckskin gloves can not be connected with the case we can strike out the entire episode," and he passed the gloves back to Damus.

"Mr. Killwillin," said Sam's lawyer, "do you know what these things are?" And he pulled them apart with a crackling noise, as though they had been stuck together with starch.

"Yes, sir."

"Well, what are they?"

"Buckskin gloves, I s'pose."

"You s'pose. Well, take them into your hands, look carefully at them, and tell us all you know about them."

The witness put out his hand and took the gloves.

"This is a pair of my gloves, that I lost three months ago."

"Where did you lose them?"

"I can't say; probably somewhere about town, or at the wood ranch, or between here and there."

"Do you see anything on those gloves which is not on all gloves?"

"I see my name on them."

"That is to say, you see the name of William Killwillin."

"Yes, that's my name."

"Did you write it there?"

"I did."

"Do you see anything else unusual about those gloves?"

"I see some nut-pine pitch on them, but that's not very unusual in this country."

"No, the pitch is not unusual on a woodchopper's gloves. Don't you see anything else?"

"No, sir," but the voice began to be thin and hollow.

"Now, don't you see the dried and blackened blood of the man Hualapi on those gloves?"

Here Carlo walked around to get a better view of the eyes of the witness.

The witness looked first at the dog and then at the lawyer, both of whom drew closer to him, with their eyes on his face. At last he gulped out:

"I ask this court to protect me. It's enough to have a lawyer after a man without doggin' him."

Sam Crain stepped over from his seat, took the dog gently by the back of the neck, and then, stepping back again, sat down with the dog in his grip.

"Oh, yes," said Damus, softly, almost soothingly, "we'll all protect you, nobody shall hurt you, and you shan't be dogged. Is that blood on those gloves?"

"I don't know what it is."

"Ah! you are not an expert in bloods—only in voices and dog's barks. Well, sir," continued Damus, after a pause, during which he slightly consulted his memoranda, "in your examination by your friend here, the prosecutor, you spoke of hearing a dog bark; now, when you were taking your oath here to-day you heard this dog, Carlo, bark. Didn't you?"

"I believe I did."

"You believe you did! Well, do you believe that this dog's bark, and the bark you heard on the night in question in this case are identical, and that the two barks belong to the same dog?"

"I can't say exactly. The echo in here is different from the echo out of doors."

"I didn't ask you anything exactly. What do you believe?"

"I believe they are the same, or would be the same in the same place."

"Well, sir, if you had dropped these gloves, or for some reason best known to you, had hidden them in a crevice of rocks, or stump, or tree, on that occasion, do you believe this dog would remember so as to go and find them for you, five or six weeks afterward, upon your ordering him out of the house with the words: 'Git out, Carlo!' or 'Carlo, git out!'"

"I don't know what he can remember."

"May it please your Honor," said the Prosecuting Attorney, "this whole business of dogs, and gloves, and trees, and stumps is irrelevant, and new matter based on nothing the witness has testified to in his examination."

"Your Honor will recollect, and I doubt not several, if not all, of the jury will remember, that the dog was introduced by the prosecution. I wish to say to the learned council on the other side that his witness introduced a dog, and the dog introduced these gloves on cross-examination—hence all these woes."

The Court smiled at the ingenious method of connecting the testimony. He would study the matter and give a decision thereafter.

Here the Sheriff reported that he was ready for the experiment of testing the witness' accuracy of ear.

Mr. Killwillin was seated a few feet distant from the trap-door; the persons down in the jail-room were numbered 1, 2, 3, 4. There was a peculiar smiling silence, so to speak, on the audience in the court-room as the voices from below, or after the other, came up through the trap, each saying the words: "Carlo, git out?" Every man in the house tried his ear in the attempt to distinguish and determine the owner of each voice—and Carlo was never so puzzled in his life with orders, none of which he could execute because Sam kept him quietly in hand. A comparison of notes setting forth Mr. K.'s answers showed that he was right regarding voice No. 1, wrong as to Nos. 2 and 3, while No. 4 was beyond him altogether, being, he said, no voice he ever heard before.

"That's all for the present," said Damus, resuming his seat.

The prosecution asked a few unimportant questions in rebuttal and then said:

"That's all. We rest!"

Mr. Damus thereupon again arose and told the jury what he could and would prove; then, sitting down, he looked into his memoranda and called:

"Talbert Saxon!"

The audience, the jury, the bar, the witnesses, all looked toward the street door to note the entrance of the party just called. The last witness sat near the trap-door, but giving his attention mainly to the audience and the front entrance. Thus, without hardly anyone seeing his entrance, there arose up through the trap-door a man with a bandage about his head. Almost instantaneously there was a rustle in the audience, and a silent riveting of eyes on this apparition. The late witness also turned his head in the direction of the general gaze; but, as he did so, he arose from his chair like a machine-man, gazed upon the motionless face before him, and commenced backing, regardless of chairs or persons, while the apparition, still staring him in the face, advanced upon him.

"By h—, it's Hualapi!" shouted an excited auditor.

Then there was that sort of a wild cheer which, in the Anglo-Saxon part of America, for the moment, sweeps away, like a storm, all forms of law and order, while it announces that the great public heart is still in the right place.

Mr. Killwillin backed into the arms of the Sheriff, and that worthy officer deposited Mr. K. in a chair, gave him a drink of water, and told him to sit there.

Talbert Saxon, being duly sworn, said:

"Sam and me went to bed down at his camp; but 'long 'bout ten or eleven o'clock I woke up pretty sick; so I got up, thinkin' I'd shake myself and take a spin around camp. Well, the brush was in my way so I couldn't spin very well, and 'cordingly I took down a dry wash where there wasn't any brush. It wasn't so very dark; so I soon came to the place where the wash crossed the road, and there was a cedar stump; so I sot down on the stump and thought I'd have a smoke. I filled my pipe, but I couldn't find any match to light it with; and while I was a goin' through all my pockets huntin' that match, I thought I saw a man a comin' down the road walking very fast; so, fearing he might turn out before he come to me, I got up off the stump and went to meet him. Well, when I met him, says I: 'Hullo, pard!' 'Hello!' says he, and stopped right in front of me. 'Gimme a match, pard!' says I, and he did give me a match. And right there, in front of his face, I put the lit match to my pipe, and commenced a smokin' and lookin' at him by the light of the match; and I noticed his face, and I see that he had a pair of buckskin gloves on his hands, an' a bran new axe on his shoulder; then the match went out, and then—well, I was struck by lightning; leas'tways that's what I thought, and that was all I did think for about two weeks.

"Next place I found myself was in an Injin wickiup, at night, on the side of a mountain, with a lot of Injin doctors singing, and barking, an' dancing, an' raising general h— around me to scare away the death-devils. After that I got better; then I got a doctor to come and fix my head; then I heard about this case, and came here to help Sam."

"Do you know who it was gave you the lucifer match?"

"I do."

"Would you recognize him if you saw him?"

"I would."

"Look about the court-room; if he is here point him out."

"This is the gentleman who so kindly accommodated me," answered Hualapi, placing his forefinger lightly upon Mr. Killwillin's shoulder.

"You say you were struck by lightning. What do you mean by that?"

"I mean that somebody belted me over the head with an axe, or something hard and heavy. I have always thought it was an axe, and my doctor says it was the flat side of an axe with sharp corners."

"Did Sam Crain, the man who sits there accused of murdering you—did he strike you?"

"Nairy once! Sam ain't that kind!"

Here there was another tendency on the part of the house to come down cheering, but it was suppressed by the sternest order of the Court.

"It is a little out of the record," said Damus, smiling dryly at the prosecutor, "but, I ask you, who did strike you?"

"Well, Judge, it was—"

"Address yourself to the jury," said his Honor.

"Well, gentlemen, it was very dark after that match went out, and daylight was awful long a breakin' for my eyes, but I have always since labored under the impression that this is the gentleman who nearly cooked my goose," pointing to Mr. Killwillin.

"The Attorney for the State will enter a nolle prosequi in this case," said the Court, and then added: "Mr. Crain you are discharged. Mr. Sheriff take Mr. Killwillin into your custody, and adjourn court."

Ever since that day Carlo has been the most distinguished dog in the mountains; but I'm sorry to record that he still is compelled, at intervals more or less long, to turn tail upon his master's propensity to play with alcoholic amusements.

A man never really knows the exact "power of the press" till he sticks his fingers in the thing and leaves the ends of them there to remember him by.

Real distinction is to be obtained not by doing anything different from what your neighbor does, but by doing everything better than he does.

Bill of Fare for Six Persons.—Sunday, December 29, 1878.

Crab Soup.
Veal Cutlets, Cream and Parsley Sauce.
Stewed Mushrooms. Baked Potatoes.
Boiled Buffalo Tongue.
Roast Canvas-back Ducks, Currant Jelly.
Kole Slau.
Omelette Souffle. Sliced Pineapple.
Fruit-bowl of Apples, Bananas, Oranges, Pears, and Grapes.
TO MAKE OMELETTE SOUFFLE.—Whip to a stiff froth the whites of eight eggs with four tablespoonsful of sugar. Have ready the yolks of the eggs, which must be beaten five minutes. Mix the whites and yolks together; add two tablespoonsful of flour rubbed smooth in cream. Bake fifteen minutes. Serve immediately. Some prefer making it without the cream and flour; either way is good.
FOR COOKING CANVAS-BACK DUCKS.—See Major Bender's article in last issue, which we endorse.

THE LATEST MAGAZINE VERSES.

These Three.

I.
I said of Love: "She hath no dwelling-place,
On earth or in the air;
Or near or far, no man hath seen her face,
That he should name it fair.
The lion hath its lair
Among the olive thickets, cool and green;
The glittering serpent hath its balmy sereen;
And they who lightly bear
The weight of floods—those murderous creatures—sleep
Within the mossy forests of the deep:
But as for Love, she is not here nor there."

II.
I said of Life: "Too well I know that queen
Who bathes in blood her feet;
Hard by the pit of Hell her gate-ways lean;
Her hate is fiery-hot,
Her love is like the sleet
That pierces to the heart with bitter cold;
The timbers of her palace burn with gold—
But she is all unsweet.
Haply she hath not been, she shall not be:
Full to her throne-room creeps the crafty sea,
And secret waters weave her winding-sheet."

III.
I said of Death: "She is not young nor old:
She treads the starry floor
As one whom times and countless times make bold,
Yet enters at my door,
Her lifted hands outpour
Vials of odors—precious oil that drips
Upon the eyes, till seals of soft eclipse
Their olden sleep restore.
I have not seen her face, if she be fair;
If she be sweet I do not know or care:
But what she is, she shall be evermore."
Death took me by the hand and kissed my lips:
Thereafter I was still.
"Is there no wine," she said, "in all my crypts,
That thou shouldst drink thy fill?"
Did ever voice so thrill?
I turned to see if that was Death who spake;
Sunlike she smiled: "Thou, who has slept, awake!
See thou my grapes distill
Their sweets from out the purple!" Then I knew Life's blood-bathed feet, but named her Love, and drew Within her banquet-house to feast at will.
AMANDA T. JONES, in Scribner's for January.

A Birthday.

Into this world, with April, you
Were ushered by the birds, the dew
On opening violets, and the blue
Of skies just washed from weary stain
With shower on shower of happy rain;
By earthly scent of furrows new,
By sudden rainbows on the wing,
And each dear thing of early spring.
Wild hyacinths are in the grass,
That grow more purple as you pass,
And pale above the answering glass
They find in many a shadowy brook;
The daffodils bend down and look;
See the chance cloud, a snowy mass,
And see the restless bluebird fly
Deep in the high and painted sky.
Oh, gay the day that April brings,
When all about the wide air rings
With melody of whistling wings,
With rustling waters, and the sigh
Of odorous branches far and oigh,
Where the bee murmurs as he clings,
While up and down the glad winds strow
The rosy snow of apple-blow.
Ah, if on some delicious day,
Dropped out of heaven and into May,
You first had wandered down this way,
When mellow sunbeams wove their snare
Through azure vapors everywhere,
And all the land in langour lay,
It had not seemed a day so meet,
So shy and fleet, so fresh and sweet.
HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD, in Atlantic for January.

The Doves.

Pretty doves, so blithely ranging
Up and down the street;
Glossy throats all bright hues changing,
Little scarlet feet.
Pretty doves! among the daisies
They should coo and flit!
All these toilsome, noisy places
Seem for them unfit.
Yet amidst our human plodding
They must love to be,
With their little heads a-nodding,
Busier than we.
Close to hoof and wheel they hover,
Glancing right and left,
Sure some treasure to discover;
Rapid, shy, and deft.
Friendliest of feathered creatures,
In their timid guise:
Wisdom's little, silent teachers,
Praying us be wise.
Fluttering at footsteps careless,
Danger swift to flee,
Lowly, trusting, faithful, fearless;
Oh, that such were we.
In the world and yet not of it,
Ready to take wing—
By this lesson could we profit
It were everything!
HARRIET McEWEEN KIMBALL, in Wide-Awake for December.

The Comrades.

(FROM THE GERMAN OF UNILAND.)
I had a mate in the regiment,
A better man ne'er stepped.
The bugle blew to battle,
And 'mid the roar and rattle,
One step, one heart we kept.
"Art thou, or am I, the billet
Of that bullet whistling here?
Ah! poor old mate, 'tis thee it's found!"
He fell beside me on the ground—
'Twas a part of myself lay there.
"Dost stretch thy hand toward me?"
I must load, and one more shot
I've ne'er a hand for thee, old
Peace be with thee in kingdom
Good-bye, my mate, go!

ON THE MARSH.

Patiently waiting the early light,
Through the cold gray morning's misty light,
I watch, while the Eastern sky grows red,
From a rushy bed in a tule bed.
My comrade's gun, with a sullen roar,
Booms from the reeds on the other shore;
As over the marsh its echo rings,
Hark, to the rush of the countless wings!
From leafy covert, with startled quack,
Mallard, and widgeon, and canvas-back,
Led by a flock of the green-winged teal,
They climb, they circle, they swoop, and wheel.
Not a moment now but brings a shot;
With rapid firing the gun grows hot;
Dance the decoys on the dark pool, stirred
By the heavy splash of a falling bird.
The sun shines warm on the red-top sedge
That stretches away from the marsh's edge;
A croaking heron flaps his way
To a sandy point in the outer bay;
A mud-hen scolds from the rushes high;
A curious sea-gull floats on high.
While we seek the dead birds, one by one—
The sport is over. The light is done.

SAN FRANCISCO, December, 1878. GEORGE CHISHOLM.

A Song.

Night garnered a flower from orient bower
That rose by the southern billow,
And at midnight's hour, by magical power,
She laid it upon thy pillow.

The flower was orchis, its fragrance was love—
Sung lowly, sweet lute, to the stars above.

From heart of the bloom that mystic perfume
That guided thy sad, sweet dreaming,
Was in perfect tune as are buds in June,
When unfolding in sunshine streaming,
Love's fears and its sighs, Love's tears and its scars—
Of these sing softly, sweet lute, to the stars.

All hidden thine eyes, their dark beauty lies
Enveiled while thy sad soul slumbers;
The orchis breath flies, and on thy breast dies
Uncaught—like my feeble numbers.

Sing sad to the stars, sweet lute, in despair—
My lady is sleeping, she hears not thine air.

Oh, list ye, my sweet, to the soul at thy feet,
It dies with a passionate longing!
As the fragrance fleet of the bloom of sleep,
It can serve and love without wronging.
Sing high to the stars—sing high without fear!
O lute! sing high, that my lady may hear!

SAN FRANCISCO, December, 1878. SIGNA.

Sentinel Rock, Yosemite Valley.

Old Sentinel and Watchman for the Long Ago! Oh, would that I could bribe thee for An hour!

I know 'tis much—too much, perhaps—
For one like me, so poor in mind and purse,
So small beside thy own majestic form,
So weak in fame and little known, to kneel
Upon the mosses at thy feet, and ask
One favor at thy mighty hand.
And yet my soul calls out to learn of thee
The mysteries of the past. This vale, so
Long and deep, whose walls on either side reach Upward through the fleecy clouds, and seem to Kiss the sky, has fired anew my love
For truth, and charmed me with another hope that I perchance have found at last the door that Opens to the unmeasured past.

All round this sacred spot rise mountains wild
And free with Nature's charms and beauties, while Far below the crystal river rushing
Over giant rocks like foaming steeds to Battle-fields away; then, calm and pure as Sleeping babes, float gently through the pines and Ferns, where slender willows droop their graceful
Heads, and mirrored there gaze on in silence
On beauty unadorned.

At midnight hours come moonbeams passing o'er.
Thy time-worn peaks send forth her silver rays
Through foliage green, which break amid the trees
And dance like faines in the air.
Oh, would that I could know how long you've watched
This sacred spot; how long thy breast hath braved
The storms; how long thine eyes have looked upon
The grandeur at thy feet; and oh, how long
The winter snows and summer showers have beat Upon thy brow.
And then how long the king of day has given
His first salute to thee; how long the queen
Of night has waved her hand and bowed to thee
Before she dare light up the enchanted
Halls below, where unseen forms and trailing
Garments float in silence on the perfumed
Air, keep time with foaming falls and rushing
Rills, while angels of the night weave sparkling
Dewdrops on each tiny leaf and flower.

Oh, would that he who placed thee there to watch
In silence all the countless ages passed
Would now stoop down and loose thy flinty tongue,
Unchain thy prisoned hands, unlock thy stony heart;
Then let me learn of thee the days when thou
Wert but a child, and, if thou never wert
A child, how did you come the giant that
You are? But if the gods deny to thee
The memories of thy childhood days, I'll
Be content to know when human forms first
Walked beneath thy shade—
When man first gazed upon thy majesty,
And woman first acknowledged him her lord.
How many nations have been born and died
Since you have watched their rise and fall?
And what the highest light and glory of
That helpless race now growing less and less
With each succeeding year?
How did the red man woo his dusky mate
Ten thousand years ago? Was he then forced
To woo and win each night, and she as free
To go each morn as untamed beasts are now?
What were the bravest deeds for heroes
Then to do? Were women then the idle
Toys of men, in costly robes and glittering Gems to play the harlot or the queen as Best might please their lords?
Did great men then wear crowns of gold wrenched from
The hardened hand of toil? Did thieves then hold
And guide the ship of State? Did vice and sin
Then wear the laurel wreath, while justice cried
Aloud for bread, and truth and honor dressed
In rags? Did gods then die that men might live,
And I did they have to know and do the right?

LYDIA E. DRAKE.
SAN FRANCISCO, November, 1878.

BOOK-COVER-REVIEWS.

We are reaping the full reward of our new mode of book reviewing. Having confined ourselves strictly to noticing covers, and to pointing out the mechanical and artistic excellence of all the books presented to us, observing the beauty of the type and the quality of paper, we are in receipt of all the highly ornamented, splendidly engraved, and well bound and printed books. All the severely intellectual works, works of erudition, of philosophy, of profound science; all the dry histories and prosy biographies; in fact, all the learned treatises upon ologies and all that sort of thing, are printed with poor type, upon cheap paper, and shockingly bound in paper or cloth. These books are all presented to the Bulletin to be reviewed by Samuel Williams, Esq., while all the handsome works adorn the book table of the ARGONAUT. Hence it is apparent that we have the best of the arrangement; in time the ARGONAUT library will be something elegant; its shelves glistening with bright colors—gold and bronze—and its books illuminated with the most exquisite engravings, while the Bulletin book-room will be as sombre and gloomy as all these musty disquisitions can possibly make it. There was a time in England when book reviewing was carried to perfection. Books are reviewed now in England. The Nation, also, occasionally gives a review worth reading. There was a time, when the Edinburgh Review was in its prime, when Macaulay and other men of distinguished literary character made criticism more valuable than the work criticised. We have the highest regard for the gentleman who does the book "notices"—for they are not reviews—for the Bulletin; but how can anyone do justice to a week's work of the intellectual, book-making world in two narrow columns of a commercial journal. Tyndall, or Herbert Spencer, or August Comte puts forth a book containing the work of years, the thought and study of half a life time, and Samuel Williams, Esq.—with all respect—reads it in a day and reviews it in an hour. Is this a review? Book reviewing is simply book noticing in consideration of getting the books. It is an advertisement. Bancroft & Co., Roman & Co., Billings, Harbourn & Co. send us a new work from The Riverside Press, from Appleton & Co., Harper & Bros., Carleton & Co., or any one of the half hundred publishers; we have no time to read these works, and give to our subscribers a well-digested synopsis of their contents, and our opinion upon the subject matter treated in them. No one man has the leisure and no hundred men the varied learning requisite for such a labor.

From Bancroft & Co.—The Little Good for Nothing, translated from the French of Alphonse Daudet by Mary Neal Sherwood, published by Estes & Lauriat of Boston. From Billings, Harbourn & Co.—Maddie, a love story, by Jules Sandeau, a prize novel published by Peterson & Brothers of Philadelphia; paper cover, and cheap. From Lee & Shepard, New York, we get the last work of "Petroleum V. Nasby," entitled A Paper City, descriptive of one of those speculative town ventures in the West that did not succeed. The book is a success. Roman & Co. send us a work on etiquette; also, the Diary of a Woman, from the French of Octave Feuillet, published by D. Appleton & Co., the same interesting story heretofore published as a serial in the ARGONAUT, translated for us by Mr. James C. Ward of San Francisco. Billings, Harbourn & Co. send us, from D. Appleton & Co., the book of the season, American Painters, coming fully up to our idea of good binding, good print, and good paper, and containing one hundred and seventy-seven exquisite wood engravings of the best American artists. It is an elegant work creditable to the house of Appleton, and we hope profitable to Billings, Harbourn & Co.

The practice of newly-married couples going to a hotel immediately after the marriage ceremony has become so common as to almost supersede the old-time wedding tour. In New York, especially, a fashionable marriage is not considered complete, if legal, until the couple have been driven to the nearest fashionable hotel, and have passed at least a week within its walls. The bridal suites of the principal hotels are elegantly and tastefully furnished. The floors are covered with the richest of Turkey carpets; the ceilings are frescoed in the most elaborate style, presenting beautiful contrast of shade and color; the walls are literally covered with massive paintings and engravings, and the furniture, in blue and gold, is arranged with the taste of an artist. Marble mantelpieces are adorned with antique broozes, alternated with elegant what-nots loaded with costly bric-à-brac. Polished mirrors reflect the golden tint of the walls, mingled with the richer sunlight, stealing through the partly closed windows. The subdued hum of traffic in the streets alone breaks the stillness. Concerning the habits of their newly-wedded guests, the hotel proprietors say very little. Bashful couples order their meals in their rooms; others boldly face the leveled stares of the full dining-room. When there are from half a dozen to a dozen couples in the house at the same time they become emboldened, and act as unconcernedly as the guests of maturer years. Where the couples are young and handsome they receive more or less attention, widows and widowers newly matched being left almost entirely to themselves. When an old gentleman appears, as is now frequently the case, with a blooming young wife forty-five or fifty years his junior, there is quiet amusement all around.

We desire to advise the health officers and the authorities at Lone Mountain Cemetery that the public receiving vault and several of the private vaults smell bad. In one a child was buried last March, and during all that time the pocket has been left open that flowers may be placed upon a coffin containing the unpleasant smelling remains. Sentimental relations should remember that other people have noses not blunted to the sense of smell. There are considerations of health, as well as propriety and good taste, involved in this question. The fact is, the dead should be burned—we mean, of course, their bodies.

The comptroller of the household of the Marquis of Lorne is Mr. R. C. Moreton. When a man marries and settles down in this country, he doesn't have to go abroad to find a comptroller of the household. His mother-in-law usually announces herself as a candidate for that office the first thing, and as he is never permitted to go behind the returns, fraud or no fraud, she is counted in every time.

A MAN OF FIXED PRINCIPLES.

In the winter of 1860—I think in the month of December—wearied of law, sick of dyspepsia, I determined to make a visit to Washoe. San Francisco was just then catching the silver fever. The Comstock had been discovered, and we were having the same fabulous tales of silver wealth as only a decade before had tempted me from a law office in the city of Detroit to hazard the danger of mules and Indians in a passage across the plains. No railroad then over the Nevada hills; no palace car by lightning express from San Francisco to Virginia City. It was in the early days of "Virginia town" when Herman Camp, and Bryant, and Uncle Billy Collier were the magnates and silver kings. It was when Bob Morrow, Head, and Jo Clark used to make frequent pilgrimages mule-back over the Sierra. It was before the time of Senator Stewart, or Jim Nye; when Mr. and Mrs. Sandy Bowers had great fortunes in Gold Hill. LeCount had not been made superintendent of Gould & Curry; Mr. Atchinson was a great man. Winn kept the leading restaurant, and Sam Brown did the principal killing, and was respectfully regarded as the leading murderer of the Territory. It was before Colonel Ormsby and Captain Meredith led out one hundred and twenty of us—to punish the Indians and revenge the massacre of a white family "down on the Carson"—into an ambush where sixty-three of our comrades were left scalped and dead on the battle-field, and the rest of us skedaddled; and, of course, before Colonel Jack Hays and Charley Fairfax came over with California troops to protect us from a threatened Indian war. Fairfax wore a pair of summer shoes, in exchange for which I gave him a pair of sixteen-dollar knee boots of untanned hide. When he met the Indians and came away hastily, he was ungenerous enough to declare that the boots brought him unwittingly away in spite of his valor, because of cowardly habits acquired from the former owner.

We made up a purse to purchase for Colonel Jack Hays a war charger—bridle with Spanish bit, saddle of Mexican adornment, spurs jingling with silver bells. We chose an orator to make the presentation speech. It was earnest and eloquent. I made it myself. I referred to his heroic deeds in Texas and his patriotic achievements in the Mexican war; we relied upon his valor to revenge the dead and to protect our settlement from the horrors of an Indian massacre; closed up with a little poetry and a peroration to the American flag, the starry emblem of liberty, and handed Colonel Jack the bridle. An audience of miners, prospectors, speculators, and gamblers stood around in eager expectancy of his reply. It came. I remember it as though it were yesterday. I can repeat it from memory, word for word. First he looked at the orator, then at the crowd, then at the battle charger, and taking the bridle, he said:

"He's a durned good hoss, and I'm much obliged."

I went by way of Sacramento—where I bought a saddle horse—Placerville, Strawberry, Hope Valley, Genoa, and Carson. At Yank's I fell in with a sinewy, handsome gentleman, mounted on the best mule I ever saw outside of the artillery mules in the Spanish army. It was an elegant animal; tall, lithe of limb, graceful, and black as night. On the narrow snow path it would fight a pack-train for the right of way, and was active as a cat.

His master—well-informed, courteous, disposed to be communicative—was an agreeable companion up through the pine wooded heights of the Sierra, down through the cold winds of the Carson, across the dreary valley till we reached the Devil's Gate. He was bound for Dayton; I to Virginia town. Everybody remembers the little road-side gin mill at the mouth of the cañon, there we dismounted for a parting nip of benzine to lighten our onward journey. Before mounting I said to the stranger:

"Beg your pardon, sir, but we have had a pleasant ride together, and I am interested in you enough to inquire your name and business?"

Readily he replied: "Certainly, only I am afraid that when you learn my occupation it will lessen the good impression I have evidently made."

"Oh, no," I said.

"Well, then, I am a professional gambler," he replied.

"Good," said I; "now one inquiry more and I am content. I am anxious to know how so highly educated and intelligent a person as yourself becomes reconciled to such a life. Every one has a chart of principles, a sort of code of rules to govern himself. What are yours?"

"Well," he answered, "I am governed by certain—rules I would call them—principles I suppose they are. I have three. First, I never ask any one to drink, lest I might tempt him to excessive indulgence; I never refuse a drink, lest I might seem to be discourteous, and offend; and lastly, I don't care a damn what happens to any body, so long as it don't happen to me."

ROCHESTER.

An anecdote in the last book about Bismarck illustrates the Russian way of doing things. One day, walking with the Czar at St. Petersburg, he discovered in the corner of the summer garden an apparently needless sentinel. He asked why the man was placed there. The Emperor did not know. The adjutant did not know. The sentinel did not know, except that he had been ordered there. The adjutant had been dispatched to ask the officer of the watch, whose reply tallied with the sentinel's—"Ordered." Curiosity awakened, military records were searched without yielding any satisfactory solution. At last an old serving-man was routed out, who remembered hearing his father relate that the Empress Catherine II., one hundred years ago, had found a snowdrop on that particular spot and given orders to protect it from being plucked. No other device could be thought of than guarding it by a sentinel. The order once issued was left in force for a century.

The civilization that does not hold women as first and foremost is not a civilization. The world to-day, the whole world, even the Christian world, is in barbarism. Look at Virginia! Ten lashes with a cat-o-nine-tails and six days' imprisonment in the common jail for a wife who "stole" from her husband!

Coal dealers prefer Newfoundland dogs to any other breed. They weigh more, and they sit quietly on the cart while the load is on the scales.

MUSIC AND ART.

"For Art may err but Nature can not miss."

The last Quartet Soiree, Friday evening, 20th inst., was particularly interesting—firstly, as being the final one of the best series of concerts we have ever had in this city; and, secondly, from the peculiar and attractive arrangement of the programme, which was, in a sense, historical, and consisted of an artistic grouping of compositions of various schools and eras. Italy was represented by the Ciaccona for violin solo, by Vitali (who flourished in the early part of the last century, and had been well nigh forgotten when the late Ferdinand David discovered this gem of violin literature among the manuscripts that have been for centuries accumulating in the Royal Library at Dresden), and the Gavotte of Bazzini. The latter, who about thirty years ago was ranked among the prominent virtuosi of his day, is still living (at Naples, I believe), and occupies—deservedly, too—a very high rank among modern composers of chamber music. From France we had the Cavatine from Pré aux clercs, delightfully sung by Mrs. Marriner-Campbell, who also gave a Slumber Song by Oscar Weil, which I thought rather a tame affair, evidently designed for the parlor rather than the concert-room, and not very creditable to the composer at that. Germany gave us of its best. Beginning with old Bach, whose lovely Aria for violin (beautifully played by Mr. Louis, Jr.) was heartily encored, the various schools were represented: by Mozart, Clarinet Quintette; Mendelssohn, Capriccio brillante in B minor; Schumann, Piano-forte Quintette; and Bargiel (who is still living and writing), whose deep and thoughtful Adagio for violoncello was very tenderly and artistically performed by Mr. Ernst, and formed one of the most enjoyable features of what may be called a thoroughly delightful musical evening. I have never seen a more appreciative or enthusiastic audience.

Signor Tojetti's Ophelia, which is attracting many visitors to Morris & Schwab's gallery, where it is on exhibition, is one of those pictures about which one might write a good sized book without having exhausted its defects. Its merits may be summed up in a short paragraph. Signor Tojetti paints well; as far as the mere technique of his art is concerned he is an able artist, whose drawing is mostly quite correct, his feeling for color excellent (in some cases—certain flesh tints, etc.—quite masterly), and his treatment of draperies, textures, etc., entirely those of a painter of considerable knowledge and routine. He has a nice perception of the picturesque, and perhaps a more than ordinary talent for composition. And yet, with all these qualities acknowledged, I can not but say that it seems to me that Signor Tojetti's pictures—as we have seen them in this city—are almost entirely without artistic value; nay, more, that in any higher sense of the term they are not pictures at all, but rather mere clever paintings with a certain superficial attractiveness that is sure to win for them a goodly amount of public and newspaper praise; but that is as far removed from true art as are the heroics of the stage from the qualities that underlie the heroism of real life. The fact is that Signor Tojetti, conscious of his technique, as he may well be, and delighting himself in that fatal facility of execution that is such a dangerous quality to all artists, seems to rely exclusively upon the characteristics that will bring applause in the open market; he makes an attractive painting, but—and especially in this Ophelia—one entirely lacking any higher intellectual quality. This fatal defect—for in this picture it is fatal—was less apparent in the former works exhibited by this artist; the Elaine (weak as it was) was carried by a certain picturesqueness of arrangement, and the Venus and Night were simply subjects that any painter is always at liberty to maltreat as he likes—a nude female figure, respectably drawn from any well formed model, answers the purpose sufficiently, and, for the rest, we are not likely to be over particular. But an Ophelia is a very different affair. Here we have to deal, firstly, with Shakspeare, and after that each with his own ideal; here we look for character, heart, intellect. And in attempting to portray these qualities—if, indeed, he may be said to have attempted it at all—Signor Tojetti must be said to have failed utterly. His Ophelia is the Ophelia of the footlights; she is studied from Thomas' Opera rather than from Shakspeare, to whom she bears about the same relation that does Verdi's Louisa Miller to Schiller's, Donizetti's Lucia to Walter Scott's, or Thomas' Mignon to Goethe's. She is the Venus over again with a somewhat lorn and saddened visage and a white satin gown; the Night partially draped; the Elaine rediviva. That she is studied from the modern stage is palpable at a glance; Shakspeare gives no hint of a kneeling Ophelia, but modern actresses introduce this effect and make it very telling; the loosening of the hair, the decolleté gown (which no respectable woman wore in Hamlet's day), the bare arms—all these points are of the theatre. It requires only the most superficial study of the Scandinavian race to convince one that the features of this Ophelia are not the result of even such superficial observation; they are pretty enough, I dare say, but have neither the intellect nor high-bred air of Shakspeare's heroine. They are those of a pretty Americaine who has been caught in a scrape and is "very, very sorry." The composition is attractive and pretty in itself; the flesh and hair are nicely painted, and so are the flowers (I don't find anything about roses and geraniums in Shakspeare, and think their use the less happy in that the roses are evidently studied from Californian flowers, whereas Ophelia could not have had any but wild ones, and could not possibly have had geraniums, which are of comparatively recent introduction into Europe); and designated simply as "a fair penitent" the picture would be very well in its way, with plenty of latitude left the beholder for surmises as to the possible cause of such pretty sorrow. But with its present title it is simply a gross blunder, for there is nothing of Ophelia about it.

This year's exhibition of the work done at the School of Design seems to me to excel in quality, as well as quantity, anything that has preceded it, and betokens a steady improvement that is very encouraging. There is, as usual, considerable that seems to have been done without any definiteness of purpose or aim on the part of the students; a sort of higher boarding-school work, so to say, that is to result in the attainment of an "accomplishment," and that leaves the student, if possible, worse off than before undertaking it, since the only thing gained is a smattering of art (cheap enough it is in our day), and the certainty of being at some future time overtaken by the sickening consciousness of wasted opportunities. But, in the main, the work has been done honestly and with great thoroughness of intention, and in some instances with a recognizable striving in the best direction that is truly delightful. There is no exhibition at present in this city that will so well repay a visit; and perhaps no institution on the coast a hearty and liberal encouragement of which is apt to bring forth such desirable results—for us all—as this one. I think I can see among the drawings and color studies a great deal of promise for the future, and am strongly in the hope that before long the directors will become aware of the fact that the present system of giving prizes for proficiency, progress, etc., is in reality only an impediment to the true progress that is confidently looked for by every real friend of the school. Apart from the jealousies and heartburnings that are necessarily engendered by such a system, to me the public recognition of the fact that a student has been faithful to his or her work would seem to argue that such faithfulness was not looked for or anticipated, and that the giving of the prizes was needed as an incentive to the pupils to do their mere duty. Surely in a school devoted to the cultivation of high art this should not be the case. I can not imagine any art student ever doing less than his best, or doing more careful work because it is to be rewarded by a gold medal; indeed, to such students as some of those whose work is to be found in the present exhibition I can fancy such a distinction coming almost in the form of an insult. The true art student works for the love of his art; for him this is sufficient, and of a value inestimably above all prizes. That other kind of work, that which is done with one eye on nature—or the easel—and the other on a possible medal, or piece of parchment, is of accurately no value whatsoever, whether to the student or anybody else, and the less of it there is done the better off we all shall be. Despite the precedent of the German and French art schools, I think the system radically wrong, belittling the object of all study, dwarfing the dignity of art, and reducing it to the common level of an occupation to be pursued for what of public recognition is to be gained by it, and the amount of tangible gain that such notoriety will bring.

I think I know something of the difficulty under which a young artist labors in endeavoring to see through his own eyes rather than through those of some favorite painter whose work he very much admires, and of the almost impossibility of conquering the habit when it has once been acquired. It comes almost insensibly, and at times alongside of the utmost integrity of purpose; it steals its way into work of the purest intent; it is a trick, and is there almost before one is aware of it. But it is a dangerous, destroying habit; it is the most dangerous one that threatens the young artist, and should be guarded against with the most unflinching watchfulness; it should be resisted in every possible way until subdued, for otherwise it conquers, and its conquest is death. There is only one remedy for this insidious disease, only one hope for those who are afflicted: Go straight to nature! Go out of doors with pencil or brush, forget all the pictures you ever saw, and open your eyes! See what is there! Perhaps you will not be able to see it at first, and it will look like this painter or that—the Californian sky will appear Frenchy, the cattle like Holstein or Scotch, or any other that have been well painted—everything will compose itself into somebody else's lines. In that case don't work; shut up your sketching book and go home. But come back to it, and try again, and again, and again, until at last you learn to see through your own eyes. This is all, absolutely all, you have to do in order to become a good artist; the mere doing of the thing—the putting it down on paper or canvas—is easy enough after that. It is the seeing the thing that makes the artist; it is for what he sees in the world that the rest of us do not that he is precious. I say that the seeing through the eyes of others is a difficulty with young artists; I know plenty of older ones who do it as well, but it is not of them I am thinking. It is rather of some of those whose work I have lately seen at the School of Design; some of them with every evidence of talent of no mean order, and some with less talent, and a consequent greater need that they should be on the alert lest some unfortunate mannerism come between them and their ideal. Nature is always original, and in faithfully studying her work every artist may always be certain of preserving his originality. If he have none of his own at the outset, Nature will furnish him with all the material he needs, and in keeping true to himself no young artist can fail in time to stamp his work with the mark of his own individuality. But he must be true to himself, and see for himself. S. E.

The Stock Exchange in New York and London, the Bourse in Paris, Frankfurt, and Amsterdam, and the Stock Boards in all the prominent cities of the world, have so familiarized us with these institutions that we have come to regard them as a necessity. Why Dr. O'Donnell and his associates in the Convention should desire to suppress our Stock Exchange we do not understand.

Mr. Denis Kearney has been especially emphatic in denouncing caucuses, yet the caucus of a workingmen's club has endeavored to control the action of Messrs. Vacquerel and Dowling in the Constitutional Convention. Messrs. Vacquerel and Dowling have manfully stood up to their rights and asserted their personal dignity.

"It is a disgrace to civilization that men, women, and children are hungry in a land where grass and flowers grow in the open air on Christmas day as they do in San Francisco."—Evening Post. We say yes, a disgrace to the great hulking, idle tramps who would rather beg than toil.

Dr. Charles Carroll—of Carrollton—O'Donnell, ci devant horse-tamer, and present member of the Constitutional Convention by the grace of Kearney and the sand-lot, has come to grief: every pane in his glass house has been smashed by the hot cobble of the Chronicle, flung by Mr. A. A. Cohen. We are sorry to observe these race conflicts. Dr. O'Donnell contemplates retiring from the Convention and from practice.

AFTERMATH.

All the poetry that will be printed, and all the pictures that will be drawn, at the outgoing of the Old Year will represent 1878 as a poor, decrepit, frost-bitten, ragged, sour old man; tottering out from life bearing his burden; foot-sore, weary, disgusted, disappointed, yet looking back with jealous malignity to the blithe and happy New Year, that comes on after him with elastic step, confident of the good time coming. And it occurs to us that this is not the way to present the abdication of the monarch of a year. He is not the abject, pitiable old remnant of days going out into the shadow of time; and the New Year is not the radiant Prince of Promise that our poets and poetesses delight to represent him. The Old Year, clothed with the honors of accomplished events, crowned with achievements, his brow wreathed with the bays of victories gained—victories in arts and arms—proud and stalwart, wraps himself in a royal mantle of pure snows and sparkling ice, steps out upon the firm, frosted path, crosses the threshold of time, and standing upon the golden pavement, looks back upon a career accomplished, and forward to an immortality of rest. Happy old monarch! Happy that his work is done, his trouble ended, his reward earned. The New Year we would rather regard as a raw and awkward stripling, timorous, shame-faced, conscious of coming toil and trouble, of tasks to be accomplished, uncertain of results, and not knowing whether some grand convulsion might not undermine his empire, destroy his throne, and send himself headlong into the chaos of dissolving worlds. We would paint the New Year a sad-eyed boy, whose prophetic soul sees all the toil and sorrow, crime and misery, the disappointments and defeated hopes of a year; sees contagion and death reveling among his subjects; sees war and desolation making bloody havoc; sees all the vanity, weakness, and wickedness of humanity, stumbling and fretting along the year's short pathway. Still it is the picture of old age and youth. Hopeful, buoyant youth, and old age serene and happy, or full of discontent, as we have chosen to make it. The ARGONAUT, in the babyhood of its career, born of well-to-do but honest parents, looks out from its laces, and wraps, and long clothes, its comfortable crib, with its silver cup and pap spoon, opens its serene, calm eyes, confident of a promising youth, of a stout manhood, of a useful career, and of an immortality that makes us drop the smile of a single passing year, and wish our readers a Happy New Year, and many of them.

The making of social calls on New Year's Day is a splendid old-fashioned New York custom that has of late years extended itself throughout New England and the North, and been very generally accepted by the ladies of the South. It has, in fact, become one of our national customs, as New Year's Day has become a national holiday. The custom was for a time abused by the intrusion of unwelcome guests, but this abuse, like most others of its kind, cures itself in time, and the receiving of calls is again becoming very general. In the Eastern cities it has a new life and every hospitable mansion throws open its doors, and hangs out its card-basket to receive gentlemen callers. Business life is so exacting that the amenities of social life are—in our country—mostly left to the ladies. On New Year's Day the gentlemen are at leisure, and should be encouraged in presenting themselves to their lady acquaintance. So, if the first of January is a pleasant day we hope to see our streets thronged with New Year's callers, and that our lady friends will not put the inhospitable basket upon the door-knob unless for some good cause. We want smiles, cake, egg-nog, mince pies, apple jack, and a cordial welcome in exchange for our congratulations.

The Bulletin, Call, and Chronicle delight to bark and bite, for 'tis their nature to; while all the respectable journals like the ARGONAUT have something else to do, their little minds and feeble pens are just now busily engaged in endeavoring to do each other mischief. The Sargent-Gorham-Page-Carr-Pinney-Burr-Spaulding-Chronicle libel complication that has ended in two fiascos at Placerville; the libel farce now being played in the Constitutional Convention; the O'Donnell libel case against "the live paper"; the Reed libel case against the twins—all this, accompanied with long columns of daily abuse of each other, is exceedingly nice and amusing literature for the three leading journals of California. But does this long-continued journalistic quarrel interest anybody else than Fitch, Pickering, and Charles and Michael de Young? Is there in all California or elsewhere anybody that cares a tinker's imprecation about the quarrel, who is right or who is wrong, who wins or who loses? This thing has now been going on for nine years: one long, continuous, unceasing scold between these viragoes of the press—these cats on the journalistic clothes line—these black-and-tan terriers of type. There is one consoling reflection: So long as they abuse each other they have less space to annoy honest people.

"The markets and stores throughout the city present the natural wealth of our State in a manner that must attract the attention of strangers. The costly gems and jewels, for Christmas gifts, on public exhibition must be worth millions. The dry goods, millinery, and furnishing stores display the most costly and latest of everything for men, women, and children to wear. The toy and fancy stores are filled with everything to please the child or adult. The book and picture dealers present all the newest works in literature and art in gorgeous bindings and frames."—Evening Post. Gems and jewels are not a part of the natural wealth of California. The dry goods and millinery are imported. The toys and fancy goods come from abroad. All the books and most of the pictures are sent to us from Europe and the East. The Post is indigenous; it is a home production, and we are not proud of it.

We knew three gentlemen, and they were very agreeable acquaintance. We became intimate and considered them friends. We indorsed their notes and lost them all. Friendship seldom survives a protest. Your friend thinks you a fool for indorsing his paper, and you regard him as a knave because he does not pay; both are right. Moral: Have no friends.

A SINGED CAT.

By E. H. Clough.

(CONTINUED FROM LAST NUMBER.)

V.—THE CAT ON THE WITNESS STAND.

"Put a little more life into your answers, Inch, old man; don't act as if you were going to sleep all the time. Remember what I have been telling you and keep your eyes peeled for the District Attorney's questions—you'll find some of them hard to dodge. He is like a shot gun—he scatters, and some of the shot may hit you. Lengthen out your answers in the right place, and forget to answer at others. Above all things, don't be positive about anything except—"

"Who's doin' this?" interrupted Inch.

"You are," replied Fogle, glancing toward the Court-house steps to see whether they were observed. "I am only reminding you of the minor points in your evidence. If you work this little game as well as you did those primaries, your fortune's made. Brower's got bushels of coin, and if we clear him we've got him in the door."

"I've bin thar afore," answered Inch, turning his fish-like eyes upon the somewhat anxious attorney.

"I know, but perhaps you've never had such a ticklish case to deal with before, and—"

"Oh, yes! oh, yes! oh, yes! the Honorable District Court of the—th Judicial District is now open pursuant to adjournment."

The hoarse voice of the Deputy Sheriff rang out over the drowsy town, and the citizens began to stream toward the Court-house, anxious to listen to the details of the case of The People vs. Edward Brower, under indictment for murder. The spacious, barn-like Court-room was soon filled, and the Brower case being first on the calendar was duly called. The preliminaries of reading the indictment, calling the venire, and the impanelling of a portion of the jury, occupied the entire forenoon. During the afternoon the remainder of the jury was obtained.

It was not at all remarkable that a jury was so easily secured, for the murder had been committed ten years before, and many of those summoned to act as jurors in the case had arrived in the county long after and knew nothing of the facts whatever.

The District Attorney, in stating his case, told how a man named Joseph Taggart, a gambler, had, ten years previously, quarreled with a miner named Morris about the ownership of a mining claim on Douglass Flat, Taggart claiming that he owned it by right of purchase, and Morris, who was in possession at the time, claiming that he was the rightful owner by the right of discovery—admitting, however, that he had not worked it for some time, but urging that he had as much right to renew his labor there as anybody else, the claim having been idle during a sufficient length of time to allow the privilege of working it to anyone who chose. This dispute grew warmer and warmer every time the men met, until at last they came to blows, and Morris beat Taggart in a terrible manner—a beating that was approved by the community, as Taggart was the aggressor and struck the first blow. As soon as Taggart was able to arise from his bed he sought Morris, and, finding him in a saloon, walked deliberately up to him, drew a revolver, turned him face to face, and, without a word of warning, raised the pistol, pulled the trigger, and sent a bullet crashing through his brain. As soon as he had perpetrated this cold-blooded act Taggart mounted a fleet horse and fled. Years rolled by and nothing was heard of the fugitive murderer until a citizen of Mammoth City, who was cognizant of the whole transaction, and who was well acquainted with the murderer, met him in Marysville, a highly respected and wealthy citizen of that town, living there under the name of Edward Brower. Keeping his own counsel, this citizen, Mr. William Staghart, returned to Mammoth City and informed the authorities of the fact, and Edward Brower was immediately arrested and brought to the place where, it was alleged, he had committed the crime charged against him.

"We shall endeavor to prove," concluded the District Attorney, "that Edward Brower and Joseph Taggart are one and the same person. We have witnesses who can swear to his identity, and we intend to trace, as far as possible, his career since leaving the town, thereby obviating the difficulties that might arise from the fact that he has been absent ten years, and has, consequently, changed in his personal appearance considerably in that time."

Fogle, for the defense, in his statement, said that they did not intend to rebut the allegation that a murder had been committed—a cold-blooded, dastardly murder. But they should attempt to show, to the satisfaction of the intelligent and acute gentlemen composing the jury before him, that Edward Brower was not the murderer of Morris—that he was not Joseph Taggart, and that this was simply a very remarkable case of mistaken identity.

"May it please the Court," said the District Attorney, "I would ask that the witnesses on both sides be excluded from the Court-room."

"I was about to make the same request, your Honor. I feel that truth and justice will be subserved if this course is pursued; that a somewhat remarkable resemblance between two men will be more clearly demonstrated, and an innocent man acquitted of the terrible crime imputed to him. I—"

"Your Honor, I hope that my learned friend is not about to argue the case before hearing the evidence," said the District Attorney, interrupting Fogle.

"Witnesses for the prosecution and defense in this case will leave the Court-room, but remain within call," growled the Judge in a scarcely audible tone, thus cutting short the preliminary sparring of the opposing attorneys.

The trial lasted three days. During its progress the prosecution pursued a straight-forward and upright course, while the defense resorted to every trick and subterfuge which the prolific ingenuity of Fogle could suggest. He picked flaws in the evidence, he brow-beat some of the witnesses and coaxed others, he twisted unfavorable testimony into something like evidence favorable to the defense, he objected to questions by the District Attorney, and excepted to rulings of the Court: he cross-examined and re-cross-examined, until a doubtful witness was as limp as a rag; and in fact resorted to every species of artifice known to criminal practice to attempt to force the case. When the prosecution had called all their witnesses, he made a stirring appeal to the jury, and then placed in evidence several depositions of parties living in Marysville, who swore that Brower came to that city five years before; that he had always acted as an honest, respectable citizen; that he was not a gambler, nor an associate of low characters while resident in that city. The next class of witnesses called were citizens who had known Taggart before he fled. Up to this point the case of the defendant was far from being a satisfactory one. The proof of good character during the past five years was a nullity as regards the identification of the murderer of Morris, and the Mammoth City witnesses were vague and vacillating in their evidence. Had the latter been more positive, the prisoner's line of defense might have compared favorably with that of the prosecution, for that was not altogether free from the doubts and suppositions of witnesses who had not seen the subject of their testimony for ten years. The preponderance of evidence was in favor of the people.

"Call Hiram Inch, Mr. Sheriff," said Fogle late in the afternoon of the third day. "Your Honor," he continued, "this is our last witness. I do not know what he will testify to, having only a short time since received information that he could be of any service to us."

"Hiram Inch! Hiram Inch! Hiram Inch! come into Court," yelled the Sheriff from the front balcony.

"No answer," yer Honor," the Sheriff added, after a short pause.

"I would ask for an attachment, your Honor," said Fogle, "this witness has been duly summoned, and should be here."

"Mr. Wright, make out an attachment for this witness. The Court's adjourned for half an hour," growled the Judge, addressing the clerk and the assemblage.

The announcement that Hiram Inch would appear as a witness in the Brower case spread like wild-fire, and various were the speculations in regard to the tenor of his evidence.

"Ef Judge Rollins don't keep his eye skinned the Singed Cat'll make short work of his case," remarked Pike Sadler, referring to the District Attorney.

"I don't know 'bout that," answered Clem Martin, "he don't 'pear to be over anxious to climb up on the stan'. I'll bet it's a dodge of ol' Staghart's to cinch Brower. It'd be just like him to play ol' Inch off on Fogle, to git even on Taggart or Brower, or whatever his name is, for some grudge thet's atween 'em."

This is a summary of the opinions generally expressed by the citizens, and the interest excited was sufficient to pack the Court-room when the Court reopened.

"Did you serve that attachment?" asked the Judge.

"Yes, your Honor; the witness is here."

The tall form of Inch was in plain view of the entire assemblage.

"Why did you disobey the summons of this Court?" inquired his Honor of Inch.

"Forgot all about it," muttered Hiram, turning his sleepy gaze lazily upon the Court.

"Are you not aware that in disobeying a summons from a Court you are liable to be fined for contempt, sir?"

"Ain't never heard tell of it," was the simple reply of the apparently embarrassed Hiram.

"Where did you find the witness?" asked the Judge, turning to the Sheriff.

"He was tradin' horses down at Martinez's corral."

"Trading horses! Mr. Inch, do you consider trading horses of superior importance to the mandates of this Court?" And the august Judge frowned indignantly upon the delinquent, who twirled his hat nervously in his hands.

"Hoss trades pays better," answered Inch.

"Mr. Wright, enter a fine of twenty-five dollars against this witness for contempt of court, and Mr. Sheriff, you will keep him in custody until the fine is paid. I think that will teach him that this Court is of more importance than horse trades—or mule trades either."

The Court was evidently fully aroused, and not in a mood to be trifled with.

"May it please the Court," said Fogle, rising, "I do not perceive that the defaulting witness has perpetrated a deliberate contempt of this tribunal. He is evidently a man little used to the ways of courts, and, by the way, I do not understand why a certain political convention should have placed him before the people for the responsible position of an officer of the courts, but that is not here nor there. I think that he shows upon his face that he is innocent of any intentional contempt for this Court, and would ask that the fine be remitted. I hope that the learned District Attorney will second my request."

"I have no objection, your Honor; the witness does not appear to be impudent, at any rate," and the District Attorney smiled with the utmost good nature.

"The showing is sufficient. Mr. Clerk, the fine entered against Hiram Inch for contempt of court is remitted. Proceed with the case, gentlemen."

The Judge leaned back in his seat perfectly satisfied with his own "showing" of latent power and authority.

"Take the stand, Mr. Inch," said Fogle, waving his hand carelessly toward the raised platform and hitching around in his chair.

The District Attorney hoisted his heels upon a table and began to pare his finger nails.

"Y' so'mly swear th' ev'd'nce in—raise yer hand," said the clerk. "The other one," he commanded, in a distinct tone of voice. "Y' so'mly swear th' ev'd'nce in th' case 's—s—z—z—truth, hull truth, noth' but truth, s'elp'y' God wash yer name?"

As soon as the clerk perceived that the right hand of the witness was high in air he averted his gaze, and with his left hand toyed with the papers on his desk and in this attitude administered, parrot-like and indistinctly, the solemn legal oath. Having received a reply to his question he sat down and was immediately absorbed in a bright-colored sensational novel. There was evidently one man in that Court-room for whom Inch's testimony had no interest.

"Mr. Inch," said Fogle, deliberately, "what do you know in regard to this case? Speak slowly and distinctly so that the reporter can take down your evidence."

"Nothin'."

"Nothing! That's strange. I thought you were an important witness. How is that, Mr. Cringe?" asked Fogle, in an audible whisper, leaning over to his associate. After a moment's consultation he raised his head with a smile of satisfaction. "Yes, I understand it now. As I said before

I did not know that Mr. Inch was to testify for us until this morning, and I have not had an opportunity to obtain any knowledge of what branch of the case his testimony may bear on. Ahem, Mr. Inch, do you recognize the defendant?"

Inch slowly drew a spectacle case from his pocket, and opened it. Adjusting the spectacles on his nose he peered at Brower, and then as deliberately replaced them in the case and held them in his hand ready for future similar emergencies.

"Well, do you recognize the defendant?" asked Fogle.

"I reckon I do."

"You reckon you do. Are you sure that you recognize him?"

"I ain't exactly sartin'."

"Have you ever seen him before?"

"I think I hev'."

"Where?"

"In the Southern kentry."

"In the Southern country. You mean the lower counties of the State."

"Yes."

"Very well. Now, if this is the same man whom you knew in Southern California what is his name?"

"Joe Taggart."

The answer was prompt and positive, and Fogle looked at the District Attorney in seeming blank surprise. Recovering himself, however, he continued:

"How long has it been since you last saw Joe Taggart?"

"Nigh onto nine year ago."

"Ah, then, he must have changed considerably in that time?"

"Mebbe."

"Maybe. 'Don't you know that he must have changed?"

"I reckon."

Another whispered consultation between Fogle and Cringe.

"I don't know about that," he muttered, in an audible tone. More muttering in which the words "prosecution," "witness," "looks bad," "we'll see," and "never mind" were plainly heard by those sitting near.

"Take the witness," said Fogle, as soon as he had concluded his consultation with Mr. Cringe.

The District Attorney smiled his sympathy for "the learned counsel on the other side," and proceeded to cap the catastrophe which the defense had brought down upon itself.

"Mr. Inch," he began, fluttering a bundle of legal documents and crossing one foot over the other on the table, "You were well acquainted with Joe Taggart, were you not?"

"Knew him by the back."

"Yes, ah—knew him in—what county?"

"Los Angeles."

"You would trust your memory, I suppose, for recognizing him again, wouldn't you?"

"How?"

"The lapse of eight or nine years would not change his appearance to such an extent that you would fail to recognize him if you were to meet him on the street or in this Court-room, would it?"

"Would I know him agin?"

"That is the substance of what I am endeavoring to render plain to you. Would—you—know—him—again?"

"I reckon I would."

"And this defendant is, to the best of your knowledge and belief, Joseph Taggart?"

"To the best of my knowledge and b'lief."

"That is what I said. How stupid you appear, Mr. Inch. Is this man Brower, the defendant in this case, Joseph Taggart?"

"I b'lieve he is."

"Very well. Now, Mr. Inch, are there any distinctive marks, or peculiarities of feature, or person, or manner, by which you can identify the defendant as Joseph Taggart, beyond the peradventure of a doubt?"

"How?"

"Are you deaf? How do you know that this defendant is Taggart?"

"I don't know it yet."

"You don't know it yet! What do you mean?"

"I ain't zackly sartin till he strips."

"I submit, your Honor," wrathfully cried the District Attorney, "that this trifling is bordering upon genuine contempt. I wish that the Court would admonish the witness."

"Mr. Inch, you will be careful to avoid any undue levity while testifying in this case. I am not in the habit of remitting fines twice."

Inch looked at the Judge in his idiotic way and grunted.

"Now, Mr. Inch, you will please answer my question categorically. How do you know that Brower is Taggart?"

"Well, ye see," and Inch bent forward and placed the index finger of his right hand in the palm of his left, "Taggart was a keerd sharp. Played poker. Beat all nater puttin' up col' decks."

"We don't want to hear about Taggart's accomplishments as a poker player just now," interrupted the District Attorney; "come down to the identification."

"I'm a comin' ez fast ez I ken," answered the witness.

"Joe used ter git away 'ith the boys down to Los Angeles purty lively, an' they begun ter think thet perhaps he was puttin' up jobs on 'em, so one day Riley Blivens laid fur him, an' caught him at it. Riley wasn't no slouch, you bet, an' he didn't 'low no man to play him fur no uthar; so he jerks out eighteen inches, an' afore Joe c'ld git away he rips him from shoulder to elbow. Ef this yer man Brower hez the marks o' thet bowie on his right arm he's Joe Taggart sure's yer born; ef he hesn't, he aint. Thet's all I know 'bout it."

For a moment there was a profound silence in the court-room. Every man present was slowly comprehending what the witness had just said, and the effect that it would have upon the jury. It was the crisis of the case. Then there was a rushing sound of many voices, a buzzing of whispered conversation.

"Order in the Court," shouted the Sheriff.

"May it please the Court," said Fogle, rising, "this is an unexpected turn in the evidence, but it is testimony which admits of easy corroboration. If the defendant will bare his right arm I think that it will settle the whole matter."

Then, without waiting for the permission of the Court, he turned to Brower with the remark:

"Take off you coat, Mr. Brower, and roll up your shirt sleeve."

The defendant complied, and displayed an arm as free from scar or blemish as any limb in that room.

"The left arm," muttered the chagrined District Attorney. Brower bared his left arm, and that was observed to be as faultless as the other.

"You are sure that it was his arm, and not his side, that was struck, Mr. Inch?" asked the District Attorney.

"I seen the cuttin', an' tended to Taggart arter. That aint Joe Taggart?"

"That is all."

"Step down, Mr. Inch," said Fogle; and Inch shuffled down from the stand, and out of the court-room, twirling his bat in his fingers, and gazing lackadaisically from side to side as he passed through the aisle.

The arguments were short, and the case was submitted to the jury at dark. In half an hour they returned with a verdict of "Not guilty."

Hiram Inch had saved a cold-blooded murderer from the gallows.

VI.—MAKING THE FUR FLY.

For a week after the acquittal of Brower, nothing else was talked of in Mammoth City, and the part Inch had played was freely commented upon. There were many who doubted the authenticity of his testimony, and openly declared it as their opinion that he had imagined the Los Angeles scene. They held that the whole affair was a plot concocted between Fogle and Inch to clear Brower, and expressed indignation that the legal tribunal of the country should so often be prostituted in such a manner. Inch was fully aware of the adverse criticism which he was receiving, but pursued the even tenor of his way apparently unconscious. He continued his mining operations, and drove shrewd bargains as nonchalantly as ever, attending to his own business, and thereby gaining the respect of the conservative portion of the community.

It was nearly two weeks after the trial that Inch had occasion to walk down the main street of the town, and meeting one or two friends stopped to converse with them. The last friend he met invited him into a saloon to "have a cigar." Inch was not "a drinking man." The saloon was crowded with young men, most of whom were members of the Cata-ract Engine Company, and among them, half intoxicated, swayed the form of Bob Ikes.

"There he comes, the old thief," ejaculated the young bruiser, as Inch and his friend entered.

It was too late to retreat even if Hiram had been disposed to leave; so he stepped up to the bar without taking any notice of the remark of Ikes. Inch's friend called for a mixed drink, and while the barkeeper was preparing it Hiram lighted his cigar.

"He looks like a monkey on stilts," said Ikes, evidently directing his remark at Inch. "The call him the 'sing-ed cat,' but I think 'sing-ed liar' would suit him better. Keep your hands in your pockets, boys, or you'll miss something."

Inch's friend observed that Ikes was bent upon a quarrel, and not wishing to be drawn into any dispute himself, hastily drank his liquor and signified his intention of leaving. As they were about to step through the door Ikes shouted after them:

"Say, old Singey, tell the old cat, and the long-legged, red-headed kitten out home, that I'll come out and laugh over your lies in the Brower case with them."

Inch turned like lightning, and in two long strides was beside his insulter. In another instant the heavy form of Ikes was raised in the powerful hands of Hiram, and dashed with tremendous force against the front door, where he fell an inert, helpless lump of insensible humanity. His companions stood a moment completely bewildered until one of their number shouted the yelping cry of the "Hounds," when the entire crowd rushed upon the man who had thus rudely disposed of their chief.

Cries of rage resounded through the saloon, almost drowning the confused trampling of many feet as the gang flung themselves in a mass upon the tall form of Inch, who towered over them like a pine among dwarf oaks, swaying to and fro as he extricated his arms from the pinioning embrace of assailants. Then his doubled fists fell like trip-hammers upon the upturned heads about him, threatening to crush the skulls at every blow. He shook those who had not fallen beneath his terrific strokes from him as a terrier would shake so many rats, and sprang for the stove. The roughs began to hurl the heavy chairs at him, and he replied with the stove-lids, grate, and doors of the stove, which he wrenched from their fastenings. A chair struck the stove and threw it down, thus depriving him of this source of ammunition. Dashing a chair full at the crowd and felling one of his assailants with his fist, he reached the end of the bar, and began to hurl the tumblers and glasses. Several of the "Hounds" had already begun to throw glasses from the other extremity of the bar, and bottles soon followed, the barkeeper having fled at the beginning of the fight. The noise of crashing glass-ware, the rattle of falling iron, and the clatter of falling chairs as they struck the walls, were terrific. Mirrors were smashed, windows were shattered, and above arose the shrill yells and hoarse cries of the combatants. It was a battle of pigmies against a giant, with the odds in favor of the latter; a fierce contest of numbers against agility and muscle. The air was thick with flying missiles, and the floor strewn with the debris of the conflict. Occasionally a glass would reach the object at which it was aimed and the stricken one would sink with a groan upon the floor. Such a contest could not long continue. Twice the crowd closed around the tall fighter and twice those flail-like arms dashed them back with sounding blows. The fragment of a bottle grazed his cheek and drew blood. A chair hurtled through the air and struck him upon the breast. The old man staggered. The gang yelled. Fortune had turned and the odds were telling against him. The end was not far off. He could not return the incessant fire of his howling enemies much longer. He must go down, to be trampled upon, kicked—beaten to death. Suddenly there was a roar, a reverberating crash, and the tall form of Inch staggered and fell, staining the floor around him with a crimson stream that spurted with every pulsation from his side.

"Good shot," he exclaimed as he fell. "Brave man," he added as he struck the floor, and then the now horrified crowd observed for the first time the kneeling form of Ikes behind the prostrate man, holding a smoking revolver and glaring at the work of his murderous hand.

VII.—THE CAT AGAIN IN DANGER.

Towering above the pretty valley in which Mammoth City rested rose Bald Mountain—so called on account of its storm-washed, granite summit, which could be seen for miles down the great cañon, running parallel with Table Mountain and leading up from the foothills. Around the base of this peak, pine, cedar, and chaparral grew in wild luxuriance, while the sides were covered with chemical so thick that it was utterly impossible to reach the bare spot above except through the paths worn by animals, or cut by early explorers. On the edge of the granite cap, concealed in the high, thick brush, stood an old weather-beaten hut, which tradition said had once been the abode of a singular old recluse, who, tired of the world, had sought this lonely spot and erected this "shanty." Whether he had died or returned to civilization was never known, but the gossips of the locality inclined to the belief that his bones were bleaching in one of the dark ravines that ran down to the turbulent Stanislaus. It was said that the old cabin had afterward been used as a lookout station and lurking-place for Joaquin Murietta and his gang, and it was a downright heresy to doubt that in this solitary spot, where the moaning of the wind, the shrill shriek of the hawk, and the yelp of the coyote were the only sounds that broke the awful silence, met the little band of conspirators who acknowledged, during "war times," allegiance to that traitorous organization known as the "Knights of the Golden Circle." The Indians never visited the locality, deeming it the abode of evil spirits, and if you were to question them in regard to the "Great White-headed Mountain," they would shudder and exclaim: "Heap bad, moocho malo, Injun walla no like big white hill." It was seldom that the place was visited, although the prospect from the summit was grand, and the locality one to which all lovers of solitude might wish to retire for a few hours to commune with the gigantic works of nature here displayed.

That the place was occasionally visited, however, and at the most unseemly hours, was evidenced about two weeks after the shooting of Inch, by a gleaming light and the sound of human voices issuing from the old cabin late at night. Within the hut were three men closely wrapped in cloaks, sitting around a dark lantern, and talking in an undertone.

"It would have been close papers for some of us if Inch had passed in his checks," said one of the party.

"What do you mean by 'some of us'?" retorted a thick-set figure leaning against the remnants of the fireplace, "I believe you were the only one directly implicated, and if it wasn't for certain good friends of yours, you wouldn't be here to-night."

"What's the use of talking that way, Staghart?" replied the person addressed; "you know that if you hadn't put us up to it that fight 'd never have come off, and I wouldn't be trembling in my boots for fear the d--d Grand Jury would indict me for assault to murder."

"Yes, and the only thing that galls me is the fact that you didn't make a clean job of it."

Staghart's oaths were frightful during the delivery of this short speech.

"I tried hard enough to croak him, anyhow," answered the other.

"And I've paid you for it."

"What good 'd it do me if I'm juggled?"

"You can live like a prince after you come out," Staghart laughed.

"That's consoling."

"Yes, Ikes, old man, you can live like a fighting cock on what I have paid you already, and what I intend to give you if you succeed in finishing the job at the next trial," said Staghart.

"Vot noish vash dot!" quavered the third person, who had, during this conversation, sat perfectly motionless.

"You heard no noise, Marks," answered Staghart; "that imagination of yours would convert the snapping of a dry twig into the crash of a falling pine."

"Dot's vot's der matter—dose shnappin' twivigs. Shpose der pe shpies on der outside oof der shanty?"

"Spies! Why, Marks, you must be crazy. What do you suppose I brought you to this place for, if I didn't know that no one would disturb us or hear what we were saying? There's no danger, Marks; I've seen forty men meet right under this brush at a time when it was death to congregate for the purpose that they did."

"Vash dot so!" exclaimed Marks, drawing his cloak closer about him, and casting a frightened glance toward the door.

"As I was saying," continued Staghart, addressing Ikes, "I want you to finish what you attempted the other day, and I will give you a thousand dollars for the work. I will take your written agreement and pay you in advance."

"Make it two thousand, Staghart, and I'll do it. Risking a man's neck is worth that much, ain't it?"

"There's no risk, Ikes, if you follow my directions. If you had acted as I told you to in that last row you would have been a free man to-day—the Justice of the Peace would not have held you before the Grand Jury."

"It's worth two thousand dollars to murder a man," replied Ikes.

"You needn't be so blunt about it, Bob. It ain't murder, it's—it's—"

"Well, what is it?" asked Ikes, impatiently.

"It's self defense," answered Staghart. "All you have to do is to draw the old man into a quarrel and let him strike the first blow. Have your witnesses ready to swear that he attempted to draw a weapon. He naturally feels revengeful against you for shooting him, and will probably resent it when you meet him. I'd advise you to use a knife next time—it's surer. If it wasn't for waiting so long I'd send him to the State Prison on perjury. I know that I can prove him guilty of perjury in the Brower case."

"I can't do it for less than two thousand, Staghart," answered Ikes; "two thousand in advance."

"Split the difference."

"Well, say fifteen hundred," said Ikes; "I know well enough that you would give two thousand if I stood out for it. You want Inch out of the way because you think he holds documents against you that might make it lively for you."

"If you don't want to undertake it, Ikes, say so; I can hire a Mexican for a hundred dollars to do the work."

"I know it; but you can't depend upon a Mexican; and you know that if you do deal with Greasers you are liable to be short of breath yourself almost any time," retorted Ikes. "Is fifteen hundred a bargain?" impatiently demanded Staghart.

"Yes."

"Dere! Vash dot? You hears dot, Iksey?"

The Jew was pale with terror, and the others were not wholly free from apprehension, for they had all heard the snapping of a dry twig this time, and something that sounded like a soft footfall.

"Pshaw!" ejaculated Staghart. "It's nothing—or only a rabbit, perhaps. I'll see."

He went to the door and looked out. His ear caught no sound, save the dismal dirge of the pine tops swaying in the rising wind. He drew a pistol, and, cocking it, walked around the hut. The two men inside could hear him as he crept softly from corner to corner, and could imagine him peering into the darkness in search of a moving form at which to fire. When he returned he threw a pine burr at the feet of Marks, saying:

"There, old cent-per-cent, that's what has frightened you, I expect."

"Shpose it don't vash der bine nuts—shpose it vash der Sheriff's, eh?"

"Dry up, Marksey; you'd turn white at the sight of your own shadow and then try to make it out that you'd seen a ghost," said Ikes.

"I don't like dish eer pizness—dish gillin' work and bayin' fur ber ploof off der man."

"You don't have to do any killing, my Hebrew friend; your branch of the work is wholly financial," said Staghart. "I want you to gather in every piece of paper against the Inches that you can get hold of; commence suit, and, if possible, ruin them. At any rate you can annoy and harass them."

"But der ol' gat don't vly no baber," answered Marks.

"That's the trouble; if he did I wouldn't have to pay Ikes so much. The best way is to get the son in your clutches again. How much does he owe us now?" asked Staghart.

"Offer dree hundred dollars."

"Three hundred dollars," mused Staghart. "This work of revenge is a d--d costly article; but I'll have satisfaction if I part with every cent I've got in the world, d—them!"

His red face and fat cheeks paled at the thought of his wrongs, and his eye lighted with a terrible purpose.

"I gits der poy into der trap, eh?" asked Marks.

"Yes; and after Ikes makes away with the old cat we'll swoop down on the rest of the breed. Let me know, Ikes, when you are ready to put him out of the way, and I'll send a party to old Inch who will propose a speculation that will swamp the women after Inch is attended to. I would advise you to use the knife, Ikes; it's sure death at close quarters."

"I think we all understand each other. Let's go," said Ikes, rising.

The others followed his example; and Staghart, taking the lantern from the ground, threw the light ahead so that they could thread the dark path down the mountain in safety. Arrived at the foot of the hill the trio separated, Staghart crossing a narrow creek on the right and reaching the road leading into town, Marks keeping the more direct path down the creek, and Ikes turning to the left and selecting a path around the base of the mountain. He kept this trail until he reached the road which passed in front of Inch's house. As he passed the place he shuddered, and, for the first time since his attempt upon Hiram's life, perhaps, he felt that gnawing at the heart which some men call the admonition of conscience, and others designate cowardice. The old, barn-like structure was dark and silent; and as Ikes looked up at it another shiver ran through his frame; and, as great drops of rain began to fall, he hurried his pace, and soon left the gloomy edifice far behind him.

It was two o'clock in the morning, and the light in Henry Fogle's office indicated to the solitary watchman of the town that the lawyer was hard at work upon an important case. Had the watchman waited long enough in the shadow of the wall he would have seen a dark form sneaking with rapid but noiseless strides from door to door until it stood motionless in front of the entrance to Fogle's office; he would have heard a low whistle, answered by the creaking of Fogle's door as it opened; he would have observed the shadow of the sneaking form as it slipped noiselessly into the office; and, if his curiosity was by this time sufficiently aroused to draw him to the key hole of the door, he would have seen Fogle tendering a glass of steaming whisky to an Indian. Had he listened he would have heard a strange story, told in broken English, of a dastardly conspiracy to assassinate a man named Hiram Inch.

It was about half-past two o'clock when a man dashed through the front gate of Inch's yard, dripping from the effects of the driving rain storm, and knocked at the door of the house. The sound echoed through the hallway, reverberating hollowly far into the interior of the old building. There was no answer to the first summons, and the blows fell upon the panel again louder than ever. This time a window was cautiously raised, and a female voice pierced the darkness:

"Who's that?"

A hoarse voice replied:

"A man from Fogle's."

"What do you want?—it's a purty time o' night to come a thumpin' at people's doors, breakin' the'r rest, an'—"

"It's important business—it's life or death," interrupted the man at the door. "I must see Hiram Inch at once."

The window fell with a crash, and in a few moments Mrs. Inch hastily attired in her unbecoming calico gown, opened the door and admitted a man whose face and form was thoroughly enveloped in a large black cloak and slouch hat, down the crease of which ran rivulets of water.

"Be keerful thar, an' don't stumble over the dogs," she said, as she led the way up a rickety pair of stairs.

The man followed her, and was ushered into a sleeping apartment, where, propped up between two pillows, sat the emaciated form of Hiram Inch, holding a revolver in his hand.

"You can shoot me if you want to, Inch; but you will gain nothing if you do."

The man threw his cloak on the floor, revealing to the astonished gaze of Inch the heavy form of Fogle.

[CONTINUED IN NEXT NUMBER]

NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Rates of Subscription, $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance. Postage prepaid. City subscribers served for 35 cents per week. Single copies, 10 cents.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."
 Branch Office, Cooper's Bookstore, 746 Market Street
 Agent at San Jose—F. A. Taylor.
 News Dealers and Agents in the Interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders should be addressed.
 A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PINLEY, }
 FRED. M. SOMERS, } . . . . . Editors.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1878.

Intelligent citizens throughout the nation are looking forward with great interest to the next Presidential election. There are not a few of our leading men who have been compelled to consider the question of the perpetuity of the Republic, and are confronted with a doubt of its permanence, and of the possibility of continuing our present elective system. To disfranchise any class of citizens clothed with political power is a matter difficult of accomplishment, yet no well-balanced mind questions the desirableness of depriving the vicious, the criminal, and the ignorant of the exercise of the elective privilege. The present political condition of the nation is an alarming one. We have as the natural result of the civil war a class conflict, producing a solid Democratic South, massing the intelligence, property-owning, and influential white population of fifteen Southern States in solid opposition to the Republican party. In all these States, with their thirty Senators, and all their representatives in Congress, their Governors, and all the municipal machinery of their States, their cities, and their county organizations, there is a united sentiment of political hostility to the present administration. Public sentiment and the public press, the pulpit, the bar, the business, commercial, and social circles, are all arrayed in antagonism to the party that for twenty years has controlled the nation. In opposition to this sentiment there are eight hundred thousand colored voters, without organization, lacking intelligence to combine, judgment to plan, and courage to execute. They have no leaders, and are powerless to resist the influences that surround them, so that the Democrats may calculate upon all the Southern electoral votes in the next Electoral College. Hence, it is apparent to the Republican party managers that they must secure an almost solid Republican North or allow the political power so long held by them to depart. This supremacy will not be yielded without a great struggle. It has already begun. Blaine has sounded the rallying cry for the Northern clans, varied somewhat from the old slogan that during and after the rebellion was so powerful to arouse party enthusiasm at the North. It is not now the oppressed and persecuted freedmen—for whose protection armies were stationed in Southern States—that Senator Blaine and his party friends are concerned for, but it is the North and its political supremacy in the nation that is threatened. By a Congressional investigation of fraud, violence, and intimidation at the Southern polls, he expects to accomplish nothing of practical value in that direction, but hopes again to fire the Northern heart with indignation and resentment that it may resist the encroachment of the Democratic party. In this view of the case the issue presented is a political one; it is certainly deprived of that feature of patriotism which in war times was wont to arouse the nation's fears lest the Union should be destroyed. The South professes to have abandoned its desire for an independent government, professes to have acquiesced in the freedom of its former slaves, professes to be desirous of maintaining the Union and of accepting the conditions resulting from the war.

The last Presidential election, a very close contest between the two great parties, would have been lost to the Republicans had not Florida and Louisiana been counted for Hayes. What issues can come into the next Presidential election favorable to the Republican party that were not in the last? The political, social, and material condition of the South is better now than then; the epidemic of political massacres, that did so much to rouse Northern resentment and incite to party action, has in a great measure passed away. The withdrawal of troops has brought order out of chaos; the withdrawal or banishment of Northern carpet-baggers and political adventurers has been attended with good results; the finances of the nation are in more prosperous condition now than then; the fiery invectives of Southern brigadier generals in Congress have been toned down to more reasonable declamation; while moderate, cool-headed gentlemen and statesmen are gaining ascendancy over the hot heads that kept the fires of Northern prejudice burning by their absurd and passionate utterances. We see no very good reason why moderate Democrats should not in the next Presidential election vote their party ticket, provided the nominee shall be one in whose patriotism, integrity, and ability they have confidence. We see no very great assurance that Connecticut, New Jersey, Indiana, California, and Oregon may not give their electoral votes to the Democratic nominee, unless the Republican candidate shall commend himself to the people by his superior qualifications and fitness for the position. He is an unwise party leader who blinds himself to the fact that the nomination of some moderate, intelligent, wise, and prudent Democratic statesman has not a strong probability of success, and that the Republican party is handicapped with heavy weights in the coming race, and that it will be more difficult than in former times to arouse the Republican party to a great exertion. This will certainly be the case if Senator Blaine and his party friends shall determine to make a fight upon the old, worn-out issues of sympathy for the negro because he is deprived of his influence at the ballot-box due to his numbers. The rank and file of the Republican party are tired of this thing. It has lost its power to conjure up the party devil with. Senator Thurman said truly, that intelligence and property were justly entitled to rule, and would rule in a republican community. The whites of the South have the right of political control, and they will control; and it can never be made an issue at the North that they shall be deprived of that right, or that it should be turned over to, or divided with, the ignorant black race, that, by a serious party blunder, was given the elective privilege.

Let us suppose that Senator Thurman of Ohio, or Senator Bayard of Delaware, or Hendricks of Indiana, or any one of a score of moderate, conservative, respectable gentlemen whom we might name, should receive the Democratic Presidential nomination, with whom could the Republicans go into the fight with a reasonable assurance of victory? Would it be Senator Blaine, or Senator Conkling, or any one of the present prominent leaders at Washington? Is it possible that a second time the party can succeed by the policy of choosing some obscure person for his availability—available because obscure? The Democracy succeeds once with Polk, the Republicans once with Hayes. Such tactics seldom prosper the second time, and are, so far as we know, never a second time attempted. There is only one man in the nation who is likely to become the Republican candidate, and can be elected? Of course we refer to General Grant. That General Grant will be the nominee of the party we entertain no doubt. We have not for a year past. That he desires the nomination we do not question; that he would regard his own election as certain we are convinced. General Grant is a political fatalist blindly confident in his own luck. If he had the counsels of the most shrewd and subtle party leaders—which we believe he has not—if he were acting under the advice of the most inspired party politicians, he could not do more to accomplish his nomination than by doing just what he is doing, and that is nothing. He did a wise thing by going to Europe—and he knew it when he went—and thus keeping aloof from all political complications. He has been honored abroad as no American was ever honored, and this pleases us. He will go to India and China, and next summer he will turn up in San Francisco. He will make a speech here about two minutes' long, one of which he will devote to the Chinese question, and he will be very likely to capture the sand-lot by it. General Grant is sound upon the Chinese question, as we personally know. We will give him a rousing welcome; we will send him booming across the continent in a blaze of party enthusiasm. He will be nominated by acclamation, and it is in the possibility of arousing the latent smoldering fires of the old pent-up patriotism that he may sweep the North. Old memories of battle fields and bloody scenes when the nation struggled for its life against the slaveholders' rebellion will be rekindled. It is possible that this new issue that labor presents to capital will so alarm the property-owners of the North as to drive all the wealth, intelligence, and industry of the twenty-three Northern States to cast their votes solid for General Grant. It would be just his luck. It is possible, and in fact probable, that the Democratic party will commit some fatal mistake, some unpardonable and inexcusable blunder in its nomination; it may renominate Tilden. This would make General Grant a third-time President of the United States. It is not improbable that in the other doubtful States, as in California, some defection from the Democracy like that of Kearney may give the Republicans a walk-over. It would be just Grant's luck.

Calculating the probabilities of the next Presidential election in the light of present conditions, and assuming that the Democratic party of the North is not going to pieces upon this labor question, the chances are very great that the next President will be a Democrat. It is possible that in other Northern States, as in California, the working element of the Democracy may run away with it. The party discipline of to-day is not what it was in the times of Jackson or Buchanan. This is illustrated in California. Kearney—who is not even a good Democrat; who voted for Hayes; who is of foreign birth; without money, influence, or party power; unaided, alone, and in opposition to his church; without eloquence or education—arrays himself against the Democratic leaders, destroys their influence, breaks up the party organization, laughs at all their traditions, defies their bullies, and is proof against both threats and blandishments; placing himself at the head of the Democratic mob, sends fifty-two delegates to a Constitutional Convention, while the Democratic party secures in the entire State but a dozen. It must be remembered, too, that the Democracy are in power in the State. Irwin is Governor of California, and Bryant is Mayor of San Francisco; so that in estimating this victory the fact must not be lost sight of that the drayman was victorious against fearful odds.

We think Kearney is making a great mistake in warring against the Democratic party. He should place himself at the head of it; he should usurp its leadership. A majority of the rank and file of the Democracy is with him, and the principle is recognized in the Democracy that the majority must control. County committees and State conventions are elected at primary elections. Kearney can carry every Democratic primary election in all the cities and in all the principal villages of the State; with anything like organization he can carry a majority of the country precincts. One blast upon his bugle-horn will send Irwin, Johnson, Bryant, Caserly, Hager, Wilson, Hoge, Terry, Howard, McCoppin, Gwin, and all the rest of the leaders—Yanks, chivs, and Irish—to their hiding places. Holding a County Convention in San Francisco for municipal officers, or a State Convention, Kearney can dictate nominations, and the gentlemen whom we have named dare not bolt the ticket, and bolters they would be if they did not come squarely up to the fight with their money, their eloquence, and their influence. There is a Presidential election approaching, and the prospects of a Democratic success would make a revolt impossible. If Kearney were nominated for Governor, Doctor Shorb, Colonel Stuart Taylor, Judge Hager, and all the eloquent and gifted ones of the Democracy would take the stump for him. This is what we mean by the tail wagging the dog. Our simile has a double meaning; for, in our judgment, the Democratic party is a cur-se-d organization, and Kearney is the very tip end of its meanest part.

Such a result as this would please us, and we trust that none of our readers will do us the injustice to think that we are not most serious and most profoundly in earnest in desiring to aid in bringing about such a condition of things. The Democratic party has shown itself such an abject coward and slave in its submission to this most blasphemous adventurer, and the gentlemen whom we have named have demonstrated that they are so utterly void of political courage, manliness, or principle, that we shall be glad to see them chained to the truck wheels of this victorious drayman, and dragged through the party mire, with all the mob of sand-lot adventurers howling after them. We have a desire to see the issue made in this State; as well here as elsewhere; as well now as later. If ignorance, idleness, and crime can rule San Francisco and California, why not let the fact be understood at once? If those who have nothing are to be allowed to plunder those who have something, the division may as well take place now as at some future time. If such Democrats as we have named, and hundreds more whom we might name, think more of the Democratic organization than they do of their self-respect, their property, and the good order of society, let us know it, and let chaos come. We are anxious to have decent, honest people, who have social and property interests to guard, come together in an association for protecting and preserving them. We are wearied of this political party division, that puts one-half the decent and honest people on one side, and the other half on the other, and allows rogues, adventurers, and plunderers to control both. We are tired of waging a political warfare that gives all the honors of the fight, and all the loot and plunder of the victory, to the leaders and the camp followers.

Our advice therefore to Kearney is, to kick overboard and out of his ranks all the timorous respectability of the Democracy; cut the leaders, and lawyers, and office-holders adrift, and let them paddle their own canoes; take charge of the primaries, elect delegates to nominating conventions, assume command, and clear the decks for action. If it is to be a fight of labor against capital, these men will only embarrass him. If it is honesty against political trickery and charlatanism, they will only be ammunition for the enemy, and if Kearney should win a victory, the men who will prove skeddaddlers in the fight will be foremost to claim the rewards of success. If Kearney has the courage to become a leader, and the firmness to hold a drum-head court-martial and shoot every politician that sneaks into his party, he will accomplish one of two things. He will either reform the Democratic party of California or murder it. Either result will please us.

PRATTLE.

Patriots who dream of "acquiring Canada" may congratulate one another that if matters are not in train for the accomplishment of that end there has at least been a sowing of the seeds of political discontent. The Chamberlain of the new vice-regal court has issued a ukase that all the Dominion ladies who wish to be received by her Royal Highness, the Princess Louise, must attend in low-neck dresses, unless they present a doctor's certificate of ill health. The ladies of the Dominion—who have the misfortune to be a trifle scraggy about the neck—have ventured to protest against this regulation, as unsuited to the climate and imperfectly respectful, their liege lords dutifully backing them, and saying things in the newspapers which, in deference to our republican reverence for royalty, can not be here repeated. In this grave emergency it is hoped that the attitude of our Government may be consistent with a decent and honorable observance of international obligations until the time comes for more decided action.

His morning journal Tom surveyed,
And read aloud these lines displayed:
"A Sacramento Man Repents—Pleads Guilty to a Grave Offense."
"What!" Bob says, "only one confessed?
'Twill cost a pile to try the rest!"

The advertising "doctors" of this city kill annually more people than are killed by disease, and then if a respectable journal which will not accept their abominable advertisements says a word against them and their hideous trade, the insolent fellows have the effrontery to thrust their unwholesome carcasses into the office and ask a retraction. If I had my way in this matter (it is perhaps as well that I have not) there would be a break in the continuity of this custom. As it is, I propose to save a few human lives which the bloody-handed rascals would otherwise take, and thereby diminish their revenues. For it happens that I know these creatures and all their tenebrous ways; and I did not get my knowledge by experience either, for I am alive.

When one's watch gets out of order he has the sense to send it to a watchmaker; he does not stick his clumsy fingers and thumbs into its dainty machinery; nor does one unskilled in the trade endeavor to repair an ailing steam engine. Yet men and women of the highest intelligence in other directions do not hesitate to undertake repairs of those incomparably more intricate and delicate machines, their own bodies, without even the faintest knowledge of the nature of their disorders or the action of their "remedies," and with no conception of the disastrous consequences of a mistake. With a fatuity that deserves to rank as a continuous miracle, they will take medicine on the advice of a friend, the faith of an advertisement, or, worse still, at the maundering dictation of their own undigested and misrecorded "experience." I am convinced that to one person cut off by the accident of disease, five die a natural death by poison.

If human testimony is good for anything there are ghosts, there are witches, there are were-wolves. There is no monstrous and preposterous superstition that does not rest upon as solid a basis of unimpeachable human testimony as does the most familiar and obvious circumstance of any man's experience. If then, with regard to matters within the immediate scope and purview of the physical senses, human testimony is so nearly worthless, what shall we say of it in cases requiring close and patient observation, the widest experience, the coldest analysis, and the most methodical classification, such as the action of a certain medicine down amongst the mysterious functions of the human system? Before the stupendous difficulties of such a problem as "What cured your cold?" I stand appalled; and I reverently uncover to the supernal audacity of the mind which tranquilly believes itself to have discerned the solution—which from amongst the countless other influences acting on the organism simultaneously with the medicine assumes that it can disentangle and determine that medicine's exact part in the cure, and which is dead-sure that recovery was because of treatment, and not despite of it. Next to my Maker I adore the person who without a medical education tells me what to take for the collywoddles.

This benefactor of his race, the prescribing friend or practicing stranger, compared with whom Prometheus was a shirk-duty and Howard a self-seeker, has at least two of the attributes of Deity—omniscience and omnipresence. You shall not disturb a chip but he will jump out from under it to inform you that bees'-wax is a regal remedy for chronic sore toe—which is not likely.

We all disparage the knowledge we do not possess, and the layman who knows absolutely nothing of the science of medicine commonly holds it in light esteem. I tell him he is wrong: the difference between a man without medical knowledge and one with it is wider than that between the ignorant and the learned in any other department of human knowledge; compared with medicine the law is a science for babes and cloutlings. Much remains to be learned, but what has already been discovered and formulated is of amazing magnitude and value. And of this the physicians are sole custodians. The man who has a diploma from some great medical college may not be a good physician; he who has not can not be. Such a diploma does not certify its owner to be a man of brains; it merely proves that he has had the only possible opportunity to acquire his science—a science that can no more be self-taught than astronomy can be learned by study of gas lamps and brass door-knobs.

In selecting a physician one should of course know a diploma when he sees it, and should know which are the reputable medical colleges. In addition, he must be a judge of men—that is, he must be himself a man of brains. But any regularly educated physician is better than oneself and one's friends; and I earnestly counsel all my readers never, under any conceivable circumstances, to take even the "simplest" remedy except on prescription of a doctor. Who dares to do so is a bolder man than I, but he won't live as long—particularly if he confine himself to simple "household" remedies. It is these jokers that knock us coldest. It is these, especially, that make so lively a sale for tiny coffins. Half the babes that die are murdered by their mothers.

Educated and reputable physicians never advertise—except sometimes their names and addresses. This rule is inflexible; there are no exceptions. Moreover, most physicians on graduating take an oath that any valuable discoveries they may make they will immediately impart to the profession. Oath or no oath, it is one of the unwritten laws of the profession, observed by every honorable practitioner. It follows that the advertising doctor is a self-convicted impostor, and that if he affirm his knowledge of superior methods and specifics unknown to the profession, he is either a quack or a renegade.

As for the homœopaths, who if they hurt the physicians at least do not hurt us, they are the humorists of the profession, and no one regrets their decadence more than I do. I shall miss them from medicine just as I should miss Mark Twain from literature, the Danbury News Man from journalism, or Sunset Cox from politics. Even with them the world is none too bright and cheery.

The circumstance that Prince Bismarck is described by his biographer, Dr. Busch, as an enormous eater and supercopious drinker recalls the fact that he is a Pomeranian, and the Pomeranians are said to be the king-gluttons of the world. It was a Pomeranian who said: "The goose is a stupid bird," and being asked why, explained that "there is too much of it for one, and not enough for two."

The Evening Post says "it is a disgrace to civilization that men, women, and children are hungry in a land where the grass and flowers grow in the open air on Christmas day, as they do in San Francisco," and "one of ours," elsewhere in this paper, asserts that the disgrace appertains to the tramps who prefer beggary to toil. But is not Nature partly at fault in this matter, in not having made grass and flowers our appointed food? Nebuchadnezzar could have a merry Christmas in San Francisco all the year round, but the rest of us are not graminivorous; we must have our chops and steaks, no matter how good the grazing is.

Two friends dining at the Poodle Dog restaurant. FIRST FRIEND—"Garson! Garson! Hi! garson—donny moy cuffy noyer o suker!" SECOND FRIEND (dreamily)—"Things are differently ordered in France."

The most difficult thing for an American to understand is that in a war between a half-civilized European or Asian power and a civilized one the armies of the former are not commanded by an American. We would have it that Osman Pasha was an American; we will have it that the commander of the Ameer's forces is an American. Why we should always claim kinship with the under dog remains to be explained by some theory of canine sympathies not yet formulated.

What we want is prayer for rain—none of your lazy, drawling, snuffing, and perfunctory "petitions to the Throne of Grace," but a good, square, ringing statement of what we require for our next year's crops, when we require it, and why we conceive ourselves entitled to it. The priest or parson who fails us now in the hour of our need has no claim to our tolerance when it comes to the hour of his need. They must all be made to understand that our ability to pay their salaries and reduce the church debts depends upon the next year's harvest, and if we don't get any wheat we won't take any salvation—that we are not going to buy a thing because it is cheap unless we have the money. If the parsons won't pray for rain we must try to find somebody that will—somebody that has faith in prayer and a stake in the country—somebody whose interests are not all in the Better Land, but who has an intelligent eye to the secular well-being of the San Joaquin Valley. If our clergy—the best in the world—will take hold of this matter in dead earnest, giving a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull all together at "the golden everlasting chain," I for one will sustain them with faith. I believe they can bring rain—a regular, pelting, swashing, old-fashioned down-pour, like those of the time of Starr King, heaven rest his soul!—and if they will make the attempt there are one thousand self-cocking bull-dog revolvers that will come out of hip pockets and boot-legs to keep a ring for them. And if any scoffing Ingersoll or sceptical Tyndall comes chinning about he will get something in his paunch that he never swallowed. If there is any water up there we want it, and are not ashamed to ask for it through the chap-pies that know the lingo.

The following lines, entitled "The Dyspeptic's Lament," were written in a lady's album the day after Christmas:

Internal turkey, pray thee cease
Thy struggles—I abhor
To glorify the Prince of Peace
With an intestine war!

In North Carolina is a family of children of whom every one becomes stone blind at sunset. It is safe to say that those children, when they grow up, either will be more moral than the majority of their fellow men and women, or do a great deal toward making daylight hideous. It is hard to say whether if we were all blind at night there would be less or more vice in the world. Our opportunities would be materially abridged, but then there would not be so much detection, which would encourage us to make the most of such opportunities as would remain. On the whole, the condition most favorable to the pursuit of wickedness is just enough light to enable one to pursue it, and not quite enough to enable it to escape.

The island of Tristan d'Acunha is represented as being overrun with cats, which are not only a crying nuisance themselves but add insult to injury by openly fraternizing with the rats and mice. The inhabitants have wearied heaven with prayers and themselves with forays to exterminate them, and are now broken in hope and fortune. But Signor Pizzola, the sausage builder, rubs the chin of him with his palm, draws a visible wisdom across his brow, and passing his free hand significantly athwart the seat of his trowsers, preserves an elaborate and exhaustive silence as to what he could do for the people of Tristan d'Acunha. Alas! Pizzola, we know what you have done for us.

It transpires that the jury in the case of Mr. J. C. Duncan divided on the following lines: Two were for conviction, two for acquittal, two for either, two for neither, and two for both. Of the remaining two, one favored all these findings, and the other would hear to none of them. It was this last fellow that hung the jury, and it is the existence of such intractable fellows as this that makes one regret the abolition of the ordeal of immersion. According to this ancient method of proceeding against a person suspected of crime, he was chucked into a horse-pond and held under water. If he died without a struggle he was declared innocent.

"Dr. Linderman's health," says an Eastern telegram, "is so far improved as to enable him to discharge his duties." Let us not trust appearances; they are proverbially deceitful. That he is up and about; that he eats with an evenly sustained appetite and conquers his toddy; that he can walk ten miles to meet a reporter, and talk for three hours without stopping on subjects that he knows nothing about—these are misleading symptoms. Observe the furtive, sidelong aversion of his eye, the nervous agitation of his pocket, his constant scratching of his palm! He may, indeed, manage to get through his duties in a dead-alive kind of way, but he will never again be able to discharge them honestly. He never did.

The expounders of "an American system of finance" are giving their so-called minds to the introduction of the gold dollar, which is to contain half as much gold as the gold dollar, and half as much silver as the silver dollar. The notion of these philosophers is that this will preserve the equilibrium between the two metals: the gold in the new coin can not rise without carrying up the silver, nor the silver fall without dragging down the gold. This is very much as if one should endeavor to equalize the price of sausages and the price of pickles by tying a bull-pup to a basket of cucumbers.

Joaquin Miller complains that he is snubbed in New York society. Well, they are too high-toned for anything at New York. When a guest at any of their "palatial mansions" pulls off his boots in the parlor they want him to put on his rubbers. If at dinner he takes a fancy to blow his nose on his napkin they give him another napkin—sometimes another nose. And they insist that the singing of a lady vocalist and the war-whooping of an Oregon poet shall be separately executed and enjoyed. Mr. Miller is careless in these particulars, and so New York society prefers his poetry to his company. The serenest social circles of Boston are less fastidious; they like the one as little as the other.

OLLA-PODRIDA.

Social Etiquette of New York is a small and clearly printed book issued from the house of D. Appleton & Co., of New York, and sent to the ARGONAUT office by each of the leading book houses of San Francisco. Now, we take it that this is a very good joke on the editors, that it should occur to each of the prominent book concerns that a treatise upon social etiquette might prove instructive to them; is suggestive of the fact that they are not quite up in all the amenities of social life, and that they may be wanting in some of the elements of genteel deportment and good breeding. The editors read the book very carefully, and submitted it to "The Only Jones" for his critical examination. Jones having attentively perused it, and annotated it with remarks applicable to the best San Francisco society, it was again turned over to us in recognition of our superior intelligence in all matters of fashionable life, with a request that we would give it to our readers with the addition of appropriate reflections adapted to our higher circles. San Francisco possesses the best society in the world. It comes from the solid foundations of our gold and silver-bearing hills. In search of the qualities that adorn it, the Sierra has been explored to the depth of twenty-two hundred feet. Sutro has bored through four miles of solid rock to ventilate our aristocracy, give it airs, and enable it to work itself out upon new levels. The continent has been spanned, mountain heights overcome, great cañons leaped by the iron horse, great subsidies granted by the Government, and great exactions demanded from vulgar trade and commerce, that our aristocracy might plant itself firmly and intrench itself safely beyond the accidents of poverty. For it we have gained Alaska and the Aleutian Islands by purchase from Russia; seven millions of Government money to robe our aristocracy in furs of ermine, otter, and fox. To bring them servants from the Orient we have subsidized Government steamers. To maintain and entertain them, we authorize and legalize games of chance at the Stock Exchange, and thus encourage our toilers to bring them gifts. Our good society is cosmopolitan. It is composed of the lucky ones of all nationalities. It is governed by no false notions of birth, or that education and good breeding are essential to its maintenance. Good houses, good clothes, good carriages, and plenty of money are the requisites deemed most important. Then comes deportment, and a knowledge of those canons of good society deemed necessary in other and older civilizations, of whom we are as yet imitators. Etiquette is the machinery of society. It is a wall which rich and well-to-do people build up around themselves as a protection from disagreeable, under-bred poor people. It is the armor in which superior folks are protected from contact with the vulgar; a shield of defense against poor relations and the familiar acquaintance of old associates who have dropped behind in the pursuit of money. Etiquette is the white high road of a refined civilization, over which good society drives four in hand, and along which common pedestrians with club feet must look out that they are not run over or take the consequences.

There was a time when our English cousins called us "raw," and our Parisian friends styled us "drôle," but we are getting over all the gawkeries of newness, and now our girls are at a premium in the aristocratic circles of Europe. We have imported family crests, escutcheons, and coats of arms; we have patronized colleges of heraldy till our best society now rejoices in a long line of duly certified ancestors, and presents a lineage of which any wealthy family may be justly proud. As fast as our rich young girls attain the marriageable age we are making aristocratic alliances with the bluest blood of the titled families of the old world. California will not take a second rank in laying the foundations of this new aristocracy. The old pirates and cod-fishers of New England; the old Dutch market gardeners of New York; the descendants of Pocahontas, and those good old dames who were sold at auction in Virginia for tobacco; the Huguenots of Carolina, the creoles of Louisiana, the blue-grass people of Kentucky, must give way; they have had their day, and as their money gives out they must abate their pretensions to be considered good society, and give place to lucky ones. The ARGONAUT, as the organ of good society, assumes the responsibility of laying down rules for its government, and constitutes itself the ultimate tribunal of fashionable appeal in all matters touching its interests.

In making introductions great care should be taken, especially in San Francisco. It is a rule that introductions should not be made except by the consent of parties. Sometimes this may be assumed. A gentleman may not be presented to a lady except by her approval. The name of the less important personage should always be first called. To illustrate; if General Grant should visit San Francisco, and hold a public reception, Mayor Bryant, in presenting our distinguished citizens, would use this formula: "General Grant, this is Colonel William Henry Livingstone Barnes, who distinguished himself in the successful conduct of the Amador war, and is now the leading member of the Constitutional Convention;" or "This is General John Albenmarle McComb, Brigadier-General of the California Militia, with whose achievements you are too familiar to render it necessary for me to recount them;" or "This is Colonel Jonathan P. Jackson, of the Evening Post, the leading journal of the Pacific—the Workingmen's organ. Colonel Jackson distinguished himself in the War of the Rebellion." In the event of the arrival here of the Princess Louise and Lord Lorne, on a visit of ceremony to Governor Kearney, his private secretary, Carl Browne, would thus introduce to her the poetess laureate of the Pacific: "I do myself the honor of presenting to your Royal Highness our most distinguished poetess, who has honored your royal mother by inditing a poem to her. I have the honor to present Mrs. Theresa Corlett, of the Evening Post." Among more private persons of equal rank less formality is observable. As, for instance, if Gambetta should visit San Francisco one might say: "Citizen Gambetta, allow me to present Colonel Head, whom you have doubtless frequently met in Paris;" or, under other circumstances, "Mr. Gladstone, this is Mr. Pickering, of the Call, whose able editorials have done so much toward moulding public opinion in Europe;" or "This, Mr. Disraeli, is Mr. Charles de Young, whose searchings of the Berlin Congress and the Afghanistan must have given you so much information." With people of less distinction there should be less formality; as: "Mr. Boruck, Senator Conklin;" "Mr. James Gordon Bennett, Mr. Verdenal." In presenting gentlemen to ladies great care should be taken to avoid embarrassment. We undertook once to introduce a gentleman to a lady, with neither of whose antecedents we were familiar. In the most innocent way in the world we said: "Mrs. Brown, let me present you to Mr. Jones." "I have had the pleasure of meeting Mrs. Brown before," said Jones; "once in church, at a wedding ceremony, if you recall the incident, madam?" "Oh, yes, I recollect; you married a Miss Smith; your features are familiar, although I had forgotten the circumstance." This pair had been divorced after living together two years and having twins. Loud talk is vulgar; too much shaking hands is inadmissible. Ladies should first recognize gentlemen in the street. The younger person should be introduced to the elder. Every person at an entertainment is upon a social equality with any other guest. Conversation may be addressed to any guest at a private reception, but this does not justify a further acquaintance. Any gentleman may ask any lady to dance at a private dancing party.

One of the first things that the truly "genteel" should do is to establish a carriage; or, we might perhaps more appropriately put it in this way: as soon as you have "struck it" in stocks, and it is not necessary to realize, purchase a lot and build a stable upon it; if you fail to realize and the market explodes on your hands, you sell to the next lucky man. He builds a "palatial mansion;" the wife sets up her carriage, and a reception day; a good house, good horses, good entertainments, with good wine, good music, good suppers, and good manners secure the entrée into the social circles of the highest Nob-Hillity. It is very desirable that you should have come from a good family; and this is easy of accomplishment by securing a pedigree from a college of heraldry; get the story of your ancestors pat, and by frequently mentioning your "family" you will soon begin to believe in it yourself. If you ever were servant in a hotel, or sold peanuts, or manufactured ginger pop, or peddled from a basket or cart, or kept a corner grocery or vegetable stand, or was groom in a livery stable, or a gentleman's coachman, or porter in a store, or a butcher, or married a servant girl, or ever at any time engaged in any honest pursuit by means of which you were started in business, keep the secret inviolable and never allow it to get out among envious or jealous acquaintances. If your wife's mother kept boarders, or took in washing, or kept a millinery store; or if your wife was ever a governess, or sewing girl, or child's nurse, or schoolma'am, or gave music lessons, lie down the ignoble fact by blazoning a coat of arms upon the panel of your carriage, by stamping a crest upon your visiting card, by purchasing and displaying old portraits and referring to them as the Judge, the General, the Admiral, or the Bishop. A female portrait or two is indispensable. Old silver of antique pattern is desirable, and can be purchased second-hand or made to order. Heir looms (say the wedding dress of the wife's mother or grandmother, of quaint pattern, ornamented with rich old brown lace; curious old jewelry of fantastic pattern with real stones) may be secured from bric-à-brac stores. The gentleman should wear an old-fashioned watch-seal that came to him as an inheritance. If the family poverty has been too well known to have the fact forgotten, it should be openly and often referred to, accompanied by the explanation that a large fortune was lost by the failure of the United States Bank, or loss of negroes and plantations during the civil war, the massacre of San Domingo, the great fire in Boston or Chicago—indeed all the great calamities where property has been destroyed may be used in this connection. If your name is in any degree similar to that of any noble or distinguished European family, of course you are a descendant of it; your father, or grandfather, or more remote ancestor, having been discarded for marrying a poor but lovely girl not of equal rank. Or your ancestor may have been a political refugee, his exile dating from some great political event. If you are of Yankee family, of course your ancestors came over in the Mayflower or fought at Bunker Hill. If you are chivalry, then play Pocahontas and John Smith for ancestors. If Irish, you are descended from the Irish kings. The Huguenot dodge is a good one; or if anybody of your name signed the Declaration of Independence, or fought in the Revolutionary war, you may use the fact. If anyone of the same name is in DeBrett's Peerage, or Landed Gentry of England, it affords an excellent subsoil for planting a genealogical tree. Whenever the biographical fiend comes around to make a book, the opportunity should not be lost to get your portrait and life set forth; be careful to avoid the old time fable of being a self-made man, born of poor but honest parents; this sort of thing is vulgar and becoming obsolete. A tour in Europe is indispensable; if the gentleman can not leave his employments, the wife should not fail to make the trip and educate her children abroad. Knowledge of the French is also indispensable; German is desirable. A French maid is the thing—a French bonne with a lace cap is quite the go for a nursery of young children.

There are certain general rules to be observed in giving entertainments; the first requisite being to make a grand display and to spend more money than any one else can afford to do. The lady of the house should be more expensively and elegantly dressed than any of her guests, and she should wear more jewels. This places all the poor persons who may still be hanging by the eyelids upon the ragged edge of good society very ill at ease, and the chances are that they will decline the next invitation. It discourages accomplished, elegant, well bred, but poor girls, from continuing to society, and thus relieves the stupid, inelegant, and awkward rich young lady from a rivalry in which money appears to a disadvantage with culture, good breeding, and elegance of deportment. The event of a marriage in the family should always be seized upon as an opportunity for display and sensation. It should be announced as a marriage in high life. The ceremony should always be performed in a fashionable church after the notices have been duly distributed. Bridesmaids and groomsmen, dress and parade, glitter and sensation, wide spread notoriety, and a full description in some daily commercial paper, all indicate that the family belongs to the more exclusive and fashionable social circle. The after entertainment should be as showy as possible, and should be especially showy in the display of wedding gifts. Nothing is better calculated to impress the wedding guests with the social importance (wealth) of the family than spoons, pie-knives, fish-forks, card-receivers and silver sets. After marriage a wedding trip. The correct thing is the European tour, but if this is not convenient San José or Martinez will satisfy the rigid requirements of the most exacting social code. When the wife's family are unable to maintain a son-in-law, or for any cause it is inconvenient for the newly-married couple to live with either parent, they should go to one of our prominent hotels, and thence to a fashionable boarding-house. This breaks the fall down to a cheap hired house and drawing one's own baby-cart. We might extend these reflections into the more minute details, but to an intelligent and imitative class like that of our new and pretentious rich who are ambitious to distinguish themselves as leaders in the social world a hint will suffice; and if we find it does not, we will give the subject further attention.

The Voyage of the "Jettie."

Two hundred winters' snowing,
Two hundred summers' glowing;
Had passed on Bearcamp River;
And between its flood-torn shores,
Sped by sail or urged by oars,
No keel had vexed it ever.
Alone the dead trees yielding
To the dull axe Time is welding,
The shy mink and the otter,
And golden leaves and red,
By countless autumns shed,
Had floated down its water.
From the gray rocks of Cape Aon
Came a skilled sea-faring man,
With his dory, to the right place;
Over hill and plain he brought her,
Where the boatless Bearcamp water
Comes winding down from White-Face.
Quoth the skipper: "Ere she floats forth,
I'm sure my pretty boat's worth,
At least, a name as pretty."
On her painted side he wrote it,
And the flag that o'er her floated
Bore aloft the name of "Jettie."
On a radiant morn of summer,
Elder guest and latest comer
Saw her wed the Bearcamp water;
Heard the name the skipper gave her,
And the answer to the favor
From the Bay State's graceful daughter.
Then a singer, richly gifted,
Her charmed voice uplifted
And the wood-thrush and song-sparrow
Listened, dumb with envious pain,
To the clear and sweet refrain,
Whose notes they could not borrow.
Then the skipper plied his oar,
And from off the swelling shore
Glided out the strange explorer;
Floating on, she knew not whither,
The tawny sands beneath her,
The blue sky bending o'er her.
Amid the tangling lumber
And pack of mountain lumber
That spring-floods downward force,
Over sunken snag, and bar
Where the grating shallows are,
The good boat held her course,
Under the pine-dark highlands,
Around the vine-hung islands,
She plowed her crooked furrow;
And the rippling and the paddling
Sent the river-perch skeddaddling,
And the muskrat to his burrow.
Every sober clam below her,
Every sage and grave pearl-grower,
Shut his rusty valves the tighter;
Crow called to crow, complaining,
And old tortoises sat craning
Their leathern necks to sight her.
On she glided, overlaid
With merry man and maiden
Sending back their song and laughter,
While, perchance, a phantom crew,
In a ghostly birch canoe,
Paddled dumb and swiftly after!
And the bear on Ossipee
Climbed the topmost crag to see
The strange thing drifting under;
And, through the haze of August,
Passaconaway and Pausgas
Looked down in sleepy wonder.
All the pines that o'er her hung
In mimic sea-tones sung
The song familiar to her;
And the maples leaned to screen her
And the meadow-grass grew greener,
And the breeze more soft to woo her.
The lone stream, mystery-haunted,
To her the freedom granted
To scan its every feature,
Till new and old were blended,
And round them both extended
The loving arms of Nature.
Of these hills the little vessel
Henceforth is part and parcel;
And on Bearcamp shall her log
Be kept, as if by George's
Or Grand Menan the surges
Tossed her skipper through the fog.
And I, who, half in sadness,
Recall the morning gladness
Of life, at evening time,
By chance, onlooking idly,
Apart from all so widely,
Have set her voyage to rhyme.
Dies now the gay persistence
Of song and laugh in distance;
Alone with me remaining
The stream, the quiet meadow,
The hills in shine and shadow,
The sombre pines complaining.
And musing here, I dream
Of voyagers on a stream
From whence is no returning,
Under sealed orders going,
Looking forward little knowing,
Looking back with idle yearning.
And I pray that every venture
The port of peace may enter,
That, safe from snag and shoal,
And siren-haunted islet,
And rock, the Unseen Pilot
May guide them to their goal.
JOHN G. WHITTIER, in January St. Nicholas.

NEW YEAR CARDS

AT

BANGROFT'S
721 MARKET ST. S.F.

CALIFORNIA SPOOL SILK

TESTIMONIAL.

Referring to certain advertisements recently published derogatory to the quality of

CALIFORNIA SPOOL SILK,

We beg to offer the following testimonial from the largest dealers in the city.

CALIFORNIA SILK MFG CO.

We, the undersigned, hereby state that we have sold the CALIFORNIA SPOOL SILK for a number of years, and have found it to give entire satisfaction.

We recommend it to the public as equal in quality to any silk in this market, of either Foreign or Eastern manufacture. [Signed.] DOANE & HENSHELWOOD, No. 1 Montgomery Street.

FRATINGER & NOLL, 10 to 14 Montgomery Street.

F. CHESTER & CO., 34 to 36 Montgomery. KAINDLER & CO., Ville de Paris, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

J. SAMUELS, 28 Kearny Street.

THE WHITE HOUSE, J. W. Davidson & Co., corner Kearny and Post Streets.

S. MOSGROVE & CO., 114 and 116 Kearny.

THE LACE HOUSE, D. Samuels, 104 to 108 Kearny Street.

BUYER, REICH & CO., 129 Kearny Street.

S. BINE, 130 Kearny Street.

LANDERS & GILMORE, 132 Kearny St.

SULLIVAN'S CLOAK & SUIT HOUSE, 220 Kearny Street.

THE SILK HOUSE, Samuel Leszynski & Bro., 120 Kearny Street.

B. SCHONWASSER & CO., 222 Kearny St.

JACOBS & GLASS, 226 Kearny Street.

P. B. KENNEDY, 232 Kearny Street.

O'CONNOR, MOFFATT & CO., 111 to 115 Post Street.

O'NEILL, KENNEDY & STUART, 875 Market Street.

C. CURTIN, 911 Market Street.

J. J. O'BRIEN & CO., 924 to 928 Market St.

O'DWYER & EINHORN, 36 and 38 Third Street.

PEIXOTTO & SILVERMAN, 42 to 46 Third Street. And hundreds of others.

WAREHOUSES, N. W. CORNER
KEARNY AND SUTTER STREETS.

SHERMAN, HYDE & CO.

SHEET MUSIC,
MUSIC BOOKS,
MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

HERRMANN'S HOLIDAY STYLES HATS! HATS! NOW OUT.

For New Year's calling, be sure and get his latest styles.

336 KEARNY STREET, BETWEEN BUSH AND PINE,
& 910 MARKET STREET, ABOVE STOCKTON.

CALIFORNIA SPOOL SILK.

The Extra 100 Yards. Quarter Ounce. Ounce Spools. Embroidery Silks.

THE BEST IN USE.

Manufactured in San Francisco, supporting over 100 white women and girls. Sold by all first-class dealers.

MADAME SKIDMORE FINE MILLINERY.

THE LATEST PARISIAN STYLES CONSTANTLY RECEIVED.

1114 Market St., between Mason and Taylor, under Graham House.

THE CAL. FURNITURE MFG CO.

HAVE FIVE TIMES AS MUCH

FURNITURE

As any other house on this Coast, which has been purchased so low that we CAN and WILL sell at such prices that the poor can gratify their WISHES and the rich their TASTE. At the old stand,

NOS. 224 AND 226 BUSH STREET, S. F.

AMERICAN DISTRICT TELEGRAPH.

UNIFORMED MESSENGERS.

Special Detail to Deliver Christmas and New Year's Presents.

OFFICES:

222 SANSOME ST.,
211 KEARNY ST.,
833 SUTTER ST.,
965 MISSION ST.,
POWELL AND UNION,

CALIFORNIA AND FILLMORE,
MISSION AND TWENTIETH,
FOURTH AND BLUXOME,
HAYES AND LAGUNA,
BUTCHERTOWN.

THE SINGER MANUFACTURING CO.'S NEW FAMILY SEWING MACHINES.

Now selling at a great reduction from former prices.

The Best always wins

in the Long Run.

283,812 of our Machines sold in 1877.

Buy only the Genuine.

Beware of Counterfeits.

CAUTION.—No SINGER Machine genuine without our TRADE MARK (given above) stamped on the side, and our corporate name, "The Singer Manufacturing Company," in gold letters on the top of the arm of the machine. Buy of our authorized agents only. Beware of BOGUS AGENTS and COUNTERFEIT MACHINES.

THE SINGER MANUFACTURING COMPANY,
118 Sutter Street, between Montgomery and Kearny, San Francisco.

CANNEL COAL.

A SUPERIOR QUALITY OF GRATE COAL for sale by

MIDDLETON & FARNSWORTH,
14 Post Street, and 718 Sansome Street.

BUTTERICK'S

PATTERNS—DEC. STYLES.

Send stamp for catalogue. AGENCY, 124 POST ST., San Francisco.

CHRISTMAS

CANDIES AND HOLIDAY GOODS supplied to Church Festivals and Parties at wholesale rates. Imported Cap Bonbons, extra fine, 50 cents a dozen.

ROBERTS, corner Bush and Polk Streets.

HEALD'S BUSINESS COLLEGE,

No. 24 Post Street, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

Opposite Mechanics' Institute.

IMPARTS A THOROUGH PRACTI-

cal Education in all Commercial and English Branches French, German, Spanish, Drawing, and Telegraphy. This school having greater facilities, and enjoying a more extensive patronage than any similar institution on the Pacific coast, continues to base its claims for recognition and patronage upon the good sense and enlightened judgment of public.

LIST OF FACULTY.

E. P. Heald, F. C. Woodbury,
H. M. Stearns, A. B. Capp,
Mrs. C. Woodbury, T. R. Southern,
J. A. Chesnutwood, Mrs. W. J. Hamilton,
A. P. Durbief, F. Sereni,
R. Sorcini, Geo. Jebens,
Lloyd Baldwin, A. Vander Naillen,
For full particulars, call at the College, 24 Post Street, or address E. P. HEALD,
President Business College, San Francisco.

ARMY AND NAVY GOODS, REGALIA AND LODGE SUPPLIES.

A. J. PLATE & CO.,

No. 510 SACRAMENTO STREET.

EUREKA STONE MFG CO.

EUREKA STONE SEWER PIPE A specialty. None but the best brands of English Portland Cement used.

FACTORY, 535 BRANNAN STREET.

THOMAS BOYSON, M. D.

(University of Copenhagen, Denmark),

PHYSICIAN AND SURGEON. Office and Residence, 112 Kearny Street. Office hours, 11 A. M. to 1 P. M., 6 to 8 P. M. Sunday 11 to 1 only. Telephone in the office.

GEORGE BARSTOW,

ATTORNEY AT LAW, No. 309 California Street, San Francisco, Cal.

THOMAS H. HOLT,

NOTARY PUBLIC, No. 326½ Montgomery Street. Residence, 1803 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

DR. JAS. M. HUTCHINS,

DENTIST, REMOVED TO 737 MARKET Street, opposite Dupont.

J. J. CLARKE, M.D.

No. 106 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

J. J. BIRGE, DENTIST, 313 Kearny Street.

R. C. MOWBRAY, M.D., DENTIST
224 STOCKTON ST., corner Post, S. F.

FILIPPE'S ACADEMY OF LANGUAGES,

120 Sutter Street. French, Spanish, English, German, Italian, Latin, Greek, Portuguese, Russian, and Scandinavian languages taught, at moderate terms, by thorough teachers, with the shortest and best methods. Classes or private lessons day and evening. Take the elevator. Free school library for the students.

THE VERTICAL FEED.

THE ONLY POSITIVE SUCCESS IN all departments of sewing. Lightest running shuttle machine in the market. The NEW DAYS VERTICAL FEED SEWING MACHINE, 130 Post Street.

P. S.—Howe, Florence, Wheeler & Baker, Domestic, Weed, Wilcox & Co. each.

INTERCEPTED LETTERS.

SAN FRANCISCO, December 27, 1878.

MY DEAR MAUDE:—Christmas has come and gone, and its refulgent wave of carnival and contagion leaves us all stranded on the shore of our every day life, seedy, and sad, and sorry almost that anybody was ever born to the honor, and the necessity of so tremendous a birthday. How merry the present-giving, the eve, the day, the salutation, the dinner, the night with its shout, and song, and sequence of egg-nog, and "we won't go home till morning" atmosphere! How blue the light of the next day—when general depression reigned; when the infant was pale even unto death from the effect of the paint licked from the gaudy confection; when the plum pudding in the adult stomach—like our flag—"was still there;" when husband, and son, and brother, put on their hats with the shoe horn, and strolled mournfully down town to business, full of reaction and repentance! How difficult under these circumstances, my dear girl, to write cheerfully and charmingly of the holiday spectacles on street and stage! For theatrically we were a bit stupid and stiff this year. Stupid, because we were afflicted with English stuff; stiff, because we sat in cloaks and overcoats, and sympathized with the unfortunates clad in nothing more than the mantle of one's own modesty. The "specialties" began at the Bush Street Theatre on Monday night with the production of H. M. S. Pinafore, announced on the bills as "the latest English musical absurdity." The bills were entirely right. It was English, it was musical, and it was absurd in every sense of the word except the very novel and realistic stage setting where the flies, and drops, and grooves, are entirely swept away to give scope for a painted ocean, and a stage representing the quarter-deck of an English ship. There are many good things in the burlesque. The movement of the sailors up the ratlines and along the yards, the furling of the sails, the watery perspective, and actual touch and smell of tar, all go to the making of a pretty picture. Then the music is bright and sparkling, and sweet for those sea-dogs to mouth. But the wit falls flat and the dialogue drags, and the plot drops through, and you can not make out what it is all about till some beef-eater tells you, "You know that it is an awfully clever joke on the first Lord of the Admiralty, you know"—which you didn't, "you know." As to the pinafore part of the business, Mrs. Oates, dressed as the sailor boy, "Ralph Rackstraw," needed one very badly. Yet she sang well—the best I have heard her lately—and her "Good-bye, sweet-heart, good-bye," was as feelingly and tearfully rendered as though she had just dismissed another husband. Lulu Stevens, as the Captain's daughter, made modest love and a mess of her acting as she always has—with one exception, in Marjoline—but she was in good voice, and looked but passably well in a dress so short that it took away all the romance of the age, and left her a little snip of a school-girl. Beverly, the cunning little tenor, received many a hand for the spirited rendering of "The Death of Nelson," and "The Bay of Biscay, O!" Taylor represented well the "Admiral; Meade had a good action and make-up as "Deadeye," the dissatisfied sea-dog, and Connell, as "Captain Corcoran," roared about to the full extent of his natural capacity—if you can comprehend the terrible possibilities of such an assertion. Taken altogether H. M. S. Pinafore was not exactly a success, but was enjoyable for its novelty and its music, and disliked for the thoroughly English burlesque features which only those acquainted with the British navy could appreciate. Tuesday evening I was off to see Revels, or "Bon Ton George, Jr.," at the Grand Opera House, the comic burlesque extravaganza so extensively advertised in connection with the return of the Rice Surprise Party. There was a stretch of second-hand carpet from the street entrance through the marble-tiled passage to the inner doors, a brass band in the upper corridor making a superior but not very artistic noise, and a desolate and dreary-looking house within. There had been an attempt to counteract the chilling influence of the place by trimming the vestibule columns with alternate stripes of Turkey red and evergreens, and festooning the boxes, and dress circle, and balcony seats with the same material, but it looked cheap, and had no effect whatever on the imagination or the atmosphere when the curtain went up and the gale swept in from the great cavern of a stage. That first performance was anything but a revel. The audience was sparse and cold, and of that character that demanded satisfaction for anticipation, and was disgusted when it did not even get it by waiting till twelve o'clock; for Revels opened as a weakling and dragged along the most ridiculous lot of rubbish that was ever dignified with the high-sounding name of spectacle. Another English imposition without coherency of plot or movement, containing nothing new or novel, unless it be the diabolical attempts at punning that so invariably afflict the text of anything that Rice & Co. have to do with, and which is a spectacle sufficient to make the Norse gods weep icicles a mile and a half long if they only had a blue upholstered seat in a strong draft at the Grand Opera House. It is absolutely impossible for me to tell you what it is all about; something relating to St. George and the Dragon, I believe, with the first scene or two cribbed from Nemesis, with a double action in England and India, and a following of situations intended to be ridiculous, but which are only saved from actual stupidity by the interpretation of the character of "Callapat," by Willie Edouin, who has carried the entire performance and given what little satisfaction has been had from it. None of the other people of the Surprise Party appear to half the advantage that they did on the small stage, and with the warm and cosy surroundings of the little Standard Theatre. Alice Atherton was hoarse to a painful degree, and though she attempted to make up for the loss of voice in sprightliness of action, the audience barked out their sympathy for her uncovered arms, and sneezed through the same breeze that swept about the well filled maroon tights. Some of the chorus were so thoroughly cornered by the cold that they could not sing at all, and the lithe and limbo pages had to blanket themselves like so many Pious squaws every opportunity they had to get within the wings. Christmas afternoon and evening, however, Revels had tremendous audiences, not even a bit of standing-room left, and the piece was cut, to its visible improvement; but it can not be classed as a success, for it is not of that merit that will draw a person the second time to see it. There are but one or two good scenes, and the best of them—the transformation and corridor setting—is familiar to everybody that has seen the Black Crook at the California. From a musical point of view Revels is a potpourri of stolen music, and bad stealing at that. It has not even the humorous features of lost Evangelina, the magnificent spectacular failure of a year ago; and its whole moral effect is, or at least ought to be, to make the Surprise Party, or any combination or company that has to interpret the alleged Rice music and librettos, keep themselves on a small stage and close to their audiences, and then they will be appreciated. Distance lends no enchantment to a leg review. At Baldwin's things were conducted a little differently, and then was the added advantage of a comfortable place to sit, and warmth and color in the surroundings. Not Guilty is another English spectacle, but one that has at least the merit of a plot, and the possibility of being understood. It was announced on the programmes as "a grand musical, military, dramatic, and spectacular drama." Its musical feature was a failure, and might with profit be immediately discontinued. Its military were well dressed, well manoeuvred, and inspiring. The dramatic element possessed some considerable strength; its humor quiet, agreeable, and not so badly strained, and its spectacular impression and effects limited only by the cramped stage area. It is by far the most attractive and interesting bill of the holidays. It is put on the stage in a manner that is highly creditable to the taste of the stage manager and the talent of the scenic artist. Each scene is a picture, not overdrawn, nor incongruous, nor absurd, but as realistic as stage illustration and action will permit. It is rarely that one sees a piece of this description and extravagance of detail so artistically and satisfactorily managed. It is a pleasure to mention a performance so well presented. Not Guilty was as well cast as it was artistically mounted. Herne, as "Joe Triggs," and Bishop, as "Jack Snipe," gave as neat bits of character sketching and quiet flashes of humor as one need to demand or expect. Morrison did the villain and the counterfeit presentment business creditable to his countenance. Rose Wood was a sweet little thing who had a first rate chance to starve to death but for the bread that got poor O'Neill, as "Robert Arnold," into the quarry with a really becoming striped suit on. As a matter of course Not Guilty had its ridiculous as well as its realistic situations. It was simply absurd to mix the modern hoodlum up with the soldiers, and residents, and architecture of an old English village. The procession of boys, with paper caps and toy drums, was out of place. The sputter of firecrackers in a barrel did not sound altogether like the rattle of musketry, nor the knocking in of the drum head like the boom of distant cannon. The charge of the Cameron Cadets was full of life and smoke, but strange in the fact that in the teeth of that murderous fire, face to face, not a Sepoy nor a Cameron Cadet fell, and that the battle raged fiercely till the time came for the curtain to fall, when the Sepoys piled up in a swath of destruction, dead to a man, and not a smiling Highlander the less, not a smirch of the pretty kilts, not a rent in the plaid hose, covering the tights which Highland laddies do not wear, vide the muscular shins of the pipers. But the girls looked pretty in the march, and stepped as short as women generally do, and found their hips too wide for the manual of arms, and altogether made a very creditable and a pretty picture—enthusing the gallery to its highest: applauding pitch. The piece has drawn well from the start, and the Christmas rush was something extraordinary. At the California we have had Chanfrau in the threadbare Octoroon, put in a "Moonlight on the Canebrake" holiday dress by Voegtlin to fill out the present week, and then the Florences are to follow with The Mighty Dollar that we are all so loth to part with at the theatre door. These, with the Hart variety performance at the Standard, makes up our holiday budget, such as it is. It is nothing very gorgeous, hardly up to the attractiveness of other seasons, and of so doubtful a quality that few of the bills will survive the beginning of the new year. But when these spectacles, have faded away, and the leg brigade are nursing their consumption and catarrh and rheumatism, and managers are figuring up the account of profit and loss, there will come something else to attract the curious moth to the dramatic candle; and patiently and innocently awaiting it, I am just able to subscribe myself, yours, for "positively the last time" this year, BETSY B.

The following is told of one of the speakers the night before the recent election in New Hampshire: The orator, while in his speech, reached a point where he was depicting the results to the country if certain measures should become a part of the law of the land. Said the speaker: "If this should occur the country would—would—" Here the orator paused for the right word to come to the point. On the instant, a man in the rear, near the door of the hall, shouted out: "What, for heaven's sake, what?" to which the speaker instantly replied: "If my friend will come around to the hotel after the meeting is over, I will tell him confidentially," and then went on with his accustomed fluency.

"Do you think," writes a young student of human economy, "do you think the human race is decaying?" Not at all, not at all. Part of it isn't decaying because it is yet alive, and the portion of it that is dead doesn't decay because the medical student don't give it a chance. Oh, no, the human race was never, in all its history, so well protected against decay as at present. Be thankful that you live in an age when the grave has been so shorn of its power that it can't hold a man so long as a sieve would hold a spoonful of quicksilver.

A Norwich bank cashier has a valuable family dog, which he has been boarding in the country until a few days ago, when he introduced it to his city home. When the dog was last seen he was a close second behind the family cat, which was traveling through the lace curtains of his parlor windows—a lost planet looking for space. Result, five dollars' worth of damaged curtains, a demoralized cat, and a dog that is gone but not forgotten.

Biddy (to old gent)—Please help a poor woman with seven small children, all to— Good-natured old gent (who knows her)—Yes, but I say, don't you think your family increased rather too rapidly? Last week it was only five (Biddy, not a bit abashed)—Sure and isn't it all the more reason why yer honor should help me again?

A Seymour (Indiana) man picked up a stick of cordwood the other night and chased a cat across the back yard. He didn't catch the cat, but he caught the clothes-line with his teeth, and now when he smiles the corners of his mouth pass each other at the back of his neck.

Last winter Dr. Sackett, of Chester, Connecticut, made a violin of thousand and fifty pieces of wood. We always thought there should be about two thousand and fifty pieces in most of the fiddles we ever listened to.

Connecticut boasts of a girl that sleeps standing up. She ought to marry that Rochester man who puts his umbrella to bed and stands himself behind the door—provided there is room for two behind the door.

Mereer—"Stockings, miss? Yes, miss. What number, miss, do you—" Matter-of-Fact Young Lady—"Why, two, of course. Do you think I've got a wooden leg?"

The finest work at lowest prices at Boyd's Yosemite Art Gallery, 26 Montgomery Street.

A CRYSTAL PALACE.

A long-needed want of the elite has been filled by a New York gentleman, who has opened a magnificent store at 31 Kearny Street, the Gem Candy Emporium. Delicious candies, exceeding anything heretofore in this city, are offered at very reasonable prices. Marshmallows from the celebrated Whitman of Philadelphia. Opera and chocolate caramels, in quality which heretofore could only be found at Maillard's, New York. Elegant bonbon boxes, etc. This is the only candy store in the city which is closed every Sunday.

Great reduction in photographs at Boyd's Yosemite Art Gallery, 26 Montgomery Street.

BOSTON DRESS REFORM.

California "Worth" Princess Suits, Skirts, and detachable Flounces; Cashmere and Merino Union Suits for ladies and children; ladies' and misses' shoulder-brace Corsets; Abdominal Corsets. No. 430 Sutter Street. A. W. BAKER, the only Dress Reform Agent in the city.

Decker Bro.'s Pianos, the leading piano of the world, at Kobler & Chase's, 137 and 139 Post St.

Children's pictures a specialty at Boyd's Yosemite Art Gallery, 26 Montgomery Street.

Try E. H. Hubbard's Parisian Cream for the complexion. 923 Market Street.

Mrs. Parker, of the Ladies' Depository, has opened a new store at 126 Post Street. Dolls dressed in all styles. New Lace Patterns.

The finest candies in the city are to be had at the Clarendon, 213 Kearny Street, of Love & Goldstein. Try them.

The finest French and purest home-made candies found at Vogele's, 915 Market Street, between Fifth and Sixth.

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER.
F. LUSTER.....ACTING MANAGER.
G. R. CHIPMAN.....TREASURER

CHRISTMAS HOLIDAYS.

Immense success of the grand musical, military, dramatic, and spectacular Christmas piece,

NOT GUILTY.

The whole of the GREAT COMPANY in the cast.

THIS (SATURDAY) EVENING, December 28th, and until further notice.

The Cameron Cadets in full Highland Costume. Highland Pipers, Drum Corps, and Military Music on the Stage. The Revolt of the Convicts. Embarkation of her Majesty's Troops for India. Grand Battle Scene—the Relief of Bhurtpoor. Magnificent English and Oriental Scenery, by Dayton. A full Operatic Force of Eighty Voices. A largely increased Band. Gorgeous and Correct Costumes.

Holiday Matinees New Year's Day, and every Saturday at two o'clock.

CALIFORNIA THEATRE.

BARTON & LAWLOR.....MANAGERS.
BARTON HILL.....ACTING MANAGER.

NEW YEAR'S WEEK.

Monday Evening, December 30th, the incomparable artists, MR. AND MRS.

W. J. FLORENCE,

Who will appear as "Hon. Bardwell Slote" and "Mrs. General Gifford," in

THE MIGHTY DOLLAR.

Special engagement of the California favorite, MISS

ALICE HARRISON,

As "Libby Dear."

Beautiful Scenery, Costly Dresses, Elegant Appointments, and a Brilliant Cast.

NEW YEAR'S MATINEE ON WEDNESDAY.

USUAL MATINEE SATURDAY.

27 Seats may now be secured.

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LOCKE.....PROPRIETOR.

At the Matinee to-day; also to-night and to-morrow night, the greatest success of the Oates Opera Season,

HER MAJESTY'S SHIP PINAFORE.

"Good-bye, Sweetheart." A real ship, manned by real sailors—real cannon—the most realistic production ever presented in San Francisco.

Next week the last week of

THE OATES ENGLISH COMIC OPERA COMPANY.

H. M. S. PINAFORE.

Monday, January 6th, CALLENDER'S

ORIGINAL GEORGIA MINSTRELS

STANDARD THEATRE.

Bush Street, between Montgomery and Kearny.

LESSEE AND MANAGER.....M. A. KENNEDY.
BUSINESS MANAGER.....P. H. KIRBY.
TREASURER.....C. S. WALTON.

This (Saturday) afternoon, Dec. 28th, grand Ladies Matinee.

MATINEE TO-DAY AT 2 P. M.

This evening, Dec. 28th—

MR. JOSH HART

And his

NOVELTY COMPANY.

LAST WEEK BUT ONE! LAST WEEK BUT ONE!

Entire change of programme and positively last week of

JOSH HART'S

GREAT SPECIALTY COMPANY.

GRAND OPERA HOUSE,

Mission Street, between Third and Fourth.

JOHN TORRENCE & Co.....MANAGERS.

REVELS

HAPPY NEW YEAR!

REVELS

Monday, December 30, 1878, every evening at 8 (including Sunday). Also, New Year's and Saturday Matinees at 2.

REVELS

SECOND WEEK

REVELS

And enormous success of

REVELS

RICE'S SURPRISE PARTY

REVELS

In the new grand

REVELS

COMIC BURLESQUE EXTRAVAGANZA

REVELS

With

REVELS

SPECTACULAR EFFECTS.

REVELS

REVELS! REVELS!

METROPOLITAN TEMPLE,

Fifth Street, bet. Market and Mission.

PRESENTATION ENTERTAINMENT,

Wednesday afternoon and evening, Jan. 1, 1879.

TWO HUNDRED GIFTS VALUED AT $2,000.

A HAPPY NEW YEAR

.....AT.....

BILLINGS,
HARBOURNE & CO.

The largest collection of Standard Works of Fiction, History, Travel, Biography, Poetry, and General Literature, in Fine Library Binding.

ILLUSTRATED GALLERIES,

Bound in half and full morocco.

JUVENILES,

In sets and separate volumes.

Bibles, Prayer-Books, and Hymnals, Games, Toy Books, etc., etc.

RUSSIA LEATHER

Writing Desks, Portmonnaies, Portfolios, Jewelry Cases, Work Boxes, Lunch Boxes, Music Rolls, etc. Photograph Albums, Stamp and Autograph Albums, and

ELEGANT STATIONERY,

Embracing the newest styles of Wedding, Corresponding, Visiting and Menu Cards.

Copper Plate Engraving and Printing a Specialty.

BILLINGS, HARBOURNE &amp; CO.,

BOOKSELLERS AND STATIONERS,

NO. 3 MONTGOMERY STREET.

MARBLEIZED
IRON MANTELS.

IN ELEGANCE OF DESIGN, QUALITY of finish, and durability of polish, they are every way superior to slate or marble. In point of economy, also, they cost very much less, are stronger, and certainly far more durable than either.

ALL SIZES AND STYLES

ENAMELED GRATES.

FRENCH COOKING

RANGES

All sizes, suitable for Hotels, Restaurants, Families, and Boarding-Houses.

W. W. MONTAGUE &amp; CO.

NOS. 110, 112, 114, 118, &amp; 120 BATTERY ST.

GROVER & BAKER SEWING AND Embroidering SILKS, Pure Dye, Full Weight. To the trade and at retail. J. W. EVANS, 29 Post Street.

R. P. &amp; H. N. CLEMENT,

ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW,

Nos. 2, 3, and 4 SHERMAN BUILDING,

Montgomery Street, N. E. corner of Clay, San Francisco (P. O. Box 707.)

DIAMONDS.

The most attractive assortment of

DIAMONDS, WATCHES, JEWELRY, ETC.,

And Novelties, for the selection of wedding and other presents, at

GEO. C. SHREVE &amp; CO.'S,

110 MONTGOMERY STREET.

W. K. VANDERSLICE &amp; CO.

NO. 136 SUTTER STREET.

IMMENSE REDUCTION
IN SILVERWARE.

SOLID STERLING SILVER SPOONS AND FORKS,

Of our own manufacture, at $1.40 per oz.,

THIS BEING MUCH LOWER THAN THEY EVER HAVE BEEN SOLD.

DIAMONDS, WATCHES, JEWELRY, AT LOWEST RATES.

DIAMONDS OF RARE PERFECTION

In single stones, and carefully matched pairs, set and unset.

EMERALDS, RUBIES, AND SAPPHIRES,

AND OTHER PRECIOUS STONES.

WATCHES, JEWELRY, AND SILVERWARE

AT UNEXCEPTIONABLY LOW RATES.

BRAVERMAN &amp; LEVY,

119 MONTGOMERY STREET.

JOHN E. QUINN,

1400 POLK STREET, CORNER OF PINE,

THE LEADING, ONE PRICE FANCY GOODS STORE OF WESTERN Addition. A full line of

First Class Fancy Goods, Dress Trimmings, Kid Gloves, Holiday Gifts, Notions, etc., etc.

I do not advertise to give my goods away as many do, but will, and do, sell them at the lowest market prices.

Open Evenings.

THE ARGONAUT,

A Political, Satirical, and Society Journal, published every Saturday, at 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.

FRANK M. PIXLEY,
FRED. M. SOMERS,

EDITORS.

The ARGONAUT is essentially a Californian publication—bright, breezy of the Pacific, and the medium of the good things of current literature. Sent, post paid, to any address on receipt of $4.00, the yearly subscription price.

THE ARGONAUT PUBLISHING COMPANY,

A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

522 California Street.

DECKER BROS PIANOS ARE THE

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP CO.

First-class steamers with unequalled accommodations for passengers will leave San Francisco:

FOR YOKOHAMA AND HONGKONG,
On the 1st of every month.

FOR SYDNEY AND AUCKLAND, via HONOLULU,
January 20, February 17, March 17, April 14, May 12, June 9, July 7, August 4, September 1, September 29, October 27, November 24, December 22, and every fourth week thereafter.

FOR NEW YORK, via PANAMA, CENTRAL AMERICAN, MEXICAN, and SOUTH AMERICAN PORTS, HAVANA, and all WEST INDIA PORTS, on the 5th and 20th of each month.

FOR VICTORIA, B. C., PUGET SOUND PORTS, and PORTLAND, Oregon, on the 10th, 20th, and 30th of each month.

WILLIAMS, BLANCHARD & CO., Agents,
Corner First and Brannan Streets.

INDEPENDENT LINE

—FOR—

ASTORIA AND PORTLAND, OREGON.

The Splendid Low-pressure, Side Wheel American Steamship

GREAT REPUBLIC,

3882 TONS,

JAMES CARROLL, Commandant

Will sail from Spear Street wharf, for the above ports,
On SATURDAY, Dec. 28, at 10 A. M.

Steerage Passage ..... $2 00
Cabin Passage ..... 7 00
In Bridal Rooms ..... 10 00
Freight ..... at Lowest Rates

FREIGHT RECEIVED DAILY.

For freight or passage apply at the office on Spear Street wharf. Tickets also for sale at No. 3 New Montgomery Street, under Grand Hotel.

P. B. CORNWALL.

OFFICE OF THE CALIFORNIA

Mining Company, San Francisco, Dec. 26, 1878.—The annual meeting of the stockholders of the California Mining Company will be held at the office of the Company, No. 23 Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, on Wednesday, January fifteenth, 1879, at one o'clock P. M., for the election of a Board of Directors for the ensuing year, and for the transaction of such other business as may properly come before the meeting. Transfer books will be closed from January 4th until January 17th.

C. F. GORDON, Secretary.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

MATHA A. SHORE, plaintiff, vs. NELSON A. SHORE, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to Nelson A. Shore, defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony heretofore and now existing between the plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is hereby made—that the care, custody, and control of the minor children, issue of said marriage, be awarded to plaintiff—and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 7th day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk,
By W. STEVENSON, Deputy.
[SEAL]
SAWYER & BALL, No. 502 Montgomery Street, Attorneys for Plaintiff.

ASSESSMENT NOTICE.

THE DEL REY SILVER MINING COMPANY.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Silver City, Lyon County, State of Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Trustees, held on the 11th day of December, 1878, an assessment (No. 3) of two (2) cents per share was levied on the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary or Treasurer, at the office of the Company, No. 7 Montgomery Avenue, Room 24, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the twenty-ninth day of January, 1879, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction; and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on WEDNESDAY, the nineteenth day of February, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

SAM'L A. CHAPIN, Secretary.
Office—No. 7 Montgomery Avenue, Room 24, San Francisco, California.

LEE D. CRAIG,

Notary Public and Commissioner
of Deeds.

TAKING OF DEPOSITIONS, Searching of Records, Conveyancing, and the incorporating of Mining Companies, specialties.

No. 600 MONTGOMERY STREET, N. E. CORNER OF CLAY, SAN FRANCISCO.

227 Successor to F. V. Scudder.

BEST KOHLER & CHASE
SAN FRANCISCO
& O. K.

PHOENIX.

Translated from the Swedish.

In Paradise, under the Tree of Wisdom, grew a hedge of roses; here, in the first rose, a bird was born. His flight was like that of light; his color was beautiful, and his song glorious. But when Eve broke of the Tree of Wisdom—when she and Adam were driven from the garden of Paradise, a spark from the flaming sword of the Angel of Punishment fell into the nest and burnt it. The bird died in the flames; but from the red egg there grew a new bird, Phoenix.

It is an old tradition that Phoenix lives in Arabia, and every hundred years burns himself and his nest; while, from the red egg, flies a new bird, the only Phoenix in the world.

The bird hovers around us, swift as light, of beautiful color, and with a glorious voice. When the mother sits by her baby's cradle, he is near the pillow and beats with his wings a crown of glory around the child's head. He flies through the cottage where content reigns and brings sunshine with him. But the bird Phoenix is not alone Arabia's bird. He flutters in the northern light on Lapland's ice plains; he flits about among the yellow flowers in Greenland's short summers. Under Babylon's copper cliffs, in England's coal mines, he flies in the shape of a moth over the psalter in the hands of the pious workman. He sails on a lotus-leaf down the Ganges' holy waters, and the Hindoo-girl's eye glances when she sees him.

The bird Phoenix! Do you not know him? The Bird of Paradise—song's holy swan! On the chariot of Thetis he sat as a caving raven, and beat his black wings; over the Icelandic singer's harp glided the swan's red, ringing beak; like Odin's raven, he was perched on Shakespeare's shoulder and whispered "Immortality!" during the concert, he flew through Wartburg's hall of knights. He sang for you the Marseillaise, and you kissed the feather that dropped from his wing.

Bird of Paradise! renewed every hundredth year, fed in flames, dying in flames, thy image made in gold hangs in the halls of the rich; whilst thou often roamest, lost and alone, one myth only, the Phoenix of Arabia. In Paradise, when thou wert born in the first rose under the Tree of Wisdom, our Father kissed thee, and gave thee thy right name—Phoenix.

Dead Lions.

What good looks are to women, reputation and influence are to men. The masculine equivalent is surrendered not less reluctantly than the feminine possession. There is the same rebellion against the inevitable decree of malignant Fate when the fatal hour strikes, and the finger of Destiny traces the legend Ichabod. The wicked Lord Lyttelton put back the hand of the clock, and thought he had "jockeyed the ghost." But there was no preventing the intrusion of the unwelcome presence. Habent sua fata libelli; the lot of the writers of books is harsher than that of the books themselves, for the book very often lives when the author is forgotten, and admiring readers frequently fail to identify the commonplace middle-aged gentleman, whom they meet occasionally at dinner, with the creator of the fancies which delight them and the sayer of the sage things whence they have derived wisdom. Men may thus gather some idea of what posthumous fame is like even in their own lifetime. Years ago they have given to the world a book which has cast its germinating seeds far and wide. It is a book that belongs to what De Quincy has called the literature of power. It has resulted in the establishment of what is in its way a school. But the disciples ignore their master, and a careless and oblivious generation have lost sight of master in the disciples. Fame and power are the most evanescent essences, and the recipe for permanently imprisoning them in the individual has still to be found. The plenipotentiary dictator of society, or science, or journalism has hut to drop out of the running for ever so little, and the place which he once filled will know him no more. He will wander about, the shadow of his former self, the pale reflection of the authority that he used to wield. The great houses where he once was an almost daily guest are open to him at infrequent intervals. A marvelling company no longer hangs upon his slightest utterances. He relapses into a melancholy silence, and his thoughts take on a sadly sombre hue. Fama, he acknowledges, must be his motto. The new generation is pressing on. He recognizes, not, perhaps, without a muttered anathema, that he is being shelved. Such is humanity's heritage. Was there ever a nation in any period of pagan idolatry who worshipped the setting sun?

A gentleman who had patented a new religion deemed it necessary to quicken and confirm the faith of his proselytes by whooping them up a few miles, and accordingly announced that he would fly over a deep and wide ravine. A vast multitude assembled on the appointed day, and he thus addressed them: "I dearly beloved brethren, in order that I should perform the miracle which will now be presented for your intelligent appreciation, it is absolutely necessary that I should be supported by your faith as well as my own. This is an occasion where I can not rely on my faith alone. Do you, therefore, believe that by miraculous agencies I can fly over this vast abyss?"

"We do."

"Then, dearly beloved brethren, there is no need of my flying across and wasting a miracle."

His bootmaker brought him a number five and a quarter foot to go on a number six and a half foot, and the process of trying it on convinced him of the tortures he would have to undergo in what Shakespeare has called "the timing of the shoe."

"Too small," he says, "they hurt."

"Hurt?" he says, "they hurt?" They can't hurt. I made em myself from measurements I took myself, and they must be a roomy fit."

"But they do hurt."

"How in heaven do you know anything about it? Are you a shoemaker?" What experience have you had, anyhow?

There is a superstition which is religiously observed in Bohemia, that it is an unway for a lover to visit his sweetheart except on Tuesdays and Sundays. The young women are thus enabled to get five nights' sleep every week, which helps preserve their beauty for years.

Why should we look one common faith to find, Where one in every score is color-blind? For 'tis on earth they know not red from green, And 'tis the better into things unseen.

—H. M.

MUSIC BOXES

OF ALL DESCRIPTIONS AND OF Standard Reputation, playing from one to over one hundred airs. The largest and best assortment in this city. MUSICAL BOXES WITH CHANGEABLE CYLINDERS always on hand. New and interesting styles constantly received. Call and examine our stock. REPAIRING OF MUSICAL BOXES thoroughly done in all their particularities.

M. J. PAILLARD & CO.,
MANUFACTURERS AND IMPORTERS,

120 Sutter Street, San Francisco.

Branch of House, 530 Broadway, New York.

O. F. WILLEY &amp; CO.

IMPORTERS AND MANUFACTURERS OF

FINE CARRIAGES &amp; WAGONS

No. 427 MONTGOMERY ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

Agents for the sale of Wagons manufactured by
BREWSTER & CO., New York,

W. D. ROGERS, Philadelphia,

C. S. CAFFREY, Camden, N. J.,

WOOD BROTHERS, New York,

H. KILLAM &amp; CO., New Haven,

COOLING BROS., Wilmington

ALSO, AGENTS FOR

HARNESS MANUFACTURED BY WOOD GIBSON,
TOMPKINS & MANDEVILLE, AND
A. H. DUNSCOMB.

Also, a fine assortment of Robes, Blankets, Nets, Whips, etc.

USEFUL
HOLIDAY PRESENTS

MULLER'S
OPTICAL DEPOT,

135 Montgomery Street,

Near Bush.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

MAGGIE WHEELER, plaintiff, vs. GIRAD B. H. WHEELER, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to GIRAD B. H. WHEELER, defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service), after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise, within forty days—judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony existing between the plaintiff and defendant, on the grounds of failure to provide the plaintiff with the common necessities of life, and extreme cruelty to said plaintiff, by the defendant, and that the said plaintiff be allowed to resume her maiden name, to wit: Maggie Saunders, as will more fully appear in the plaintiff's complaint herein, to which reference is hereto expressly made.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded. Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this twenty-fifth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-eight.

By W. STEVENSON, Deputy Clerk.

THOMAS H. WILSON, Attorneys for Plaintiff.

HILL &amp; NORCROSS SILVER MINING COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Directors, held on the tenth (10th) day of December, 1878, an assessment (No. 36) of one dollar ($1) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 15, Nevada Block, northwest corner Pine and Montgomery Streets, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the fifteenth (15th) day of January, 1879, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on Monday, the seventh day of February, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

JOEL F. LIGHTNER, Secretary.
Office—Room 15, Nevada Block, northwest corner Pine and Montgomery Streets, San Francisco, California.

GEO. W. FRESCOTT. IRVING M. SCOTT. H. T. SCOTT.

UNION IRON WORKS

(Founded 1849.) Post Office Box 2128.

COR. FIRST AND MISSION STREETS,
SAN FRANCISCO

MANUFACTURERS OF

Compressed Engines,
Air Compressors,
Rock Drills,
Portable Hoisting Engines,
Marine Stationary and Portable Boilers
Baby Hoist, complete.

CONSTANTLY ON HAND AND FOR SALE.

Direct-acting Pumping and Hoisting Engines,
Upright and Stationary Engines,
Joints, Grinding and Amalgamating Machinery,
Blake's Rock Breakers,
Smelting Furnaces,
Quicksilver Pumps,
Chloroziding Furnaces,
Cornish Pumps,
Steam Pumps.

All manufactured by us of the best materials, design, and workmanship, and furnished at lower rates than by Eastern manufacturers.

FRESCOTT, SCOTT &amp; CO.

THE LAST SENSATION!

"THE SOCIETY IN SEARCH OF Truth: or, Stock Gambling in San Francisco." A Novel, in Forty-four Chapters, by

I. F. CLARK,

A former member of the Pacific Stock Exchange. Now ready. Read it.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—INDIAN

Queen Mining and Milling Company, Room 69 Nevada Block, San Francisco, December 16, 1878.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company held this day, dividend No. 4 of Twenty-five (25) cents per share was declared, payable on Friday, December 17, 1878.

ALFRED K. DUREBROW, Secretary.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF

The Eureka Consolidated Mining Company, Nevada Block, Room 37, San Francisco, December 16, 1878.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company, held this day, a dividend (No. 38) of three dollars per share was declared, payable on Friday, December 20, 1878. Transfer books closed until December 21st.

W. W. TRAYLOR, Secretary.

ARIZONA SILVER MINING COMpany.—Location of works, Unionville, Humboldt County, State of Nevada. Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the ninth (9th) day of December, 1878, an assessment (No. 4) of one dollar ($1) per share was levied on the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 15, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on Monday, the thirteenth (13th) day of January, 1879, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on Monday, the third (3rd) day of February, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

WILLIAM WILLIS, Secretary.
Office—Room No. 29, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

SILVER MINING COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the fourth (4th) day of December, 1878, an assessment (No. 36) of one dollar per share, was levied on the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 15, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the seventh (7th) day of January, 1879, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on Monday, the twenty-seventh day of January, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

E. HOLMES, Secretary.
Office, Room 15, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

IZETA GOODHUE, plaintiff vs. STEPHEN GOODHUE, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to STEPHEN GOODHUE, defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise, within forty days—judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now and heretofore existing between plaintiff and defendant upon the grounds set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which special reference is hereby made, and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded therein.

Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 14th day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-eight.

THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.
By J. H. PICHES, Deputy Clerk.
WOODS & COFFEY, Attorneys for Plaintiff.

CALIFORNIA FARMERS' MUTUAL

Fire Insurance Company

[ESTABLISHED IN 1874.]

Paid up Capital .....$200,000
Assets exceed..... 326,000

PRINCIPAL OFFICE 209 SANSOME ST.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

THOS. FLINT, President.

FERR. K. RULE .....Secretary.
I. G. GARDNER..... General Agent.

COMMERCIAL INSURANCE COMPANY OF CALA,

FIRE AND MARINE.

Principal office, 405 California Street, San Francisco.

JOHN H. WISE, President.

CHAS. A. LATON, Secretary.

THE STATE INVESTMENT

—AND—

INSURANCE COMPANY, FIRE AND MARINE

CASH ASSETS.....$450,000

Principal Office, 218 and 220 Sansome Street, San Francisco

OFFICERS:

A. J. BRYANT, President,

RICHARD IVERS, Vice-President,

CHAS. H. CUSHING, Secretary,

H. H. WATSON, Marine Surveyor

JOE POHEIM

The Tailor,

203 Montgomery St. and 103 Third Street, under the Russ House, near Bush Street, has just received a large assortment of the latest style goods. Suits to order from .....$20
Pants to order from ..... 5
Overcoats to order from ..... 15

The leading question is where the best goods can be found at the lowest prices. The answer is at

JOE POHEIM,
203 Montgomery St. and 103 Third St.

Samples and Rules for Self-Measurement sent free to any address. Fit guaranteed.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF

THE CALIFORNIA MINING CO., San Francisco, Dec. 17th, 1878. At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named Company, held this day, a Dividend (No. 39) of One ($1) Dollar per share was declared, payable on Monday, December 16, 1878.

C. P. GORDON, Secretary.

THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE

stockholders of the Consolidated Virginia Mining Company will be held at the office of the Company, No. 26 Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, in this city, on THURSDAY, the ninth day of January, 1879, at one o'clock P. M., for the election of a Board of Trustees to serve for the ensuing year, and for the transaction of such other business as may properly come before the meeting. Transfer books will close Saturday, December 28, 1878, at twelve o'clock noon.

A. W. HAVENS, Secretary.
SAN FRANCISCO, December 15, 1878.

GOULD &amp; CURRY SILVER MINING

Company.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 18th day of November, 1878, an assessment (No. 34) of one dollar and fifty cents ($1 50) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately, in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 69, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 23rd day of December, 1878, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on THURSDAY, the fourteenth day of January, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with cost of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors.

ALFRED K. DUREBROW, Secretary.
Office—Room 69, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

CROWN POINT GOLD AND SILVER

Mining Company.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Gold Hill, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 12th day of December, 1878, an assessment (No. 36) of one dollar ($1) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 10, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the sixteenth (16th) day of January, 1879, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on THURSDAY, the sixth day of February, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

JAMES NEWLANDS, Secretary.
Office—203 Bush Street, Room 10, Cosmopolitan Hotel, San Francisco, California.

FRENCH SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY.

411 BUSH STREET, ABOVE KEARNEY, SAN FRANCISCO.

G. MAHE, Director.

WAKELEE'S AUREOLINE

PRODUCES THE BEAUTIFUL Golden Hair so much admired. Superior to the imported article by reason of its freshness and the care used in its production.

PRICE, LARGE BOTTLES, $2.

Manufactured by

H. P. WAKELEE & CO.,
DRUGGISTS,

Corner Montgomery and Bush Streets, San Francisco.

ALASKA COMMERCIAL CO.

No. 310 SANSOME STREET,

WHOLESALE DEALER IN FURS.

J. C. MERRILL & CO.

SHIPPING

—AND—

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Agents for the

SANDWICH ISLANDS AND OREGON PACKET LINES.

204 AND 206 CALIFORNIA ST. - - San Francisco.

NEWTON BOOTH, C. T. WHEELER, Sacramento,
J. T. GLOVER, W. W. DODGE, San Francisco

W. W. DODGE & CO.,

WHOLESALE GROCERS,

Northwest corner Clay and Front Streets, San Francisco.

RARE ENGRAVINGS AND ETCHINGS,

CHRISTMAS, 1878.

JUST RECEIVED, A LARGE COLLECTION of fine Engravings specially purchased in Italy for the Christmas trade. Nothing can be more appropriate for a holiday or wedding present than a fine Engraving, which is suitable for home decoration and at the same time rare. W. K. VICKERY would respectfully invite an inspection of his Engravings and their prices.

Please note address—22 Montgomery Street, opposite the Lick House.

OPEN IN THE EVENING.

REDINGTON'S FLAVORING EXTRACTS

ARE THE PERFECTLY PURE and highly concentrated Extracts of

FRESH FRUITS

Prepared with great care. They are put up in superior style, in a bottle holding twice as much as ordinary brands of Extracts.

Comparing quality and contents, none other are nearly so cheap.

Wherever tested on their merits, they have been adopted in preference to all others, and now are the

STANDARD FLAVORING EXTRACTS

Of the Pacific coast. Dealers will find them to give better satisfaction to the consumers than any other kind and are respectfully requested to give them a trial.

REDINGTON & CO.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

RUPTURE.

BUY NO TRUSS

Until you see what has been accomplished by DR. PIERCE'S late invention.

Call, or send for New Illustrated Book. Prices reduced.

MAGNETIC ELASTIC TRUSS

CO., 609 Sacramento Street, San Francisco.

MILLER & RICHARD,

SOLE MAKERS OF

EXTRA-HARD METAL SCOTCH TYPE.

SPECIAL AGENTS FOR

THE CAMPBELL, HOE, AND PEERLESS PRESSES.

No. 529 COMMERCIAL STREET.
And 205 Leidesdorff Street, San Francisco.

WINTER ARRANGEMENT,

COMMENCING MONDAY, NOV. 18, 1878.

Passenger trains will leave San Francisco, from Passenger Depot on Townsend Street, between Third and Fourth, as follows:

8.30 A. M. DAILY for San Jose, Gilroy, Hollister, Tres Pinos, Pajaro, Salinas, Siledad, and All Way Stations. At Pajaro, the Santa Cruz R. R. connects with this train for Aptos and Santa Cruz. At Salinas the M. & S. V. R. R. connects with this train for Monterey. Stage connections made with this train.

10.40 A. M. DAILY for San Jose and Way Stations.

3.30 P. M. DAILY (Sundays excepted) for Gilroy, and Way Stations.

4.40 P. M. DAILY for San Jose and Way Stations.

6.30 P. M. DAILY for Menlo Park and Way Stations.

The extra Sunday train to San Jose and Way Stations is discontinued for the Winter season.

EXCURSION TICKETS to San Jose and intermediate points and return sold on Saturdays and Sunday mornings. Good for return until following MONDAY, inclusive.

A. C. BASSETT, H. K. JUDAH,
Superintendent. Asst. Pass. & Tkt. Agt.

SOUTHERN DIVISIONS.

Passengers for points on the Southern Divisions of the road will take the cars of the Central Pacific Railroad via OAKLAND, leaving SAN FRANCISCO via Ferry Landing, Market Street, at 4.00 P. M. daily, and making close connection at GOSHEN for Sumner, Mohave, LOS ANGELES, Wilmington, Anaheim, Colton, Colorado River, and YUMA.

SAN FRANCISCO AND NORTH PACIFIC R. R.

Commencing Monday, November 11, 1878, and until further notice, Boats and Trains will leave San Francisco: (Ticket Office, Washington Street Wharf.)

3.00 P. M., DAILY, Sundays included, Steamer "James M. Donahue" (Washington Street Wharf), connecting with Mail and Express Train at Donahue for Petaluma, Santa Rosa, Healdsburg, Cloverdale, and way stations. Making stage connection at Lakeview for Sonoma; at Geyserville for Skaggs Springs, at Cloverdale for Ukiah, Lakeport, Mendocino City, and the GEYSERS.

Connections made at Fulton on the following morning for Korbels, Guerneville, and the Redwoods (Sundays excepted). (Arrive at San Francisco 10.30 A. M.)

Freight received from 7 A. M. to 2.30 P. M. daily (except Sunday).

TICKET OFFICE, WASHINGTON STREET WHARF.

ARTHUR HUGHES, Gen. Manager. A. A. BEAN, Supt.
P. E. DOUGHERTY, Gen. Pass. and Tkt. Agent.

OCCIDENTAL AND ORIENTAL STEAMSHIP COMPANY

—FOR—

JAPAN AND CHINA,

Leave Wharf, Cor. First and Brannan Streets, at noon, for YOKOHAMA AND HONGKONG.

Connecting at Yokohama with steamers for Shanghai,

GALICIA, OCEANIC, BELGIC.

February ..... 18 | March ..... 15 | January ..... 16

May ..... 16 | April ..... 16

Cabin plans on exhibition and Passenger Tickets for sale at No. 2 Montgomery Street.

For freight apply to GEO. H. RICE, Freight Agent, at the Pacific Mail Steamship Company's Wharf, or No. 218 California Street.

T. H. GOODMAN, Gen'l Passenger Agent.

LELAND STANFORD, President.

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP CO.

First-class steamers with unequalled accommodations for passengers will leave San Francisco:

FOR YOKOHAMA AND HONGKONG, On the 1st of every month.

FOR SYDNEY AND AUCKLAND, via HONOLULU, November 25, and every fourth week thereafter.

FOR NEW YORK, via PANAMA, CENTRAL AMERICAN, MEXICAN, and SOUTH AMERICAN PORTS, HAVANA, and all WEST INDIA PORTS, on the 5th and 20th of each month.

FOR VICTORIA, B. C., PUGET SOUND PORTS, and PORTLAND, Oregon, on the 10th, 20th, and 30th of each month.

WILLIAMS, BLANCHARD & CO., Agents,
Corner First and Brannan Streets.

PACIFIC COAST STEAMSHIP CO.

Steamers of this Company will sail from Broadway wharf for PORTLAND (Oregon), every five days, direct, and for LOS ANGELES, SANTA BARBARA, SANTA CRUZ, SAN DIEGO, SAN LUIS OBISPO, and other Northern and Southern Coast Ports, leaving San Francisco about every third day.

For day and hour of sailing, see the Company's advertisement in the San Francisco daily papers.

TICKET OFFICE, No. 214 MONTGOMERY ST., NEAR PINE.

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO., Agents,
No. 10 Market Street, San Francisco.

CHAS. N. FOX.

M. B. KELLOGG.

FOX & KELLOGG,

ATTORNEYS AND COUNSELORS
AT LAW, San Francisco, Cal.

Office, No. 530 California Street, Rooms 1, 2, and 3.

FRANK KENNEDY,

ATTORNEY AT LAW, 604 MERCHANT STREET, Room 16. Probate divorce, bankruptcy, and all other cases attended to.

C. P. R. R.

COMMENCING TUESDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1878, and until further notice.

TRAINS AND BOATS

WILL LEAVE SAN FRANCISCO:

OVERLAND TICKET OFFICE AT FERRY LANDING, MARKET STREET.

7.00 A. M., DAILY, VALLEJO Steamer (from Market Street Landing), connecting with the trains for Napa (Stages for Sonoma), Calistoga (The Geysers), and Sacramento. Connecting at Davis (Sundays excepted) for Woodland and Knight's Landing, and at Woodland for Williams and Willows.

[Arrive San Francisco 8.10 P. M.]

7.00 A. M., DAILY, LOCAL Passenger Train (via Oakland Ferry and via Livermore), arriving at Tracy at 11.30 A. M., and connecting with Atlantic Express. Connects at Niles with train arriving at San Jose at 10.15 A. M. [Returning, train from Tracy arrives at 6.05 P. M.]

8.00 A. M., DAILY, ATLANTIC Express Train (via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R.) for Sacramento, Marysville, Redding (Portland, Or.) Colfax, Reno (Virginia City), Palisade (Eureka), Ogden, and Omaha. Connects at Galt with train arriving at Ione at 3.40 P. M.

SUNDAY EXCURSION TICKETS to SAN PABLO AND MARTINEZ AT REDUCED RATES.

10.00 A. M., DAILY, (VIA OAKLAND FERRY), Local Passenger Train to Haywards and Niles. [Arrive San Francisco 4.05 P. M.]

3.00 P. M., DAILY, SAN JOSE Passenger Train (via Oakland Ferry and Niles), stopping at all way stations. Arrive at San Jose at 5.20 P. M. [Arrive San Francisco at 9.15 A. M.]

3.00 P. M., DAILY, NORTHERN Railway Passenger Train (via Oakland Ferry) to San Pablo, Martinez, and Antioch.

[Arrive San Francisco 9.15 A. M.]

4.00 P. M., DAILY, SOUTHERN Express Train (via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R.), for Lathrop (and Stockton), Merced, Madera, Visalia, Sumner, Mojave, Newhall (San Buenaventura and Santa Barbara), Los Angeles, "Santa Monica," Wilmington, Santa Ana (San Diego), Colton, and Yuma (Arizona Stages and Colorado River Steamers). Sleeping cars between Oakland, Los Angeles, and Yuma. [Arrive San Francisco at 12.35 P. M.]

4.00 P. M., SUNDAYS EXCEPTED, Vallejo Steamer (from Market Street Landing), connecting with trains for Calistoga (The Geysers), Woodland, Knight's Landing, and Sacramento, and at Sacramento to passenger train, leaving at 9.35 P. M., for Truckee, Reno, Carson, and Virginia. Sleeping cars between Vallejo and Carson. [Arrive San Francisco 11.10 A. M.]

4.00 P. M., SUNDAYS EXCEPTED, Sacramento Steamer (from Washington Street Wharf) for Benicia and Landings on the Sacramento River. [Arrive San Francisco 8.00 P. M.]

4.00 P. M., DAILY, THROUGH Third Class and Accommodation Train, via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R., connecting at Lathrop with train arriving at Los Angeles on second day at 11.55 A. M. [Arrive San Francisco 9.05 A. M.]

4.30 P. M., DAILY, LOCAL Passenger train (via Oakland Ferry) to Haywards, Niles, and Livermore. [Arrive San Francisco 8.35 P. M.]

5.00 P. M., DAILY, OVERLAND Emigrant Train (via Oakland Ferry and Northern Railway), to Ogden, Omaha, and East. Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

FERRIES AND LOCAL TRAINS.

FROM SAN FRANCISCO, DAILY.

To Oakland.		To Alameda.	To Fernald.	To East Oakland.	To Niles.	To Berkeley.	To Delaware Street.
A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	A. M.	A. M.	A. M.	A. M.	A. M.
6.10	12.30	7.00	8.00	6.10	7.30	7.30	8.10
7.00	1.00	8.00	9.00	7.00	8.30	8.30	9.00
7.30	1.30	9.00	10.00	7.30	9.00	9.00	9.30
8.00	2.00	10.00	P. M.	8.00	9.30	10.30	10.00
8.30	2.30	11.00	8.50	9.30	4.30	11.30	12.00
9.00	3.00	12.00	.....	11.30	To San Jose.
9.30	3.30	P. M.	.....	12.30	7.30	1.00	3.30
10.00	4.00	1.30	.....	1.00	8.00	3.00	4.30
10.30	4.30	2.00	.....	1.00	8.30	4.00	5.30
11.00	5.00	3.00	.....	3.30	9.00	5.00	6.30
11.30	5.30	4.00	.....	4.30	9.30	5.30	.....
12.00	6.00	5.00	.....	5.00	10.00	6.00	.....
12.30	6.30	6.00	.....	6.30	10.30	6.30	.....
.....	.....	7.00	.....	7.00	11.00	7.00	.....
8.10	8.10	8.00	.....	8.10	11.30	7.30	.....
9.20	8.20	8.10	.....	8.10	A. M.	Change cars	.....
10.30	10.30	9.20	.....	9.20	7.00	at West	.....
11.45	11.45	10.15	.....	10.15	7.30	Oakland.	.....
.....	.....	11.45	.....	11.45	8.00	.....	.....

CHICKERING

PIANO WAREROOMS,

31 POST ST., Mechanics' Institute Building.

ELEGANT PIANOS.

L. K. HAMMER,

Sole Agent for Pacific Coast.

Owners of Chickering Pianos are specially requested to leave orders for tuning at Warerooms, 31 Post Street.

KNABE
PIANOS

Grand, Square, and Upright.

BEST STOCK OF SHEET MUSIC.

BANCROFT, KNIGHT & Co.,
733 MARKET STREET.

PIANOS

NO. 12 TYLER STREET, S. F.

These Pianos are all three-stringed, with ivory keys, not imitation.

PIANOS

SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED PIANOS.

Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.

WOODWORTH, SCHELL & Co.
12 Post Street San Francisco.

STOVES

FOR PARLORS, OFFICES, HALLS
BED-ROOMS, CHURCHES,
STORES, ETC., ETC.THE LARGEST STOCK AND
the greatest variety on the Pacific Coast.

500

DIFFERENT SIZES, STYLES, AND PATTERNS to select from.

W. W. MONTAGUE &amp; CO.

NOS. 110, 112, 114, 118, &amp; 120 BATTERY ST.

THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE stockholders of the Sierra Nevada Silver Mining Company, for the election of a board of Trustees to serve for the ensuing year, and for the transaction of such other business as may be properly brought before the meeting, will be held at the office of the Company, Room 4- Nevada Block, No. 30, Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California, on Wednesday, the fifteenth day of January, 1879, at one o'clock P. M. Transfer tickets will be closed on Wednesday, January 8th, 1879, until after the meeting, San Francisco, December 27th, 1878.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATOR,

WILLIAM DOOLAN,

Office No. 12 Nevada Block.

DECORATION OF THE LEGION OF HONOR.
AWARD OF THE GOLD MEDAL.
FIVE DIPLOMAS OF MERIT!THE PARIS EXPOSITION HAS AWARDED THE DECORATION OF the LEGION OF HONOR to MR. HENRY BREWSTER, senior member of the firm of

BREWSTER &amp; CO.

(OF BROOME STREET,)

CARRIAGE BUILDERS,

Of the city of New York. Also, the Gold Medal, and five Diplomas of Merit to the several foremen of departments, for an exhibition of Thirteen Carriages, a Park Drag, Pleasure Vehicles, and a Racing Sulky, at the late Exposition, as a recognition of the superior excellence of the work of the firm.

W. J. DONLEY, the representative, is now in San Francisco, and may be found at
O. F. Willey & Co's, or at the Baldwin.

Messrs. O. F. WILLEY &amp; CO., 427 Montgomery St., are Sole Agents in California.

BREWSTER &amp; CO. (OF BROOME STREET,)

Broadway, 47th and 48th Streets, New York City.

ELITE DIRECTORY

For San Francisco, Oakland, and Vicinity.

A Private Address, Carriage, and Club Directory and Visiting Guide, containing the Names and Residence Address of nearly Six Thousand Society People.

THE BLUE BOOK OF THE PACIFIC COAST.

Ready on or about the first of January, 1879.

A. L. BANCROFT &amp; CO., Publishers.

HOLIDAY ANNOUNCEMENT.

Great Sacrifices in Fine Custom Clothing left on hand at

NICOLL THE TAILOR'S

Great bargains offered during the next two weeks to reduce stock for ANNUAL IN-VENTORY, which will be taken the first week in January. No better present can be made than a cheap, substantial suit of clothes. Call immediately, and secure THE CHOICEST BARGAINS.

NICOLL THE TAILOR

Would call the attention of gentlemen to the daily arrivals of New York styles of French, English and Domestic goods from his London and New York houses. Gentlemen before calling elsewhere will do well to call and inspect his immense stock.SALE PRICES.—Pants from $3.00; Suits from $12.00; Overcoats from $12.00;
Vests from $2.00; Coats from $7.00. The trade and public supplied with Cloth and Trimnings at wholesale prices. Any length cut, and all kinds of Cloth kept in stock.
Samples, with instructions for self-measurement, sent free.

TO ORDER.

Pants .....	from $4.00	Black Doeskin Pants.....	from $7.00
Suits .....	" 15.00	White Vests.....	" 3.00
Overcoats .....	" 15.00	Fancy Vests.....	" 6.00
Dress Coats.....	" 20.00	Genuine 6 x Beaver Suits.....	" 55.00

Finest Stock of Woolens in the World.

NICOLL THE TAILOR'S GRAND TAILORING EMPORIUM,
727 Market St., 505 Montgomery St., 18 Kearny St., 160 Third St.,
And 853 Broadway, Oakland."DOMESTIC"
THE LIGHT RUNNING
SEWING MACHINE,

SEWING MACHINE,

The only really light-running lock-stitch Sewing Machine in the market.

"DOMESTIC" PAPER FASHIONS

Elegant, stylish, and reliable.

J. W. EVANS, 20 Post Street, San Francisco.

STEINWAY

&amp; SON'S

PIANOS

Two Highest Awards for the best Pianos and Piano Forte Material,U. S. CENTENNIAL EXHIBITION, Philadelphia, 1876.The Steinway Pianos alone were accorded the "highest degree of excellence in all styles."The First Grand Gold Medal of Honor, Exposition Universelle, Paris, 1867.Grand Honorary Testimonial Medal, Society of Fine Arts, Paris, 1867.Grand National Gold Medal, from H. M.
King Charles XV. of Sweden and
Norway, 1868.Academical Honors of the Royal Academies,
Berlin and Stockholm.First Prize Medal, International Exhibition,
London, 1862.Twenty-five First Medals at American Exhibitions.Testimonials and Certificates,
From the Most Eminent Musicians, Composers, and Artists in the World, who all unite in the Unanimous Verdict of the Superiority of the Steinway Pianos over all others.Every Steinway Piano is Fully Warranted for Five Years.Illustrated Catalogues, with Price List, Mailed Free on Application.

STEINWAY HALL.

GRAY'S

MUSIC STORE

117 POST STREET.

PALMER BROS.

726 TO 734 MARKET ST.,

Have a full assortment of

LADIES' AND GENTS' FURNISH-
ing Goods, Toilet Articles, Corsets, Embroideries,
French and Valenciennes Laces, a fine assortment of Veil-
ings and Rubings, and the largest stock of

MILLINERY GOODS,

And the best stock of

BOYS' CLOTHING AND HATS & CAPS
In the city.PACIFIC BUSINESS
COLLEGE,
320 POST STREET,
San Francisco.

